INTRODUCTION

In the last decade, there has been dramatic growth in Massachusetts in the number of communities that have formed Local Education Foundations to support education in their public schools. These LEFs have developed in response to concerns about the schools and to the desire to play a role in strengthening student learning.

Most LEFs have been initiated in a climate of reduced budgets for schools. To address their concerns, they have mobilized parents, citizens, business people, local organizations, colleges and universities, and interested others to provide human, material, and financial support that benefits teachers, administrators, and students.

LEFs also are serving as catalysts that are involving community members in helping to shape the educational agenda in school districts. Through participation in system-wide and school-building planning and decision making teams, and through coordination of the LEF's priorities with those of the educators, LEFs are involving the community in designing long-term plans for school improvement.

LEF ORGANIZATION AND PROGRAMMATIC ACTIVITY

Formation

Local Education Foundations are generally grass roots organizations that reflect their local community and that respond to local needs. In urban areas, these LEFs frequently have been initiated by school administrators or the business community. In rural and suburban communities, they are more often initiated by parents and other citizens.

Fund Raising

In order to benefit from laws governing tax exempt status, most LEFs form non-profit organizations and establish the required boards of directors. LEFs use a variety of approaches to garnering human and physical resources for their schools that include local fund raising, grant proposals to corporations and foundations, brokering community partnerships for the schools, and securing in-kind contributions of "work, wealth, and where-with-all."

Programming

LEF programmatic activity in many communities is weighted in favor of teachers. Mini-grant programs, professional development workshops and retreats, and recognition and appreciation programs have been developed by many LEFs for teachers and administrators. Programs that are directly targeted toward students, more common in urban communities, include scholarships, award and recognition events, projects related to school pride and school climate.

School Improvement

Established and emerging LEFs are recognizing the potential of their organizations for being players in school improvement. They are helping to involve their communities in strategic planning that is focusing citizens on educational issues and enabling school managers to participate in training in organizational development and planning. They also are helping to ensure that school programming reflects the diversity in the community and is designed to meet the educational needs of all students.

THIS DIRECTORY

This directory of LEFs in Massachusetts is based on a survey that was disseminated in the summer of 1991 by the Office of Community Education of the Massachusetts Department of Education to school superintendents and LEFs of which we were aware. It updates the listing of LEFs that is provided in an earlier publication, Private Support for Public Schools: A Description of Local Education Funds in Massachusetts (1988), which provides a more detailed description of the organization, programming, and goals of LEFs.

We hope that leaders in LEFs will use this publication to network with other LEFs across the state as they work to involve their communities in meaningful school improvement.
