This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world’s books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that’s often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book’s long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google’s system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google “watermark” you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can’t offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book’s appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google’s mission is to organize the world’s information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world’s books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/
DEBATES

IN THE

MASSACHUSETTS

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

1917-1918

4 vols.

CHAPTERS I TO XV

BOSTON

WRIGHT & POTTER PRINTING CO., STATE PRINTERS
32 DERNE STREET
1919
PREFACE.

The Convention directed its Committee on Rules and Procedure to publish a report of the Debates. At the request of the Committee its ranking member undertook the oversight of preparation and publication. He was of the belief that the convenience of legislators, lawyers, historians, students, and others who might have occasion to consult the report would be subserved by departing from the customary method of arrangement, which has been purely chronological, strictly consecutive. Under that method it is often hard to find all that has been said on any given topic; and there must be much waste of time in the use of the index, with some degree of uncertainty as to the result of search. Therefore it was determined to make the arrangement topical, with the attempt to group allied topics and to secure a sequence in general conformity with the order followed in the Constitution itself. If this occasionally brings comment or allusion in advance of the subject thereof, it is hoped that any inconvenience will be more than offset by the advantages of systematic arrangement.

The directions given by the Convention permitted the omission of so much of the debate as related to matters of procedure, and only that has been retained which is necessary to an understanding of the main argument, or throws desirable light on the circumstances of the discussion. In case any reader should have occasion to determine whether relevant matter of consequence does not here appear, he may consult the verbatim transcript of the stenographic notes, which has been filed in the State Library.

After the first session (June–November, 1917) it seemed desirable to publish at once the debate on the Initiative and Referendum. This was of suitable length for a volume by itself; and with the hope that it might prove to be in logical order as Volume II., Chapter XVI., was so printed. The course of debate in the following session (June–August, 1918) has made it possible to devote Volume I. in the main to topics concerning the Bill of Rights, with the probability that the final volume (or volumes) will chiefly comprise discussion of topics relating to the Frame of Government.

A condensed record of the treatment of each topic is prefixed to the report of its debate. For the lists of Yea and Nay votes and the full record of collateral procedure, the Journal may be consulted.

It is fitting that credit should be here given to those who have shared in the preparation of these volumes. The stenography was the work of Frank H. Burt, Arthur T. Lovell, and William L. Haskel, expert in their art, accurate and prompt in performance. The editing has been done by William H. Sanger, Assistant Clerk of the Senate, journalist by training, diligent and skilful in carrying through an exceptionally intricate and arduous task. The indexing (except of the second volume) was intrusted to David M. Matteson, specialist in applying scientific methods to such effort. The printing presented unusual problems, by reason of the topical arrangement, which required keeping a great deal of matter in type, pending completion of the debate on the various topics, and it was fortunate that there were at command such facilities as those of the State printers, the Wright & Potter Printing Co., who heartily coöperated in accomplishing the ends desired.

ROBERT LUCE,

For the Committee on Rules and Procedure.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Provision for the Convention</td>
<td>vii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Members of the Convention</td>
<td>x</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Opening Ceremonies and Organisation</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Report of Proceedings and Debates</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Manual of the Convention</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Contested Seats in the Convention</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I.</td>
<td>Preamble</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II.</td>
<td>Appropriations for Sectarian and Other Institutions</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III.</td>
<td>Universities and Colleges and the Encouragement of Literature</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV.</td>
<td>The Golden Rule</td>
<td>364</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V.</td>
<td>Defence of the Accused:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Public Defender</td>
<td>365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Law of the Land</td>
<td>369</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Testimony by the Accused</td>
<td>374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Rules of Evidence</td>
<td>380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VI.</td>
<td>Challenge of Judge and Jurors</td>
<td>381</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VII.</td>
<td>Verdicts of Juries</td>
<td>389</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Right to Trial by Jury</td>
<td>437</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIII.</td>
<td>Abolition of Capital Punishment</td>
<td>439</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IX.</td>
<td>Organisation of the Courts</td>
<td>450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X.</td>
<td>Power of Courts to Declare Statutes Unconstitutional</td>
<td>453</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XI.</td>
<td>Public Interest in Natural Resources</td>
<td>542</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XII.</td>
<td>Necessaries of Life</td>
<td>632</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIII.</td>
<td>The Police Power</td>
<td>851</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Authority of the General Court</td>
<td>854</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Rights of the People</td>
<td>872</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIV.</td>
<td>Election and Tenure of Judicial Officers:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Election of Judges</td>
<td>874</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Tenure of Judicial Officers</td>
<td>911</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Appointment of District Attorneys</td>
<td>1,031</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XV.</td>
<td>Injunctions and Labor Disputes</td>
<td>1,040</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
PROVISION FOR THE CONVENTION.

The General Court of 1916 made provision for the Constitutional Convention in Chapter 98 of the General Acts of that year. The Act was as follows:—

AN ACT TO ASCERTAIN AND CARRY OUT THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE RELATIVE TO THE CALLING AND HOLDING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Section 1. For the purpose of ascertaining the will of the people of the Commonwealth with reference to the calling and holding of a Constitutional Convention, the Secretary of the Commonwealth shall cause to be placed on the official ballot to be used at the next annual State election the following question: — "Shall there be a Convention to revise, alter or amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth?" The votes upon said question shall be received, sorted, counted, declared and transmitted to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, laid before the Governor and Council, and by them opened and examined, in accordance with the laws relating to votes for State officers so far as they are applicable. The Governor shall, by public proclamation, on or before the first Wednesday in January next, make known the result by declaring the number of votes in the affirmative and the number in the negative; and if it shall appear that a majority of said votes is in the affirmative, it shall be deemed and taken to be the will of the people that a Convention be called and held to revise, alter or amend the Constitution, and in his proclamation the Governor shall call upon the people to elect delegates to the Convention, at a special election to be held in all the cities and towns of the Commonwealth on the first Tuesday in May in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen.

Section 2. The number of delegates to be elected to the Convention shall be three hundred and twenty, of whom sixteen shall be elected at large, sixty-four by the sixteen congressional districts, to wit, four by each district, and two hundred and forty by the legislative representative districts of the Commonwealth, each district having the same number of delegates as it is then entitled to elect representatives to the General Court.

Section 3. Nomination of candidates for the office of delegate to the Constitutional Convention shall be made by nomination papers without party or political designation which shall be signed in the aggregate by not less than twelve hundred voters for each candidate at large, by not less than five hundred voters for each candidate for delegate from a congressional district, and by not less than one hundred voters for each candidate for delegate from a legislative representative district. Said papers shall be filed on or before five o'clock in the afternoon on the first Tuesday in March in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen. No person shall be a candidate for delegate in more than one district, or both in a district and at large. If nomination papers for more than one nomination for delegate are filed in behalf of a candidate, and if, within seventy-two hours after five o'clock in the afternoon of the first Tuesday in March aforesaid, he withdraws all but one nomination, the remaining nomination shall be valid. No person shall be a candidate for delegate from a legislative representative district in which he does not reside.

Section 4. If in the Commonwealth at large, or in any district, the number of persons nominated by nomination papers equals or exceeds three times the number to be elected delegates as provided by section two, a non-partisan primary shall be held in the Commonwealth, or in such district, on the first Tuesday of April in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen. At such primary, twice the number of persons to be elected delegates shall be chosen from those nominated by nomination papers, and those so chosen shall be deemed nominated as candidates for delegate, and their names only shall appear on the ballot at said special election. The provisions of section five of this act shall, so far as is consistent herewith, apply to the primaries provided for by this section.

Section 5. At the special election to be held under the provisions of section one, every person then entitled to vote for State officers shall have the right to vote for sixteen delegates at large, for four delegates from his congressional district, and for the number of delegates from his representative district to which that district is entitled under the provisions of section two. The number of delegates of each class for which the voter has the right to vote shall appear on the official ballot. No party or political designation shall appear on said ballot.

Section 6. The persons elected delegates shall meet in Convention in the State House, in Boston, on the first Wednesday in June in the year nineteen hundred and seventeen. They shall be the judges of the returns and election of their own members, and may adjourn from time to time; and one hundred and sixty-one of the persons elected shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. They shall be called to order by the Governor, and shall proceed to organize themselves in Convention, by choosing a President and such other officers and such committees as they may deem expedient, and by establishing rules of procedure; and when organized, they may take into consideration the propriety and expediency of revising the present Constitution of the Commonwealth, or making alterations or amendments thereof. Any such revision, alterations or amendments, when made and adopted by the said Convention, shall be submitted to the people for their ratification and adoption, in such manner as the Convention shall direct; and if ratified and adopted by the people in the manner directed by the Convention, the Constitution shall be deemed and taken to be revised, altered or amended accordingly; and if not so ratified and adopted the present Constitution shall be and remain the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

Section 7. The Convention shall be provided by the Sergeant-at-Arms, at the expense of the Commonwealth, with suitable quarters and facilities for exercising its functions. It shall establish the compensation of its officers and members, which shall not exceed seven hundred and fifty dollars for each member of the Convention as such.
It shall, subject to the approval of the Governor and Council, provide for such other expenses of its session as it shall deem expedient, and may cause to be prepared and issued a statement briefly setting forth such arguments as the Convention may see fit relative to any revision, alteration or amendment of the Constitution adopted by it, or any part thereof. The members of the Convention shall receive the mileage specified in section eight of chapter three of the Revised Laws, as amended by chapter six hundred and seventy-six of the Acts of the year nineteen hundred and eleven.
The Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, is authorized to draw his warrant on the treasury for any of the foregoing expenses.

Section 8. The Secretary of the Commonwealth is hereby directed to transmit forthwith printed copies of this act to the selectmen of each town and the mayor of each city within the Commonwealth; and whenever the Governor shall issue his proclamation, calling upon the people to elect delegates, the Secretary shall also, immediately thereafter, transmit printed copies of said proclamation, attested by him, to the selectmen and mayors.

Section 9. All laws relating to nominations and nomination papers, and to primaries, elections and corrupt practices therein, shall, so far as is consistent here-with, apply to the nomination of candidates for delegate to the Convention, and to the primaries and special election provided for by this act.

Approved April 3, 1916.

The Act providing for the calling and holding of the Constitutional Convention was accepted by the people Tuesday, November 7, 1916, by a vote of 217,293 to 120,979.
MEMBERS OF THE CONVENTION.

The special election was held Tuesday, May 1, 1917, and the following delegates were elected: —

Adams, Brooks, of Quincy.
Adams, Charles Francis, of Concord.
Adams, Scott, of Springfield.
Adams, Smith J., of Lowell.
Anderson, Frederick L., of Newton.
Anderson, George W., of Brookline.
Avery, Nathan P., of Holyoke.
Aylward, James F., of Cambridge.
Bailey, Charles O., of Newbury.
Bailey, J. Warren, of Somerville.
Balch, Francis N., of Boston.
Ballantyne, John, of Boston.
Bangs, Francis R., of Boston.
Barker, Warren S., of Fall River.
Barnes, Clarence A., of Mansfield.
Barnes, George L., of Weymouth.
Barrett, James T., of Cambridge.
Bartlett, Horace I., of Newburyport.
Bassett, Edmund, of Taunton.
Batchelder, Albert W., of Salem.
Bates, John L., of Brookline.
Bates, Sanford, of Boston.
Bauer, Ralph S., of Lynn.
Begley, John S., of Holyoke.
Bennett, Frank P., of Saugus.
Benton, Everett C., of Belmont.
Berggren, Roy F., of Lynn.
Besse, Harold A., of Newburyport.
Bicknell, Wallace H., of Weymouth.
Bigney, Robert E., of Boston.
Bird, Charles S., Jr., of Walpole.
Blackmur, Paul R., of Quincy.
Bodfish, John D. W., of Barnstable.
Bolster, Percy G., of Boston.
Bosworth, Henry H., of Springfield.
Boucher, Joseph Zoël, of New Bedford.
Bouvé, Walter L., of Hingham.
Bowen, Patrick, of Boston.
Boyden, Frank L., of Deerfield.
Boyer, Elmer E., of Lynn.
Boynton, Thomas J., of Everett.
Brackett, John Q. A., of Arlington.

Brennan, James H., of Boston.
Brennan, James J., of Boston.
Brine, Henry C., of Somerville.
Broderick, Patrick S., of Waltham.
Brooks, George F., of Worcester.
Brown, E. Gerry, of Brockton.
Brown, Samuel F., of Springfield.
Bruce, Charles, of Everett.
Bryant, Lincoln, of Milton.
Buck, Maurice A., of Billerica.
Bullock, William J., of New Bedford.
Burns, William A., of Pittsfield.
Burrell, Fred J., of Medford.
Butler, A. Webster, of Brockton.
Buttrick, Allan G., of Lancaster.
Callahan, Timothy F., of Boston.
Carr, Edward, of Hopkinton.
Chandler, Leonard B., of Somerville.
Charbonneau, Henry V., of Lowell.
Chase, Mial W., of Lynn.
Chaste, Charles F., Jr., of Southborough.
Churchill, George B., of Amherst.
Clapp, Robert P., of Lexington.
Clark, Chester W., of Wilmington.
Clark, Eara W., of Brockton.
Coakley, Daniel H., of Boston.
Codman, James M., Jr., of Brookline.
Coe, S. Hamilton, of Worcester.
Coleman, George W., of Boston.
Collier, David R., of Gardner.
Collins, Samuel L., of Amesbury.
Coogan, Clement F., of Pittsfield.
Cook, Benjamin A., of Fitchburg.
Cook, Rufus H., of Northampton.
Coolidge, Louis A., of Milton.
Coome, Zelotes W., of Worcester.
Cooney, Charles P., of Peabody.
Corrigan, Robert S., of Natick.
Costello, Francis M., of Boston.
Coughlan, William J., of Boston.
Cox, Guy W., of Boston.
Crafts, Lyman A., of Whately.

1 Died February 15, 1918.
2 Died April 6, 1918.
MEMBERS OF THE CONVENTION.

Craven, John H., of Boston.

Creamer, Walter H., of Lynn.

Creed, James F., of Boston.

Crosby, J. Howell, of Arlington.

Crosley, William Cyril, of Fall River.

Cumming, Herbert E., of North Brookfield.

Cumming, John W., of Fall River.

Curtis, Arthur B., of Revere.

Curtis, Charles P., Jr., of Boston.

Curtis, Edwin U., of Boston.

Curtiss, Elmer L., of Hingham.

Cusick, John F., of Boston.

Dale, George H., of Watertown.

Daley, Peter, of Lowell.

Daly, John W., of Lowell.

Davis, Elbridge G., of Malden.

Davis, William R., of Cambridge.

Day, Charles M., of Winchendon.

Dean, Robert A., of Fall River.

Delaney, Louis F., of Holyoke.

Delano, Robert T., of Wareham.

Dellinger, Raymond P., of Wakefield.

Derbyshire, James H., of Lawrence.

Doe, Orestes T., of Franklin.

Donnelly, James P., of Lawrence.

Donohue, John A., of Boston.

Donovan, Daniel R., of Springfield.

Donovan, James A., of Lawrence.

Donovan, Thomas F., of Boston.

Doran, James P., of New Bedford.

Douglass, John J., of Boston.

Dreese, Frank F., of Worcester.

Driscol, Dennis D., of Boston.

Driscol, Timothy J., of Boston.

Dutch, Charles Frederick, of Winchester.

Ellis, Theodore W., of Springfield.

Farnsworth, Frank S., of Leominster.

Feiker, William H., of Northampton.

Ferrey, Irving D., of Pittsfield.

Ferry, James R., of Northbridge.

Finn, E. Philip, of Chelsea.

Fisher, Edward, of Westford.

Fits–Randolph, Reginald T., of Nantucket.

Flaherty, William, of Boston.

Flye, Louis Edwin, of Holbrook.

Flynn, Maurice R., of Malden.

Foss, George H., of Springfield.

Fraser, Eugene B., of Lynn.

French, Asa P., of Randolph.

Frost, Archie N., of Lawrence.

Gallagher, Daniel J., of Boston.

Garland, Francis P., of Somerville.

Gartland, John J., of Boston.

Gates, Joseph S., of Westborough.

Gaylord, Henry E., of South Hadley.

George, Samuel W., of Haverhill.

Giddings, Charles, of Great Barrington.

Glazier, Frederick P., of Hudson.

Gleason, Nebsit G., of Andover.

Good, John P., of Cambridge.

Granfield, William J., of Springfield.

Graumann, John, of Boston.

Green, Thomas H., of Boston.

Greenwood, Hamlet S., of Lowell.

Haines, Benjamin F., of Medford.

Hale, Edward R., of Haverhill.

Hale, Matthew, of Boston.

Hall, Elisha S., of Orange.

Hall, Frederick S., of Taunton.

Hall, Isaac Freeman, of North Adams.

Hamilton, Andrew Foster, of Athol.

Harding, Clarence W., of Whitman.

Harriman, Arthur N., of New Bedford.

Harrington, Patrick H., of Fall River.

Hart, Albert Bushnell, of Cambridge.

Hawley, Truman R., of Malden.

Hibbard, Charles E., of Pittsfield.

Hicks, George H., of Fall River.

Hobbe, Clarence W., Jr., of Worcester.

Hoitt, Augustus J., of Lynn.

Horgan, Francis J., of Boston.

Howard, Charles F., of Reading.

Hutchings, Henry M., of Dedham.

Johnson, Charles R., of Worcester.

Jones, George R., of Melrose.

Kelner, John A., of Boston.

Kelley, George W., of Rockland.

Kelley, Thomas R., of Boston.

Kennedy, Thomas W., of Palmer.

Kenny, Herbert A., of Boston.

Kerr, Alexander, of Malden.

Kilbon, John L., of Springfield.

Kinney, William S., of Boston.

Kneal, Arthur S., of Westfield.

Knott, J. Franklin, of Somerville.
MEMBERS OF THE CONVENTION.

Lane, Daniel W., of Boston.
Lane, Dwight F., of Dighton.
Langelier, Louis F. R., of Quincy.
Larson, Charles G., of Worcester.
Leboeuf, Telephore, of Webster.
Leonard, Joseph J., of Boston.
Linke, Fred R., of West Springfield.
Logan, James, of Worcester.
Lomasney, Martin M., of Boston.
Look, William J., of Tisbury.
Loring, Augustus P., of Beverly.
Love, Joseph A., of Webster.
Lowe, Arthur H., of Fitchburg.
Lowell, James A., of Newton.
Luce, Robert, of Waltham.
Luftin, Willfred W., of Essex.
Lummers, Henry T., of Lynn.
Lyman, Frank E., of Easthampton.
Lynch, John C., of Milford.

MacMaster, Edward A., of Bridgewater.
Maguire, James E., of Boston.
Mahoney, John J., of Boston.
Malone, Dana, of Greenfield.
Mancovitz, David, of Boston.
Mansfield, John J., of Boston.
Martin, Daniel A., of Holyoke.
Martin, Martin L., of Boston.
McAnarney, John W., of Quincy.
McCaffrey, George H., Jr., of Boston.
McCarty, Charles F., of Marlborough.
McCormack, John W., of Boston.
McLean, Daniel V., of Boston.
McKean, Francis F., of Worcester.
McLaud, Abner S., of Greenfield.
Merriam, John M., of Framingham.
Merrill, George Frye, of Gloucester.
Michelman, Joseph, of Boston.
Mitchell, Charles, of New Bedford.
Mitchell, John, of Springfield.
Montague, David T., of Boston.
Moore, Charles D. C., of Swampscott.
Moran, William, of Fall River.
Moriarty, James T., of Boston.
Morrill, Charles H., of Haverhill.
Morton, James M., of Fall River.
Moynihan, James J., of Boston.
Murley, Joseph J., of Boston.
Murphy, John L., of Chelsea.
Myron, John F., of Boston.
Nestor, Patrick F., of Lowell.
Newhall, Arthur N., of Stoneham.
Newton, H. Huestis, of Everett.
Nutting, Edward H., of Leominster.
O'Connell, John J., of Lowell.
O'Connell, John P., of Salem.
O'Connell, Joseph F., of Boston.
O'Connor, John D., of Chicopee.
Parker, George S., of Boston.
Parker, Herbert, of Lancaster.
Parkman, Henry, of Boston.
Peirce, Albion G., of Methuen.
Pelletier, Joseph C., of Boston.
Perry, Augustus W., of Boston.
Peterson, Patrick, of Brockton.
Pillsbury, Albert E., of Wellesley.
Powers, Samuel L., of Newton.
Putnam, Harry B., of Westfield.
Quincy, Josiah, of Boston.
Quinn, Timothy F., of Sharon.
Ray, Herbert L., of Sutton.
Reidy, Michael J., of Boston.
Richardson, Edward A., of Ayer.
Richardson, James P., of Newton.
Rieutord, Louis O., of Southbridge.
Robbins, Edward J., of Chelmsford.
Robinson, George H., of Sturbridge.
Ross, Samuel, of New Bedford.
Russell, Walter F., of Brockton.
Saunders, Amos T., of Clinton.
Sawyer, Roland D., of Ware.
Scigliano, Alfred P., of Boston.
Shanahan, William J., of Somerville.
Shattuck, Josiah B., of Worcester.
Shaw, Michael F., of Revere.
Shea, John M., of Dalton.
Shea, John T., of Cambridge.
Sheehan, Christopher A., of Boston.
Sherburne, Nelson, of West Springfield.
Skerrett, Mark N., of Worcester.
Smith, Jerome S., of Provincetown.
Smith, Rutherford E., of Lynnfield.
Sparrell, Ernest H., of Norwell.
Stearns, Harry N., of Cambridge.
Stoeber, Charles, of Adams.
Stoneman, David, of Boston.
Sullivan, Edmund G., of Salem.
Sullivan, Joseph M., of Boston.

1 Died August 13, 1917.
2 Died June 22, 1917.
3 Declared seated by the Convention.
MEMBERS OF THE CONVENTION.

Sullivan, Michael A., of Lawrence.
Sullivan, William H., of Boston.
Sullivan, William J., of Boston.
Sweeney, Edward A., of Attleboro.
Sweet, Joseph L., of Attleboro.
Swig, Louis, of Taunton.

Talbot, Harry R., of Plymouth.
Tatman, Charles T., of Worcester.
Theller, Ralph L., of New Bedford.
Thompson, Edward, of Beverly.
Thompson, Hubert C., of Haverhill.
Thompson, John L., of North Attleborough.
Tilton, Rufus H., of Springfield.
Trefry, William D. T., of Marblehead.
Turner, Joseph, of Fall River.
Twomey, John C., of Lawrence.

Underhill, Charles L., of Somerville.

Walcott, Robert, of Cambridge.
Walker, George, of New Bedford.

Walker, Joseph, of Brookline.
Walsh, David L., of Fitchburg.
Waahburn, Albert H., of Middleborough.
Waahburn, Charles G., of Worcester.
Waterman, George B., of Williamstown.
Webster, Francis E., of Waltham.
Webster, George P., of Haverhill.
Weekes, George LeRoy, of Harwich.
Wellman, Arthur Holbrook, of Topsfield.
Wheeler, William, of Concord.
Wheelock, Henry H., of Fitchburg.
Whipple, Sherman L., of Brookline.
White, John A., of North Brookfield.
Whitehead, James, of Fall River.
Whittier, Eugene P., of Winthrop.
Willett, George Franklin, of Norwood.
Williams, Fred Homer, of Brookline.
Wilson, William H., of Lowell.
Wing, Herbert, of Dartmouth.
Winslow, Guy M., of Newton.
Wonsoon, Carlton W., of Gloucester.
Wood, Charles J., of Cambridge.

Youngman, William S., of Boston.
PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS
PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS.

OPENING CEREMONIES AND ORGANIZATION.

The Convention assembled at the State House, in the chamber of the House of Representatives, at 11 A.M., June 6. His Excellency, Samuel W. McCall, Governor, after calling the Convention to order, asked Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, D.D., Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts, to offer prayer.

PRAYER BY BISHOP LAWRENCE.

O Almighty God, in whom dwellth righteousness and truth, who art the only source of Light and Life, pour down upon us, who are met in solemn assembly to consider the foundations of the government of this Commonwealth, the rich gifts of Thy good spirit.

We praise Thee for the work of our fathers who gave to us a Constitution under which the Commonwealth has increased in strength and virtue. We treasure with gratitude the names of those who in times of peace and of war have given their lives for the State. We name the institutions of justice, learning, mercy, and piety that have arisen under the protection of the law and in the atmosphere of civil and religious liberty. We rejoice in the increasing recognition of the rights and privileges of all citizens and of the responsibility of all to uphold the government and to defend the Nation.

As we enter upon our work, may we be conscious of the solemn responsibility laid upon us by the people. Save us from all error, ignorance, pride, and prejudice. And of Thy great mercy direct and prosper all our consultations and actions to the advancement of Thy glory and the safety, honor, and welfare of the people, so that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us all for generations.

We pray also for the President of the United States, the Governor of this State and all others in authority. Grant to them at this time special gifts of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and strength, that, upholding what is right, and following what is true, they may obey Thy Holy Will. Give skill and strength to our Army and Navy.

Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning and pure manners. Defend our liberties, preserve our unity; save us from lawlessness and violence, from pride and arrogance. Fashion into one happy people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. In time of prosperity fill our hearts with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble suffer not our trust in Thee to fail. Hasten the day when all nations shall dwell together in peace.

We now commend ourselves, O Heavenly Father, to Thee, to the establishment of justice and to the service of the people. Send out Thy light. Let Thy truth lead us. Amen.
ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR SAMUEL W. McCALL.

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION: It has been nearly two generations since the people of the Commonwealth have entrusted to any body of men the task they have just confided to you. Since the Convention which framed our Constitution nearly one hundred and fifty years ago, there have been before to-day but two Constitutional Conventions. The rarity of the occasions upon which the people have exercised their power to summon together a body of men to consider changes in their organic law, serves to mark the distinction of the work. But the character of those whom they have chosen, no less indicates the view they take of its importance. On the three occasions when conventions have been held their membership has been made up from the most eminent citizens of the Commonwealth. It may be doubted whether any more distinguished body of men have ever assembled in America since the adoption of the Declaration of Independence than were contained in the conventions of 1820 and 1853. Some of the speeches made in the latter Convention have become classic, and are still studied and admired by all who are interested in public affairs.

You are meeting to-day under the dispiriting influence of war, and at the first thought it might seem that the time was not propitious for your work. But with all its evils war often brings a quickening perception of conditions. It makes more alert the sense of danger, and experience has shown that under its shadows have been devised some of the most liberal and enduring systems of government. We have a convincing instance in our own history since our Constitution was framed when the country was in the throes of the great revolutionary struggle. The autocratic origin of the present war, sweeping like a devastating conflagration over the whole world, has produced a reaction in favor of popular freedom and those democratic institutions which it was the first purpose of the framers of our Constitution to establish.

We are now living in a very different world from that upon which our fathers looked. We have about us social and industrial conditions of which they never dreamed. In the place of the toll-bridge we have the great transcontinental railway. The spinning wheel has given way to the modern factory with its thousand looms. The slow and haphazard mail has been succeeded by the telephone, the telegraph, and the modern post-office. But human nature remains the constant factor, for it has changed little if at all from the earlier time, and the necessity is no less great now than then that power should be defined and political rights made secure. I take it that your duty is not so much to create a new Constitution as to adapt to modern conditions the principles of the Constitution already made. The highest fitness for your work is the ability to understand and to reverence the fundamental ideas of democracy and liberty that animated the men of 1780. That Constitution provided with greater perfection than was ever before witnessed a mechanism through which a democracy might express itself, and in spite of any obstacles that then existed, it was able to express itself fairly. The democratic idea will be, I think, the animating principle in your deliberations, and it will be your concern to determine how it may most surely and safely express itself under the conditions of our time.

We have recently been told that the world must be made safe for democracy. There is a sense, I think, in which this expression would not convey the proper conception of democracy. Democracy is not a timid flower, an exotic which needs to be sheltered from the winds and storms, but it is a strong man, making his way in the face of tempests upon the open heath, having in him all the strength of the race, and there is no higher power which can patronize him and make the world safe for him to live in. He would be little attracted to the hot-house or to a fenced and protected enclosure. When democracy fully comes into its own, it will hold sway by imperial right and not by the grant and favor of anybody and it would perhaps be more true to say that democracy will come into its own not when the world is made safe for it, but when it has made itself safe for the world. It can be made safe by endowing it with the necessary organs, by giving it eyes and ears and sure methods of expression, and by giving it a spinal-ity which will enable it to stand erect. Without appropriate organs it would be, as it has so often been, the easy prey of organized privilege; it would tumble about itself, and be as helpless with all its strength as the blind Polyphemus, the huge and shapeless monster to whom the light had been put out. Democracy has usually been at a disadvantage on account of lack of organization. From lack of organization it has been compelled more than once to bear the guilt of glaring faults and it has failed to promote the great ends of government. From lack of effective method of expression it has often seemed to be the government of the most violent and noisy while the great silent deeps of the people were untouched and dumb. A few men united can scatter confused counsels in a great mass divided, and made up of individuals animated by no common plan or purpose of action. Democracy has been too much regarded as a mere ideal to be decried about and not as something which should be shaped to animate and direct practical government in a responsible fashion.

Men who parade the streets in times of revolution with banners inscribed "Down with Authority" are not democrats. They are nothing less than assassins of liberty. The last thing they represent is democracy. Democracy is not opposed to authority. In the nature of things it is subject to it and cannot exist without it. But it must be an authority which is essential and inborn and not an authority that is artificial and imposed upon it. A democratic government is one in which the people rule. But their rule must not be arbitrary and subject only to their own desires. It must be based on justice. The chief purpose of a State is to secure order under justice. Order may be obtained by governments of the most autocratic character, but the element of justice will be little seen, for there can be no broad and comprehensive justice under a government of privilege which is itself a system of injustice to great masses of men. The mere counting of people does not establish what is right and what is wrong, for justice in every case cannot rest upon the will of the more numerous any more than upon the will of the stronger. The few who are at the moment stronger have no right to trample upon the many, and on the other hand, the many who by the power of numbers in a democracy are stronger, have no right to oppress the few. In either case the right rests upon superior force, and if in the scheme of things right may be based upon power, then we must recognize force and not justice as the final arbiter of the world and there is an end to the moral universe. A great Nation with its armies may overrun a weak one, but the greater the relative strength of the oppressor the more heinous is his crime against Heaven; and in the same way in a State, a mass of men may not of right in their organized capacity do injustice even to an individual man. The limitation of justice must rest upon the action of those who are the more powerful because of numbers just as it must rest upon those who are the more powerful for any other reason; and when men have their rights taken away from them and are beaten down by oppression, there will always remain the cry to Heaven which it is nefarious ever to provoke.

Si genus humanum et mortalia tenetis arma,
At sperate deos memores fandi atque nefandi.

You may best provide against injustice by preventing snap judgments and securing to the great mass of the people the opportunity to see and to comprehend what they are about to do. Unless action is preceded by forethought, it is likely to be followed by repentance.

The government of a great democracy must of necessity be conducted by representatives or agents. But it is indispensable that the principals shall always be able to see how their government is carried on. There should be no invisible agencies, agencies not chosen by the people, and not acting in the public weal, but serving purposes of their own. In order that it may be pure, representative government should be so open that the winds may blow and the sun shine through it. There should be nothing secret or hidden in its operation.

Limitation upon government should not be wholly vague and general. Our system in America has express limitations and that is one of the distinctive things in our freedom. Certain fundamental rights of the individual are protected even against the encroachments of government itself. They are rights which have been established in the long struggle of centuries between autocracy and liberty; they are rights which are of the very essence of freedom and which governments have at times been prone to invade. Among them are the right of free speech and of a free press, the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience, and the right to be heard by judges surrounded by every safeguard for the unbiased administration of justice.

I have failed in making myself understood if I have not impressed upon you the fact that the work of a Constitutional Convention possesses a peculiarly serious character. A Legislature acts only for the day. All that it does may be reversed by its immediate successor. Its mistakes may be rectified with comparative ease. The experience of the Commonwealth from year to year may be constantly invoked. But a Convention for the revision of the Constitution meets only at long intervals. Sixty-four years have elapsed since last an assembly of this kind met in Massachusetts. An equal length of time may pass before such a body is again summoned. This circumstance will, I feel sure, assist the Convention to approach its work in the most broad-minded spirit, lifted above that which is transient and of the day by the long vista of the years which lie ahead.
OPENING CEREMONIES AND ORGANIZATION.

I would further impress upon you that the instrument which you are about to revise is the oldest written Constitution now in force anywhere in the world. If England is the mother of Parliaments, Massachusetts may boast with equal pride that she possesses the most ancient frame of government based upon the written word which anywhere exists. This is not a matter of mere antiquarian interest. Some of the peoples now engaged in the war need to be taught that democracy does not mean disorder. To Russia, immersed in the struggle attending the transition from autocracy to democracy, and to the other nations of Europe our history represents an invigorating example of stability, of freedom, and of order, that conclusively shows that liberty is not license and that the rule of the people does not mean the abrogation of law. It must make a convincing appeal to them that during the century and a half of the life of our Constitution there has been no spot upon the globe that has on the whole been better governed, that there has been no place where the door of opportunity has been more equally open to all the children of men, and that there has been no State that has better illustrated the blessings of free government and has made greater progress in those things that tell for real civilization. While the old order changes and gives place to the new, let us approach with reverence the work of adaptation and realize that that which has served us so well in the past and under which we have grown so great should not be lightly cast aside.

I will venture to add one other practical observation which I trust may not be without value to you. The Constitution of Massachusetts is not only the oldest written instrument of government now in force, but of all our State constitutions it is one of the most brief. This is no slight advantage. A Constitution is not a statute. It should be a declaration of fundamental individual rights accompanied by an outline of a frame of government through which organized society may perform its work. In our day, social and economic conditions change with great rapidity and statutes may be required which will soon become obsolete and outgrown. But if the Constitution, — the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, — is made to partake of the nature of a statute, if it shall attempt to specify in detail the rules which should govern the ordinary relations of men to each other and to the State, it cannot hope to have a high degree of permanence. In the period which has elapsed since a Constitutional Convention last sat in this Commonwealth, some of our States have had as many as four such bodies. Those States are not more unstable or prone to change than is our own, but having placed in their Constitutions matter statutory in its nature, they have been obliged to treat it as a statute and resort to frequent revision. It has been the good fortune of Massachusetts thus far to avoid this error. May this Convention preserve her in that happy condition!

And so, gentlemen, the superlative importance of the work you have undertaken justifies the sacrifices you are making. What you do here may affect profoundly the future of the Commonwealth for generations, and it may profoundly affect also the future of other States and of great populations beyond the sea. If you shall pursue your task with diligence and wisdom and your work shall be ratified by the people, you will have the proud satisfaction of having rendered your fellow-men a service as distinguished as it is unique. It is a happy contrast that you present, when, amid the din of arms, when the tread of mighty hosts is shaking the earth and force is settling the relations of nations to each other, you are attempting to perfect a peaceful mechanism through which justice and reason instead of force may have sway over the destinies of men. May the influence of your example help somewhat to bring about the emancipation of mankind to the end that brute force may be supplanted by reason, and the hideous barbarism of war with its vandalism, its murder, its slavery, its rapine, and the other imps which it engenders, may be driven from the earth. [Applause.]
OPENING CEREMONIES AND ORGANIZATION.

ADDRESS OF FORMER GOVERNOR JOHN L. BATES.

Hon. John L. Bates of Brookline, upon being elected President of the Convention, spoke as follows: —

YOUR EXCELLENCY, GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION:

I thank you for the confidence that you have shown and for the high honor you have conferred upon me. To serve as your presiding officer is a great privilege. It brings with it a correspondingly great duty. A full heart prompts me to say that it shall be my only purpose so to discharge that duty that your confidence may be fully justified. Without your hearty support I cannot hope to succeed. May all the differences that have attended the organization of this Convention “in the deep ocean of oblivion be forever buried,” and may the President have your united, helpful coöperation.

The people have entrusted to us a great work, and we are here, in the language of the statute, “to take into consideration the propriety and expediency of revising the present Constitution of the Commonwealth, or making alterations or amendments thereof.”

When the act was accepted by the people last November, in accordance with which we are now met, a large portion of the world was in a state of war. Since then our country has become involved in the great struggle. Yesterday our young men were numbered and registered that they might be called into the military service of the Nation. The greatest war in the history of the human race is being waged. Out of the confusion of its origin, and despite the proposals and ambitions of kings and men, it is each day becoming more clear that all humanity is divided into two great camps, and that by far the larger proportion of nations, not for conquest nor for spoils, but to down absolutism, to overthrow autocracy, and in its place to set up a genuine government of the people, to the end that “the world may be made safe for democracy.” There is, therefore, a most interesting relationship between the world war and the work for which we are met.

The Constitution of Massachusetts was “the first written Constitution in which the people appear at once as author of the government and subject of its laws.” Adopted in 1780, it became the model of all that have followed. When adopted, no nation on earth had a written Constitution. To-day there is hardly any without one, and in them all, whether it be the Constitution of a State in North or South America, in Europe or in Asia, one will find incorporated some of the principles that were first clearly enunciated in the Constitution of
OPENING CEREMONIES AND ORGANIZATION.

Massachusetts, and oftentimes one finds a wording so similar as to show conclusively that the Constitution adopted by Massachusetts in 1780 has been one of the greatest factors in changing the form of government of humanity to that of a representative, constitutional democracy, under which the liberties of men have been secure and their progress unparalleled. It is the Massachusetts idea of democracy, then, that is the center of the world's storm to-day, and may God grant that that idea, triumphant throughout the world, may soon usher in an epoch of peace and liberty and good will for all the peoples of the earth. In these momentous times, then, let us approach our task with a view to help on the cause of democracy through constitutional government.

We have not been elected as representatives of any political faction, and approach the work with our minds free from any partisan prejudice. Let us not unduly delay on matters of mere procedure. May it not be with us "as with men whom small things move," but let us deliberate and argue fully the great things, the fundamentals, to the end that when our work is finished we shall in no way have impaired or weakened the great principles from which our strength has been derived, but rather, so far as found necessary, shall have increased their breadth and scope, so as more fully to adapt them to the conditions of the present age and the future progress of the State.

We are here for Massachusetts, and may all we do contribute to her prosperity, her security, her advancement, her strength, and her honor.
REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

Mr. Powers of Newton, for the committee on Rules and Procedure, who were authorized to report rules and orders for the government of the Convention, reported, in part, on the 13th of June, 1917, recommending the adoption of the following order: —

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Convention be authorized to provide for a stenographic report of the proceedings and debates of the Convention and of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I regret exceedingly that I should be the one to sound the first discordant note in the harmony of the proceedings of your committee on Rules. But, sir, I do not believe I would be doing my full duty to the people of this Commonwealth if I did not bring to the attention of the members at this time the full meaning of this order, which has been almost unanimously presented to this body by the committee on Rules.

I would call the attention of the Convention to the special legislative act of this year making appropriations for this Convention. Section 1 appropriates $350,000 for the expenses of this Convention. The following sections apportion that expense in various ways. There is a sum which covers the salary of the members, there is a sum which provides for the mileage of the members, there is a sum for expenses to be approved by the Secretary of the Commonwealth, making provisions for the primaries. The amount of that provision has been exceeded already, and the Secretary of the Commonwealth will have to make a requisition or appeal for an additional sum to cover the expenses of the primaries. For expenses approved by the Sergeant-at-Arms, for telephone and other necessaries, a small sum is also appropriated. Then the last section says:

For such other expenses, subject to the approval of the Governor and Council, as shall be deemed proper, a sum not exceeding $50,000.

I have gone into this matter very carefully, and I find that this sum of $50,000 will be necessary to carry on the work of the Convention,—the necessary work of this Convention, if you please. The office of the Sergeant-at-Arms must provide messengers, pages and other employees, who will assist the members in carrying on the work. The office of the Secretary must provide clerks and assistants, and provide also someone to assist the members in drawing various measures. The total amount which it is estimated these two offices will require is in the vicinity of $10,000 to $12,000, and that is a very conservative estimate. The printing which will be necessary for the Convention, samples of which you have on your desk,—the Journal of the Convention, the Calendar of the Convention, and the Orders of the Day,—are absolutely necessary and must be provided. The printing will cost in the vicinity of $15,000,—the regular printing for this Convention. This, together with the other necessary expenditures, brings an estimate in the vicinity of $35,000, leaving a balance of $15,000 which can be used by the Convention for incidental matters, or can be used, perhaps, in part, in meeting the expenses of this order.
REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

Let me call to your attention that the order provides that every speech in the Convention or in the Committee of the Whole shall be taken down verbatim in shorthand, and this shall be transcribed, and later on, if it is going to be of any value at all, it must be printed.

In the report of the Convention of 1853 there were 2500 pages of fine type. It is estimated that this Convention will take at least 2900 pages of fine type, or something like four large volumes. The estimate for that printing is about $20,000. The estimate offered for what is supposed to be sufficient in the way of stenographic help is in the vicinity of $6,000 or $7,000.

Now, Mr. President, there may be honest differences of opinion, and I grant you that there are in this case, as in every other. The object of this order is that posterity, law libraries, etc., may have the records of this Convention, at the expense of the people of this Commonwealth. At this particular time, when the people are staggering under excessive burdens,—income taxes, State taxes, local taxes,—when the people are trying their very best to meet the requirements of the situation, and taking from the stockings and from the hiding places their little hoards and investing in Liberty bonds, when we know not what demand may come upon us in a very few days or a few weeks, when we are importuned on every corner and our door bell is rung night after night that we may contribute to this or to that necessary charity, if you please, or organization, which is taking part in the great events of the day, Mr. President,—when the cost of living has reached a point where it is almost impossible for each and every one of us to make both ends meet,—I want, in all seriousness, to ask the members of the Convention if, while the people are crying for bread, you are going to give them books,—and dry ones, at that!

It seems to me, if we pass this order, it will be necessary to go to the Legislature next year and ask for an extra appropriation. My estimate of $50,000 is based upon a very conservative calculation; and, sir, if I may prophesy, and almost stake my reputation upon the prophecy, it will be nearer $75,000 than $50,000. Already we have appropriated through the Legislature $350,000. This will bring the mark very close to a half a million, and who is going to pay for it? It may not be out of your pocket, it may not be out of my pocket, but the only way in which this can be met is through the taxes placed upon the people of this Commonwealth. You perhaps are all familiar with the cartoon where there is a pyramid of men, one standing on the shoulders of the other, and the top figure is dressed in the garb of a soldier, and he says: "I fight for all." The next figure below is the figure of the bishop, clothed in his habiliments, and he says: "I pray for all." And below him, and on the shoulders of the next, stands the lawyer, and he says: "I plead for all." And at the bottom of the heap, with his poor bent back and his brow with the sweat of the day upon it, stands the laboring man, and he says: "I pay for all." It may not appal you, you may not notice it, but the laboring men and the people of this Commonwealth are going to notice this additional expense at this time. Mr. President, when this Convention is so rife with the statements from every speaker "We are here in the interests of the people," I wish that someone would stand by my side this afternoon and plead for something substantial for those people. I think the matter of votes, perhaps, one of the dearest of our liberties, one of the best things in our institution of government, must come secondary if a man finds his wife and family are in need of bread, and lack the necessities of life. I do not believe that the privilege of the ballot is of such great moment to him then. And so without further remarks, simply putting this matter up to the Convention itself whether it desires to spend this money unnecessarily for unborn generations, if you please, people who will have no part in the payment of the same, why, then, sir, I am content that this order should be adopted. But if, on the other hand, any of you have felt the pinch during the past winter, if any of you anticipate what is going to occur during the coming seasons, then, sir, I hope every one of you will take the matter home to himself and that you will vote to save the money of the Commonwealth and to save the money of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The specific proposition before the Convention is that the proceedings of this body shall be taken down in shorthand. If this order prevails it will be followed in due time by an order providing that the proceedings shall be published. There is a middle course that the Convention may follow if it sees fit, which would entail the filing of a single transcript of the stenography in the archives of the Commonwealth, and not entail the immediate printing thereof. For the convenience of the Convention I may be pardoned if I discuss the whole program together, anticipating the possible introduction of the order on printing.

The motion follows the usual course of proceedings in conventions and the almost invariable practice of all the important law-making bodies of the world. It has not come to my knowledge that a single national or unusually important deliberative assembly now fails to provide for a complete verbatim report of what goes on within its walls.

In the matter of Conventions, so far as this State is concerned, the practice of printing reports of debates began with the Convention of 1788, which considered the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The Convention of 1780 was not reported. Its journal has been published. Such information as can be had about the views of the people of the Commonwealth at that time must be secured with difficulty from the musty archives of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, disclosing a marvelous series of discussions that took place in the town-meetings. In 1788 reports of the proceedings were published in two newspapers, and from those reports was compiled the somewhat fragmentary volume we now possess. Also Chief Justice Theophilus Parsons had foresight enough to take notes of the proceedings, and his notes have been found of a value corresponding to that of Madison's famous notes of the proceedings in the Federal Convention.

In 1820 again reliance was had upon newspaper reports. Nathan Hale, the publisher and the editor of the Boston Advertiser, was a member of the Convention, and under his direction Octavius Pickering, who afterward became reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court, was assigned to a seat in the Convention and made such report as he could for the Advertiser. That was printed in the following year in book form, and when the Convention of 1853 gathered, was deemed of such importance that a reprint was ordered. Any one who will look through the volume of 1820 must be impressed with a feeling of thankfulness for the newspaper enterprise of the day, in view of the lack of action by the Convention itself.

In 1853 a full report was ordered, with very little discussion in the Convention. In candor I should say that Nathan Hale himself, who had directed the report of 1820, saw fit in 1853 to deplore the publication of the verbatim proceedings, because he thought they invited to prolixity and verbosity. Nevertheless, the Convention by an overwhelming vote decided to print its debates, and as a result we have an invaluable treasury in the three great volumes with which I presume every member here is more or less familiar.

The Pennsylvania Convention of 1873 and many other Conventions, notably the recent New York Convention, all followed this example, and certainly something is to be inferred from the combined wisdom of all these Conventions as to the usefulness of preserving a report of proceedings.

The gentleman who has preceded me has suggested that perhaps we will exceed the limit of the appropriation made by the Legislature. It should be pointed out that the appropriation made by the Legislature was in the nature of an emergency appropriation, for it had no powers in the matter except to put at our immediate command the money appropriated. All the authorities, so far as I know, and I am certain all the authorities of importance, agree that it is within the province of a Constitutional Convention to expend all the money it may deem necessary for the proper performance of its work and to bind the credit of the State for that purpose; and if, perchance, unforeseen exigencies should demand a very much larger expenditure than that which the Legislature thought probable, it will be normal and it will be right for us to incur it. But it will not be either normal or right for us to make any expenditure not pertinent, not proper to the work of the Convention, and therefore in seriousness we should ask the question whether the preservation of these debates is a matter of public service to which we ought to attend.

The reasons for the preservation of debates are not the gratification of individual vanity, nor the furnishing of material with which to delight the curious or the antiquarian. The purpose of printing the debates is twofold: First, that the people of the Commonwealth in passing judgment upon whatever proposals we may make, shall have at hand a record of the reasons here advanced in favor of and against those proposals. It would seem to be somewhat inconsistent for the State to engage in an expenditure of $400,000 or $500,000 in order to hold a Convention and then begrudge a small fraction of that amount for the purpose of informing the voters fully as to the reasons for our action. And secondly, there is the broader purpose, the more enduring purpose, that we in turn shall do for generations yet to come what those who have passed before have done for us. It is by the record of their experience that we learn; by its lamp are our footsteps guided.

Why, sir, all human action is based on the record of the past.
Precedents are not alone the province of the lawyer; precedents are the province of mankind. We all look back to the accumulated record of the past in order that we may avoid its errors and profit by its wisdom. Take, for instance, the experience of this Commonwealth. It is probable that in this Convention once again will arise the question of the relation between church and State. Where will you find a more adequate discussion of that matter, set forth with more earnestness, more zeal, more tolerance, than in the report of the debates of 1820? And shall we not profit by the errors of those who then discussed the great problems of life? Turn to the volume of 1820, and there you will find as perhaps its ablest speech that of Daniel Webster in defence of property as the basis of representation in the Senate, an error we have now discarded. Is it of no use to find why he took what we think now the wrong ground?

Turn over the pages farther. You will find a most interesting speech by Joseph Story in defence of property. It has a ring not familiar in these days, and yet one will do well if, from the current literature, he turns back near a hundred years to the words of the great Massachusetts citizen who dared to defend thrift, who dared to defend foresight, and who spoke eloquent words that ought to appeal to reason even to-day.

Let me again refer to the Convention of 1820. I am not, sir, one of those who feel we are here improperly. I am of the belief that the people have a right to vote to revise, alter or amend the Constitution. But there Daniel Webster made a speech defending the report of the committee on that subject, in which he said the committee did not foresee any probability that the Constitution as a whole would ever need revision. At least that might instruct us, if to no other purpose than to show that, after all, no generation reaches the goal of human thought. The men of those times believed the Constitution was as secure as the pyramids themselves; and yet you who have visited the pyramids know that their surface is crumbling, that their bases are covered with the sands of the desert, that the chambers within are empty. The soul of the pyramids is gone and only the skeleton remains. But forgetting that, Daniel Webster told the Convention of 1820 there never would be occasion, in his opinion, for a revision of the Constitution, and therefore no other method was suggested than that of amendment by the course now familiar, of legislative action. I do not think he was right. I believe that before we have finished our labors we shall deny his view. But frankness leads me to add that if we are to reach the true conclusion on this occasion, we must take into account the reasons that led to the action of 1820, reasons to be found in the printed report.

Or turn to the Convention of 1853; there, too, you may gather information useful to-day. It is not impossible that we shall here consider the question of an elective judiciary. There you may find that the result of a long and earnest debate was a compromise, with a recommendation that judges should be appointed for a term of ten years. Read those able speeches and get inspiration for the task before you. Read the great speech of Rufus Choate, read the wise words of Professor Greenleaf and Professor Parker of the Harvard Law School, read the words of Richard Henry Dana, Jr., — aye, even the words of Benjamin F. Butler, and then find that there is nothing new under the sun, and that we in our turn are to answer questions our fathers answered. Let us hope we shall answer them more wisely, because we shall have not only the benefit of their wisdom, but also the experience of the years that have gone since they spoke.

There is no lawyer within the sound of my voice who does not know that within careful limits the courts are accustomed to accept information as to the circumstances under which constitutional provisions came into being. Is there a lawyer here who does not grieve because there was no stenographic report of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States? Is there a man of letters here who does not know that in all the literature that has come from the American press perhaps there is no single set of volumes more precious to our liberties, more important to our welfare, than the five volumes of Elliott's Debates, containing Madison's notes and what was said in the State Conventions? This is why the question before you is one of far more than passing interest, why it concerns the very foundation of law, perchance, in the years to come.

Our laws relating to general incorporation found their origin in the debates of 1853. The framework of our cities rests upon the debates of 1820. I might enumerate to your weariness the long list of other important questions there ably discussed.

Ah, but I know, in due and fitting modesty, some member of this Convention will say to himself that there is none here capable of speaking words worthy of preservation; that we have lost the proud position of those who made fundamental laws for the Commonwealth before us; that to-day there is no Daniel Webster to thrill the world with his eloquence, no Joseph Story to bring the lore of legal learning, no Rufus Choate, no Henry Wilson, no Boutwell, no Burlingame, no Banks, no Dana. Perchance in their day they might with like modesty have said the same thing.

Their Noonlight never knows what names immortal are; Their noontime never knows what names immortal are; Tis night alone that shows how star surpasseth star.

And when we shall have entered the long night, perchance there may be names of this Convention that will shine in the very zenith. Perhaps words we here speak may serve generations that are to follow. Perhaps the very friction of our ideas may stimulate them to wiser conclusions. Perhaps we in turn shall have done our duty and by our addition have given to the years of the future a stock of wisdom beyond that which we have received from the past. [Applause.]

Mr. Underhill: I recognize how little ability I have to answer the splendid rhetoric and eloquence of the gentleman, with whom I usually agree. Possibly it is because we live in a different environment. His plea to the lawyers of this body was indeed a masterpiece, and it is something with which I probably shall find it is impossible to compete or contend. But, sir, if I may be excused a personal reference, I hold the position in my city of president of one of the great charitable organizations of that city of 100,000 people, and sir, the things that I have seen during this last hard, cold winter make me appreciate, if nothing else would, the value of a dollar. I ask you of what value to the unborn generations this volume or these several volumes of the proceedings of this Convention will be if, when born, the mothers hold to their dying or drying breasts the mouths of the babes they are unable to satisfy.
Mr. President, the conditions are worse than any of you realize or recognize. The lawyer of this Convention and the lawyer in practice does not pay the bills for the stenographic reports of the case; the poor plaintiff or defendant does that. We in ourselves are transferring this burden from our shoulders and pocket-books to the shoulders and pocket-books of those less able to meet the expense. And, sir, our principal reason for being here, the principal purpose, if you please, is not to hand something down to posterity in the way of speeches, it is to get out a Constitution. The newspapers of to-day are just as progressive as, if not more than, the newspapers of 1853 or 1820, and all that is necessary in the way of verbatim reports of speeches will be found in their columns. I want to warn this Convention that if this order goes through you will find undoubtedly that there will be man after man who will extend his remarks, who will unnecessarily hold forth, in order that he and his name shall go down to posterity. I may possibly hurt my cause, but I still call to your attention the character and quality of the debates which we have already heard and ask you if you think they are worthy of a place in a volume or a volume of volumes to go down to posterity. [Applause.]

Mr. President, the gentleman has put the responsibility where it belongs. He says we are not bound by any action of the Legislature; nor are we. We are bound by our own action, and the responsibility rests with us. But in the days of the coming legislative session you will find if we exceed the appropriation so generously provided, with an increase in the taxes, with an increase in the burdens of the people, the odium will not rest with the Legislature but with this Convention, and its expression will be in speeches in the legislative session and which will not go down to posterity, but which will be used for immediate consumption.

Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I simply wish once more to call to the attention of this Convention that the conditions to-day are far different from the conditions of 1853 and of 1820; that to-day the people need every single solitary cent they can lay their hands on or save from the tax collector, and that in those days we had prosperous, good times, without the accompaniment of war and all of the horrors which it brings. Now, sir, if the Convention wishes to place this burden on the people of this Commonwealth of Massachusetts, if it wishes to assume the responsibility, at least my conscience is clear. I leave it with the Convention.

The order was adopted, by a vote of 186 to 52.

On the 14th of June, 1917, Mr. Joseph J. Leonard of Boston offered the following order: —

Ordered, That the committee on Rules and Procedure consider and report whether a method may be devised whereby proceedings and utterances deemed worthy of future reference may be printed in good readable type, and that all other material be printed in a smaller type.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I have offered this order after looking at some of the reports of the debates of previous conventions, and also after listening during the past several days to the discussions in this chamber. I think we all will agree that the great fault of our public documents is that generally they are printed in a uniform type, and any scholar or student who will take the proceedings of the last Convention and endeavor to separate in them the wheat from the chaff is confronted with a very serious and difficult task. It has impressed me that if some mechanical method had been devised by our forefathers of seventy-odd years ago we all would be greatly facilitated in getting at the material matters that were uttered in that Convention of 1853. Now, I understand and I feel, perhaps, that some people might say that in offering this order I am trying to infringe upon the right of an individual to have his utterances given the same circulation as those of any other individual, and that we all have the same right to give expression to our thoughts, and our ideas are of equal value, no matter upon what subject they may be expressed. I have no idea of that sort. I think in these days of efficiency we ought to be able to devise some means whereby the material of this Convention will be accessible to the reader of the future. Now, I would like to say right here if the reader of the future record should happen to look at my remarks, that up to the present time if he will read carefully the address of His Excellency the Governor and the address of the President of the Convention, and also peruse the debate on the question of the open ballot and the discussion which occurred yesterday between the chairman of the committee on Rules and a member of the same committee upon the question of stenographic reports of these proceedings, I think he would have most of the material that is worthy of preservation up to the present time.

Now, I have listened to a great many voices here that have brought from time to time mandates directly from the people. It seems to me as if some of the delegates feel that they are inspired to give us a message directly from the people upon each and every method of procedure, even including those matters upon which the people themselves have not given any expression or thought. That may be so, and if it is, it is a remarkable and unusual gift. It is a gift that comes by inspiration, I should say, or by some sort of superhuman revelation. But in my experience I think that the people of this Commonwealth, through several generations of trial in self-government, have adopted a means of utterance that generally is sound and at the same time decisive, and whether they speak from the bench or the farm, or the workshop, or the factory, or the office, or the bar enclosure or the judge's bench, their voice is generally heard and generally heeded. Now, it may be that some of these utterances are really the spoken voice of the people, and if that is so, even though they are printed in very fine print those utterances will be found by the future scholars, because one of our great philosophers has said that if a man makes a mouse-trap that is better than that produced by his neighbors, even though he builds his house in the wilderness the world will make a track to his dwelling-place. So I should like to suggest to the committee on Rules some method of considering the typographical make-up of the debates of this Convention, if the debates are to be printed, and I understand that is a matter that is under consideration at present. It may be that the idea that I suggest may seem impracticable, but it might be possible to devise some authority or judicial body that could pass upon what was worthy of preservation and what should be put in finer type.
To sum it up, whether you agree with the idea that one man's utterances should be in larger type than another's, there is this to be considered,—whether we cannot, in the mechanical make-up of the proceedings, give a sort of a running history right through the three or four volumes that may be printed; just the same as a lawyer endeavors to find out the prominent authorities and leading cases, giving some prominence to those matters of debate or discussion that are of importance and less prominence to those that do not seem to be of interest to the future. I offer that order and ask that it be submitted to the committee on Rules for their consideration and report to the Convention at some future time.

The order was rejected.

On the 21st of June, 1917, the committee on Rules and Procedure recommended the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Convention be authorized to contract with the Wright and Potter Printing Company, at prices not exceeding those paid by the Commonwealth under its contract with said company, for the printing and publishing of not more than three thousand copies of the Journal of the Convention, in addition to the sheets furnished for daily requirements; of not more than two thousand copies of the reports of the commission appointed to compile information and data; and of not more than three thousand copies of the Debates of the Convention;

Ordered, That the volume or volumes of the Debates of the Convention be confined to verbatim reports of debates in the Convention, or in Committee of the Whole, concerning proposals to revise or amend the Constitution, or questions relating to (1) the form, manner or time of submitting to the people any amendments adopted by the Convention, (2) the powers or rights of the Convention or any of its members, (3) the returns of elections of its members or the filling of vacancies in its membership, (4) the record of its proceedings or debates, or the printing or publishing of the same; together with such appendices, index and other matter as the committee on Rules and Procedure may deem it desirable to have published in such reports;

Ordered, That one copy of the Journal of the Convention, of the reports of the commission appointed to compile information and data, and of the debates of the Convention, be furnished to each member of the Convention; that not more than five hundred copies of the journal, commission reports and debates be distributed to libraries and for other purposes of education, or to officials; and that the remainder of the copies be sold at a price approximating the cost of paper, press-work and binding;

Ordered, That provision be made by the committee on Rules and Procedure for the preparation, publication, distribution and sale of the volumes herein referred to, and of such other documents or reports as may hereafter be ordered to be printed;

Ordered, That all motions for printing, except in the Journal or Calendar, and all motions for the purchase of publications, shall be referred to the committee on Rules and Procedure for report before final action.

Mr. UNDERHILL of Somerville: I regret that I feel obliged to inflict myself upon the members of the Convention, but I do not think it would be right to allow this order to go by without serious consideration. I hope that every member of this Convention will read the various provisions of this order, and each for himself say whether he thinks this is the proper time for the passage of such an order through this body, or whether he thinks it can well wait until later, and perhaps forever. Mr. President, this is a continuation of the line of argument I opened up some day last week, when the order for the employment of stenographers and the reporting of the proceedings of this Convention was before the Convention; but, sir, where that order involved only an expenditure of from $7,000 to $8,000, and might be considered a perfectly proper and necessary expense by the members of the Convention, this proposition is of an entirely different character. This proposition before we are through with it will cost in the vicinity of $50,000, without any doubt. The expense alone should really result in its rejection, but that is not the worst feature of the passing of this order at this time. I cast no reflection on individuals, but there are many members of this organization who are interested in political booms, political ambitions, and if you pass this order as it is drawn you will have at least four weeks of stump speeches to be printed at the expense of the Commonwealth and circulated in the fall to aid one's election to the House or to the mayoralty of some city, or the return to office of some political office holder. That to my mind is one of the worst features of this order.

I ask the indulgence of the Convention while I point out how this might possibly be handled and yet get all of the information that is necessary for the antiquarian of the future generations. It seems to me that today, when all of us are trying to conserve not only our energies but every commodity that is at our demand and command, when the price of printing paper is extremely high, when we are told to economize in every direction all of the natural resources, we can well put off the publication of the speeches which are to be delivered in the Committee of the Whole and in the Convention itself until some later day, and some other body rather than this one then might edit the matter, revise the debates, separate the wheat from the chaff and publish, if they please, a report of the proceedings of this Convention, together with such speeches as may have stood the ravages of time or had the approval of time set upon them, and then that body could provide for the payment of the same. At that time I hope and pray that our country may be in a better condition, that our State may be in a better financial situation, to handle the expense involved. There could be no objection, and no charges of favoritism brought at that time, but the real meat of this Convention and what it may bring forth would then be issued, and probably one volume would be sufficient to hold all that was necessary. I do not stand here with any plea of pressure or to urge my views upon this Convention, but, sir, in the committee that considered this question there is no unanimity of opinion. A bare majority considered this a proper time to pass this order. And so I submit to you with those who agree with me in the committee that you should study the question seriously and solemnly, from a standpoint of economy and good judgment, before you pass the order.

Just one further matter and I have finished. I noticed the other day, when I asked for a standing or rising vote upon the question of the employment of stenographers,—and really the whole question was debated at that time,—that the self-constituted tribunes of the people were conspicuous by their absence among those who stood to reject that order. I did not ask at that time for a roll-call, for I did not wish to take unnecessarily the time of the Convention. The only man in this Convention who stood by my side on that day is a man who has had considerable experience and association with the poor people of this Commonwealth, and my thanks are due to him for his efforts, not in my behalf but in behalf of those people whom he represents. Today I shall take a different attitude, and I shall ask and expect every man in this Convention to be willing and ready to place himself on record on this question of spending the money of the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts at this particular time, when they need every cent they possibly can save from the tax collector and from the high cost of living.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: After the discussion of this matter last week the desire of the Convention had seemed to be clear enough to warrant the hope that there would not be occasion further to take its time or to elaborate the arguments; and to-day it is not my intention to tax the patience of the Convention to hear a repetition of all the reasons presented in the previous discussion. There were, however, some facts which were not brought to attention which may now aid the Convention in reaching a conclusion a second time.

I have before me a list of 25 cases in which the highest courts of our different States have accepted the debates of Constitutional Conventions as evidence of what was meant by amendments there adopted. I could read to you an opinion from our own Supreme Judicial Court, — not a decision, but an opinion, — showing that its members went even outside the debates, to recorded statements made outside the Convention, for the purpose of ascertaining what was meant by an amendment. And I will crave your patience while I read just two lines from a decision in New York:

"The Courts," it says "have characterized the printed copies of Convention debates as the most unequivocal proof."

The record of what we here do will be the most unequivocal proof of what we here mean. In the very last Constitutional Convention in New York, in the course of debate, this statement was made:

We understand the rule of constitutional construction to be that the courts may look to the records of this Convention to find out what we mean.

It goes on to justify the action of the Convention because the courts would look to the records of the Convention in the construction of the amendment. Elihu Root, who served in that Convention, persuaded it that this matter was of such grave importance that the reports of debates in the Legislature ought to be preserved. I would not go with him that far, for the reports of the Legislature would have no standing, presumably, in a court of law. But there is no lawyer within the sound of my voice who does not know that if we propose amendments and if they are adopted by the people, the time will come when the interests of men will hang upon the construction given to them by our highest tribunals; and shall we deny those tribunals the opportunity to know what we meant? That would be our action if we concealed our debates from the world.

It has been suggested that the time is not yet arrived to decide this question. There are mechanical difficulties in the way of postponement. If you do not decide it until close to adjournment, then these volumes will be piled upon the State printer at a time when in all probability his presses will be taxed and at any rate there will be a delay of months, possibly running into years, before these volumes will be printed. A reason for the immediate publication of these debates, is that the people may know what we meant, — the people, when they discuss this matter next fall, when they go to the polls, that they may have read with their own eyes the reasons for our action, or else may have listened to those whose duty it will be, — and I include every man in this Convention,—whose duty it will be next fall, with memory refreshed by the record, to tell the people why we have given this or that advice. And therefore, in order that the prime, the chief, the all-important duty may be instantly performed, this matter should be decided now and we should at once state whether we will follow the precedent of many previous Conventions, and at least eight out of the last ten Constitutional Conventions that have been held. We shall fail in our duty unless we shall do as they have done, recognizing that those who are to vote upon the questions we submit have the right to know why we advise this or that course. With that duty in front of us is there any man here who will say that, expending a half million dollars,—it may come to that,—for this Convention, the people will begrudge the fifteen, twenty, twenty-five thousand dollars, or even more, necessary for us to do our work right? It was the mandate of the people that this Convention should be held, and coupled with that mandate and part of that mandate was the order that we should do this work to the best of our capacity, that we should do it aright; and this work will not be done aright if a record is not preserved and if that record is not put within the reach of every voter in the Commonwealth at the very earliest possible moment.

The order was adopted, by a vote of 157 to 26.

Manual of the Convention.

The committee on Rules and Procedure reported Tuesday, September 18, 1917, that the following order ought to be adopted:

Ordered, That there be printed one thousand additional copies of the Manual of the Constitutional Convention, five hundred to be distributed under the direction of the Committee on Rules and Procedure and five hundred to be offered for sale at cost.

The order was considered by the Convention the following day.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: When this matter came before the committee on Rules and was voted on in that committee, I asked to be recorded as a dissenter. Some mistake has been made, and I was not so recorded. I simply wish to bring to the attention of the Convention once more the fact that this is another one of those printing orders for the expenditure of the people's money in order that the proceedings of this Convention and all of that sort of thing may go down to antiquarians or somebody else. In other words, that one thousand additional copies of the Manual may be printed; that the committee on Rules may distribute to the public libraries of the State five hundred copies, and that the rest of them may be sold by the printer at cost. Provision has been made that the printer may sell these at cost; and if any man here is patriotic enough or philanthropic enough to buy a copy for his library, he can get it for one dollar each, and he can save the people one thousand dollars in the publication of this document.

Mr. Williams of Brookline: This order came before the committee on Rules with a recommendation or rather a letter from the Commission to Compile Information and Data, to the effect that the edition of five hundred copies had been exhausted, and that there were demands from many of the libraries and public institutions of the Commonwealth to the extent of about four hundred. It seems desirable that those institutions and libraries should have the benefit of a copy of the Manual. It contains a great deal of valuable information. Undoubtedly it is one of the best documents that ever has been prepared relating to the Constitution of Massachusetts. Any student of the Constitution of Massachusetts would like to have access to it, whether residing in the Commonwealth or elsewhere.

There was a suggestion that the public printer should take the risk of publishing it at a dollar a copy, — they cost, by the way, fifty cents. It seemed wise to the committee to keep the sale and distribution in the hands of the Convention, or its committee on Rules and Procedure, so that the public institutions and libraries could be supplied and that the others could be sold at cost. Your committee did not think it is wise that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should go into the business of selling books at a profit. Therefore your committee, with the exception of the gentleman from Somerville, was unanimous in recommending the adoption of the order.

The order was adopted.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

The committee on Elections reported, July 18, 1917, no action necessary, on the communication from Jasper N. Johnson of Medford, claiming to have been elected to membership in the Convention from the Twenty-fifth Middlesex Representative District (Doc. No. 328).

Mr. Shaw of Revere: As there has been some misunderstanding regarding the rights of the minority members of the Election Committee in regard to that particular matter, at the request of one of the minority members I make a motion that the whole matter be recommitted to the committee on Elections.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I think if any minority member wants this recommitted he ought to have the courage to make the motion himself. As a matter of fact there is no minority report. This matter was heard, the petitioner was given all the opportunity that he asked for, the vote was taken and the committee made this report,—a unanimous report. They were asked if there were any dissenters and nobody dissented; and five days after that action we find that the petitioner wrote a report himself and went out and, through a misapprehension, secured the signatures of three or four members of this committee, one of whom had voted in favor of the report, no legislation necessary. Now I have had some experience with legislation, Mr. President, but I never heard of any such transaction as that, when a petitioner draws his own report and then comes up here and deposits it himself. There was not a member of the so-called minority that the gentleman speaks of who would deposit or file that report. It seems to me there is nothing gained by recommitting this report. If there is anything that the gentleman from Revere fails to understand, the committee is able to give him any information he would like. But I think it would be a great deal better if these so-called "minority members" would come in here and make their own motion instead of sending a substitute.

Mr. Shaw: There is not anything in regard to their rights that I do not understand, Mr. President, but a member of the committee told me that they did not know what their rights were, that they were absolutely ignorant as to legislative matters, and that when this report was in the committee they did not know what their rights were; they did not believe they could do anything else, as a majority of the committee signed the report, and they desired the report recommitted to the committee in order that they might exercise their rights. I think as a matter of courtesy, if nothing else, on behalf of this entire body, that the circumstances of the case should be taken into consideration in regard to these committeemen, in order that they may preserve the rights which they have.

Mr. George: I have had an opportunity to talk with these members and I do not find them so green as the gentleman thinks. They understand the situation; perhaps the gentleman from Revere thinks he understands it; being a partner of the gentleman who has petitioned for this seat which does not belong to him, he may have information first-hand. There is nobody green on this committee; they fully understood it. We had a hearing covering two days and these gentlemen were there, every one of them, and when we took a vote there was not a dissenting vote in the committee, and this report came in here as the report of the committee and there is no minority report, except, as I say, that the petitioner went to work four days afterwards and drew a report and then, through a misapprehension, secured the signatures of certain members of this committee.

Now those members of the committee are here; let them speak for themselves. The man who is "green," — let him come in here and speak. Let us have the facts. I never heard of such a proposition before and I never read of a proposition of this kind, that after a committee had taken a vote and adjourned for five days and had presented a unanimous report, that a petitioner who does not belong to this body should write a report, a bogus report, a misrepresentation, and then secure the signatures through a misrepresentation and then try to spirit this report in here himself. Boss Tweed of New York in his palmiest days never went up to Albany and played any such trick on the Legislature. I think we have fooled with this long enough. I am perfectly willing that the Convention should recommit this report. If we had known that there was going to be a dissenter we might have made a more elaborate report, but it was unanimous and what was the use of making a long report when the committee had heard the case and were all of one mind with respect to giving this petitioner leave to withdraw?

The motion to recommit was lost, and the report was unanimously accepted.

The Report of the committee on Elections, leave to withdraw, on the communication from Patrick H. Jennings of Boston, claiming election as delegate at large and asking for an examination and recount of all ballots cast for delegates at large, was considered on the same day.

Mr. Timothy J. Driscoll of Boston: In my opinion, the committee on Elections secured sufficient evidence to have a recount of all ballots cast in the State. The committee on Elections had a tabulation before them which showed many erasures and irregularities in the counting and tabulating. The Governor's Council did not adhere to the election law. The election law requires that the Governor and five members of the Governor's Council shall be present when the seals of the returns of the cities and towns are broken. The Governor was not present. Five members of the Council being present, the seals were broken. On the first day some of the Governor's Councillors were present, and some were not. They left the counting and tabulating to clerks, which was a violation of the law. The returns were given out that Arthur D. Hill was elected as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention. They called in the secretary, Mr. Boynton, to verify the statement that Mr. Hill was elected. Mr. Boynton verified the statement; the certificate was sent out to Mr. Hill, and then the men who were interested in Mr. Jennings' campaign came to the State House and asked the Governor's permission to tabulate the count of the vote. After tabulating the count they found in the Essex County returns a mistake of 13,000 votes. Then a request was sent to Mr. Hill to return his certificate to the Governor's secretary, and he did so. The mere fact is that Arthur D. Hill would have been declared elected and would be sitting in this Convention to-day had it not been for those men who went to the Governor's Council and spent all day in tabulating the votes as they were returned to the State House. In many cities and towns there were numerous erasures, and in one town a bottle of ink was spilled all over the returns.

I think that it is no more than right and just to all the people of this Commonwealth who have doubts in their mind whether Mr. Jennings was elected to this Convention that a recount should be had. The official press reports declared him elected, and the discrepancies in some of the counties were as high as 1,000 votes.

Mr. Dean of Fall River: I hope that the members of the Convention have read this report of the majority of the committee on Elections. I think perhaps the simplest way to deal with this matter is to go over what took place regarding the election May 1 and to go through the final tabulation by the Governor and Council.

On the 2d of May the Boston Globe stated that Patrick H. Jennings of Boston was one of the duly elected delegates at large and he led Charles F. Choate, Jr., of Southborough by a little less than 300 votes. The paper also stated that 75 towns were missing. The Boston Evening Transcript gave a similar return, stating that four districts were missing, but in the tabulation of the result of the vote in the cities the Transcript made a mistake of more than 800 votes. It gave Mr. Choate 4,109 votes when as a matter of fact he received 4,980 votes in Worcester. That difference of 871 right there more than takes care of any lead that Mr. Jennings had over Mr. Choate. The returns from the missing towns, however, were slowly coming in. The Cummington return, which I hold in my hand, came in on May 17.

On the 22d of May the Governor's Council tabulated the vote. At that time it made a mistake in counting the vote for Arthur D. Hill in Essex County. That vote was counted twice for Mr. Hill. He was given 25,600 votes instead of 12,800 votes in Essex County. The following day representatives of labor organizations went to the Governor's Council and asked to see the returns and tabulation sheets, and they went over the vote, and as a result of their work this mistake for Mr. Hill was found. Let me say, as is pointed out in the report, that no change was found in the vote cast for Charles F. Choate, Jr., of Southborough, or for Patrick H. Jennings of Boston; their votes have remained the same throughout. The alterations and erasures on the tabulation sheets, and I have a copy here before me, show absolutely no change in the vote of the sixteenth and seventeenth candidates who were running for delegates at large; their vote remained the same. Friends of labor who looked into this matter do not contend that there is any change, so far as any official return goes, in the vote of Mr. Jennings or of Mr. Choate. They did, however, finding this vote for Mr. Hill, ask the Governor and Council to retabulate and to correct this error, and this was done May 29. Mr. Choate was then the sixteenth candidate and duly elected, and Mr. Jennings was the seventeenth candidate. Their votes remained the same; Mr. Hill dropped back to the place that he had previously held.

All that the friends of Mr. Jennings have to base their claim on is the fact that the newspapers stated on the day after election, with 75 towns missing, that Patrick H. Jennings was elected. There was this mistake in the Governor’s Council; this was corrected, however, on retabulating. The final tabulation May 29 exactly agreed with what labor found when it retabulated. There was found, for example, a piece of paper like that. [Exhibiting a paper to the Convention.] Before the hearing a great deal of emphasis was laid on that, and we were asked to go over that return, and told that we ought not to have a new return but that we ought to recount the votes not only in the Cummington district but in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Now, sir, what does the return for Cummington tell? You can see it. How important do you suppose it is regarding the vote of Massachusetts? Well, the ink is still over it. According to the return Charles F. Adams has 20 votes, Charles F. Choate of Southborough has 18 votes, Patrick H. Jennings of Boston no votes. And they brought this in as a result of that and urged we ought to go back and recount the votes of all the cities and towns in the State.

We sought on behalf of Mr. Jennings to find wherein these errors had been committed, and the best information we could get was that the Council had bungled their part of the work. We admitted it, and we said: “We will go back and start where the Governor’s Council started, and we will go over this vote.” So this committee spent a week in tabulating, getting the returns from the cities and towns, making our own figures up and retabulating them, — and with what result? We came out with identically the same figures in point of tabulation made by the Governor and Council, and Mr. Choate was still elected over Mr. Jennings by 1,640 votes. As I have said before, there was no change in the vote counted for Mr. Choate or Mr. Jennings.

The petitioner came in and said: “Because this suspicion has been created, and because there was a difference in the returns from those reported by the Associated Press, we ask that you proceed to recount all the ballots.” No single individual request of that nature could safely have been entertained by the committee. There was absolutely no evidence given to the committee of any error in the marking of the ballots.

The majority of this committee feel that under those circumstances they have done all that they could, all that they were required to do, — starting in with retabulating the vote, disregarding the vote of the Governor and Council, and drawing their own conclusion that Mr. Choate was duly elected. To go further seemed to be unfair, and seemed to be unreasonable. I trust that the present motion to substitute the minority report will be defeated.

Mr. Moriarty of Boston: Being one of the committee that did the tabulation after the executive authorities of this Commonwealth were not able to find the mistake, I happened to be one of the men who went in there and found the mistake, — not as any representative of any labor organization, but as a citizen of this Commonwealth. Three men who were with me were likewise citizens of this Commonwealth, and we came here without any classes, and we came here as representatives and citizens of this State.

I want to say, as being one of the members who appeared before the committee, that I never mentioned the tabulation sheet of Cum-
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

I want to say to you members of this Convention, do not let them becloud the issue by holding that tabulation sheet up here, that there are not over fifty votes on, and think that we were going to change the situation by that. The man who reported for the committee does not even tell you the whole of Worcester. He does not tell you that Mr. Choate gained 800 in Worcester, and Mr. Jennings lost 1,000, in just the city of Worcester. If the newspaper reports were correct, Mr. Jennings would have been sitting here instead of Mr. Choate.

I want to say that on Friday prior to the Governor's Council making their report there was a letter seen in a prominent attorney's office in this town. That prominent man in this town happened to be seated, or to have a seat, in this Convention. The report had got out that Mr. Hill had gained a place in the delegates at large by an increase from twenty-fourth place to fourteenth place, jumping ten places in the list. On Saturday morning we got the word. We came to the Secretary's office, but after closing hours. We were told to come around Monday. We went there without any action of any organization, to show that it is not the labor movement but it was individual citizens of this Commonwealth. On Monday we came and talked with Mr. Boynton. He told us that we could have the tabulation sheets immediately on the Governor's Council making their report. He told us that he was not satisfied with the tabulation made by the clerks of the Governor's Council and that he was going to have a re-tabulation that day, and that he would give us his report at four o'clock that night if we would return. We came back approximately at four o'clock. He said: "My clerks have gone over the tabulation of the Governor's Council and we find the tabulation correct, giving Mr. Hill a seat in the Convention." We said again to him: "When can we have the tabulation sheets?" He replied: "Immediately on the Governor's Council going into session."

We came here on Tuesday, and at twenty minutes of two I received from the executive secretary the report of the Governor's Council, even before they had gone into session, a printed document stating that Mr. Hill had a seat and had been declared elected a delegate at large to the Constitutional Convention. Mr. Long, the secretary of the Governor, told us that the Governor's Council was not going to approve the election that day, but they had to come back on Wednesday; that they had an appointment for the unveiling of a statue and that they were going to do it the next day; that if the committee that I happened to be one of found any mistakes they would rectify them on Wednesday. But Mr. Boynton was called in before the Governor's Council, and after being in there an hour and twenty minutes the Governor's Council did take a vote and approve the election of Arthur D. Hill of Boston. They came out at twenty minutes of four, and he said: "You can have the tally sheets now at any time." We said: "Well, we will be back here to-morrow morning at nine o'clock." And we counted from nine o'clock in the morning until twenty minutes of seven at night without any official of the State being in the office; and when we found a mistake of approximately 13,000 votes in Essex County, without any official capacity on the part of anybody, somebody did send a message of some kind to Arthur D. Hill of Boston, asking him to return his certificate of election unopened. Without the Governor's Council sitting, without the Secretary's office being notified by any State official, they did notify him to return his certificate of election, and then the fourth tabulation took place. Mr. Choate was declared elected, Patrick H. Jennings and Mr. Hill declared not elected.

In the tabulation, Mr. President, we found erasures on practically every delegate at large, the 32 included, or appearances of erasures. And we want to know, or we should like to know or be enlightened, as to what the Election Committee could find out by going over the same tabulation sheets that the four counters had gone over, when appearances of erasures had taken place, according to their own words.

We found in the city of Waltham that erasures took place against the name of Adams.

We again found in the town of Winchester that erasures appeared beside the name of George W. Anderson.

We again found in the city of Lawrence pencil marks and the figures changed against the name of George W. Coleman.

We found in Fitchburg, in the case of Apsey, Barton, Buie, Choate, Donovan, Moriarty, Storey, Jennings, figures changed, or appearances of figures changed, on the tabulation sheets.

We found in the town of Blackstone erasures against the names of Adams and Choate.

We found in the town of Clinton, again, erasures against the name of Anderson.

We found in the town of Holden erasures against the name of Adams.

We found in the town of Mendon erasures against the names of Adams and Anderson.

We found in the town of Amherst erasures against the names of Walker, Walsh and Whipple.

We found in the town of Orange erasures against my own name.

We found in the town of Hinsdale erasures beside the name of George W. Anderson, in Hamilton against the President of this Convention, John L. Bates, and in the town of Ipswich against Adams.

The testimony of Mr. Boynton, the Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth, before the committee, was that the Governor's Council and the Governor's office were trying to make the goat out of the Secretary of the Commonwealth's office and trying to throw the responsibility over on the Secretary of the Commonwealth for the mistakes made. Mr. Boynton said that the reason that they did not find the mistakes was that all they went through was the total, and where the mistake was made was in the totalizing. They only counted the total.

I want to say that the committee has made a precedent. The first case that they took up in this Convention was on the resolution presented here in regard to the Charlestown case of Sullivan and Mullen. The petitioner asked that both men be allowed a seat in this Convention with half a vote. Neither one of those contestants asked the committee to retabulate the vote. But the committee went out, and after a recount being held by the election commissioners of the city of Boston, and the election commissioners of the city of Boston declaring it was a tie vote, this Election Committee, appointed by this Convention, without the request of either the men or their representatives, went out and counted the votes, broke the tie, and declared that Mr. Sullivan was legally elected as a delegate.

I want to say that that is all that we ask, that the votes be counted, and if Mr. Choate has got the most votes Mr. Choate should be here. I happen to be a delegate who may be as near to being counted out as anybody else. I stand No. 15 among the delegates at large, and if I have not got enough votes in the recount I do not belong here. In having the votes recounted I am taking chances of being counted out, but I say that the citizens of this Commonwealth deserve protection from the men whom they elect. One of the committee has reported that there was not a sufficient number of officials there to even break the seal.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the laws relative to primaries, caucuses and elections, Acts of 1913, Chapter 835, Section 312:

The Secretary of the Commonwealth shall lay before the Governor and Council the copies of the records of votes cast with their seals unbroken. The Governor with at least five Councillors shall, as soon as may be, open and examine all such copies and determine who are elected to the several offices. Upon such determination, the Secretary, upon application, shall furnish to newspapers an abstract of the records of the votes examined.

I want to say to you that the committee asked the Governor's Council to come before the committee and only one member of the Governor's Council recognized that request. I understand that that member of the Governor's Council told that the members of the Governor's Council violated the election laws of this State by not having the Governor present when the seals of the votes of this State were opened; and I believe if any man ever had the right to a recount of the ballots of his election it is Mr. Jennings, and that every delegate at large should be with this proposition to show that the ballot of this Commonwealth is a sacred document. And I am going to say that after to-day, when this is made public, — and I hope that it does get a lot of publicity, — that the voters of this State will not believe that the vote is a sacred vote if this Convention does not go on record to count the votes of the delegates at large.

Mr. President, delegates of this Convention, we have complied with every law. Before the thirty days expired we notified every city and town of this Commonwealth according to law to hold the ballots, to allow this Convention to take the ballots in here, which they have power to do. Now I ask you men, — not as the chairman or the secretary of the committee has said, that it is a labor movement, but we come here with clean hands as citizens, not as any divided people in this State, but purely and simply as citizens of this Commonwealth, as we got our nomination papers as delegates as citizens and not as of any class, — and I ask you men to give Mr. Patrick H. Jennings, as a citizen of this Commonwealth, and Mr. Choate, who does not want to be a delegate to this Convention, if I judge him right, and have any insinuations that there was anything wrong with the ballot in this Commonwealth, this recount. I will say that I will be one of the first men, if Mr. Choate or any other delegate has got votes enough to be in here, to say that this is his place, but I believe that we have a right to be shown.

Now, I want to say that, going before the committee, I was criticized most severely for being suspicious, and I remember that I answered this question of one of the committee, Yes, that I was getting so suspicious from finding out the things that I did find out that when I went home late at nights I used to guard my own shadow.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

And I was criticized for that. But I want to say to you men that when the committee went in to tabulate the sheets they got suspicious too; and the first thing that they tried to find out, when they found that blotted sheet from the town of Cummingston, — their first thing to do was to go out and find if it was done by the four members who went in and found the mistake. Now I want to say to you and the committee: Have I not got just as much right to be suspicious as a member of the committee?

In conclusion, gentlemen, I want to say this: That both the Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth and the secretary of the executive say that the mistake would never have been found out if it was not for the four citizens going in and retabulating the vote. That is testimony that came out before the committee. So I say to you men, I realize that the word "expense" is going to be used now after I get through. They are going to say that it will cost a lot of money. My answer is no matter how much money it costs, that it will be a cheap venture to show the citizens of this Commonwealth that the ballot is right and that men who run for public office will receive all of the votes tabulated in their favor. I thank you for the indulgence.

Mr. Choate of Southborough: I remember in the early days of the sitting of this Convention an honorable gentleman, a delegate from Waltham, advised the Convention that there were no Choates in the body. Whether he so advised them by way of congratulation or lamentation I was not then aware, — I think and I hope and I suspect by way of congratulation. I have for the last six weeks enjoyed an experience which I think is unique in the experience of any member of such a body as this. I have been "in again and out again" every day, I think, for the full six weeks of the sitting of this body. And I have no right to share that exhilarating experience alone, — there are thirty-two other gentlemen who are as much entitled to that excitement as I, and I for one, am heartily in favor of their having the opportunity. But seriously, Mr. President, a delegate to this Convention should be like Caesar's wife. And if there is, as there seems to be, a well founded and well settled and thoroughly believed doubt as to the seat of any member here, surely this Convention ought to vote as one man to ascertain the truth about those facts and settle it for all time. [Applause.]

Mr. Dean: The only trouble with the gentleman's proposition is that there is no doubt. The situation is this: The gentleman from Boston, speaking a little while ago, said that we set a precedent when we counted the ballots in the case of Sullivan v. Mullen (Document No. 133). We did that, Mr. Chairman, because there there was a tie vote and there were six ballots in dispute. Those are the cases where you go to the ballots themselves, and you see what the intent of the voter is by what he puts on his ballot. Seeing how he marked his ballot you then determine what the will of the majority is. But there is absolutely no evidence in this case that requires the examination of any ballots whatever. The whole trouble came with the Executive Council, through a mistake in tabulation. I should like to correct the gentleman from Boston in regard to that by telling him we did not take a copy of the Council's tally sheets. We went to the records of the 354 cities and towns of Massachusetts; we took those records and we retabulated the votes for the thirty-two delegates at large. We did everything in reason that we could to make clear and sure the result, and we were satisfied, — it was perfectly clear, — Mr. Choate of Southborough had 104,152 votes and he had defeated Mr. Jennings by 1,640 votes.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

Mr. President, this last suggestion to my mind is a pretty serious matter. On mere suspicion and conjecture, on a fishing expedition, with the hope that we may count a few more votes for one candidate, are we going to recount the ballots of the entire Commonwealth of Massachusetts? You speak of the vote of the little town of Cummingston, but the largest vote of that town, 20 was given to Mr. Adams, and Mr. Jennings got no votes there. What does that mean? Is that evidence upon which to go ahead and recount the entire vote of the State? These alterations, these erasures on the tally sheets, — and there were erasures on the tally sheets, the sheets that the clerks made up, — amount to very little. The people who actually gained are men like Mr. Cummings of Fall River or Mr. Clifford of New Bedford. Those are the men who have material changes. And the greatest change made in the vote of any of those men would not be enough to offset the lead which Mr. Choate had over Mr. Jennings. I cannot believe under such circumstances that this Convention is going to reexamine the ballots. That is a reflection upon every precinct officer in all the towns and all the cities of Massachusetts, as if there was really something crooked, and there has not been the slightest evidence before our committee of anything of that nature whatever.

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: I trust that the delegates to this Constitutional Convention will not follow the action of some Legislatures and lessen the confidence of the people of this Commonwealth in their attempt to amend the Constitution. When I first came to this Convention as a delegate one of the prominent men of this Commonwealth suggested a very small error that should be corrected, and the feeling of the delegates to this Convention as to that small error was such that there was not any correction made. Now, the people of this Commonwealth feel that there is not only an error, but that there are other mistakes, — that the committee do not deny, — and on the statement of a delegate to this Convention there are violations of the election law of this Commonwealth that have been made. Do you blame us for being called radicalists?

When men come in as delegates, as citizens, representing the people of this Commonwealth and in behalf of labor, is it because it is a labor man who asks for a recount that the consideration of the interest of the Constitution of the people is not worthy of granting? I trust that the delegates to this Convention will prove to the people of this Commonwealth, and it is bold for me to say it, that if the Governor's Council does not live up to the laws relating to the tabulation of the voting in this Commonwealth they will see that they are lived up to, and if it does not do its work they will encourage other men to go on record in favor of abolishing such an organization as the Executive Council or the Governor's Council of Massachusetts. Is it true that all those mistakes were made on the tabulation? Is it true that all lead pencil changes and blots of ink in regard to figures have been found? Does any delegate to this Convention deny this statement: That the committee who first handled the tabulation of these ballots sent a notice to Arthur D. Hill that he was elected a delegate to this Convention? Does the committee deny that? And after the committee of citizens who were there looking over the ballots found out that the committee of the Governor's Council had made a mistake of thousands of votes, who assumed the authority, without a meeting of the Governor's Council, to send a notice to Mr. Hill that he was not elected as a delegate to this Convention? I want to say to all the delegates to this Convention that if they showed the same manhood and the same feeling as the delegate in the third division (Mr. Choate) did in talking on this subject, they would give the people of the Commonwealth more confidence in their representatives who are delegates to the Constitutional Convention. We are not afraid to spend money for justice. We believe in freedom. The poor and rich should be equal. And then when it comes to this Convention, representing the people, the delegates shall not have it said by any one on a public platform in their city or town that they were afraid to spend money when there was doubt of the people as to an act that was proved, in order to prove to the people of this Commonwealth, when all is done, that the representatives of the people who were considering the question of the Constitution took such action as to give to the people who were not delegates here the assurance that every man would get justice by law and by the action of the delegates to this Convention. I trust that the delegates to this Convention will accept the minority report of the committee and let the majority members of that committee go back and count the ballots, and so let every delegate go home when the Convention is over and say that every man who sat here represented the people, or the interest of the people, and in behalf of the people were not afraid of any issue in open voting. That is the reason that I would rather go on record in favor of recounting the votes, and I trust the delegates to this Convention will do likewise. Give the opportunity that the ballots be counted, and where errors were made see that they are corrected promptly, openly and aboveboard. Give us more encouragement in the future. Then, when our State officials are elected by a small vote of the Commonwealth, we will not be trying to get a recount. We have a tabulation here. We have lost confidence in it. Now give us confidence by giving us a recounting of the votes for the delegates who are here, and their friends who are outside will be satisfied. I express my feeling openly and aboveboard, in the interest of fair play for the citizens of this Commonwealth.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I should like to inquire from Mr. Moriarty in reference to the erasures that are spoken of in those reports. Was there any indication that those erasures were made by those who tabulated, or were they made before they came to the tabulators? It seems to me it is very important that this Convention should know of this feature definitely. And further, I should like to know how many erasures were noticed, and what was their nature. Were they in the tabulation originally, or were they made at a later time? If Mr. Moriarty or some member of the committee can enlighten me on that I shall feel better able to act on this question.

Mr. Dean: I think I can answer the gentleman's question. The figures now appearing in the tabulation appear to be in the same handwriting as the figures that were erased or crossed out. Let me give you a few of the changes that show their nature. In the vote of the county of Hampden 6,478 are given to Mr. Anderson, and then that is crossed out, a line is put through it, and the same hand writes above it "6,439." When you come to the vote of Mr. Clifford of New Bedford in Barnstable County, he was first given 846 votes and in the same handwriting that was crossed out and he was given 802 votes. Mr. Cummings in Essex County lost 7 votes the same way, from 19,633 votes to 19,626. And I might go on in the same way. It was all a case of where a figure was corrected by the person tabulating, and these corrections are on the tabulating sheets, and not upon the original source of information, the returns made by the cities and towns, to which we go back for our own authority in making our own tabulation.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

The gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) emphasizes labor's interest in this election. He should remember that while there are many classes in the Commonwealth, no one class shall rule.

Mr. O'Connell: The gentleman seems to have told us about corrections. My inquiry was in reference to erasures. The term erasure has been used here, and I believe it is in both the majority and the minority report. I want to know about the nature of the erasures that took place in these tabulations.

Mr. Timothy J. Driscoll: In the returns from the cities and towns there were numerous erasures. Some of the returns were in handwriting and others were typewritten, and there were numerous mistakes in the writing of them. It seems as if erasures were made and they were written over. That is for the information of the previous speaker.

Mr. Moriarty: I will say that in the places that we found erasures or the appearance of erasures it was our opinion that we could not tell what was there before the erasure took place. There were indications on the tabulation sheets that erasures did take place, but what was there before the erasures took place in counting the ballots will be the only thing that will tell whether the figures are true or not.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I should like to inquire whether there is any evidence at all that erasures or changes were made which affected the result. If I understood correctly the claim made by some one of the committee, the tabulation disclosed the errors. If that is so, then there is no occasion to recount the ballots. If, however, there is evidence that there were changes made in the votes which might change the result, then a different case is presented. I do not yet learn what the facts are claimed to be.

Mr. Dean: In answer to the gentleman's question I should like to say that there are no corrections or changes that would affect the actual result. Any changes that appear on these sheets will not affect the vote cast for Mr. Choate or Mr. Jennings in any material respect; that is, they may affect the vote of one candidate by two votes, but there is nothing to show that the votes cast for Mr. Choate or Mr. Jennings would in any way be affected by these erasures or these changes. There are a few erasures. Apparently some one has taken an ink scratcher, and instead of crossing a line through and making a correction has scratched out a figure and put another one in its place.
Mr. Moriarty: Mr. Chairman, they say that there is not any difference. According to the newspaper reports Mr. Choate received in the city of Worcester 4,109 votes, according to the tabulation sheets he received 4,980 votes, an increase of 871 votes. Mr. Hill received 3,528 votes according to the newspaper returns, and according to the tabulation he received 3,498 votes, losing votes in Worcester. Mr. Jennings in Worcester from the newspaper reports received 5,384, and on the tabulation sheets received 4,384, a drop of 1,000 votes. Just in errors alone Mr. Choate's gain of 871, Mr. Jennings' drop of 1,000, would change the situation. I will say that we counted the last four men. Myself in Worcester received according to the newspaper reports 48,056; on the tabulation sheets I lost 200 votes. Mr. Hill, Mr. Jennings and myself lost votes; Mr. Choate gained,—the only one on there who did gain. In the town of Brookline Mr. Choate was given 204 votes by the newspaper reports. The tabulation sheets give him two thousand and some odd votes. There is a gain of 2,800 votes for Mr. Choate and a loss of 1,800 for Mr. Jennings. In the town of Winthrop by the newspaper reports I lost 500 votes. We have always taken the Transcript and the Globe reports as being pretty nearly accurate, but this is the first time in the history of an election in this State when every town in this State did not have its returns tabulated in the papers. There were a number of towns for which there was not any tabulating by which we could verify the reports. I think that you are not losing anything in ordering a recount, and for the sixteen men elected I feel that those men would be the ones that would like to have the votes counted over again.

Mr. Hogan of Boston: From the statements which have been made here to-day I understand that this is the situation: That the tabulation sheets to which the gentleman from Boston who has just taken his seat refers are the tabulation sheets which were in possession of the Governor and Council; that he made a comparison of those sheets with the newspaper returns, that the committee did the same thing; but that, in addition to doing that, the committee went to the original sources of information, the various cities and towns of the Commonwealth, to verify the tabulations which appeared upon the sheets that were in possession of the Governor's Council. I should like to know, Mr. President, if that is correct. If it is correct I should also like to have this further question answered: Was there any information presented either to the committee which represented the interests of Mr. Jennings or to the committee of this Convention showing any fraud or collusion or error on the part of any election official of any of the cities and towns in this Commonwealth, and if so what was the nature of the fraud, the collusion, or the error?

Mr. Dean: I will answer the second question first, in regard to fraud or collusion. There was no evidence of any fraud or collusion, or the slightest evidence of anything wrong in that respect. Now in regard to what the committee did. We took the returns of the 354 cities and towns and we tabulated those returns,—examined the returns and tabulated them,—then compared our result with the tabulation of the Governor and Council, and it agreed exactly with the final tabulation of that body.

Mr. Hogan: I should like to ask through you, Mr. President, from the gentleman from Fall River, if the tabulation sheets which they used themselves were the same tabulation sheets which were used by the Governor's Council.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

Mr. Dean: I hold in my hand the tabulation sheets, all in my own handwriting. These figures were compiled by myself. However, let me say this, that in regard to the tabulation sheets from Barnstable, we will say for illustration, where the returns of the different towns came in we had the figures read and we checked them on one of the tabulation sheets that we found there, but all totals we made ourselves.
I wonder if that is clear.

Mr. Horgan: I think it is clear as far as the gentleman has gone, but what I am anxious to ascertain from the committee is this information: Did the committee in addition to the tabulation sheets which were placed at its disposal by the Governor's Council, — which I assume were the original sheets submitted to the Governor's Council in order that they might ascertain the votes, — go behind those sheets when it discovered the various errors made by the Governor's Council and endeavor to obtain from the direct source, namely, the cities and towns, a correct verification of the figures of those respective cities and

Mr. Dean: Yes, we did. We went behind the tabulation sheets and took the returns of the cities and towns, and made our own record.

Mr. Moriarty: I should like to ask how many cities and towns of the 354 he got that verification from.

Mr. Dean: We examined the figures from all the 354 cities and towns.

Mr. Moriarty: That is not my question. I understood the secretary of the committee to say that after going over the tabulation sheets filed by the Governor's Council he went back farther than that and communicated with the different cities and towns to see if the figures on the tabulation sheets were accurate. I should like to find out how many cities and towns he got word from that the figures on the tabulation sheets were accurate.

Mr. Dean: What we did was this: We took the returns which were filed in the Secretary of the Commonwealth's office from the cities and towns, each in a separate envelope, and we went through those returns, looking, and anxiously looking, to see if we could see anything on the return itself which would show that any error was committed in the particular city or town; and we found nothing. The gentleman from Sutton (Mr. Ray) did a great deal of that work; I would like to hear from him.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: Is not the Convention getting away from the main issue here, which is, simply, which of the two men is elected?
That is the thing that we are most interested in. A machinery for elections is provided, which has gone through its various stages, and under ordinary circumstances and in an ordinary body that result might be accepted. The difficulty is of course that that fossilized monument of the opinions of mankind a hundred and twenty-five years ago, the Governor's Council, which has very little to do, did that little very badly. They are the people who have tangled us up; and it is impossible not to suspect sharp practice somewhere, when a man is suddenly discovered to push out the sixteenth man; and when it is discovered that he did not push him out, it is found that another man pushed him out. I myself do not believe that there was any fraud or substitution; but I do believe that the community at large, the people of Massachusetts, feel that there is something wrong in that count, and that that feeling can be removed by this Convention by following the desires of the two persons most concerned. The sitting member and the contesting member, both of them have asked this Convention to do what is unusual. But we are an unusual body. This Convention is a law unto itself in that matter. It did not require even the authority of the Legislature to examine the credentials and the votes of its own members. I therefore shall vote for a proposition which, at whatever cost of time and money is necessary, will enable this Convention to satisfy its constituents and the Commonwealth that it has removed any doubts or questions. The finding of such a committee will be accepted by both contestants, by all the members of the Convention, and by the public at large, as final, and there never will be any more difficulty.
CONTESTED SEATS IN THE CONVENTION.

Mr. GEORGE of Haverhill: Perhaps it would be well to explain the difference between the tabulation sheets and the returns from the various cities and towns. As a matter of fact, in regard to any of those returns that have been mentioned here as having erasures, those erasures were made before they were executed by the town officials so that every return that came to the Secretary of the Commonwealth's office was sealed, and opened in the presence of the Governor and Council. These reports were sworn to, and there is no question or doubt as to the reliability of the result upon the returns from the various cities and towns.

The committee went back to those returns, they carefully compared those returns, and then they retabulated the entire returns from the several counties, including the several cities and towns; and, as the clerk of the committee has said, we found, independently of the Governor's Council, that the returns as tabulated were correct.

Now, it is said that because the Governor's Council bungled these returns it created a suspicion. It has not created suspicion enough in the mind of the gentleman from Cambridge to raise any doubt in his mind; he thinks it is perfectly straight. The gentleman from Boston says it has created a suspicion in his mind. Now, that is the difference between the two. A suspicion is created in the mind of the gentleman because the Governor and Council bungled their part of the work, so he says that the returning board down in Barnstable and the returning board up in Williamstown, and in the three hundred and more other cities and towns of the Commonwealth, must have made an incorrect return.

I appreciate the situation that the gentleman from Southborough is in, and I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Boston has told us the real purpose of this discussion when he said: "I hope it will be given a wide publicity." Now, I hope the newspapers will take due notice of that and give it wide publicity, because that is what this discussion is for. As a matter of fact, there is no question in regard to the count. There is no reason to believe, simply because there is an error committed over in the Governor's office or the Councillors' office, that the officials in all the cities and towns of this Commonwealth committed errors. It seems to me that such suspicion is not well founded.

Now, the committee gave this case a great deal of attention, and they thought it was not necessary to send for all the ballots, all over the Commonwealth, and employ a large number of people to go over these ballots and count them all over again because we have not confidence in the men who have performed that service for the several cities and towns of Massachusetts. I think that suspicion is rather overdrawn, and I think it would be well if the gentlemen who have raised that suspicion should do their part toward allaying it and tell people that we have gone through this whole matter in a practical way. One of the men who appeared at the hearing said that the stream appears very muddy, and he said: "What we want to do is to go back where the water is clear." He said the clear water was back at the source. So we went back to find clear water, and we found clear water when we inspected the returns from the several cities and towns. So instead of going back to the source of the stream and using two months' time or six weeks' time, spending thousands of dollars, simply because some one was suspicious, we went where we found the waters very, very clear. We took those sworn returns from the several cities and towns and tabulated them, and there could be no question in regard to the result. There is just as much question as to the election of the other 319 members as there is to this one, and if we are going to have exact confidence we ought to go back and count all the votes for all the delegates; if we should count all those votes, and then find some people suspicious, why, we would have to perform that work over and over again, as they have asked us to do in this case. It seems to me this is a practical question, and you will notice that all that is said here is directed at the tabulation. I am not here to defend the Governor and Council. I am not here to defend the Governor for letting a partisan committee have the returns of the various cities and towns, and to remove them to another room with no custodian, when there were rights of 32 or 31 other candidates involved. That was done, and that opened another suspicion. But I think that these four men were honest, and I think that the election officers throughout this Commonwealth were honest. It seems to me a wholly unnecessary thing to drag in all these ballots, all over this Commonwealth, and spend our time counting ballots, when there is no question about the original count, no hope is offered or suggested that there will be any change, and for no other reason than to remove a suspicion that some people think exists in Massachusetts. I travel on the railroad and I meet all classes of people, and I have this to say: There is not a human being who has said a word to me about this question outside of this Convention; and yet I should think, to hear these gentlemen speak, that there was tremendous feeling all over the State about this so-called suspicion. I am ready to vote to accept the report of the committee and end the whole matter.

Mr. Broderick of Waltham: Did the committee on Elections communicate with the officials of any of the various cities and towns to learn the reasons for these erasures, alterations and corrections in the returns of the elections from these cities and towns, which have been referred to in the course of this debate?

Mr. George: I think it is fair to assume if the Secretary of the Commonwealth or any other official accepts an official return, even though it bear erasures, if it is signed and sworn to by the proper officials, he understands that it was not signed until those corrections or erasures had been made. It is a very easy thing to make an error in calling off the returns from all these cities and towns. We even did it ourselves. You cannot help getting a figure wrong sometimes. But we corrected it; and these returns were not signed and executed by the officials, and sworn to, until they were corrected. So we took it for granted that they were legal documents in every respect.

On the amendment offered by Mr. Timothy J. Driscoll of Boston, to substitute for the majority report the minority report of the committee, the roll was called and the motion to substitute was negatived, by a vote of 106 to 164. The report of the committee was then accepted.
DEBATES
DEBATES ON PROPOSALS TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION.

I.

The Preamble of the Constitution of Massachusetts is as follows:

PREAMBLE.

The end of the institution, maintenance, and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body politic, to protect it, and to furnish the individuals who compose it with the power of enjoying in safety and tranquility their natural rights, and the blessings of life: and whenever these great objects are not obtained the people have a right to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity, and happiness.

The body politic is formed by a voluntary association of individuals: it is a social compact, by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good. It is the duty of the people, therefore, in framing a Constitution of government, to provide for an equitable mode of making laws, as well as for an impartial interpretation and a faithful execution of them; that every man may, at all times, find his security in them.

We, therefore, the people of Massachusetts, acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the great Legislator of the universe, in affording us, in the course of His providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud, violence, or surprise, of entering into an original, explicit, and solemn compact with each other; and of forming a new Constitution of civil government, for ourselves and posterity; and devoutly imploiring His direction in so interesting a design, do agree upon, ordain, and establish, the following Declaration of Rights, and Frame of Government, as the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. Ralph L. Theller of New Bedford presented a resolution providing that the above Preamble be stricken out; and that the following be substituted: —

We, the people of Massachusetts, grateful for the heritage of liberty which has come down to us, in order to secure forever the benefits of that liberty to ourselves, to our posterity, and to all the inhabitants of our Commonwealth, in order to establish justice, to insure peace and tranquility, and to promote the general welfare, do ordain and establish the following as the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The Committee on Bill of Rights reported that the Resolution (Document No. 21) ought not to pass, and it was considered by the Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, July 19, 1917, and was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Theller of New Bedford: The docket does not show the proposer of the motion, so I had better acknowledge it now. I should like to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to document No. 21. It contains only seven lines and can easily be read at the present time. I have offered this amendment of the preamble after examining the preambles of the Constitutions of very many of the States of the Union and the preambles of the Constitutions of the various continental countries, and so far as my research went I found no Constitution with a preamble as long as that of Massachusetts at the present time. I think that improvement in the direction of brevity ought to be considered while we are revising this Constitution, and I have offered a very-simple amendment. The Constitution of New York which was not approved by the people and the present Constitution contain for a preamble only a single line. I confess, and probably many of you will feel as I did when I first read over the preamble of this Constitution of 1780, there is no question in anyone’s mind who takes out the little notebook and reads the preamble that it is couched in language which is sonorous and elegant. But I should like to state also that if you read it two or three times you will find in it the old phraseology of the old law and a great many expressions which have been discarded and some very antiquated political science. That is to say, the so-called social compact, I think I am correct in saying, has been almost entirely discarded by the thinkers in political science. But I am not offering any objection to that at all. The objection I offer is that the preamble or the Constitution itself should contain in so many words any political or economic theory. Our own Mr. Justice Holmes, in the New York Bake Shop Case, in his dissenting opinion, said in so many words: “But the Constitution should not contain any theory, whether of laissez faire or paternalism.”

My point, then, is entirely this: That brevity and the reform of language and the exclusion of any particular theory mentioned in such terms as is there mentioned, would really reframe the preamble so that it would be simply an expression of the obligation of the people of the State with regard to that particular Constitution which they are asked to adopt.

There is one further thing I should like to say before closing, and that is this: This resolution for a new preamble was referred to the committee on Bill of Rights. Now the Bill of Rights Committee, of course, has dealt with the Bill of Rights; it dealt with substantive rights. There is no particular right, personal or otherwise, in the preamble, so that it really was not for the committee on Bill of Rights to discuss it. It seems to me that this committee should refer this motion for amendment to the committee on Form and Phraseology, more particularly for this reason: There are other matters coming up before the Committee of the Whole and if they are accepted and referred to and accepted by the Convention, then the Constitution will be revised both in language and in matter, and if you accept the report of this committee now and the Convention acts on your report you will be in the position of having an antiquated preamble and a modernized Constitution. For that reason it seems to me that this report of the committee on Bill of Rights should not be accepted but that when this Committee of the Whole rises to report it should refer this resolution for an amendment of the preamble to the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. MERRILL of Gloucester: While, strictly speaking, the committee on Bill of Rights had no jurisdiction of the preamble of the Constitution, nevertheless this resolution was referred to it by the President of this Convention and they took jurisdiction. The gentleman from New Bedford appeared before them and explained at length his idea in changing the preamble of the Constitution. Your committee, however, after considering the matter thoroughly, were of the unanimous opinion that while many changes were necessary and desirable in our Constitution, there seemed to be no reason why the preamble of the oldest written Constitution in existence, written by a man who was famous in Massachusetts and throughout the United States, John Adams, — why that should be changed by cutting out a single phrase. And as I said, your committee therefore were of the unanimous opinion that this resolution ought not to pass.
PREAMBLE.

II.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECTARIAN AND OTHER INSTITUTIONS.

Article XVIII of the Amendments of the Constitution reads as follows:

All moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools, shall be applied to and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is to be expended; and such moneys shall never be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance exclusively of its own schools.

[Article III of Part the First provided for the election of Protestant ministers and for taxation for their support, a man's taxes to be applied to the support of a minister of his own denomination if there were any whose church he regularly attended, otherwise to the support of the dominant sect of the town. In 1836 Amendment XI was substituted. Amendment XVIII was adopted in 1855.]

The following Article of Amendment was recommended by the committee on Bill of Rights:

ARTICLE XVIII. No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion; and all moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is expended; and no grant, appropriation or use of public money, or property, shall be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning wherein any religious doctrine is taught, or any other school, or any college, infirmary, hospital, institution or undertaking which is not conducted according to law, under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers and agents authorized by the Legislature; except that appropriations may be made for the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts, for public libraries open to the public in any city or town; and no such grant, appropriation or use shall ever be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any church, religious denomination or society; [A] but nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting the power of the Legislature to authorize the performance through contract of the necessary functions of government respecting public health, or the care and maintenance of such persons as may, in whole or in part, require support at the public charge.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton dissented from the recommendation of the committee on Bill of Rights and, in a minority report, recommended the following:

ARTICLE XVIII. No law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the State, county, city, town or any civil division use its property, or credit, or any money raised by taxation or otherwise, or authorize any of them to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding by appropriation or in any other manner any church, religious denomination or religious society, or any institution, society, undertaking, school or higher institu, tion of learning which is wholly or in part under the control of a religious body or a religious corporation, whether said complete or partial control be explicitly expressed in the charter, by-laws, or other such writing by some provision that all or any of the governing or managing bodies must or may be members of a specified religious body or society or must or may be appointed by a specified religious body, corporation or authority, or whether, if the control be not thus explicitly expressed, it be due to the fact that a majority of the governing or managing bodies are members of one religious body or society or are appointed by one religious body, corporation or authority. Nor shall the State, county, city, town or any civil division use its property or credit or any money raised by taxation or otherwise or authorize any of them to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding by appropriation or in any other manner any school or higher institution of learning, whether under public or private control, in which the distinctive tenets of any religious body are taught or propagated: provided, that nothing contained in this section shall be held to deprive any inmate of the publicly controlled charitable, reformatory or penal institutions of the opportunity of religious exercises of his own faith, but no inmate shall ever be compelled to utilize religious opportunities of any kind against his will, or, if a minor, without the consent of his parents or guardians.

Schedule. This amendment is to be described on the ballot by the words “Prohibiting Sectarian Appropriations.”

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the committee’s resolution be amended as follows:—

By striking out all after the word “society”, at [A], and inserting in place thereof the following: “but nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the State or any county, city or town, from paying not more than the ordinary rates for services previously rendered by a privately controlled hospital or infirmary.”

Subsequently, Mr. Anderson withdrew his substitute resolution and also his amendment of the measure reported by the committee on Bill of Rights.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston, chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, then moved that the committee’s resolution be amended by substituting a new draft, which, after technical changes by the committee on Form and Phraseology at a later date, read as follows:—

Article XVIII. Section 1. No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion.

Section 2. All moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the city or town in which the money is expended [A] and no grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning [B] wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated, or any other school, [C] college, [D] infirmary, hospital, institution, or educational, [E] charitable or religious undertaking which is not [F] under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers or [G] agents authorized by the Commonwealth or Federal authority or both, except that appropriations may be made for [K] the maintenance and support of the Soldiers’ Home in Massachusetts and for [H] libraries [I] open to the public in any city or town [J]; and no such grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any church, religious denomination or society.

Section 3. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Commonwealth, or any political division thereof, from paying to privately controlled [L] hospitals, infirmaries, or institutions for the deaf, dumb or blind not more than the ordinary and reasonable compensation for care or support actually rendered or furnished by such [M] hospitals, infirmaries or institutions to such persons as may be in whole or in part unable to support or care for themselves.

Section 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any inmate of a publicly controlled reformatory, penal or charitable institution of the oppor-
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Opportunity of religious exercises therein of his own faith; and no inmate of such institution shall be compelled to attend religious services or receive religious instruction against his will, or, if a minor, without the consent of his parent or guardian.

Mr. Charles G. Washburn of Worcester moved that the new draft be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: —

The General Court may make appropriations for scholarships in technical and engineering schools in which State scholarships now exist.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport moved that the new draft be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: —

But nothing herein contained shall prevent any city or town from expending money raised by taxation or otherwise, in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Frank P. Bennett of Saugus moved that the new draft be amended by striking out all after the word "expended", at [A].

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Scott Adams of Springfield moved that the new draft be amended by inserting after the word "libraries", at [I], the words "and museums connected therewith."

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Samuel W. George of Haverhill moved that the new draft be amended by substituting the following: —

As the public worship of God and instruction in piety, religion, and morality, promotes the happiness and prosperity of a people, therefore the several religious societies of this Commonwealth, whether corporate or unincorporate, shall ever have the right to establish and maintain houses for public worship, for the maintenance of religious instruction; and no law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and to avoid all possible discrimination no religious test or qualification shall ever be required of any person seeking public employment and no money shall ever be appropriated or used by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the support of any institution wherein the distinctive doctrines, creeds or tenets of any particular religion are taught, or for the support of any institution founded for or controlled by any religious sect, denomination or society.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Frank L. Boyden of Deerfield moved that the new draft be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: —

Section 5. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any town from raising and appropriating money for such academies in the Commonwealth wherein no denominational doctrine is inculcated as are open to the public in any town not maintaining a high school or specifically exempted therefrom.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. James P. Richardson of Newton moved that the above amendment be amended by inserting after the word "academies", the words "now existing."

This amendment was rejected.
Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Boyd be amended by striking out the words proposed to be inserted, and inserting in place thereof the following: —

Section 5. But nothing herein contained shall prevent any city or town from expending money raised by taxation or otherwise, in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the new draft be amended as follows: —

By striking out the words "infirmary, hospital, institution, or", at [D].

This amendment was rejected.

The same gentleman moved that the new draft be amended as follows: —

By striking out the word "charitable", at [E]; by striking out the words "the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts and for", at [K]; by striking out the words "hospitals, infirmaries, or", at [L]; and by striking out the words "hospitals, infirmaries or", at [M].

These amendments were withdrawn.

Mr. Charles G. Washburn of Worcester moved that the new draft be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: —

Nothing in this amendment shall in any way affect chapter 78 of the Acts and Resolves of 1911, being a Resolve in favor of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and chapter 87 of the Acts and Resolves of 1912, being a Resolve in favor of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Lincoln Bryant of Milton moved that the new draft be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: —

Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the appropriation and payment to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology of the sums granted to it under chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911 as amended, or to the appropriation and payment to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute of the sums granted to it under chapter 87 of the Resolves of 1912.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. James M. Morton of Fall River moved that the new draft be amended by inserting after the word "town", at [J], the words "", and to carry out legal obligations, if any, already entered into".

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston moved that the above amendment be amended by striking out the word "legal".

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Lincoln Bryant of Milton moved that Mr. Morton's amendment be amended by striking out the words to be inserted and inserting in place thereof the following: "", and to carry out the provisions, as now defined, of Chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911 and of Chapter 87 of the Resolves of 1912."

This amendment was rejected.
Mr. Martin M. Lomasney of Boston moved that the new draft be amended by inserting before the word "agents", at [G], the word "public".

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the new draft be amended as follows:

By inserting after the word "learning", at [B], the words "whether under public control or otherwise"; by inserting after the word "school," at [C], the words "or any"; and by inserting after the word "not", at [F], the words "publicly owned and".

* These amendments were adopted.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston moved that the new draft be amended by striking out, at [H], the words "libraries open to the public", and inserting in place thereof the words "free public libraries".

This amendment was adopted.

The committee on Form and Phraseology further recommended that the new draft be amended so as to read as follows:

ARTICLE XLV. Section 1. No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion.

Section 2. No grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated, or any other school, college, infirmary, hospital, institution, or educational, charitable or religious undertaking which is not under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers or agents authorized by the Commonwealth or Federal authority or both, except that appropriations may be made for the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts and for free public libraries in any city or town; and no such grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any church, religious denomination or society.

Section 3. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Commonwealth, or any political division thereof, from paying to privately controlled hospitals, infirmaries, or institutions for the deaf, dumb or blind not more than the ordinary and reasonable compensation for care or support actually rendered or furnished by such hospitals, infirmaries or institutions to such persons as may be in whole or in part unable to support or care for themselves.

Section 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any inmate of a publicly controlled reformatory, penal or charitable institution of the opportunity of religious exercises therein of his own faith; and no inmate of such institution shall be compelled to attend religious services or receive religious instruction against his will, or, if a minor, without the consent of his parent or guardian.

[In explanation of its proposed amendment changing the number of the Article of Amendment from "XVIII" to "XLV" the committee on Form and Phraseology stated that its adoption presupposes that Article XVIII of the Amendments to the Constitution is to be allowed to stand in its present form, while the proposed amendment under consideration is to be supplemental thereto. In that case no reference should be made to Article XVIII, and no part of its language need be repeated in the new amendment.]

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Samuel L. Powers of Newton moved that the new draft be amended by inserting after the word "expended", at [N], the words "or of such State authorities as the Legislature may direct".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport moved that the new draft be amended by substituting the following:

No law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the State, county, city, town, village or other civil
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the new draft be amended by adding the following new section:

SECTION 5. This amendment shall not take effect until the October first next succeeding its ratification and adoption by the people.

This amendment was adopted.

The proposed Amendment of the Constitution as amended and passed to be engrossed was as follows:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

ARTICLE XVIII. SECTION 1. No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion.

SECTION 2. All moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the Commonwealth for the support of common schools shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is expended; and no grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning, whether under public control or otherwise, wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated, or any other school, or any college, infirmary, hospital, institution, or educational, charitable or religious undertaking which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers or public agents authorized by the Commonwealth or Federal authority or both, except that appropriations may be made for the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts and for free public libraries in any city or town, and to carry out legal obligations, if any, already entered into; and no such grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any church, religious denomination or society.

SECTION 3. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Commonwealth, or any political division thereof, from paying to privately controlled hospitals, infirmaries, or institutions for the deaf, dumb or blind not more than the ordinary and reasonable compensation for care or support actually rendered or furnished by such hospitals, infirmaries or institutions to such persons as may be in whole or in part unable to support or care for themselves.

SECTION 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any inmate of a publicly controlled reformatory, penal or charitable institution of the opportunity of religious exercises therein of his own faith; but no inmate of such institution shall be compelled to attend religious services or receive religious instruction against his will, or, if a minor, without the consent of his parent or guardian.

SECTION 5. This amendment shall not take effect until the October first next succeeding its ratification and adoption by the people.

The vote on passing the resolution to be engrossed was taken by a call of the yeas and nays. The result was: Yeas, 275; nays, 25.

The Convention voted, without division, Thursday, August 30, 1917, to submit the proposed amendment to the people.

The Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, began the consideration of the measure as outlined above Thursday, July 19, 1917, but the discussion of the merits of the proposed change of the Constitution did not begin until the following day.
THE DEBATE.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I rise, Mr. Chairman, not to move to substitute the minority report for the majority report at this time, though I may do so some time in the future after debate, but I rise at this time to offer a series of amendments to the resolution before us in order to make it what, it seems to me, would be proper and reasonable. Those who are familiar with legislative procedure might think that I was trying to load down a measure to which I am hostile with unfavorable amendments, but I wish those whose minds are confused with the legislative procedure to lay that notion entirely aside. I am trying to perfect this report of the committee, so that it may be most acceptable to me and to those who stand with me in this body. We may in the end be forced to go to the polls with this measure on the ballot. If that should happen, there are a good many of us who perhaps at the polls, in spite of a good many objections to it, might possibly vote for it and work for it, but we cannot vote for it or work for it as it stands; not for a minute. In fact, just as it stands here, we should be forced not only to vote against it in the Convention but also to work against it from the minute that the Convention placed it before the people. I am sure that if to those who wish nothing done on this subject, and those who favor sectarian appropriations in principle, and all the friends of the private institutions of the State, were added our powerful body, the Convention might just as well not pass any amendment, because it certainly will be defeated at the polls. Consequently, in a perfectly friendly manner, I am offering certain amendments this morning to this measure, in order that if it should chance to pass, at least it would be open to us to consider the advisability of supporting it at the polls. The first amendment which I wish to offer is this:

I move to substitute for the final section of the committee's report, beginning with the words on line 39, "but nothing herein contained", the words, "nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the State or any county, city or town, from paying not more than the ordinary rates for services previously rendered by a privately controlled hospital or infirmary."

I make that motion as an amendment.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: The majority of the committee on Bill of Rights, a very large majority, have reported Resolution No. 306. Gentlemen may be confused, having seen so many other copies of the proposed resolution, but it is No. 306 that is now before us. The committee feels that at this stage of the proceedings it should object to every amendment. It is a very difficult resolution to draw, and one word may change the entire meaning. We drew probably fifteen to twenty-five resolutions before we finally adopted this one that is submitted. I do not say that later in the proceedings of the Convention the committee will not be willing to make any amendment, but at the present stage the committee is opposed to the acceptance of any amendment to its resolution.

Mr. Anderson: I am very sorry to be forced to this line of action and did not expect to be until within five minutes. I want the Convention to understand that thoroughly. I had understood that my amendment had been accepted to all intents and purposes, and I would have offered the amendment which I understood was accepted by the committee, if I had had a copy of it here. I am perfectly will- ing to substitute that, with a change or two, for the amendment which I already have offered if somebody will put it in my hands. However, it will be of the same tenor as the resolution which I have put in.

I object to the last clause of the resolution for the reason that it is so loosely drawn that it opens the door to almost everything. A dis- tinguished citizen of this State who ran for delegate at large to this Convention but who was not elected, and who has bitterly opposed the anti-sectarian amendment on the stump again and again, said to a friend of mine that this section of the majority report not only opened the door wide, but invited everybody to come in. It seems to me that there is no necessity for this amendment, in the first place, and in that view the chairman of our committee at one time stood with me.

The genesis and the growth of this amendment is a remarkable and interesting history. When my friend from the fifth ward (formerly Ward 8, Boston) right here (Mr. Lomasney), a man whose heart is as big as his head is clear, offered his amendment before the Legislature, he did not think it was necessary to have any clause of this kind at all. But when the war came on and he thought of battles and pestilences and epidemics and disasters, he considered that the State ought to be able to pay some hospital for taking care of the people who might be affected. I quite agreed with him and told him that I would accept his amendment slightly differently worded, which wording he immedi- ately accepted; so there we were agreed as we are agreed in a great many things, I find out. Then came the original of this majority report transmitted to the committee by our chairman, and that had no such clause. And when it was suggested in the committee that the clause should be put in, the chairman said that there was no necessity of it, and I agreed with him in the committee. I cannot follow all the various editions of this majority report. I tried to keep up for some days, filing a minority report every time they put in a majority report, but I gave up. If that is the game they have me beaten hands down. But if I remember correctly, the first amendment of this kind to the majority report was a very much simpler affair, and one to which I would object very much less than to this. It was intended to take care of the Eye and Ear Infirmary and the Perkins Institution for the Blind. Then our committee at the advice of our chairman parted company, and we were in two flocks for a while, and when the major- ity of the committee flocked together, they evolved this remarkable proposition which we have here, an absolutely wide open affair. A noted lawyer, a professor in a law school of high standing in this country, told me that the last clause of this report would permit almost anything,—old age pensions, or soldiers' pensions of any sort or outdoor relief, or anything you might desire. Just look at it: "The care and maintenance of such persons as may in whole or in part require support at the public charge." That takes in a great many persons.

The principal thing to which I object, however, is simply this: "through contract." "Through contract!" Our measure starts in with a certain proposition. I do not want to criticize it too severely, you know, because I might want at some time to support it at the polls, so I cannot rip into it the way I might, if I wanted to. I do not want to; I want to handle it tenderly, you understand. But still I must say, the original idea of the measure, I think nobody will dispute me, would exclude all private institutions; and that is what my friend from the fifth ward (Mr. Lomasney) had in his measure,—all private institutions; perfectly straight. When our chairman brought in his first amendment, he used the words "except the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts." I am not an expert on soldiers' homes, but a good many of the politicians here say that the exception of the Soldiers' Home is not necessary, that the Soldiers' Home of Massachusetts had better be supported by the State. That was the first exception. The thing was going along merrily, when all of a sudden one afternoon they got a letter from the librarian of the Springfield Library in which he told them that there were sixty-six towns and cities in this State that had libraries which would be affected by this majority report. The majority and the minority of the committee had never thought so far as a library, you know, and consequently they were utterly astounded and dumbfounded. It was like a bombshell exploding under them; they naturally thought that they could not run up against sixty-six cities and towns in the State, and so they excepted libraries. And then they thought they must except the Perkins Institution for the Blind and the Eye and Ear Infirmary to a certain extent at least by a rather innocuous clause like the one in the second edition. Now this is the third, fourth or fifth edition,—I have forgotten the count now,—but in this third, fourth or fifth edition, the one we have before us, you will see that the report practically takes out from under the principle of the amendment all of the hospitals and infirmaries and everything that is in the line of public health and everything that is in the line of poor relief, and by the time they get through excepting I do not know what will be left of their principle of private institutions.

Now how does it except almost everything? In this way: We know very well that contracts are made in cities and towns where a certain party, political or otherwise, has a very large majority; and often contracts are made in such a way as to give considerable support, are they not? And in such a city or town there is no reason in the world why, with a fat contract, the sectarian hospitals, infirmaries and so on and the private hospitals, infirmaries and so on should not be adequately supported just as much as by appropriations. We do not want to have the system that prevails in the city of New York and which caused that tremendous struggle down there last year. We do not want five millions of dollars of the State's money or city's money appropriated as it was in the city of New York for that kind of institutions. Anybody who read of that controversy knows what condition those institutions were in at the time that Mayor Mitchell held them up. We do not want that kind of thing, and this clause of the measure allows it absolutely, it seems to me, and it will take a good deal to convince me that it does not. I do not mean to say that it was put in on purpose to allow anything of that kind; I think it was put in by inadvertence, but the effect of it will be just exactly the same.

Now, I have been interviewing the State Board of Charities and the State Department of Health, and they tell me that the contract system is not the system in vogue in this State at the present time. So this report actually recommends to the Legislature in a certain way a new system which is not now in vogue in this State, and which has been well kept out of it up to this moment. At the present time, so far as the State is concerned, the amount which may be paid for those who are sent to the hospitals and so on, is regulated by law; and the State pays in most instances, if not in all instances, less than it really costs the hospitals and infirmaries, and in the case of some sectarian institutions the sectarian institutions take charge of dependent children, — orphans, — absolutely for nothing. That was one of the fine things which I found out in my investigation of this matter. I discovered that some hundreds of orphan children who were sent to St. Mary's Orphan Asylum here in Boston, as I understand it, were actually received and cared for without charge. I thought that was a delightful thing. The asylum never sent any bill at all to the State for them. They had no contract in the matter; they simply took the children and cared for them freely and gratuitously out of the benevolence of those who support an institution of that sort. We do not need any contract; we do not need anything of this kind. It will be new in the State. Perhaps in a few cities or towns it may exist, but in the majority of the cities and towns it does not obtain. And I think that we better fix this measure up right here. I understand that the majority of the committee are ready to do it, though I believe they have no meeting in prospect and have tied themselves up in some way or other about it. But I hope that my amendment will not be voted down by the Convention on that account. We have come here in a spirit of accommodation in every way. I have said no bitter words because there was no bitter feeling in my heart, and now when we ask in the spirit of extreme accommodation and concession that our amendment should be adopted, it seems to me that it is only generous and right that it should be.

Mr. Coleman of Boston: May I ask the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, who is speaking for the majority (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) if he will tell the Convention why that majority objects to the passing of the amendments that are being proposed by the member in the third section (Mr. Anderson) at the present time, when he, the chairman, intimates that they may be ready to accept them at a later time. It would help me very much if I could understand why the majority of the committee take that attitude.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: There are fifteen members on this committee. They sit all over this chamber. I am unable to ask each one of the fifteen whether he is willing to accept that amendment or not. I say they may be willing to accept some such amendments at a later stage; I cannot say now whether they will or not. And, gentlemen, I want to say this for the committee: This resolution offered here has borne my name. It is not my resolution. It is the resolution of the committee on Bill of Rights. There are fifteen gentlemen on that committee. Each one of those fifteen gentlemen has a mind of his own. He has shown it in every deliberation of that committee. I do not believe there is a man of that fifteen who has not got some word or some thought into the resolution which is now before you. I like credit for myself, but I do not like credit that does not belong to me, and if there is any credit in producing that resolution it belongs to every man, including the gentleman from Newton, who has contributed to that resolution as we now submit it. Gentlemen, we are opposed to this amendment at the present time, as we are opposed to any other amendment. We are opposed to amendments because we have not gotten together and had an opportunity to consider them, and I cannot speak, and I will not speak, for the other fourteen men of my committee, who have minds of their own.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: It is somewhat hazardous for one to express his judgment upon these matters who is not a member of the committee and not on the inside of any faction, that is, upon any of these amendments, but as a member of the Legislature for the past four years it seems to me that I detect something rather dangerous in this amendment that is offered. Both the amendment offered and the closing clause of the original resolution provide for the support and care of public or semi-public charges. The original resolution provides that the care of those charges shall be as authorized by the Legislature. The amendment takes away all legislative authority for the care of those charges, and constitutionally prohibits the Legislature from exercising authority over the care of those charges, leaving it open to the different cities, counties or towns. Mr. Chairman, what would that result in? It would result in the various institutions in the cities and counties and towns being thrown into politics. It would result in this most unhappy controversy, which is now somewhat of a State controversy, being localized in the various cities, towns and counties. Does this Convention want to take away from the Legislature the important power that the original resolution would give it, if we are to make any change in the Constitution at all? Does this Convention want to prohibit the exercise of this power by the larger body, the Legislature of the State, men who come up here from all walks of life, all religious faiths and all geographical sections of our State, who would be able as a fair-minded jury to decide upon things that localities, in the heat of battle and the heat, perhaps, of religious strife and controversy, could not decide upon for the benefit of the Commonwealth? I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will look more than carefully at this amendment before we accept it. I do not know just how much force there is in the argument that is made by the gentleman who moves the amendment (Mr. Anderson) as to there being a violation of good faith in the issue of contracts. That would depend, of course, Mr. Chairman, upon the good faith of your Legislature. If you can trust your Legislature, why, we can believe that there would be no illegal or unfaithful contracts allowed to be issued. On the contrary, if this Convention and this committee feels it cannot trust its Legislature, a much simpler amendment would meet the objection of the gentleman who has just spoken by simply adding at the close of the whole section some such words as: "provided, that such contracts shall not be issued at rates in excess of the ordinary terms of service." That would still give the Legislature power, but would not give the Legislature power to approve a contract that was obviously intended to defeat a situation. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that if this committee is going to make any amendment of this sort it will make a simpler amendment, still leaving power in the Legislature; not constitutionally prohibiting your Legislature from having anything to say as to the disposition of the public charges of the future.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: The gentleman is right when he says that the more you read this question, the more you examine these measures, the more you will realize what an important question it is. This committee does not desire to shut off any proper relief, and it was in that spirit it met. Now what caused these lines to be added? The fear that the poor in some way would be affected. That was the cause. It was so as not to put anything into the Constitution that would prohibit anything, charity or anything else, which the State was now doing for the poor. That was the purpose of these lines. And of course when you get doctors of law and doctors of divinity arguing in a committee, where does a poor layman fit? What are you going to do, — follow the lawyer or follow the minister? If you want to go to heaven you probably will follow the minister; if you are going to live on earth you have to follow the lawyer: And the lawyers on this committee told us that these were the things to do and they also told us they had taken the best legal advice. Now I have respect for lawyers, but I have seen lawyers fool themselves, and that is why we have Supreme Courts. And when Supreme Courts have exercised the function given them by the Constitution we have seen them write minority reports. The purpose of our committee was to do nothing against the weakest individual or institution in this Commonwealth that properly should receive public money.

Mr. Newton of Everett: Is it also the purpose of this committee, when it is shown that they have made a mistake, to refuse to allow any amendments to be made?

Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman had retained his seat a moment I would have come to that part. Now, Mr. Chairman, again it is a lawyer, and there are a hundred and fifty or sixty of them in this Convention. God knows when we are going to get through if we have to hear them all. [Laughter.]

For the first time this morning a former Attorney-General of this Commonwealth submitted a review of these lines, slightly different from that of Mr. Anderson, but I see no objection to them. We had a meeting of the committee; we had forty or fifty amendments offered. You must have organization and you must have discipline and you must have cooperation if you want efficiency. So we agreed to come into this Convention, and discuss the matter, — what for? Not to arrive at what any one person wants, but to arrive at that which was right for the entire State. And that was the spirit that permeated the mind of the chairman of the committee when he addressed the Convention. He said: "Discuss all these amendments, bring out the weak points in the measure; offer your amendments to cure them. Vote on the main question, so that we may know just what the views of a majority of this committee are, and then fix upon and put into this measure those words that will guarantee to every proper individual and institution in this State that to which it is entitled, so that it may relieve the State of the situation that it is now in." Of course the measure is entirely different from the first one. When it was my privilege, sir, to meet this question for the first time, I found men going through the Legislature whispering, — whispering, suggesting, — what? All kinds of things, — and I do not like to say anything any more than my brother behind me (Mr. Anderson) that would stir up any feeling here. Why, sir, he said just now he was surprised to find that the poor of a certain denomination were cared for so delightfully. Would you not think that, as a professor and as an expert on those matters, before he started a campaign such as he has, he would have made inquiries to see what was the condition, what was actually being done; not what somebody was whispering to him was being done? Why, all elements in this State, Protestants, Catholics and Jews, regard 'their' poor, and they regard them in such a way that they willingly contribute to their support. And he will find that a man does not ask what a man's religion is, if he is poor and he wants to help him. And that is the spirit we want to show in this case.

Mr. Chairman, we have not had a chance to meet and discuss this question. The question is: Do you want the main features of the Curtis Resolution, No. 306, to prevail? If so, let us adopt it. Let us then meet these amendments in Convention. Let every man here who has an idea express it, because, Mr. Chairman, the committee has no desire to suppress ideas. They want a measure perfect, with every interest safeguarded, so that it will receive the approval of the citizens of Massachusetts at the polls; for it will be one of the best things this Convention shall have done if it has removed this question from the political atmosphere.

Mr. Parker of Lancaster: Because I believe that the committee on Bill of Rights, considering the subject embodied in the majority report of that committee, reflects the judgment of the committee, based upon what I believe to have been one of the fullest, the most deliberate, the most careful and the most conscientious investigations which a committee could make, the majority report of that committee is entitled to the respectful consideration of this Convention, which doubtless it will have; because also I myself believe that the provisions embodied in the majority report of the committee do in substance wisely and finally deal with the momentous but sensitive subject with which the report is concerned. I hope that the majority report of the committee will be adopted by the Convention sitting in Committee of the Whole, and I hope that this procedure will result, because I confidently entertain the belief, based upon conference with very many of my colleagues sitting in this Convention, that at later stages in the consideration of this measure there will be opportunity to consider, and probably to embody in a final draft of the measure, amendments which I am assured will harmonize the different views of all the delegates and result in a measure which will assure the people of the Commonwealth that this question, with which we are attempting wisely and definitely to deal, will be so safeguarded that hereafter it will be held wholly above and apart from the natural, normal disputations, discussions, attritions and asperities that always are involved in any discussion of public policy. Because I believe that the majority measure does reasonably secure these most desirable ends, and because especially I believe that further opportunity will be given, and will be availed of, to incorporate in this resolution some amendments which I think are distinctly meritorious, we may look for a harmonious and happily unanimous conclusion. I know, Mr. Chairman, that conferences have been held. I speak by no authority, but upon my own confident belief, when I say that the differences now outstanding are differences of phrase rather than of substance. Knowing the responsible attitude which all my colleagues hold to every proposition with which they are here to deal, I believe that these differences, chiefly of phraseology, when dealt with by candid and conscientious men, will be so resolved that finally a measure having the substantially unanimous support of the Convention will result. I therefore hope that the report of the majority of the committee may be accepted, that the amendments now presented may not prevail, that with the proposition embodied in the majority report which is, I think, admittedly adequate, we may then proceed in an orderly, deliberate manner before committees or before the Convention itself to revise the measure by consideration of some further amendments, which I myself believe to be desirable as perfecting clauses.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to say that this debate so far absolutely justifies my motion of yesterday to put this thing over until Tuesday.
I think everybody sees that by this time if he has any eyes in his head.
We are in a very unfortunate position here. The committee take the ground that they will accept no amendments, even if they believe in them, at this stage of the proceedings. They also say that they want all the amendments offered, in order that they may find out what the Convention wants, but they want all of them, as I understand it, voted down. Then I should say that the result of the whole matter will be that the Convention will understand that the Committee of the Whole does not want any amendments. Well, what are we going to do about it? I myself would be willing to go on in this unnatural way which has been proposed by the chairman of our committee (Mr.
Edwin U. Curtis) if it were not for one thing. I am afraid of this debate,—not afraid of this debate for my amendment, not for a minute; my amendment will go through all right, I think,—but I am afraid that as we go on, incautiously somebody is going to say something which he will wish he had not said and which will cause somebody else to say something that he will wish he had not said, and the present situation, which is extremely favorable, may be all overturned.
I wish I had enough parliamentary knowledge to know how to get out of this perplexity. I am going to ask the chairman of the Committee of the Whole for information now if a motion to recommit this matter to the committee on Bill of Rights would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Luce of Waltham): The Chair will rule that a motion to recommit will not be in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would it be in order that this committee recommend to the Convention that this report be recommitted to the committee on Bill of Rights?

The CHAIRMAN: It would be so in order.

Mr. ANDERSON: I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Anderson of Newton moves that in the matter of the resolution under consideration, with the pending amendment, the committee recommend to the Convention that the matter be recommitted to the committee on the Bill of Rights. Is the committee ready for that question?

Mr. EDWIN U. CURTIS: We should gain nothing by that, because when we brought in our next report there would still be other amendments. There are many gentlemen sitting in this room who have amendments, who have handed them to me. This is not the only amendment. There are other people interested. It seems to me that this Convention has been asked to play fast and loose about long enough. We ought now to get right down to business. I shall not say anything here that will stir up anybody's feelings; I do not see why any other gentleman should. Let us all keep our tempers, but let us not be afraid to meet these issues and meet them fairly and squarely, and have it out, and have this subject out of the way. Now, the committee feels this way: As the ex-Attorney-General (Mr. Parker) has told you, this is a very delicate, a very hard measure to draw; and, gentlemen of the Convention, nobody knows it better than he. And, gentlemen, except the ex-Attorney-General, no lawyer of prominence here, no other of the great lawyers has helped us. He has helped us, and he knows what he says. He knows that the best thing to do is to pass this measure along and show that it in general meets the approval of this Convention, and then take up these amendments as we are willing to do, and try to straighten the thing out, and have it right. And I will say now, what before I did not say, that if this committee report this measure favorably to the Convention, when it comes up on the calendar in the Convention, as chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights I will then move that it lie on the table. Then everybody who has an amendment can bring it in to the committee, and we will consider it and report back our views.

Mr. GEORGE of Haverhill: I think that this Convention will have reason to congratulate itself upon the progress which it is making in the Committee of the Whole. I think the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) is a little apprehensive. There is a very easy way of handling this matter. Let us discuss this question for the next hour and then the committee rises and reports to the Convention progress, and this question takes its place in the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday. That is an easy method; nobody is harmed.

I do not agree with the last speaker that we have got to force this thing out of the Committee of the Whole to-day, if that is his purpose. The place for this resolution is in the Committee of the Whole, where we all can discuss it in an informal way. I am not prepared to discuss it to-day because there are so many questions coming up in relation to various aspects of this resolution that we cannot reach it in the course of an hour. Now let us go on and discuss this resolution, and when the committee rises and reports progress to the Convention, the Convention adjourns and next Tuesday we will take this matter up where we left off. Anybody who has any amendments that he wants to offer can bring them in here at this time. I have an idea, Mr. Chairman, that this matter is going to be discussed in the Committee of the Whole right here for two or three days, and it ought to be. Who is there who is afraid to discuss this question? Why, it seems to me that we are trying to look for trouble when we seem to invite people to say things or infer that somebody is going to say things that somebody will not like. I know in past debates people have said a good many things that I did not like, but I was not provoked about it. We can get along here as reasonable, intelligent men, and we are making great progress here in the Committee of the Whole.

Now I do not think that the committee is going to insist that we shall have a vote to-day to report this to the Convention. There is no reason for it and it ought not to be done. Let us discuss this for the next hour and then let the committee rise, and the Convention will adjourn and the western people will go home and we all will come back next Tuesday morning ready to spend the whole day in considering this resolution.
Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I should like to explain, gentlemen, that I had no expectation of getting a vote to-day; I have not had even an opportunity to explain it. I never expected it would pass to-day.

Mr. Coleman of Boston: There was one little point which seems to have been overlooked. The gentleman who is proposing the amendment (Mr. Anderson) said in his opening remarks something that intimated that he expected that this amendment, and other amendments which he intended to propose, would meet with the approval of the majority of the committee, and that he had not known until five minutes before he rose that that situation would not prevail. Now, the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights refers to the amendment offered by the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Anderson) as though it were a miscellaneous amendment, that might be offered by any one in this Convention, of which the majority had no particular knowledge in advance. It would appear from the remarks made by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) that there had been some tentative understanding between the minority and the majority with reference to these amendments that he is about to propose. Now if, as we understand from the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, he has not had opportunity to consult the majority with reference to these various amendments, would it not be wise and fair, and help in expediting business, if we gave the majority and the minority an opportunity to come together between now and Tuesday and find out whether it was possible for them to come to an agreement? If they cannot we might well proceed as we are proceeding now, but if they possibly can, why, it would save a great deal of time and possibly some confusion, and, as the gentleman from Newton said, some unfortunate discussion.

Mr. George: I should like to ask the gentleman in this division (Mr. Coleman) if the committee should rise and report to the Convention, what there is to hinder the majority and minority members of this committee getting together and staying together all the time between now and next Tuesday morning, and harmonize everything that they want to, and come in here with a substitute?

Mr. Coleman: In order to bring the matter to some action, I move that the Committee of the Whole rise.

The Chairman: Mr. Coleman of Boston moves that the Committee of the Whole now rise.

Mr. Lomasney: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that motion will not prevail until every man in this Convention who has an amendment shall offer it. Two or three gentlemen have given me amendments. Let every man put his amendment in here and have it printed. We shall have then until next Tuesday to see what they are, to think them over; and then we shall have two or three days to go over all these matters. What is the use of rising now with only this one amendment before us and then come in next week and have a dozen more offered? Let every man put his hand on the table; let him put his amendment in and have it printed, then when we have a conference we shall have the whole matter before us. Then it cannot be said that anybody was trying to force the matter. I know the gentleman misunderstood the position of the chairman of the committee. He said he did not desire to force a vote to-day. We never shall get together on this measure if we do not have the confidence in, and submit, what we believe will perfect. Why, people have come to me with two or three amendments and asked: "What do you think of this?" I could not offer them. Now let the gentleman put them in and have them printed and then they will be properly before us. I hope we will not rise and report progress until that is done.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I certainly hope the committee will not rise.
It is quarter of twelve; we have another hour. I am prepared to go ahead and make a statement to the Committee of the Whole on this resolution and tell the committee what it is about. I think Mr.
Lomasney's suggestion fair, that the amendments be presented so that the members may know what was pending.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: As a member of the committee on Bill of Rights, I feel, if you will indulge me just a moment to say so, because of my experience on the committee on Bill of Rights, that there is no possibility of getting together with the only infallible member, the minority of that committee. I rose some moments ago to ask him seriously, if this amendment which he has suggested prevailed would he and his powerful cohorts then support at the polls this measure, the majority measure, if the Convention decided to submit it to the people? Mr. Chairman, in the course of our very courteous questioning of the infallible member of the committee when he appeared before us, I asked him if in its discretion and wisdom the Convention saw fit not to submit his amendment, but to submit to the people the perfected amendment which included everything, would he and his friends then support it at the polls, and he said "No." Now, what is the sense of continuing this effort for further compromise?
Such is the course of conduct he has pursued throughout, — delay and bickering and pretended amendments, to all of which amendments we have agreed; and I would agree to this one which he has sought to submit here, but he is not acting in good faith, it seems to me — (the Chairman rapped). I will withdraw that statement. It seems to me that I am justified in refusing to acquiesce in his amendment. That is why I think we ought to discuss here and now the substantive matter and I will close with the suggestion, which has been made before, that we ought to discuss and come to a conclusion as to substantially what measure we wish to pass and submit to the people, and then amend it later. What is the sense of wasting time making amendments to a measure until we know if said measure will be adopted by the Convention?

Mr. Coleman: I made my motion with the hope, and the expectation, that when the majority and minority came together with reference to the amendments that are about to be proposed, they would find that the whole fifteen of them can agree upon all of them.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: I hope that this committee will not rise at this time. I hope they will not recommit at this time. I hope they will take the offer of the chairman of our committee and let him explain the measure that is before you. Something has been said by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) indicating that he was misled. As a member of that committee who has attended all its meetings, and been at all the meetings of this body, I will say that I have heard of no amendments until the article which appeared in the Boston Journal this week telling about a meeting at the Union Club. Yesterday I heard murmurings of that amendment. This morning two gentlemen met me in the corridor and said: "What do you think of this? If you will agree to this the minority will withdraw." It was eight or ten lines written in handwriting. "Why," I said, "I cannot pass upon this; I am only one member of the committee anyhow. Where have you been during these weeks we have been in session?"
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

We have been surprised, really, at the small assistance we have had. We knew there was a tremendous amount of public interest, but it did not fructify, it did not crystallize, in any way of helpfulness toward us; and the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) comes in with some amendment, and intimates that if it is accepted he may withdraw something else. To repeat what the gentleman from Boston (Mr. William H. Sullivan) has said, we heard that very frequently in the committee. Day after day we adjourned and thought things would be all right, but during the night something happened and the next day we found we had not agreed.

Now, the proposition made by the chairman of this committee is a fair one. We ask you to take document No. 306 and approve it; say to the Convention: "This measure we approve." We then have a skeleton on which to build. The chairman says that when we go into Convention, if you will take that measure in, he will ask you to lay it on the table, and that means that the committee will take it again. It will not be a question of being buttonholed then. It will not be a question then of "if you do this I will do that." It will be a question of having a meeting here, I hope on Monday, right away, and saying: "Come hither all ye with amendments and let us talk it over." Then the committee can go into executive session and be ready to do business on Tuesday.

Now, what rights are lost? You have two opportunities to debate this or any other measure in the Convention. But to-morrow or next Tuesday some honest man comes along who has had a wonderful light, and it is surprising the way these wonderful lights come to different men on this sectarian measure; they never have given it a thought, but suddenly they get a wonderful idea. Next Tuesday some one is going to have it, going to come in and rise here and say: "I have seen the committee; they are very much impressed; will not the Convention put this over until to-morrow?"

Now, that is not surprising and perhaps it is commendable, but still we are here for business. We have general ideas. In this so-called Curtis amendment you get the mind of fourteen out of fifteen members of that committee. Three or four besides the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) reserved the right to dissent, but they did not dissent; and we have all kinds and types and different walks of life represented there. We ask you, then, to take that measure and send it in to the Convention, let it go on the table, and then lay before the committee considering the Curtis amendment the proposed amendments, that they may be able in an orderly way to give them some decent consideration.

Mr. COLEMAN: In order that the next hour may be profitably used by the Committee of the Whole, I should like to offer this suggestion, and ask the member from Newton (Mr. Anderson) if I were to ask for unanimous consent to withdraw my motion that the committee do now rise, would he then also ask for unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment temporarily, in order that the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights might have the rest of the time in order to explain to us his measure? May I ask the gentleman from Newton that question?

Mr. Anderson: I have no objection to that, and of course I shall withdraw my amendment. I want to say, while I am on my feet, in reply to the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division (Mr. William H. Sullivan), who seemed to think I was insincere, that no man in this Convention is more sincere than I am in desiring to get this thing settled, and settled right; and no man is liable in the end to make greater sacrifices for it. I want to be met in a spirit of accommodation when I am ready to make those sacrifices.

There being no objection, Mr. Coleman’s motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and Mr. Anderson’s amendment were withdrawn.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I am going to ask your indulgence for about twenty or twenty-five minutes, not over that, in making this statement, and in the course of what I have to say I shall quote briefly from the debates of the 1853 Convention, which may seem dull to some of you but which will place this matter historically before the Convention so that we shall understand the whole proposition.

What is commonly known as anti-sectarian agitation for many years has exercised an unfortunate influence in our body politic and in the life of Massachusetts. It has been the subject of many intemperate speeches and on various occasions has caused the election or defeat of candidates for public office. It has become, in fact, the cat’s paw of petty politicians. Most of the discussions of the question have been based upon a misunderstanding of existing constitutional limitations and of the conditions calling for a change, and they have resulted in stirring up needless religious prejudice and in sowing discord among neighbors and friends. It is high time, as I think we all are agreed, that such an influence be eradicated from the body politic.

The subject, however, should be approached in a calm and dispassionate way. There is not the slightest need of casting aspersions upon any church, sect or denomination. Abuse or even unfriendly criticism of any particular form of religion falls wide of the mark and is not argument. The Constitution provides for absolute freedom in religious worship; it has regard for the individual conscience. Such a provision is in harmony with what we find in the Constitution of the United States and with the Americanism we all approve and desire to maintain. I am sure that every man of us recognizes the right of every other man to worship God in the form and manner which he prefers. Observing the spirit as well as the letter of this constitutional provision it ought to be possible for us, as sensible men, as true Americans, and as fellow-citizens in a great Commonwealth, to discuss the question before us as one, above all others, to be discussed “with malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right.” Only in this way can we hope to arrive at any wise and wholesome conclusion. On this basis, then, the committee has proceeded.

The controversy which has smouldered and flamed ever since the Convention of 1853 arises from the fact that while the individual is guaranteed complete freedom from legislative control of his conscience and religious beliefs, his property is not yet freed from the liability of being applied through taxation to the support of institutions which may be conducted under the auspices of those holding religious opinions different from his own; or, as commonly expressed, to sectarian purposes. While to practical men there may not seem to be any real danger or objection in this, it must not be forgotten that there are many citizens to whose tender consciences those conditions are causes of real alarm. The question, however, is not entirely devoid of interest from the practical side, as will be seen from the following table showing the amounts which have been appropriated by the Legislature to charitable and educational institutions not under the control of the State during different periods from 1786 to 1917, inclusive.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

If these figures do not seem to agree with those in the printed pamphlet, it is because I have added, in making up my statement, the appropriations for 1917.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1786 to 1860,</td>
<td>$257,500 00</td>
<td>$183,651 60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1860 to 1917,</td>
<td>$8,871,460 84</td>
<td>$10,707,785 40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>$7,128,900 84</td>
<td>$10,591,436 90</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

As the Massachusetts Agricultural College, however, became a State institution in 1911, there should be deducted from the total amount appropriated for educational institutions not under the control of the State in the periods stated the sum of $3,110,264.37 appropriated since 1910 to the Agricultural College. This leaves $7,781,172.53 appropriated to educational institutions from 1786 to 1917. These figures are large figures however long a period we spread them over, considering that they represent sums spent on objects of a private character in which the State is not strictly interested. But the real significance of these figures in connection with the so-called sectarian agitation lies in this: That from practically the time at which the Constitution was adopted until a point shortly after the Convention of 1853, or to put it another way, during the first 74 years of our constitutional government, only $257,500 were appropriated by the Legislature to charitable institutions and $183,651.50 to educational institutions; but in the succeeding period of 57 years $6,871,460.84 have been appropriated to charitable institutions and $7,597,521.03 to educational institutions. Here is food for reflection for even the practical man. What a disproportionate growth! How many finely equipped and ample educational and charitable institutions could have been owned and supported by the State with the appropriations here represented! The question is not wholly one of tender conscience.

The danger of appropriating public money for practically private or, as it is sometimes called, sectarian purposes was recognized by the Convention of 1853, which proposed what subsequently became the eighteenth amendment, safeguarding the common schools.

The attention of that Convention, however, was concentrated on one phase only of the question, namely, the possible diversion of money raised for school purposes from the use of the public or common schools to the use of other schools subject to sectarian influence and control. That Convention, therefore, went no further than to place the integrity of the public school system beyond all danger by proposing the eighteenth amendment. The debates in the Convention, furthermore, show clearly that while it recognized that a general principle was involved it was not the intention at that time to go further and to forbid the appropriation of money to the use of higher educational institutions, societies or undertakings even though they should be under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. To illustrate what the Convention of 1853 intended to accomplish in the eighteenth amendment, and the field which the Convention purposely left open, I may be pardoned for quoting at some length from the debates in that Convention.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

A committee known as the committee on the Encouragement of Literature was instructed "to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution that the school fund, belonging to the Commonwealth, shall never be appropriated or applied to the support of any sectarian schools, or schools founded upon sectarian principles." That was the subject for debate in the 1853 Convention.

On July 6 the committee reported as follows: — "Resolved, that it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, so as to provide that no public money in this Commonwealth, whether accruing from funds, or raised by taxation, shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian or denominational schools."

The inquiry was at once raised as to the extent of meaning to be attached to the word "schools."

Gentlemen, it is well here to note that the very question which we are asked to consider here in accepting amendments arose right there, on the meaning of these words, and you see at once what a very difficult resolution you have to draw.

The inquiry was raised whether it was confined to common district schools, or whether it would include "academies, colleges, or other institutions of learning," which prompted a motion that the word "colleges" should be added after the word "schools." To this Mr. Blagden of Boston, one of the committee, replied that "the committee understood by the term schools, the common schools," and that he understood distinctly that it "did not embrace colleges." He was followed by Mr. Lothrop of Boston, another member of the same committee, who hoped that the amendment inserting the word "colleges" would not be adopted. His argument is illuminating and worth quoting at some length: "This resolution relates simply to the common schools of the Commonwealth, and to the public money arising from the income of the school fund, and from taxes levied for the support of those schools, and we wish to provide against any sectarian or denominational influence being brought to bear in their management. That covers the whole extent of the resolution." Mr. Lothrop therefore concluded that nothing could be gained by adding the word "colleges," and considerable confusion might arise thereby. To illustrate this point he supposed a case where in the course of a few years something should occur which should dispose or induce the Legislature of the Commonwealth to make an appropriation from the State Treasury to Amherst or Williams College, or to the University at Cambridge.

And I understand that this controversy in the 1853 Convention presumably was not waged against any religious association which is now in controversy; I understand it was a quarrel between factions of the other side.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Each of these institutions was, Mr. Lothrop said, to a limited extent at least, "in the hands of a particular religious denomination, and yet the general interests of education might be promoted and the whole State benefited by such an appropriation from the Commonwealth to one or another of these colleges, — yet, it might be argued that it could not be done under this article of the Constitution," provided the amendment by adding the word "college" prevailed, and "this argument would be conclusive; — the college being in the hands of trustees of a particular denomination would, upon a strict construction, come within the rule, and be regarded as sectarian in its character."

Gentlemen, in the last amendment presented by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), — and while some fun was poked at the committee for the many amendments that we have drawn, I think he has drawn several, — he has left out the words "ecclesiastical" and "sectarian." I have a reference here to the debates of 1853 as to the use of those words, and I have been perfectly prepared to discuss whether they should not appear in any amendment, but as they do not occur in the last one I have seen offered here I will not discuss it.

Hon. Henry Wilson, afterward Vice-President of the United States, also objected to the addition of the word "college." He assumed the resolution was intended to apply strictly to common schools, the object to be attained being that the common schools should be open to all the children of the State, without distinction of sect or condition; and that the school fund, not only that portion of the proceeds of which are to be applied to common school education, but that which is raised by taxation, should be preserved, so that the common schools in the future should stand as they did then and had stood in the past, and "to avoid if possible the question which may hereafter arise as to the establishing of sectarian schools." He thought the resolution not so clear as it ought to be, and said that he has seen a resolution drawn by Mr. Parker of Cambridge which he thought covered the ground. He concluded by saying: "I am willing to vote money, if we have it to spare, to Williams College, or Amherst, or Harvard College, or any other sectarian colleges or seminaries of learning. They are all sectarian, more or less, and I think they should not be mixed up with the common schools, where we all say sectarianism should never come."

During this part of the debate an objection was made by Mr. Keyes, delegate from Dedham, on an entirely different ground, namely, that the meaning of the words "sectarian or denominational schools" was doubtful. He claimed that all schools were under the influence in chief of some denomination or other.

The real point, gentlemen, of my making these remarks is to put something into this record by which, if this resolution passes, the courts can see what this Convention intended to do. Plainly, from the decision of the Court of Massachusetts, they read the debate of the 1853 Convention and they saw what the Convention meant to do. They meant to touch nothing but the common schools. That they did, and that the Supreme Judicial Court afterwards said was what they did.

Mr. Bird of Walpole said he did not see the ground of distinction between appropriations of the public money for common schools and similar appropriations for colleges. He did not agree with Mr. Wilson in leaving the matter open so that when there was money to spare it might be appropriated to sectarian colleges. If it should not be appropriated to sectarian common schools, why to sectarian high schools, and if not to sectarian high schools, why to sectarian normal schools, and if not to sectarian normal schools, why to sectarian colleges? So you see the subject was considered there. If he were willing to vote for a proposition of this kind he would vote for one that "would cover the whole ground, and forever prevent the appropriation of a single dollar of the public money to any school whatever of a sectarian character,—using the word school in its broadest sense, as including seminaries of learning of all descriptions."

So that was Mr. Bird's idea of the way to stop it then, as we are endeavoring to stop it now in 1917.

During the latter part of the debate on this day Mr. Joel Parker of Cambridge offered his amendment which had been referred to by Mr. Henry Wilson, and on July 23 offered it again in a modified form as follows:— "Resolved, that the money raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools, shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is to be expended, and such moneys shall never be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance, exclusively, of its own schools."

On July 27, without further debate, the resolution of Mr. Parker was adopted by the Convention.

On July 29, the debate was again renewed on a motion to reconsider the adoption of the Parker resolve. That is, to all intents and purposes a debate took place on what is now the eighteenth amendment. This debate, therefore, is of especial significance as indicating what the Convention thought the meaning and effect of the present eighteenth amendment to be.

Mr. Bird of Walpole, arguing for reconsideration of the resolve, said: "It does not say one word about giving any portion of the money of the State to colleges and higher seminaries of learning. Money may be appropriated to sectarian colleges, notwithstanding its adoption; and I submit that from our action here it may be inferred that we are willing that the public money should be given to sectarian academies and colleges."

Mr. Chandler of Greenfield, a member of the committee on Encouragement of Literature, said: "We do not require the Constitution to forbid the bestowal of money upon any college in the State, sectarian or otherwise, but the money thus appropriated is not to come out of this fund."

Now see what our friend Mr. Butler of Lowell said. Mr. Butler of Lowell said the resolve first reported by the committee covered all schools "from the humble village school to Harvard University. It precluded the appropriation of money to the support of sectarian or denominational schools, of whatever grade, or class, or description." But the amendment drawn by Mr. Parker left it open for money to be appropriated to Harvard or any other institution whether sectarian or not. No attempt was made to answer these arguments and the Convention finally refused to reconsider its action adopting the resolve.

Had they paid attention to Mr. Bird of Walpole or to Mr. Butler of Lowell, or to some of those other gentlemen, the agitation which has gone on here from 1853 to to-day, and has made us all more or less trouble, never would have arisen. They had the opportunity to settle it, as you gentlemen have to-day, and they did not settle it.

Mr. Parker’s resolve, therefore, was submitted to the people with other amendments of the Convention. It was rejected, however, by the popular vote by a majority of only about 400. Subsequently, the same proposition for amendment was adopted by the legislatures of the years 1854 and 1855, and having been ratified by the people in May, 1855, became incorporated into the Constitution as the eighteenth Article of Amendment.

The debates alone of the Convention of 1853 seem to leave no doubt that the Convention designedly refused to take away the power to appropriate money for maintaining or aiding other schools and educational institutions which might be wholly or in part under sectarian influences, and such has been declared by the Supreme Judicial Court to be the result of the eighteenth amendment. This was one of the questions specifically submitted by the Legislature to the court in the Opinions of the Justices in 1913 in 214 Mass. 600.

It is idle to speculate now why the Convention of 1853 stopped short with the common schools in dealing with the subject. If it could have foreseen the appropriations subsequently made to charitable and educational institutions that Convention might have gone further. That Convention, however, recognized that at least so far as both schools and higher educational institutions were concerned the same fundamental policy was involved. It is difficult to-day to understand why, if sectarian control was then such a menace to educational institutions as to make it necessary to establish a policy in regard to one class of schools, it was not also desirable as a matter of principle to apply the same policy to all classes of educational institutions. Conditions to-day indicate that it would have been far wiser to have settled the whole question then once and for all. The failure to do so furnishes another illustration of the truth that a question is not settled until it is settled right, and that temporizing with a principle only serves to strengthen its ultimate demand for full recognition. It seems plain that it is the duty of the present Convention to avoid this mistake of the Convention of 1853 and if possible put a quietus forever on the question of sectarian appropriations. This is a general conclusion to which every one probably will assent. It is apprehended that the only difficulty will arise on the question of how far this Convention shall go in applying the general principle partially put into operation by the Convention of 1853. But in the end it seems inevitable that if we have the courage to follow the guidance of principle to its logical conclusions, if we would escape the error of the 1853 Convention, if we would obviate the necessity of still another Convention to complete our work as we now propose to complete the work of the 1853 Convention, only one settlement of this question seems possible. That is the adoption of a constitutional amendment which shall forever prevent the appropriation of public money for the support of any institution whatever which is not, like the common schools, under the supervision and control of some public authority.

The first part of the proposed amendment down to the words "and no grant," with the exception of the eleven words at the beginning, "No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion," is exactly the same wording as that of the present Article XVIII of the Amendments of the Bill of Rights. This language has not been changed as it is considered that the question of public schools has been settled by the Supreme Judicial Court of this State in the cases of Merrick v. Amherst (12 Allen, 500) and Jenkins v. Andover (103 Mass. 94), and by the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court given to the Legislature dated June 2, 1913 (214 Mass. 599), which provides in effect that moneys raised by taxation, etc., for the purpose of expenditure for the public or common schools, as these words generally have been understood, must be dispersed exclusively for the support of such schools and cannot be diverted to any other kind of school maintained in whole or in part by any religious sect.

Now, the committee did not want to change those words. Why? Because they were adjudicated and that question was settled; it was no use ever to bring up the question of common schools again. And the committee considers that they are settled by those decisions, and therefore they changed not a word of the old article down to the words "and no grant."

But the opinion cited in the 214 Mass. also states that there is no constitutional prohibition against appropriations for higher educational institutions, societies or undertakings under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

The proposed resolution therefore commencing with the words "and no grant" attempts to correct this and to prevent appropriations or use of public money for the purpose of maintaining higher educational institutions, societies or other undertakings under the control of any religious denomination, and further to prevent the use of any money raised by taxation or otherwise for any undertaking whatever that is not under State control, with the exception of the matters specially mentioned.

The Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts is excepted. It has been in existence for over thirty-five years and was founded by the Massachusetts Grand Army of the Republic assisted by the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, the Women's Relief Corps and the Sons and Daughters of Veterans.

The present valuation of the property is about $500,000. This property reverts to the Commonwealth when the institution is wound up.

The Home is maintained by the Commonwealth which last year appropriated over $100,000; the United States Government which last year appropriated $46,896, and the balance being from private contributions and donations form the Grand Army of the Republic, Women's Relief Corps, Sons and Daughters of Veterans and Spanish War Veterans.

The board of trustees is made up of twenty-one citizens, of whom fifteen are members of the Grand Army of the Republic, three appointed by the Governor and the other three coming from Sons of Veterans, Spanish War Veterans and the citizenship of the Commonwealth. All the trustees, excepting those appointed by the Governor, are nominated by the board of trustees.

Practically all of the rooms in the Home are maintained and cared for by the Posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Women's Relief Corps and the Sons and Daughters of Veterans.

While the committee considers it would be much better if this institution were run wholly as a State institution it probably would require lengthy negotiations to bring this about and it can be done at any time, if at all, through action of the Legislature.

The committee was of the opinion that no member of this Convention would desire to deprive any old soldier of the benefits of this Home. Hence they made the exception.

It was ascertained that there were in the Commonwealth in the neighborhood of 75 private libraries open for public use which were maintained partially by endowments and partially by contributions from cities or towns and that the endowments in many cases, under the terms by which the funds were left, could not be transferred to the cities or towns.

And, gentlemen, we thought at first that they could be transferred and we did not except the libraries. Then we found the funds could not be transferred and did except the libraries. There was not any guesswork or uncertainty. We went into the whole question, and we have a quantity of literature and citations on it. The committee, therefore, realizing that libraries open for public use were of great assistance to the education of the people, have made this exemption.

The committee also realized that the Commonwealth,—we have nothing to conceal,—sends to private institutions many blind persons and persons affected with eye and ear trouble, also many persons sick or injured, who are unable to pay their expenses in these institutions either in whole or in part; that it boards at its own expense many neglected and delinquent children and persons lacking means of support. Therefore it is provided in the last paragraph that the State may continue these and other contractual relations.

Gentlemen, there is no hidden motive in the wording of that last phrase. The committee considered it carefully. They rewrote that three or four times, amending conscientiously the first draft they had in hand. It may not be right now. It is just as apt to be right in phraseology as that which any gentleman gets up on the floor and offers here without careful consideration. That is all we ask of this Convention. We ask to put this theory of ours through, give us a chance to amend it, if necessary, knowing as we do all these little difficulties.

It was said at first that the chairman did not believe any such clause was necessary. That statement was absolutely true. I believed as a matter of law that the State had an inherent right to make contracts, and that right to make contracts could not be taken away from the State without specific language; that the Supreme Judicial Court would not take away the contractual relation unless the language was so specific as to show that they intended to do it. I so stated and that was my belief. I am not sure now that I am not right in the law. But a more eminent lawyer than myself, a man accustomed to giving public opinions, said he thought it was dangerous, and so we put in the last clause. The chairman did not change his mind, nobody "pulled" him, nobody is trying to use any influence on me on this subject. I took the advice of a better lawyer than I was, to save any question. There is nothing dark or hidden in that matter.

In short, this amendment provides:

First. — Against the appropriation of money raised by taxation or otherwise for the support of public schools to the support of any school which is not a common school.

Second. — Against the grant or appropriation of public money or property of any kind for the purpose of founding, aiding or maintaining any college, hospital, institution or undertaking which is not under public control, with the exceptions above stated, and against such grant under any circumstances for founding or aiding any church, religious denomination or society.

At this time when the Commonwealth needs the support and good will of every person within its bounds it is no time to work up race or religious prejudice. Let us hope, therefore, that the Convention will settle this much discussed question along these broad lines, complete the work of the 1853 Convention and once for all close the discussion of this subject.

I have exceeded the time I indicated, gentlemen, for which I crave your pardon. [Applause.]

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: There are several points in regard to this matter on which I should like further information. Unless I am wrong, it seems to me that this proposition here, this resolution, contains three separate and different amendments, one of which I favor, one of which I oppose, and on one of which I am in doubt, although generally I have been in favor of it.

The first proposition is to prevent the appropriation of public money for sectarian educational institutions. The second proposition is to prevent the appropriation of public money for sectarian hospitals and other institutions than schools. The third proposition is to prevent the appropriation of money for a variety of public purposes to private institutions.

Now, I am very much opposed to that. I do not see why we have not got the right to appropriate money for the textile schools, for instance, which have been quite a feature in Massachusetts in the last few years, under private guidance and private control. I fail to see why it is not a good thing to appropriate public money for those and any other similar institutions. Why, in regard to many functions for the benefit of the Commonwealth we are very ardently taking entirely opposite grounds. We have just voted down a resolution to permit the State to engage in the sale of merchandise or engage in manufacturing. We have just voted that down because we want private parties to do it.

Now, am I wrong in thinking that we have taken opposite ground there to what is proposed here? The State Highway Commission proposes to build a piece of State highway. Before the State goes in and builds it it does now, or used to, ask for contracts, first from the locality, the towns and cities, through which it passes, and next from private contractors. The city of Boston, or at any rate most cities, make contracts for a great variety of public purposes.

Now, there are not only textile schools but there are the private hospitals. I think they have exempted libraries here, but there are the public hospitals in various towns and cities, run on the bequests of private persons and supported largely by private beneficence, but aided by appropriations of the towns and cities. It seems to me that this would do away with that.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Now, when it comes to sectarian hospitals and other similar institutions we have an entirely different proposition. I always voted for appropriations for Carney Hospital; and, in spite of some excitement and some hostility by certain orders and certain people of a different way of thinking, I never had the slightest difficulty in explaining it. I never had the slightest difficulty and it never was made a political issue. I never had the slightest difficulty in explaining that that hospital was performing service which the State would have had to perform, and less efficiently, if that hospital had not done it.

Now, it seems to me I ought to have a chance to vote differently on those matters. When we come to sectarian schools it seems to me that I am in favor most decidedly of that portion of this report, because I believe in the public school system, and I believe that it has been almost the principal cause of the progress of this Nation, in that it has become what it has.

I had a gentleman visiting me the other day from Iowa, who said he was brought up in a community of Poles, or people of Polish extraction, and he said almost invariably in the third generation you could not tell them from Yankees, from natural born Americans, except that they had more children. That is the only way you can tell them. They came over here more or less dirty, immoral and thriftless, and in the third generation they were changed to native Americans. And, as I say, they differed from them then only in that particular, which I think is almost the fundamental cause of this principle coming in here at all, namely, that some races increase faster than others.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to get a chance, unless I am entirely misinformed, to vote on these three propositions separately. It seems to me I am entitled to have that chance. It not only seems to me I am entitled to have that chance, but it seems to me that the voters are entitled to have that chance at the polls, to vote upon them separately. I listened with as much care as possible to the reading of the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights from the proceedings of the Convention of 1853, and it seemed to me that they were confronted with precisely the questions that we are confronted with, and that they most deliberately decided that they would not go into the prevention of the Commonwealth having work performed in the most efficient and most economic manner, and they rejected that proposition. They would not go into the question of public appropriations for hospitals, and for certain special institutions of learning, as textile schools, and they defeated that proposition. And, if I understood the gentleman correctly, what they did is precisely what I hope we will do,—prevent any appropriations of public money for minor sectarian educational institutions, and cut off the rest of it.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the matter may shape itself in that way. I think we are entitled to have it shape itself that way. I make no reflection upon the condition of affairs which brought about this wonderful combination in this amendment, but I cannot help having a little suspicion on the subject when I remember how ardently a very able gentleman in this body always has opposed appropriations for the Institute of Technology and other similar institutions. The Institute of Technology has become very rich. How about textile schools, how about shoemaking schools, how about tailors' schools, dressmakers' schools, what not? In this manifold system of technical training into which we are now coming, what are we going to do about that? I understand we are going to cut it if it goes through, we are going to cut it off neck and crop. I do not believe the people will do it.

Now, I have been impressed with the sincerity of utterance of the chairman of this committee (Mr. Curtis), and I am not going to say that I think this amendment is put in this way for the purpose of killing the whole proposition. And my judgment may be wrong, very likely it is, but if I wanted to kill the whole proposition at the polls it seems to me that I could not do a cuter thing than to put these three entirely different propositions together in one. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we shall have some way of getting at this and having these three separate.

On Tuesday, the 24th of July, Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston, chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, announced that the committee had unanimously agreed upon a form of amendment which he offered as a substitute for the measure originally reported by the committee. In explanation of the reasons for the changes recommended Mr. Curtis said:

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: In reading over the resolution this morning the committee discovered that in line 22, after the word "learning", these words should have been printed: "., whether under public control or otherwise.". They were read by the secretary as we had made the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is with great pleasure that I announce to the Convention that the resolution as now presented represents the unanimous opinion of the committee on Bill of Rights. [Applause.] I want to say, however, that there are certain gentlemen on the committee who reserve their right to vote as they may please on certain amendments that may be offered. The committee made the following changes. Gentlemen have the old resolution for reference.

Referring to Document No. 306, line 23, the committee struck out the word "religious", and put in the word "denominational." In the same line, the committee struck out the word "taught", and inserted the word "inculcated".

There were many people who were of the opinion that the wording of Resolution No. 306 practically made our schools atheistic or agnostic, hence the change.

In line 26, the committee struck out the words "conducted according to law", believing that any institution that was not conducted according to law would be properly cared for by the Attorney-General.

In line 30, the committee inserted the words "or Federal authority or both". That was because the Agricultural College has certain relations to the United States government, and we feared that the contributions of the United States government to the college might be interfered with if we did not add those words. These words also will take care of any question of the contribution of the United States government to the Soldiers' Home.

In line 35, the committee struck out the word "public", as needless repetition.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

After the word "construed", the last word in line 40, the committee struck out everything, and substituted what appears in the substitute resolution offered.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that there may be errors of punctuation that should be corrected; undoubtedly there are. The committee, as I have said, have had no opportunity to correct the proof. If there are such errors they undoubtedly will be corrected by the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw the minority report. [Applause.] I think it is a matter of congratulation to all of us that we have at least reached a point of unanimity. However, I wish to say that my assent to the report is in some sense a qualified one; and, as the committee already understands it, I want the Convention to understand exactly what my assent means. It means that I will vote for the committee's amendment in the form it now bears, or in a more satisfactory form, in the final vote at every stage. I reserve my right to vote against it as soon as it is amended in a form unsatisfactory to me. I also reserve my right to support all amendments or substitutes which seem to me to improve the committee's amendment or put it in better shape. In these particulars I reserve the right to dissent.

Some object to that and say that I should have gone further. But while I was a dissenter, I was perfectly free; I did not need to go any further than I chose to go. I have gone a long way. I have gone so far as to say what I never said before, that I should vote for the Curtis amendment, for the majority amendment, and I have done this accepting the very great handicap of the hostility of friends of the private institutions which are cut off by this measure.

That is a very grave handicap. I think probably I know its extent as well as any man in the Convention. I have made a special investigation along that line. I have a long list of private institutions which will need to be more or less reorganized or readjusted if this amendment should pass. I feel that I am taking a very grave and great chance in giving my assent to this majority report. But as we go along in life, we are compelled to take chances, sometimes great chances, and I am willing to do so this morning. I cannot deny that I do it with the greatest reluctance and with the greatest doubt; and yet I have made up my mind, in the interests of harmony and good will, that I am ready to take the handicap.

Now, I have said publicly that I never should support what I then called the Curtis amendment. Why did I say that? I never gave but one great reason, either in my campaign for this Convention or in the Convention. Of course I have had subordinate reasons which I still hold, but I mean one main reason; and that is, that I was afraid that this amendment would be beaten at the polls. It will have against it all of the sincere friends of sectarian appropriations; it will have against it all of the friends of the private institutions; it will have against it all those who do not approve on any ground, theoretical or otherwise, of the new policy which this resolution, to which I have now assented, involves.

Moreover, the one thing that I felt most keenly, it had no promise of really active support. By that I do not mean to say that every member of the committee was not perfectly sincere. And, as I understand it, every member of the committee is willing to make a few speeches for this amendment. But when I looked around the table in the committee-room yesterday, I wondered who would be a father to it, who would sit up with it nights, who would nurse it through the measles and the whooping cough, carry it over the rough places and finally see it "across" on election day. I asked the committee whether any of them were willing to do this but I did not get any reply except from the chairman, whose response I very highly appreciated.

Why, then, do I change and now say that I will support under certain conditions the report of the committee?

First, because it is a different report from the one which I said I never should support. It has been changed in what seem to me important particulars. I am ready to say right here, and fairly and squarely, that so far as I can see at the present time it gives to the opponents of sectarian appropriations all that they want, and consequently on that ground I have given my assent to this report.

The second reason I did this was because I knew that every day I stood in opposition to this report, which I felt that I might be called upon to support at the polls, I really was injuring its chances before the people, and consequently I changed in order that I should not play into the hands of some persons, — I will not say members of this Convention, — who are supporting this report because they want to see it killed. I did not want to play into their hands a moment longer than I possibly could help.

In the third place, I had another reason, and this was the compelling reason, a reason which never has been made known before. Without this reason I should not have been able to have signed this report. I have received from the highest quarters assurances of active support for this amendment by men who wield large influence and newspapers that wield large influence in this Commonwealth; and I felt that I could trust in the honor of the gentlemen who made me those assurances. I now think that, with those guarantees, with the unanimous report of this committee, and I hope a unanimous vote of the Convention, the handicap of the private institutions will be overcome. I think it is reasonable to suppose that it may be.

Now, as I am on my feet, I think I should like to tell the Convention in a sort of historical review something of the story and motives of the movement that has made such a discussion as this possible in the Convention. We are taking part to-day in an age-long and worldwide debate on the subject of the relations of church and State. It is a very difficult question. I never knew how difficult it was until I began to investigate. It is wonderful how many cross currents of life are involved in it. It would be a difficult even if it were not a delicate question, and it is delicate because it involves the religious feelings and prejudices and sometimes the passions of men, and, more than that, because all through this present situation run all sorts of political ambitions. I am sure, however, that all of us desire to have this question permanently taken out of politics, where it ought never to have been. The Convention of 1853 ought to have seen to that. And when we have a proper separation of church and State, it will have disappeared, and forever.

I am glad that we have such advantages at the present time in
Sectarian Appropriations.

Solving this question; that we have in this Convention the beginnings of mutual understanding, which are of the very highest promise for the future of this State. I feel that we all agree, or almost all agree, up to a certain point. We all agree on religious liberty. We all agree on the separation of church and State, in theory at least, and I think that the great majority of us agree on the application of the separation of church and State to appropriations of public funds.

In the ancient world and in the heathen world and in Christian Europe, the custom has been the union of church and State, but even in Europe whenever countries have become republican, as in France and Portugal, they have entered almost immediately upon the course of the separation of church and State. In France and Portugal it was done in an unnecessarily rough and crude way, — but nevertheless it was a part of their democracy, their high valuation of the individual, which compelled them to it. And if I can understand anything from the confused reports that come from Russia, I believe that the separation of church and State already is in process in that new republic. Republicanism and the separation of church and State necessarily go together.

It is the glory of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that on its soil Roger Williams, away back in 1636, proclaimed this doctrine of religious liberty, — religious liberty for the other man as well as for himself. On account of his denial of the right of the State to compel any act in the sphere of religion, — not because he was opposed to religion, but because he felt that religion was a personal matter and that voluntary religion was the only religion worth talking about, — the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, whose history in this matter, as I shall show, has not been such that we can be proud of it, banished Roger Williams at the beginning of winter, and if the Indians had not been more kind to him than his Christian brethren he would have perished in the snow. He went down to Rhode Island, and there he established a State where every one had full religious liberty; and such a motley crowd of Turks and Jews and Baptists and Catholics and Quakers, and every sort of people with strange ideas as got together, there probably never was seen before on the face of the earth. It was the asylum of everybody who had independence enough to maintain his own opinions against his neighbors in the sphere of religion. They had a terribly hard time of it, but they held to the doctrine that every man had a right to think and act as he pleased in the sphere of religion, without any State compulsion.

When the United States formed its Constitution it followed the lead of the State of Rhode Island, influenced also by the toleration which was found in Maryland and Pennsylvania, but refused to imitate the other Colonies, which had State churches. Consequently, we find in the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States the words:

Congress shall make no law regarding an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Now, with Roger Williams out of the Colony in 1636, there still remained people in Massachusetts who wanted to live here and yet wanted to have and to speak their own opinions on the subject of religion. The result was that for more than a hundred years, up to the time of the Convention of 1780, there was constant agitation and religious persecution in this State. Quakers were hanged in this city because they were Quakers, and Baptists were whipped in this city because they were Baptists, and Episcopalians and Catholics and Presbyterians and every other kind of folk were persecuted in various ways because they did not belong to the established order. This fight against the established church had gone along pretty well before the Convention of 1780 assembled, and in that Convention this was the greatest question debated. The result of that discussion was the second and third articles of our Bill of Rights. I have heard recently some distinguished men quoting the third article as though it was part of the law of the State, but it has long since been repealed and amended by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution. A more involved, uncertain and inconsistent article is not to be found in a State Constitution than that third article of the Bill of Rights. It simply shows how small progress our fathers made toward settling that great question in the Convention of 1780.

The agitation continued, because very little after all had been gained by that third article, and in the Convention of 1820, again, this was one of the principal questions debated; and an amendment, which went much further than the third article of the Bill of Rights, was put before the people and was beaten by them.

However, there had been so much interest stirred up in this matter that in 1833 an amendment was passed by the Legislature and the people, which finally, in the most grudging and back-handed manner, abolished the State church in Massachusetts.

That was the result of the labors of 150 years. Some of you think that this agitation which we have witnessed in this State, which has gone on for over 17 years, is long; but I assure you, gentlemen, if you do not settle this question now, some of us, like our fathers, are ready to go on with it for our natural lives and hand it down to our sons and grandsons.

I might say right here, bringing it in perhaps a little illogically, that there are three or four stages in reference to this matter of the relations of church and State. First, there is the union of church and State, where the State supports the church to the extent that it persecutes, forces and compels all those who do not do as the State and the church have agreed shall be done in the sphere of religion. Then comes the next stage, where the State and the church say: “Our laws are right, you ought to obey them, but you are so stiff-necked that you will not, and consequently we will allow you certain privileges.” That is toleration, which every red-blooded man spurns. Then we come to religious liberty, when it is conceded by everybody that everybody else, so far as the State is concerned at least, has a perfect right to think and to act in the sphere of religion as he pleases; and this religious liberty, mind you, never can be guaranteed except by the complete separation of church and State.

This separation of church and State is of two kinds, however. In some countries,—and I think that many of us could think of such countries at the present time,—it is a separation where the State is hostile to the church, and where the State practically persecutes the church in some particulars because it is hostile to it. But the other kind of separation of church and State is that which we have had in America, which we have enjoyed for a hundred years with the greatest satisfaction both to the State and to the church, — a friendly separation, — where the State is friendly to the church and the church is friendly to the State, where they keep their affairs apart for their mutual benefit, and yet cooperate for the highest good of the people.

Now, in the Convention of 1853 this question came up again. Why? Because the matter of appropriations, of the use of money, had not been settled. This question of sectarian appropriations is a question of religious liberty. Religious liberty says that the State shall compel no act in the sphere of religion; therefore the State cannot compel a man to pay his good money in taxation for the support of a religion, or of the schools and institutions of a religion, in which he does not believe. It is intolerable that the Catholic, for instance, in this State, should be forced by the State, as he too often has been forced in the past and as he still may be forced under the present Constitution, to pay his good money in taxation for the propagation of the Protestant religion in the schools and institutions which that religion has established; and it is equally intolerable that the State should force a Protestant to pay his good money in taxation for the support of the institutions and schools in which the Roman Catholic religion is propagated; and it is equally intolerable, — I say equally intolerable, — that the Jew or the agnostic should be forced by the State to pay his good money in taxation for the support of institutions in which either of these forms of religion is propagated.

Now, the Convention of 1853 attended only to the matter of public schools. How well they attended to it may perhaps be brought out later in the debate, and I will not debate that now. But the question concerning higher institutions of learning, societies and undertakings, certainly was left open and consequently the matter comes before us again in 1917.

About the year 1899 or 1900 a group of men in this State made up their minds that this thing ought finally to be put right. They had good reasons for their movement at that time. All they had to do was to look around them and observe what was going on in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, in order to see what very soon would be done here, if the matter was left wide open. Consequently, they joined together for the purpose of putting this great principle of religious liberty, guaranteed by the separation of church and State, in the matter of appropriations and taxation, into the Constitution of Massachusetts. They were high-grade men who did this thing. Their leader was Professor Henry S. Nash, of the Episcopal Divinity School in Cambridge, and men of that sort. After a while they drew about them some of the very finest men in this State. Of course they had an organization, and I want to say something about that organization, as it has been very much slandered and very much misunderstood.

I wish to say, in the first place, that it is not a secret society in any way, shape or manner; and in the second place, that it has no dues, that the members never have paid a cent, and that the officers never have received any money; and that those who have done the work of the movement have sacrificed, — some of them have sacrificed all they had, some of them have mortgaged their future, — in order that this great principle might be put into the Constitution. I want to say, too, that it is not an A. P. A. society. The distinctive principle of the
A. P. A. is that a Catholic, holding allegiance to the Pope, cannot be a good American citizen. We absolutely repudiate that sentiment. We do not believe it at all. We do not believe in discriminating against our friends of any sect or creed because of their religious views or feelings. That never ought to be taken into consideration, it seems to me, when a man is running for public office in this State. I have had the great privilege of voting again and again for my friends of the Catholic faith, and when this Convention was chosen, I voted for one man, and I think I voted for two of that faith, to represent me here.

Now, I want to have you understand thoroughly the character and animus of this movement. It has been a high class movement. It has been a movement whose motto has been "Speaking the truth in love;" and we feel that we have been justified in all that we have done; that on the whole,—notice what I say,—that on the whole the results of the agitation have been helpful; and there is no State in the Union at the present time which so thoroughly believes, I think, in religious liberty and in the separation of church and State, even so far as sectarian appropriations go, as this State, just because of this agitation.

We introduced into the House of Representatives an amendment to the Constitution whose first sentence reads:

No law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

That is part of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. We put it in because the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1789, dominated by the State church, rejected that first amendment to the Constitution, along with Connecticut and Georgia; and we thought it was only a right atonement at this late day that this State should place that amendment in its own Constitution:

No law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the State or any county, city, town, village or other civil division use its property or credit or any money raised by taxation or otherwise, or authorize either to be used for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding by appropriation, payments for services, expenses, or in any other manner any church, religious denomination, or religious society or any institution, school, society, or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

I thought during my campaign, and I still think, that that is a perfectly plain amendment. It has a single purpose. Any man who runs can read and see what it means. There is nothing unfair in it, I am convinced, after the most thorough consideration of that matter. I was surprised to hear from a friend of mine, an opponent of this amendment, that a certain church thought that the words "sectarian or ecclesiastical" were aimed at it. I wonder how that possibly could be. They thought that that was an insult, and an intended insult. I wonder which word contained the insult. Was it sectarian? Why, certainly that great church is not sectarian; no one ever supposed that it was. Is it ecclesiastical? Certainly that great church is ecclesiastical; but there are other churches that are ecclesiastical,—all churches are ecclesiastical. No insult was intended.

It is perfectly fair. It gives to everyone all his rights before the law, as it seems to me. Still, we are not debating that amendment and we do not need to go any further to show the spirit in which we have come to this place.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

But I want to state our arguments for the anti-sectarian amendment, which is now a feature of the majority report. First, it safeguards religious liberty in taxation. I already have explained that. Next, it takes the last irritating, debatable question out of politics. Third, it safeguards the independence, spirituality and dignity of the church,—it is just as good for the church as it is for the State. And, lastly, it saves the State an unseemly scramble of religious bodies for public funds. I am sure members of the Legislature here will agree with me that that would be a calamity to the State to have all of the religious bodies of this State scrambling here, as they do in Pennsylvania and Maryland, for the public funds.

I make these remarks in this extended way simply to show you the spirit in which we have come to this Convention. We have come in the spirit of accommodation. We have made every possible compromise. The compromise that we made yesterday in the committee, and which we have ratified this morning, is a compromise which goes further than some of those who have stood with me have thought was right or wise. I have taken the responsibility upon myself to make it, with the greatest reluctance, and yet just because I hope that the time is coming in this State when all those who have religion of any sort, and those who have no religion of any sort, will treat each other with the highest respect and with mutual helpfulness. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKMAN of Boston: Before the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) entered into this historical discourse, which was most interesting, I understood him to say he was afraid this amendment might be opposed at the polls by friends of private institutions who are cut off in some way or other from assistance which they had had either from the State or from other sources. Now, as representing one of those institutions, the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, which has received for many years great help from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, I want to say, simply, for the friends of that institution, that I believe they will heartily support the amendment as offered now; and I want to say that I further believe that friends of other private institutions will put patriotism above other things, and vote so as to remove any religious or sectarian questions outside of future political discussion. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAHAN of Boston: As one of the very obscure members of this committee on Bill of Rights, I rise at this time to extend my congratulations to the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) though he has succeeded so beautifully, Mr. Chairman, in congratulating himself for his attitude that I think it is unnecessary now.

I want to speak, Mr. Chairman, for a few of the members of that committee, who went there with absolutely no prejudices, and were ready and willing at all times to accept anything that would be agreeable to all the parties concerned. One day, when the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) said that his proposition was going to save the Commonwealth a whole lot of money, I asked him to explain that vague statement, and he said he preferred not to do it, and the chairman of the committee, in his fatherly sort of way, came and asked me not to urge the question, that perhaps it might cause some trouble. And then I was told that the aim was not to stir up any religious discussion and not to fan any religious prejudices, and that was a thing that appeared very commendable to me; and that was the thing more than anything else which made it possible for this committee to bring in a unanimous report, because those of us on that committee who held different views from the gentleman from Newton felt a certain insult, because this question never before had been approached properly. When it was approached properly, when they did not make any insinuations, when they did not make it appear that certain people and a certain element in the community were a menace, then we agreed absolutely with them on this proposition; because there is none of us, no one in this Convention, who would dare suggest that there be a union of church and State in these days. We all of us subscribe to that doctrine of separation of church and State, and every one of us, Mr. Chairman, believes that there should be fair play and everybody treated alike. And when the gentleman from Newton came into that committee, and with all the skill of a German diplomat, if you will, got everything that he wanted, and which we gave willingly and not grudgingly, he then assented to this proposition. I think it is a splendid thing. I think that the gentleman from Newton ought to go further than he has, and say that he will urge this measure all the way through the Convention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, he asks who will support this thing before the people, who will sit up nights with it, and who will carry around the nursing-bottle? Why, if we on that committee, and we here in this chamber, publicly advocate this proposition, does he mean to say that we shall go out afterwards with a knife in our hands and stab the proposition in the back? Certainly not; we are not built that way.
We shall support this thing all the way through. I take it he wants a public statement to that effect, and I gladly give it here upon this floor, Mr. Chairman; and not only I, but the other members of that committee, and the men whom we know and the persons with whom we are intimate, will support this thing, because we believe on the whole it is a good proposition, and if it had been approached properly and decently in the past few years it would have received this same support.

Now, I believe absolutely in this proposition. I started out with the belief that the public money not only should not be dealt out to sectarian institutions but that it should not be given out indiscrimi-ately to private institutions. The proposition as I saw it, Mr. Chairman, was whether or not this Convention believed that public money should be spent for private institutions of any kind; not, as some members have said, whether there should be money refused for sectarian purposes and yet given to other private purposes, because that is another division of it. The real division, the real question, is whether public money should be spent for private purposes, whether they are sectarian or not. I think that with the exemptions that this committee very wisely has made, exempting the Soldiers' Home, exempting perhaps the Agricultural College, which after all needs no exemption, and then making a wise provision for the contracts with different private institutions in the case of the care of the sick or needy, — I think those are the only exemptions necessary, and as one of the members of the committee I urge this body at this time to vote down all these amendments that go to the spending of public money for private institutions.

I personally sympathized very strongly with the young man who appeared before our committee yesterday, who was the principal of a school in a town in the western part of the State. He was the finest kind of a young man, and I think he is a member of the body here. He was the principal of one of those schools which takes the place of a high school in these small communities. He does splendid work and he is a fine American. There is not a bit of bigotry in his whole make-up. He no doubt is bringing up those boys and training them finely in that town, and if all schools were like his perhaps we should have no objection. But, Mr. Chairman, in those schools, which take the place of high schools, where the towns where they are supposed to maintain a high school refuse to do it and send their students to these private schools, they have religious exercises. They are not sectarian, certainly not, but they have religious exercises that we do not have in our public schools, that we do not have in our high schools, and that we would not tolerate for one moment. I sympathize with him, and personally I should like to exempt these schools, just as we exempt libraries in towns where they have no public libraries. But we are going too far. We are going too far afield when we do that. We have to draw the line somewhere, and I think that this committee very wisely has drawn the line, and that they ought to be sustained here in this body. [Applause.]

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I desire to offer an amendment, which I will place in the hands of the Secretary.

The Chairman: Mr. Washburn of Worcester offers an amendment which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows: Add at the end of the resolution the words "The General Court may make appropriations for scholarships in technical and engineering schools in which State scholarships now exist."

Mr. Washburn: It is with a feeling of very great reluctance that I rise to suggest an amendment to this measure. When the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) and the two distinguished gentlemen in the third division (Mr. Anderson of Newton and Mr. Lomasney) are able to agree upon any proposition as important as this, it would seem to be prima facie evidence that no change for good could be made in the measure. But, Mr. Chairman, in full accord with the purpose had in mind by the committee reporting this measure, with an earnest desire to see this sectarian question settled for all time, realizing fully the importance of not suggesting any ground here upon which a difference of opinion might arise, I deem it my duty, in this informal discussion by the Committee of the Whole, to call attention to some important considerations which I think have been overlooked in the discussion of this question,—at least, I have not heard them referred to.

In beginning my remarks, which will not be long continued, I should like to quote from chapter 5, section 2, of the Constitution, in which the Legislature is enjoined to encourage "private societies and public institutions for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences and commerce, trades, manufactures;" and in this connection I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the prosperity of Massachusetts depends upon the success of our great industries. No amendment or suggestion was made until 1855 touching the question we now have under discussion, and then the amendment familiar to you all was made to the Constitution.
I take it that what has precipitated this discussion at this time is the opinion given by the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court to the Senate and the House of Representatives, 214 Mass. 599, in which they said that it was still open to the Legislature to make appropriations for higher educational institutions under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. With the general purpose here expressed, to make impossible appropriations to sectarian institutions, I am in entire accord. As to the other proposition, whether it is well to remove absolutely from the Legislature the right to make an appropriation to an institution under private administration, I am more in doubt. I think these two questions might well be separately referred to the people. But, on the other hand, if it were to be the mature judgment of this Convention that the matter should stand as it is, I personally should have no quarrel with the conclusion.

It is not, gentlemen of the committee, to urge any fundamental objection to this measure that I rise, but rather to propose an amendment which it seems to me will strengthen it, and which will leave the Legislature in a position to act in a well defined limited area.

There are now two institutions of the higher grade in this Commonwealth receiving State aid, — yes, there are three: the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst, the Institute of Technology in Boston, and the Polytechnic Institute in Worcester, the State College of Agriculture at Amherst established in the early sixties and the other two schools established in the late sixties. They all have received aid from the State. The Agricultural College at Amherst up to this time has received over $5,000,000, and during this present year the appropriations amount to $360,000. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has received a much smaller amount, and the Polytechnic at Worcester a still smaller amount.

The Massachusetts Institute, in 1911, received an appropriation of $100,000 a year to continue for ten years, and in 1912 the Polytechnic Institute at Worcester received an appropriation of $50,000 a year to continue for ten years. As I view the proposition, Mr. Chairman, those were contracts between the institutions and the Commonwealth, because in each was recited a consideration upon which the appropriation was made. The consideration was that in the case of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology eighty free scholarships should be maintained, nomination to which should be made by the Board of Education, and the further consideration that within a specified time an additional increase to its endowment should be secured, and both conditions were complied with, which, as I view the proposition, established a contract between the Commonwealth and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in accordance with which that appropriation should be continued for a period of ten years. Like conditions prevail between the Commonwealth and the Polytechnic Institute at Worcester, with the single difference that the amounts involved were less, because the appropriation was smaller, as was the institution.

My amendment is directed to this proposition, namely, that when the period elapses for which these appropriations were made, and when it is beyond the power of the Legislature, if this amendment to the Constitution be adopted, to make any grants to these institutions, when this amendment will absolutely put an end to these free scholarships, 120 a year, involving the fortunes of 200 or more needy students,—for these scholarships are divisible,—that when that time arrives the Legislature shall have the right to make appropriations for scholarships. And why do I desire that amendment?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Why, gentlemen of the committee, I am not here, particularly at this time, to depreciate the value of the industry of agriculture, I am not here to criticize, far be it from me to condemn, the great appropriations made to this industry, involving an output of $70,000,000 a year in normal times; but what I do plead for is this: That with our great industrial enterprises, dependent for their success upon our mechanical engineers, our electrical engineers, our civil engineers, our physicists and our chemists, the needy youth of this Commonwealth seeking advancement in those channels shall not be absolutely cut off. Adopt this measure as it stands, and you deprive them of the opportunity to secure an industrial education. The industrial output of Massachusetts this very year is over $1,600,000,000, over twenty times the output of products of agriculture, and yet while you leave the Legislature free to make these great appropriations, of which I do not complain, to the Agricultural College at Amherst, you cut off absolutely all these scholarships that have existed heretofore in connection with these great engineering schools. What will follow as sure as the day follows night is that those adversely affected are going to cry out in indignant protest against this discrimination, and are going to demand a State University.

I know that the establishment of a State University has some adherents on this floor, and this suggestion may be an argument to them why this amendment of mine should be killed in order to make imperative the demand for a State University. Personally I do not believe that we need a State University in Massachusetts. I would prefer to see the State take advantage of the institutions now in existence as far as they can be used. But I say to you that if you shut the door absolutely in the face of this demand on the part of our young men for assistance in securing a technical education, you will throw wide open the door to the demand for the establishment of a State University.

I consider it, Mr. Chairman, entirely appropriate that in the informal discussion of these matters in the Committee of the Whole I should bring these considerations to your attention. I do it in no hostile spirit to this measure, but I should like to preserve in the Legislature the power to avail of these great engineering schools already availed of to so large an extent for the education of the young men of this Commonwealth in those pursuits which have made the name of Massachusetts preeminent as a manufacturing State throughout the world.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: The last speaker has made some comparison between the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst. I should like to ask him if he is aware of the fact that the Massachusetts Agricultural School is a State institution, that it conveyed to the Commonwealth all of its property several years ago and is to-day subject to exclusive State control.

Mr. Washburn: In reply to the question of the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Pelletier) I will state that he has conveyed to me no information of which I was not already in possession. I fully appreciate that fact. I do not see, however, that it is at all relevant to my discussion. I was not condemning the Agricultural College at Amherst, I was not disputing the right of the Commonwealth to make the appropriations, I was not disputing the wisdom of doing it; but I used the Massachusetts State College, and I referred to it in that way several times in my remarks, to emphasize the fact that under this measure it is most appropriately left in the hands of the Legislature to make any appropriations it may choose for the industry of agriculture, and the Legislature is absolutely prevented, excepting through a State University, from making any provision for technical and engineering education.

Mr. Pelletier: Is there any legal or constitutional reason why the Worcester Polytechnic Institute could not give itself to the Commonwealth, to be run as the Agricultural College at Amherst has been run and is being run?

Mr. Washburn: Without examining all of the deeds of gift under which the Worcester Polytechnic Institute has received its various benefactions, I cannot answer the question which my friend has asked; but I will say this: That if it were possible, and if such a course as that would be of advantage to the Commonwealth, I feel that the management of that institution would not shrink at all from making the transfer which my friend has suggested.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has given this Convention an opportunity to hear the brilliant and skilful orator from Worcester, whose eloquence can make black appear white; but let us get down to the facts.

The great school of technology, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has never sent a representative to appear before this committee at any of its hearings. Neither has it asked, as far as I know, any gentleman of this Convention to appear before the committee or to say one word in its behalf. Therefore, gentlemen, discard at once from the eloquent orator's talk everything about the Institute of Technology. The Agricultural College in Massachusetts, I stated the other day, was taken over by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1911. Only yesterday the committee added words to its resolution to save any question of its Federal donations, as I explained early in the day. Therefore, gentlemen, the Agricultural College was put into his eloquent remarks that you might think that school was interested. It is not interested; it is a State institution.

Now we come down to one institution, the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, the only one that he attempts to reach by his amendment. If I am not mistaken, his argument to the committee yesterday was that the State was bound by contract with that institution, and, gentlemen, I so understand that the people who are running that institution now claim. If the State is under contract with the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, there is no member of this committee who desires that the State should break its contract, and nothing that we could write into this resolution, and nothing that this Convention could do, would in any way impair that contract, if there is such a one.

I turn to the Constitution of the United States and read you this: "and no State shall pass any bill or law impairing the obligation of contracts." No law, gentlemen, that you could pass would do that. But he shifts his ground to-day, and now he comes and asks what? He asks for scholarships, — no limitation on the scholarships, — to all schools in which they now exist. He does not limit the number. He does not limit the time.

Gentlemen, we have asked you to adopt here a great principle, a principle that we no longer shall pay money, or allow money to be paid, to private institutions. If you are going to make exception here and there, then we might as well pass nothing; we might as well do just as the 1853 Convention did. Then we would not have improved the ground at all. If you load this resolution down with exceptions, the resolution will be no good when it goes before the people.

I want to say that I agree to all the great work done by these great institutions; I agree that they send out young men who are an honor and a credit to this Commonwealth, and, gentlemen, I believe that they will send them out just the same after this is passed, and go on forever.

Why does he not stand up like the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Parkman) and say that his institution is hurt, and although it is hurt his people will go out and support this resolution? That is the right way to meet this thing.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I voted for this proposition when it was before the Legislature and I fought for it, and I want to take it out of the Legislature. You see the ability of the gentleman, and you will realize, when men of his capacity approach Legislatures to do the things they wish to do and the wires they work with, how hard it is to resist them. Now, sir, what is this proposition? It is to make an exception in favor of this institution, which already has taken $575,000 out of the taxpayers of this State. Many young men have benefited by it, it is true, but the people have been taxed for it, and what has Massachusetts got to show for it, — I mean in dollars and cents, — to-day? Nothing. Now, sir, as the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) said, if the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) would coöperate with the fair-minded citizens of this State, he would rise to-day, and, speaking for the Worcester Institute, would say, as George F. Hoar, one of its founders, would have said: "Let us abandon the present custom in the interest of the State at large." If the gentleman from Worcester will come forward and convey to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts this institution, and go forward and educate Massachusetts' sons at the expense of Massachusetts, then open it to Massachusetts' control and not private control; then, Mr. Chairman, all men of intelligence will commend his action. It is a wrong thing to have a private school of that kind in any city or in any county or in the State, where you may take the poor boy or the rich boy and give him an opportunity for advancement at the public expense, to which every young man in the State has not access. To-day they have the power to dictate who shall go there to be educated, and the public contribute in part the moneys that support the institution. That is all wrong. We never should make a special educated class in this Commonwealth. Millions of the people's money have been taken in this way, — legally to be sure, but improperly. There can be no question about it. Five hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars is what they have taken out. The total taken out for educational purposes since 1860, according to document No. 17, is $10,133,159.40. This institution has taken out over half a million. Would they not show the proper spirit if they were to convey it now to the State? So long as they do not show that spirit, let us do the proper thing for Massachusetts and let them stand on their own bottoms. Then they may come in and do what the Massachusetts Agricultural College has done, and what Mr. Parkman says the charitable institution he represents will do.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

They say they have a contract now. It is a clever contract. He is an able seaman who drew it. It is a skilful piece of work and done with great care, and if they have not drawn a document that will stand, they are to blame. However, do not let us ratify it; do not let us repeal it; let them stand on the contract just as they made it. That is the proper way to do. The gentleman came before the committee pleading for the contract, but I believe he misunderstands the temper of this Convention. In the old days, when he was fighting for Congress against John R. Thayer, and when he was getting all those salaries John R. Thayer claimed he was,—Thayer in speaking to the hardy yeomanry of Worcester said he was getting $60,000,—Thayer said: "Charles G. Washburn is now getting $60,000 in various salaries, and now he wants to take the $5,000 salary away from poor John R. Thayer. Are you going to allow him to do it?" And they said, "No." Let the Convention now say to the skilful appeal of the gentleman from Worcester: "Well done, good hearted, intelligent, capable son of Worcester. We recognize your integrity and we glory in your good work. But Massachusetts feels that you have had your day at the public treasury, getting money for a private institution, when the whole State now wants to stop it in the interest of all the people." [Applause.]

Mr. Washburn: I am glad to have won from the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) some slight measure of commendation, which is really more than I had dared to hope. I believe that he means to be fair. When he condemns me for referring to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in connection with the argument I am making, I want to say to him that only yesterday, before I went before his committee, I was in consultation with a friend and supporter of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, whose name I am not at liberty to mention but which carries great authority in educational circles, and he told me that while he was in accord with the general principles of the measure he felt it would be a very great mistake to deprive the Legislature of the power, if it should choose to exercise it, of maintaining these scholarships. My friend does me a personal injustice and misrepresents the facts when he suggests that I have intimated in any way that I should oppose this measure. I was very careful to say that I was not attacking the fundamental character of the measure at all; I was suggesting an amendment that I believed would improve it. And now, moving to the antipodes from my friend in the first division (Mr. Curtis), and approaching my friend in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), oh, what must be the merits of a cause that could bring these two choice spirits into complete accord. [Laughter.]

The Chairman: The committee will be in order.

Mr. Washburn: Why, the gentleman from the third division (Mr. Lomasney), in spite of what he says, and what is more awful, in spite of what he looked at me, has been my friend for twenty years, since we served together here. I was in the House; I think on that particular occasion he was in the Senate. He gave me great assistance when I had a hand in securing for the Worcester Polytechnic Institute five years ago this appropriation, and I never have failed to express to him when we have met my appreciation of the great service that he rendered. [Laughter.] He was a member of the Ways and Means Committee, that committee that sits in inquest upon all those who seek to ravage the treasury of the Commonwealth, but I hardly had stepped within the portals of the committee-room when he fell on my neck and said: "Washburn, whatever you want is yours." [Laughter.]

Mr. Lomasney: The gentleman told the Convention that I voted for this measure, and in view of the gentleman's own statement, you see where you are going to be if you continue to let the bars down. [Laughter.] For if an old veteran like myself would do what he says, which, of course, is somewhat doubtful, — you know that I would hesitate a long time before I would throw my arms around the gentleman, because I know him well, — I should be afraid he might call for the police. [Laughter.] But, speaking seriously, this is one of the dangers. These large institutions have powerful weapons to work with. I do not want to criticize the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or any one of them; but when they start for the public money, corporation influence is nothing to it. If ever you had a friend who had done you a favor, he is reached. He is after you night and day. And with this power in their hands, the bars go down. You yield, — not for money, not for promises, but to these influences. If you have a note at a bank, you are reached and you are asked to support the institution. If you have a contract, you have an engineer over you; you are asked by the engineer to favor the proposition. And so on down the line. That has been the trouble in this situation. You will find, sir, that in 1899, when the first real protest was made against any of these appropriations, the State had spent only $5,844,274.30 from 1860. But from 1899 down to the present, it has spent over eleven millions; and that after thousands of people in this State had filed a protest against giving $10,000 in the name of charity to the Carney Hospital, a private institution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to mince matters. You cannot make any exemptions. You cannot make a concession to his institution, for, while I do not say it offensively, it has received altogether too much money. It should in decency convey this property to the State, if it wants to be aided longer, and let the doors be opened to all the sons of Massachusetts, — not to the select sons of Massachusetts whom he and the board of trustees may designate. It still wants to select the students; but why should the son of a poor mechanic toiling in the mills in Lowell be taxed so that the son of his uncle or his brother could be educated as an engineer and always be capable of earning five or ten thousand dollars yearly, while the son of the mechanic never could get over one thousand? It is class legislation, it is improper legislation, and in this spirit and in these times the Worcester Polytechnic Institute should not be exempted. And, sir, I cannot close without calling your attention to his audacity in asking not that the present measure shall stand for a few years, but that it be allowed to run forever. If we do that, what does our work here amount to? How can you now justify giving more money to this institution that has so many rich public men interested in it? The gentleman himself could give twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars a year and not feel it. At any rate, if it has done this work for years for these young men, give the institution to the State now or support it yourselves; but do not tax other men for it. Mr. Chairman, you see what they are now trying to do, not asking for the contract, because, if there is a contract, it should not be broken; I would not repeal it, I would not ratify it. If there is a legal contract, let them stand on it. Pass this amendment, and let the courts or the proper authorities adjudicate and confirm them in their rights if they have any; but do not let us give them any vote such as he now requests.

Mr. LOGAN of Worcester: If I might be permitted just one word, to say that last year the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) contributed toward the funds of the institution for which he speaks $60,000 of his own money. [Applause.]

Mr. BAUER of Lynn: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussions this morning on this whole matter, and it seems to me that the amendment offered by the delegate from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) is an amendment that is both wrong in principle and wrong in practice and should not be adopted by this Convention. Every man here knows that when it comes to a question of disposition of the free scholarships that are made available by State appropriation they are not always allotted to the needy boy, or to the deserving boy, or to the boy whose parents cannot afford to send him to the institution; they are very often placed because of political expediency. Even our State commissions, which sometimes have the final say on the allotment of those scholarships, are not indifferent to the influences of political expediency, as I personally know. Any boy in this Commonwealth, if he has the right stuff in him and is determined to fight his own battles, can to-day work his own way through the Institute of Technology or the Worcester Polytechnic Institute or any other institution in this State, and those boys who do it in that way are a far greater asset to this Commonwealth than boys to whom have been allotted scholarships under those conditions under which they have been given out in this State during the past few years. Many of the boys who get these scholarships, most of them who get these scholarships, do not remain in this Commonwealth and make this place the home of their life's effort, and Massachusetts in no way gets back very much for that kind of an investment. As I already have said the boy who has the right stuff in him always can make his own way through the Institute of Technology or any other institution in this Commonwealth and be a more useful citizen, not only to this State but to every other State in the Union. I hope the amendment of the delegate from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) will be voted down, because of the statements made objecting to it.

Mr. CUMMINGS of Fall River: When the resolutions prohibiting the appropriation of public money and public property to private institutions were referred to the committee on the Bill of Rights we knew that the committee was called upon to consider one of the gravest questions, certainly the most delicate question, that would come before this Convention. We have anxiously awaited the report of that committee, and the enthusiasm with which the Convention to-day received the announcement that the committee had unanimously agreed to report an amendment to the Constitution intended to settle the question, certainly is calculated to discourage all opposition. In rising to oppose the report then, I am not unmindful that I shall be heard with impatience, and yet I venture to ask you to re-examine this question in the light of indisputable facts, believing that you will conclude that the answer has not yet been found. If we could be sure that there was any call from the people to take up this question and that our decision would be accepted unanimously or with substantial unanimity by the people, then we should submit the resolution reported by the committee. The best reason that has been given for bringing this question into the Convention, and the only reason that could be given and induce men to consider the question at all, is the promise that if we deal with it now in the line of this resolution we shall settle it forever. Well, if someone here can give substance to that prophecy that we can be sure that a question which springs from religious differences, the atmosphere of which is charged with trouble and with danger, can be settled by anything that we propose to do, then in God's name let us do it; but we have no assurance that the amendment we offer is wanted, and we have every reason to believe that it will provoke bitter public discussion.

Everyone knows that this is a difficult and dangerous question. It lights up too easily; the fire already has been kindled, and although it has been kept under control remarkably well, yet no one doubts that the fire is still here. Do we believe that by scattering the brands throughout this Commonwealth from Provincetown to Pittsfield, for that is what we do when we submit this question for public discussion, we shall extinguish the fire? Have we not reason to fear that we shall enkindle others that cannot easily be extinguished? It is said that a Bishop of the Church of England going to his death at the stake reminded his executioners as they were about to apply the torch that they were kindling a fire in England that day that they never could put out. I am afraid we are lighting that kind of a fire.

Did you notice the impressive words of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) when he said that we shall have arrayed against us in public discussion all those who believe that it is unjust to deal with this question this way,—all those who believe that appropriations for schools in which religion is taught are not necessarily a bad thing, and many others who would protest and resist the adoption of this resolution? If this is true, if what he predicted shall take place, we shall have these fires of religious discussion lighted all through this Commonwealth.

Let us not forget our office. A Constitutional Convention does not enact laws, it proposes constitutional amendments to the people for adoption. It is obvious that we do not settle any question, but we take the responsibility of submitting questions to the people for settlement. We leave the debate, discussion and decision to the voters. It is imperative, therefore, before we propose any amendment to the Constitution that we should have convincing reasons to believe that public opinion requires the submission of the proposed amendment, or that it can be submitted safely without fear of causing serious differences and divisions among the people. We are not even enacting a law that temporarily at least settles something. The people must take such a law, but they have the opportunity from year to year to amend it as legislation is tentative and experimental. The people put up with bad legislation because they have the hope that at the next session of the Legislature the law will be repealed, but we are recommending to the people to put something into the organic law, something that cannot easily be changed, something that if it is wrong or believed to be wrong by a large number of our fellow-citizens will be a source of perpetual trouble and strife.

Now, before I speak of the provisions of this report that make for trouble, let me speak of two that are satisfactory and that make for peace. The first is the opening clause of the resolution which paraphrases the first article of amendment to the Federal Constitution relating to religion. The gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) stated it accurately. It says that Congress shall not make any law relating to the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. I am not stating it so accurately as he did, but that is the substance of it. To that I give my unqualified assent, and I beg of this Convention to remember that from the adoption of that first Article of Amendment in 1789, for a period of now nearly one hundred and thirty years, that provision has been adequate to secure religious liberty under the government of the United States, and to protect the Nation against the union of church and State.

In the next place, I believe that a proper subject for the consideration of this Convention is the question upon which the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court divided when it was submitted to them. Four members of that honorable court were of opinion that no amendment was necessary to restrict or prohibit the Legislature from appropriating public money in aid of any church, religious denomination or religious society, and three of the Justices were of the opposite opinion. This disagreement of the Justices shows that there was a doubt about the authority of the Legislature. It may be advisable to have that doubt removed; and it is removed by this measure, for in the last part, in the part that was reformed this morning, there is an absolute prohibition on the Legislature from granting or appropriating public money to religious institutions. The subject is dealt with exactly as it was submitted to the Justices of the court. It is completely, conclusively and finally dealt with. In this respect the resolution declares the will of the people for the complete separation of church and State, and a complete and absolute prohibition of grants and appropriations for religious purposes. There is no difference of opinion in this Commonwealth about that policy, and if the report from the committee had stopped there I should not oppose its adoption.

Let me say a word further about the work of the committee. I sympathized with the members in their labors. I shared their belief when I came to this Convention that the question referred to them could and should be answered. I read the resolution offered by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). I had opportunity to examine it and carefully inquired into it, and I confess that it seemed sufficiently comprehensive and fair and in all respects adequate to prevent the appropriation of public money to private institutions; but I found as I got closer to the subject that there were the insuperable difficulties that attach to disputes growing out of religious differences, which, as the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) said, have come down through the ages, and which are rarely susceptible of human settlement. The best thing we can do with them is to leave them undisturbed.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Now, as to the provisions of the resolution that are and will become a source of trouble. Plain speech is not necessarily offensive speech, and if, in attempting to be clear and state plainly the objections that I have in mind, reference is made to religion that irritates some of my colleagues, I beg them to remember that I do not intend offence. In the first place, let me say that I have no authority to speak for the members of any church; I have no right to speak for the high authority that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) spoke of, who gave him assurance directly or indirectly that this measure was acceptable; I have no authority to speak for any religious constituency; I speak for myself alone, and I speak hesitatingly and diffi-dently; but I am a Catholic layman, my life has been spent in the most intimate relations with the Catholic people, and I trust that it will not seem presumptuous on my part to say that to some extent at least I share their confidence.

In this Commonwealth the Catholics, for conscience' sake, are supporting parish schools; they are teaching in these schools all that is taught in the public schools; these schools are subject to certain superintendence and supervision, and it is a cause for deep regret that some way cannot be found to administer them as part of the public school system.

Continuing, after the noon recess: —

Mr. CUMMINGS of Fall River: When the committee rose I was about to ask the attention of the delegates to the position in which certain of our fellow-citizens, who, for conscience' sake, feel obliged to support and maintain parish schools, are placed by this resolution.
Any one who knows how burdensome the maintenance and support of parish schools is will expect to find those who assume to bear that burden, in addition to their share of the expense of maintaining the public schools, discontented, and yet they are not here asking for aid; they have not asked the Legislature for aid; they do not take advantage of a critical situation when the Nation is seriously disturbed, to raise their voices in protest against further continuance of what is to them an offensive law; and neither by remonstrance nor petition, nor by any other act, are they responsible for this resolution. They have raised no sectarian or anti-sectarian question. To-day they are expending in this Commonwealth large sums of money to support their schools. We know that the great majority of them are poor and that the burden could not be borne by them, unless relief came in a most unusual way. If the financial burden equalled the cost that would have to be paid if the same number of children was educated in the public schools, I am not prepared to say that it would be insupportable, but I doubt very much if they could bear it. But relief has come to them, as it always comes to people who make sacrifices, from sources beyond their control. As the schools increase and the burden becomes greater the number of trained teachers, men and women, who for love of God cheerfully offer their services, who are willing to teach without pay and who have no care for financial reward, increases, so that it becomes possible for the parishes to maintain their schools, at a high degree of efficiency and at comparatively low cost.
The Catholics suffer not only from the financial burden they bear but also from unjust discrimination under the eighteenth amendment. However, they hope and believe that the injustice of this situation will appeal to their fellow-citizens. Sooner or later they say our fellow-citizens will see that we are educating our children to become good citizens; that we are laying the foundation that is absolutely essential to good citizenship, teaching them the love and fear of God as well as knowledge of material things, teaching them to obey and to respect authority; and they say our fellow-citizens will soon understand and appreciate our contribution to the welfare, the safety and stability of the Commonwealth. They have a right to believe that when Massachusetts realizes the whole truth she will quickly remove all cause for complaint; and they have reached that state of mind where they patiently and quietly, without protest, and without discussion, accept the law, relying upon their fellow-citizens, when they see that it is unjust, to correct it. I think many of the Catholic people believe, certainly I do, that some arrangement may be made, and a way found, to administer these schools as a part of the public school system. The remedy may not be at hand, but it will come and it will come peaceably and amicably if we let it. Our children will know each other better than we have known each other; they will know that the prejudice of this day against the parish schools is a poor inheritance, and they will reject it.

It is one thing to bear patiently and silently with a condition of things that is burdensome, irksome and irritating, as these people are bearing it, but it is another and different thing to ask them, when we know they object to this law, to reaffirm it, to ask them again to vote for it, to ask them to deny themselves the hope of a just settlement by accepting and adopting an unjust and oppressive law. Cannot we see that when this amendment is carried to the public platform and somebody is obliged to ask the men and women who support the parish schools to reaffirm their adherence to the eighteenth amendment, he will be asking them to do something which human nature resents, and which we have no right to expect they will do? Since there is no clamor or protest from them why not leave this question alone? Is it not a significant fact, I ask you, that these people who have paid their share of the nineteen million dollars appropriated to private institutions in the past fifty years have not protested? Is it not a significant fact also that they are not here and have not been here asking for money, although their institutions have received comparatively nothing, and that the protest comes from those who represent the institutions that received the money?

Mr. Chairman, I confess that I lack the courage to go to my Catholic fellow-citizens and say to them: "I know you do not like this eighteenth amendment; I know it irritates and oppresses you; I know it leaves you bearing burdens that you should not be called upon to bear, but I ask you, although it is against your conscience, in the interest of peace to vote for it." I am not ready to do it, and I do not believe there is any power, any influence in this Commonwealth, any authority high or low that at this time can compromise the electorate and give any assurance that the people who are oppressed by that amendment will signify again at the polls their acceptance of it.

Mr. Chairman, there is still another phase of this question and that is the one that is presented when the committee asks the Commonwealth to reverse the policy that it has adopted for one hundred and thirty-seven years. From 1780 up to the present time it has been the unchanging policy of this Commonwealth to give support to private institutions when we believed that those institutions were valuable adjuncts of our public institutions. What an anomalous situation we create in adopting this report! We have to admit that Massachusetts, for its highest school system, has to rely wholly and solely, with the exception of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, upon private institutions. We have no complete system of public education. Our system generally stops at the high school. When we look for higher education, education that the State requires for some of its citizens, we have to look to private institutions. Let us face that fact. When we come to deal with the multitude of the poor and the afflicted we have to rely in a large degree upon private institutions. Let us face that fact also. How strange it seems for an enlightened community, for an enlightened State, that it has to confess that it is dependent upon private institutions for the furtherance of higher education, dependent upon private charity in a large degree for the care of its afflicted, and yet, relying upon these institutions, dependent upon them, it turns away and says: You may help us, you may help the State, the State needs your help, but the State cannot help you. Our fathers were wiser than that. The illustrious gentleman who drew the Declaration of Rights and his associates knew that the Commonwealth needed the aid of these institutions, educational and charitable. They knew that they should foster the spirit of charity that made it possible to spread all over this Commonwealth institutions where the afflicted would be cared for. They knew that the future of Massachusetts would be secure in the charity of her people, and that charity should be fostered and not famished. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that it is absurd, the mere statement will show you that it is absurd, to believe for a moment that men who know the nature of private charities do not know that turning them into public institutions will tend to destroy charity in the hearts of our people.

The fear that lies at the root of this report, let us be frank about it, — we are not legislating in mutual confidence and trust, we are legislating in mutual fear and distrust, — is that some religious institutions may receive State aid. For one I do not yield to that fear. If it were a fact still I should refuse to turn away from the wisdom of the fathers; but it is not a fact. Are we obliged at this time of peril to reverse the policy of Adams and the men who were associated with him; are we prepared to do so; are we ready to strike out of the Constitution the fifth chapter, which the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) so aptly brought to our attention; are we prepared to say that the Commonwealth no longer desires to foster wisdom, education and religion; no longer desires to help private institutions which foster the arts and sciences, or which care for the afflicted; is no longer willing to hold up the hands of those who have done so much for this Commonwealth? And yet that is what we are doing if we adopt this amendment, and that is what we are about to ask our fellow-citizens to do. What answer can we give them when we are asked why we turn away from the policies of the fathers and adopt a new policy in this generation? The modern tendency in this great Nation of ours is to follow the pol-ICY which Massachusetts is about to reject. Take an illustration: The Young Men's Christian Association, undoubtedly a Protestant institution, doing excellent work, most efficient work in the field of social service, work that appeals to all the citizens without regard to their creed, is fostered and helped and officially recognized by the Federal government. Who finds fault; who complains? Everyone knows that the United States is not giving aid to that institution for religious purposes; everyone who takes the pains to inquire knows that the aid is given because the efficiency and usefulness and value of that institution have been made known, and because it is needed as an auxiliary of the government; and the aid is given to it without any fear that it will be used to proselytize and pervert, but with the absolute conviction that that institution will live up to its promise and use it for other purposes.

True charitable institutions will not use the charitable offerings for uncharitable purposes. Charity will not pervert or misuse what is given in God's name and for His purposes, and yet knowing this, because of an unreasoning and unreasonable fear, we fetter ourselves so that in the future we may not be able to help these charitable institutions that have helped us in the past. We are afraid that some day someone may use the grants of public money in some way that was not intended.

Before I pass from that I should like to say just one word about the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. The suggestion was made, — it was pressed with great ardor, — that if they were to be helped they should become public institutions. In attempting to cure an alleged evil we create another. In order to deny public aid to these private institutions, and to make them public institutions, we are taking from those well disposed to support these institutions, so long as they remain private, the motive that actuates them to give generously and freely. Do not believe, Mr. Chairman, do not receive the statement without challenge, that transferring the institutes from the private field to the public, that making them public institutions, will be a public benefit. Is this Convention ready to say that from this day forth it will advise its constituents not to aid any institutions, however well conducted, however necessary to the State, — and we have to confess they are necessary to the State; we have used them in all these years from the adoption of the Constitution, — not to help them, not to foster them, unless in turn they give their title deeds to the Commonwealth, and remain no longer the objects of private benevolence or of private charity?

I began by saying that the best reason for adopting this resolution is, if it is a fact, that the question will be definitely and finally and conclusively settled. If anybody can demonstrate that, that is a good reason. May I say that in the Convention of 1853 the same assurances were given, the same promises were made, the same hopes were entertained? There was no doubt in the mind of anybody but that, if the eighteenth amendment was adopted, religious discussion would end; but it did not. You may say that they did not cover the whole question. No. They had seventy-three years of experience behind them. It was barely suggested in the Convention that they should extend the scope of the eighteenth amendment to charitable and religious institutions. What they desired, as Mr. Lothrop and Professor Joel Parker of Cambridge said, was to protect the school funds. In their anxiety to protect the funds and to secure funds for public education, they passed the amendment; but they discussed the question, whether or not the amendment should not extend to all institutions, and they said no. There was scarcely a voice raised in favor of the proposition. Are we wiser than they? Is there some new light that has come to us which they did not have? The strife, as the chairman of this committee was pleased to remind us, was quite as bitter, quite as general in those days as it has been since; but they were not convinced in that Constitutional Convention that they should abandon the policy of the older days and adopt the policy we are attempting to enforce to-day.

I realized and tried to state in the beginning that I appreciated the difficult position I was taking in attempting to prevent the passage of this amendment; but I submit that it is necessary that we should re-examine this question in the light of these facts, and say whether or not, solemnly and earnestly, after full consideration, we are ready to take this step.

Is it not a cause for alarm and cause for believing that we are proceeding with undue, if not with indecent haste, that in the midst of this world war, in this unhappy time, when thousands of our sons will be away, we should press to final settlement this question so intimately related to their liberties?

When this war is over the burdens of taxation are liable to be oppressive. The objects of taxation are going to be more numerous than they were before. If we, in the slightest way, induce the youth of this State to think that because of fear, we have allowed ourselves to be stampeded by clamor, that we have shown disrespect for religion, and have put the sign of disapproval upon institutions where religion is taught, they may ask: Why not tax these institutions?

Is it safe for Massachusetts to teach her youth the lesson which is taught in this resolution, that any institution which has what I was about to call the taint of religion upon it is without the walls? The step from banning the institution in which religion is taught to banning religion from private institutions is a short one.

Mr. Chairman, the evidence before us does not support the reason given for introducing this resolution, and as we love Massachusetts we should not submit this question to the people.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: Like the distinguished dean of the bar of southeastern Massachusetts, who has just spoken, I may say that I represent no body of men and no particular faith; and yet, like him, I am a communicant and member, if you please, of the same faith of which he has spoken,—the Catholic faith. I am not sure that I caught the entire drift of his argument, though I followed it closely, but as it came to my ears and as I think of it, it seems to me that, standing for the same religion, not standing for it here, but rather should I say believing and professing the same religion, my point of view of this situation is somewhat different from his. I will not undertake to answer in debate, or as at a jury trial, the facts and the arguments which he has presented. There was one figure, however, which struck me particularly and lingers in my mind especially, perhaps for a personal reason, and that was his reference to the attitude of the Federal government toward the Young Men's Christian Association in this war. He said he would feel that our Commonwealth could follow the Federal government in aiding and assisting financially the Young Men's Christian Association; that that should be our ideal, and that we ought to remain free in this Commonwealth to assist that or a similar organization.

I think he is wrong in his illustration. I think I know the facts when I say that the Federal government is giving no financial aid to the Young Men's Christian Association; and I know what I say when I make the statement that the Federal government is giving to the Knights of Columbus every privilege and every right that she has given to the Young Men's Christian Association. And I say, let that be your ideal. Foster religion, help religion; not by money, but in a far different way should such help and assistance come; and I take that simile from my brother's lips as best illustrative, if I know the committee of which I am a member, of what that committee was striving to reach.

I tried to put upon paper several days ago some thoughts on this subject, but as the hours went by it seemed to me that it would be entirely unnecessary for me to say a word; and yet I feel that in duty to myself, in duty to this Convention, in the hope that perhaps I may shed just a little ray of light on some particular phase of this question, I ought to announce the thoughts that have matured in my mind after a few years of life and after many hard days in this committee.

First of all, I had in mind to say that I wish I had the power to express the thanks of this Committee of the Whole, which is the Convention under an alias, to the honorable President of the Convention for the care and judgment that he exercised in selecting the committee on Bill of Rights, to which was committed this very delicate, if not the most delicate, question that can face us or the people of this Commonwealth. A more able or more representative committee could hardly have been chosen from this Convention; and I speak with pride, as an humble member, and conscious that personally I might offer an exception to that statement. In politics all shades of opinion were represented on that committee. The different occupations and professions, from minister to wage-earner, were all to be found. In religion the Jew, the Catholic, members of different Protestant sects, all had their voice.

It is perfectly apparent that this subject has caused anxiety to the thinking members of this Convention, and that means all the members, and I am proud to be able to follow Mr. Curtis, our able chairman, to assure this Convention that after our many days of hearings and our many more days of executive sessions, without harsh word or personal invective, all the members of the committee finally agree upon the measure which is before you to-day; and that we are here in full confidence that you will have faith in our good purposes, in our deliberate counsel, and support the measure that we present without change or amendment.

Religion is no stranger in this State, nor shall it ever be. Education in our early days was fostered by the church and State together; and the best work in our history, despite a contrary allegation made on this floor to-day, was done under religious impulse, and the strong foundation upon which we shall ever rest was laid with religious spirit, for God's glory and man's eternal salvation, as the fathers believed.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

I would not be misunderstood in my support of this measure. I hold no brief for irreligion, nor to show that religion in education is harmful. In the words of our late lamented Governor, Curtis Guild: "The danger lies to-day in irreligion, not in religion." Our famous colleges and academies of other days, — the firm manhood, intellectual strength and moral worth produced by them, — all attest the strength of religion in education. However, the doctrine of separation of church and State has become stronger and stronger from the beginning and to-day represents one of the elements of our form of government cherished by all the people. The denial of financial support to religion, however, never has meant and never can mean the abolition of religion but means only a transfer of the responsibility of maintenance to those whom it most concerns, — to the members and communicants of each particular religion or sect; it means greater care, greater vigilance for the churches and greater sacrifice for the individual. Religion, which from the words of Washington in his farewell address, and throughout our own Constitution, has become of the web and woof of sound citizenship, is ever to be protected but not supported from public funds. The vital question to-day is whether the handmaids of religion, education and charity, under private control, should have support from public funds.

In the early days theory and practice, in this respect, were not of one mold, but we now are living in a new era, a cosmopolitan day. Conditions which permitted the use of public moneys for education under religious or quasi-religious influence, which gave public moneys for private institutions under more or less religious control, for years have been undergoing a change, until to-day undeniably there has grown up a large public sentiment against supporting any private educational or charitable institutions; and your committee, I believe, without criticism of the past, but recognizing the growth of State control in many matters once considered absolutely private, facing fairly and frankly the many forms of religious belief, and not unmindful of the growth of unbelief, — and I think I quote their sentiments fairly, — our committee feels that it has recorded public sentiment in its measure, which denies public support of any private affairs except public libraries and the Soldiers' Home.

Your committee found it impossible to define "religious beliefs", "sectarian", and the many words which have been used in an attempt to explain the eighteenth amendment. One religion is easily recognized as of dogma; another is less easily identified; a lecture to one man may be a sermon and religious practice to his neighbor; a prayer-meeting by one is considered simply as his acknowledgment of his Creator; to another it is a form of religion; and so we might go on until we find ourselves in a vicious circle of argument with no beginning and no end.

Our attempt has been made to frame a measure which would need the least possible judicial interpretation, and which would leave at least no open apparent way for continued public discussion.

The appropriation of public moneys for private affairs, educational and otherwise, seems to have been growing. Coldhearted indeed the Legislature that could refuse a few dollars to some charitable institution, to some hospital or the like. And yet, as the years roll by, the demands continue from the same sources, and others hopeful and equally worthy seek to enter the list of petitioners for State aid. Under the present system, the State may build strong an institution, which grown strong with State aid, yes, grown rich with annual payments, sometime may say: "If we can receive no further aid, we shall preach this or that theory, science, or practice, inimical though the same may be to the Commonwealth and the Nation."

Is it too harsh a thought to picture a university teaching anarchy, a hospital teaching birth-control, an academy teaching atheism, although they have been nurtured and built strong under State aid, their previous good name established, their very land and buildings purchased at State expense?

But I will not urge those reasons because they may seem pretty far-fetched. I prefer to take from the lips of the Honorable Henry Parkman his magnificent statement made to-day, when on this floor he said that, although representing a private charity that might be affected, he knew they would support this measure even though it might cost something, — they would support this measure out of the sense of patriotism.

If there is any worthy institution under private control which will cause the people to suffer by denial of State aid, is not the way always open, if it is really public in purpose and public-spirited in management, if it is rendering a needed service to the public, — is not the way always open, I ask, to such an institution to give its name, reputation and property to the State for public control from public funds? We have such an example, as has been referred to to-day, in the Agricultural College giving over real estate, buildings and good name to the Commonwealth for public control by public funds in the future; and who shall say that that institution has gone backward under State control? Who shall deny the fact that it has made tremendous progress under that control?

In conclusion, gentlemen, I might say that in the framing of this measure there has been mutual respect for all persons, mutual respect for religious belief and theory. There has been some yielding of opinion, and yet it has not called for the sacrifice of any principle; it is not a jury compromise. We give it to you as our best thought for the best interests of the Commonwealth. We ask you to give it to the people even as it has come to you, with a unanimous vote, that the people may be impressed and deem it worthy of final enactment. [Applause.]

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: I have no prepared speech to deliver, but I feel justified in saying something, because I was honored by the President with an appointment on the committee on Bill of Rights. I approached my duty on that committee in the spirit in which all the delegates to the Convention approach their work, with the firm determination to do what I could for Massachusetts. I felt, when the report was unanimous, that no word of mine would be necessary, and I feel so now.

Some question has been raised by one of the members of the committee as to whether I was actively in favor of this report of the committee. Standing here I may declare my position, and incidentally make some comments upon the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings). In our committee I expected to hear all the evidence, judge of the motives which prompted the speakers, and come to some conclusion which I could report, with the other members of that committee, to this body. Unfortunately, the eloquent gentleman from Fall River did not appear before that committee; we could not get his viewpoint nor his testimony. We had been informed by a member of the committee and by some of the witnesses who appeared before us, that there was great need of this sectarian measure; that there would be a demand for financial support for parochial schools and other sectarian institutions. This the Catholic members of the committee indignantly denied. We contended then, and I contend now, that there was no occasion for a sectarian measure, that there is and will be no request for financial assistance for Catholic institutions. I am entirely in accord with the gentleman from Fall River, who says that there is no occasion for a sectarian measure because the Constitution, by the amendment of 1853, now prohibits sectarian appropriations; yet while he argues that our forefathers years ago made no provision to eliminate support for sectarian institutions other than parochial schools, in another breath he argues that the Supreme Judicial Court decided that that measure did cover such institutions; and in that I am in entire accord with him.

The gentleman from Fall River says: "Let us not light the fires of religious differences and spread them abroad from the east to the west", and I am in entire accord with him there. But apparently he does not know that years ago the fires were lighted. He says that he is close to his people, and that has been proved by the magnificent vote he got which permitted him to come to this Convention. But I say, — perhaps it may be considered egotistic, — that the man who is closest to the people is not the man who confines his efforts to the practice of law and who achieves great distinction in the law, but the man who would serve his people in public life, who would do something for his people at the sacrifice of his profession. That is the man who is closest to his people; and because I have represented my constituents in public life I come here to help solve this question which concerns the whole of Massachusetts, not as the representative from any district but as a man from Massachusetts.

The fires have been lighted and, as the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) has well said, he will not permit them to go out until the question is settled. They have been lighted; and I have witnessed in my three years in the House many a conscientious man defeated for reelection, maligned and misrepresented, — a burnt offering, — because he voted as he believed on this sectarian question.

Now, that was the proposition which confronted our committee, — to put out forever those religious fires, which the gentleman from Fall River thinks are just about to be lighted. I agree with him that there is no occasion for this sectarian provision, so called; that this amendment adds no new prohibition; simply confirms the old. Then, if we compromise, what have we given away in this amendment? We have given away nothing. We have simply satisfied some members of this Convention who are honest and sincere, who believe this amendment perfects the amendment of 1853 and who believe that some day, if this amendment is not adopted, raids will be made upon the treasury, without, I contend, any justification for this belief; because when they came before our committee we asked repeatedly: "What is the occasion for this measure at this particular time," and no answer ever was made. But we are here to listen to other men perhaps equally as sincere as ourselves, to consider their grievances and, if we do not have to conceded too much, to compromise with them for the sake of Massachusetts.

I agree with the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) as to there being no occasion for the sectarian part of the amendment. We are giving away nothing when we insert one new phrase. But there is great need for that part of the amendment which prohibits appropriations for private institutions. Having served in the Legislature of Massachusetts, and knowing the ease with which the money is extracted from the public treasury, knowing, as the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) has well said this morning, how the unctuous representatives from wealthy institutions come before the legislators and get vast appropriations, when I realize that $17,000,000 have been expended on private institutions, then, representing my constituency, limiting my thought on this phase of the question to the environment of the district from which I come, I say that my people, the ones I represent, shall not be compelled to pay their taxes to support those private institutions in Worcester and other places. They should not be expected to do so.

The gentleman from Fall River has said: "Let us not depart from the position of our forefathers", those all-wise men; and yet we read the other day that he departed most radically, having cast the decisive vote in favor of the initiative and referendum. He says: "Let us not depart from the policy of our forefathers", but how much farther could you get away from the old propositions of the forefathers than that? [Laughter.]

Sitting on that committee, we were prepared to hear all the evidence, and no opposition appeared to this measure. Are we not justified in saying that there is no systematic opposition to it? It reconciles everybody. For the sake of saving the treasury of Massachusetts and preventing my constituents from being unjustly taxed, I favor the whole measure without any division. I want no separation of the sectarian part from that of the private institution, and I oppose any such separation.

Now, I am reminded that some time ago the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) handed in an amendment, which apparently came from the gentleman from Fall River as the result of a meeting at the Union Club,—a provision which provided that private institutions now receiving donations from the State be protected until 1925; and I am reminded also of the fact that the Fall River Textile School takes $46,000 a year out of the Commonwealth. To that I am opposed. My people shall not be compelled to support that textile school in Fall River.

These are some of the incoherent thoughts which I have sought to express. My purpose in rising here is to make my position plain; to answer very feebly the fatuous theory of the gentleman from Fall River. If I were to approach this question as a politician solicitous about his political future, I should sit still and take no position at all. Were I approaching it as a politician anxious about his future, I should search in my vocabulary for the most bitter words with which to characterize the motives or the methods of the proponents of the sectarian measure. Were I to approach this question as a Catholic citizen, I should read from the fair pages of history of the deeds and the sacrifices of my fellow-Catholics. Were I to approach this question as a member of the Catholic church, I would enter into an impassioned defence of this church, which has stood for centuries, undimmed by time and unchanged by persecution, the mother of patriots and the mentor of heroes, to-day stupendous, majestic, splendid and immutable.

But, sir, I do not approach this question as a politician or as a Catholic, but as an American, a son of Massachusetts, born here, taught his ideas of American citizenship by a Massachusetts mother, whose love for Massachusetts was intensified by the example of an alien father, an Irish Catholic, who came to Massachusetts at the age of twelve, enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment at the age of seventeen, and served with distinguished valor from the beginning to the end of the Civil War. As such an American I approach this question, and I urge the adoption of this amendment which is suggested by the committee because it will prevent dissension, disruption, disunion; because it will bring our people of Massachusetts into closer communion so that, with inspiring loyalty to Massachusetts, with irresistible unity, we all can sweep onward to the consummation of the glorious destiny of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. Brown of Brockton: If there was one subject upon which I had pledged myself that I would not say a single word, and upon which I knew very little and cared less, it would be this sectarian amendment. When I heard the words of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), who is of an opposite faith from myself, as are each of the three gentlemen who have spoken, I want, in just a few words, without any notes whatever, and without any preparation, as some have had, to say why I am going to be recorded with him against this amendment. It is because of what he said; which proves conclusively that in this Convention men can come and change their minds. If I say anything, it is to say that I was going to follow the gentleman for whom I had the honor to vote for president of this Convention (Mr. Lomasney), because, knowing him to be of an opposite faith, knowing him to be absolutely fair, I was prepared to take what he offered with my eyes shut.

But when it comes to the time that the gentleman points out, as he has pointed out to you, that the mere fact that you are unanimous here does not stop this talk throughout the Commonwealth, he struck the keynote. That is a thing to which you are to address yourselves.
You never heard that, as I understand it, until the gentleman from Fall River sounded it. He says that that will not stop this discussion; and along with this discussion I heard the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Curtis) point to the gentleman who is the author of the amendment (Mr. Anderson of Newton), or in charge of the amendment, as one who could make black white, and who even gives the suspicion right here and now, after the gentleman in that division has given it, that the gentleman himself is all right but he does not answer for others, or that, knowing anything about the question, he supposes that this is going to quiet it.

Put it in the ballot if you want to, and you will give those people the very chance they want to go about and organize themselves as a force. Already they are putting themselves up in this Commonwealth as wanting to project a candidate, and you will give them an issue alongside a candidate. That is what you are going to do. Why do you interfere with it at all? Have we not got along very well with it as it is?

Gentlemen before me have spoken of their own personality; pardon me if I speak of mine. The old saying is: Examine what is said, not who says it. And have I had any experience? I came into school life at the very time that this question was up in the old Eliot School at the North End. I was born in the North End. I there joined in protest with some others, at the time the boy was flouted across the bench by the master because he objected to things which were then done in the public schools, and the doing of which led to the parochial schools, or at least helped them along. I admit that I stood in sympathy with that boy, although I was of the opposite faith. I made a scuffing of the feet, and I have not forgotten what I got for it. That question, as I say, can be left alone.

Liberal as the forefathers of this Commonwealth were, it stood until 1833 that no one could be recognized in this Commonwealth except he was Protestant. It was in 1833 that they took out that word. And pardon me for a minute as these thoughts come. The gentleman whose business it is to conduct people to heaven, according to the definition of a gentleman who lives at the foot of the hill, took religion and gave it a personally conducted tour backward, and I want to do the same thing for a minute.

You will find that all governments originally come in under the military, and they are not lasting simply because they have got nothing to keep them, — nothing but conquest, nothing but selfishness. A little later the fellow who is going to die as the result of the military goes to the fellow who is at the inner veil and has him tell him, in case he dies, how he is going to heaven. Then you find the church is joined to the military.

Far be it from me to say one word against any church. I say here and now that as the result of my lifetime I see good in all and none that has all the good. I have reached that large position. But, to continue, the church takes charge with the military. From the time of Constantine down to the time of Charlemagne, who gave you civilization if it was not the church, no matter what name you put to it? The trouble to-day is that the church is criticized by people who are perfectly free because of the sacrifices of martyrdom to air their ideas, but if they want to air them properly why do they not go down to the conditions which surrounded the men who did what they did do at that time? Why do they hold this, that and the other religion, or this, that and the other time, responsible, — think of it, — without entering into the conditions that prevailed at that time? If you de-nounce our forefathers, remember that they had not forgotten King James and all that he took to himself at that particular time. Thus do we see that oftentimes if men belong to any religious faith it is due to them to live up to the highest possible standard in order that they may elevate the particular religion to which they may belong. But our forefathers had not got over the old feeling, and it is because, therefore, of King James and his times and certain other things that they felt as they did.
Well, 1833 took out the "Protestant." In 1850, — we must think of the times as they were, — it was about that time that so strong was the feeling that when the militia of this Commonwealth marched over to the Common and the Montgomery Guards came there other companies shouldered arms and went off, leaving the Montgomery Guards there. It is well that we look to the changed conditions. That would not be done to-day. The conditions changed and men softened from day to day, and they are softening now. So, too, in regard to the schools since that time; feeling gradually has softened.

Why do we interfere with it at this time? My fear is that it is going into the ranks of labor, now united. My fear is that, where labor now knows neither race nor creed, pretty soon we will commence to talk about this Constitutional Convention provision. You are going to hear two sides of it. You are going to hear these narrow people get out and try to express their idea that there is a religion in this Commonwealth that ought to be trampled upon. Do not disguise it. Do not shut your eyes to it. Gentlemen like to say that everything is lovely. Gentlemen like to say: "Oh, we have got it all settled. Is it not nice? The Convention is all agreed. We are going to sleep. Hurrah! Praise God from whom all blessings flow." "Let us settle the trouble on the other side of the water. All we have got to do is to agree to it, and it is settled." Is it settled? I guess not.

I will agree with the gentleman who last spoke, or the next to last who spoke, that there is irreligion. While I myself am free, and call myself perfectly free, yet at the same time I want anybody to show me that if I have not got veneration for the Divine Power I ought to have more of it. And yet I say freely here that the time has come in Massachusetts when men almost have to apologize for referring to the Divine Power. The man who refers to that Power, and who thinks he can trace that Power as the cause of the events behind the events themselves, and undertakes to draw analogies and to show that like causes produce like results, is told immediately that he is in the clouds. And so it is, — it has come pretty near to it to-day, — that if a man has any particular opinions along that line and is thinking along that line he is in the clouds.

But you cannot get away from the question that has been raised here by the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), to whom you listened so attentively, and the whole point of it is that he votes against this matter because he feels that it simply will cause discussion to take place in this Commonwealth which will not take place if you do not vote any resolution at all. Gentlemen say: "Let this go out from here." Why, it goes out then under the augst accompaniment of the minds of this Convention, but that does not save the discussion. If it is to come at all, let it come under the guidance of those men who particularly have fostered it during all these years. Let them go to it. If ever they put that issue up in this Commonwealth where there is a chance to vote on it there is no question where the majority would be. There is no question about the liberality of Massachusetts, and I see no reason why we should simply get here on bended knees and tread as if treading on eggs, and go around with the idea that if we are politicians all we have to do is to vote for it and we have done our part and are through with it because the whole of them have voted for it. Now, if it does come out as the majority of the committee say, if it does come to pass that everybody votes for it and nothing else and that we do dispose of it in that way, then can nothing but glory come to you people for having got it out of the way. But if, on the other hand, the gentleman from Fall River is correct, it is a different question.

Have you anything here which you think is bigger than that? Have you any issue that you want to send before the people that is bigger than that? Well, take warning. You will have some other question to meet besides that thing that is near to your heart. Do you want the initiative and referendum? Before you get a chance to vote on that you may have a chance to talk on something else. Do you want anything on labor? Before you get a chance to talk on labor you will find they want to hear something on the sectarian question. Somebody will have started it. It is going. But if you let it alone the issue dies.

You have not settled it. At the very best what do you do? Why, simply you do not trust the Legislature, which is composed of such great big heads and such generous hearts that the worst that has been said of them in this debate is that they fall on a man's neck and give him what he wants. If you tell me, with the Legislature under the influences which the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) says that it is, that this settles the whole question and that there will be no way whereby the legal fraternity can invent something by which to undo what you are trying to do, I doubt it.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention, I have taken all the time I am entitled to. As I told you, I did not want to say anything. Strange to say, I have got something on another matter two numbers down, but I will save it. I will not hit you so hard when I come to that. But I want to be serious. I want to be as serious as the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings). From all my experience, from all that I know, I do believe that this matter will be discussed, that it will not be discussed in the temper of this Convention, that there will be men who will take the opportunity to express themselves on it, that thereby you will awaken discussion. No good will come of it. It is far better to let it alone. [Applause.]

The amendment moved by Mr. Washburn was rejected.

Mr. McANARNEY of Quincy: I rise not for the purpose of making an address to the committee on the proposed amendment. I rise merely for information. You will recall that several days ago the present chairman, when addressing the Convention, referred to something we all know to be a fact, that when the Supreme Judicial Court is called on to construe any part of the Constitution, it turns frequently to the debates of the Convention having to do with the framing of that portion of the Constitution for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning thereof. Therefore it is well, when we are dealing with any proposition looking toward an amendment to the Constitution, to see to it that the definition the Convention wants to attach to the amendment which it intends offering to the people may be made a matter of record, so there may be no confusion in the future as to its meaning. Now I would like, sir, to have the committee on Bill of Rights, speaking through any member, state to this Committee of the Whole what meaning it is intended to attach to the words "denominational doctrine", as used in the proposed amendment.

There are many men who view this question as I do. They want to see it settled now and if possible for all time, in so far as it can be so settled. They want to settle it in the least offensive manner. Personally I know that at first blush whoever undertakes to define the word "denominational" will turn his thoughts to matters that are purely religious. He will draw before his mind the definition of some religious society, Catholic, Baptist, Methodist or whichever may come to his mind, and its teachings. When you refer to "doctrines" and you associate that word with "denominational" you are apt to limit it entirely to a religious teaching. Was that the intention of the committee? Did they mean to include that and something more? For instance, assuming in this Commonwealth there came a time when one of its communities should come under the control of those who, not believing in religion, believed, if you will, in atheism, and undertook to teach atheism in the public schools thereof. Would teaching atheism in such schools be inculcating a "denominational doctrine" within the meaning of those words as used in the proposed amendment and thereby prohibit such schools obtaining money from the public funds, or would the schools, notwithstanding such teaching, be entitled to public funds?

If the words "denominational doctrine" are intended to prohibit the giving of public money to schools while atheism is being inculcated therein, then I think the Convention will declare itself in favor of a proposition that I personally can support.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I did not catch the very last part of the question,—the very last part.

Mr. McAnarney: Mr. Chairman, my inquiry, stating it more briefly, is this: Did the committee by the words "denominational doctrine" mean to prohibit all denominational teaching relating to the hereafter, including the denying that there is an existence after death?

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I presume there are several gentlemen on the committee who can answer that question much better than I. Our discussion yesterday took a religious turn that, I frankly acknowledge it, was a little beyond me. I believe, however, in answer to the gentleman, that this can be said: We did not want to leave it that our schools ever should become atheistic or agnostic.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: These words "denominational doctrine", were the words at which the committee arrived as the result of hours of discussion. We tried a great many different phrases at this point, for we wanted to find some one phrase which would be agreeable to all. As is usually the case in such instances, it is not the best phrase in the minds of a good many of the committee, but one which does adequately express the ideas of all. By "doctrines" of course we mean teaching, denominational teaching, and by that, as I understood the debate,—and I think that I speak for all the members of the committee in this particular,—we mean any distinctive teaching of any denomination. Every denomination has some distinguishing doctrine on which it stands, because of which it separated
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

perhaps from some religious body to which it formerly belonged, which it still maintains, and which is a reason for its continued existence. What we mean to say is that none of those denominational teachings shall be inculcated in any public or private school to which public funds are given. Now I do not care to go into that in detail except in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, and I may say that the gentleman's inquiry has been a subject of a good deal of consideration and anxiety with me. It has seemed to me that our phrase ought to cover the very case that he has raised, if the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court take a large view of the matter, for when a society is not an irreligious society or a non-religious society, but an anti-religious society, it seems to me to be teaching some doctrine peculiar to itself in the sphere of religion. For that very reason I think, although we do not want to increase the verbiage here, that a large view of this matter on the part of a future Supreme Judicial Court would cut out anything of that kind.

Mr. McAnarney: The answer of both the gentlemen satisfies me I have got into the record the committee's interpretation of those words, so that in future there can be no doubt what this Convention means by its use of them.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: I am very much in favor of the general principle of the Curtis-Lomasney amendment, and I am one of those who believe that when the proposition is put before the voters at the approaching election it will receive the support of a vast majority. At the last session of the Convention I did not like the language of the concluding part of the amendment. It seemed to me vague, obscure, and difficult of interpretation. And so I offered, as possibly affording some assistance to the committee, the amendment found printed at the bottom of page 2 of the docket. I could not understand what was meant by the concluding language referred to, and I made an attempt in five or six lines to state what I supposed the committee were aiming at. I believe that I succeeded in so doing, as is evidenced by the change of form of the end of the resolution which Mr. Curtis has brought in to-day. And I may say that while I believe the shorter form expresses it all and states in forty-one words what the present draft states in seventy-one, yet the improvement is such as to satisfy me; and therefore I ask the privilege of withdrawing the amendment which I offered the other day, and I hope that the resolution as offered by the gentleman from Boston, the chairman of the committee, will be adopted without any further change.

The Chairman: The Chair will inform the member that the amendment not having been moved a formal withdrawal of it is not necessary.

Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport moved that the resolution proposed by Mr. Curtis be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: —

But nothing herein contained shall prevent any city or town from expending money raised by taxation or otherwise in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control.

Mr. Bartlett: This amendment is very like the amendments proposed on page 2 of the docket by Mr. Boyden of Deerfield and Mr. Hall of North Adams. I understand that Mr. Boyden proposes to move in the morning for another amendment, and I only make this motion this afternoon to get the matter before the Convention. I do not want to discuss it at any length, because those other amendments are very like it, and we might come to something which might include this. Therefore, unless it is desired that I discuss this this afternoon, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was defeated.

Mr. Bartlett: I want to say something about this proposed amendment. It is an exception which ought to be put into this measure. There are in various parts of the Commonwealth schools which are not in any way sectarian and in which no sectarian doctrines are taught and it is an advantage if the municipalities can send pupils there. The sending of them is in no way for the help or support of the schools, but entirely for the benefit of the towns which have that opportunity. There is in the town of Newbury a school called Dummer Academy, which many here know about. It was established before the Revolution by William Dummer, then Acting Governor of the Colony, and it is in no way sectarian. The inhabitants of that part of Newbury could send their scholars of high school grade to that school very well and it would be greatly to their advantage, and they have sought a way and means to do that, to expend their money for that purpose,—instead of sending their scholars off to some other town by train or otherwise,—to educate them in a good school in their own town. They ought to be permitted to do it.

There was for many years a school in Newburyport called the Putnam Free School. It was in no way sectarian. A fund was given many years ago for the support of that school in Newburyport and for forty years or more, notwithstanding the constitutional amendment adopted in 1855, that school was run jointly by the Trustees of the Fund and the school-committee, and greatly to the advantage of the city, and there was no hint nor suspicion of sectarianism about it, nor anything in the will of Putnam or anywhere else that made that school in any way sectarian. The town of Newbury wanted to send its pupils there but it could not do it lawfully under the provisions of the constitutional amendment of 1855.

There is in Ipswich a large tract of land given 200 years ago for the use of the grammar school. There is a fund given by the will of one Manning for the establishment of a school of high school grade and character in Ipswich, and for years the Manning High School of Ipswich was carried on by a joint board consisting of the feoffees of the grammar school, the Manning trustees and the school-committee. And there is no objection, it seems to me, and there ought not to be any objection on the part of any of this committee, to excepting situations like that from the provisions of their proposed amendment. My amendment provides that any city or town may expend money "in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control."

And there is no reason that I can see why that should not go into this measure. A similar situation presents itself in other parts of the Commonwealth, as is seen in the amendments printed here offered by Mr. Boyden of Deerfield and Mr. Hall of North Adams. I did not go before that committee yesterday on these amendments, because they announced, when they made their first report, that they had given attention to every argument and to every communication and they had a communication from me setting forth this matter fully. Yet I hear that I was five times called upon before that committee yesterday.
I thought it was no use to go if they had fully heard these matters.
The reason why there should be an exception in such cases is stronger than the reasons why there should be exceptions in these cases which we have here in this measure. It is not a helping of the school in any of those instances; it is a helping of the town, whereby they can spend their money for the education of their school children to much better advantage than they can in any other way. I hope that some of the gentlemen who favor similar provisions will be heard from on this matter.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: It is with hesitation that I rise to say anything on this matter. Among other reasons for the hesitation is this: I was unable, because of conflicting official duties, to be present during the morning session and to hear the arguments and facts adduced by other delegates. I have, perhaps, in a certain way, a personal interest in this proposed amendment. I am one of the trustees of Cushing Academy, located in Ashburnham, an institution from which I graduated many years ago. It is an institution founded originally by a gift of a native of Ashburnham. Whether he had any religious views I do not know. So far as I understand the charter and by-laws under which we exist it is absolutely non-sectarian, undenom-national,—you might say non-religious. For many years in that town, the town being heavily loaded with taxation, pupils of high school age have attended the academy, tuition being paid by the town in a lump sum,—which figures somewhere about a quarter or one-third of what it would cost the town otherwise to furnish equivalent facilities in sending these pupils to Winchendon, Gardner and Pittsburg, the three places to which they naturally would go,—probably less than a quarter of what it would cost this town and its taxpayers to furnish high school facilities, within the town, anything approximating in adequacy the facilities furnished by the academy. There are, I am told, several other similar or analogous instances within the Commonwealth. It is possible that the principle involved is so important that the Commonwealth ought to cripple itself as to joining public moneys with private moneys in such educational undertakings, but I have yet to hear statements of fact or arguments which show me that that is clearly so.

There is another class of institutions within the State, supported in part by private moneys and managed by privately selected boards of trustees, that is, public charities, not governed by State boards of trustees, which I, knowing comparatively little about them, have yet thought were of increasing importance. They are the textile schools and certain other kinds of technical schools which are being promoted within the Commonwealth to give us technical education.

I direct the attention of the members of this committee to the fact that we in Massachusetts are not richly endowed with natural resources, that in the competitive contest to maintain our industries fairly on a level with those of other States we need to proceed, unham-pered by any unnecessary restrictions in our Constitution, to give the most thorough education and training to our human resources. From the committee on Public Affairs, of which I have the honor to be chairman, we are reporting for your consideration various measures tending to unhamper the Legislature, so that it may proceed more freely to serve by necessary legislation the great, growing, increasing,
—and increasingly perceived,—public needs of the Commonwealth.
I cannot easily accept the proposition that in the important work of education we are so torn by distrust of each other, by a subterranea but yet existent jealousy of each other's religious convictions, that we cannot trust the Legislature to deal in the important work of combing public funds and private funds in the tremendously important work of education. But that is exactly, as I understand it, the proposition that this Convention is asked to submit to the people. One field is put absolutely out of the opportunity of coöperation and coordination between private funds and public funds. If I am wrong in that conclusion, I should like to be set right. If that is the conclusion, we ought to approach that proposition with more soberness and more discussion, and more recognition of the burden upon its proponents, than I have heard yet.

I was much impressed with the part of the eloquent speech from the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) to which I was privileged to listen since I was able to come to the committee this afternoon,— not that I agreed with all that he said, but there was much there to give us pause. I was much impressed by what was said by the gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) the other day to the same effect, that we ought to go slowly and carefully before we say to the Commonwealth: “You shall not put your public money and your private money into any educational institution, however non-sectarian;
however little it may have anything to do with any man's religious belief or religious prejudice, you shall not put one dollar of public money along with private.” I am not ready on any showing yet made to vote that. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Newburyport (Mr. Bartlett), perhaps changed somewhat as to form, will prevail. I believe that it ought to remain possible to appropriate public moneys from the treasury of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to go with private moneys into any sort of an educational undertaking which is absolutely free and divorced from any sort of ecclesiastical or sectarian control, and which also does not in any particular inculcate any kind of religious doctrine. It seems to me that that is the sound principle, and not the absolute prohibition which, as I understand it, is proposed by the report of the gentleman from Boston.

I have had to say what I had to say on this this afternoon, for I beg the indulgence of the committee to say I am absolutely compelled to go into court in a Federal case to-morrow morning,—a case growing out of special war needs, requiring a jury trial right now in midsummer.
This I had no reason to anticipate when I gave myself the privilege and the honor of becoming a member of this Convention. Hence I must state my views this afternoon, regretting that I have not had the benefit of all that has been said here in debate:

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: If I do not answer the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Brookline it is because the hour is late and I feel that I could not in the short time adequately answer it. I will, however, say that I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Charbonneau, who is a member of this Convention, saying:
"I desire to withdraw my proposed amendment to the sectarian amendment reported by you", this amendment being one for the textile schools. I trust that we shall come to a vote to-night and that the report of the committee will be accepted.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I do not know as I quite understand the modus operandi of running Constitutional Conventions. I understand from certain members of the committee on Bill of Rights that we all must come up and vote for this resolution because other members of the committee on Bill of Rights got together last night or this morning and agreed. If that is the case all we have got to do in this Convention is to accept the reports of the committees. We can do that all in ten days and go home. But I understand by looking at the record some of these gentlemen vote one way and talk another. The other day when I had a committee report here from the committee on Elections I found three of them recorded against me, and to-day those three are the strongest advocates of standing by the committee of which they are members. I do not know as that indicates anything, but it indicates this to my mind: I thought they did right the other day when they voted against my committee, and I think I am doing right to-day if I vote against this committee if I think their position is wrong; and I think if a majority of this Convention is not satisfied that the report of this committee is right it is up to a majority of this committee to make that report conform to the judgment of the Convention. We understand that there are two questions. They say there is a public sentiment against appropriating money for sectarian institutions. They say also with great deference that there is a tremendous public sentiment against appropriating money for non-sectarian institutions. Now I should like to have the committee on Bill of Rights tell us how many people came to that committee and asked them to pass a law that would disfranchise eighty per cent of the public charities of Massachusetts. I understand we have something like 900 charities, mostly public, representing assets to the amount of $125,000,000, which are spending $16,000,000 annually, and in order to take religion out of politics and in order to stop appropriations for sectarian institutions we are going to disfranchise about 500 non-sectarian institutions to conform with the opinion of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney).

Mr. Lomasney: In response to the gentleman I would say that the report of the State Board of Charity for 1915 shows there are somewhere around 850 charitable organizations in the State making reports to the State Board of Charity. There are only six or seven that received any money from the State. The other eight hundred and forty-odd collected their money and spent it, the money was subscribed by private persons and no State aid was given them.

Mr. George: I do not know what that has got to do with this case. I was speaking about 900 charities. Now if this is not going to affect many of the charities in the Commonwealth what is the use of making so much noise about it? One difficulty with this committee is this, if you will pardon me for speaking. The committee on Bill of Rights is supposed to consider those questions that affect the Bill of Rights. There were resolutions introduced affecting the Bill of Rights, but the committee on Bill of Rights have reported a measure that touches a very little of the Bill of Rights, but they go into the school question, they go into the hospital question, they go into the Soldiers' Home question, and they have traveled all over the Commonwealth and entered into every other department and done very little about the Bill of Rights, and they do not propose to amend the Bill of Rights; they propose to amend a subject that is entirely outside of the Bill of Rights. That is where the difficulty comes.

Now that school proposition ought to have gone to the committee on Education. The question of private charities and public charities ought to have gone either to State Finance or to the committee on State Administration, and the question whether the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should authorize money to be paid to sectarian institutions should have gone to the committee on Bill of Rights.

I am not prepared to discuss the whole situation to-day. I do not have any objection to the committee reporting this measure into tomorrow's Convention, but I am going to offer a substitute measure after it gets into the Convention and also I am going to offer another measure in another part of the calendar which I think will divide that proposition; then I think that we can approach this question and know precisely what we are doing. I do not think we all know what we are doing to-day. [Cries of "Question."

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: I trust the gentlemen who have made up their minds and are convinced in regard to the public value of this proposition will allow those who have a different opinion to express their minds upon it. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "expended," in line 17, — all that part of the amendment which is printed in capitals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the same diffidence in regard to this that I have had upon all the previous matters in which a plain farmer is expressing his opinion against not only that of great lawyers and college professors but especially against that of acute politicians, and especially of the acute politicians of the city of Boston who have a wireless telegraph at work from the North End to the South End every day in the year, and who know how to arrange matters so that what the public want will carry with it to the polls something that the public do not want but which they vote for in order to get what they do want. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, — as I say, I have some diffidence in regard to this opinion, — but it seems to me that this amendment of mine meets all of the objections to this amendment except those of the sectarian or non-sectarian character; it meets all the other objections. It does what we have been urged to do in so many other matters, — leaves the situation so concise that it gives the Legislature and public some flexibility.

Now as you plow through this docket you will find in many cases that it is proposed to take a course exactly the opposite of this. As, for instance, I was talking with a gentleman to-day who has been watching for some years past that little word "proportional" relating to taxes, upon which there has been built up a library of opinions and decisions almost large enough, I was going to say, to fill this hall; and they want to take out that "proportional" in order to let the Legislature or the referendum or what not, have more flexibility in regard to appropriations for the public good. Now here you are proposing to go to work and make the Constitution less flexible. If we adopt this amendment we meet, it seems to me, all the objections of all the gentlemen who have spoken against this proposal. Now, Mr. Chairman, in a somewhat reasonably long life, now perhaps approaching the twilight, the greatest revolution that I have seen in this world has been the revolution in favor of religion. When I was a young man there was a wave of materialism over this country, due partly to our great material achievements and partly to the studies and discoveries and revelations of Darwin and others; and the greatest revolution that I have seen, — and I say this because of something that has been said about a rising tide of atheism, — the greatest revolution I have seen has been in respect to prayer. I do not find a man anywhere to-day who does not believe in prayer. Thirty-five or forty years ago it was different. I do not find a man anywhere to-day who does not believe in prayer, and I find very few men who do not believe that the cornerstone of their activity in this world should be the parable of the lost sheep. The ninety and nine were safely housed, but the shepherd went out into the night and the storm to rescue and save the hundredth. I am not talking religion, I am not talking fustian; I am talking with the aloofness, — with the personal aloofness with which I would speak of an increase of the cotton crop or a change in the methods of agriculture, and simply stating what I see to be a fact. And I am going to say further to this Convention that the fundamental political issue of this country and of the world to-day, — political issue, — is the universality of Divine Providence; the universality of belief in the Eternal Goodness and the supreme value of the individual human soul. I am going to say that that is the supreme political issue to-day. It may not be recognized as such, but it is the greatest of the demands here for the initiative and referendum. There is no doubt about it. It is the basis of the growing sweep of trade-unionism which has brought about the restoration of Russia, the centralization of England, and which is doing so much in this country at the present time. It is that supreme value of the individual human soul, — and I speak again with the same personal aloofness with which I would repeat my views and what I see in other directions, — it is that which is causing this war. What else? What else would arouse the people to think and talk in billions, — billions of dollars, billions of men, billions of beneficence?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not hear the necessity of this question. Why, since Louis XIV said "I am the State," "the State, it is I," — since the Three Tailors of Tooley Street resolved "that we, the people of England," — I do not think that there has been another event of the kind so interesting as the spectacle of the chairman of this committee and the representative of the Hendricks Club gazing at each other across the expanse of this hall and pleading that there should be no hair pulling, no bloody noses and that no children should step on each other's toes here. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, the first of it, — cut out the clap-trap in the remaining two-thirds, — this amendment, the first of it, is based upon that tremendous growth of religious sentiment in this Commonwealth to which I have referred, and I do not limit it to either the affirmative or to the negative. There is as much of it in the negative of this proposition as there is in the affirmative.

I love the Roman Catholic Church. Before my immigrant ancestor came to Salem in 1635, before the Pilgrims landed in 1620, before Jamestown was settled in 1607, the Roman Catholic missionaries had been all over this continent, and you can trace from Louisburg at the tip end of Cape Breton Island through Montreal and Quebec and Detroit and the straits of Mackinac and St. Louis and the whole State of Indiana down to New Orleans, — you can trace to-day the enterprise, the vivacity and the courage of those people which originates from that early stock. I respect and admire and love the Roman Catholic Church because during the Middle Ages it kept alive the fires of learning and civilization in Europe. Had it not been for those Catholic monks we should not be here to-day with any Protestant church and discussing any sectarian or non-sectarian amendment.
How, then, can we help loving that great communion? Personally I do not see any difference, — I am a member of the Congregational Church, — I do not see any difference between the Congregational Church and the Catholic Church in fundamentals and I probably would be a Catholic had it not been for the influence of heredity, the same as I am a Republican for the same reason. [Laughter.] That is so, — born so. Some are born Democrats, and some are born Republicans, and for the most part it is the convincing reason.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have gone into this because I want to make plain my attitude in regard to this matter. I have no sectarian or anti-sectarian bias, but as a member of this Convention I should dislike exceedingly to see this piece of clap-trap, which it is, — down in the bottom of his heart nobody in this Convention is primarily in favor of the last two-thirds of this resolution. It is a compromise measure pure and simple. I say nobody is in favor of it. There may be one man, my friend from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney), but hardly anybody else is in favor of this primarily, and we know very well that if it had come up by itself it would not get a tenth part of the votes of this Convention. I mean the last two-thirds. If the last two-thirds of this proposition came up by itself in this Convention it would not receive one-tenth of these votes, and you know it, every one of you.
Is it not so? Of course it is so. [Voices: "No."] Of course it is so.
[Voices: "No."] It is so. There may be a dozen or fifteen. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted, and that we shall have the courage to stand up and vote either one way or the other upon that first proposition.

The gentleman in this division (Mr. W. H. Sullivan) who proudly announced that he is a Catholic and has referred to the fact several times, said that they did not want this, — they did not want any sectarian schools. Now if they do not want any sectarian schools, then what do they want in this proposition? What is wanted here in this proposition? Why, what is wanted is the skillful proposition of the chairman of this committee (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) and the gentleman of the Hendricks Club (Mr. Lomasney) to carry this through, and we are going to tie up the Constitution of Massachusetts, — we are going to tie it up in a way which all of the papers a short time ago were saying was improper; it was improper to get these matters into the Constitution; they could be handled by the Legislature, and all the newspapers were in favor of leaving them to be handled by the Legislature; but this thing has got in such a shrewd shape that it seems to be hitched to a proposition which may carry it through. I hope,
Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. George: I asked a question a short time ago for information.
I am going to repeat it and I see that the clerk of the committee is here, and I should like to know just how far the demand is for this particular measure called the Lomasney Amendment, and I should like to have him give this Convention the number of people that appeared before that committee to advocate it, if he will. I understand that there is tremendous demand for this measure all over the State and it must have been manifested in some way before that committee or else they would not know it was tremendous. Now I should like to know how many appeared there before his committee to advocate this State-wide Lomasney resolution.

Mr. Barnes of Weymouth: The hearings on this matter began something over a month ago, as I recall it. There have been various gentlemen before our committee upon this question. If the matter is of interest to the gentleman who has asked this question, sometime before it comes up in the Convention I shall be glad to show him my records, but I do not think it necessary or desirable to delay this committee from voting upon this question by examining those records at the present time and furnishing to him the names of all those who appeared before our committee. If I could do it without an exhaustive search of the record I should do it and do it gladly, but he must know that it would seriously delay the taking of the vote upon this question. If he desires it for his personal information I will give it to him at a later session. [Cries of "Question."]

Mr. George: These voices here are somewhat familiar, Mr. Chairman; I have heard them before. Now I asked the gentleman not to give us the names of all the people who appeared before his committee on that question; I asked the secretary to give us the names or the number of people that appeared before his committee to advocate this particular resolution, because we have been told that there is a tremendous sentiment all over the State that recently has arisen against making appropriations, for instance to the Polytechnic Institute at Worcester. I never heard of any opposition before, but I have heard to-day that there is tremendous opposition to it. And then there is a tremendous opposition to making appropriations in behalf of the Institute of Technology. I never heard anything about that before. I understand it is a tremendous opposition. I had an idea if this opposition had manifested itself so strongly that the clerk of the committee ought to give us an idea of who appeared for this particular resolution. I do not think he would have to search his records a great deal; I do not think he would have to think about it a great while to give us the information. I have a notion, gentlemen, that there was not anybody there in favor of this measure except the people who live in the vicinity of old Ward 8, and that the people of this Commonwealth never knew that there was any such feeling in regard to this question until the gentleman from former Ward 8 (Mr. Lomasney) discovered it. Now I apprehend that everybody will admit there has been more or less discussion and more or less agitation and a more or less honest expression of sentiment against the principle of appropriating money for sectarian institutions. As I said before, I am not prepared to discuss that now, but it seems to me that we want to bear in mind all the time that there is a marked difference between a public sentiment against a certain thing and a sentiment of two or three individuals which they call a public sentiment. It makes a great difference. Remember, — while
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

I do not have any objections to taking a vote, I hope the gentleman will be prepared to-morrow to bring in those records and show us what evidence there is of this tremendous public sentiment in favor of this resolution. [Cries of "Question."\]

Mr. LOMASNEY: The gentleman has seen fit in the course of his speaking to be somewhat personal toward myself. I learned long ago an old maxim: "There are none so blind as those who will not see", and the gentleman's public record on the Gas and Electric Light Commission indicated clearly that he had very poor eyesight and a limited view of public sentiment. [Applause, interrupted by the Chair.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to leave personalities out of this question [laughter, interrupted by the Chair], — and I want the Chair to do his part to keep them out if it is right, and not to do it if it is wrong. I heard here the other day the gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett), stand in this Convention and say that a certain class of people were dirty and immoral. My blood boiled in my veins, but I said nothing at the time. I talked with the gentleman afterwards and he felt that he did not say that. We should discuss these questions calmly and coolly. I am not afraid to discuss any of these personal matters with the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) and with the gentleman from Saugus, formerly from Everett (Mr. Bennett), but it seems to me that they do not interest this Convention. This is a great public question and if he had read the history of the State he should know it. I do not mean the history of Haverhill, because recently that city has been suffering from extreme heat on a religious question. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I cannot sit silent and see men like these two stand up and attempt to fool delegates to the Convention as they have tried to do. I ask mercy from no man in this Convention and I ask no freedom from criticism, but when the Convention allows them to indulge in personalities they must take what I say in return. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to assume that the gentleman from old Ward 8 has no sinister purposes from time to time in his efforts to attach to somebody or other some utterance which he never made but which can be useful five years hence, ten years hence, if distorted a little. And I presume that it was solely, — I will say that it was solely, — for the public good that he brought out this of somebody or other who shall be nameless having referred to some class of people as low down or something like that. Well, now, there is no question that he meant me and there is no question, — or I will not say that, — but perhaps five years from now, if I should be still alive and running for something down in the Lynn district, up would pop that utterance, misunderstood, and very useful to anybody who wanted to use it. Now what he accused me of was of saying that when the Poles came over to this country they were dirty, disreputable and immoral —

Mr. BASSETT of Taunton: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN: The gentleman will state a point of order.

Mr. BASSETT: The point of order is that the present personal remarks are not germane to the question before the committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Luce of Waltham): The discussion has taken a personal turn which the Chair ventures to suggest is unfortunate, in view of the very high plane that the debate hitherto has followed, and he ventures to suggest that harmony and good feeling will be advanced by resuming debate, if it is to be resumed at all, on the same level that it reached during the early part of the day. He hopes that gentlemen will confine themselves in their remarks to the question immediately before the committee, which in this case is the adoption of the motion to amend made by Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not introduce this subject and I hope the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) will not introduce it and then run away. Now he accused me of saying that the Poles who came to this country were dirty, disreputable and immoral — [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN: The Chair would rule that the remarks of the gentleman from Saugus are not pertinent to the question under discussion, which is the amendment moved by Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport.

Mr. BENNETT: I hoped to avoid rising to a question of personal privilege, but if it is necessary in order to set myself right I will do so, and I will proceed upon either basis that the Chairman desires or insists upon.

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman understands that Mr. Bennett of Saugus rises to a question of personal privilege. He will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: The question is this: The gentleman has introduced continuously the remark that I showed my lack of sympathy with his constituents by saying that the Poles who came to this country were dirty and disreputable and immoral, and that three generations changed them into native American citizens whom you could not tell from native born Yankees except that they had more children. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the kind of my own self, my own volition. What I did was to quote a friend who was raised in Iowa, and I quoted him as having said that, and if the gentleman before he tries to pick out five years hence when neither of us may be alive and prepare for the campaign of 1922, — if before he has done that he will have looked in the records of the stenographers he probably would have found that just as I stated it. I did not say anything of my own volition at all. I quoted a gentleman who was raised in Iowa and who had that experience, and it seemed to me a most excellent tribute to the character of this country, to its function which we advertise and eulogize so much as a melting-pot of humanity, — that that happened in that way. I do not suppose I have disposed of this; I have not disposed of it. It will be up next year and it will be dragged out of the card catalog of my friend who has such things ready for emergencies and will be used again. Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say on the subject. [Cries of "Question."]

Mr. BARTLETT: Mr. Chairman, I did not think I was going to precipitate all this talk when I moved that amendment and I hope the Convention will not visit it on me. I hope they will vote on that amendment on its merits as a simple act of justice.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport, — that the new draft moved by Mr. Curtis be amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "But nothing herein contained shall prevent any city or town from expending money raised by taxation or otherwise, in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control" — was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bennett of Saugus, — that the new draft moved by Mr. Curtis be amended by striking out all after the word "expended", in line 17, — was rejected.

Mr. Scott Adams of Springfield moved that the new draft moved by Mr. Curtis be amended by inserting after the word "libraries", in line 33, the words "and museums connected therewith."

Mr. Adams of Springfield: I think it is unfortunate perhaps that this question should be interjected into the debate at this time, but if the Convention will bear with me I will be as brief as I can in making the point which I wish to call to their attention. In the first place, I believe in the amendment reported by the committee. I shall be glad to vote for it, I shall be glad to support it at the polls this fall if it goes to the voters, no matter what happens to the amendment which I now offer. In the second place, I should not presume to move this amendment if I thought it interfered with the principle adopted by the committee either in degree or in kind or if it were anything further than a perfecting amendment. Under the measure as reported libraries to which the public are admitted are excepted. In the city of Springfield there is a library association, chartered in 1864, offered by private individuals and by city officials ex-officio, which manages the City Library Association, which operates the City Library. This City Library Association holds property to the value of two million dollars, which it manages. It defrays its expenses partly from the income of its private funds and partly from appropriations given by the city of Springfield itself. It also is chartered for the purpose of maintaining public museums of natural history and art and in connection with its library does maintain such museums. These museums are entirely public, are used for educational purposes only, and are used by the same persons and to the same extent as the Springfield City Library is used. Both are absolutely free to all comers. But further than that, this whole amount, two million dollars or more, has been given to this Library Association on the condition that the city of Springfield, by appropriation from time to time, should defray the operating expenses of the association. As I read this amendment, the city of Springfield, if the amendment prevails, and I hope it will, may appropriate money to defray the operating expenses of the library only, but may not appropriate money to defray the operating expenses of the museums connected therewith, used exactly in the same way. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the rule in one case is the rule in the other, and that the city in this case should be allowed to appropriate money to care for the immensely valuable collections which it has received from private donations upon the understanding, implied, of course, that it will do so.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: Just one word. The committee thanks Mr. Adams, is very grateful to Mr. Adams, for having called to its attention the question of libraries. We gave this question of museums careful and earnest thought. I believe Springfield is the only city in the State, and this museum the only museum, which would be affected by his amendment. Yet, gentlemen, having helped the libraries we think the city of Springfield can make an appropriation for her library, and that other library funds can be used for the museum. We do not feel like giving up the principle.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: In behalf of the citizens of Springfield and a public library that for fifty years has been well known throughout the Union, in behalf of the men, many of whom are dead and gone, who have contributed large sums to the museums of that library, we are here speaking at this late hour. The entire State appropriations in several generations have been but around twenty million dollars to all the subjects we are discussing. Private citizens in Springfield have given more than ten per cent of that sum to the museums of the library upon the faith of a charter that if they would give, the city would keep and show. That is all that is required. That right is all that is asked. We say that this is a mere perfecting amendment, having nothing whatever to do with the great principles that are involved here in any way which can militate against them, and merely preserves the simple right to the city of Springfield to show some two million dollars' worth of property which has been given to a private charity on the faith of a charter which was granted long ago. That is all there is to it. It seems to me that the committee is straining at a very small gnat. We ask for but three words. From the mere fact that in the city of Springfield we happen to have men who have given very largely, some from their small means, some from their large means, there has grown in many respects one of the finest libraries in the State. Connected are two or three museums unequalled for their size perhaps in the country, perhaps in the world. And yet the committee say that from now on the city of Springfield, unless these collections are given to the city in some way which the donors who are now dead and gone never intended, shall not extend public help toward their exhibition.

Mr. Lomasney: If the Convention will pardon me, it is not only the city of Springfield that is affected. We have in Boston an art museum, and they have been trying for years to get an appropriation through the Legislature. They were defeated on several occasions. They tried to get it for several years,—$50,000 a year was the sum petitioned for. And there are other places. Now, there is no question but there are some odds and ends like these that are on the outside that are going to be affected somewhat, but cooperation will bring about the desired result. There is always a way if there is a will to overcome these slight differences; but if you let the bars down everything else will come in. You at once bring up a question about the Boston Art Museum and the other museums and a thousand other things which you do not realize. I hope the committee's report will be sustained.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Bosworth) through you, Mr. Chairman, if the art museum is not so closely connected with the library, that the appropriation for the library could be used for the art museum.

Mr. Bosworth: I would answer the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) that we are advised at the present time that that cannot well be done. It is costing the City Library Association to properly exhibit these large collections and show them to the public,—and there is no teaching connected with them, except through the public schools and other educational institutions,—because of the large effort that is made to show these things and show them wisely, to the young people of the town, to the children in the schools, to teach all how to use these museums profitably, — it is costing approximately $10,000 a year. As I understand it, only about $2,000 annually of the funds of the library can be diverted toward that sum of $10,000.
[Cries of "Question."]

The amendment moved by Mr. Adams of Springfield was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston, — that a new draft (See Document No. 338) be substituted, — was adopted; and, accordingly, the new draft was substituted; and it was voted that the Committee of the Whole report to the Convention recommending that the new draft ought to be adopted.

The proposed amendment of the Constitution, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole, was considered by the Convention Wednesday, July 25, 1917, and was ordered to a third reading after a short debate on the question of postponement.

It was next considered Friday, August 10, certain technical changes having been made by the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. Lincoln Bryant of Milton offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: At the time this matter was in the Committee of the Whole, I, for one, was not entirely informed as to the nature of the obligations that had been undertaken by the Commonwealth in connection with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and I have reason to believe that some other members of this Convention were not advised as to what the relations of the State and those two educational institutions are.

I desire to say that I have no affiliation with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or with the Worcester Polytechnic Institute.
I never went to either of them. As far as I know, I have no friends going to them now, and I have no relations of any kind, nor, as the expression is, do I hold a brief for either of them. But I do hold a brief, Mr. President, for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by virtue of my election to this body, and I cannot let this matter pass without saying a few words as to how it looks to me.

I do not at the present time intend to attempt to argue the main question of the sectarian amendment. I merely wish to state this.
It is a compromise amendment. I think it is hardly necessary to argue that. On the one hand it provides that no funds shall be given to any sectarian institution; that is the first proposition. The second proposition is that no public funds shall be given in aid of any institution not under public control.

These are different and distinct propositions. One-half of the committee recommend very strongly the first proposition; but what do they say about the second proposition? That it is unimportant. The other half of the committee recommend very strongly the second half of the proposition. What do they say of the first half? That it makes very little difference. That is the kind of unanimous report that we have before us. I intend to make no comment upon it, but that is the situation.

Now, the second part of the amendment provides that no public funds shall be devoted to institutions not under the public control; and what arguments have been offered us in the discussion of this matter that we can take back to our constituents to explain why we have adopted this part of the amendment? The main argument that has been offered us on this proposition is that in every single year from 1860 to 1916 there have been grants to worthy educational non-sectarian, — private, if you will, — institutions, and that up to date these grants amount to something like $19,000,000. This money has been granted to these institutions, because the Legislature believed that it was for the benefit of the Commonwealth so to grant it. If we examine the report that was issued by the commission appointed to compile information for our Convention, we find that between 1780 and 1860, there were 172 appropriations made by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to various worthy educational and charitable institutions.

That, Mr. President, is the only argument I have heard that has been offered as to why we should refuse now to allow that policy to be carried on. What does that mean? If it means anything it means that the people of Massachusetts, speaking through their Legislature, have decreed time and time again their will to appropriate their public funds in aid of worthy institutions. Is there any proposition that has come or will come before this Convention on which we may hope to have a clearer, more definite, better sustained indication of the will of the people? Was any Constitutional Convention ever called which, with such short debate and with so little consideration, has assumed to deny to the people a power which, so long and so consistently, they had been exercising? In 1636 four hundred pounds was granted to Harvard College to sustain it, and ever since that day the people, in every way that they can possibly manifest it, have shown their desire to continue that policy. What are we going to say to our constituents when they ask us: “Why have you reversed the policy of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? Who has assumed to barter the will of the people, and at what price?”

I am not arguing this proposition. I am merely stating the condition that seems to confront us.

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them; especially the university at Cambridge, public schools and grammar schools in the towns; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country.

Is that as true to-day as in 1780, when it was solemnly adopted by a Constitutional Convention and by the people? What are we going to say to our constituents when they ask us why we have sought to repeal that document? The educational institutions of this Commonwealth have been pictured to us as seeking something that they ought not to have, and we are told of the great sums that they have received as if it were something they ought not to have received. Is there any member of this Convention who really believes that they have not returned tenfold, yes, a hundredfold, every dollar which they have received in those voluntary gifts of the people? Have they not rendered to the people of Massachusetts services worth a hundredfold every dollar that has been given them to carry on their worthy enterprises?

In 1911, by chapter 78 of the Resolves of that year, the Legislature resolved that there should be paid annually to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology for the term of ten years the sum of $100,000, $1,000,000 in all, provided, first, that the last four payments should be conditional on gifts to the amount of $1,000,000 from outside the Institute; and, second, that the Institute of Technology should establish eighty free scholarships for the boys of Massachusetts. Subsequently, that $1,000,000 was contributed by citizens of Massachusetts, by citizens of the United States, by citizens from outside the United States, and the eighty free scholarships for boys were established.

It is not necessary to do more than to state the facts, to show that there is at least a strong moral obligation on the part of the Commonwealth to carry out the promise which has been made, and on the strength of which people all over this country, and outside the country, have contributed $1,000,000. Is it too much to say, as was said in an editorial in one of the recent papers, that “it would be preposterous to rest the present duty of the Commonwealth on any technical question as to whether the agreement made by the State amounted to a legally binding contract”? The moral obligations of the Commonwealth are too important to be thrown aside, and there is the strongest moral obligation for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to live up to what it has said it will do.

But assume for a moment that there is a contract here, — and to be sure we have the opinions of several of the lawyers in this body that there is a contract. Of course everybody here knows, lawyer and layman alike, what a free opinion is worth. A free opinion is worth just what you pay for it. Some people think that no lawyer’s opinion is of much value, but a free opinion is at best a mere off-hand opinion. There is but one opinion on which you can rely in this matter, and that is the opinion of a court of last resort, which, in this case, is the United States Supreme Court. That is the only opinion that is of real value. But assume, I say, that there is a contract, where does that leave the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? It leaves it in the position of a man who refuses to pay his debts until compelled to do so in the poor debtor’s court, because there is just one tribunal that can compel the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to pay this obligation to the Institute of Technology and to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and that is the court. It means that we are solemnly, advisedly and deliberately repudiating the debts of Massachusetts. What a storm went over the country in the greenback days, when several Congressmen sought to repudiate the obligations of the United States! Are we doing anything more or less than repudiating the contract which the State has made? No Treasurer of Massachusetts, unless he has the decision of a court back of him, will ever dare pay the $400,000 still due to the Institute of Technology in the face of this direct prohibition of the proposed resolution:

No grant, appropriation or use of public money, or property, shall be made or authorized for . . . any college, infirmary, hospital, institution or undertaking which is not under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers.

What should we say if the Legislature of 1917 had seen fit to repeal the chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911, and had come back home and said: "Yes, we repealed it, but the Massachusetts Institute of Technology is protected by the provision of the United States Constitution that no State shall impair the obligation of a contract"? What should we say of legislators who assumed to do that and thought that their constituents would back them up in it? Should we not say that they were either knaves or fools, who had bartered the fair name of the Commonwealth in return for some consideration as to which the citizens of the Commonwealth were not consulted? Are we not as jealous of the good name of the Commonwealth as the Legislature? And I ask you to read the resolution, and say whether it is not a clear and direct repudiation of the debt. If the rights of those two institutes are saved under this resolution it is not by virtue of any honesty of purpose manifested in it, but because the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts will be dragged into court and told: "You shall not break your contract."

Mr. President, this case will be another Dartmouth College case. It is very well to say that the courts will read the debate which takes place here, and will assume that the members are sincere in saying that they have no intent to take away an honest dollar from anybody. That is very well to say. In my opinion, gentlemen, these debates will not even be read by the court, because the resolution is perfectly clear as it is, and therefore a court cannot go outside of its terms to construe into it something which is not there.

But assuming that some court will read the debates, how will the case stand in history? It will stand in history as the Dartmouth College case stands, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts sought to take away from two worthy institutions their just and vested rights, deliberately and advisedly. Who now knows what debate went on in the Legislature of New Hampshire when the statute was passed which concerned that college? Who can tell me one word that was said then? All we know is that it was sought to deprive Dartmouth College of something to which it was entitled. A man is judged, not by his protestations, but by his deeds; a Constitutional Convention is judged, not by its eloquence, but by its acts; and the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts is judged, not by what its public servants say, but by what it does. And in this case it is repudiating its contract as clearly as it ever was attempted to repudiate the debts of the United States in the greenback legislation.

There is another consideration that I want to lay before you, and it is this: Are we going to put ourselves in the position of passing a resolution which we know to be in part at least unconstitutional? That is an extremely dangerous thing to do, and I want to refer to one case to illustrate my point.

In 1907 the Senate and House had under consideration an act which provided that no seller of any goods or machinery in the Commonwealth should make it a condition that the buyer should purchase other goods of him. I hope I make myself clear. No seller of merchandise or of machinery in the Commonwealth should say to the buyer: "I won't sell this to you unless you will buy certain other things of me."

The legislators were doubtful about the constitutionality of that act. They asked the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. The point on which they were doubtful was this: Whether the act did not impair patent rights which the United States had granted as to patented articles. Note that it made no special reference to patented articles. The majority of the court thought it did not impair rights on patented articles. The minority of the court said it did impair rights as to patented articles. But they all could have united on this proposition, for which authority was cited by the minority: That, assuming that it did impair rights as to that comparatively small number of articles covered by patents, the whole statute was unconstitutional. If you will compare the number of patented articles sold in the Commonwealth with the number of all other articles sold in the Commonwealth you will see how comparatively unimportant the sales of patented articles are. But that court would have found, and the minority did find, that, because the rights of the owners of this small group of articles were impaired, the entire statute, as to all sales, would be unconstitutional.

Where does that leave us, if we pass a resolution which we admit is in part unconstitutional, because contrary to the Constitution of the United States? Does it not leave the whole resolution in a very dangerous position, if we admit that, as referred to one set of circumstances, it is unconstitutional? I do not attempt to prove that in argument at this time, because this is not the place for extended legal dissertations; but why take that chance when it is unnecessary?

Now, Mr. President, I believe that the majority of the delegates here are entirely sincere in not desiring to do anything that will injure the fair name of Massachusetts or will deprive one institution of its just dues. But if we are sincere about that why not say so, and why not lay the question at rest forever? Is it just to compel the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute to go to the courts to get what everybody practically admits is their due under this statute? The amendment which I have offered does not alter the meaning of the wording of the statute one iota; nor is a syllable of the resolution as drafted, altered, and no part of the meaning is affected. If the friends of this resolution want it accepted by the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts why should they seek to pile up against it, when it comes before the people, not only the opposition of graduates of the Institute of Technology and of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute,—which perhaps somebody will say is selfish,—not only that, but the righteous indignation of every fair-minded man in the Commonwealth?

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: Will the gentleman kindly read to the Convention the text of the statute of Massachusetts constituting the contract?

Mr. Bryant: I should be very glad to, Mr. President. It is chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911, and unless some gentleman asks me to I am not going to read the chapter in regard to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, because it is exactly on all fours with the present resolve. If the delegate from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) desires to deal with that he can deal with it much better than I can. But simply to save the time of the Convention I shall not read the chapter relative to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. The other is as follows:

Resolved. That there shall annually be paid from the treasury of the Commonwealth to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, for the term of ten years, beginning with the first day of January in the year nineteen hundred and twelve, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the corporation of said Institute for the general purposes of the Institute: Provided, however, that the payment for the year nineteen hundred and seventeen and for the four following years shall be conditioned upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Governor and Council that the said Massachusetts Institute of Technology has received, by bequest or gift from other sources, the sum of one million dollars in addition to all the funds held by it on the day of the approval of this resolve. In consideration of the said payments and during the continuance thereof, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology shall maintain eighty free scholarships to be granted by the Board of Education to residents, or minor children of residents of Massachusetts, who, upon examination conducted under such rules and regulations as the president of the said Institute may prescribe, shall be found to possess the qualifications fixed for the admission of students to the Institute.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal of talk in this Convention about the will of the people. That which you have just heard is the voice of the people. And I for one say, let us have done with calling on the name of the people if we cannot hear their voice when it speaks so clearly and distinctly; if we cannot hear that voice which is so sacred, Mr. President, that many members of this assembly think that even the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth should not question it, and so great an authority as the honorable district attorney for the United States in this district thinks that only a two-thirds majority of the Supreme Judicial Court should be allowed to question it. That is the voice which we have just heard. That is not any indefinite expression of some one's opinion as to this, that and the other will of the people, — that is the people's voice.

Now, Mr. President, this is an entirely friendly amendment.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I should like to ask the gentleman one question, Mr. President. Was that act which he has read accepted by the Institute of Technology formally or impliedly?

Mr. Bryant: Mr. President, that act was accepted; there was no provision for the formal acceptance by a vote, but it was accepted by the Institute of Technology by going around all over the State, and all over the United States, and collecting this million dollars, with the statement that the good faith and credit of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was behind this resolve to give another million dollars to the Institute of Technology. That is the situation that is coming right up before the voters when they look at this resolution. Will any fair-minded man have anything but indignation that we should try to impeach that fair, free gift to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute?

As I said, Mr. President, this is an entirely friendly amendment. It is offered in good faith. It is offered in part, of course, to save the rights of a just creditor of the Commonwealth, but it is offered mainly to save the good faith of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

[Applause.]

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I should not rise on this occasion to address the Convention unless the issue involved, in my opinion, was momentous. The issue involved in this proposition is nothing more nor less than the good faith of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. There are two amendments pending to effect the same purpose, — one which I expected to offer myself, and the other which has been submitted by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant). Each one serves the purpose, which is to make certain that neither of the resolves upon the statute-books making appropriations for a term of ten years to these two institutions shall be affected if perchance this anti-sectarian amendment is adopted by the Convention and ratified by the people at the polls.

I am not now discussing any other part of this amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Milton does not affect the fundamental propositions contained in this so-called anti-sectarian amendment. I am here to make a plain statement, in plain words, as directly as I can, to the members of the Convention.

There is, I take it, nothing dearer to any man here than his own personal honor, unless it be the honor of the Commonwealth. What are these two resolves of which I speak? In the year 1911 the Massachusetts Institute of Technology found itself in financial straits, and applied to the General Court for aid. In conformity with the practice followed for many years, in varying degrees, the General Court responded by passing this resolve, chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911, in which,—and I shall not read it,—are contained the following stipulations: That there shall be paid annually from the treasury of the Commonwealth to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, for the term of ten years, $100,000 a year upon certain conditions. What were the conditions? That the Massachusetts Institute of Technology should maintain eighty free scholarships, to be awarded by the Board of Education. More than this, the act provided that the appropriation should not continue for a second term of five years unless meantime the Institute added a million dollars to its endowment. That condition has been complied with and certified to by the Governor and Council. And on what representation were those contributions solicited throughout the length and breadth of the land? I hold in my hand a letter from President Maclaurin of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which I will read to the Convention:

The million dollars obtained by the Institute in order to comply with the conditions laid down by the Legislature in making a grant in 1911 was obtained from benefactors in almost every State in the Union. I had personal interviews or correspondence with all the larger contributors and in every case was asked what Massachusetts was doing for Technology, and in every case I referred to the Resolve of the Legislature in 1911. Smaller contributions came for the most part from appeals made by a committee of the alumni association which began its work immediately after the Governor signed the resolve of 1911,—a resolve which was made the basis of the campaign for funds.

The conditions were complied with on the part of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The case of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute is on all fours with this, excepting that the number of the scholarships and the amounts of money involved were different. I myself know of one large personal contribution made to enable the Worcester Polytechnic Institute to comply with the condition that its endowment should be increased by a certain amount, if the appropriations from the State were to be continued for the second period of five years.

Now, what are the conditions? Four years of payment remain for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and five for the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, involving in one case $400,000 and in the other case $250,000. I mention this part of the case incidentally because I am dealing primarily with the fundamental proposition of the good faith of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester whether in his opinion the arrangement made between the Commonwealth and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and also the arrangement made between the Commonwealth and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, in his judgment amounted to contracts?

Mr. Washburn: If my friend will have patience I will come to that feature of the case at once.

Mr. Powers: And there is another question I should like to ask; and that is whether, if we pass this resolution, the resolution would have the effect of repudiating the contract? In other words, if we pass this resolution may it not be that these contracts can still be carried out without interfering with the terms of the proposed contracts, or alleged contracts, made between the Commonwealth and these institutions?

Mr. Washburn: I welcome the questions. I was proposing to deal with them fully, and I hope satisfactorily.

When I was interrupted, Mr. President, I was about to say that the suggestion is made: "Why, this is a contract." It may be a contract or it may not. I am quite certain that if it were made between two individuals, members of this Convention, it would be a contract. But this is the precise way in which this matter will proceed. Suppose this anti-sectarian amendment is adopted by the Convention and is approved by the people at the polls. Next year when the legislative committee comes to make its appropriation of $100,000 for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and $50,000 for the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, some one will say,—very properly perhaps: "You cannot make those appropriations because the constitutional amendment prevents it." Then some one says in reply: "Ah, but this is a contract." Then some third person asks: "How do you know it is a contract?" And then a fourth person on the committee is certain to ask: "Haven't we a right under the Constitution to ask for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts?" And they ask for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts; and the court, I hope and believe, would sustain it as a contract. But the court might say: "One Legislature cannot bind the next one; this is not a contract, although the consideration has been given." There would then be nothing left but a moral obligation, and the Legislature is in no condition to fulfil moral obligations in face of a constitutional amendment inhibiting any action.

Of course it is my contention that this is a contract; but I see no reason why, if any one expresses doubt, there should be any objection in any quarter to removing it. I do not ask to have the claims of these institutions made any stronger than they are, but I appeal to this Convention here assembled not in any way to weaken the obligation, and not to make it impossible for the Commonwealth to carry out an arrangement into which it has deliberately entered.

Does some one devoted to form rise and say: "Oh, a saving clause of this sort should not be appended to a constitutional amendment?" My reply is that in Massachusetts in times past substance has been regarded rather than form; and if this amendment, or any other that serves a like purpose, is adopted, it will be to the credit of the Convention and to the glory of Massachusetts that it is made clear that this Convention has favored no resolution, has taken no action, that might weaken and perhaps destroy a sacred obligation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: It is with some diffidence that I rise to answer the arguments of these two lawyers, but the gentleman who has just taken his seat has distinctly stated that he believes this is a contract. He has stated that, and he believes it. Then is he afraid to trust our Supreme Judicial Court, or the Supreme Court of the Nation, to justly carry out the provisions of a sacred contract? I wonder if he is. But, Mr. President, of course he is not.

Now, he says he is simply asking to leave it as it is. Let us read his amendment and see what it says, page 2 of the calendar:

Mr. Washburn of Worcester gives notice that he will move that the resolution be amended by adding the following: "Nothing in this amendment shall in any way affect Chapter 78 of the Acts and Resolves of 1911, being a Resolve in favor of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Chapter 87 of the Acts and Resolves of 1912, being a Resolve in favor of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute."

What do the words "in any way" mean? Do they mean that there-after, after this term is up, the Legislature can again appropriate $100,000 more for ten years? What is the meaning of these words "in any way"? Why, Mr. President, he says he does not want to help or hurt the proposition; he wants to have it stand. I submit to you, Mr. President, and to the lawyers of this Convention, and to the business men of this Convention, — and I will not make any reflections upon him, he is a business man, — if he would be justified, after a contract was signed and sealed, in adding anything to it, or would he expect it to stand as it stood when signed and sealed? That is the way business men do. That is the way every sensible man does.

They talk about the moral obligations of the Commonwealth. No one would question the moral obligations of the Commonwealth. Who started the Massachusetts Institute of Technology? The Commonwealth of Massachusetts gave them land on the Back-Bay valued at $323,000, away back in 1863. That land to-day is worth $1,500,000 on the assessors' books, — from $323,000 to $1,500,000 is quite an increase and they have been in the Land Court and the Supreme Judicial Court trying to enforce rights not allowed by their title.

But let us see about the moral obligations. When they secured that grant there was a certain charter passed, in 1861. In 1863 they came before the Legislature and were relieved by chapter 226 of two sections of that act, — two sections, 8 and 9. I am not going to take the time to read them. And, Mr. President, I have here the figures, beginning with 1863, when they were given this land, then valued at $323,000, down to 1916, when the total they had received out of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was $1,766,644.66. That is what the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has done for this institution, and who can question what Massachusetts intends to do? Of course the State intends to be fair. Is not that proven by what it has done? Who would think, what business man, what lawyer, if a person came to his rescue in business for fifty years, supplying him —

Mr. Washburn: I should like to ask Mr. Lomasney, who is versed in legislative ways, this simple question; and before I ask it I want to say to him that he is the first man with whom I ever came in contact who has suggested that the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and the Supreme Court of the United States were likely to follow any opinion that I might express. [Laughter.] The question that I ask the gentleman in the third division is this: When next winter rolls round and the Legislature is convened and the committee on Ways and Means takes up the matter of continuing this annual appropriation, and some one raises the question that the appropriation cannot be made because of this constitutional amendment and the advice of the Supreme Judicial Court is asked, and the Supreme Judicial Court says that it is not a contract, let me ask the gentleman how the Legislature under those circumstances can make any further appropriation whatever to either of these institutions?

Mr. LOMASNEY: Why, Mr. President, the gentleman says it is a contract. He says he knows it is a contract and it was drawn by skilful lawyers for that purpose, and who can question that if it is a contract the Supreme Judicial Court will say so? That is what I said. He was asked the question by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) if he claimed it was a contract, and he said he did, and that he believed it was, but he said: "We want to be sure." Now here is a paper signed and sealed. Suppose you have a deed of a piece of property; it is on record and there is some question coming to trial affecting the title; what do you do when the question is before the court? Put some other statement on record to affect it? Of course you do not.

Now, Mr. President, that is the trouble and that has been the trouble all the way through. I have read his amendment. Hear what his amendment is. It states: "shall in any way" . . . . Now, I am not going to ask any question of him, but it seems to me that those words "shall in any way" after these five years are over might justify people saying in the Legislature that this constitutional amendment did not at all affect the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Mr. WASHBURN: I am greatly obliged to the gentleman for so courteously yielding, but if he finds so much to criticize in my amendment I want to ask him if he understands that that amendment is not before the Convention.

Mr. LOMASNEY: Does the gentleman now give notice that he will not move it? If he does I will not discuss it. [Applause.] So you see where I stand. Lawyer-like again, Mr. President, you see, he is playing with us on this matter, a pussy-cat in the corner. [Laughter.] Mr. President, I would not violate the moral obligation of Massachusetts for my life, nor would any other man in this Convention. [Applause.] But see where the other side of this argument would take us. He would have Massachusetts stop, do nothing here on this great question after the people elected us, and when the question of principle is involved, because that is the question, — the principle involved, — he would have us stop, do nothing and wait five years. Is that efficient government? Is that the kind of government they are teaching in this institution that he so ably represents, that this great State should stop its Constitutional Convention, should pause, do nothing, because forsooth they have an amendment, a kind of extending amendment? I do not think it is.

Now, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Convention, I do not like to go into this question in all its detail and state why this question is before us. I had no objection to these grants, I voted for them, and, Mr. President, I am not going to attack any of the insti-
Sectarian Appropriations.

Institutions at all. But when the charitable institutions of the Commonwealth have come forward, and said gladly: "We will yield and comply with the enlightened sentiments of the State to-day and refrain from taking these public funds," it seems to me, Mr. President, that these gentlemen who represent these two institutions of higher learning in Massachusetts should recognize that they are not little tin gods any more than any one else.

Mr. President, there never was any trouble in the Convention of 1853 in dealing with the schools for the masses of the people. They very readily took care to make clear what they meant by common schools and they defined them as the schools for the masses. Then the trouble came because the classes wanted to tax the masses for their higher institutions of learning and control them to a certain extent, thereby going back to the old principle for which our Revolution was fought,—no taxation without representation. That is the one great principle here. We never had any trouble about our common schools. And now, Mr. President, pretty nearly every other trouble is cleaned up except with reference to these two institutions. And, without reflecting on the gentleman, in a way I intimated in the Committee of the Whole when this was under discussion before, how they worked, not improperly, to win their case. What man in this Convention now can stand up and say, unless he is kind of a holy man, that somebody has not met him in some way or other and said he was shocked to know that great injustice was being done by the noble Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute; and he hoped for the good name of the old Bay State we should not break our contracts; we should stand by our moral obligations! You all know how hard it is to resist those men. But, Mr. President, there is more than the Institute involved in this matter. If it was only the Institute it would be another question. It is the principle that is at stake. How are you going to face the people of my faith and race, who for years have been supporting parochial schools for the children of the masses because of their conscientious obligations as they see them, when you take out of the public funds this money for education for the classes?

There is no question that this institution has done a great deal of work; there is no question that both institutions have done a great deal of good work. But have the students who have graduated from those institutions had any regard for the State that has done so much for them? Massachusetts started them on their way and gave them the land and that start enabled them to go forward. What is $100,000 to those graduates for five years,—$100,000 a year, $500,000,—when a principle like this is at stake, when Massachusetts is to have one kind of legislation for all, equal rights and equal opportunity for all? That is the principle here. Then why should these institutions come in and ask to be relieved?

Now, then, the second—

Mr. Richardson of Newton: If it is a fair question I should like to ask the member from Boston in the third division whether, if the anti-sectarian amendment passes in the present form, when this subject comes up in the Legislature next year he will cast his vote and use his well-known influence in favor of a continuation of the grants of money during this term to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute?

Mr. LOMASNEY: I never make any promises like that. [Laughter.] How could the gentleman expect me, if the court says this was not a legal contract, to break my oath of office and fight and vote for it, if I am here? But you cannot tell who will be here,—who will be dead or who will be alive. Is the gentleman satisfied with that answer? [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, what was the attitude of another distinguished son of Massachusetts, the gentleman from the Back Bay, Mr. Parkman? Speaking for an institution that is ministering to the suffering, to the blind that they may see, to the deaf that they may hear, what was his attitude? They were giving up $50,000 a year, and, Mr. President, they were helping the masses, the children of the masses, restoring the sight to eyes which had been darkened. He said: "We recognize the principle in this matter. We recognize the principle in this resolution. We want Massachusetts to be one united State"; and he said: "We will ask no more State aid."

Now with due regard for every one, would not these gentlemen stand higher in the public estimation if they took the same stand? They cannot plead, Mr. President, that they have not the means, because we have given them $1,766,644.66 in cash besides the land.

Mr. WASHBURN: I have heard it said that the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has now an abundant income. I telephoned the treasurer yesterday and he told me that he was borrowing money now to pay running expenses, and further than that I may add that the demands of the war are so likely to deplete the rolls of scholars that the income from tuition is likely to be seriously interfered with. I do not like to suggest these collateral questions, but I must,—and I acknowledge the courtesy of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney),—I must see, as far as I can, that the Convention receives a correct impression of the facts.

Mr. LOMASNEY: I also am familiar by reading the papers with the fact that there is a probability if not a certainty that they will get the revenue from the McKay millions. Where will they be then? Mr. President, there are these great men whom they have turned out, these men who are doing the work they are doing every day, who, because of that education, are not compelled to work in the mills, not to be stenographers, not to be lawyers, but maybe electrical engineers, and at the head of those great industries and activities that produce millions because of their brains. What one of those men is not going to be grateful to his mother, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, that nursed him in his youth, that gave him his education? Why, you know, sir, that the reason they do not get the McKay millions at once is because of the rivalry between the two institutions, that the Technology boys say: "We don’t want another institution to take us in; where would we be? We stand for the M. I. T." That is the reason that they are working every day to keep their institution alive with their contributions, because Massachusetts boys in my opinion are not ungrateful, and there is no graduate of that institution in my opinion who would not fight if the integrity of the institution was attacked. And if you put it up to them in this light: "It was a case of principle, we all had to yield something, we all were giving something for the common good," I think their sense of patriotism would cause them to rise and say: "We will contribute the $100,000 a year." Five hundred thousand dollars, I think, is the total. If they did not, Mr. President, I should be compelled to say against my will that they are somewhat ungrateful. But I am not going to charge them with that now.

Now, Mr. President, the other gentleman's amendment. [Referring to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bryant of Milton.] He says: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the appropriation. . . ." And he wants us to believe that he is not changing the contract. Is not that a change of the contract? "Nothing herein contained shall prevent the appropriation and payment. . . ." Is not that a change of the contract? I am no lawyer, but it does not take much knowledge of law to see that that changes the entire question. Of course it changes the entire question. You cannot, Mr. President,—well, just a second; I hate to read from these books, but law is law. [Laughter.] The 1917 Manual, page 11, Constitution of the United States, Article I, Section 10 says:

No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Do you want any better law than that? "Shall not pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." What does he want to substitute? That the Massachusetts Legislature,—let me get the exact words:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the appropriation and payment to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. . . .

Is not that a lawyer's contract, all written his own way? Has he any regard for the straight question there? Of course he has not. There is the straight law. No State shall pass any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." The Constitution of the United States does not allow you to do it. If you wanted to do it you could not do it. Their rights are safe. What is the danger, Mr. President? Let them go to the Legislature, ask them and put it up to them. It is an important question, Mr. President. It ought to be settled. And mind you, Mr. President, the gentleman from Worcester says he is satisfied it is a contract. The United States Constitution says you cannot pass a law impairing a contract. Then what are they here for? They are trying to get another twist on the rope, trying to get another twist of the halter to be surer. Of course you must defeat the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) which says "you shall not prevent them," and also the other amendment which says "shall in any way"—both trying to do the same thing; only the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) goes further, because I believe under his amendment they could come in at the end of the five years and have an even chance for asking some more of the people's money.

Now, Mr. President, I hope I have not taken up too much time, but here is what the figures show: The figures show that this Massachusetts Institute of Technology, as I said, has received $1,766,644.66 of the public money of Massachusetts. Now that is a nice sum of money. The Worcester Polytechnic Institute has received $575,000. Now, Mr. President, our direct debt is about $30,500,000. We have paid to these two institutions a couple of millions. That is going some. Mr. President, there is a principle at stake now. I claim that in view of the present situation in Massachusetts the gentlemen representing these two institutions should be fair; they should rise to the occasion and say: "We recognize the condition. We believe we have a contract. We will do nothing to stop the passage of this amendment and we will leave our case to the courts." Because, Mr. President, they drew, mind you, this resolve themselves. They came before the Legislature with a petition. The Legislature did not send for them. They came to the Legislature with a petition. They drew the resolve, they made the form, they presented it, they submitted the facts and the Legislature took their resolve and passed it in the form as they gave it.

I submit, Mr. President, with all due regard for the legal side of this question, with all due regard for the moral side of this question,—because, it is very easy to use the words "moral obligation" with other men's money,—you have a right to pay your moral obligations with your own money, but you should go slow when you pay moral obligations with the people's money. You should treat the people's money just the same as you should the money of a trust estate, because in a sense you are trustees, and what man having a trust estate could put down on his return: "I paid out $20,000 for a moral obligation"? I question if the men in this Convention who handle large properties or lawyers who direct them would justify that. We should treat this case just the same and no differently between the State and these institutions as between man and man, because man to man all joined together is the State. And I say, Mr. Président, that the amendments offered by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) and the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) go further than they claim they do. They absolutely take the stand that these institutions shall be exempted from this amendment, and that is why I say the amendments should not prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. Feurer of Northampton: It is furthest from my mind to interject any arguments against this resolution at the present time for the purpose of delay and it is only after due deliberate and careful consideration of this most important matter that I have decided to vote against the proposition contained in the so-called Curtis resolution. It probably will make no difference in the vote of this Convention as to whether or not I am so opposed, and it possibly may seem presumptuous on my part to enter my objections as against the arguments of such able and conscientious gentlemen who here so eloquently and clearly set forth their reasons why this Convention should pass this resolution to be submitted to the people for their approval as an amendment to the Constitution. But, sir, it is my privilege as a member of this Convention, representing the Second Congressional District, to present my reasons for taking issue with them on this most important resolution. I am more proud to-day to represent that district after hearing the eloquent and able remarks on the initiative and referendum made by my friend, a member of our delegation, in the third division, Mr. Churchill of Amherst. I believe, Mr. President and gentlemen, that our people of western Massachusetts are willing to pay him a tribute and I extend to him not only my own congratulations but the congratulations of the people of western Massachusetts. It is a great honor and privilege to sit in this Convention among so many distinguished men.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

It is also a very great responsibility which one carries. For not only must one keep pace if possible with the distinguished gentlemen, but one must be able also to decide, as a representative of the people, what he thinks is best for them in the way of amendment to the Constitution for their approval or disapproval by popular vote, — and there comes the great test.

I have listened with great care to what the distinguished gentlemen have said in regard to this matter and at no time have I heard from the lips of any one of them that there had been or has been any abuse of privilege under the Constitution, as it now stands, in the way of reckless and careless expenditure of moneys given by the Legislature to educational or charitable institutions which have received these benefits. They say that some $15,000,000 have been appropriated by the Legislature for such purposes, — what of that? Has one cent been expended carelessly or recklessly? I ask the Convention this question. If the answer is in the negative, then it seems to me that the system is not wrong and although millions have been spent, the results have been commensurate with the benefaction. But they say, although they do not begrudge the money and that none has been expended recklessly or carelessly, they are afraid that certain sectarian institutions will make a raid upon the public treasury and swamp the Legislature with requests for aid for their separate institutions.

I believe in a representative democracy and the Legislature as a fair and honest representation of the people. Some people harp upon and criticize its action, and some people say it is subject to prejudice and narrow-mindedness and that it lacks discretion; but I do not believe this. Great questions have been settled fairly and on the merits of the case. Can it be shown that in this case the Legislature has betrayed its trust? If the only reason for the passage of this resolution is that we are afraid of a raid on the public treasury through vote of the Legislature, I submit that this Convention should not give it a serious thought. Let us meet the issue fairly and squarely and not make any compromise. It is no question for compromise, and if the learned gentlemen think that the people will support such a compromise as is offered, I submit that they may be mistaken in their views.

Generally speaking, it will affect numberless institutions throughout the Commonwealth, which have been receiving aid and doing an infinite amount of good. Do you wish to cripple these institutions just because you are afraid some particular sect or creed is going to ask for aid? If they ask for it and are worthy, extend the hand of the Good Samaritan for the purpose of helping worthy persons who are in need and distress along the stony path of life. It makes no difference to me whether these institutions have my way of religious belief or not. I believe all religions do good. If you did not have them you would have to create a military power greater than Germany to-day (and God grant that such a thing never will happen). These institutions depend upon the aid and protection of this Commonwealth. This Commonwealth had inculcated into the minds of its people that these institutions would be fostered and protected forever. Do not cripple them now by withdrawing assistance. Many will have to close the doors of education and charity if you do. If ever we needed their help, it is to-day.

Speaking for my constituency, which includes many cities and towns which have these institutions, I humbly submit that they are opposed to this resolution because of the adverse results. Particularly speaking, Northampton, my home city, would be hard hit if this resolution passes. Smith’s Agricultural School, a vocational school, may come under it. I will not say that it does, but a sentence, word, or even punctuation, might deprive this great institution of over $15,000 of State and city money. Deerfield Academy, Hopkins Academy of Hadley, Springfield Museum, The Farm Bureau just established in all four western counties, and others too numerous to mention. Think twice before you vote for this resolution. Let your good judgment prevail. Cast aside all prejudice and rancor, all narrow-mindedness as far as religion is concerned, and leave it to your Legislature under the Constitution as it now stands to use discretion and good judgment in giving funds to aid institutions which come under this resolution, of whatsoever religion or charity they may represent.

Mr. President, I trust this resolution will be rejected, and that the Convention will take these remarks in the spirit in which they are offered, with the assurance that I have at heart only the best interests and welfare of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. Brackett of Arlington: Mr. President [applause], — I had no idea that this subject was coming up to-day and am therefore poorly prepared to speak upon it, as I intended to do when it was reached. My remarks accordingly will have to be impromptu.

I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant). If we do not adopt it we are liable to raise difficult questions, which we ought to avoid. What is the effect of a constitutional amendment upon a valid law already passed? We can, of course, by an amendment regulate future legislation. We can say what the Legislature may do or what it shall not do hereafter, but can we by a constitutional amendment annul a law which the Legislature had the constitutional right to enact at the time it enacted it and under which rights have arisen which would be affected by such an amendment? Such questions should be prevented, if possible, and to prevent them in this case we should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Milton.

I do not support that amendment in any spirit of favoritism to the institutions to which it relates. I have no connection with them. The payments to them which have been authorized should not be regarded in any sense as charities. These two institutions are doing a great work and one which is of the highest importance to our industries and hence are entitled to our favorable consideration. In this connection consider for a moment the industrial condition of Massachusetts. We are losing, and to a large extent already have lost, that supremacy in manufacturing which the Commonwealth formerly enjoyed. At the south cotton mills are increasing, being built up largely with Massachusetts capital, and are entering into competition with our own factories in the cotton industry. In this competition they have certain advantages over us on account of their location. They are nearer where the raw material is produced, nearer the coal mines, and therefore the expense for transportation of raw material and coal is less than that which the manufacturers of Massachusetts have to bear. The cost of production accordingly being less, they can sell their products at a lower price, which of course gives them an advantage.

Now, what is Massachusetts to do to offset this advantage? The effort should be made to produce by the greater technical skill of our people a class of fabrics which will bear the same relation to those made in other States which imported fabrics bear to home-made. You know that imported goods always command a higher price than domestic. Why is this? It is because of their superior quality, due to the greater technical skill of those engaged in their manufacture. And one of the industrial aims of Massachusetts should be to so educate her people that our manufactured products shall be as superior in quality to those of other States as foreign goods are to those made at home, so that by reason of that superiority they can be sold to people who want the best and will pay a higher price for fabrics bearing the stamp "made in Massachusetts" than for those made elsewhere. Ask any intelligent manufacturer of the Commonwealth as to his opinion of the work in this direction which is being done by these two institutions and he will tell you that it is of the greatest value to the industries of Massachusetts in providing that needed education. For these reasons we should be very careful, in acting upon the resolution before us, not to do anything which in any way will narrow the scope or lessen the efficiency of that work and thereby impair the industries which we all are interested in promoting. [Applause.]

Mr. Boyd of Deerfield moved the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: I ask the Convention to give me, as a sincere advocate of the main principle of the Curtis amendment, an opportunity to go on record as in favor of the proviso embodied in the amendment moved by the delegate from Milton (Mr. Bryant). I want particularly to have the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) hear the reason which I give. My relations with him and with the chairman of this committee (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) have been very pleasant and each one of them will tell you that from the beginning I have earnestly supported the broad principles of their amendment; so that in what I say I speak as one in harmony with their general ideas.

Now the gentleman from Boston in the third division said the other day that if we once begin to let down the bars there is no knowing where we will end. That is a perfectly just statement so far as it relates to any exception that is intended to be permanent in its operation. Such is the nature of the exception moved by the delegate from Deerfield (Mr. Boyd), and therefore I shall oppose the adoption of that and I shall stand firm with the committee in its desire,—in its purpose,—to defeat all amendments which operate as permanent exceptions to the broad principles of the resolution. But such is not the fact with regard to the amendment to which I am speaking.
The delegate from Boston says that there is a principle involved here. Would it not be a more accurate statement, gentlemen of the Convention, to say that there are two principles involved here side by side? Now what are those principles? On the one hand it is the principle of the amendment itself, to prohibit hereafter the use of public funds for private purposes; but alongside that question, if you please, there is involved also the principle of the Commonwealth's standing by its agreement. Now I do not care whether that with which we are dealing is a contract protected by the United States Constitution or whether it is not. The result, in either case, would be the same, so far as my vote on this question is concerned. In the commercial world we have what we term as "gentlemen's agreements." Now, sir, this is at least a gentlemen's agreement. I am inclined to think myself that it is doubtful whether what has taken place between the Commonwealth and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology constitutes a binding contract; but as I say, it is at least a gentlemen's agreement and creates a moral obligation. Therefore the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) should understand, and we should all understand, that there are two principles involved here side by side: On the one hand, the broad principle of the amendment; on the other hand, the question whether the Commonwealth shall stand by its moral obligations. And for that reason, Mr. President and gentlemen, I hope that we shall vote in favor of this proviso, which, as I have said, is not in its nature permanent; it is simply to go on two or three years, for a few years, until the obligation is performed, and then we shall come permanently under the operation of this great new principle which this amendment seeks to place in the fundamental law of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Morton of Fall River moved the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: Let me ask my distinguished friend from Fall River whether he would accept, as a modification of his amendment, the substitution of the word "obligations" for the word "contract."

Mr. Morton: Mr. President, I accept the modification suggested by my distinguished friend from Wellesley.

Mr. Swig of Taunton: I should like to amend that by placing the word "legal" before the word "obligations."

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: If the gentleman from Fall River will accept the word "legal" before "obligations," the committee on Bill of Rights is very glad indeed to accept his amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Morton: I do not know, Mr. President, whether you understood me to accept, as I intended to, the introduction of the word "legal", — "legal obligations."

Mr. George of Haverhill moved the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Bryant: I know that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Fall River, as amended, is intended to accomplish exactly what I have intended to accomplish, but my only objection to it is that it still leaves the question open; it has to be proved in the courts.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS. 137

as to whether there is a contract or not; it still obliges these institutions to go possibly to the Supreme Court of the United States to obtain their rights under this amendment. Consequently there is the consideration that if this is not a legal contract it is nevertheless in the nature of a moral obligation. I am inclined, Mr. President, to accept the amendment. [Applause.] I have offered this mainly and almost entirely to protect the good faith of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and as it seems to be the opinion of gentlemen for whose opinion I have great respect that this does accomplish the purpose which I have been aiming at, I will give notice, Mr. President, that I am happy to accept the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Bryant withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: I should like a little better understanding of this matter. It seemed to me the good faith of Massachusetts was enlisted in a way, where we were doubtful whether it was a contract or whether it was a moral obligation, or, as the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Clapp) has said, a gentlemen’s agreement. Now, we still are in doubt as to whether it is a contract or whether it is what he calls a gentlemen’s agreement. I rejoiced when Mr. Pillsbury made the substitution “obligations”, and it seemed to me that meant the whole case. Why not leave it “obligations”? Then somebody makes a motion to amend by putting in the word “legal”. Well, now, do they not get it right back into a contract again? “Legal obligation”; a contract! Is a legal obligation anything but a contract? Well, Mr. President, I do not think we ought to have that amendment “legal”. It is an obligation. The good faith of the Commonwealth is pledged, but none of us seems to know whether it is a contract or not. If it is not a contract, then the Massachusetts Institute of Technology does not get the money, and the good faith of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is impugned all over the United States. I may be wrong. I have not an exact knowledge as to the force of the expression “legal obligation”, but it does seem to me that we are simply putting this right back where the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) had it in the first place, and we are not giving anything that the gentlemen are asking for in this amendment. I do not know as I understand it. I would like to understand it better, perhaps, but as I do understand it we are giving up the whole case absolutely if we put in that word “legal”.

Mr. Lomasney moved that the resolution be amended by inserting before the word “agents”, at [G], the word “public”.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: I wish to offer three amendments in one. They are perfecting amendments, offered by the committee. I move to insert in line 22, after the words “institution of learning,” at [B], the words “, whether under public control or otherwise,”; to insert in line 24, after the words “any other school,” at [C], the words “or any”; and to insert in line 25, after the words “which is not”, at [F], the words “publicly owned and”.

Mr. SANFORD BATES of Boston: I desire to have an expression of the opinion of this Convention on the question as to whether they want the “legal” before the word “obligations”. I therefore move, Mr. President, to amend this amended amendment, if it is in order, by striking out the word "legal." I think, Mr. President and gentlemen, that the position of the gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) is absolutely right. We might as well do nothing in this amendment as put in the words in the way this amendment reads. If there is a contract the Supreme Court of the United States will uphold it; if there is no legal obligation then it will do absolutely no good to put those words in there. If the Commonwealth to-day desires to act in good faith and stand by its obligations let us show it; if not, let us not put in these highfalutin words about having the Commonwealth stand by its legal obligations. If there is one word that has an empty and hollow sound it is the word "legal." Let us not be put in the position of a Shylock, who always proposes to stand by the legal terms of his bond. If we mean anything else, let us say it; if we do not, let us have a distinct understanding as to what we do mean. I therefore move that the word "legal" be stricken out.

Mr. Washburn: The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton) does not effect the purpose which I believe the majority of this Convention has in mind. I believe that a majority of this Convention is disposed to put the good faith of the Commonwealth beyond question, and, as I tried to point out in what I said a few moments ago, while I believe that this arrangement amounts to a contract with these two institutions, if, perchance, the Supreme Judicial Court should declare that it is not a contract, then I want to see the Legislature in position to carry out the moral obligation. For those reasons I am in favor of striking out the word "legal."

Mr. Brackett: I entirely concur with the last two speakers in striking out this word "legal." The suggestion of the gentleman from Wellesley that we put in that simple word "obligations," leaves it just where it should be left. Massachusetts should stand by its obligations, whether legal or moral.

Mr. Swig: The position of the committee on Bill of Rights in this matter does not need to be expounded with any debate or any flights of oratory. It is a very clear proposition. This Convention saw fit to refer this matter to the committee on Bill of Rights for their deliberation, and for days and days and days they gave their best thoughts and their best ability to the consideration of this proposition. The arguments that have been advanced here in regard to the two schools of technology were advanced before the committee, so that it is no new matter to them. And yet this committee, made up, as I contend, of men who had the good faith and honor and reputation and moral well-being of this Commonwealth at heart fully as much as any other members of this Convention, after due deliberation thought it was time to enunciate the principle that no public money should be given to any institution unless it was under public control, through public officers and public servants, and so they brought into this Convention the resolution that is under your consideration. Now, the very gentlemen who are advocating these amendments to exempt these schools do not find any fault with our general proposition; in fact, so far as I can learn, they favor it; but they want to make an exception, and they claim that while, to be sure, it is a contract, yet to make assurance doubly sure that they get the money that they want they ask you to make an exception in their favor, putting it on the ground of morals. No one would go any further than I for the morals of any case or of any matter. But how about the morals of those other little schools and libraries and museums that we are cutting out? Has not the Commonwealth of Massachusetts led those little schools, those little academies and libraries and museums to believe that if they would conduct their institutions in a certain way they should be granted certain money by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and have we not granted them that money, and have they not built up their institutions and made their plans accordingly? And now we are recommending that we take that money away from them. What about the morals in that kind of a case? Does it stand on any different footing than to say: “Well, in 1908 or 1912 we made an arrangement with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology whereby we should give them so much a year”? There, to be sure, is a definite amount. But we also said to these other schools and these other academies, and these museums and these hospitals, that we should give them some money every year so long as they conducted themselves in the way that they have; but yet no one rises here to talk about the morals of cutting out those institutions.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. President, I feel that we will do a great injury to this measure if we except these two institutions just because they are powerful and large and great. I feel that if we except these two institutions, these little institutions, these small institutions, will rightfully rise up in their wrath and say: “How is it that you deprive us of money because we were poor and unimportant and you have given it to those two institutions which are powerful and great?” Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this Convention will stand by the committee on Bill of Rights; that it will stand by the great principle which we have brought forth, and that is to give no money to any institution unless it is under public ownership and under public control. These institutions can do just as other institutions that were formerly conducted in the way that these technologies have been conducted have done; if they feel that they want the money from the public, let them become public institutions.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope, as I said before, that this Convention will back up its committee on Bill of Rights, which has given this matter due and deliberate, calm, sane consideration, uninfluenced by any pressure, or feeling, or passion, or sentiment. This committee has an affection for these institutions wholly as great as that of any other members of the Convention, but we had to report this matter irrespective of affection.

I hope that this Convention will ratify the action of this committee.

[Applause.]

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: As I intend, Mr. President, to be entirely candid with the Convention on this and all occasions, I feel bound to say now, in view of what has transpired since I made my original suggestion to my friend from Fall River (Mr. Morton), that my very purpose in asking him to accept the word “obligations” in place of the word “contracts” was to let in the moral obligation which clearly exists in this case; which I believe this Convention recognizes and is disposed to affirm, and which I believe the Legislature will fulfill in due time if it can. I sincerely trust, therefore, fearing that the introduction of the qualifying word “legal” will defeat this purpose, that the motion of the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates) will prevail.
Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I should like to ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat if, assuming that the word "legal" were left out, in his opinion the court would recognize any obligation that is not a legal obligation.

Mr. Pillsbury: If the word "obligations" stands without qualification, I think the Legislature will recognize and accept the moral obligation which plainly exists in this case, and there is at least a chance that the court would hold that action to be within the competence of the Legislature. It has been held more than once that moral obligation may warrant the appropriation of public moneys.

Mr. Clapp: I sympathize with the purpose of the motion made by the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates), but is it not true that, if the motion prevails, you will open up to recognition by the Legislature all sorts of alleged moral obligations? It seems to me that the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) treats it as though it let in simply moral obligations under these two resolves pertaining to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. And I think that if we should strike out the word "legal", we should add some limitation so as to make the proviso say, in substance, that nothing shall prevent the Commonwealth from carrying out its obligations under these specified resolves, namely, 78 of 1911, 87 of 1912,—if I have got the numbers correctly.

Mr. French of Randolph: I am extremely sorry to differ with the delegate from Wellesley with regard to his construction of the word "obligation" as used in the Constitution or in any statute of Massachusetts. I feel that there ought not to be a moment's doubt in the mind of every member of this body that the word "obligation" used in this connection would be construed by the court to mean an obligation and an undertaking which can be enforced by law, and nothing else.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to offer an amendment for the committee, striking out, in lines 30 and 31, at [H], the words "libraries open to the public in any city or town", and inserting in place thereof the words "free public libraries."

[Subsequently, Mr. Curtis modified this amendment by omitting the words "in any city or town" from the words to be stricken out.]

When the able and astute lawyer of great experience, formerly Attorney-General of this Commonwealth (Mr. Pillsbury), who ordinarily sits beside me, offered his amendment to the motion of the respected former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, I was suspicious, and I was suspicious because he never had told me what he aimed at, never had given me any information as he did the other day when he tried to lay this measure on the table; and, gentlemen, I have learned to beware of the Greeks bearing gifts. [Applause.] I do not match my skill and my reputation as a lawyer against his, neither do I match my simple ways with his astute ways. If the gentleman from Taunton (Mr. Swig) had not put in the word "legal" I should have done so, and I should have done it to save the day until I had time to see what this meant. I tell you if you do not have that word "legal" in there you will rip the whole resolution up. [Applause.] I have not got through. There are other things mentioned, other institutions mentioned in this measure of ours. There are hospitals. There are infirmaries. There are institutions. There are colleges. There are academies. If there is a moral obligation for these two institutions why not a moral obligation for the academies in this State, and why have you not opened the door? I do not know whether that is what he meant or not, but that is what he would have accomplished. My friend here, the able lawyer, also saw it, and he told you what it meant. Now, I say, gentlemen, let us not vote on that amendment to-day. Let us adjourn and go home after the other gentlemen have made their arguments, and let this committee see what those words mean. Every time anybody has put a word into this measure, every time anybody has changed a sentence, we have found he has done something to injure it, and we do not propose to allow any of these astute gentlemen to put anything over us. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Washburn of Worcester offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. BRYANT: Sometimes as one grows older one grows wiser.
I think when one does grow wiser one had better admit that he has been foolish and try to redeem his error. It seems to me, Mr. President, that my amendment can properly be offered, and I wish to offer it again. I observe from the discussion here that the object which I thought would be clearly accomplished by the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton) apparently will not be accomplished. I have grown wiser, gentlemen. I am not used to parliamentary discussions, as you no doubt have noticed, but, Mr.
President, if it is in order it seems to me that my amendment as drafted clears up all these questions. It is exactly what the majority of this Convention I believe wants to do. It preserves in two specific and perfectly clear cases the good faith of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and does not raise all these questions which might be raised by the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr.
Morton). I therefore offer my amendment [cited at the beginning of the chapter].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Newton: I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment presented by Mr. Boyden of Deerfield, to alter that proposed amendment by adding after the word "academies", in the third line of the proposed amendment, the words "now existing."

Mr. LOMASNEY: When this matter was being discussed the delegates were listening to the views that were presented by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) and the gentleman from Milton (Mr.
Bryant). The honorable former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court
(Mr. Morton) made a suggestion. His suggestion was as it was submitted to the committee. What man could be more interested in the good faith of Massachusetts and preserving it than a former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court? [Applause.] Who should be given more consideration in this Convention than a man of his age and of his standing and experience and especially upon a question of law? And for what purpose? For the purpose of bringing this Convention out of a difficult situation into which it had arrived. No man can believe that he would suggest anything that was improper, that was not impartial; and he did not.

Now, what happened? A suggestion was made by the learned gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), who is the most skilful lawyer in this Convention in putting in words that mean something different. [Laughter and applause.] There is no question about that, Mr. President. It is to his credit. It is his brain. God Almighty has given him that faculty, and he sprang his amendment. And, Mr. President, if the gentleman from Taunton (Mr. Swig) had not put in the word "legal" I was on my feet to do it, because I know the gentleman from Wellesley so well. I realize he is an old fox. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. President, when the member from Milton (Mr. Bryant) stood up one moment ago and withdrew his amendment, I felt he acted as a true son of Massachusetts and did what his heart dictated to him on the proposition. But what did the astute gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) do? What did he do? Sat there tight on the job, talking for the institution with which he is connected, in which he is interested and for which he has done a great deal of work. Mr. President, I question,—mind you, I do not reflect upon his motives,—but I question if in the Legislature under those conditions he would have done that. But he sat there. For what? Not to do what was the greatest good for this old Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Not to cooperate and give and take something for this great principle; but to get his pound of flesh. And, Mr. President, when the learned former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court accepted that amendment and with it, the word "legal," I thought, sir, that this Convention was through with that question, so I yielded. We all must yield at this time in the interest of the Commonwealth and in the interest of the principles for which we are now working, so that we can clean this situation up.

But what happened? The gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) arose with an amendment and threw in the word "moral." I would like to see you, gentlemen, trying to get him, when representing interests as he does, to talk about putting through statutes which recognized moral obligations. [Laughter.] Ah, gentlemen, some men who, like him, are talking about moral obligations! Moral obligations, sir! Now, Mr. President,—

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The President: The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. Bates: That it is improper for a gentleman to question the motives of another member of the Convention. [Applause.]

The President: The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken, and requests the member to refrain from any personalities.

Mr. Lomasney: I had no such intention. But who used the word "moral" first? Why, Mr. President, I am surprised at the gentleman from Dorchester (Mr. Sanford Bates). He is too sensitive. I did not impugn any one's motives. I have no desire to impugn the gentleman's motives. I was giving him standing as a lawyer of ability. [Great laughter and applause.] Mr. President, he has grown gray in the service. I do not see his familiar form round here any more, and I want to tell his old clients that he has still got a good punch.

Now, Mr. President, to be serious with this proposition, you now realize, what I told you when this matter was under debate in the Committee of the Whole, that these institutions have powerful friends. You have seen evidence of it all through this Convention. I pointed out to you when we started, that principle cuts no ice with these gentlemen; they have no desire to help the Commonwealth, they have no desire to do the greatest good for the greatest number. They have a selfish purpose in this proposition, and that is to fool, if they can,—but I know they cannot,—this Convention into assuming that we are going to assail the fair name of Massachusetts and repudiate our honest, moral, legal obligations. Would you not leave all those questions to the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton), the former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court? His words were good enough for me and I was willing to take them, because, Mr. President, he specified "if there was a contract." The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) said there was a contract. Assuming that there is such a contract, the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) asks: "How can we take it away from you?" And then the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton) put in those words: "and to carry out contracts if any already entered into". Who could object to that?

Now, then, sir, when he accepted the word "obligations" did he not recognize the purpose to comply with what the desires of this Convention and of the people of Massachusetts would be? He accepted the word "obligations", and then the word "legal" was accepted, making it read "legal obligations." As the gentleman from Randolph (Mr. French) said, obligations without the word "legal" would be construed as substantially the same. Now although I am no lawyer I know what precedents are, and the minute you start to read the word "moral" into your decisions is not that what they have been complaining of for years, the court reading into its decisions something that is not in the law? If you are trying to read the word "moral" in, Mr. President, put the word "moral" in and fight on this question of moral obligations, or else do as sensible men do, fight it on legal obligations. I hope, sir, that the word "legal" will not be stricken out, because if you start on moral obligations I am prepared to talk about moral obligations, Mr. President, not to a few students in institutions of higher learning, but to great masses of people of my race and religion, who, for principle, have stood up and paid for what they believed was right. If moral obligations are to be considered take the parochial schools of this State. See the amount of money they represent and see what it costs to educate the scholars, and then see what cities to-day would be almost bankrupt if these scholars were turned loose on them to be educated. I believe the State would have some moral obligations toward these schools that ought to be considered here before these two institutions that were founded and paid for out of the money of the common people of Massachusetts whose sons and daughters were given very few chances to obtain any benefits therefrom. I hope, sir, the motion will not prevail.

The discussion was resumed Wednesday, August 15.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: As chairman of the committee on Form and Phraseology I wish to say a few words relative to the amendments proposed by that committee; and I will say at the outset that it is merely explanation, and not advocacy, because this committee sits in a perfectly impartial manner, to see that the form of the proposed amendment is proper. As for the measure itself, it has no concern or opinion as a committee, and I am speaking now merely for the committee and in an entirely impartial manner. I call the attention of the Convention to Rule No. 29, under which this committee works:

The committee on Form and Phraseology shall examine and correct the proposals to amend the Constitution which are referred to it, for the purpose of avoiding repetitions, insuring accuracy in the text, and consistency; provided, that any change in the sense or legal effect or any material change in the construction shall be reported to the Convention as an amendment.

Under the latter part of the rule the committee has reported to the Convention two amendments. I will take up the smaller of the two amendments first, and that is where it changes the phrase "for libraries open to the public" to "for free public libraries." It seemed to the committee that there is a distinct difference between the meaning of the two phrases. While it supposed that the committee on Bill of Rights meant "free public libraries", it was not sure, and therefore suggested this change as an amendment.

A library open to the public is any library into which the public at the present time can go. For instance, the library of the Genealogical Society is a library open to the public. The committee did not suppose it was the intention to include a library of that character among libraries which should reap the benefit of State aid. It supposed, however, that it was such a library as, for instance, the library in Springfield, which, although controlled not by State officials or town officials, is held in trust for the public by the officials who control it. That is, the public has a beneficial interest in that library which it could enforce, and therefore the committee thought it would be amply covered by the phrase "free public libraries," and so suggested that phrase as an amendment. This phrase I understand is agreeable to the committee which reported the measure, and has been moved by the chairman as an amendment to the measure as reported on pages 5 and 6 of the document No. 347.

The other amendment which the committee proposes was so near the line that it did not know whether it should report it as a report of the committee or report it as an amendment, but in order not to transgress its power it decided to report it as an amendment.

Instead of repealing the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, the committee thought it was advisable to let that article stand, and to propose this as the forty-fifth article of amendment to the Constitution. As the proposition came to the committee, the eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution was repealed, and all of it was reënacted except the last two lines, which would have been super-seeded by the new amendment as proposed. It seemed to the committee that this was unnecessarily complicating the situation; that if the matter ever came before the voters they would be very doubtful as to what was meant by first repealing the eighteenth article and then reënacting the greater part of it; they would wonder if there was any "joker" there; very few of them would have a handy pocket edition of the Constitution to refer to, and the committee thought it would be puzzling to them and make them very doubtful as to what the real purport was, first to repeal this section of the Constitution and then reënact it. It seemed to the committee that the best course was to leave the eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution just as it stands, with the rulings and the interpretations which the court has given it, which also would stand with the article. If the article is repealed and reënacted, although substantially in the same language, it does not follow that the decisions would remain the same, because it is not reënacted in its entirety. Then, also, you save in repetition.

As the measure came to the committee most of the new matter, — and it was supposed to be all the new matter, — was in capitals; but the very first sentence, that is to say, "No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion," was printed in small print, and with no stop, just as if it was a part of the original eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. Of course it was an entirely different proposition. That was misleading, I have no doubt, to a great many people who read the measure casually, and it would be very misleading I think to the average voter. It seemed therefore to the committee that the measure as reported on pages 8 and 9 of document No. 347 was very much more succinct and better, and one that would be more likely to receive a favorable vote from the voter, and be more easily understood, than the more complicated provision which, in the first place, repeals the eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution and then proceeds to reënact part of it.

Now, as a matter of personal feeling about the measure itself, it seems to me that, as any one who studies it will see, it covers two perfectly distinct propositions. The first proposition is contained in section 1 of the committee's report:

No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion.

That is a perfectly distinct proposition. Then it goes on to say that money shall not be appropriated for sectarian purposes. I think that it is perhaps entirely proper that the two should be conjoined, and I do hope that the measure will pass. But as far as the committee is concerned the parentage of the measure is not very important. The committee acts in an obstetric capacity, but does not want to see any propositions going before the voters that are cross-eyed, snag-toothed or double-jointed.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I did not intend at this time to explain my amendment; but as it is before the Convention now, I will read a statement of the committee in regard to that amendment in order that it may go into the record for future use.

The question is upon the meaning of the words "free public libraries in any city or town." It will be noted that this is one of the exceptions to the operation of the principle of our proposal. That principle is, in brief, that no appropriation of public money shall be made to any private institution, and then come the exceptions: first, the Soldiers' Home; and then, the free public libraries. It is therefore immediately evident that the word public in this phrase cannot be used in the sense, publicly owned or publicly controlled, as it is elsewhere in our proposal, for the very fact that it is an exception shows that the libraries in question are wholly or in part under private control. The word public in this phrase must then mean founded and primarily intended for the public, open to the public, just as we speak of the public waiting-room in a railway station. The very object of the exception is to allow appropriations of public money to libraries which are wholly or in part under private control. The only reason we have for seeking to change the wording of the report of the committee on Form and Phraseology at this point is that their phrase "libraries open to the public," would allow appropriations for the library of a theological seminary or of a private college, if open to the public, as most of them are.

Mr. Boydgen of Deerfield moved the amendment printed at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. BOYDEN: In speaking before this Convention at this time and in view of the general sentiment which seems to prevail I feel somewhat as I did three or four years ago when going to Amherst on the trolley car with the superintendent of schools from a neighboring town. The superintendent had his son with him, a boy of about fifteen, who was sitting in the seat behind us. When the conductor came along the superintendent gave him ten cents for himself and for the boy, and when I tried to pay my fare the conductor said: "Your father paid for you." [Laughter.]

It is not my intention this morning, and it has not been at any time, to endeavor to embarrass the work of the committee; and regardless of what the attitude of the Convention may be toward this particular amendment it will in no way affect my vote at a later period. I wish to especially thank the committee, as a committee and individually, for the extreme courtesy and kindness with which they have listened to me during the past two weeks. But I should like to call to your careful and thoughtful consideration a class of institutions which in the past has done much for the education of Massachusetts, and which is still doing a great work in the country sections, — a class of institutions probably not very well known to most of us, particularly those from the cities. The question involved in this amendment is not one of the schools, but it is one of the towns. It is not a question of aiding the academies, it is a question of helping out the towns, which are already heavily burdened by taxation.

Now, just a word or two about these schools. Years ago there were many of them scattered all over the State, but the adoption of the public high school system rather did away with the need for them, and so gradually these institutions have become simply the public high schools for the towns in which they exist. That is, they are not private institutions, like Groton or Andover, or many of the other excellent private schools that we have, but in reality are the free public high schools of the towns in which they exist, and are so recognized by the Board of Education.

Now, with regard to this amendment. When we first put this amendment in it was similar to the one concerning the libraries, because the situation is practically the same. But I found that some people did not understand it, and certain members were willing to support it provided we limited it to towns, thereby shutting off any possibility of any aid from the State. Therefore in the beginning we say: "nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any town from raising and appropriating money." It is limited also to towns in which there is no public high school. Therefore you see there are very few towns to which it can possibly apply. We also say: "wherein no denominational doctrine is inculcated." That was put in at the suggestion of a certain member of the Convention; and whatever the interpretation of that phrase may be on the part of those in authority, whatever interpretation is applied to the public high schools, the same will apply to our academies as long as we receive any public money.

Then to take up for a moment the legal situation, — and this is the real serious part of the whole question. The State has decreed that every town with over 500 families shall maintain a high school unless specifically exempted. Those towns which are specifically exempted are those, among others, in which these academies exist, and they are exempted because these schools are of equal or corresponding grade with the public high schools. The State also guarantees to every single child within the Commonwealth a free high school education. But a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court states that while these schools are in existence it is impossible for any child in any of these towns to secure the free high school education guaranteed by the State in any other institution save in these. That is, we must send our children to these institutions, and yet we cannot appropriate any money so as to make them the type of schools that we want our children to attend. Now, gentlemen, does that seem really a fair state or condition to exist in connection with these towns?

These academies form a complete group exactly as the libraries do. They are recognized by the Board of Education as the public high schools of these towns. This amendment is limited to towns without high schools and provides the same sectarian restrictions as apply to our public schools. It does not permit of State aid but simply allows this group of towns to tax themselves, if they so vote, for the support of the only institution in which they can secure a free high school education for their children.

Gentlemen, there is a real need for some help for our country towns and we hope that the Convention, if it feels it can do so without injury to the main amendment, will give our cause most careful consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. Powers of Newton: Section two of Article XVIII provides that all money raised by taxation in the cities and towns and all money contributed by the State shall be expended in the cities and towns in which it is to be used under the order and superintendence of the local board of education. This question came up for discussion in the Convention of 1853. At that time the Commonwealth was giving very little aid to the cities and towns for public education. Times have changed within the last sixty-four years and to-day the State is called upon to aid these communities that are less fortunate in the raising of money for common school education. We have in Massachusetts to-day the situation of certain wealthy towns that are able to provide a system of public education upon a very much higher standard than is provided in other cities and towns. The disparity in the quality of education that is furnished in the different parts of the State is becoming wider and wider as time goes on, and the Commonwealth is going to be called upon in years to come to furnish money to the towns and cities where the taxation does not provide sufficient money to keep up the schools in the manner in which they should be kept up. I think it is fair to say that the trend of the times is toward establishing in Massachusetts a standard of education that shall be substantially equal throughout the Commonwealth; in other words, that the small towns and the manufacturing towns shall be permitted by aid from the Commonwealth to maintain schools of the same efficiency as those that are maintained in those localities where the taxation yields a larger return. And so as time goes on these little academies to which the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) has referred are probably going to become weaker and weaker; these great technical schools that have been established by the generosity of noble men and women are gradually going to become weaker as time goes on, for the very reason that State aid is to be withdrawn from their support.

Now what is going to be the result, Mr. President? We are gradually going to come, so far as public education is concerned, to adopt the system that has been adopted with so much success in the middle west and in the far west. I would predict that before this century closes the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will maintain a State institution, — that is, a State University, not unlike the great University of Wisconsin and those great universities of Michigan, Illinois and Indiana. And the reason for that is that they bring about a harmony in education that you get in no other way. The difficulty that we have in Massachusetts to-day is that no two colleges require the same entrance examination. The difficulty comes that the public high school finds great trouble in preparing students for entrance into all the colleges. In some of these high schools you find three different systems. If the boy is to enter Harvard University he has to have one kind of preparation; if he is to enter Amherst College he has to have another; if he is to enter some other college he has to have another; and the result is that there is no harmony to-day in our educational system.

Now there is absolute harmony in the public educational systems of the middle west. From the time that the child enters the kindergarten way up through until he completes his course in the University and takes his post-graduate course it is one harmonious standard from beginning to end.

Now the passage of this, — what is called the sectarian amendment; and I am in full sympathy with it, — places Massachusetts in the position that we no longer can aid the little academy and the private college. It seems to go partly on the theory that these academies and these colleges under private control are a business by themselves.
But I want to pay my tribute at this time, Mr. President, to those men and women who have given of their money to establish these little academies and to establish these colleges and these great universities in order that the youth of New England might be educated.
And if it had not been for them they would not have received the education, because the public would not have furnished the education.
Around these academies and these colleges cluster very tender associations, great traditions of which we are all proud; but we might as well recognize the trend of the times, and that it is toward public education.

Now, the second section of the eighteenth article makes no provision whatever for the State to have any control over grants which it makes to the various cities and towns. In other words, if the Legislature decides to appropriate $1,000,000 to help out schools in the manufacturing centers and the small towns it has not the slightest control over that grant; and it seems to me that this Convention ought not to adjourn until it amends in some way that section or that article so that the State, in the years to come when it makes these large grants, as it is bound to do, will have some supervision over the expenditure of that money. And I am going to offer at this time an amendment which is in no way hostile to the proposition we have under consideration, but which provides that the Commonwealth may have such supervision over the money it appropriates for the cities and towns as the Legislature decides to direct. The amendment reads:

Amend by adding after the word "expended" in the eighteenth line of section 2, Article XVIII, the words "or of such State authorities as the General Court may direct."

If that amendment is adopted the section will then read:

SECTION 2. All moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools shall be applied to, and expended in, no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the city or town in which the money is expended or of such State authorities as the General Court may direct; . . .

In other words, by that amendment we leave the Legislature free to give such directions as it may see fit in the way of supervision over the grant which the State makes.

Now my belief is that that is absolutely in the interests of education and my belief is that it would be a harm to the Commonwealth if the Legislature were to have no control of, and could not impose a single condition upon, the appropriations of the State money which is to be used for public education in these cities and towns. I bring this amendment to you with the approval of the Board of Education. We feel very strongly that this amendment ought to be adopted. I am perfectly well aware that some one may say: "Is it the purpose of this amendment to interfere with local control of the schools?" Not at all. The only purpose of it is to allow the Legislature to impose such conditions in the grant relative to the expenditure of this money and such supervision as the State may regard as wise for the general benefit of public education. And when you bear in mind, Mr. President, when you bear in mind that the trend of the times is toward State education and State control, I feel that this amendment ought to have the approval of the Convention.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I have understood that this proposition involves a very delicate question, so much so that we cannot discuss it with that frankness that we usually use in discussing other public questions. For instance, if we should pass a truly non-sectarian amendment, some one would feel that it hit him. Now, Mr. President, I think that I can approach this subject as a neutral. I am not speaking about this boastfully, but I have no affiliation with any denomination and I am in favor of the broadest freedom for all religious societies; and I believe that I am stating a fact when I say that I believe in American institutions; that the church is an American institution, and the American church of every denomination is stronger in the United States than in any other nation in the world, simply because it is independent and free. Therefore I have no feelings of hostility toward any religious sect or toward any church or society.

I am in favor, Mr. President, of closing the door of opportunity to inject religious discussions into our political affairs; and I am not actuated, Mr. President, by any feelings of bigotry, for it is twenty years ago this very year, in this hall, that I bolted the nomination of my party for Clerk of the House of Representatives, and voted for the man who was and had been the best State official who ever served in any capacity in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and I voted for that person because of the fact that they had brought in religious and racial questions in order to defeat a competent man, and that was used purely for political purposes.

At a later date, Mr. President, I opposed a resolve that was offered on a petition for the benefit of Carney Hospital. I did not oppose that because it was Carney Hospital, and I did not oppose it on the ground that my friend from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) said the other day that he supported it. He said he supported it because it was a charitable institution. So it is. I was asked to support it because the man who introduced the petition had no connection with Carney Hospital, and no person connected with Carney Hospital asked for the appropriation. But the man who introduced the petition was a Senator and a colleague of mine, and it so happened that that resolve came before my committee, and it so happened that my committee reported against it; and the reason why he wanted us to pass that resolve to appropriate $10,000 for this hospital was because it was to help him get elected alderman the next year in Boston. Now, he got the resolve through and he was elected. I did not think that it was worth $10,000 to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to elect him. It may have been worth $10,000 to the city of Boston; I know not; but there was no reason why the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should pay it.

Now, the charity in that case was a by-product, just the same as the horns and hoofs of a steer that is led to slaughter. The first proposition was to get that resolve through for political purposes; and I honestly believe, Mr. President, that this resolve as it stands now is going through for the same purpose. It is purely a political proposition, and nothing more.

It seems to me that it would be well for us to first ascertain what the status of the church and State is. I understand among the functions of government, as we understand it here in Massachusetts, that it is the duty of the government to protect life and property. It is the duty of the government to afford, as we understand it in Massachusetts, free public schools to all the children of the Commonwealth. It is also the function of government to care for the poor, to care for the needy, to care for the afflicted.

Now, what is the status of the church? The church is instituted for a religious purpose. It is instituted to propagate its faith. It is true that it erects and establishes schools. It is true that it erects and establishes hospitals. But I submit, Mr. President, that when it assumes the functions of the government, when it establishes religious hospitals, religious schools, there is no moral obligation why the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should make appropriations to support schools and hospitals that are run by the Methodist Church, the Universalist Church, the Unitarian Church, or any other church, and I believe that it is time for us to pass a resolve that really means what it says.

It has been said that this is such a delicate question that we cannot do things here without offending people. I want to call your attention to what was done in the State of Maryland. Maryland is a religious State, but they have had difficulties, they have had troubles; and many years ago those people in Convention, and the people at large, had the courage to treat the situation, and they treated it more radically than we intend to treat it, but they treated it in a way, as they thought, which would prove efficacious. The Constitution of Maryland, Article 3, Section 11, provides:

No minister or preacher of the Gospel, or of any religious creed or denomination, and no person holding any civil office of profit or trust under this State, except justices of the peace, shall be eligible as Senator or Delegate.

Now, Mr. President, the late William Paret, the great Episcopal bishop in the State of Maryland, did not think that was directed against him or his religion. Bishop Wilson, the bishop of the Methodist Church, did not think that was directed against him or his religion. That great American who has done more to help sustain American institutions than any other man living in this country, James Cardinal Gibbons, did not think that it was directed against him or his religion. It was thought that by passing that resolve, as strange as it may seem to us, it would eliminate the possibility of acrimonious discussions in the Legislature, which would be most harmful, as it had proved to be most harmful in the early history of the State.

Mr. President, other States have taken this matter up, and let me show you how they deal with this proposition. Arizona has an article in its Constitution which reads like this:

No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or to the support of any religious establishment.

Florida provides:

No preference shall be given by law to any church, sect or mode of worship, and no money shall ever be taken from the public treasury directly or indirectly in aid of any church, sect or religious denomination, or in aid of any sectarian institution.

Georgia provides:

No money shall ever be taken from the public treasury, directly or indirectly, in aid of any church, sect or denomination of religionists, or of any sectarian institution.

Indiana provides:

No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution.

Mississippi provides:

No law granting a donation, or gratuity, in favor of any person or object shall be enacted, except by the concurrence of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature, nor by any vote for a sectarian purpose or use.

Nevada provides:

No public funds of any kind or character whatever, State, county, or municipal, shall be used for sectarian purposes.

New Hampshire provides:

No money raised by taxation shall ever be granted or applied for the use of the schools or institutions of any religious sect or denomination.

And there are other States. I will not undertake to read them, but I want to call your attention to them because there are States which have had the courage to take this question up and deal with it and apply a remedy which lasts forever.
As I understand it, Mr. President, there were two propositions that came into this Convention. One was an anti-sectarian amendment, and another an amendment which sought to prevent the appropriation of any public money to non-sectarian institutions. In other words, because there was a public demand for an anti-sectarian amendment, they immediately said that there must be a demand for an amendment which should prohibit the passage of any law appropriating money for any other institution.

Now, Mr. President, I do not understand that that is the case, and I do not understand that there is any public demand for the resolution before us. I do not understand that there was a single human being who came before the committee on Bill of Rights and said that the textile schools ought not to receive aid from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I do not believe there was a single person who came before the committee on Bill of Rights and said that the ten agricultural counties in this State should not have the right to pass appropriations to promote agriculture. I do not believe that there was anybody who came before that committee who raised the slightest question against continuing the present contract with the Worcester Polytechnic Institute or the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I do not believe there was a single person who came before the committee and offered the slightest objection to allowing these towns that are so poor that they cannot erect and maintain a public high school to contribute to the expense of those scholars attending higher institutions of learning, such as the academies that have been mentioned in this debate; and I am quite sure that nobody came here to ask us to refuse to permit appropriations to be made to support public libraries.

Now, I have sought to divide this proposition. If you will look at the Convention Document No. 341, — the one that I propose, — that refers to the first part of the proposition, which deals entirely with the sectarian amendment. I have sought to amend Article XI, which was an amendment of Article III of Part 2 of the Bill of Rights. This proposed resolution which is before you does not amend the Bill of Rights. There is nothing in the Bill of Rights that says anything about schools, there is nothing in the Bill of Rights that says anything about infirmaries or hospitals or colleges. That deals with a proposition entirely outside the Bill of Rights. The proposal before us seeks to round up everything there is outside the Bill of Rights.

Now, my proposition is to divide this question. Let us meet this question by amending Article XI, which is practically the same as now, except the last dozen lines; and then, at a later day, I have given notice that I shall move to substitute document No. 340 for the report "leave to withdraw" on document No. 263. Then all these other questions, — the question of institutions, the question of colleges, the question of agriculture, — can be taken up and discussed on their merits without bringing in any question that affects religion. It seems to me that we ought to do this, and the people are entitled to have this done. If you will look at Rule 43 you will see it provides that any member of this Convention can ask to have a question divided if the question is divisible. Why? So that we can have an intelligent method of voting. But when we put these two questions up to the public the people have no right to ask to have this question divided. They have got to take the whole or nothing. It seems to me that they are entitled to this; and I should not object, Mr. President, if this entire question could go in two forms. Let them vote on the sectarian question, and then let them vote on the question of whether or no they want to stop all appropriations for all institutions, sectarian and non-sectarian alike.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

While this proposed resolution does a great many things, it leaves a great many things open. Among the statements that have been made is the statement that it would take religion out of politics. I presume there are members of this Convention who actually believe that under this resolution we cannot make an appropriation for a sectarian institution. That is not true. Let us read section 3:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Commonwealth, or any political division thereof, from paying to privately controlled hospitals, infirmaries, or institutions for the deaf, dumb or blind not more than the ordinary and reasonable compensation for care or support actually rendered or furnished by such hospitals, infirmaries or institutions to such persons as may be in whole or in part unable to support or care for themselves.

Now, I understand that under this proposal it is possible for the Legislature of this Commonwealth to pass an appropriation that will cover the expenses of a hundred patients at the New England Baptist Hospital in Brookline, at the rate of $10 a week per patient if that is a reasonable rate. I am going to ask one of the most intelligent men in this body if I am correct, and I want to ask the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) to say whether I am correct or not. [A pause.] He does not want to admit it now, but he has heretofore.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I should like to ask the gentleman, Mr. President, through you, is it not true that those patients must be public charges, in need of public assistance, and cared for under the most advantageous conditions, under that section of the resolution?

Mr. George: I am not arguing the question of service. I say that this opens the whole question again, so that St. Luke's and St. Mark's hospitals and other sectarian hospitals can receive State aid and municipal aid if the Legislature so provides. So that every time a man is a candidate for public office the proposition will come up to him: "Are you in favor of appropriating public money to sectarian institutions?" and it will be more in politics than it has been in the past.

I think I am right. I believe that this opens the door; and, as one of the most brilliant lawyers in this State recently said, as it was quoted here some time ago, when this matter was up for discussion, it not only let down the bars but it invited them in.

This means the adoption of what is called the New York system. Let us see what they did over in New York last year, or in 1915, which is the latest report that I have been able to get. It is for the year ending September 30, 1915, and I am reading from the Forty-ninth annual report of the State Board of Charities of the State of New York. The cities and towns throughout the State, and the State itself, appropriated for private institutions, mostly sectarian in character, $10,030,745.82. That was $3,287,285 more than the Commonwealth of Massachusetts appropriated for the same purposes from 1860 down to and including 1916.

Now that is a system that they do not want in New York, but they have got it, and they cannot get rid of it. They get in here and there, and finally they have established a system where in one year they appropriate for private institutions, mostly sectarian, more than $10,000,000.

Now I have here an interesting document. It is a "Report upon the cost to the City of New York of its contributions for Charitable Purposes," and it is presented by William A. Prendergast, Comptroller of the city of New York. He tells us that under the New York system the cost of private or sectarian charitable institutions in that city, for the ten years from 1904 to and including the year 1913, amounted to $41,445,142 and that the expenses in New York city alone increased from $2,968,437.30 in 1904 to $4,550,484.28 in 1913, an increase of $1,582,046.98, or approximately 53 per cent.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Lawrence: I should like to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to the provisions of section 3, which he is now discussing.

Mr. GEORGE: I am opposed to it in its present form, because it is unnecessary, and it simply puts in a bid for these institutions.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I should like to ask the gentleman if in document No. 340, relative to the inspection and support of charitable institutions, he does not make a proposition which is substantially the same, only that it gives greater latitude to the Commonwealth and to towns and cities than is given in section 3, which he is now discussing. I refer to the end of document No. 340.

Mr. GEORGE: I have taken the provisions of this resolution and divided them, and I reintroduced the same thing practically in the document referred to by the gentleman from Lawrence, so that when that matter comes up it can be amended; it can be changed in any way, be enlarged or limited. At any rate, it will be before the Convention for their consideration.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I should like to ask the gentleman if he wants that matter considered on its merits separately from this, why, in document No. 340, he combines it with other propositions which are bound to be objectionable to the great majority of this Convention?

Mr. GEORGE: I understand why I did it. We have in this Commonwealth something like nine hundred public institutions. They are doing a public work. Those institutions have been founded by the wealth left by the citizens of this State to establish certain hospitals and other institutions that do a great public work. Now, their property is not taxed, although their assets represent a valuation of $125,-000,000. I think that they are spending something like $16,000,000 a year in various ways for the public welfare. Now, I am one of those who believe, Mr. President, that those institutions ought to be inspected by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and that was so over in New York until the Court of Appeals of New York upturned the system by rendering an adverse decision by a majority of one vote.

Now, this detailed statement of expenditures, covering the period from 1904 to 1913, is very interesting, because the proportion that is given out to the various institutions depends, I fancy, in large measure upon the number of votes there is behind it. I see that one institution gets $13,000 in ten years, another $75,000, another gets $13,225; I do not think they had many votes. Still another gets $85,000. I see that certain other institutions, one, for instance, receives in ten years $782,853.05, another receives $1,088,772.12, another receives $1,006, 094.20, another $1,010,580.79, still another $1,560,545.71. These are paid for at regular rates by the week, the same as is proposed in this resolution. Then I find another institution received $2,855,856.85; still another received $3,267,461.51 and so on according to standing and influence.

Now, if you should adopt that system, what great opportunity there would be for the members of the Legislature from various sections of the Commonwealth to secure appropriations in behalf of their local institutions. How the political “rodents would skip from their hiding places” with such opportunities before them!

Now, New York does not want that system. They have got it. And because last year Mayor Mitchell, who is an honest man, thought that it was not proper to maintain the high death rate that there was in some of those institutions, and that there ought to be an investigation, and because he thought it, was not proper to pay for patients who had been dead three months, they abused him, they called him a bigot, although he is a churchman, and they want to defeat him; and yet everybody now in New York except Tammany Hall wants him elected, simply because he is a man of courage. He believes in having things done right. And I want to tell you, Mr. President, that what we need here in this Convention to-day is a little courage to meet this proposition, to decide it right, and put this proposition before the people so they may have an opportunity to vote for what they want; not what the city of Boston wants them to have, not what a coterie of people in the city of Boston wants them to have. I say that they are entitled to it.

Therefore I have offered this resolution, in order to bring it before this Convention. And in view of what has been said round about the corridors, I want to say, Mr. President, that I have not asked anybody to vote for my resolution, and I care not whether they do or not. I know that I am going to. I am going to submit it to you, and I want you to exercise your own judgment, and I do not want you to be influenced by any of the reasons given to the effect that this is a complete remedy to take religion out of politics, because in my judgment it is putting religion back into politics a great deal worse than it has been for the last 25 years.

Mr. Webster of Waltham: I have not very much to add to this discussion; but I can say, with reference to what the member in the fourth division (Mr. George) added, at least this, — that he has spoken to a general principle, while most of these instances have been matters of special and particular interests. I think of an evening over in the Harvard Union when a certain professor was giving a reading from Dickens. It was a very cold night and the windows were all closed, the steam was all turned on, and the smoke also was much in evidence. And so in the midst of his reading he said: “It is getting very close in here. Won’t some one please open a window?” Some kind-hearted gentleman stepped up on the platform and opened the window next to the speaker. He said: “Oh, no, don’t open that one; that blows on me.”

Now, gentlemen, I think that whenever you get a proposition of this kind, on a really large principle, you are bound to find the draft blows on the back of the other fellow’s neck somewhere. You cannot come out of a history such as ours in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

dating back at least three hundred years, and not come with a heritage fraught with varied interests of one kind and another that are bound to be trodden upon just the minute that you endeavor to get a nineteenth century principle into action. You might just as well, gentlemen, stand up and face the issue that is put before us by the speaker in the first division (Mr. Powers), that more and more we tend to State supervision of all our educational enterprises.

I do not understand, sir, that the gentleman in the fourth division
(Mr. George) has added anything to the debate by his quotations from the New York investigation. The measure under consideration is not for the purpose of protecting the public treasury, but for the purpose of protecting religion. If this thing is to turn into a discussion of religious matters and church interests I should ask you, sir, not to consider the Church of Rome, of which I know very little except super-icially, but I should ask you to turn your attention to the Church of England, that I know all about from the ground up. While I have no desire to come under the domination of the Pope, I would far rather be under his domination than under the domination of the British Parliament or the Legislature of this Commonwealth. [Applause.]

We are trying, sir, to make this broad enough to cover the whole ground. For the committee, I can say that we are all regretful for some of these private academies. To my great personal regret, I find myself unable to support the very appealing proposition of our fellow-delegate who spoke this morning for the Deerfield Academy. I wish very much that we might make another exception; but we are trying, sir, to avoid these exceptions, because every exception is bound to be a weakness. We are loaded now in this amendment with all the exceptions that should be made. I do not feel that it is my job to pass a bouquet to the committee on Bill of Rights; I do not know that anybody will feel so; but, gentlemen, it ought to be appreciated that that committee nearly two months ago went into session in an atmosphere that was distinctly charged with danger, and, if we had not known it of ourselves, every newspaper in Massachusetts was throwing it at us.

Now, it is not my business to defend the committee or to extol its work, but I want to say this, Mr. President and gentlemen, that it is something to be said and something to be remembered of all the others of this Convention, that whatever is the issue of the vote in this Convention, whatever is the issue when the matter of ratification comes before the people, that there are at least fifteen men who have come out of this long debate, where sometimes we have sweat blood, with a profound respect, aye, sir, I may say we have come out of it with a distinct affection for each other. All the object that I have in making this speech is that no man should feel that in what seems to be, as in the case of the academies, a perfectly proper request for an exception, you have got fifteen pig-headed, bull-headed, obeinate fellows, who have sworn that whatever comes they are not going to allow anything to interfere with their program. Nothing of the sort, sir. It is because we have become convinced, as I regret to see that some others are not already convinced, that we have here a principle which will not divide the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but which will unite us on a basis where all except the extreme people at either end of the line will be ready to walk down the middle of the road in peace and good fellowship, and go about their business. That, sir, is what I suppose the people of this Commonwealth in general are all anxious to do.

Mr. Barnes of Weymouth: I feel some diffidence about entering into a discussion that has been participated in by men so much more familiar with its details and ramifications than I can be. But if, Mr. President, my membership, my service, upon the committee on Bill of Rights has permitted me to obtain information or to formulate opinions that may be of value or of assistance to my fellow-delegates in their consideration and determination of this question, it seems to me to be my duty to express those views to the members of this Convention, even though, perchance, I trespass somewhat upon their patience in doing so.

It seems to me desirable that we should consider just for a moment what we are trying here to accomplish. There has been much said about prohibiting appropriations for sectarian schools or sectarian institutions; and I desire particularly to call this to the attention of the Convention because it has a distinct application to the amendment suggested by the delegate from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden), for whom we all entertain so high a regard and respect. Do not let us, in discussing appropriations for sectarian institutions, or institutions under sectarian control, lose sight of the real principle that we are all endeavoring, I trust, to carry out. Why is it that we oppose,—and I think most of us do,—appropriations of public money to an institution under sectarian control? Why, it is, Mr. President, I apprehend, because that institution is teaching, inculcating, or promoting a doctrine that is not common to all the people of the Commonwealth and in which all the people do not believe.

Now, is it not equally true that an academy, a school or an institution, inculcating, teaching or promoting any other doctrine that perchance is not sectarian, but in which the public at large do not believe, should be deprived likewise of public support and public control? Do not misunderstand me, Mr. President, because I do not mean to have any one infer that these academies are teaching any doctrine inimical to the public interests. But the principle is equally clear in either case.

Suppose, for example, Mr. President, some academy or institution at the present time was teaching its students that this war in which the United States is engaged is an unrighteous war, and that we never ought to be in it. How would you and I feel about that institution receiving aid from public money, raised by public taxation? I do not mean, Mr. President, to intimate that there are such academies or institutions. I mean to point that out only as an illustration of the fact that there may be many other things, many other principles, inculcated in these institutions, that are not public and are not common to the whole citizenship of the State, and that are equally objectionable with that of the teaching of sectarian principles.

That, Mr. President, is the thing we are trying to accomplish here when we say that no money shall be appropriated or devoted to any institution unless it is under public control, unless that money is applied under the supervision and direction of public officials, who are accountable to public authorities, who are accountable to the Legislature elected by the people; so that those institutions shall teach and inculcate only those doctrines, only those principles, which are laid down by public officers and public agents under the authority of the Legislature, representing all the people. That, Mr. President, I think is what we are trying to accomplish, and not simply to prohibit appropriations to institutions under sectarian control. It is because, Mr. President, I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) violates that fundamental principle, because even though it has a strong personal appeal, even though it has much merit that appeals strongly to our sympathies, yet it violates the very fundamental principle on which this resolution is founded, and which we are trying to accomplish here,—it is for that reason, Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment ought to be defeated. It long has been in this Commonwealth, and I suppose in every State, a fundamental principle that public moneys raised by taxation should be applied to none other than public purposes. That was well laid down some time ago by the Supreme Judicial Court of this State, when a distinguished and revered member of this Convention was upon the bench, who joined in that opinion, when a town down here in the southeastern part of the Commonwealth attempted to make an appropriation for a Grand Army Hall, for Grand Army purposes. A distinguished lawyer of that vicinity, Mr. Kingman, carried his case to the Supreme Judicial Court, on the ground that that was not an appropriation of public money for public purposes; that it was an appropriation of public money to a private purpose. And the Supreme Judicial Court said that he was correct in that contention, and that that appropriation could not be sustained. There is one paragraph in that opinion, Mr. President, that seems to me applicable to the present situation, in which they say:

If the body of persons to be benefited is numerous, the greater is the influence that may probably be brought to bear to secure such an appropriation of public moneys.

In other words, the more exceptions we bring in, the greater the number of people benefited by those exceptions, the more hazard there is to the entire principle involved:

So, Mr. President, because I believe that this amendment violates the principle that we have established in this resolution, because if we adopt this amendment we shall soon find ourselves in the same position in which the Legislature has found itself, namely, that as successive proposals have come before it and it has adopted one because it had seeming merit, and then the next one because it apparently had as much if not more merit than the first, so that that has gone on and on until we find that from the original appropriation of perhaps $48,000 a year the Commonwealth is now spending nearly $1,000,000 a year for these private institutions; if, I say, Mr. President, we start upon the exceptions, it seems to me we soon shall find ourselves in exactly the position into which the Legislature has been led and the principle of this resolution will be entirely lost in the obscurity of the multiplicity of exceptions that will be attached to it.

Mr. President, for those reasons, because I believe it violates the principle of this resolution, because I believe it vitiates the very purpose of this proposed amendment, and because I fear that it imperils the hope of settlement of this whole question that we all so ardently desire, I trust that this amendment, as well as all other exceptions to this resolution, will be defeated. [Applause.]
Mr. Anderson of Newton: I listened with the greatest interest to the debate of last Friday morning and felt as it proceeded that we were losing the force of the broad stream of our agreement in the sands of a desert of minor differences. I think that we ought this morning, once more, perhaps, to go over the whole matter and to appraise the purpose and the value of the proposal of the committee on Bill of Rights.

I understand that it is the custom of this assemblage to yield for questions, although it is not at all the uniform custom of Congress, but I am going to ask that, because I am trying to present a balanced argument, I may not be interrupted for questions until the end; then I shall be very glad to answer any which may be asked of me.

I do not need to go over what I said the other day about this being a world-wide and age-long controversy in which we are engaged. I do not need to review the two hundred years of conflict in this State which finally resulted in 1833 in the eleventh amendment, which in a backhanded but effective way finally disestablished the State church in this Commonwealth. This was a great step in advance, but still in 1833 a great deal was left undone. For while it is intolerable to men who prize religious liberty to be taxed for the support of a State church, it is only one whit less intolerable for them to be taxed against their will for the support of the schools and institutions of a church.

In 1853 a part of this subject which was left unfinished in 1833 was taken up, i.e., the matter relating to the public schools, and the extremely awkward eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, which never had passed the scrutiny of a committee as far as I can find out, was finally passed. As I understand it, that amendment says effectually, though not plainly, that public money is to go to public schools only, and public schools mean the common schools of the Commonwealth. To that statement,—and the amendment should have ended there,—there was added the following phrase:

and such money shall never be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance, exclusively, of its own school.

That was a very dangerous addition. It is very difficult to find out what it does mean, but the English of it is simply this: That $200,000 might be appropriated to the Methodist denomination, we will say, and that if only $195,000 of it was used for its own schools and $5,000 for something else it would be all right. And I apprehend that the reason that the Supreme Judicial Court in its 1913 opinion divided four to three on the subject whether appropriations could be made to a religious denomination or religious sect was this very sentence, and three of the members of the Court, relying probably on this sentence, declared that under certain circumstances appropriations might still be made to a religious sect. This dangerous situation is cured in the report of the committee on Bill of Rights by saying that no appropriation shall ever be made to a religious denomination or religious society.

The Convention of 1853, however, lacked both in courage and in vision, but especially in vision. They did not see how important it was to clear up this whole question, and they dealt only with public common schools, leaving higher educational and charitable institutions entirely out of the question. And on that account since 1853 there have been various movements in this State in this sphere. Some of these movements have been on a lower and narrower plane and some of them have been on a higher and broader plane, but all have insisted that the doctrine of the separation of church and State should apply to all appropriations to sectarian institutions of whatever kind.

Now I want to say to some men in this Convention who have been so busy with other affairs, and rightly, that they have not known what has been going on in this matter in this State, that this is a very popular issue. Why, before our committee on Bill of Rights there appeared the Methodist bishop, who told us in no uncertain terms that all of his people, practically without exception, favored the prohibition of sectarian appropriations. A representative of the Congregational denomination appeared and read us a resolution which was passed by their State assembly, — I do not know just what the name of it is, — with only a few dissenting votes, in which it stood absolutely for this principle of the prohibition of sectarian appropriation. The representative of the Unitarians came in and said practically the same thing. I remember very well that two years ago in the Baptist State Convention they passed a resolution to the same effect unanimously and with cheers. I have been attending that Convention for seventeen years and I never heard any resolution in that Convention cheered before or since; but that one was greeted with cheers.

Now I have nothing from the Episcopal church, but in going about the State and talking about this matter I never have found an Episcopal clergyman who was not in favor of the prohibition of sectarian appropriations. And I never have found any Protestant clergyman nor any Jew who has not been in favor of that prohibition. And almost all of those who claim to have no religion or who are agnostics, if you talk with them on the subject, will say it is perfectly right to prohibit sectarian appropriations. I believe that five-sixths of the people of this State believe in the principle of the prohibition of sectarian appropriations.

We have a society called the Minute-Men, not a secret society; it has no dues or salaries; it is distinctly not an A. P. A. society, but an association in which the broadest and most liberal men have gathered together. It was founded by Mr. Batcheller and since then a large body of the most distinguished men in this State have entered it. It has only one object, — not, let me tell you, not necessarily, narrowly, to put through one particular amendment called the anti-sectarian amendment, but merely to put this principle of the prohibition of sectarian appropriations in some way into the Constitution of Massachusetts. Now one hundred thousand voters of this State have signed the cards of this association and at one time in the recent history of the State sixty thousand votes were cast for this principle in one of the Republican primaries and one hundred and seven votes were cast for this principle, — and I think we could say a good many more votes than that if we take merely the principle into consideration, — in the House of Representatives. It is a large, popular movement.

Now I did not believe that fully until after my election to this Con-
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Istitutional Convention. Please pardon a personal reference but I want to tell you how I learned a good deal. I never had been in politics before and so, of course, I learned a good deal anyway in a good many different directions. But I made up my mind that I would test the popularity of this movement. I had been told that there was a great popular demand for this principle and I said: "I am going to test it." I was an utterly unknown man politically, hardly known beyond my own ward in Newton, and I knew perfectly well that my personality would not command five hundred votes in the district. But I said: "We will test the principle now and we will put it forward from beginning to end." And so from the very first night of the campaign to the last I attached my name to the anti-sectarian amendment prohibiting sectarian appropriations. I spoke of it every time I spoke at all, I advertised it in the newspapers, I sent circulars heralding it all about the district, and this was the issue which finally gave me in the district 9,620 votes. Now that shows how strong the issue is when it is presented in a calm and fair manner. I advocated it as the way to a solid peace in this State, and that is the thing which I came to this Convention to help on if I could,—a solid peace in this State.

Any one who has been here in the State House for the last two months knows very well that there is more popular interest in this matter than in any other. Our hearings were crowded; we had to go to one of the very largest rooms in this building in order to accommodate the people who came day after day to hear.

Now the reason that this is a popular issue, the reason there is a great popular movement for it, is easy to understand. In the first place, it involves the religious liberty of the individual. It is a part of religious liberty that the State can force no act in the sphere of religion, and that on the ground that religion is a private matter between a man and God; that it has its seat in the inner sanctuary of the personality, and that to force a man on the subject of religion, to force him to any act in that sphere, is to force him in those things which he holds deepest and most sacred, is to violate his personality in the grossest and crudest way. And if that is true, it applies to appropriations for sectarian purposes, for the State under this principle has no right to force a Catholic to pay his good money in taxation for the support of Protestant institutions; the State has no right to force the Protestant to pay his good money for the support of Catholic institutions; the State has no right to force the Jew or the agnostic to pay his good money for the institutions of any religion in which he does not believe. I do not know, gentlemen of the Convention, how much you prize your liberties. I lived for one year in Germany and the most of that time in the city of Berlin, and ever since I lived there I have prized my liberty. [Applause.] And I tell you that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

In the second place, the reason for the popularity of this issue is that the prohibition of sectarian appropriations is just as good for the church as it is for the State. We are not opposed to religion because we say that the State shall not give appropriations to religious bodies or institutions. We are helping religion by that proposition. It has been the history from the very beginning that it has been good both for the church and for the State that they should be separate;
not separate as though the State hated the church or the church was opposed to the State, but in a perfectly friendly manner, with an understanding of the two different spheres in which the affairs of the State and the affairs of the church move.

Two illustrations of that: When Christianity had its first great victory in the Roman Empire and the Emperor Constantine became at least favorable to Christianity, in that very hour of their greatest victory, the Christians committed their greatest mistake. For the State and the church then for the first time were united and religious questions became the great political questions of the new Christian Roman Empire, so that all of the political troubles for a hundred years gathered around the question whether a man was an Arian or not. And it was just as bad for the church, for one of the first things that happened was that the Emperor went into the church council and presided and political influence began to do its work of degradation and deterioration in the church.

Here is another illustration of it: In France, up to about thirteen or fourteen years ago, the French Catholic church had been feeding out of the public treasury for centuries, with the exception of a brief period, and the result was, as a distinguished Catholic member of this Convention said the other day in my presence, that it became almost as fragile as a house of cards. When the Concordat was denounced in a way that I myself could not approve, but when at last the separation between church and State occurred, the members of the Roman Catholic church in France, a great many of them at least, thought that the church was done for, that without public money it could not subsist. What has been the real result? The real result has been that in these fourteen years the Roman Catholic church in France has become stronger than it ever was before. It has increased in faith, increased in courage, increased in independence, increased in popular favor as never before in all the history of the country. Never was such a distinct good done to the Roman Catholic church in France as when separation of church and State was effected, although there was some injustice in the way in which it was done. Consequently I wish to say that I believe that we are not doing anything against religion, but that we are doing a great thing for religion in taking the position that we do not believe in appropriations for sectarian purposes.

The next reason why ours is a popular issue is this: It takes the last irritating debatable question out of the politics of this State. This has been an irritating debatable question for many, many years, and has been debated more or less during all this time. It has caused a friction in the State which never ought to have existed. It has caused division in the State when there should have been none. It has filled different parties with suspicion when there should not have been any suspicion. And one of the most difficult things that we have to overcome in this Convention is the mutual suspicion which this one thing has bred in this State. If the men who come from communities where it has not been much discussed do not believe that this is a question of immense importance I will say to them that they should ponder the Haverhill riot, in which this smouldering fire burst into flame for a few days. We do not wish to discuss that riot now, but we desire to do something here to-day that will make it absolutely impossible that any such things shall ever occur in this State again.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

When you go into the railroad train, you sometimes get a cinder in your eye and it feels extremely uncomfortable. So you put it up here, and it is just as uncomfortable here as it was there. So you put it over in the right-hand corner of your eye and you begin to weep and feel that you must somehow get it out. You put it down here and it is just exactly as irritating. What is the matter? The matter is that a cinder does not belong in the eye; take it out; take it out! And that is just what we wish to do by our proposal, — to take this irritating, debatable question out of politics forever. In accordance with the great American scheme of the separation of church and State, it never ought to have been in politics. I hope that this is the last Convention in this State in which the matter will ever be debated.

And lastly, it prevents an unseemly scramble for public spoils. Suppose we knew nothing of this teaching in this State, suppose we were back in the old days when all things were free and open, why, we would have an assault on the Legislature for spoils by the different denominations, and you know just what that would mean. All would be on the same level to all appearances, but nevertheless there would be contentious jealousies, each trying to outdo the other in the amount that it would get out of the public treasury, and no one of them would have any real ground for its demand.

Why, then, does not our report contain merely the simple issue of the prohibition of sectarian appropriations? The reason is this: Some of our Catholic friends, who believe in religious liberty and the separation of church and State even to the point of taxation and appropriations, looking at the old anti-sectarian amendment, thought that its defining words "under sectarian or ecclesiastical control" did not cover the whole case. They felt that they did exclude all Catholic schools and institutions from public aid, but that they did not so exclude all Protestant institutions and schools, for they pointed out that some schools and institutions, which seemed to them virtually but not formally Protestant, just escaped coming within the operation of the clause "under sectarian or ecclesiastical control," and declared that it was impossible so to define them as to bring these schools and institutions under its prohibitory force. They therefore felt that the old anti-sectarian amendment was unfair to them and in a manner discriminated against them. I did not understand this when I began my contest, and did not fully appreciate it until very recently. I want you all to know the truth that those who framed the older amendment supposed it to be perfectly fair and as general in its application as in its terms, and that in the campaign for this Convention we had no other idea. Indeed I still believe that the old amendment is fair, that the point that it does not cover all possible Protestant institutions, while technically correct perhaps, is merely technical, and that the old amendment would work out no injustice to anyone in practice.

Still the fact remained that our Catholic friends did hold the view that the old amendment was unfair, and some of them were deeply suspicious that it was intended to be unfair. Some of them therefore, under the leadership of my friend from the fifth ward (Mr. Lomasney) hit upon the really brilliant idea that all Catholic and non-Catholic sectarian schools and institutions would be covered by the term private, and that a prohibition of appropriations to all private institutions would solve the problem beyond all question.

Now when I came to understand this a short time ago, what was I to do? Was it not the part of fairness and of wisdom to allow them to have their way in such a case and thus forever allay their suspicion that we intended to take any slightest advantage of them? Was it not better to cooperate with men who agreed with us on our principle, were willing to give us all we asked and who differed with us only in a matter of definition, rather than to antagonize them by insisting on what seemed unfair and obnoxious to them? I am free to say that I had other compelling reasons for signing the report of the committee and so making it unanimous, but the desire to act in such a way as to bring in an era of harmony and mutual confidence was one of the strongest motives I had in that act.

And I am free now to say what I never have said before, that the amendment reported unanimously by the committee on Bill of Rights is under the circumstances the very best solution of this whole controversy, and it is the best because it is a true compromise, in which no one gains a victory over the other, but each gains a victory over himself; in which all parties make real concession and all gain real advantages, and yet without the slightest sacrifice of principle. And it should be pointed out that a compromise of such fairness, entered into in a spirit of mutual understanding and good will, is liable to stay in the Constitution, if once inserted in it by the vote of the people. I am heart and soul in favor of the proposal of the committee on Bill of Rights. [Applause.] I believe that it gives to those who wish to put the principle of the prohibition of sectarian appropriations into the Constitution all that they ever asked. For weeks I have been looking for that supposed "joker" in this measure. I have not found it. At first there were one or two things I thought were "jokers." I asked that they might be amended and I found that they were mere inadvertencies, because my opponents,—now my friends,—were perfectly willing to amend them; no opposition at all.

Now I believe in the sincerity, Mr. President, of every one of my colleagues on this committee. I am sure of that sincerity in my own mind. I repudiate the idea which was given us by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) that this is a political scheme. [Applause.] It is nothing of the sort. Presented to you as it is, it is a monument of self-sacrifice, of the broadest good will and patriotism that has yet been presented to this Convention.

And now after I have said that, I am going to say something else. Let me tell you in all frankness that if this Convention or the people reject this best solution of this question, this unanimous report of our committee, on account of the hostility of the friends of the private institutions, it may be necessary to urge upon the people the next best thing, the old anti-sectarian amendment. For there are tens of thousands of citizens of all parties who will not rest until they have put the good old American doctrine of the separation of church and State in all its length and breadth into the Constitution of Massachusetts. The method of doing this recommended unanimously by the committee on Bill of Rights is, in my opinion, the best. Let us hope that both the Convention and the people will have the wisdom and the vision so to regard it, and that no second best ever will form the basis of another contest.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

165

But some one may ask: Do you not then sacrifice the non-sectarian private institution for the sake of settling the religious controversy? Indeed, in an earlier stage of my progress toward a larger knowledge of this subject, in the days of my comparative ignorance, I asked the same question. The answer is "Yes" and "No." It is partly true, but it is not the whole truth, and only the whole truth should influence our final decision. The fact is that we have here a new policy for the State, which, on the whole, is a good one in and of itself, entirely apart from any relation to our compromise. Allow me to show you that this is true.

When I came before the committee on Bill of Rights at the first hearing I was asked the question if, apart from the sectarian features of this measure, I believed that it was good policy to cut off the private institutions from State aid; and I could not give a positive answer to that question after all, because I was not decided in my own mind. But I have been learning ever since that time and I am coming more and more to the opinion that, apart from our compromise entirely, it is good policy for this State to give no appropriations of public money to private institutions.

Now I should like to show you that. In the first place, no school or institution has a right to an appropriation. Let us put that right down. No school or institution has a right to an appropriation. Of course you can say that they are worthy institutions. They are worthy institutions. That does not give them a right to a State appropriation. You can say that they are doing good, doing a fine work, doing a work of mercy or of charity, or of education, or of something else which is of inestimable worth to the community; but that does not entitle them at all to an appropriation from the public treasury. Why, I could make a pretty good argument here to prove that man for man, the graduates of the Newton Theological Institution were doing as much good to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts as the graduates of the textile schools. Because that Institution is a good one, a worthy one, doing a good work, a work which seems to a great many people indispensable to the highest interests of the State, nevertheless that is no reason at all why it should have an appropriation.

And I want to say one thing more. I heard in this hall on Friday that, because the State had once given an appropriation to a school, that might constitute a certain claim upon the State, as though because the State for ten years or twenty years had given such an appropriation, it was in some way under obligation and bound to do it for all the future. There is nothing at all in that either. This is a State policy, a new State policy, which is proposed here, and it is always the question with the State, a question which is to be settled by the State itself, as to whether or not it is a good thing to help this particular institution in the public interest.

In the second place, — my colleague on the committee in the fourth division (Mr. Barnes) has taken this matter up, so I pass it over a good deal more cursorily than I would otherwise, — down at the bottom of this policy there is a legal principle which he mentioned, and that is, no public money for private uses. That is inherent in the very idea of taxation, for taxation is the taking by the State of the money of the individual for the public good, and consequently the State has no right to use it for private good. The case to which my friend referred, that of Kingman v. Brockton, I have here, 153 Mass.
255. There Mr. Kingman, standing on his rights as a citizen and on this principle of which I have spoken, refused to pay his taxes levied for the support of a Grand Army hall and I believe was threatened with arrest or perhaps was arrested. He brought the matter up to the Supreme Judicial Court and the court said that he was right about it, that the city of Brockton had no right to use public money for the private uses of the G. A. R.; that they might just as well have appropriated money for the Masonic Home or Odd Fellows' Hall in Brockton. Now you see, however, that that does not settle the case, because the plea is that these institutions, many of them, are not altogether private institutions. Some of them are partly private and partly public, some of them have so large an interest in public service that we cannot call them exactly private institutions. There is a very shadowy line here, a "twilight zone" between public institutions and private institutions, — between appropriations of money for the good of the State and appropriations for simply private enterprises. And if the conditions at any time in the history of the State are such that the State makes up its mind that it is good policy for it to cut off all private and semi-private institutions from its treasury, it has a perfect right so to do.

In the next place, I want to show you the growing abuse of the policy of aid to private institutions. My friend from Milton (Mr.
Bryant) on Friday morning said that it had been the policy of the State from the very beginning, and I suppose that that is a sufficient argument for some gentlemen in this Convention. But it is not a sufficient argument for me, because I believe that sometimes it comes to the point where old privileges are abused to such an extent that the only thing to do is to cut the whole thing off, to destroy the animal by cutting off its head.

Now we have the facts that for the last six years the State itself has given $1,000,000 a year to private institutions and I suppose the cities and towns have given another million to them. That is simply my guess on the matter. And when you look at other States we see what this policy is leading to. All we have to do is to point to the figures which were given us just now by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr.
George) with reference to the State of New York. Ten millions of dollars in one year by the cities and towns of the State of New York, apart from anything that was given by the Legislature, I understand;
and he admitted in his statement that some fair fraction of that amount was given to non-sectarian private institutions as well as to sectarian institutions. And I was told, — I have not the figures for this, — that in some towns and cities of New York State Old Ladies' Homes were beginning to get money from the public treasury, and Elks' Homes and Odd Fellows' Homes and this, that, and the other, until almost everybody now is filled with the idea that if he can exert enough influence in the State of New York he can get his hands into the public treasury, too. It is a dreadful scandal, — this widespread desire to be fed and helped by the State.

Take the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The Commonwealth of
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Pennsylvania has been doing the same thing, so that it has reached pretty nearly $1,500,000 a year by the Legislature only, not saying anything about what the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh and the other great cities of the State have done. I call your attention to some of the things that were helped by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania:

The Union Home for Old Ladies, Philadelphia.
Home for Colored Children, Allegheny.
Midnight Mission, Philadelphia.
Home for the Friendless, Harrisburg.
Home for Aged and Infirm Women, Easton.
Messiah Home Orphanage, Harrisburg.
Florence Crittenton Mission, Williamsport.

And so we go on — Beulah Home, Reading.
German Baptist Home for the Aged, Philadelphia.

Some of those, of course, are sectarian and some are non-sectarian, too, private institutions which are being helped by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Now I tell you that this has become a serious strain on the Legislature of Massachusetts and on the city councils and the selectmen of this State. These appropriations are not made after a wide survey of the needs of the State, picking out this institution or that as a strategic point where there is need, and giving a State appropriation to help at that point of need. Why, that is so idealistic a picture it never has occurred to a good many men in this Convention that possibly it might be the way to do it. Rather it is done just as the gentleman from Haverhill said. Men come into the Legislature and they hope that their political fortunes will be furthered if they can get an appropriation for some institution in their city or in their town. And sometimes the institution has not even asked for it, but representatives come in and ask for these appropriations just with the hope of being elected to some office or other in the future. And political pressure is brought to bear for this institution and that institution and the other institution, and the Legislature votes away the people's money without any real consideration, in a large way, of the needs of the State or as to why this particular institution rather than others like it should receive the appropriation.

Now it is not good for the private institutions to get this State money. I believe it is no better for the private institutions to get the State money than it is for the sectarian institutions to get it. I believe that the private institutions which stand on their own feet, which proudly have refused ever to ask one cent of the Legislature or of the city council, which have determined to rely on the benevolence of the people who support them, — I believe that those institutions grow stronger and better and larger than the other institutions do. For just as soon as a private institution begins to feed at the public crib, just so soon its aims must become more or less political and just so soon politics begins to enter into its management and its affairs. And so the springs of benevolence are dried up and private philanthropy is discouraged.

I call your attention to what the Public Charities Association of Pennsylvania in 1913 said about affairs in that State. This is from their first annual report on this very subject:

For years a persistent protest had been heard from medical conventions, women's club meetings and social workers' conferences that the method of making charitable appropriations in Pennsylvania was unscientific and unjust and resulted in the neglect of the State's wards. From various and increasing sources the system of State appropriations to private charities had been discredited on five specific counts: That it crippled our public institutions and prevented the fulfilment of our public obligations; that it encouraged the development of unnecessary private charities; that it discouraged private philanthropy; that it confused public responsibility with private benevolence and hindered the development of a uniform and clear-cut system of charities; that it carried our charities into politics and resulted in gross political abuses.

This widespread but unorganised sentiment reached its climax at the fourth Pennsylvania Conference of Charities and Correction at Wilkesbarre in October, 1912. A Committee on Standards and Classification in Granting State Aid reported to the conference on the weaknesses and incongruities of the present system of making appropriations, and declared that "appropriations from the State treasury should not be made to charities under private management until the reasonable needs of the State have been fully met and an adequate system of State institutions fully developed."

And after going on to elaborate that, the writer of this article ends:

If this policy is adopted, there will remain but a short step to direct State control and administration, which would perhaps be the most logical and satisfactory evolution from the subsidy system.

In the next place, it cripples our public institutions. Here we have perhaps two millions of money in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,—perhaps that is a little high, a million and a half,—given to these private institutions when it ought to be given to our public institutions, to our public charities. A friend of mine was sent some time ago to one of the public institutions in this State. I am not making any criticism of that public institution, but I want to say that compared with the private institution which she left, it is a pretty bare and hard affair. I do not say that the officers of that institution do not do the best they can with the money, but they ought to have a great deal more money there to do their work. And I believe that if the State cannot get that money anywhere else,—and in these hard war times I do not know that it can get the money anywhere else,—it ought to take the money now given in appropriations to these private institutions and put it into the public institutions so that they might be something like what they ought to be. I do not believe that we have a right to give away money before we supply our own children with proper food. And I do believe, in the last place, that there is something in the argument that in the end the State ought to have something of ownership to show for its money. When the State puts, year after year and year after year, $10,000 and $50,000 and $100,000 into an institution, it seems to me that at last it ought to own that institution, ought to have some real property there, as well as the benefits that come from the institution in an indirect way to the public.

Mr. President, I have reached a certain turning point in my speech and it is nearly one o'clock, time, perhaps, for the Convention to adjourn. I move that the Convention adjourn.
Continuing after the recess, Mr. Anderson said:

I am going to tax the patience of the Convention only a few moments more. I had intended to take up all of the objections that I had heard to the prohibition of appropriations for private institutions, but I shall mention only one or two.

It is said that there is no public demand for this prohibition, and that is more or less true, but it is the kind of change of policy for which it is unlikely there would be a public demand. Changes of policy come from two directions: First, from the public; and, second, in other cases, from trained legislators. And it seems to me that this is the sort of thing which naturally would not come from the public until the abuse of the privilege became almost unendurable. As a matter of fact, many of the leading legislators tell us that the privileges are now abused to the extent that we ought to be very careful about this matter at least, if not to cure it at this time. One hundred and fifteen members of the Massachusetts Legislature voted in favor of this principle in 1915.

But if there is little public demand for the prohibition of appropriations to private institutions, there is a demand for the amendment offered by our Bill of Rights committee. I must say that when I go out and talk with the people I am unmoved by the opposition which we find in this Convention, and I have it reported to me by other delegates that the people are practically unanimous for this amendment as far as they understand it. They want to see this question taken out of politics. They want to see it settled according to the American doctrine, and settled right, and I am quite sure that you will find large communities in this State that will vote almost unanimously for it. The more I hear from the people the more certain I am that we are on the right track. You know I felt for a good while that it was very doubtful whether with the handicap of the private institutions we could possibly carry this amendment at the polls. But now, although we have some squalls before leaving port and although we have an unchartered channel before us and no one can tell exactly what is going to happen, I have the largest faith that with this good crew which we have aboard we are going to carry the ship through to the desired haven.

The next matter to which I wish to call attention is the fact that this is a new policy and consequently demands many readjustments and works some hardships. There can be no doubt about it. So it is with every change of policy in a settled community. When the Commonwealth of Massachusetts chartered the first railroad it certainly caused a great change and readjustment in the whole system of transportation, and a good deal of hardship was worked to the old stage lines when the locomotives began to draw the trains over the railroads. And so it is perfectly inevitable that with a new policy we must have something of that sort. But I call your attention to the fact that this amendment of ours is right in line with progress. In 1853 the State reached the point of saying: "Public money to public schools only." Now we only take the next step and say: "Public money to public institutions only." And this step already has been taken by six other States of the Union.

It seems to me that all I have to do to carry my point with the Convention is to prove it by even the slightest margin, fifty-one to forty-nine or something of that sort, that this change of policy is desirable. And if that is so, then the very great value of our amendment in taking the whole sectarian controversy out of politics will more than outweigh any possible objections which can rise.

I wish to speak a little about the pending amendments in general. This compromise which we put before you, — and all matters of this sort which really settle anything are compromises, — is of course of a very delicate nature. I suppose it is hardly an exaggeration to say that there are lines in this amendment which contain the words of five or six different members of the committee. Why, there is not one member of the committee but probably could write a better amendment than this. But this is the only amendment on which we all can agree. It is the only production to which we all can give our consent. And consequently it has the most delicate balance, and if you put in this amendment and that amendment and the other amendment you will be sure to imperil it and perhaps to disrupt the harmony which all of us are so happy to have attained.

Mr. Haines of Medford: I should like to ask the gentleman if this amendment passes and then goes to the people and is accepted by the people as a constitutional amendment, is it then under the initiative and referendum as is put forth in the measure by the majority of the committee before us? Can it be repealed and at the same time put on the ballot by any parties having the required number of votes?

Mr. Anderson: In reply to the gentleman's question I will say that of course if any one, any party, can get fifty thousand signatures they can put any proposition, I suppose, on the ballot by the initiative and referendum. I think that is a plain statement in reference to the matter, but I do want to make this point, — that an amendment like ours, put in as a result of a compromise of this sort, with the feeling of good will, with the idea that everybody is treated right, will stay in the Constitution a lot longer under the initiative and referendum than any other kind of amendment.

Mr. Haines: I again should like to ask the gentleman how we settle this question in this Convention if the next year the people, under the initiative and referendum having the right to repeal our acts as a Constitutional Convention, get a certain number of signatures and then take it before the people in a controversy?

Mr. Anderson: Well, I should say in reference to that: If the initiative and referendum is adopted we have all got to meet it, that is all, and what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. Haines: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the people of this Commonwealth want this measure or want any compromise, or whether they want a straight measure based upon the feeling that they have as people as to what should be the law on the sectarian issue, regardless of any appropriation for any educational purpose or for any private purpose whatever where there is any religion brought into the matter.

Mr. Anderson: I think that what the people of this State want is an amendment that will settle the question and settle it the longest and settle it the best; and I think very soon, if they look into the question and if they have it placed before them rightly, they will see that this is the very best solution of the matter.

Mr. Haines: It seems to me that the people of this Commonwealth will have,—under the initiative and referendum which gives us the right to appeal any constitutional amendment adopted by this Convention,—the right then to repeal our act and will voice their own feeling and will bring this measure before us next year. It seems to me that our first duty here is to pass or fail to pass the initiative and referendum. If we pass that law we have accomplished the purpose of giving the people's voice power, and when we do that we have settled this question forever. If we settle this by our three hundred or more members here we simply have thrown it open to the same controversy that we always have had in the past, and it seems to me, Mr. President, that we should settle that question first and this question afterwards.

Mr. Anderson: I simply want to say that knowing as I do the situation with reference to this sectarian controversy, no sectarian amendment will be put forward by fifty thousand voters next year if the initiative and referendum is brought before the people. The fact is that we have just before us a new era in this State. If we can do the reconciling act of passing this amendment at this time in this Convention we shall bring in an age of good feeling in the whole Commonwealth, I believe, which will be very much like the state of good feeling which we have here now in this Convention. For the last three or four weeks we have had the first fruits and the foretaste of a new feeling in this State and I myself rejoice in it.

I shall now speak a little about the amendments which are before us at this time, and first about the academy amendment. I think that there is considerable merit in that amendment. There is some hardship that must be suffered by the towns and the academies, but I believe that there are various means of adjustment and that patience and largeness of view and some self-sacrifice and some genius in the Legislature will be able to carry that matter through. It seems to me that that amendment is the most dangerous to our compromise, for with my friend from Weymouth (Mr. Barnes), who spoke immediately before me, I believe that it attacks the very ground on which the compromise is made.

I wish also to answer my friend from Haverhill (Mr. George) as I said I should in-reference to the hospitals. I believe that the third section of the proposal is a perfectly fair section. I do not believe it opens up the matter wide. It simply says that the cities and towns may pay the hospitals as any other of their patrons do for services actually rendered. Simply to pay their ordinary and reasonable charges is not aiding the hospitals in any way, shape or manner.

I wish to say a word about the amendments which I proposed as the representative of the committee, the committee amendments that I proposed with reference to the matter of phraseology—

Mr. George: I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman's most interesting address, but he is touching upon the questions that I asked. I am not asking a question whether or no it is a fair proposition. What the question was is this: Is it not possible for the Commonwealth or any political division thereof to appropriate money to the New England Baptist Hospital for a hundred patients at so much per week, say ten dollars, if that is the prevailing rate? I simply ask if that is not possible; and then if it is possible, cannot that same thing be done with three hundred other institutions in the Commonwealth, precisely as is now done in New York? That is what I wanted to ask.

Mr. Anderson: Under the third section the town of Brookline could pay the New England Baptist Hospital for care and support actually rendered or furnished to any number of patients, and so could any other hospital be served in any town or city of this State.

Mr. George: I should like to ask through you, Mr. President, if the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or the Legislature of Massachusetts cannot make a similar appropriation to that institution or any other institution for like service?

Mr. Anderson: The Commonwealth of Massachusetts can pay, if it is charged by any hospital or institution for the deaf, dumb or blind, the ordinary and reasonable compensation for service which is actually rendered and furnished under those circumstances.

Now I go on with my perfecting amendments which are committee amendments. The first amendment which I proposed was that after the word "learning", in line 22, — will the members of the Convention please take up the report of the committee on Form and Phraseology, pages 5 and 6, looking over to page 6, — we amend by inserting in line 22, after the words "aiding any school or institution of learning", the words "whether under public control or otherwise." The passage reads:

and no grant, appropriation or use of public money or property or loan of public credit shall be made or authorized by the Commonwealth or any political division thereof for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any school or institution of learning wherein any denominational doctrine — that is, any distinctive doctrine of any religious body or anti-religious sect —

is inculcated, —

that is, is taught or propagated — or any other school, college, and so on.

Now, after the word "learning", in line 22, we insert the words "whether under public control or otherwise". Those words were in the original resolution and were left out by the committee on Form and Phraseology because they thought they were surplusage and that it was not necessary to put them in. The committee on Bill of Rights do not know whether they are surplusage or not and are a little doubtful, and think it is best to retain them on the ground that it makes the matter perfectly plain.

In line 24 we wish to insert, as we had it in our original proposition, after the word "school," the words "or any", so that it shall read: "or any other school, or any college, infirmary, hospital, institution," etc. This is a matter merely of English. The word "other" is correlative. It refers to some one thing of which it is the other, — the one, the other. Now when we say "or any other school," we mean that one kind of school which has not yet been mentioned, and that is the private, non-sectarian school.

Now you see that there is in line 22 the word "school," and in line 23 we have "or any other school,". The committee on Form and Phraseology would say "or any other college", and looking at line 22 you would see "institution of learning" corresponding to it. But still "college" narrows "institution of learning" considerably. "Institution of learning" may mean academy, or theological seminary or anything else of the kind, but "college" narrows it, and so we put in "or any college". Now if you go on with this sentence as the committee on Form and Phraseology have it and say "or any other infirmary," you look in vain to the line preceding for any infirmary. "Any other hospital"; you still look in vain for a hospital above. "Any other institution"; you still look in vain for a correlative to that. And consequently we think it is good English for us to put in the words "or any" before "college".

The last perfecting amendment would insert the words in line 25 "publicly owned and", so as to read "which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control, order and superintendence of public officers or agents", etc. It was made plain to us that without those words we might possibly let in all the private institutions in simply another way, that all the private institutions might come to the Legislature and ask that their trustees might be made public officers and agents, and consequently that they would get their appropriations simply by coming in at another door. Therefore the committee thought that it was best to say just exactly what they meant, "which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control," etc.

Also I want to say one word about the phraseology amendment,—that is, the one making ours amendment 45 and leaving amendment 18 as it stands. Amendment 18 as it stands, it seems to me, is dangerous. The last clause of it makes it dangerous. I do not know why we should leave that sentence uncorrected as we correct it in two places in our amendment.

In the last place I want to offer, Mr. President, a unanimous committee amendment. I move to amend by adding Section 5:

This amendment shall not take effect until the October first next succeeding its ratification and adoption by the people.

I offer this amendment, Mr. President, in order that the readjustment which must necessarily follow the adoption and ratification of our amendment by the people may be effected as easily as possible; that time may be had for making it.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: Mr. President, I desire to move the amendment to the resolution contained in the Orders of the Day, and printed on page 2 of the Orders of the Day. This amendment, as it will appear, provides for striking out, in line 24, the words "infirmary, hospital, institution, or"; striking out, in line 25, the word "charitable"; and striking out, in lines 29 and 30, the words "the maintenance and support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts and for."

No change has been made in the first part of section 2 as amended. The purpose of this amendment is simply to eliminate charitable organizations, such as hospitals and infirmaries. The striking out or the elimination of that reference to maintenance or support of the Soldiers' Home in Massachusetts is made because the exemption is no longer necessary if the words infirmaries and hospitals and charitable institutions are eliminated. And so in section 3 there would be no occasion for the exemptions there provided, "hospitals, infirmaries, or", and they are stricken out, because they would not be prohibited in section 2.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

This amendment is in no way antagonistic to the proposed amendment which forbids appropriations for sectarian institutions. It is a simple amendment. It is directed specifically against the so-called no-aid-to-private-institutions amendment.

Now, gentlemen, I for one have had some difficulty in following the chameleon like changes in my friend from Newton (Mr. Anderson), who says that this amendment as it is now drawn is a particularly fine amendment, and that the purpose at which it aims, namely, giving no aid or assistance whatever to any private or semi-private institutions in cities or towns, is a most desirable one to attain, and he has given us what seemed to be several very convincing arguments to that effect. I have received, however, from one of my constituents in the city of Quincy a letter and a resolution which I have been asked to submit to this Convention. The resolution is as follows:

To the Constitutional Convention of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Be it resolved, that we, the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Wollaston, Mass., hereby indorse the constitutional amendment to prohibit sectarian appro-prations, No. 66, and urge its passage by your body; and be it further

Resolved, that we protest against the substitution for the anti-sectarian amendment of any amendment prohibiting appropriations of public money to private institutions.

(Signed) GEORGE M. BAILEY,
Pastor (or presiding officer).
S. NELSON BELCHER,
Secretary.

With that communication which I have been requested to submit to you, sir, and which I now submit in pursuance of that request, there was this communication in addition:

JULY 7, 1917.

Constitutional Convention, State House, Boston, Mass.

My Dear Sir:—Enclosed find a petition which I ask you to read and then present to the Convention, as it is from your district.

Allow me to take this opportunity of giving it as my decided opinion that the Lomasney-Curtis amendment will never be ratified by the people, as it will have as its opponents not only all those opposed to the anti-sectarian amendment and all the friends of the private institutions, but also all those who do not desire to see a policy inaugurated which will inevitably tend to bring our well managed private institutions under the management of the cities and towns of the State. If the Lomasney-Curtis amendment is submitted to the people singly and defeated at the polls, then we shall be just where we are now, with this vexatious question still unsettled. The only way to settle this matter is to get the anti-sectarian amendment before the people in some way. It is sure to secure a majority.

Yours respectfully,
FREDERICK L. ANDERSON.

You will observe there, Mr. President, that he states that he does not believe,—that he is positive, in fact,—that the people of this State believe in inaugurating a policy which inevitably will tend to bring our well managed private institutions under the management of the cities and the State.

Now, Mr. President, what is this great principle involved that we hear so much about? It is simply this: That the State, cities and towns may no longer aid private charities or support them in any way, no matter how worthy they may be, and no matter how necessary they may be to the public which they serve. Let me call your attention to the situation that exists in the city of Quincy. In 1889 certain individuals went to the Legislature and secured from the Legislature an act incorporating the city hospital of the city of Quincy, and that hospital was established. In that act there was a provision that the city of Quincy might appropriate so much money each year, $1,000 in the beginning, toward the support and maintenance of that hospital. Quincy at that time had a population of about 20,000 people. They needed a hospital. It was impossible to get to any other hospital; at least, there were no hospital facilities nearer than the Massachusetts General Hospital on the other side of Boston. Private aid was secured, a plant was built, and with assistance from the city of each year's appropriation the hospital has since flourished. At the present time it takes care of over 1,200 patients every year. Recently the city government of the city of Quincy went to the Legislature and secured an act which enabled them to appropriate $7,000 a year. For the last fifteen years they have been appropriating $5,000 a year.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS. 175

Whose money is it? Is it the money of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? No! You talk about preventing the appropriation of the State money for such hospitals. It is not the money of the State. It is the money of the citizens of the city of Quincy, and not one dollar of that money is appropriated except by the vote of the city council of the city of Quincy, with the full knowledge and consent of every citizen of that town. And that money, gentlemen, is necessary toward its support. Take the city of Brockton. The city of Brockton I understand appropriates each year $8,000 toward the support of its hospital. The city of Brockton may or may not be able to support a hospital entirely out of public funds, but is it well now to inaugurate a policy in this State to force the maintenance of these great charities upon the public, when we are bending every effort that we can to carry the great burdens brought upon us by this war? Is it now desirable to support an entirely different policy and to throw over all these well managed private institutions to the management of politicians or to say that they shall not exist a year after next October unless they can take care of themselves? It seems to me an absolute absurdity to take any such position as that. Is it better for us to have a well managed hospital, a hospital upon whose board of trustees the mayor of the city of Quincy sits ex officio, and of which there are certain trustees elected by the city council in Quincy, a hospital costing the city only $5,000 or $6,000 or $7,000 a year, or a hospital such as that in Haverhill, which I understand costs the city $30,000 a year? Why should the city of Boston say, or any gentleman from the city of Boston say, that the citizens of Quincy cannot support their own private hospital, if they want to, or assist in aiding it, if it costs only $5,000 or $6,000 a year? Is it connected with the sectarian issue? Not the slightest. I do not even know the religion of the gentlemen on the board of trustees, but if I were to guess I should guess there were some good Catholics as well as Protestants upon it. No question of religion ever is asked of anybody who goes there, but whether a hospital is sectarian or not would make no difference to my mind. I can see no good reason why, for instance, an institution such as the Carney Hospital should not have an appropriation if it wanted it,—if it needed it. The question is: Does it do good in the community? If it does, and the city or town wants to help support it, why should they not be permitted to so spend their own money?

Mr. Lomasney: Do you understand that in 1899, when the resolve to allow the Carney Hospital $10,000 was being considered, there were many protests made against it? Did you come forward on that occasion to speak in favor of it?

Mr. Blackmur: Sir, my answer to that is that I knew nothing about the situation at that time, but I should be very glad to come forward and speak for it under the conditions that exist as I understand them to-day. I can see no reason why any sectarian question should enter into the question of charity,—needed charity. I can see no reason why there should be tacked on to this measure a prohibition against a system of local assistance to worthy charities in the communities where they are needed and cannot be otherwise supported.

Mr. Lomasney: With the gentleman's permission, I will read to him the protest on that occasion:

The policy of paying money from the treasury of the Commonwealth to private institutions in the name of charity is a most dangerous policy to pursue. We therefore remonstrate against the proposed appropriation for the Carney Hospital as being a step if once taken that will be fraught with insurmountable difficulties by the demands of numerous worthy institutions, owned and directed by private associations, beyond the control of State authority; we most respectfully suggest that now is the time to pause and consider well the consequences that will follow such legislation.

With your permission, sir, I will state these facts: Document No. 17, issued by the Commission to prepare data for this Convention, shows that from 1860, up to and including 1899, $6,973,982.48 has been given by the State to educational and charitable institutions. Of that amount three Catholic charitable institutions received $49,000. From 1890 up to January 1, 1917, $9,902,637.76 additional has been expended, making a total of $16,876,620.24. Since 1899 no Catholic institution has received any money from the State. If the above protest against the final grant of $10,000 to the Carney Hospital was sound doctrine to apply to a Catholic institution in 1899 why should not the same doctrine apply to all privately owned or controlled institutions now?

Mr. Blackmur: I cannot see how that changes the situation in one single iota, for the simple reason, sir, that whether Carney Hospital did or did not receive the aid that it ought to have had is beside the question. The question now, here, is whether in passing the sectarian amendment we find it so advantageous and so necessary to do it that we tack on to it an entirely different proposition that has absolutely nothing to do with the sectarian issue.

Mr. Lomasney: I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that on the occasion he refers to Mr. Sprague of Quincy from his own city was one of the most violent opponents of the proposition?

Mr. Blackmur: I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that I am not Mr. Sprague's keeper. I know not whether he did or did not oppose it. In any event I am not responsible for his opinion.

Now, there is an exception placed in this measure that was worded a little differently than it is now, but the purpose of it was this: That cities and towns might furnish certain aid to people who were unable to aid themselves and who were a public charge. That was the meaning of it and that was the intent of it. Now, I am told this is what happens. Take a city like Quincy, for instance. In this hospital we have about 1,200 patients a year. There are about 300 of those patients, largely coming from the city of Quincy, who are in no sense paupers, who have struggled along in hard times making both ends meet, and perhaps not doing it quite, who are overcome by sickness and disaster and go to a hospital, and who expect and want to pay for their care.

Mr. Anderson: Does the gentleman understand that the line he refers to just now has been changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology so as to read: “be in whole or in part unable to support or care for themselves,” instead of “at the public charge.”

Mr. Blackmur: Yes, sir, I understand that that wording was placed there, and placed there at my own suggestion, but it does not really fill the bill, as I explained to the gentleman from Newton. I suggested to him a very much broader amendment, one which was suggested to me by my colleague from Quincy, but I understood that his committee was not receptive to any more suggested amendments and so we let it remain as it is. The phraseology here takes the sting out of it, to be sure, but the effect of it is practically the same, for this reason: That you have to make an application to the city of Quincy for A or B on the ground that he is unable to take care of himself and he goes on the books of the poor department of the city, because it is only the poor department of the city through whom they (the hospital) can get the money. The result is that the patient begs the people in the hospital, in the first instance, not to pass in his name to the city, and promises that he will pay for his board and care, etc. The patient intends to do it. But what is the result? Not many are able to face the added burdens put upon them by the sickness after they get about and try to make both ends meet. They find they cannot meet those extra expenses, and so the hospital bill falls by the wayside. Under the law, unless claim is made in five or ten days, or something of that sort, the hospital loses a claim on the city. There is a large proportion of the citizens attending these hospitals who never pay anything but who would pay if they could.

But this provision is not going to help the case of many of these hospitals that are starting. They need more than the actual money that will be received from time to time from each patient, or from a number of patients; they need to know in advance how much they can get from every source. At the present time the amount is figured out in advance. The city of Quincy can pay $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000, or the city of Brockton can pay $8,000, whatever the amount may be, and that money is appropriated for them and they can rely on it, and they can make the engagements for nurses and the care of patients in anticipation thereof.

What are you going to say also in cases of great exigency, where the hospitals constantly have to have additional help? Take the case of Quincy. We now have, I think, about sixty beds, but they are making provisions for one hundred additional beds in case of any disaster at the Fore River Shipbuilding Company’s works. Under the conditions that obtain now we need all the help and assistance we can get from every source, and so does every other town and city in the Commonwealth that has an institution of this kind.

I think I have answered, Mr. President, the suggestion of my friend from Newton (Mr. Anderson). When he said that politics might enter into these institutions, these private institutions that got money from the cities and towns, he had in view, of course, those institutions which came to the State to get State money. I have here a list of hospitals, private hospitals in this State, about a hundred in all, thirty or thirty-five of which receive appropriations from cities or towns toward their support and maintenance. Does he mean to suggest, for instance, that politics enters into the city hospital in Quincy because the mayor and the city council and all the people of the city together reach the conclusion, through their representatives, of making this appropriation to our city hospital each year? No politics enters into the Quincy hospital, and I doubt very much if there is any in the Brockton hospital or any other institution of that character.

We are told that a great principle is involved here. What is this great principle? We are told that it is necessary for the peace of the Commonwealth that you should insert this prohibition against hospitals, infirmaries and charities. Why, stated in one way the principle is this: That in order to be a good charity it has got to be all public or it has got to be all private. Now, that is a perfect absurdity on the face of it. Is it not just as good a charity if it is assisted and placed on its feet in these small towns and small cities where charities are needed and they could not otherwise have charities established?

And then we are told also that the peace of the Commonwealth demands it. How does the peace of the Commonwealth enter into such a proposition? Is there a demand on the part of the noble and generous Catholics and Protestants of this State or of any other religion that we should not give support to the needy private charities? I should like to ask the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) where he heard that demand. I never heard it.

Mr. CHURCHILL of Amherst: It is with very great reluctance that I rise to say a single word on this question. I want to say a word in support of the amendment of the delegate from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden), in the first place because I feel in duty bound to do so in representing a very great body of opinion in my district, and second, because I feel that the amendment is a worthy one. I should not say a word in favor, in spite of the feeling in my district, if I did not think it a worthy one. But I want to say with just as much emphasis as the delegate from Deerfield did that I have not the slightest desire to embarrass or endanger in any way whatever the passage of the main amendment, that I regard the work of the committee as a great accomplishment, and that whatever doubts I have had upon the subject, and whatever differences of opinion as regards the amendment there may be, whatever its likelihood of success, I cannot help feeling as a result of this debate that the agreement of the various interests, the harmony which has been secured upon at least the amendment itself is something that ought to make all of us exceedingly grateful to the committee and to the Convention, and that the people of Massachusetts ought to be grateful for the result.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

But I am bound, Mr. President, to call attention to one thing on behalf of these academies. The committee has laid down apparently a hard and fast principle, the principle that no institution which is not truly a public institution shall receive public funds. They base their attitude upon the fact that this is the principle upon which harmony has been obtained, and this is the principle upon which they insist when they say they cannot accept amendments. But they themselves have not lived up to that principle, and they therefore have invited and do invite, as the amendment at present stands, a suggestion as to the value of other exceptions than those which the committee has made. In other words, if these exceptions are justifiable which the committee has made, — the exception with regard to the Soldiers’ Home and the exception with regard to the libraries, — it must be because the commit- tee believe that in these cases at least the principle is not binding, that an exception may wisely be made, and they therefore leave it, it seems to me, as long as those exceptions are there, to the rest of us to suggest, — at least we have the right to suggest, — the considera- tion of other exceptions that may possibly rest upon as good a ground.

I have not the time, Mr. President, to say what I wanted to say with regard to this amendment. I am going to confine myself absolutely to a statement of my attitude in the matter. I want to call the attention of the Convention, in the first place, to the reasons which the chairman of this committee offered on page 12 of his printed speech (Document 334) for the exemptions in the case of the libraries. They did except seventy-five libraries that are not public institutions. I will not read the whole paragraph or two paragraphs in the middle of the page, but they said: “We went into the whole question. There was not any guesswork or uncertainty about it. We found funds could not be transferred, and did except the libraries.”

The committee, therefore, realizing that libraries open for public use were “of great assistance to the education of the people,” have made this exemption. There is the reason that they offer. The thing could not be made public. These funds could not be transferred. The libraries were of great use to the education of the people, and they therefore made the exemption.

I shall not argue the case of the academies, Mr. President, but from the point of view of the people in my district, where there are a number of these academies, and from my own point of view, that is all of it equally true with regard to the academies. I do not believe that the members of the Convention as a whole really do understand the position which those academies have in our system of education. I assert, — I can only assert it because I have not time to prove it, — that on the whole those academies are to all intents and purposes, except the fact that they are partly privately supported and controlled, upon precisely the same basis as our high schools, and that if you take away the privilege of treating these academies as high schools and appropriating public funds thereto, you leave to the towns in which these academies exist one of two alternatives. Either the towns must duplicate the plant at a very considerable cost both in money to the taxpayers and in education to that town, or some arrangement will have to be made which will bring the expense of the education of the boys and girls in that town upon their parents. They will become private pupils, and their parents will have to pay the expense of their education. Those schools have been accepted by our educational system into the situation, which is the common situation in Massachusetts, that the cities and towns shall pay for the education of all their pupils, and you are therefore taking away from these children the privileges which we regard as necessary and truly popular in our system of public education. That is the situation that is left, Mr. President, and it is true with regard to a good deal of the private assistance given to these academies that these funds cannot be transferred.

I am unwilling to sit down without repeating that I do not want to see the consideration of this amendment a danger and an embarrassment to the principle of this amendment, but the principle has not been carried out in the case of the libraries, though the exception may be entirely justified. There are a great many people in the towns where these academies exist who feel that they ought to be supported, and who will feel that if exception is made in the case of the libraries they have been treated unfairly. I do not say that they ought to vote against this amendment because of that. They ought not. I myself, Mr. President, am ready to pay a pretty high price for things that I should like to see accomplished, for the sake of accomplishing what this amendment aims and intends to accomplish, but it nevertheless remains a fact, gentlemen, that this amendment is intended not merely for acceptance by a vote of the people, it is intended for harmony, for unity, for a real fraternity. We want to see an amendment, it seems to me, Mr. President, which will go to the people in such form that really all the interests may feel we are thus obtaining a genuine harmony, corresponding, I believe, to the genuine feeling of the citizens of Massachusetts. It is necessary not only to carry this amendment, if it is to have its greatest and proper force, by a majority vote; it is necessary to make the people of Massachusetts feel as far as possible that it is right, and that it does tend to bring about a unity of spirit. It is certain, Mr. President, that if the people feel that these academies stand upon a different basis from truly private institutions, if they feel that they are not sectarian in any sense, nor doctrinal, if they feel that they are really, in all respects that this amendment might take into account, genuinely public institutions, they will feel, however they may vote upon the amendment, as if a means ought to have been found among men who are looking at all interests to take care of these interests too, without spoiling the real intent and principle of the amendment. Unless the committee at the same time can stand absolutely out against any exception (unless it be the Soldiers' Home, where of course it is the National government, as I understand it, with the Massachusetts government that controls), unless the committee can adopt this principle and stick to it absolutely, even at this late day, Mr. President, I think the committee ought to be willing to give consideration to this question. I, for one, say that I stand exactly where a certain great newspaper in this State stands. We ought not to endanger the main principle by exception, we ought not to urge exceptions about which there is really any fundamental doubt. Only those things that may receive ready acquiescence ought to be offered. But I feel bound, Mr. President, to say that I think if the members of this committee were free at this minute to consider the question from the start they might find it possible, upon the principles they have adopted in the case of the libraries, also to except these schools.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

There is just one thing stands in the way of that, Mr. President, and having said that I am through. No academy which does not in all respects truly stand in its curriculum, in its public services of any sort, precisely upon the same basis as the high schools, ought to be excepted. If the amendment of the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) does not confine the giving of public money to academies, to such academies, it ought to be made to confine it; but I submit, it does. If you are to except libraries because they do help the education of the people, though they are partly private in control, if there are academies that conform in all respects to the conditions of our high schools then those academies ought somehow to be given what they have had during these years. The towns should have the assurance that they have had in the money that is privately given to these academies. It is a sad state of affairs, Mr. President, for such academies, and it seems to me for us, if we could not, cannot, work out an amendment which will shut out all possible sectarianism of any sort, and at the same time keep these forty high schools which have some private assistance, as well as the other high schools which have no private assistance.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I sought this morning to obtain recognition for the purpose of asking a question in relation to a matter which has been somewhat obscured by the subsequent discussion, but which has been now revived by the remarks of the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill). I want to ask the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) before I vote on his resolution, if he knows just how many academies are affected by his amendment, and where they are located?

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: No one denies that the passage of this resolution will work some hardship to some of these academies and to some institutions. No one denies that there is a good deal of plausibility in the arguments that they put forth for their own institutions. Mr. President, we have a large question here before us. We have a question which resolves itself into a triple division, whether we shall pass an anti-sectarian amendment; or whether we shall pass an amendment which makes a change in our public policy,—it is a public question and a question of public policy; or whether we shall modify that.

We would be warranted in passing a resolution to prohibit sectarian appropriations only if facts and figures showed to us there was a sectarian menace to the State. Since 1860 we have had in round figures, $19,000,000 given to private institutions: $2,000,000 have been to miscellaneous enterprises, $10,000,000 have been for educational institutions, $7,000,000 for charitable institutions. The sectarian institutions, or institutions under ecclesiastical control in part or in whole, have received only a very small amount from that whole appropriation. Now, it is needless to go around the bush. We understand that a strictly thoroughgoing anti-sectarian amendment is aimed at the Catholic church. Out of that $19,000,000 that church which that amendment aims at has received but $49,000. It received not one cent of the $10,000,000 that went to educational institutions, and of the $7,000,000 that went to charitable institutions it received.
$49,000. It received $10,000 for the House of the Good Shepherd, $9,000 for the House of the Guardian Angel, $20,000 in the eighties for Carney Hospital and $10,000 in 1899 for Carney Hospital.

I was a pastor in Brockton in 1899, and I can testify to the popularity of the Carney Hospital at that time. From my own parish several of my parishioners went to that hospital by choice, and they had only good words to say for it; and yet, Mr. President, when that resolve was brought into the Legislature, or when they asked for a $10,000 appropriation,—or their friends did,—in 1899, there arose such a protest against it that the next year the anti-sectarian amendment made its appearance, and each year since then it has been in your Legislature. It has not received any considerable vote. I think in all the years the highest vote it received was sixteen.

We can say, then, that there is no menace from this sectarian source. We can safely say, then, there is no menace from this source, or from any other of our religious bodies, seeking to raid the treasury. Therefore if the only question before us is to pass an amendment that shall deal with the churches there is no need of any amendment whatsoever. Not only does the past show no need of it, but I can testify that the temper of your Legislature, and the temper of your State government, is such that no such appropriation would get by any Legislature or get by the Executive Chamber in any Governor's year.

So, Mr. President, the question that is really before us is whether or not we shall change our public policy, whether or not there is something alarming in the menace of private institutions, other than ecclesiastical or sectarian institutions. Taking the period wherein we have the figures, from 1860, dividing it into halves, we find that for the first half of that time the appropriations for private institutions were a little over $5,000,000 and for the second half of that time they were over $12,000,000. This shows a startling increase. Now, I want to call to the attention of this Convention that in 1911, a Governor of this State called the attention of this State to this increase, and at a conference held in the Governor's chamber, when these very resolves to appropriate $100,000 a year for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and $50,000 a year for the Worcester Polytechnic Institute were under discussion, Governor Foss stated that he believed it was a poor public policy, a poor business policy, for the State to appropriate money and turn it over to people to spend who were in no way responsible to the State and made no report necessarily to it. He went so far that there was a fear in some circles that he might veto those propositions. If any of you will go back to the legislative history of the time you will see that the resolve provides for certain scholarships to be given to certain Senators, and that there were certain other measures and promises taken to secure its passage. This claim, then, that the friends of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute make, that they have an ethical obligation on the State, is not entirely well-founded, when we understand the means that were taken to wrench those appropriations originally from the State.

Now, was Governor Foss wise? Is it wise to continue our policy of taking public funds, turning them over to private enterprises and institutions not elected by the people, not appointed by any elective officers of the people, but entirely private enterprises and institutions?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Why, Mr. President, we who have been in the Legislature know how it is. Here is an enterprise in a town that A, B, C and D, four or five representatives come from. They want to get an appropriation out of the public treasury. Another town has an institution; it wants a thousand dollars out of the public treasury. Here is another town of the same character. They come together and they get thirty or forty votes in a block, and each votes for the other's appropriation that is desired, and any one else in the Legislature who will dare to stand up and oppose those appropriations incurs the enmity of the whole thirty or forty votes. The Governor in his chamber, if he vetoes the thing, incurs the enmity of them all. The result is that there is a hold-up. The Legislature is forced to make the appropriation. Now, have we got courage enough to stop it here? The gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) said that the committee lacked courage when it reported the resolution upon the calendar rather than the sectarian resolution. Mr. President, I believe that it showed a fine courage when it reported that resolution rather than the original one.

Why, Mr. President, take the matter of the local fair, — county fair if you like. They come forward with boards of their own election; they are not responsible to the State and are not elected by the State or any political division, and yet they come up here yearly and get thousands and thousands of dollars for their private enterprise, and they have a lobby sufficiently strong that no one dares to oppose them. I have sat on the committee in this Legislature that was appointed partly for the purpose of reorganizing the State Board of Agriculture, and I saw the committee forced way down. I know that every Governor who has been elected for several terms has called attention to the scandal of that board and asked that it be reorganized, and yet they never have got very far with it.

When they say that this resolution offered here by the committee is a resolution for which there is no demand and no need in our practice, and is a makeshift or a cowardly attempt to evade something else, why, Mr. President, they do not properly understand the facts. I trust that this Convention, composed, as it is, of delegates who are not seeking re-election, will have the courage to stand here and vote in a little different way from what sometimes others, who are seeking re-election, feel that they are compelled to vote; that we will go ahead and accept the report of your committee.

Now, Mr. President, there is just one other thing, and that is this: We came to this Convention expecting to face a delicate situation and a delicate question. This anti-sectarian issue has developed in the last three or four years, and developed very naturally. As I have said, the anti-sectarian amendment came in first in 1900 and never got any considerable vote, but in 1913 this State elected its first Catholic Governor. Mr. President, he was an estimable gentleman. His record as Governor shows the people of the State to have been warranted in electing him. Your greeting to him on this floor on the first day of this Convention showed that he has your respect when you see him. And yet, Mr. President, there were certain forces in the State that felt his election was a great menace, and so that helped to the securing of a following for this anti-sectarian amendment. Now, it happened that there were also on the State ticket three other men whose religion was of the Catholic persuasion. This was a further opportunity for certain forces to see red. And it happened also, Mr. President, that owing to the Progressive political movement in the State this House for the first time in many years was divided, and that the majority party did not hold control, but was dependent upon receiving the vote of some of the Progressives if it would organize the House and appoint the committees. It is a matter of legislative history that the exigencies of political trading then organized the House. The committee on Constitutional Amendments was so organized that there would be a favorable report for this anti-sectarian amendment, to give it standing in the House and to secure a vote for it; thus, Mr. President, this issue was thrust upon us and a certain member of the Republican party ran for Governor upon the issue.

We have felt that for the last three or four years we have faced a delicate situation. We feared when we came to this Convention that there might develop a condition that would send a question to our people that would bring forth dissension. What happened? Mr. President, you yourself took the move that was a bold move but after all has proved to be a wise move. You made as the chairman of this committee that handles this matter of Bill of Rights a man who, though of the minority party of the great metropolitan city of Boston, had been elected mayor, and who had proved himself to be a popular mayor and showed that he had an understanding of the feelings and ideals of the various races, the various religions. Mr. President, you then put upon that committee some of the most active men of both sides of this question. You put upon that committee men of all classes and all religious, and you left it to them as intelligent, wise, honest and sincere men to get together, and you were not disappointed. They got together, and they have reported into this Convention a resolution that takes the whole question out of the realm of religious controversy, that removes it from religious dissension, that will send forth to the people a question that means a change of public policy and not an attack upon any religious faith or order. It seems, Mr. President, that your committee having acted so wisely, and having done so well, it is our duty, our moral obligation as members and delegates of this Convention, to support them and to send the resolution that they report, out to the people without these amendments that are sought to be attached to it.

Mr. President, it was said here the other day that the academies and that the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute had a moral obligation from the State for the continuance of their grants. Why, instead of that, they have a moral duty toward the State, in order to relieve us from the delicacy of the present situation, that they should withdraw those amendments; they should not press for them but should unite with us that we may have a harmonious and united stand in the Convention and before the people, that there may be harmonious and united action on the part of the people.

Why, Mr. President, we are in the midst of a great foreign war. It would seem that somehow it takes a war to always answer these movements that arise against the great bulk of Catholic citizens in our State. We remember the Know Nothing movement of 1853, how then they told us that we could not trust these citizens, how in the war of 1861 to 1865 they went forth and shed their blood side by side with their fellows of other religious faiths. Do you remember the A. P. A. movement of 1894, and how in the Spanish War they went forth in the same way? Now, Mr. President, in the face of this movement, in many of our cities and towns the great bulk of the young men who are enlisting to go forth and fight for this country are men of this religious faith and this religious persuasion. In my own town there are homes, and all of them of this faith, upon which a placard is placed: "A man from this household is fighting somewhere in France." Is it not time for us to rise above the level of prejudice, and to send forth a question that will not stir up our people in matters of religious controversy and conscience? We may discuss these things as delegates, under the order of parliamentary procedure, harmoniously and coolly. Such things would not be discussed in the same way in the shops by men who touch elbow to elbow and have no such restrictions upon them.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

We have a moral duty to the State in the matter of this resolution, and I trust, Mr. President, that we will stand heartily behind your committee and send the matter without this amendment to the people for adoption and ratification.

Mr. Bouvè of Hingham: Far above any question of facilitating the business of this Convention, or of being harmonious, is the matter of right, the matter of common honesty,—and that of the honesty of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am about to speak very briefly, in regard to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) and by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn). Does any person in this Convention believe for a moment, that if it never had been held, that any question of withholding from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, or from the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, the balance of the money promised by the Commonwealth to them, respectively, upon certain conditions which already had been fulfilled by each of them, and in consideration of which a part of such money already had been paid, would have arisen? Or that if, by any possibility, such question did arise, there would have been any serious attempt to break the pledge of Massachusetts, given, depended upon, and acted upon by both these institutions and their alumni? Does anybody doubt that if there was no Convention, both would receive the fulfilment of these promises on the part of the State, to the last cent? I care nothing whatever about signed and sealed contracts. To me there is no difference between a moral and a legal obligation. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts said to the people of the State, and to the alumni of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology: "If you go out and raise a million of dollars, more or less, and will agree to establish eighty free scholarships for the benefit of the children of this Commonwealth, it, in return, will give you a million dollars in deferred payments,—in partial annual payments,—to help you keep such agreement, and to do it better than you would be able to without such payments." The Institute of Technology raised the million dollars; it agreed to establish the scholarships, and did so, and it is now giving free instruction to eighty young men in fulfilment of its promise. And now this Convention is asked to permit itself to be used as a club to break the honor of the Commonwealth, and to cause it to refuse to pay the promised money, the consideration for which has been entirely performed by the other side. Mr. President, suppose the boot was on the other leg. Suppose that the State had paid the full million dollars, and subsequently, for its own convenience, or because it preferred to apply the money so received to other purposes, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology had refused the agreed instruction to these young men. Would not we say, — would not every man here say that the Institute was committing a breach of contract, — a gross breach of contract; and if not of contract, a gross breach of honor? Every person in this Convention would say so. Then for the honor of the Commonwealth, and because we refuse to say to the friends of education who have raised that large amount of money in good faith, and in reliance upon the good faith of Massachusetts, and because we are unwilling that the young men who are now, and those who hereafter will be, entitled to rely upon the word of the State when solemnly given, should be disappointed, and find their faith in her unsubstantial and not to be relied upon, let us pass these amendments. I appeal to the Convention not to talk of policy or wisdom, but of common honesty. I appeal to it not to sully the white flag of the Commonwealth, which hangs upon our walls, by any failure to live up to the letter and spirit of the agreements, express or implied, made by Massachusetts.

Mr. BOYDEN: In reply to the question of the gentleman from the first section (Mr. Washburn of Middleborough), I will say that as nearly as I can find out from the Board of Education there are somewhere around forty to fifty academies throughout the State which are supported in part by private funds. Most of these academies were able to make some arrangement with the local town officials whereby they retain that fund and the control of the school is left largely in the hands of the local school-committee, but there are ten or eleven towns which are distinctly affected by this amendment which I have offered. Now, may I say one word more, that is, that it is not a question of the academies, gentlemen, it is a question of the towns. It is a question whether the towns shall be allowed to take advantage of the generosity of people who have left money in order that the children may secure a better education than the town is able to offer them. The gentleman asked for this list which I will give in part: Ashburnham, Deerfield, Hatfield, Georgetown, West Bridgewater, Marion, Harvard and Andover. These institutions, you see, are all in strictly rural, strictly country sections, and I believe that the addition of some consideration for the country districts would be a means of strengthening rather than weakening this measure.

Just one thing more. How will it affect the towns? I happen to know about two towns. In the town of Deerfield if we were not able to take advantage of an appropriation of $3,000 from the town it would be necessary for the town to establish and maintain a high school of its own. That would cost, according to the Board of Education, at least $6,000 to $8,000 annually after a building had been erected and equipped. In the town of Ashburnham, Cushing Academy for many years has educated the high school children of the town for the sum of $1,500. As I understand it, there are fifty or sixty children who go there. If this thing goes through without any amendment it means that the town of Ashburnham in all probability will have to build and maintain a high school of its own. Of course it would not possibly begin to compare with the advantages which they secure at Cushing Academy, and the expense to the town would be very greatly increased. Now we are willing to have any restrictions put upon us. In our own case the money appropriated by the town is spent by the school-committee, it appears in the annual town report, and there is absolutely nothing that is not open to inspection at any time.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: I should like to say just a word on this matter of the academies, particularly after my good friend Mr. Boyden from Deerfield and my learned friend from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) have started a heart-beat here this afternoon. How different their appeals for these little academies from those made for the mammoth institutions of Worcester and the Charles River! My colleague on the left, Mr. Webster, said this morning that the appeal of these academies had a great deal of effect upon our committee; we found it hard to work the head against the heart. I see now the way things are developing, and I am afraid that the heart here may lead the head and the better judgment.

Why has no exception been made in favor of academies? Why, Mr. President, what do you mean by the word "academy"? The gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden), head of one of those academies, doing a great work there with his young people, appealed to the Board of Education for a list and brings us in five or six names. The gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) says they are all under the Board of Education. Well, it is strange they have not got a list of them. What about the other twenty or thirty? But be that as it may, I care not for control by the Board of Education. Last year, if I am right, the Legislature had to say to the Teachers' agencies: "Don't you ever again dare ask an applicant for a teacher's position what his religion is." The control by a State board that has tolerated such an abuse in this day and generation and in this State so that agencies have to be forbidden by law from asking that question, is a board that never would fit in this debate and would soon start a fire that methinks I almost hear crackling in this room now.

The difference between these academies and a library is a sectarian question. There is no question of that sort in a library. You can get a book on my religion or your religion; and any library that is really free and really public, if it has not got the work, so far as I know in the history of this State, has always gladly supplied the want and the demand. So far as I know, they are not pushing out books of this kind or that kind, and if so, that can be remedied. What is the condition with these academies? I said when I spoke before on this question that our committee had found itself unable to define the word "sectarian", unable to define the words "religious" and "denominational". Here is one of the very instances: In the academy at Deerfield, they have a reading of the scriptures and a singing of hymns in the morning. Our friend says: "That is not sectarian, it is not offensive, Mr. Pelletier. Nothing is ever said about your religion or anybody else's religion. There is nothing sectarian about it." But I say: "Why, my friend, that is sectarian to me; it is sectarian to my Jewish friend and Lord knows what it is to the unbeliever and the atheist." Define things, you say; make rules for these academies, and put them in some class; they are not offensive. Why,
Mr. President, there is a Catholic convent of this city, where fifty per cent of the young ladies are non-Catholic; the parents of those young ladies say there is nothing offensive there in a religious way at all, they are not asked anything along religious lines. The convent which was burned on yonder hill seventy-five years ago was over eighty per cent non-Catholic in the young ladies attending there, brought there by non-Catholics. That Ursuline Convent, established by non-Catholics, was attended by young ladies who wanted that line of education. Not the religious line. No, they thought as much of their religion as you and I do of ours. But they thought the ladies of that particular teaching society could teach letters and the humanities and music and what not, that went to make a perfect woman and the ideal mother. There were over eighty per cent in that convent, and they would say: "There is nothing offensive there." Go to Boston College on University Heights. If a non-Catholic young man goes there he does not have to be marked on doctrine, he does not have to attend any services, he will not be asked to attend any service where his religion is criticized or dissected. They want to be fair and respect his opinion. So you can go all along the line. We are all trying to be honest. But underneath us all there is uneasiness and there has been uneasiness, and that is the reason for this amendment; that is the reason for all this talk. We do not seem to understand one another. We do not seem to be able to trust one another. My good will I feel you ought to take, and I should take yours. But in these matters in a large State, with a growing and changing and cosmopolitan population, where you are dealing with little children in the teaching proposition, — ah! there you certainly are on dangerous ground. And in order to let these academies in you must first tell me what you mean by an academy; second, you must put into your organic law, into the Constitution, if you want to follow some of the wild-cat States, a description which shall say something about what is religion, and what is sectarian, and what is denominational. Ecclesiastical? Oh, well, that generally means one church; but all these others it is harder to define. The Standard Dictionary will give you a definition, but some of us have reached maturity, and many of us feel that we have our own ideas; and public opinion as to what a word means is better than your Standard Dictionary, if you please.

And so you enter into this academic proposition, these academies, gentlemen, and you open wide the whole proposition. I am not going to say that there are not other towns just as small as these that build their own high schools and maintain them. I am not going to say that in my opinion I believe none of these towns and none of these academies will suffer. I am not going to say that I believe that the trustees of these academies in many cases could transfer their property to the town or municipality. I leave that all to your imagination. But I will guarantee this: That in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts no boy or girl in any town with or without an academy shall suffer for a high school education. Even if the old county of Suffolk has to pay, instead of eighty per cent, ninety-eight per cent of the taxes of the Commonwealth, we will see that the children shall have their high school education. [Applause.]

I said I thought you were getting nearer and nearer the awful question that everybody has avoided here. I want to say this, Mr. President, before I commence running or plunging. One thought has come to me to-day. We have heard so many nice things said,—I do not mean any one in particular, but everybody has said lovely things,—about breadth of opinion and so on. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology wants its money. It would not agree with Worcester Polytechnic Institute the other day or rather Worcester would not agree with Tech. You remember, as the gentleman said, Worcester sat tight when Tech was willing to come forward and agree with the learned Justice. They are not looking for the little academies. Oh, no, academics can get along! They are not looking for the little hospitals! Oh no. Every one is looking out for his own tree, which is apt to be barked! Well, of course that means that we are all quite human here. Even the orators and others who have taken the floor are all quite human. But after all, Mr. President, as I sat here to-day, I said to myself that, with all the professions of liberality, no man has risen here, not even my learned friend from Fall River (Mr. Cummins), to say: "I move as a substitute for all of this that the Commonwealth and every city and town shall have the right to appropriate money for any worthy charitable, educational or religious cause." Why not go the limit? To do that of course you ought to strike out the eighteenth amendment. Why not go the limit? You all say: "It is a good cause, it is a worthy cause, it makes no difference whether the nurse has a white band here, or a white wing, if she ministers to me; and the doctor who ministers to me, it makes no difference what his religion; it is a worthy cause." Well, then, why do you not come through? "It makes no difference whether there is a cross or a weather-vane on the top of the school; if it is teaching pupils what the State says at a certain age they ought to know, what difference if they get a little something moral?" Why not come through with that resolution? And some of you gentlemen were talking that way. See what the temper of this Convention is. Away with this sort of feeling about "My tree and your tree." Let us take the big question, either let everybody in and let the State squander its money if it will, let the city squander its money if it will,—if you think it will; I think perhaps it would not,—either trust the people through the Legislature, trust your city or town government, to spend their own money that they are collecting from the people, or else say: "You cannot spend any public money for any private purpose." [Applause.]
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Our committee has not all the wisdom of this Convention (and I admit it), nor all the charity, nor all the breadth. We feel that as far as we know the people, as far as we know the progress of the time, as far as we know the need of the situation, we ought to ask you to put through a measure which says: "No public money for any private purpose,"—for the two exceptions amount to nothing. I shall not mention those. You say: "It is going to hurt here and there." Yes. Hurt you, hurt me,—yes; this town, that town,—yes; your tax raised ten cents and mine, in this town,—yes. Hurt the Commonwealth? No, Mr. President! We finally came to the decision to oppose any amendment of that measure. We say that, in our judgment, for what that is worth, this resolution ought to go through. It cannot injure the Commonwealth, but it will be for the benefit of all the people. [Applause.]
The discussion was resumed Tuesday, August 21.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Last Wednesday I notified the Convention that I desired to be heard upon this resolution. Since then I have been advised that enough members of the Convention have declared themselves in favor of the resolution reported by the committee on Bill of Rights to insure the adoption by the Convention of the report of that committee. That being so I will not trespass upon your time by undertaking to speak as I intended, as to either the merits or the demerits of the main proposition embodied in the report. But, sir, I feel that I should be lacking in the discharge of what I conceive to be a duty to the Commonwealth as well as to myself if I refrained from speaking and giving utterance to my sincere views and convictions on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden).

That amendment, sir, proposes to write into the fundamental law of the Commonwealth a principle for which I, at least, cannot stand. It is open, at least in my judgment, to two fatal objections. In the first place, the report of the committee, so far as it relates to educational institutions, does what? It provides that public money shall go to the public schools and publicly controlled educational institutions. It then provides that in those schools and institutions denominational doctrine shall not be inculcated. It is the accepted law of this Commonwealth that in our public schools the tenets of any particular religious denomination shall not be taught. Why is that? Why is it that in our public schools we do not allow denominational teaching? The answer to that question will lead us to the door of one serious objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Deerfield. Is it not true that attendance in the public schools of this Commonwealth is in its nature compulsory? The State demands of each citizen that he shall permit those of school age subject to his control to receive that degree of education which the State has decreed to be necessary for a safe citizenship. The children are compelled to attend our public schools, unless, of course, their parents are fortunate enough to be so circumstanced as to provide a similar degree of education elsewhere. But that is the exception; the main proposition is that attendance in the public schools is in its nature compulsory.

Now if the State is going to compel the attendance of children in the public schools and the parents of those children believe in different religious faiths, some of them having no faith at all, it is only fair, it is only right, that in those schools children should not be compelled to listen to the teaching of any particular church or of any denomination that would not meet with the approval of the parents. That is why in our public schools we do not have denominational religious teaching. It is not because the State is opposed to religion; it is not because we do not want our citizenship to be a religious citizenship. From the very first paragraph of our Constitution to its closing pages there breathes throughout its whole a belief in God. We bear testimony to that every morning in this Convention, sir, when we have the divine aid and assistance invoked to guide us in our deliberations. But so far as our public schools are concerned we recognize that attendance in those schools is compulsory and we refrain from teaching any denominational doctrine in them. In that we are doing the only consistent and the only reasonable thing. But that is different, Mr. President,—that is far afield from the proposition offered by this amendment. This amendment is one which, if you will reflect upon and read it carefully, you will see strikes at the very soul of religion. See what this amendment proposes. It says that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts may give its money to private schools providing those private schools will not teach the denominational doctrine of any religion. It offers a premium for schools that will not recognize religion. Are we going to commit this Commonwealth to such a course as that? If for reasons of fair play we exclude religion from our public schools, as we must of necessity if they are to be public schools, are we then going to say to the people of this Commonwealth: "Extend the doctrine farther, and if you who have charge of private schools shall not teach religion in your private schools you too may come in and receive aid from the public treasury"? Is that a doctrine that appeals to any man in this Convention as a wise and a safe doctrine for the Commonwealth to embark upon?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Do you not know, Mr. President, and does not every man in this Convention know that there are hundreds of thousands of men and voters in this Commonwealth who will not for one moment stand idly by and let the brand of outlawry be placed upon a private school because it teaches that there is a God and teaches the course that in the belief of those in charge of it men should follow in order to reach His throne? That is what this amendment means. Only those private schools shall have money that teach irreligion or fail to teach religion.

On what ground does this gentleman offer this amendment, and on what ground is it advocated by his supporter from Amherst (Mr. Churchill)? On what ground do they say the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should pay money to private schools? Let us analyze their ground; let us see upon what they base their case.

They say that private schools are doing the work of the State,—the town or the State, as the case may be; that they are saving these hill towns and outlying country districts hundreds of dollars every year; that there are towns in this State that are unable to maintain a public high school and that these academies are training the children of those towns and giving them the education that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts says its citizens shall have, and because they are rendering this great public service and work they ask that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts permit those towns, either by paying tuition or in some other way, to give them money toward their support in return for that public service.

Mr. President, I do not differ from the soundness of that doctrine. I am not here advocating that that is not a proper thing for the Commonwealth to do. And if that was the proposition that the gentleman from Deerfield advocated I might not be now opposing him. But he does not stop there. He carries into this exception which he urges what, to my mind, is fundamentally objectionable. He says: "Give this aid only to the private schools that do not teach religion."

Mr. President, if we are to take his claim, as he has stated it, as the ground upon which the State shall give money to its private schools, let me give you a case. I will ask the gentleman from Deerfield to follow me, and any other man who feels as he does, and see if I do not state a worthy case. In the city of Quincy from which I come we have an institution; you may call it an academy if you want to or you may call it anything you see fit. In that school or academy last year there were 527 scholars. It is a private institution. If that institution were to close its doors in the September coming do you know what it would mean to the city of Quincy, already struggling under a heavy tax rate and an enormous debt? Those 527 children would have to be educated in the public schools. It costs us in Quincy $32 and some cents to educate a child in our public schools. Five hundred and twenty-seven times \(32\frac{1}{4}\) if that be the figure in round numbers, would be $17,000. We should have to raise in Quincy next year $17,000 to provide school facilities to take the place of that private school or academy. Not only that, we should have to build a sixteen-room school-house which would cost us to-day something like $125,000, the annual interest charge on which at four per cent would be $5,000, making our burden for next year and for all the years to come until we had paid off the cost of that school-house, $22,000 a year if that private school were to close its doors.

Now that school is doing just the kind of work the gentleman from Deerfield claims his school is doing. It is going out into the streets of Quincy; it is taking inside its rooms the children of the poor and the rich; it is educating them. It is saving the city thousands of dollars a year. Why, if the Deerfield Academy is to receive money, should not that institution also receive money? Can any one tell me? Will the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) tell me why the school I am referring to should not receive State aid if he has given the real reason why a private school which renders a public service of the character referred to should receive such aid?

What school am I referring to, he inquires. Why, I am referring to St. John's Parochial School of Quincy. There is a school that is doing the city of Quincy's work, and if the reason that the gentleman gave why a private school should receive money is valid, then that school should receive money.

But see what he wishes done. He says: "No, your private school shall not receive public money if it teaches any form of religion." Now why should you exclude religion from a private school if the principle on which public money is to be paid to a private school is as he and the gentleman from Amherst have stated and their reasons are sound? Can you think of any sound reason? Do you not see the difference between a private school and a public school? Attendance at the public school is compulsory, therefore no child should be compelled to listen to any particular form of religious belief. Attendance at a private school is voluntary; there is no compulsion when your child attends the private school; the parent need not send it there unless he wants to. There is that fundamental difference. One is a voluntary attendance and the other is a compulsory attendance. The State concerns itself only with the intellectual education of its children. If its requirements in that respect are complied with, there is no reason why the State should object if, in a private school, that education is supplemented with religious instruction agreeable to the parents and guardians of the children attending the same.

I submit, it is not a policy which we should adopt to say to the private schools: "We give you money because you are doing the town's or the city's work, and we will give it to you for the additional reason that you are not doing God's work,—you are not teaching religion." I cannot lend myself to that proposition. Either give it to these private schools because they are doing a public work or do not give it to them at all. Give it on some ground of sane, sound, public policy, and not upon the ground stated in this proposed amendment.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

193

I am not here pleading for the private school; I am here now speaking against this amendment, and this amendment only. And I hope the Convention, sir, will follow the purport of my remarks and not read into my remarks something that I am not putting into them myself.

But there is another objection, an objection which is fundamental. I have waited, Mr. President, from the beginning of this debate until this moment, for some one of the supporters of this amendment to show any legal authority under which the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or any town in this State could legally pay tuition to these academies for the children they receive and educate, and I trust that before this debate closes some one of these gentlemen will show authority for so doing,—a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court, saying that it is lawful to do so. To my knowledge the question has been passed upon,—not by our Supreme Judicial Court. Our Supreme Judicial Court never has passed upon the question of whether a private academy in a town in which there is no high school may receive pupils and the town legally pay money to it for the tuition of those children. It is true the Legislature has undertaken to pass several acts authorizing the towns to do so, but we are dealing with the Constitution. We are not dealing with a legislative act. No legislative act can rise higher than the Constitution, and if it is not constitutional an act of the Legislature is a mere nullity. Therefore I trust that the gentlemen when they quote their authorities will not rely upon acts of the Legislature, because acts of the Legislature do not interest us in our present discussion.

The Legislature had this problem before it in 1895, and, Mr. President, there was at that time in office in this Commonwealth a man whom I believe to have been in his day one of the great lawyers of the State. He was a man who never dodged an issue, and when a legal problem was put up to him he decided it squarely upon its merits. And when the Legislature asked him for his opinion on these two questions he did not hesitate to give it. Mark you the questions, and then his answers:

Is it constitutional for a town to grant and vote money to pay the tuition of children attending an academy in said town in accordance with St. 1895, c. 94?

Now the Act of 1895 referred to was one providing that towns that did not have a high school might send their children to private academies and pay tuition to the private academies, a case on all fours with the case the gentleman from Deerfield presents to you. The Legislature was not satisfied with that question; they put a further question to that officer. Mark you this question:

Is it constitutional for a town to grant and vote money to pay the tuition of children attending an academy outside of said town?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

They wanted to find out whether a town had authority to pay tuition for children attending these private academies in the town, and then, did they have the authority to pay money for children's tuition who attended academies outside the town, the towns themselves not having any high school. And what did that gentleman say? Let me say, Mr. President, he is the only official of this Commonwealth, so far as I have been able to learn, who ever has faced the issue and answered it squarely,—and I do not except from that statement even our Supreme Judicial Court. I read to you the opinion of the late Hon. Hosea M. Knowlton when Attorney-General of this Commonwealth. After dealing with all the facts and setting forth the case and citing the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution, he comes in his opinion to this significant and in my judgment controlling language:

It is of no consequence that the tuition of such pupils may not be paid from money especially appropriated by the town for the support of its public schools.

You know what that means. The eighteenth amendment said:

All moneys raised by taxation in the cities and towns for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of common schools, etc.

Mr. Knowlton said it makes no difference whether this money is raised in that manner or not.

The question is not one of mere appropriation. The purpose of the constitutional amendment was to prohibit the use of public funds for the education of the children of the Commonwealth—

Now mark you these words:

in any institution, however conducted and whether sectarian or not, the control of which is not in the municipal authorities.

Mr. President, here we have the law officer of this Commonwealth advising the Legislature that the eighteenth amendment prohibited the payment of money to these private institutions, sectarian or non-sectarian, teaching religious doctrines or not teaching them, so long as they were not under the control of the public authorities. And, sir, I say without fear of challenge that that decision and that opinion has never been attacked or overruled in this Commonwealth. Further let me read you:

If the expenditure be for the purpose of the education of the children of the town, it is within the spirit of the prohibition of the amendment.

In the face of that opinion of the Attorney-General to the Legislature some of these academies have been receiving money every year. They have been receiving money from the public treasury, and nobody has questioned the legality of the payment of that money. And why? Merely because the academies did not happen to be sectarian. And yet every time a dollar was so paid, a dollar was illegally paid of the public money, if the opinion of the late Attorney-General Hosea M. Knowlton is good law.

The only case that I have found in which that opinion has in any way been dealt with by our Supreme Judicial Court is in the case of Fiske v. Huntington, 179 Mass. 571, and there the court does not differ from Attorney-General Knowlton, but it repeats his decision and says, without deciding the question as to whether he was right or wrong, that the particular case then before it could be disposed of on other grounds and was so disposed of. If his opinion was wrong the Supreme Judicial Court could have said so.

Mr. President, on the grounds that we ought not to write into our fundamental law the doctrine, the hateful doctrine, that it is right to give money to private academies for the tuition of children attending them providing they do not teach religion, I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Deerfield. The reason why such academies should receive public aid as stated in the amendment is one that runs counter to every fiber of my being, and that is why, as a sworn delegate to this Convention, I cannot sit idly by and see such a declaration written into our fundamental law. I am not raising any question so far as the public schools are concerned; perhaps it is right and proper that there should be written into our law a prohibition against teaching religion in our public schools, for the reason, as I stated, that attendance in the public schools is compulsory. But if private schools are to receive aid give it to them on some broad general ground upon which every school will stand alike. If you do not believe that public money should be given to private academies, then say so; but say that you do not believe that public money should go to private schools. Do not go out of your way to offer a gratuitous insult to the Deity Whom we recognize and before Whom we bow.

Mr. President, it is also my contention that as a matter of law the amendment offered by the committee on Bill of Rights does not take away from those academies any legal right to public money they have to-day, because in my opinion to-day they have no legal right to receive money from the treasuries of the towns and cities for the teaching of children therein and when they do so receive it they receive money unlawfully and illegally and it is a practice which should be stopped solely because it is unlawful and illegal, and on no other ground. [Applause.]

Mr. John W. Daly of Lowell: I have listened patiently and with great attention to the able arguments in favor of and opposing amendments to this resolution. The opinions expressed here, and the reception accorded those expressed opinions, clearly indicate what the attitude of this body will be toward any attempt at modification of its provisions. I should be short of imagination, lacking in judgment, incapable of any power of discernment, did I not appreciate the significance of this and understand fully what the final action of this body will be upon this question. However, notwithstanding this, irrespective of advices to the contrary and realizing wholly the hopelessness of my position, I feel that I must at least give brief expression to a defence of my own convictions, however futile it may appear. I would gladly subscribe to the resolution as presented by the committee on Bill of Rights, for, like the majority of this Convention and undoubtedly like the vast majority of the body politic of this Commonwealth, I should like to see this question settled for all time. The sincerity of purpose which prompts the promoters and the supporters of this measure in their desire to eliminate what seems to be a sore spot in our social and commercial life, to my mind is above question. I have waited, and I have watched the proceedings very carefully, hoping against hope that before final action an amendment somewhat modifying the very drastic restrictions imposed by this resolution upon certain institutions, and which might be acceptable to the committee on Bills of Rights, might be offered to this Convention. As it now stands it means that no money shall be appropriated by the State, by any city or town, for the support of institutions like the Lowell Textile School, the best equipped of its kind in the entire world. I have had prepared, and I have in my possession, facts and figures, statistical records, extracts of statements made at hearings where requests and demands were made for State and municipal aid for this institution. Out of consideration for the temper of this body I have decided not to make use of this documentary evidence in support of my contentions. For obvious reasons I feel that it will be quite unnecessary for me at this time to refer to or to discuss the contents of these papers. My only desire is to call the attention of this body to the Lowell Textile School and to ask this Convention to weigh well their action before anything may be entered here which in any way will affect the future welfare of this great institution. The people of this Commonwealth, and particularly the citizens of Lowell and vicinity, have an opportunity to get an education in keeping with their means, and because of this it will be of great benefit to the community. Its benefits should not be curtailed in any manner because of the fact that the State from time to time may be called upon for assistance. Better by far to regulate the activity of any class that might come under the meaning of this resolution than to interfere with the efficiency of such means where our youth and others may get that information of which otherwise they might be deprived under the curtailment of such means as this resolution contemplates.

At a recent session of the Committee of the Whole the gentleman on my left in the third division, the member from Saugus (Mr. Bennett), raised the point and asked the question: "In the event of this measure being submitted to and accepted by the people what actually will be the result of such action upon such institutions?" His inquiry and subsequent statement, together with the statements of the member in the third division upon the same afternoon, strengthened a doubt which already had existed in my mind as to whether or not the insertion of such an amendment in our Constitution would hamper seriously the future efficiency or welfare of these institutions. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the approval of the Curtis amendment will mean one of two things. I understand, of course, that in all probability the schools will continue their teaching, but under somewhat changed conditions, and it strikes me that the inevitable governmental supervision will mean the substitution of political for private or semi-private management. Whether or not this would be an improvement I am not prepared to admit. In my desire to reach an intelligent solution of the problem I sought information from a source which I considered would be most authoritative, but for some unaccountable reason the chairman of the board of trustees of the Lowell Textile School denied my urgent and pressing request for an interview, and as a consequence of my ineffectual efforts to secure certain necessary information I am still in doubt not only as to the interpretation of this and similar parts of the resolution, but I am at a loss to understand the passiveness and the inactivity of those who control or those who are in charge of this institution at a time like this, when the confirmed action of this body may mean so much to those who in the past have been deriving a benefit from this institution and to those who in the future might be afforded the same privilege. However, I am in no way concerned about those who control or those who are in charge of this institution. These men can take care of themselves. Any man who directs great capital ordinarily will be able to secure all that he desires both for himself and his dependents. The great interest should be in the average citizen. The welfare of the State demands that he shall have a fair share in the advantages of prosperity. Therefore my interest and my concern is for the youth, for the young men and the young women of my city and of my State, and I feel that they should not be deprived in any manner of any opportunity for learning or advancement in the trades, sciences and professions.

Being an interested resident citizen of the city where the school is located, I have been permitted at times to inspect it and have been enabled thereby to keep in touch with its facilities. In the past it has been my privilege to be in a position where I could and did vote public appropriations for its support. I have heard its praises sounded from the pulpit, in the courts, through the press and from the public platform, so that any hasty or ill-considered action of mine or of any deliberative body would be a source of regret to me and should be a matter of deep concern to the entire State.

I have been told by my colleagues, I have been informed by several of the delegates with whom I have become acquainted since the sixth of June, that should this measure become a part of our Constitution eventually, or in all probability, the State will take over these institutions and they will be conducted much as our grammar schools or high schools or our State normal schools are conducted at the present time. If there was any assurance of this there would be no cause for protest, no cause for alarm. But no such assurance has been given, and I know that no such assurance can be given. Is there any evidence of such a belief in the minds of the delegates who have been so persistent in offering their amendments, asking for a modification of the resolution favoring the institutions in which they apparently are so vitally interested? These men are much better versed and they have had far more experience in legislative affairs than I. Then is it not fair for me to say, am I not justified in saying, that they too have their doubts, that there is uncertainty in their minds as to what the final outcome of this movement will be?

At a recent session the question of contract, of the moral or the legal obligation existing between the State and certain other parties, was discussed. I admit that in so far as I know there is no legal obligation existing between the State and certain private educational institutions which I have in mind; but, as every member of this Convention knows and understands, there is, as there should be and as there always will be, a moral obligation existing between the State and its people in so far as aiding them in their desire for advancement along any line of worthy endeavor. It is not my intention to get into debate on this point, realizing that any comparison here requires a trained legal mind, and that it can better be made by those who are accustomed to weigh and analyze and test evidence, or, as in a specific case of this kind, by those who have made a special study of social and political problems. Nor am I giving you on this point my personal view of the matter. I am trying to express briefly as best I may the opinions of some of my constituents, of the voters of the Fifth Congressional District, of which I have the privilege to be one of the representatives; and their contention is that inasmuch as the State is the people and the people are the State, they assert that an impression, an erroneous impression of course, has been and is being created among a part of those who will have the final deciding voice in this matter, that an attempt is being made here to make it constitutional for the State to violate its moral obligation to itself. Should this impression become prevalent and be allowed to prevail, what will happen? Is it not self-evident that long before the question is settled at the polls next November an undercurrent of resentment and dissatisfaction, of misunderstanding and confusion, will be the result and all our labors, though with the best of intentions, will have been for naught?

Anticipating your permission, I should like to ask a question: Is this resolution, together with the amendments which have been offered, to be decided upon the merits of the men behind them, or is it to be decided, as it should be, strictly upon the merits of the measure itself?

I may be all wrong in my analysis of this question, but inasmuch as a doubt does exist in my mind even of the justice and the fairness of this change, should it occur, I should be derelict in my duty did I not take advantage of an opportunity that presented itself and protest against anything which in my opinion might be detrimental to the interests of the Lowell Textile School. Having no desire that my motive should be understood as a selfish one, what I have said with particular reference to this institution applies equally as well to all institutions of a like nature throughout the State. If you open up any section of this proposed restricted area in favor of any institution, why not lower the bars altogether and let them all come in, by which I mean, of course, defeating the measure entirely?

At this time I want to say that I shall gladly accept any additional, or definite, accurate information that may disillusion my mind or have any tendency to set me right, otherwise my vote as I intend to cast it will be with the utmost reluctance.

Mr. Coleman of Boston: It is not my purpose to prolong unduly the discussion of this topic, but I feel very earnestly that I do want to register my strong conviction against all the amendments, save one, which have been proposed to the resolution offered by the committee and to give my hearty and unqualified assent to that resolution. I do this not only as a citizen of the Commonwealth but also as a man of the church, a man who has spent a great deal of his time and energy outside of business affairs in all of the activities of the church with which one of my faith may properly be connected. I want to say from both of these points of view that I believe the committee on Bill of Rights has done a magnificent piece of work for this Convention and for the people of Massachusetts, and that if we adopt their resolution and it is accepted by the people next November, as I thoroughly believe it will be, the members of this committee will go down in history gratefully remembered for years to come by the people of Massachusetts for the honorable, square, fair, friendly way in which they have dealt with and settled one of the most difficult, dangerous and delicate problems which has harassed and perplexed the people of this State for a generation or more.
I want to call your attention, Mr. President and members of the Convention, to the remarkable demonstration that the committee gives in its own personnel of what has been accomplished, and I believe it is a foretaste and an augury of what we are going to see at the polls in November. Recall a few of the gentlemen who are fathering this resolution. There is the chairman of the committee in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) and the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), so famous because of his connection with old ward 8. Recall, please, that one of them is a rock-ribbed Republican and the other is a red-hot Democrat. One is of the Protestant faith; the other is a devout Catholic. One has sprung from the classes; the other comes from the masses. And yet they are joining heart and hand in their advocacy of this measure, upon which one might suppose they never would be able to agree.

And we have in the membership of the committee, Mr. President, another exemplification of how opposites have been wonderfully brought together in this resolution which has been unanimously presented by the committee. I refer to those two gentlemen on the committee who have been recognized more or less as the champions of the two opposing sides. I happen to have known one of them personally and intimately for a number of years,—the gentleman from Newton in the third division (Mr. Anderson). I know some of the qualities of his mind and heart. I know how accurate and painstaking he is, how faithful he is to every obligation. But he has demonstrated to me in his work on this committee, and in the part that he has taken in this Convention, a quality that I did not know he possessed, or at least I did not know that he possessed it to such a remarkable degree, and that is the quality of gracefully and readily yielding his own opinion, his own position in favor of what he has come to see to be the larger and the greater good. I had an impression that was given to me of the champion on the other side, the district attorney of Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier). I was led to believe that it never would be possible for me to see eye to eye with him on this topic. When he made his last speech on the floor of this assembly the other afternoon, following the speech of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), I was delighted beyond measure to find that in heart and mind I could give absolute, unqualified and unreserved assent to the position taken by both of these gentlemen. Furthermore, Mr. President, I am highly delighted to find myself in agreement with another member of this committee with whom I never had been able to be in agreement before on political lines. I refer to the gentleman from the new ward 5 of Boston, who sits in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). During my short political career, whenever I have appealed to the people for their vote in city or State he always has seen fit to honor me with his opposition. Nevertheless, I have been able to win out on all of those occasions. I have been delighted in this Convention to become personally acquainted with him, never having had that opportunity before. I am rejoiced again beyond measure to find him giving voice to a sentiment and principle on this great question with which I am wholly in accord.

Mr. President, it would seem to me that if this Convention did nothing else (and sometimes I am almost inclined to believe that it will do nothing else) than to pass this resolution presented by the committee on Bill of Rights, it would have done enough to have made it well worth while, in spite of the great cost which is attached to the holding of this Convention. The settlement of this problem in this Convention by the general agreement of both sides, and the adoption of the amendment by the people at the polls, when men of every party and every race and men of every faith and of no faith, will go to the polls and cast their votes in favor of the passage of this amendment of the Constitution, will signify a great day in the history of Massachusetts.

And it seems to me, Mr. President, that the educational institutions that are advocating these amendments in favor of themselves are making a serious mistake, not only with reference to the great issue that is before us but also with reference to their own interest in the long run. I am not unfavorable to any one of these educational institutions. I have lived almost under the shadow of the buildings of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology all my life. I was born in the very same year in which it was established. I had hoped to finish my own education within its walls. I am proud of all that it has accomplished. I regard it as one of the great assets of this State. I know something of the situation with reference to these educational institutions, these academies, in the western part of the State, and I wish them all well. I should not like to take a dollar away from them. But it seems to me, Mr. President, that it is short-sighted for them to press their financial interests in the face of this great overwhelming problem that affects the entire life of the whole Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I hope with all my heart that when we come to vote on this resolution from the committee on Bill of Rights that we shall be able to pass it not only by a considerable majority, but by an almost unanimous vote. [Applause.]

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: Ever since the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) addressed the Committee of the Whole on the proposal now before us, I have been waiting for some word to be said in direct response to his point of view,—not in opposition to it, but in response to it. I would have wished the word to come from lips free of all possible taint of professionalism, but as the word has hitherto been unsaid, I can only strive as honestly as I may to leave aside all professional prejudice, and speak as a citizen, not without convictions indeed, but with the conviction supreme that now and here I have neither the right nor the wish to consider anything but the good of the Commonwealth and of all its people.

The gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) in reviewing the other day the history of the agitation for the so-called anti-sectarian amendment, told you that that amendment was indorsed by the Congregational conference of Massachusetts with only a very few dissenting voices. I have not yet ceased to be proud that my voice was one of those few. I judged that I could discern in the attitude and methods of those who urged the measure,—a measure in itself not only unquestionable but so far as it went desirable to me,—features that appeared to me to be against the public welfare. I believed then and I believe now that the principle embodied in the proposition before us is not only wiser as a basis for general agreement but also more correct as a matter of public policy.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

I shall not take the time of the Convention with any argument regarding this belief, which I judge the Convention shares. What it seemed to me desirable to do was to put in, as an individual, but as an individual Protestant, some considerations as to the relation between the Commonwealth and the church.

To my mind, — and in this opinion I certainly do not conceive that I speak for the body of Protestant people, — the separation of church and State is a regrettable necessity. It is no less necessary because it is regrettable; it is no less regrettable because it is necessary. It is regrettable because religion is essential to the welfare of the State. Only as its citizens are moved, directed and restrained by the principles of religion can the State remain sound and secure. When human society shall reach the goal which the Old Testament pictures as the Messianic Kingdom and which Jesus called the Kingdom of God, men no longer will be aware of any real distinction between church and State. But men now are very fully aware of such a distinction, and the world has few difficulties greater than those that arise from attempts to put in present operation ideals that belong to a future stage of development. The separation of church and State is necessary, — necessary for the welfare of the church; necessary for the welfare of the State. I shall ask no further proof of this broad statement than can be found in the history of Massachusetts. The colonists maintained their ministers with town funds. They gave them no vote, but they did give them an influence often amounting to autocratic direction. To some of these ministers, like John Robinson, who never set foot on these shores, like Thomas Hooker of Hartford and John Wise of Ipswich, American democracy owes an unspeakable debt. But on the whole the plan worked badly for both State and church. Boston has not always, we judge, been governed just as the best of its citizens would like to have had it governed. It has been governed at some times in periods after his day with less honor and integrity and with more graft and corruption than it was governed in the days of Cotton Mather; but I do not believe that Cotton Mather was any better boss for Boston than men who since have held that kind of position.

As we look at the people who profess and call themselves Christians, — still an overwhelming majority of the citizens of the Commonwealth, — we find among them two different ideals of the nature and function of the church. One ideal is the Catholic. To those who hold this ideal it appears that God, sum and source of all truth, has made that truth known to men and has intrusted it to the keeping of His church. To that Church may come every man burdened with sin, tossed with doubt, or bowed with grief, and find in the truth believed always, everywhere and by all the secure haven of refuge and restoration. Its God-inspired methods and ministers, its sacraments and its worship, are so adaptable to human needs that every willing soul may find in them the response of the divine love to the cry of his longing, and may gain from them strength for the work of life. There is, I take it, no truly religious man to whom an ideal like this does not make its appeal. The glorious power of it is sufficiently proved by the deep devotion to it of great multitudes of our citizens.

But alongside this ideal, in contrast always and in conflict sometimes, is the Protestant ideal of the church. To those who hold this ideal God seems to reveal Himself progressively by a process of individual experience. In mutual contact and fellowship, in the honest purpose to walk together in the ways of the Lord, known or to be made known unto them, whatever it may cost, men who hold this ideal have seen the light of ultimate truth gleam before them and beckon them onward, each by his own free way, to the joyful attainment of the goal. The knowledge of faith becomes ever the richer knowledge of proved experience, and the man who so walks finds in himself the growing assurance that he is on the right way.

This is no place to argue one's preference for one of these ideals over against the other. The point I have wished to make in stating them is simply that each of them has a right to be, even though they be obviously incompatible. I often wish, though I wish in vain, that it were possible to be both Catholic and Protestant. I believe each church is better for the presence of the other. The two ideals, while they will not blend, do so check and direct each other that the progress of the whole is saner and stronger than it can be under the unchecked domination of either ideal.

If, then, the State try in any way to change the current of men's thinking and men's devotion, if it work in any way to increase or to diminish the power of the one ideal or of the other, it is laying its hand upon the ark, and, like Uzzah, it must suffer the consequences of its profane interference.

The State perceives this fact throughout America, and so far as any direct interference is concerned, it is guiltless. But indirectly it finds itself involved in difficulty. Education and charity involve contacts between the State and the church. Charity is the child of religion. The charity that grudgingly doles out enough to keep body and soul together because the State will not leave its citizens to starve is one thing, and the expression of the Divine Love by sympathetic charity is another. Education that leaves without culture the religious faculties is education that cripples by partial development. The conscience to which the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) alluded, that demands the training of children with due attention to religion and that demands that charity be administered for the love of God, is a good conscience. It would be well if it were more widespread. Yet I must feel that those who hope, like the people for whom the gentleman from Fall River spoke, that the State may sometime honor this conscientious conviction by taking the burden of its fulfilment upon itself, are looking the wrong way. Surely it is wiser for us so to direct our policies and so to cultivate the spirit of tolerance that we may hope for the day when the burden of care and expense may be relieved by a proper division of the time of all our children between the education the State must provide for its own protection and that which the church must provide for the full development of those intrusted to its care. So may we look for an administration of charity in which the State cordially assents to the supplementing of its own activities by the free ministrations of the church. These things must wait; but because I believe that the measure before us will hasten the day of their coming, I shall vote for it with joy and advocate it with zeal. To me it is not a compromise, a mere way to get by with a desired amendment; it is a policy, new, but wise, which can be heartily commended to the Commonwealth.

I shall vote, therefore, with great joy for this proposition, with a
Sectarian Appropriations. 203

Single exception. I find that in some form I must support the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) relative to the two schools of technology. We present a new policy for adoption. We find that the Commonwealth has made a pledge to two institutions. I regret that pledge. I cannot picture myself, were I a graduate or trustee of either of them, contemplating without a degree of shame the application to the State for such an appropriation. But I am unwilling to hinder the carrying out in full of the promises of the Commonwealth, whether those promises have the binding force of a legal contract or whether they lack such force. For three or four years after the new policy goes into effect, it may be postponed in these two instances without hurting the principle.

But, sir, if this Convention should have done nothing more than establish this principle with the general assent of all who hold the two irreconcilable ideals of the church, it will have justified its existence and will have prepared the way for the final solution of one of our most perplexing problems. I rejoice not merely that the committee has agreed, but that it has agreed to the thing that really is best. [Applause.]

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: It seems to me, Mr. President, that the members of this Convention are very near together as to the principle of not appropriating public money for ecclesiastical purposes and the principle of not appropriating public money for private institutions. They should be put briefly, it seems to me, in two propositions. They could be written in ten lines,—the one proposition and the other proposition,—as is becoming in constitutional amendments, and should be submitted to this Convention in that way rather than in the way in which they have been submitted.

"No public money for church purposes",—we can almost state it in those words.

"No public money for private uses",—we can almost state it in those words.

But instead of that we have got the two mixed up in a long resolution which, it seems to me, it is not becoming for a Convention of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to pass. We have the two in separate amendments proposed here before us. In the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) we have the anti-ecclesiastical amendment, and in another we have the anti-public-money-for-private-uses amendment. It seems to me that we ought to vote upon them separately, and under the rules of this Convention I remember it says that when a question is susceptible of division it may be divided. Before there was any resolution offered by the gentleman from Haverhill we had before us in the beginning what is called the Anderson amendment, which was as clear as a mountain stream on the question of no money for sectarian purposes. I have received communications favoring it; this Convention has received a lot of them favoring it; and I want delegates to have a chance to vote upon that proposition. Therefore, Mr. President, I move, as a substitute, to amend by substituting the original Anderson amendment, so called, being document No. 66 of the Convention documents, and we shall get a vote at least upon the question of whether this Convention wants to vote upon those two propositions separately.
On the question of public money for private purposes, it seems to me that what the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) is trying to get at is not against the principle there. His resolution is unfortunately phrased, in that it says: "... raising and appropriating money for such academies." That is not what he wants to get at. What he wants is to give to towns the right to save money by sending their pupils to academies and thus get rid of the expense of supporting high schools. It is not any more a devotion of public money to private uses than it would be if I go out and hire a cab or an automobile for an hour. I am not doing that for the benefit of the cab owner; I am doing it for myself, for my own benefit. That which the gentleman from Deerfield wants is not contrary to the principle of this measure. What he wants to get is the privilege for these towns to save money by sending their pupils to these academies and having the benefit of their funds. The amendment which I offered in the Committee of the Whole, and which the committee rejected, provides that "Nothing herein contained shall prevent any city or town from expending money, raised by taxation or otherwise, in the education of its school children in any school approved by the school-committee and not under ecclesiastical or sectarian control." Mr. President, I move this in amendment of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden).

Mr. Stoneman of Boston: I am called out of town to-morrow on a matter of great importance and cannot be here when the vote on this resolution will be taken. I am heartily in favor of resolution No. 347 and opposed to all of the amendments except the perfecting amendments which the committee on the Bill of Rights will offer, and I desire to be recorded in that way.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I desire to offer this amendment: To amend the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton) by striking out the words to be inserted and inserting in place thereof the following: "and to carry out the provisions as now defined of chapter 78 of the Resolves of 1911 and of chapter 87 of the Resolves of 1912."

Mr. President, I offer this amendment because it seems to me in the briefer form to state what I have already stated in my other amendment. I do not propose to recount the reasons why I offered that other amendment, further than to say that they apply to my present amendment. I am not proposing this matter, as I have stated before, on behalf of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. I did not introduce it at their request, or at the request of anybody. I take the full responsibility for it myself. It was introduced without their knowledge, and I have had no conferences with them about it, but I am pressing it because I think it is simple and ordinary justice for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to carry out. Mr. President, I think I have more faith in the so-called sectarian amendment than even some of the members of the committee on Bill of Rights, because I believe that it can survive even if it does justice in this particular. I already have stated my reasons for the amendment, and I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment printed on page 2 in favor of the amendment which I now offer.
Consideration of the resolution was resumed Wednesday, August 22.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I desire, Mr. President, to say just a word in explanation of the amendment which I offered last week and which is printed in the calendar. That amendment has no relation, either directly or indirectly, with the subject which the committee have had under examination. It in no way relates to what is called the sectarian issue. It is not to be classified in any way with that issue. For the past fifty years or so there has been a discussion among lawyers as to what the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution really intended. It has been argued on both sides; by some that the State has control over its appropriations for local education; by others it has been contended that the State has no control over the subject of appropriations for local education. All lawyers I think agree that the language is at least ambiguous.

Now, all my amendment seeks to do is to leave it to the Legislature to straighten out a situation which at least has become irritating in connection with the Board of Education and the local boards of education. In other words, if this amendment be adopted it simply leaves it to the Legislature to determine by what authority the money appropriated by the State shall be expended. For instance, if the Legislature to-day were to make appropriation of a million dollars to be used in the small towns and the manufacturing centers, in order that the children in those localities should receive education of the same standard and the same quality as those in the more favored towns, the State, it will be claimed, has no control as to the manner in which that money shall be expended. Now, I dislike very much, Mr. President, to have this Convention adjourn and not have that question settled; and since it has no connection whatever with the amendments that have been offered relating to sectarian education, I move you that this amendment which I have offered be considered after all the other amendments are disposed of in connection with and just before the main question is voted upon.

I have nothing further to say except that I want to divorce this amendment from these other amendments which have been offered. I want to say one word further, and that is that I am in full sympathy with the report of the committee. It is my purpose to support this committee; and my belief is that there is no reason why this amendment should be voted down by this Convention simply because it is an amendment to the report of the committee. The work which the committee has done has been most admirable. They have settled a vexed question, which has been disturbing the State for a good many years. I expect to see the resolution adopted. I expect to see it go before the people and be adopted by the people. But there is no reason why the amendment which I offer, which is in the interest of education and which has the support of the Board of Education, and so far as I know has the support of every one who believes in broadening the educational system of this State, should be voted down by this Convention. Therefore I move you, Mr. President, that this amendment be considered just before the main question is taken up, after all the other amendments, which are supposed to be more or less hostile to the report of the committee, have been disposed of.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: I should like to ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat if this phase of the question has been discussed before the committee on Bill of Rights.

Mr. Powers: I am not sure whether it was discussed there or not. It was not called to my attention until some two weeks ago. It was brought to my attention by the chairman of the Board of Education, and he was very anxious that this motion should be pressed here in the interest of State education.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: Would not the effect of this amendment be to throw this whole question into the hands of the Legislature?

Mr. Powers: I should say it would not have the slightest effect, for the very reason that it relates only to public education, and public education under State authority, and that is just what the committee is attempting to work out,—that all public education shall be under State authority,—and this amendment is entirely in line with what the committee is seeking to accomplish.

Mr. Lomasney: If this amendment prevails does it not really interfere with the school-committees' operations and their control in every school district in this State?

Mr. Powers: My reply to that is that this amendment does not interfere with anything. It simply leaves the Legislature to determine what authority shall be exercised by the State in State appropriations, and it seems to me that the local school boards can well afford to leave the matter with the Legislature. I feel quite sure that the Legislature will do nothing that is hostile to local education.

Mr. Lomasney: If it does not do anything why should we pass it?

Mr. Powers: The reason for that is this: It does not affect the present situation, but it leaves the Legislature free to determine what conditions may be imposed upon State appropriations.

Mr. Lomasney: Does it not allow the Legislature to give the Board of Education control over these total expenditures of the money given by the State, and supervise it, and absolutely control the school-committee in the different districts of this State?

Mr. Powers: I cannot agree to that proposition. I do not think it does that.

Mr. Lomasney: I should like to ask the meaning of these words: "... or of such State authorities as the Legislature may direct."

Mr. Powers: That has reference to State appropriations and not to local appropriations. That is the purpose of the amendment: That the Legislature may impose conditions as to the manner in which moneys appropriated by the Legislature for local aid may be expended. And it would be a very remarkable proposition, Mr. President, if the State were not to have control over its own appropriations, which it makes for the benefit of a local community.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: I desire to call the attention of the Convention to a question which fairly arises from this resolution and which thus far has not been discussed. That question relates to the authority of the Legislature in the future to exempt religious, educational and charitable institutions from taxation. At present those institutions are exempt, and there is constitutional authority for the Legislature making the exemption; but if this amendment is adopted by the people I doubt very much, without pretending to answer the question and speaking under correction, whether there will be any longer authority in the Legislature to exempt these institutions from taxation. I ask the attention of the Convention, especially of the lawyers, but also of every member, to the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court upon a question of taxation which was referred to them by the Senate, in 1908, and to which, among other things, they made this answer; and I hold it of so much importance that I believe it is a duty to bring to the attention of the Convention what the Justices replied. Speaking of taxation in general, they said (195 Mass. 608):

There are other provisions under which the Legislature has acted, relative to particular subjects which involve taxation or exemption from taxation. The third article of the Declaration of Rights, and Article XI of the amendments which was substituted for it, recognize the importance of the public worship of God, and of instruction in piety, religion and morality, as promoting the happiness and prosperity of a people and the security of a republican government. Accordingly, taxation for these purposes is authorized. As taxation to procure property for such uses is permitted, exemption of property so procured is legitimate, under the special provisions of the Constitution touching this subject. We have also constitutional requirements for the encouragement of literature and science, the diffusion of education among the people, and the promotion of "general benevolence, public and private charity" and other kindred virtues. As taxation of the people may be imposed for these objects, property used for literary, educational, benevolent, charitable or scientific purposes may well be exempted from taxation.

The exemption is based upon this idea, and this idea only, that since taxation may be imposed for the protection and fostering of these institutions, therefore exemption may be allowed, and when taxation may not be imposed to foster and protect these institutions exemptions may not be allowed. When the authority to aid by taxation is gone the right to exempt from taxation is gone.

We should vote upon this matter with our eyes open to this peril; that if we adopt this resolution, — and again I speak hesitatingly, because I have not had the opportunity to consider the matter so fully as I should wish, — if this resolution is adopted we expose these institutions to taxation because we take away the excuses for exemption, that they are to be protected, fostered and aided by the Commonwealth. I may say that the opinion of our late colleague, Attorney-General Malone, was to the same effect. There was the authority to aid these institutions, and that authority to tax to aid them was also the authority to exempt. Now, let us not act blindly, but know that if we pass this resolution we are exposing these institutions to taxation.

Mr. President, if this resolution is to be submitted to the people, — and the signs are unmistakable that it will be submitted, — it should be offered to them in its least objectionable form. Therefore, I urge the proposal of the committee on Form and Phraseology, striking out the eighteenth amendment. I attempted, perhaps imperfectly, to tell the Convention that the rééactment of that amendment was not necessary, — that amendment which is irritating to a body of people who are discontented, but are not clamorous, not protesting, not remonstrating. The Catholic people are not doing any of those things. They are not here causing any confusion by protests or petitions. In the multitude of petitions which were handed in by the churches, religious conferences and ministerial meetings in support of this resolution, I wish you to remember that there was not one that came from a Catholic conference or a Catholic church. The Catholics refuse to take responsibility, and will refuse to take it, for this resolution, and for anything that comes out of it. If these institutions which have been aided in the past are to be denied aid in the future, let no man stand up and say that it was because of Catholic petitions or Catholic remonstrances. There is no amendment sectarian or anti-sectarian offered by the Catholics.

That reminds me, too, of the remarks of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Webster) that some of us, who wanted to stay where we find ourselves under the Constitution, were extremists, and that he and his friends were taking the middle of the road. Well, it is a small matter,—the characterization of our position,—whether you call us extremists or not; but it is an extraordinary statement to make, that the men who are content with the provisions of the Constitution as they have existed for a hundred and thirty-seven years are extremists, and the men who call upon us to pass the most drastic constitutional amendment that ever has been offered,—I do not think its like is found in any State,—are the middle-of-the-road men. The men who deny all aid to private institutions might well be characterized as the extremists, if the characterization meant anything.

Again, I urge on the Convention to accept the amendment to the resolution relative to the grants of public money to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Whether the State is under a legal obligation and a just obligation,—and our court has decided that it will recognize no other,—or a moral obligation, or a political obligation, there is an obligation in honor, and Massachusetts should not repudiate her honor. When the State says to trustees: "If you go out and raise a million dollars, and if you go out and raise half a million dollars, and if you grant us so many scholarships, the Legislature will make you annual appropriations of a fixed amount for ten years," and the trustees do it, and then we withdraw the promise made by the State, it makes a man believe that the Convention is obsessed. It is not creditable to the State to do that, and the value of this resolution, if it otherwise has any value, will not be impaired by respecting an obligation that in honor Massachusetts is bound to respect.

I believe also that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur), giving us the right to use private hospitals and to aid them, should be accepted, and, again, the acceptance of this amendment will not impair the usefulness of this resolution, if otherwise it is valuable.

Mr. President, the gentleman from Northampton (Mr. Feiker) asked a pertinent question which should be answered before we vote, and which has not been answered. He asked if anybody claimed that, in all the appropriations for one hundred and odd years which have been made to private institutions, ostensibly not for the private institutions' sake but for the sake of the Commonwealth, any part had been misappropriated, any part had been misapplied, or that the appropriations had not brought back fruits a thousandfold; and no one has made that claim. The gentleman's question remains unanswered, and it may be taken for granted that there is no answer other than the one he indicated when he asked the question,—that Massachusetts must acknowledge the public service rendered by these institutions and their honest administration of public funds.

Why then are we taking this course if that is true? The gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) said, and if I misquote him I ask to be corrected: "We may as well admit that the anti-sectarian amendment is aimed at the Catholic Church." It is true this is not the original anti-sectarian resolution, but it also is true that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), who introduced the anti-sectarian resolution, said in the course of his argument that there were a hundred thousand minute-men who stood to advocate and advance his amendment. He told us that if we did not take this amendment he would give us the anti-sectarian amendment; and that, even though the Catholics supported this amendment at the polls, if it was defeated we must take the other, — he would give us the other, — and you sat here and applauded. Are we taking it because we are afraid of the threat?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

I am not here asking for aid for religious institutions. I do not want the State tied up with any church. I am not here asking for aid for the teaching of religion in any school. I do not want the State money spent to teach creed or doctrine. I stand just where you stand who are the most ardent champions of the separation of church and State, and I want to be counted with you in that separation; but when the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) told us what a benefit it was to the church in France that the Concordat had been repealed, that the contract which was made in reparation for the spoliation and confiscation of church property had been cancelled and repealed, and that the church benefited by the repeal, you applauded that too. The repeal of the Concordat was not intended to help the church, it was a part of the policy of persecution of the church, adopted and mercilessly carried out by the government of France and intended to destroy religion, but it failed. It would have been better to tell the whole story. France is our ally, and we honor her for her superb and glorious defence of human liberty. She is our ally, and I would not say one word to throw a shadow upon her glory, — not a word. But tell the whole truth. It is no discovery that the gentleman made, that religion prospers under persecution. No matter whose religion, Catholic or Protestant or Jew, it never was in the power of violence, of human violence, to bayonet a man's faith. You cannot stamp faith out that way. What men honestly believe, God Almighty protects from the violence of men; persecution cannot destroy it; and it is a saying as old as religion itself, as old as the church in any event, that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. It is no discovery that religion prospered under persecution. But tell what it was that was done. It was not simply the repeal of the Concordat, or the taking out of the Bible from public institutions. It was the horrible, the blasphemous boast of the Minister of Education that the government had driven out the Divine Founder of Christianity from the hospitals, from schools, from military camps, from the courts, and that it would drive Him out of France. It was the confiscation of church estates, the banishment of the religious, the blotting out of the name of God from the children's school-books, all these things combined, that aroused the faith of France and brought back religion in all its fullness and in all its strength. The church will not suffer, religion will not suffer from persecution; religion will be protected. I therefore ask this Convention, which applauded an act that was a part of the persecution, to ask itself this question: When until now, and where excepting in this hall, did we ever hear persecution justified because it failed? That is exactly what we have heard.

Do not accept this resolution with the assurance that the question is settled. It is not settled here. Whatever assurance the Convention may have from the committee, and I admit it has a right to take cognizance of the committee's unanimous report, that this resolution when it is submitted to the people will be adopted without conflict, I wish to tell you that it is not so. I do not know about this immediate section, and I may not speak for it. I have the right to say something for the diocese in which I live; I think I have the right to say something about the diocese of Springfield; and I believe that the people in those dioceses,—the Catholic people,—will resent the passage of this resolution.

There is just one word more and I am through. This is a painful subject. I wish I might have escaped speaking of it; frankly, I have tried to run away from it; but in conscience I could not leave this question without telling you what I honestly believed. We have been admonished to help the academies and private institutions. Let me call your attention for a moment,—for a moment only,—to what the fathers have told us. It is the one case in the Constitution,—the one place,—where they have almost commanded us, and the command is to foster these institutions. I am reading from chapter 5, section 2:

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them.

That is the admonition, that is the charge, which came down to some of us who inherit the liberties for which these men had fought, and to some of us who are alien, who came here, as Lincoln said, to share, because we were of the human family, the liberties for which others had died. That is the admonition and warning: In all future periods, to cherish and protect the interests of literature, of the sciences and of seminaries of them. What are we doing? Worthy institutions are being rejected, as if there was something bad about them. It was claimed with reference to one of them that it was sectarian, or it was suggested that it was sectarian, because the Scriptures were read and a hymn was sung. Well, I hope the day is far distant when it will be an offence to read the Bible or an offence to sing a hymn in praise of God. I do not believe that Deerfield Academy is open to the objection that it is sectarian.

Mr. President, I have no vain hopes of changing the result in this Convention, for it is written, as the gentleman from Lowell (Mr. Daly) said, so plainly that the blindest of us must see that this Convention will accept this resolution. I know it is adopted in a spirit of peace-making; but I wish to remind the Convention that there is such a thing as making peace at too great a cost. Eighty years ago, when anti-slavery petitions were presented to Congress and the southern slaveholders were opposing the reception of the petitions, Massachusetts was advised to give up the right of petition for the sake of peace, and, I regret to say, for a time she yielded, but she soon redeemed herself. No man has shown why we should now surrender our rights, and this resolution is a humiliating surrender, for it represents the concession that fear makes to intolerance. [Applause.]

Mr. Donovan of Lawrence: It is not without considerable deliberation and also with some trepidation, after hearing the sages and statesmen who surround me, that I take the floor to explain to you why I shall vote against this amendment, — against all these amendments, — and against the resolution offered by this committee. In Massachusetts to-day a couple of technical schools, a few hospitals and some academies are being aided by public funds. There has been no outcry from people who believe in and who praise and who admire the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. The various academies and hospitals that are aided, — there has been no cry against them; in fact, there has been all praise for them, and there should be. There is no reason why any of these hospitals, these academies, these technical schools, that are doing good, should not be aided if they need aid. Therefore let us tear the mask from this thing, gentlemen, and get down to what it means and why it is in here.

Is it not, then, this, — that there is fear that there will be a call in this classic hall for money to pay for the support of parochial schools and the maintenance of Catholic churches? I am a Catholic layman, but I represent no body, I speak for no one but myself when I take this floor; but I ask you to remember this, — that if I sound a discordant note, it is sounded in absolute sincerity.

I have listened to all this argument, and I have had personal experience, because I am a graduate of a parochial school, a graduate of a public high school, a student in an evening public school, and a graduate of two large Protestant universities of this State, — I refer to Harvard University and Boston University, — so I feel that I have been through all sorts of schools.

Now, what does it mean? It means that there is a fear that money will be appropriated for parochial schools and for Catholic churches. Twenty years ago the Catholics were much poorer in Massachusetts than they are to-day; ten years ago they were much poorer than they are to-day. I should say offhand that they are better off to-day than they ever were in Massachusetts. And what are they doing? Without asking one single, solitary cent from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for parochial schools or for Catholic churches, in this State to-day there are 588 Catholic churches, 202 parochial schools, 1,324 Catholic priests, 117,000 pupils in the parochial schools of Massachusetts, and all supported by the Catholic people themselves without asking a cent from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and I hope the day never will come when they will ask for a cent from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

I tell you, gentlemen, there is no need of this measure. It is fostered and engendered by people who have an innate jealous fear in their souls. There is no need for this measure, no need whatsoever. The Catholics never asked for it. They have not asked for it up to to-day, when they are better off than they ever were, and there is no reason to believe that they ever will ask for it in the future.
Now, then, what would be some of these results from this measure? I think that the point taken by the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) is an excellent one. There is fear that if you pass this measure you cannot exempt the churches and schools from taxation. What is the result? Not only do Catholic churches and schools come under this, but Harvard University comes under it, with its $26,000,- 000, and I should not want to see Harvard burdened any more than it is burdened now. The Old South Church, probably worth $2,000,000, on Washington Street, comes under this for taxation. So it hits every- body. It hits all denominations. It hits everything that is exempted now, and I think that that point is well taken. Why should we let this innate fear, this jealousy on the part of certain people in our community, plunge us into a maelstrom of trouble by passing such a measure?

Gentlemen, there is another thing to consider. It says in this measure that we shall not aid, maintain, etc., in the language of the resolu- tion, any institution not under public control. Does this ever occur to you, — that you could not buy produce from institutions that are under sectarian control? Did this ever occur to you? For instance, St. John's preparatory school in Danvers is situated very near the Danvers Insane Asylum. If this ever should occur, think what a curious, comical situation it would be, — that if St. John's preparatory school should raise five hundred bushels of potatoes on its farm, and be able to use only fifty of them, it could not sell those to the Dan- vers Insane Asylum because they would be Catholic potatoes. That situation may arise, because if there is any profit on those you could not aid or maintain any institution under sectarian control.

Gentlemen, there is also this to consider. The hospitals and insti- tutions in this State that are doing good work should not be cut off. The Boston City Hospital should not be cut off from the appropria- tion that it is getting to-day. None of these institutions should be cut off because of this measure that is aimed perniciously at some- thing that there is no reason for it to be aimed at. Another thing I tell the advocates of the initiative and referendum is this: That if this measure is submitted to the people it will be argued from the conserva- tive standpoint that it is aimed at the Catholic people, and an effort will be made to induce people to vote against both amendments. We are in a time of war, gentlemen. Four men are leaving this Con- vention for Plattsburg at the end of this week. There are thirty-six others of us who are under this draft, who may be called at any mo- ment. I tell you that it is no time to inject religious strife. It is not simply in my own city where a great many of them are ready to vote against this legislation; they feel it is a gratuitous insult to the Catholic people of this State. I tell you, gentlemen, to vote down this resolution; there is no need for it, and it is simply kept along and engendered by a spirit that long ago should have died in the Common-wealth of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: Though a member of the committee, I have carefully restrained myself from saying anything, in the hope that we should reach a vote some time ago. Some days ago, perhaps some months ago, in the Committee of the Whole, we passed unanimously this proposition. Now we are asked to change our conclusion, sitting in Convention, and we have heard various arguments, but the principal argument is that there is a moral obligation to make various payments of money to different institutions; the Committee of the Whole at the time it passed this amendment knew then of this so-called moral obligation, and let me say that in the Bill of Rights Committee there were many men who considered this moral obligation.

Now, in the ten minutes that I have to speak I cannot hope to say all I had hoped to say, and I am not going to ask for any extra time because there are a number who want to speak. Very briefly and very hurriedly, let me give a brief résumé of what has been said.

The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) opposed the amendment the other day, and was the only one practically who did oppose it; to-day he opposes it, and to-day he brings in a new argument, — that under the Constitution we cannot exempt churches and schools from taxation, if we pass this measure. It is true, he says that he expressed that opinion with some hesitation. What is his solution? Why, he says it can be solved by substituting the resolution of the committee on Form and Phraseology; but if you read that resolution it is the same thing as this one. It has the same wording, it prohibits any and all appropriations. Now, the committee on Bill of Rights discussed that matter of tax exemption. They came to the conclusion, and every lawyer will come to the same conclusion, that there is nothing in the phraseology of this amendment to forbid the State to exempt churches and public institutions from taxation.

The revered ex-Governor from Arlington (Mr. Brackett) has said, in favor of the appropriation for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, that we ought to encourage education, that the south is outstripping us in manufactures, etc. I have not time to go into all his argument. But one gentleman from Lawrence, another one from Lowell, — and this also answers the gentleman from Lowell who pleaded for the textile schools the other day, and also answers the gentleman from Fall River, — two men came before us, one of them a delegate in this Convention from Lowell, and objected to any further appropriation for the Lowell Textile School because the money was misappropriated, because the schools were for the benefit of the mill owners, and because the men who got their education there at the expense of the State went south to build up the industries of the south. The beloved ex-Governor suggested that we ought to educate our young men in industry to compete with the south and I agree with him; if he would make an amendment that all the recipients of scholarships at the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and the Institute of Technology be compelled to remain here in Massachusetts, where they received their education, to build up our industries, then we might get results. The gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) spoke about the moral obligation, — a moral obligation on the part of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to subscribe to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Who made the contract, if there was a contract? It was the Legislature, and it never was ratified by the people of Massachusetts, it never was ratified by my people, and as their representative in the Legislature I voted against the Worcester Polytechnic appropriation. In the testimony that we heard before our committee there was not one word about the need of this appropriation, there is no financial need of it; and yet they demand the pound of flesh. The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) has well said: "Let them stick to their contract,"—these men who speak about the moral obligation. Look at the phraseology of the amendment they suggest. It is not to ratify what has been done, but it is to compel the State, by a skilfully worded amendment, to continue the payments whether there was a contract or not; they seek to protect this moral obligation in a most immoral way.

Then the revered Justice from Fall River (Mr. Morton) made a wise suggestion, that if there is any obligation, if there is any contract, to permit the State to appropriate moneys to fulfil the legal contract; and they would not accept that suggestion. At that time they thought they could pass the original resolution. Some days ago, in a more subtle and more skilfully worded amendment, the suave and beloved gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) suggested that the State be permitted to continue appropriations for scholarships; and at that time, with the same moral obligation staring us in the face, we voted unanimously against it. Now, they ought to receive no fruit of this compromise.

Then take the gentleman in favor of the Deerfield Academy (Mr. Boyden). We listened to the testimony that was adduced by him. Before he went to Deerfield there was the same academy, with fourteen pupils, a private institution, run for private profit; and that institution, with fourteen pupils, would be eligible under his amendment to receive assistance from the State; they say these little towns ought to be permitted to save money; and some of the towns perhaps,—not Deerfield, but some of the towns,—might prefer to escape taxation of $2,000 or $3,000 by contributing small sums to a worthless institution rather than have a high school at substantial expense. As the gentleman, the ex-congressman from Newton (Mr. Powers), has well said, to-day there is a standard of public education. Why should these small towns be permitted to escape? The gentleman who favors this resolution has performed well there. He has now over two hundred pupils. But what is going to happen when he leaves? Perhaps his predecessor might come back, and the school will run down to fourteen pupils, and still the town would contribute rather than build a high school.

The gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) says, about his private hospital amendment, that the State ought to be allowed to contribute; and so also says the gentleman from Fall River. The latter opposes this measure primarily; he also favors every amendment which will weaken it. Now he says the State ought to be permitted to contribute to private hospitals, which are creatures of the public service corporations to such an extent that it became necessary to curb them, and I introduced a bill, which was passed, that these hospitals should not put into their records, when a man was injured, anything but the medical history of the injury and the medical treatment of the case. Creatures of the corporations! When a man goes to one of these private hospitals, the hospital and the doctors therein immediately become employees of the railroad corporations, and I am strenuously opposed to any appropriation for these hospitals.

Now, as I said before, why should my people in Ward 14 be taxed for the Worcester Polytechnic Institute? What obligation is there that my people have entered into when I, as their representative, opposed it?

I do not know how long I have spoken, but there is one other thing, perhaps it has nothing to do with this debate, which I say by reason of the remarks of the gentleman from Boston yesterday, when he gave all the credit of that committee work to a few prominent men. Now, I would not take away one iota of the praise that the papers and this Convention have given them, but there are other members on that committee, and as a member of that committee I am going to give very brief testimony here relative to the work performed by them. There was not a chair-warmer on that committee. Everybody did something. On that measure there is some virile thought and much of suggestion from every member of the committee. There is one member, — and I can say this now; at the beginning of our deliberations I thought he would be too narrow to ever compromise or agree to such a measure, — and he is the judge from Cambridge (Mr. Welcott); at one time there were four or five dissenters, and we seemed far apart, but the judge from Cambridge, with a desire to serve his Commonwealth, brought us all together, and we have that resolution. And there were four other dissenters: the majestic appearing lawyer from Gloucester (Mr. Merrill), the judge from Franklin (Mr. Doe), the clergyman from Waltham (Mr. Webster); they all yielded in their desire to help Massachusetts; and the judge from Taunton (Mr. Swig) has made many wise suggestions. And there is one almost unknown, the member from Adams (Mr. Stoeb), a laborer, a workingman, who perhaps made few suggestions and said but little except that from the beginning, when there was no conception of the liberality in this committee, he was fearlessly insistent that something be done to help Massachusetts. And the other gentleman from Boston (Mr. Callahan), whom I never had known personally, the gentleman who sits back of me, was the most tolerant member on the committee. While we all glory in the honors that were given to the gentleman from Boston, and the district attorney (Mr. Pelletier), and would not take one iota from them, we wish to see that every member of the committee receives his due meed.

Mr. Barret of Cambridge: I wish to refer very briefly to a matter that has not been touched by the preceding speakers, namely, the grants of various cities and towns to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Notwithstanding the legal or the moral obligations of the Legislature of 1911, the city that I have the honor to represent in part has donated in an indirect way hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In the first place, Mr. President, our city has exempted from taxation for a number of years the land on which the buildings owned and occupied by the Institute of Technology now stand, doing so in anticipation of having an increase in our tax revenue. The first thing the city knew, through a shrewd real estate concern this land was all bought up for the Institute of Technology, which now has some $9,000,000 of property in Cambridge exempt from taxation.

Now, I do not stand here in favor of the taxation of educational institutions, by any means, though we in our city have some $50,000,000 of property exempt from taxation from an educational standpoint, — entirely college property; but I believe it is unfair, Mr.
President, that our city should be required, whether we have any moral obligations or not, to pay anything extra to the Institute of Technology, or similar institutions, when we already are staggering under a tax rate of $23.50 last year, and our tax rate will be $25 and more this year. In view of the fact that we have seven sectarian schools in our city, taking care of seven thousand children, if the governing power of those schools said to the city of Cambridge tomorrow: "We cannot afford to educate those children any longer, we will allow the city to do it," it would mean the expenditure in buildings alone of some $2,000,000, and it would mean the maintenance of those schools at over $500,000 annually; and that would mean that our city would be driven into bankruptcy. The children, the pupils and the graduates of those schools, are an honor to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and to the Nation. I could name a hundred of them who are doing their part for the Nation in far-away France. They are the men who are not coming to the exemption boards in order to avoid their honest duty to the Nation with as much strapping and harness on as would subdue a Kentucky mule. They are not men of the type of the Kingdon Goulds and the Noble Fosses, whose personality is so much above the common herd that there is no name in the Christian or Hebrew calendar good enough to distinguish them from ordinary mortals,—who have formed an unholy alliance of mammon, aristocracy and cowardice. I believe, Mr. President, that when those men are returning from the front, we, who are living here in luxury and ease, legislating for them, ought to let them know that they are coming into a State where the laws will be better than when they left us. I believe the time and test are right here now when all this racial difference should be forever driven out of our State.

I have the greatest possible respect, Mr. President, for the men who compose this committee on Bill of Rights, and also for the judgment of the presiding officer who selected them. I question if there is a legislative assembly in this Nation that could get together fifteen men, possessing all these racial differences, religious and political traits so far apart, and come out as one solid man in favor of this resolution. I believe, Mr. President, it is a forerunner of what is going to happen through the States and in our Nation, moulded all in one body.

I am reminded, Mr. President, of the words of one of my favorite poets, written perhaps a century ago, but applicable to present conditions, when he said:

Shall I ask the brave soldier who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds do agree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar with me?
From the heretic girl of my soul would I fly,
To seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
No! perish the hearts and the laws that try Truth, valor, or love by a standard like this!

Mr. PARKER of Lancaster: The least suggestion that should fall from the lips of my honored colleague, the delegate from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), sitting in this division, and intended to guide the deliberations of this Convention, ought to, and would and does, fall upon respectful, attending and receptive ears. Instantly my anxious attention was arrested when he suggested this morning the new and somewhat menacing proposition that the adoption of the resolution proposed by the committee on Bill of Rights would endanger the safety of the ancient charitable and educational institutions of this Commonwealth by removing their present immunity from taxation.

Mr. President, if my honored friend, speaking with the authority that attaches to his every word interpretative of our law, had declared that it was his deliberate opinion that the adoption of this resolution would put in jeopardy these worthy institutions, I should have gravely hesitated before I dared even make inquiry with respect to the authority of that opinion. But my friend speaks always conscious of the grave responsibility that attends his words, and he has not said to us that it is his opinion that this perhaps disastrous removal of exemption from taxation would befall these institutions. I therefore venture to make inquiry, I therefore venture to suggest, upon principles of reason, though I have not reviewed the language of the opinions of the court to which he has referred, and so I would say in the modest phrase of inquiry rather than of dogmatic or of authoritative statement, that I have supposed, and believe it to be true, that the immunity from taxation afforded and extended to charitable and educational institutions established in this Commonwealth, is extended, in part compensation, in part in grateful recognition of the public service that these institutions so graciously, benevolently, philanthropically and constantly perform. And, sir, I believe it to be a principle of law, as it is a principle of justice, that so long as these institutions do discharge these high and beneficent services, the consideration of the State will extend to them in matters of taxation in recognition of this service performed and to be performed. I cannot believe, sir, because a source of income may be denied to or withdrawn from any of these institutions, the State will thereupon immediately visit upon these beneficent organizations, serving for the welfare of the State, additional burdens.

Let us not then shrink from the duty manifestly resting upon us to deal directly with the wise measure which the committee has reported to us, through phantom fears of evils that I myself, Mr. President, do not believe to be imminent, or evils that will not befall; because this State never will repudiate an obligation that it owes to man or institution so long as the service for which that compensation is to be paid shall be rendered to the Commonwealth. Let us not be diverted by the confusion of apprehensive fears. And until my honorable friend shall say, with the responsibility that attaches to his words, that this evil consequence of a removed exemption from taxation will inevitably fall upon these institutions, I shall stand for a principle that I believe to be immutable because it is just, and I believe that this high service of these institutions will go on and it will be recognized by the Commonwealth.

But, sir, to the end that the principle set forth in the resolution reported to us by the committee may be sustained, uncontaminated, unaffected, by all lesser considerations, I would accept the resolution as proposed by the committee, already evidently approved by this Convention, even though some incident of burdens of taxation might result; for I know well that the people of this Commonwealth, whether acting through their Legislature or acting as individuals, are animated by a common conscience, and a common high purpose to see to it, by whatever adjustment may be necessary to be made, that these institutions shall be preserved.

And, sir, one word with respect to the resolution itself. Already, from all sides and from all opinions in this Convention, words of high praise have been given deservedly to this committee for the conscience and courage it has displayed. Its purpose is, sir, that all interests, material or financial, all the solicitations of zealous or filial devotion to this or that institution, all temporal temptations, all temporal and financial favors, shall be kept far away from contaminating the perpetual security of this great principle, the preservation of the religious faith of our people, and its absolute separation from all solicitations, attritions and activities, either collective or individual in their character. And, sir, that forever it may be kept above those conflicts, above those asperities of ambition, of passion or of prejudice, let the principle of our religious faith, the absolute inviolability of its observance, be committed, as this committee has wisely sought to commit it, to the perpetual, safe, just guardianship of a Constitutional provision. [Applause.]

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I regret that there is a feeling here that those who are not in favor of the committee report, or who are in favor of some of the amendments, should not be given even a ten-minute period in which to express themselves. I shall take less than that time. I have listened to the debate in the hope that the many members of this Convention for whose judgment I have great respect, in whose sincerity I have absolute belief, would convince me that the principle underlying this amendment is right and sound, and that desirable results may accrue to the Commonwealth from the enactment of this amendment to the Constitution. If I had been enabled otherwise to follow their judgment instead of my own, I should have been compelled to retrace my steps by the argument and the statement of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings). Perhaps no two men view questions of creed and of religious conviction from more different points of view than he and I. He is a believer in the Catholic church. I am a Protestant of the Protestants, an attendant of the Unitarian church. But I believe he is profoundly right when he says that this proposed amendment is wrong in principle and will be found harmful in operation.

Let us look for a minute at what the facts are. The facts are that our ancestors came over here, not to found a Commonwealth free for religion, but to found a Protestant evangelical theocracy, and my ancestors were then in the dominant class. And we all were brought up under the theory, in many parts of New England, that the taxing power should be used for the benefit of the Protestant evangelical church. In substance, the Constitution of 1780, that social compact so cherished by the learned gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate), provided that the Protestant Congregational Evangelical Church should be the established church of Massachusetts. We have gotten away from it gradually, moving toward what I believe to be sound principle; that sound principle is that there shall be no public money devoted, directly or indirectly, to or for the benefit of any sectarian or religious purpose. The principle which underlies this amendment is that there shall be no public money devoted to any educational purpose which is not under absolute State control. I have yet to learn that educational purposes are "private purposes," as was argued by one of the delegates from Boston. I know of no "public purpose" which is more important for the welfare of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts than education. I cannot subscribe to the proposition that the devotion of public money to an absolutely non-sectarian,—if you choose, non-religious,—educational institution is the devotion of public money to any other than a most fundamentally important "public purpose." On that ground I must stand.

I should be glad to vote for an amendment based upon the principle I have just stated, if, indeed, it be necessary to have any amendment.

Now, Mr. President, this is not a new question to me. I had six years' experience of it in the Boston school-committee a good many years ago; and then I adhered to the principles which I thought were sound. At one period I was denounced as an A. P. A., at another period I was denounced as a pro-Catholic; I have had the feeling, being denounced by both of the extremists, that I had somehow or other found and kept the middle of the road.

One word more and I have finished. I do not believe the resolves under which appropriations are being made for the two Institutes of Technology are contracts which the courts can enforce. I think I know that they are obligations binding in honor and in interest upon the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I hope that if this amendment is submitted otherwise to the people for its acceptance that the amendments permitting appropriations of money to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology will be made a part thereof. I hope that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Deerfield (Mr. Boyden) will also be adopted. There can be no doubt that it is in the interest of several of the poorer towns of the Commonwealth to allow them to utilize private funds which have been given for academies. Therefore I shall vote for those amendments, and I shall vote against the entire proposition. For, I repeat, this resolution is unsound in principle, and if adopted will be found harmful to the peace, the quiet and to the religious freedom of the people of this Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Broderick of Waltham: I hope that the amendment as reported by the committee will be adopted. It does not meet my approval in every particular, but no doubt it is the best possible solution of the question. I do not believe, however, that it will accomplish all that many hope it may accomplish, which is that it will eliminate from the minds of our citizens all religious feelings in the consideration of public questions and of candidates for public office. That result, in my judgment, cannot be accomplished by legislation, though its harmful effects might be reduced if it were made unlawful to urge publicly or privately the defeat of any candidate by appeals to religious prejudice. It can best be brought about by education, by inculcating into the minds of men the great principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution of the United States. It is a disturbing tendency that ought to be discountenanced because it contravenes the application and effect of those principles which alone should guide every citizen in his civil conduct and action.

But in the consideration of the subject-matter of this resolution we should recognize at all times the good that religion has done in the State, in the Nation and throughout the world. Certainly, we should not embody in our Constitution any provision that would be offensive to religion. If we are to prohibit by constitutional provision the appropriation of public money for private institutions that are under religious control, then we should include in the prohibition non-religious institutions. To do otherwise would be to declare that religion is an evil which taints any institution that may encourage its teachings.

I do not favor this amendment on the principle of the separation of church and State. These great institutions, the one religious and the other governmental, while they move in a sphere distinct and separate, are not rivals, and their relations always should be harmonious and friendly. And it should be deemed a proper subject for consideration, to what degree, in order to promote the general welfare, they may cooperate without encroaching on the well-defined and definite functions of either. Surely in this awful moment of strife which threatens to exterminate the human race, the church and the State may and ought to cooperate to find and apply some remedy to relieve suffering humanity.

I am in favor of this amendment on the principle that the taking of the money of one individual or group of individuals to give it to others is unjust and an abuse of the taxing power. Second only to the power to take the life and liberty of the individual is the power to take the property of the individual without compensation. The exercise of that power is excusable and justifiable only when the property taken has been unlawfully acquired or is unlawfully held, or when it is indispensable to meet the legitimate expense incident to the administration of government.

This amendment is intended to prohibit such taking and I hope therefore that it will be adopted by the Convention in the form in which it has been reported by the committee.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: In bringing to a close this debate which has continued now for many days, I wish to call to the attention of the Convention several especially pertinent questions.

First, about the question of taxation.
In answer to inquiries, it might be well to say that the taxation of church, charitable and educational property or enterprises is not involved in our proposal, and is furthest from the intention of the committee. Special pains have been taken with the wording in order to avoid any disturbance of the status quo on this subject.
That statement, gentlemen, was prepared by the committee.
The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) argues that if we take away the power to aid educational institutions by money raised by taxation, we may lose our power to exempt them from taxation.
But we now have power to exempt churches from taxation, although we have no power to aid them with money raised by taxation.
I think, gentlemen, that answers his argument.
Now, if the Convention will remember, in the opening statement which I made for the committee I said that in the Convention of 1853 the colleges and institutions of higher learning and academies defeated what was intended to be done and what was attempted to be done in that Convention; and, gentlemen, I said that same attempt will be made here; and I ask you to look at the 22 amendments offered to this resolution. What is the object? I am not a trained legislator; I am serving my first time in a legislative body. But I have been told that one way to kill a bill in the Legislature, and to kill a resolution in this Convention, is to load it down with amendments. And if this resolution is not loaded down, I will leave it to any legislator here if he ever saw one loaded down more heavily with amendments, each one of which has been offered by some delegate with a view to helping an individual scheme of his own.

Now I come to the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), and I again call attention to what I said in the opening days of this argument, — that there was no need to inject feeling here, no need to inject religion; and, gentlemen, has any man of our committee injected it?

And how is that committee made up? There are five Congregationalists, four Catholics, two Episcopalians, one Universalist, one Baptist, one Jew and one Agnostic. If that is not a fair committee from which to get a fair result in this Convention, I should like to know how one can be appointed.

Now, gentlemen, at the last minute of this discussion, or the last day, the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) rises here and throws in a new matter. He does it like a trained and skilled lawyer. You notice that he addressed you as Gentlemen of the Jury. That is what is in his mind, namely, at the last minute to turn this Convention by a jury argument.

I want also to say about the gentleman from Fall River that, while he spoke of one thing in particular, he then favored every single amendment. Why? Because if he could get one in he knows the measure will be defeated. He says that in its present form it would not be accepted at the polls. I do not know whether his judgment is better than mine or not, or better than other men here who have had some political experience. But in the last two months, — and I know people of every denomination and every walk of life in this city, — no man has approached me who said that; but many men have come to me and said that we have got the true solution of this difficulty. Therefore I say my judgment on that point may be just as good as his.

Gentlemen, I want to say that the committee, with all their fifteen votes, stand united on what I am about to ask the Convention.

On the amendment of Mr. Powers, we ask you to defeat it, to vote "No." The committee on Education, in document No. 309, has taken care of that matter.

The amendments of Mr. Anderson, all of them, were accepted by the committee. We ask you to pass them, to vote "Yes." On Mr. Blackmur's amendment we ask you to vote "No." I have not time to give the reasons; they have all been talked out here. On Mr. Anderson's again, the committee ask you to vote "Yes." On Mr. Lomasney's amendment to vote "Yes." Again, we ask you to vote "No" on Mr. Blackmur's. On my own amendment, which is simply putting in the correct words, we ask you to vote "Yes."

Now we come to Mr. Morton of Fall River. On the Institute of Technology question I have talked with many eminent lawyers, men who are sitting in this Convention, whose names I will not quote, who say, and agree with me, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts made a contract,—that the Massachusetts Institute of Technology agreed to give certain free scholarships, and the Institute also agreed to raise a certain amount of money. Assuming that both of these have been done, and the contract has been accepted, we say it is a good contract. But the gentleman from Fall River came to me and said: "If it is so, and if the Attorney-General says it is so, or the Supreme Judicial Court on a question of the Legislature says it is so, you have provided no way by which the Legislature can make an appropriation." And when I came to look at the resolution I found that he was entirely right, and the object of his amendment is to leave it so,—if you read it in connection with the rest of the resolution you will find that I am right,—that if the Supreme Judicial Court on a question, or if the Attorney-General, says that it is a good contract, with those words in, the Legislature can make an appropriation. Therefore the committee asks you to vote "Yes," on Mr. Morton's amendment.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the measure if the wording of the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River ought not to be slightly changed, the word "already" perhaps changed to "entered into prior to January 1st, 1917;" and if the amendment on page 3, moved by Mr. Anderson, be adopted; which I understand the committee to recommend, it will leave over a year between the adoption of the amendment, and throw it into one Legislature, and it might be a bone of contention in that Legislature.

Mr. Curtis: I think I can reply safely, without having time to go into it now, that the amendment is drawn by the former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, and I prefer to leave it as it is. As to the amendment of Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston, I understand that Mr. Bates if he had the opportunity would withdraw that, and therefore—

Mr. Bates: I have been waiting for an opportunity to get out of the way of this steam roller, Mr. President, hoping that I could get the floor so that I could withdraw my amendment. I do now ask unanimous consent to withdraw it, having been convinced by the weight of legal opinion in this Convention that it is unnecessary.

Mr. Washburn: Mr. President, in order to avoid confusion and because I am in favor of the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. Bryant of Milton, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment printed in the calendar. [Applause.]

Mr. Curtis: The next, at the bottom of page 2, is the amendment offered by Mr. Bryant of Milton. The Convention has heard the discussion on that; the committee asks the Convention to vote "No."

The next is the amendment of Mr. Blackmur of Quincy, and on that the committee requests that you vote "No."

On the question of the academies, you have all heard that discussion, and on that amendment the committee would ask the Convention to vote "No."

The same on Mr. Richardson's amendment which follows.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I come to the amendment of Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport. It seemed to me very unfair yesterday that the gentleman from Newburyport should have undertaken to put the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) into a false position by again moving his original amendment. The gentleman from
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Newton had explained to this Convention carefully, honestly, why he had changed his mind. I cannot understand the purpose of a man who comes in at the last day, when the matter of the original so-called Batcheller amendment has been disposed of to all intents and purposes, and again moves it; that is, if he is in good faith with the Convention. It seemed to me that his two suggestions,—the two suggestions offered yesterday by the gentleman from Newburyport,—were not what we call open and fair amendments; they were what I have described to start with, amendments put in here to cloud the issue, to defeat the main purpose of what the committee had tried to do. And so the committee ask you to reject the two amendments of Mr. Bartlett.

Mr. Washburn having withdrawn his amendment, of course there is nothing to be said as to that.

Mr. Anderson of Newton makes a last amendment, which we ask to have passed. We would like to have you vote "Yes" on Mr. Anderson's amendment on page 3.

The committee on Form and Phraseology report a new draft of the amendment, and on that, gentlemen, I want to speak with some care. If you will all take your little book, the Constitution, and look at page 97, you will find on that page the last words of the eighteenth amendment. Of those words I desire to speak. The last words are: "... and such moneys shall never be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance exclusively of its own schools." If the amendment of the committee on Form and Phraseology prevails the whole eighteenth amendment as it stands now will continue to stand, and what will be submitted to the people if this Convention passes this committee's report will commence with "No grant shall be made."

Now, gentlemen, I want to try to show you, without criticizing the committee on Form and Phraseology, admitting they have done good work, that perhaps they do not know as much about the main question as our committee. So what I say is not a criticism, but an attempt at explanation. The committee on Bill of Rights objects to the division of the amendment leaving the present Article XVIII of the Bill of Rights as at present and making a new amendment to the Bill of Rights numbered 45, as recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology on pages 8 and 9 of document No. 347.

The first objection of the committee on Bill of Rights is that its amendment covers all institutions and undertakings of whatever nature which are not of a purely public character. Schools and colleges are but one of several species of the same family. These are mentioned among other institutions in all the drafts which were submitted to the committee. So far as educational institutions are concerned, they naturally group themselves with schools in the eighteenth amendment. If the question were only of where and how to insert an amendment covering this particular class of institutions no one would hesitate to say that the eighteenth amendment was the place. The common schools are there dealt with, and it was suggested in the Convention of 1853 that higher educational institutions should be dealt with in the same connection. But in principle, schools and educational institutions cannot be divorced from all other institutions, so far as the object of the committee's amendment is concerned. Why then make two bites of a cherry? Your committee were of the opinion that as the underlying principle involved not only public schools which the Convention of 1853 acted upon, not only colleges and higher educational institutions which the Convention of 1853 avoided, but all other classes of institutions, educational or otherwise, consistency and logic dictated that they be grouped together; that this Convention should start where the Convention of 1853 left off, and extend and perfect in a logical manner what that Convention left incomplete and imperfect.

The second objection to a division of the amendment arises out of the last clause in the eighteenth amendment, which is as follows:
"... and such moneys shall never be appropriated to any religious sect for the maintenance, exclusively, of its own schools."

Apparently just what these words meant was not known to some of the members of the Convention of 1853. For example, Mr. Hallett of Wilbraham considered the amendment established an ecclesiastical tribune. It declared that money raised for the support of schools never should be appropriated to any religious sect for the exclusive maintenance of its own schools. Now what is a religious sect? What is a maintenance exclusively of the schools of a religious sect? Who is to determine whether or not the town's money has been appropriated to any religious sect? Anything less than a whole is not exclusive.
"Therefore," said Mr. Hallett, "you may apply your money to a sectarian school all but. Any exception will save it."

The words may mean that, for example, an appropriation can be made to an academy of which all the trustees are Congregationalists, provided the doctrine of that sect is not taught therein and it is open to scholars of all denominations; as in that case the appropriation may not be for the "exclusive maintenance of that religious sect."
If that is what it means the committee on Bill of Rights do not feel that the words should remain and have omitted them to avoid such an interpretation.

To me it is not entirely clear what the author of the last clause in the eighteenth amendment intended to accomplish by it, but out of the uncertainty and doubt which his language creates in the mind one thought stands out persistently and clearly, that he sought to give some expression to the very same idea which is covered in all its phases and in explicit terms in the first part of the amendment of your committee, namely, that no public money should be appropriated to any school or institution wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated. It is unnecessary to consider how far or how imperfectly the last clause of the eighteenth amendment developed this idea. It is sufficient that your committee's amendment carries out every idea contained in the last clause of the eighteenth amendment in language which it is believed admits of no doubt.

The consequence is that if the amendment is separated from the eighteenth amendment as proposed, there will be two provisions in the Constitution covering the same thing, one of them, however, explicit and plain, the other, in the last clause of the eighteenth amendment, being subject to question. The people and posterity would be warranted in considering our work slipshod and careless if we acted on the same subject in a new amendment to the Constitution and left as if by oversight the old provision.

In short, if the present eighteenth amendment stands as recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology and the amendment recommended by your committee on Bill of Rights becomes Article XLV of the Bill of Rights, the two amendments are in contradiction.

Therefore, gentlemen, the committee ask you to vote "No" on the amendment of the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. President, we listened to Mr. George before the committee. There is no question that some of the things in his resolution are incorporated in ours. We have no criticism to make of him, but we say that possibly he does not know what the meaning is of some of the things he has in his resolution, and possibly the gentleman from Newburyport (Mr. Bartlett), who said he could write it in ten lines, does not know. Take these words in the resolution under discussion:

... and no law shall be passed respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Gentlemen, the committee would have been glad to have put that in. They would have put it in for the gentleman from Newton. Why did they leave it out? They did put in "No law shall be passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion", but refused to put in the first clause: "... and no law shall be passed respecting the establishment of religion." We did not want to offer in the future the possibility of some new religious society coming up and asking for a charter and having the Governor of the State veto the bill because it was unconstitutional. The first article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States contains these very words. The first two lines provide:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

It is said that this amendment was written by James Madison of Virginia, a member of the original Federal Constitutional Convention. Afterwards when Mr. Madison was President of the United States he was so fearful of violating the spirit of the first amendment that he refused his assent to a bill incorporating an Episcopal church in Alexandria, and also to a bill reserving a certain parcel of public land in Mississippi for the use of a Baptist church. I have the veto messages here and could read them, but I have not time. That is why we left out those words.

1 Story on the Constitution, vol. 2, § 1879, note. The veto messages referred to are as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States

Having examined and considered the bill entitled "An Act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," I now return the bill to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections:

Because the bill exceeds the rightful authority to which governments are limited by the essential distinction between civil and religious functions, and violates in particular the article of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment." The bill enacts into and establishes by law sundry rules and proceedings relative purely to the organisation and polity of the church incorporated, and comprehending even the election and removal of the minister of the same, so that no change could be made therein by the particular society or by the general church of which it is a member, and whose authority it recognises. This particular church, therefore, would so far be a religious establishment by law, a legal force and sanction being given to certain articles in its constitution and administration. Nor can it be considered that the articles thus established are to be taken as the descriptive criteria only of the corporate identity of the society, inasmuch as this identity must depend on other characteristics, as the regulations established are generally unessential and alterable according to the principles and canons by which churches of that denomination govern themselves, and as the injunctions and prohibitions contained in the regulations would be enforced by the penal consequences applicable to a violation of them according to the local law.

Because the bill vests in the said incorporated church an authority to provide for the support of the
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

That shows, gentlemen, the necessity of care in drawing these amendments. I should not have wanted it said ten years ago that we would not allow the Christian Science Church to incorporate, and if these words had been in the Bill of Rights then I do not believe we could have allowed it.

Now, gentlemen, my time is up. Your committee have labored nearly two months, honestly and conscientiously. We think we have produced something that may be for the good of all the people of the Commonwealth. We have done our duty; we could do no more. The decision is up to you. If you think we are wrong, then on you rests the responsibility if this state goes on and the flames are fanned and fanned and we come to religious agitation and bigotry. Should that time ever come, gentlemen, there are fifteen men sitting in this Convention to whom the finger of scorn cannot point. We shall be free; our status will be fixed. We ask you to fix yourselves as we think we have fixed ourselves. [Applause.]

I give the remainder of my time to Mr. Lomasney.

Mr. LOMASNEY: Section 2 of chapter 438 of the Acts of 1903, the act by which Massachusetts conveyed certain rights it had to the Institute of Technology, begins with these words:

Subject to the rights, if any, of other parties and to the restrictions hereinafter set forth, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, or its grantees, may erect upon all or any part of said premises, buildings conforming to the building laws of the city of Boston; but no building erected upon the above described premises shall be used for a stable or for any mechanical or manufacturing purposes.

Now the gentleman from Fall River has put the same principle into his amendment: "and to carry out legal obligations, if any, already entered into." I hope the Convention will follow the lead of the honorable gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton), who sat here as a lawyer, as a judge, and wrote those words. Do not turn his amendment down for the one submitted by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant). [Applause.]

The various amendments were disposed of as indicated at the beginning of this chapter and the resolution, as amended, was passed to be engrossed, by a vote of 275 to 25, a call of the yeas and nays having been ordered at the request of Mr. Cummings of Fall River.

poor and the education of poor children of the same, an authority which, being altogether superfluous if the provision is to be the result of pious charity, would be a precedent for giving to religious societies as such a legal agency in carrying into effect a public and civil duty.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 28, 1811.

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

Having examined and considered the bill entitled "An Act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting House, in the Mississippi Territory," I now return the same to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objection:

Because the bill in reserving a certain parcel of land of the United States for the use of said Baptist Church comprises a principle and precedent for the appropriation of funds of the United States for the use and support of religious societies, contrary to the article of the Constitution which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment."

JAMES MADISON.

Debate was resumed Thursday, August 30, when the question of referring the measure to the people was considered after a motion to postpone had been discussed and negatived.

Mr. Brackett of Arlington: I dislike to take up the time of the Convention this morning, but as it is the last opportunity that is my excuse for doing so.

I am not opposed to what is called the anti-sectarian amendment. I am in favor of it. But that amendment has been utterly submerged in another proposition. That is not even the title of the resolution before us. This is a "Resolution relative to the support of certain institutions from public funds." We are told that this was changed from the anti-sectarian amendment to its present form as a compromise. Compromises have their place in human affairs. They are sometimes useful. When there is a controversy between business men in regard to property matters they are useful in preventing litigation. They are useful in labor disputes, so as to prevent strikes and the consequent disorder. But when you come to the consideration of governmental principles and policies, I have grave doubt as to the utility of compromises. I think their futility is more obvious than their utility. Before the Civil War, on the slavery question, compromise after compromise was made, but they did not prevent, but simply postponed, the inevitable crisis which came in 1861. I remember once during the war hearing a lecture by Henry Ward Beecher in which he referred to these compromises and said, in his characteristic way: "A compromise is a bombshell with a cushion on it, easy to sit down upon for a temporary rest, but liable at any moment to blow up."

Now, this compromise possibly may obviate an opposition to the original proposition which otherwise would have been encountered, it may secure votes in the Convention which otherwise would be unobtainable; but there is something else to be considered, and that is the action of the people upon this question when it comes up for their ratification; and I believe that the changes which have been made in it, by which the Legislature is prevented from doing many things which hereafter it may be important for it to do, will tend to defeat the proposition.

The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) in his remarks the other day said that, while he had not been a member of the Legislature, he understood that one way of defeating a measure was to load it down with hostile amendments. But the amendments which were proposed to this resolution were not hostile amendments. They were amendments which would have prevented an opposition which I believe without them it will excite. They were amendments simply to exempt certain institutions from the sweeping character of this proposition. But this main amendment itself, which has changed the whole character of the original proposition from an anti-sectarian amendment to one in relation to the support of certain institutions from public funds,— that amendment, I believe, will prove to be hostile to the final success of this proposition, because of the opposition which it will meet at the polls.

Since we passed this resolution to be engrossed a communication has been received from the Secretary of the State Board of Agriculture, enclosing a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the board, asking the Convention to exempt agricultural societies, which heretofore have received to some extent support from the Commonwealth, from the provisions of the proposition. If the proposal goes through in its present form you will injure those agricultural organizations, you will impair the agricultural prosperity of Massachusetts and incur the hostility of those especially interested in it. And so, also, there are other matters, about which the same can be said. It is said that this is a great principle which this proposition contains, that is, that the public funds should not be used for any institution which is not under the direct control of the State. In regard to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, some gentleman said, when the amendment relating to those institutions was before us, that they ought to turn over their property to the State if they wanted any help. But what good would that do to the State? The State could not sell the property, it could not lease it, it could not tax it, but it would have to entirely support those institutions. And so in regard to many other institutions; not private institutions which are working simply for themselves; not institutions into which men put their money for the sake of dividends and income; but institutions which are doing a great work for the Commonwealth, and to the support of which public-spirited citizens contribute with no expectation of pecuniary gain. I do not believe that the State should be precluded from taking action, if hereafter it should deem it for the public welfare to support in part such institutions. I believe that many of these are doing a work which they can do more efficiently than if they were placed under the exclusive charge of the State.
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

But the members of the committee have abandoned the principle which they proclaim, by including in this proposition an exemption of the Soldiers' Home and of free public libraries. Those were very wise exemptions,—that particularly in regard to the Soldiers' Home was creditable to the heads and to the hearts of the committee. That exception was made because that is a worthy institution, because the men who have there found a home, the men who fought for liberty and the Union in the times that tried men's souls a little over half a century ago, are creditors of the Commonwealth. They should be so regarded. But the proposition to exempt that specific institution does not exempt other similar institutions. How do we know but that hereafter there may be a need, and in the not distant hereafter, for other Soldiers' Homes? The exemption of this institution would confer no authority to help any such homes as these, because it is confined to a single institution now existent. Last week in Boston was held the National encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, and on Tuesday last the people of Boston witnessed a scene which was thrilling and inspiring. It was the sight of the old veterans of the Civil War marching or riding through our streets, and everywhere receiving the enthusiastic applause and the homage of the people. But, Mr. President, almost daily we see in our streets other men marching, not the war-scarred veterans of the civil war, but men who were born long after the victory at Appomattox, not soldiers of the glorious past but soldiers of the present and the future, which their services for their country will tend to make likewise glorious; men who, in the full vigor of their young manhood, are about to cross the sea to represent Massachusetts upon the battlefields of Europe, fighting, not for American liberty alone, but for the liberties of mankind. Many of these never will return, and of those who survive many will come back with shattered health, maimed and mutilated, and thereby incapacitated for engaging in the vocations by which livelihoods are earned and fortunes sometimes gained. Soldiers' homes will be needed for them; and do we propose to so emasculate the legislative authority of Massachusetts that when soldiers' homes for them are proposed, and our philanthropic citizens contribute their money to their support, and the Commonwealth is asked to aid in supporting them, as it has for years deservedly aided in the support of the present Soldiers' Home, our legislators will be obliged to reply that while they, and the people whom they represent, are with substantial unanimity in favor of giving this support, yet that the Constitutional Convention of 1917,—in session while the war was raging, its members living at home in comfort and in safety while these soldier sons of ours were suffering and risking their lives abroad,—that this Constitutional Convention has so crippled the Commonwealth that, although the people are united in favor of its doing something to support the establishment of soldiers' homes for these men, the Legislature cannot appropriate a single dollar for that purpose?
SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Now, Mr. President, I recognize that every member of this Convention is devoted to the duty of the hour; that every man desires to do what he believes to be for the interest of the Commonwealth; but, Mr. President, I do not expect that civic virtue in Massachusetts is to disappear with the final adjournment of this Convention. I expect that the people who sent us here,—and I think we all agree that in our respective constituencies they showed excellent discrimination in making their selection of delegates,—that the men who sent us here will have hereafter the ability and disposition to send men to this chamber, and to the other legislative hall in this building, who will be capable of discriminating and deciding what institutions are doing a noble work and thereby are entitled to partial support from the Commonwealth; that they will be as capable of deciding that as we are to-day capable of deciding in regard to the present Soldiers' Home. For these reasons, Mr. President, not desiring to take up the time of the Convention longer, I shall vote against submitting this proposition to the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I want to be recorded as following in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessor. I took that ground in voting against this resolution in the Committee of the Whole, and I am going to say just how I view this resolution and why I vote against it. I saw coming up to this Convention a narrow proposition, aimed at one religion. I saw it taken in hand by the friends of that religion and carefully conducted inside of the door. I there saw that, in order to pacify bigotry, somebody else was called upon to suffer. As was put by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Pelletier), it is the case of everybody get something or nobody should get anything. Therefore, because some people projected a narrow issue into this Commonwealth, we, to down the issue, have sacrificed the right of the Legislature to help education in any way it might see fit to help it, to help suffering that may arise from this war. And, furthermore, I found that the very people who are opposed to the initiative and referendum because it limits the power of the Legislature and belittles the Legislature,—those same people are foremost to belittle the Legislature by saying that they no longer are to be trusted with a power that was given to them from the very foundation of the Commonwealth, when they were entrusted with so conducting this Commonwealth that the elements of piety, justice and education, which were necessary for the continuance of the republic, should be maintained. And now we have taken that power.

I myself, sir, vote as I do because I reserve the privilege, if I get the opportunity, any time and every time, to call upon the people to vote against this resolution. I myself believe that if the people of this Commonwealth are called upon to face narrow bigotry which says that a religion that comprises a large part of this Commonwealth is not entitled to respectful consideration they will vote against it. This Commonwealth has not outgrown the narrow spirit evidenced at its very beginning. Then it established a Protestant Commonwealth. The men who were shouting for the natural liberty of man, the right to govern himself and his conscience,—those men fled across the water, came to Massachusetts and the very first thing they did, as the late John D. Long once said, they fell on their knees, and next they fell on the aborigines. They did not stop there. Governor Long was criticized because he characterized them as they should have been characterized because of the great wrong that was done at that time. I do not fear, I say, what may now be the action of this Commonwealth. I should rather have some religion that I do not want than the quantity of no religion at all that we are now getting in this Commonwealth. [Laughter and applause.]

Without further debate, and with only a few negative votes in opposition, the Convention voted to submit the proposed amendment to the people.

The amendment was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 6, 1917, by a vote of 206,329 to 130,357.

Note.—For a continuation of the debate on the sectarian issue see Chapter III.
III.

UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES AND THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Messrs. Joseph Michelman of Boston, James E. Maguire of Boston, Isaac Freeman Hall of North Adams and Samuel L. Powers of Newton presented resolutions numbered, respectively, 24, 73, 157 and 158, which were severally referred to the committee on Education. That committee, on the 16th of July, 1917, reported the following new draft (No. 309):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Instead of Chapter V. of Part the Second of the Constitution, the following modification and amendment thereof is substituted.

CHAPTER V.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES, AND THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Section 1. The Universities and Colleges.

Whereas our wise and pious ancestors, so early as the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-six, laid the foundation of Harvard College, and whereas at various later times to the present day by the generosity of benefactors and the encouragement of the General Court other institutions of higher learning have been established in the Commonwealth, in which universities and colleges many persons of great eminence have, by the blessing of God, been initiated in those arts and sciences which qualified them for public employments, both in church and State; and whereas the encouragement of arts and sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America,—it is declared, that the President and Fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, and the trustees and governing bodies of all the universities, colleges and institutions of higher learning, their successors, their officers and servants, shall have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy, all the powers, authorities, rights, liberties, privileges, immunities and franchises, which they now have, or are entitled to have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy: and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed unto them forever.

Section 2. The Encouragement of Literature, etc.

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislature and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences and all seminaries of them; especially the university at Cambridge, all other universities, colleges, and higher institutions of learning, public schools and grammar schools in the towns; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country; to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity and general benevolence, public and private charity, industry and frugality, honesty and punctuality in their dealings; sincerity, good humor, and all social affections, and generous sentiments, among the people. To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insue a complete and efficient system of education which will afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development, and will aid and encourage all to become unselfish and loyal citizens.

The resolution was rejected.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by striking out, in line 10, the word "higher", and inserting in place thereof the words "all schools and"; and by inserting after the word "towns", in line 12, the words "and cities;".

These amendments were rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 93 to 165.

Mr. John J. Mansfield of Boston moved that the resolution be amended as follows:

In section 1, by striking out, in lines 1, 2, and 3, the words "our wise and pious ancestors, so early as the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-six, laid the foundation of Harvard College, and whereas"; by striking out, in line 3, the word "later"; by striking out, in line 5, the word "other"; and by striking out, in lines 14 and 15, the words "the President and Fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, and"

In section 2, by striking out, in line 2, the word "being", and inserting in place thereof the word "are"; by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "the university at Cambridge,"; by striking out, in line 10, the word "other"; by striking out, in line 11, the word "public", and inserting in place thereof the word "and"; by striking out, in the same line, the words "and grammar schools"; and by inserting before the word "towns", in line 12, the words "cities and".

These amendments were rejected.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by inserting after the word "shall", in the last sentence, the words
"save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution,"

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 119 to 92.

Mr. John J. Cummings of Fall River moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by striking out all after the word "enumerated", in the last sentence, and inserting in place thereof the words "promote and encourage the principles of humanity, education, general benevolence and public and private charity,"

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the resolution be amended in section 1, by inserting after the word "enjoy", in the last line but one, the words "save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution,"

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 143 to 18.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by striking out the last sentence and inserting in place thereof the following:

To this end the Legislature shall have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, educational and religious purposes.

This amendment was withdrawn.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended by striking out the article of amendment and substituting the following:

The Legislature shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

This amendment was adopted, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 192 to 62.
Mr. Samuel L. Powers of Newton moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by inserting after the word “otherwise”, in the last sentence, the words “, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided in the Constitution.”

This amendment was rejected.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end of section 2 the words:

To this end the Legislature shall have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 125 to 71.

Mr. David Stoneman of Boston moved that the resolution be amended in section 1, by striking out the word “Christian”, and inserting in place thereof the word “all”.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 168 to 23.

Mr. Arthur H. Wellman of Topsfield moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft:

Instead of Chapter V of Part the Second of the Constitution, the following modification and amendment thereof is substituted:

CHAPTER V.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES, AND THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Section 1. The Universities and Colleges.

Whereas our wise and pious ancestors, so early as the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-six, laid the foundation of Harvard College, and whereas at various later times to the present day by the generosity of benefactors and the encouragement of the General Court other institutions of higher learning have been established in the Commonwealth, in which universities and colleges many persons of great eminence have, by the blessing of God, been initiated in those arts and sciences which qualified them for public employments, both in church and State; and whereas the encouragement of arts and sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of all religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America, — it is declared, that the President and Fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, and the trustees and governing bodies of all the universities, colleges and institutions of higher learning, their successors, their officers and servants, shall have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy all the powers, authorities, rights, liberties, privileges, immunities and franchises, which they now have, or are entitled to have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution: and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed unto them forever.

Section 2. The Encouragement of Literature, etc.

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislature and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences and all seminaries of them; especially the university at Cambridge, all other universities, colleges, and higher institutions of learning, public schools and common schools in the towns; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country; to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity and general benevolence, public and private charity, industry and frugality, honesty and punctuality in their dealings; sincerity, good humor, and all social affections, and generous sentiments, among the people. To this end the Legislature shall, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution, have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education which will afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development, and will aid and encourage all to become unselfish and loyal citizens.

No public money shall be appropriated under the above provisions to any school or institution not under public control.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 41 to 138.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston moved that the above amendment be amended by striking out the last paragraph.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Samuel L. Powers of Newton moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end of the article of amendment the following:

The Legislature shall have power to pass laws promoting the sound development of the public school system of the State, and to raise money therefor by taxation. No public money, however, shall be appropriated under the above provision to any school or institution not under public control.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 66 to 133.

The committee on Form and Phraseology reported that the resolution ought to be adopted as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following:

Article of Amendment.

The General Court shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific or religious purposes.

This amendment was rejected.

A new draft (No. 385) was reported by a special committee June 21, 1918. It was withdrawn Tuesday, July 23, 1918.

THE DEBATE.

The first discussion arose in connection with a motion, Friday, September 28, 1917, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the resolution and assign the latter to the first place in the Orders of the Day for Tuesday, October 2.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: It came to the ears of the committee on Bill of Rights yesterday that the action of this Convention in almost unanimously passing the one resolution that it has passed might be entirely nullified by another resolution which is before the Committee of the Whole. This resolution is No. 309. The committee on Bill of Rights held a meeting this morning at which ten members were present, and the views of those absent are known to the majority, and it is unanimously agreed that if No. 309 is passed by this Convention and appears on the ballot at the same time as the anti-aid amendment, the provisions of that measure will be entirely nullified; and not only will they be entirely nullified, but the eighteenth amendment, which deals with the public schools, also will be nullified. If they both appeared on the ballot at the same time, and were accepted by the people under the present construction placed upon such proceedings by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, I have no doubt that the court would attempt to reconcile the conflicting measures and if they could not be reconciled the court would nullify them.

The committee on Bill of Rights desire to place themselves correctly before this Convention and before the people, and state that while they may appear lacking in attention to their duties in not being aware of the existence of No. 309, that each and every one of us was unaware of it, and, had we been aware of it, would have tried to bring it forward before this. We do not want to be placed in the position of having this Convention pass one resolution refusing aid to all private institutions and to all religious associations, and then by another resolution put the same thing back into the Bill of Rights. That would not be treating the Convention fairly, neither would it be treating the public fairly. There is not a member of this committee who desires to have this Convention have that opinion of us, or to have the public have that opinion. We therefore ask the Convention to advance this resolution, No. 309, for consideration Tuesday next, and then to dispose of it, in order that the Convention itself may be placed right and the public may not think we are playing with them.

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: This may raise a very important question of construction, which ought to be carefully and maturely considered by some committee of the Convention, and to my mind it naturally belongs to the committee on Amendment and Codification of the Constitution. But I rise principally for the purpose of suggesting to my friend from Boston who offers the motion that it is by no means to be assumed, as he seems to assume, that the last thought, as he calls it, of the Convention will necessarily supersede any other thought. A Constitution is construed as a whole, in view of all its parts, and not ordinarily in the order of the time at which any particular provision may be adopted. It seems to me if the question is really here it ought to be sent to some committee. I should not insist upon it, if that is not agreeable to my friend who offers the motion, but I ask him whether, under the circumstances, he will not consent to have it sent to the committee on Amendment and Codification.

Mr. CURTIS: I should not consent at this time. The matter should be brought before this Convention, and then whatever the Convention decides to do I suppose we shall have to accept. I do not agree with the great lawyer who just spoke on the construction of the Constitution. I bow to his superior knowledge in all law matters, as a rule, but on the difference between himself and myself on the construction of the Constitution I do not agree, and I think I am right.

Mr. COOMBS of Worcester: I cannot speak absolutely for all the members of the committee on Education, but I will say that we discussed this matter and when the time comes I, and I am very sure our chairman, shall be very glad to go into the matter in detail. The vote was unanimous in bringing in this form of amendment. We brought in our report, I think I am entitled to say, before the committee on Bill of Rights filed even the first draft of its amendment. I am sure that it was farthest from our intention to introduce anything in the revision which we have submitted in No. 309 which should in any way controvert or tend to overthrow the amendment introduced and finally adopted by the committee on Bill of Rights. I am sure, as I said, when the time comes we shall be very glad to meet that committee and agree to any changes; because although we talked over the general essence, the general conditions, of this amendment in the committee, we did not take up the individual points, which evidently controvert the report of the committee on Bill of Rights; and I, for my part, as standing for this resolution for the committee on Education, shall be very glad to have this motion prevail.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: I trust the motion of the gentleman will be sustained, for this reason. It is all right to have all conflicting matters disposed of at one time. Of course it would be a very unfortunate situation if we should pass the Bill of Rights amendment, and this Convention should put it on the ballot, to have it said to the people of the State that we had something buried away in a favorable report that nullified the whole matter. In view of the fact that the gentleman in charge of this resolution No. 309 has no objection, it seems to me the best thing for the Convention to do is to adopt the motion of the gentleman from Boston, in order that it may go before the Convention. He says he is willing to take out the words that seem to undo what we have done; there will not be much controversy over it. I think that is the easiest way out of it and I hope this motion will prevail.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I have had but a moment since I came to the Convention itself, to glance at this report. I hope we are at liberty to send it down with the sectarian amendment. Conflicting? Certainly they are conflicting; but that second section with a few words additional is section 2 of chapter 5. It says encourage agriculture, encourage education, encourage the trades, commerce, arts, sciences and literature. That section makes a Commonwealth concerned with all the affections. Already you are beginning to discover that the sectarian amendment is not wanted by everybody. It is not wanted by the people who can kill it. You ought to consider if the resolution already passed should go to the people. I am suggesting at this time that this resolution also may go to the people as an offset. I should like to ask, Mr. President, if you will give me this information: Would it be within the power of this Convention to send down both of these amendments together on the ballot, and provide that the people could mark either, the one having the highest number of votes to be the one that should be adopted?

The President: That is not a parliamentary question; the Chair does not feel that it should be called upon to answer it.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: The idea of a conflict between anything that the Education Committee has put forth and the eighteenth amendment is absolutely new to me,—about a half-hour old in my mind. I heard rumors last night, but I did not have No. 309 before me and knew nothing about such conflict until it was explained upstairs just a few minutes ago. I certainly hope that this motion will be passed, and that there will be no opposition to ending this whole matter on Tuesday, because it is of the highest importance, it seems to me, that the anti-aid amendment should go on the ballot in November.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: I rise to ask the gentleman from Newton a question. I have before me a letter which appeared in the Boston Post last Tuesday, bearing the name of Frederick L. Anderson, Newton Center, September 24. I shall assume, unless the gentleman denies the authorship, that he is the author. It is discussing and dealing with a report which appeared in the same paper the day before concerning the action of the Federation of Catholic societies, and it deals particularly with the anti-sectarian amendment, and the scope of it, and I ask his attention to this sentence in it. I am reading from the fifth paragraph of the letter:

It may be said that the agricultural schools are not aimed at in the amendment, and that in most other cases, readjustments can easily be made, whereby the State, through public agencies, may still aid the causes, though not the private societies and organizations, now subsidized. The new-born zeal of our extreme Catholic friends for some of these institutions is decidedly interesting, to say the least.

I wish to ask the gentleman what public agencies could be used or employed, if the anti-aid amendment is adopted, to aid or to readjust, for the benefit of the private schools and other private institutions, their finances, so that they could be helped; and I ask the gentleman if when he wrote that sentence he did not know the provisions, this final provision, of document No. 309, and if there was any other method of giving aid excepting through that last sentence in document No. 309?

Mr. Anderson: In reply I wish to say with all sincerity, and I am sure the gentleman will credit me with sincerity, that when I wrote that sentence I knew nothing about resolution No. 309 in this connection; that this is an entirely new idea to me, — that No. 809 in any way modifies our amendment, the anti-aid amendment. I wish to say that when I wrote that sentence I did not have schools of any kind in mind, but there are a large number of other organizations affected. Take, for instance, the farm bureaus of this State. The farm bureaus of this State, as I understand, at the present time are paying one-half of the salaries of the agents, and the State or county, — the county, I believe, — is paying the other half. Now, what I meant was that in such a case as that a readjustment easily could be made by which the county agents could be made county officers, could be paid entirely by the counties, and that the part of the salary which now is paid by these farm bureaus could be used for some other purpose in the general sphere in which they operate; and that thus the cause of agriculture could be helped directly through State officials, although the farm bureau, as such, would not receive any aid under our amendment.

Mr. Cumming: I desire to ask the gentleman how he expects to be able to get any public aid for any institution that was not wholly under public control?

Mr. Anderson: I did not expect to get any public aid for any institution that was not under public control, Mr. President.

Mr. Cumming: What kind of aid did the gentleman expect was going to be given through public agencies to the farm bureau, or any other institution, if it was not public aid?

Mr. Anderson: I did not expect that any public aid was going to be given to the farm bureau at all. I expected that a readjustment would be made in which the State could still continue to aid agriculture without giving any aid to the farm bureau in any particular.

Mr. Cumming: Is it the gentleman's understanding that the anti-sectarian amendment can be avoided or evaded by grants of money to the purpose of the institution and not to the institution itself?

Mr. Anderson: I am now being cross-examined by one of the greatest lawyers in this State. Never having been on the witness stand before, I am somewhat green in the matter of answering these questions. I wish to say that, to my mind, the question cannot be answered Yes or No and that I think in some cases the great causes, as I said in my letter, still can be aided directly through the public agencies. For instance, the great cause of agriculture still can be aided directly through the State Board of Agriculture, or public officials, while these private societies no longer can receive a single cent from the State, — a particle of public money from the State.

Mr. Cummings: I shall regret if the gentleman thinks that I am assuming the rôle of cross-examiner. It is a friendly interchange of ideas between the gentleman from Newton and myself, in the presence of this Convention, with a view to finding out, if we can, what was in his mind when he urged the passage of this amendment. Now, if we can aid the cause of agriculture, — and it needs aid, I confess, — why cannot we aid the cause of education, why cannot we aid all the other delightful and appealing causes that apparently have been smothered and put away by the anti-aid amendment? Why not one as well as the other?

Mr. Anderson: If I may answer, I will say that the State may still afford aid to the cause of education through public agencies. It may raise, as it always has raised, public money in every city and town in this State and give it to the public schools. It may still give its money, as it always has done in the past, to the publicly owned and publicly controlled higher educational institutions. There is no reason why it cannot do that; and, in doing that, it will aid the cause of education in the very largest way. I feel, too, that the anti-aid amendment in the end probably will bring about a finer system of public education in this State, from top to bottom, than the State ever has enjoyed before, and all from public money, spent through public agencies, and delivered through public officials.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: May I suggest that the Convention adopt the motion of the gentleman from Boston, and that will bring the whole matter before the Convention for Tuesday, when we can go into all these matters. Then everybody may go over these different measures between this and Tuesday, study the Constitution, see what the difference is, and be ready to take up the whole thing on that day. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: Before the matter is laid over until Tuesday I should like to have an explanation of the purpose of this amendment, in order that we may spend these two days to some extent in digesting it with intelligence. What is the purpose of this amendment? I called the attention of the chairman of the committee on Education to this matter in the corridor a while ago, while the other matter was under discussion, and asked him what was the purpose of having Harvard College in this amendment, what was the specific value of it, and what was the general purpose of the amendment, and if it did not conflict with or cause some confusion respecting the amendment reported by the Bill of Rights Committee. Well, I understood him to think there was nothing in that at all. Then I asked: "What is the purpose of this amendment?" and some of the gentlemen standing by said: "It is purely sentimental." We dismissed the matter there, leaving it that it was purely sentimental. Now it seems to me, if we are to have a discussion of the main question, that those of us who are not thoroughly up on these subjects should have left with us, if possible, a statement as to what this motion is for, and whether it is purely sentimental as respecting Harvard College and the other institutions; or, if it has a purpose, what is that purpose?

Mr. Winslow of Newton: I hope this motion will not prevail. This Convention has adopted in the anti-aid measure two distinct and extremely important matters. It has tied those two together and is about to put them out to the people and say "Answer 'Yes' or 'No.'" It seems to me that, in a matter which required a month for decision, the members of this body ought to be at liberty to speak before the people when that comes up. I hope nothing will be done here to bring that matter before the people at this coming election, because there is no evidence whatever that we shall adjourn before November, and certainly if there is anything which ought to be presented to the people thoroughly it is this anti-sectarian or anti-aid, or whatever you may choose to call it, amendment. Moreover, at the present time we have before us two extremely important measures, the I. and R. and the dealing in public necessities. It seems to me that two are enough to place before the people at one time. If it is supposed that by taking up this measure we can settle it in a day or two, it seems to me we are not taking into consideration the attitude and experience of this Convention in the past. Why bring in a third serious matter before we have settled the other two? I earnestly hope, Mr. President, that this motion will not prevail.

Mr. Pelletter of Boston: I understand that the gentleman who has just taken his seat is a member of the committee on Education, which passed or has given us this resolution No. 309. I should like to ask him if in his opinion that does not really destroy the so-called anti-aid amendment which already has gone to engrossment?

Mr. Winslow: When this matter was under consideration in the committee on Education, the legal lights of the committee informed the committee, as it is my recollection, that this would not produce that result. Personally, however, I may add that if it should do so I should be extremely glad.

Mr. Pelletter: It seemed to the committee on Bill of Rights, after a careful although a short examination of this measure, that it might render absolutely abortive and useless the anti-aid amendment that was so long discussed here, and that this resolution No. 309 not only does that, but absolutely in effect repeals the eighteenth amendment. Now, the question I should like to ask any member of that committee on Education is this: When we were discussing and giving so much time on the floor of this Convention to the Curtis amendment, the anti-aid amendment, when men like the distinguished gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) asked for the very thing that resolution No. 309 gives, why did not some member of that committee, which already had reported the measure, stand on this floor and say to this Convention: "We have got the amendment, Mr. Man from Fall River, that you are asking for"? Do you remember the question that I asked this Convention? I asked why some one would not come forward with a proposition that should make it legal to give public money for private purposes. Why did not some member of that committee on Education say: "We have got the amendment; it has been reported here since July 13"? Why this silence?

Mr. Bennett: I should like to ask: Why did not the committee on Bill of Rights know about this resolution themselves? [Laughter.]

Mr. Pelletter: The committee on Bill of Rights feel that this matter ought to come up at this time. We feel there has been an imposition exercised here, wittingly or otherwise, — it does not make any difference. There is no use in analyzing motives; acts count. Something has been lying dormant here in this Convention that went to the every vitals of the anti-aid amendment. We have just discovered it.
Call us stupid, if you will. Say that we should have read through the hundred-odd measures here. We have not read them, and we did not know of this one until yesterday, and we are here honestly to tell you this is the first minute we have heard of it; and we say that it is so important that the matter ought to be considered, and we ask that the
I. and R. and the food amendments give way to this and let the Convention have it on Tuesday; because if you are going to pass No. 309, then call back the anti-aid amendment and kill it decently. [Applause.]

Mr. Maguire of Boston: I introduced early in the session resolution No. 73. The reason for introducing that resolution was to emphasize physical education. I went before the committee on Education and argued very strongly on the subject. I may say that when I started to write the resolution I found some difficulty with the section of the Constitution providing for the encouragement of literature and learning. I rewrote the first part of it, but the part of the resolution in which I am most interested, most concerned about, was this clause:

And, further, it shall be the duty of the Legislature to render obligatory in all schools and colleges and universities the practice of physical training, competent to strengthen the body and perfect the health of the individual.

Finally, the Legislature shall render compulsory in all grammar schools and high schools of the Commonwealth adequate instruction in anatomy, physiology, and personal and public hygiene.

Now, all that the committee on Education gave me in the resolution that they have reported is the word “physical”. If they expect support of that resolution, and say that they base it on resolution No. 73, I ask the Convention to read resolution No. 73 and see if there is the slightest connection. Personally I am opposed to sectarian appropriations and to using public money for private purposes. I believe that resolution No. 309 ought to be considered immediately, in order that the whole matter may be threshed out. The first part of my resolution, while it may seem very broad, was, as a matter of fact, merely sentimental, stating those things on which we all agree. At no time had I the intention of aiding or abetting any movement for sectarian appropriations or for public aid for private institutions.

The motion to assign the resolution for consideration Tuesday, October 2, was adopted and debate was resumed on that day.

Mr. Coombs of Worcester: I should like to speak very briefly on No.
309, and I should like to say a word or two before I come to the question before us, in the way, if I may call it, of personal privilege.

I understand that in the columns of one of the Boston papers a day or two ago, it was said that I, the clerk of the committee on Education of this Convention, was going to “put something over” the committee on Bill of Rights; that I, a professor at the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, in some way getting myself named the clerk of that committee, had in my hands, after the committee meetings, the framing of the measure which ultimately was presented as No. 309, which is before us for our consideration. Now, Mr. President, it happens that I am a professor at the Worcester Polytechnic Institute; it happens that I have been engaged there for 27 years; it happens that I, as a professor at that institution, appeared before the committee on Bill of
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Rights and tried to explain a little as to what we were doing there, as to the nature of the school and especially as to its non-sectarian nature. But, Mr. President and gentlemen, when I became a delegate to this Convention I became a delegate as a citizen of the Commonwealth, and when I became clerk of that committee I became clerk as a delegate to the Convention and not as a professor of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute; and whatever might be my own individual feelings in regard to the merits or demerits of the so-called anti-aid amendment, I merged those feelings absolutely in my identity as a delegate to this Convention; and I will say that I did absolutely nothing in the way of shaping the report of the committee on Education in any way to put anything over on the committee on the Bill of Rights.

Let me say further,—and this is in connection with what was said last Friday by a member of that committee who rose here and with great vehemence asked the committee on Education why they had not told the committee on Bill of Rights what they were going to do. Why, good heavens, Mr. President, we went through our deliberations, we completed our report, and it was a unanimous report. We had our meeting on Friday, the 13th of July, and adjourned at three o'clock, and we filed our report at quarter past three that day. When did the committee on Bill of Rights file their report? When did any member of my committee, or when did I, have any knowledge as to what the anti-aid motion was going to contain? The article in the Boston daily would have paid me greater compliment, perhaps, if it had ascribed to me, not the keenness of the politician, but second sight, making me able to read two or three weeks ahead what the committee was going to bring out when the time came.

We filed our report, the report was there, the report was printed, as far as I recall, long before the committee on Bill of Rights submitted their report.

Now, Mr. President, those are the absolute facts; and, as I said, I wanted to speak very briefly along the line of personal privilege, so far as possible to clear myself from any imputations that I had the least intention of "putting anything over" on the Bill of Rights Committee, or in any way nullifying their work; and in extenuation of my position I may say that I voted for the report of the committee, as the record will show if it be examined.

Mr. Pelletier: I think perhaps the gentleman referred to me, and if that is so I believe he was mistaken. My criticism of the committee on Education was that it had not spoken on the floor of this Convention; not a complaint that it had not told the story to our committee, but that when all this subject was being discussed here no member of that committee had said a word about the resolution it had reported.

Mr. Coombs: I shall come to that in just a moment. I am very glad that the member of the committee on Bill of Rights has spoken. I shall come to that in just a moment and tell why no member of the committee on Education rose on this floor to say a word.

May I briefly go over the several matters referred to our committee? If you will refer to your docket you will find that they came under Nos. 24, 72, 73, 157 and 158. No. 24 was submitted by a delegate of this Convention. If you will examine that you will find that it looks toward the elimination in the Constitution of chapter 5, section 1, which is headed "The University," and chapter 5, section 2. The committee on Education held several public meetings, and at one of their public meetings they had before them the proponent of that recommendation and the president of Harvard University. Each appeared, each told what he would like to have done. As a result it was agreed to eliminate the first section. The later material was rewritten by the head of Harvard University, and appeared in section 1 under amendment 309 in the exact wording of President Lowell. The remaining part of chapter 5,—that is, section 2,—was rewritten by a subcommittee of the committee on Education, consisting of the chairman and of the clerk, myself. I will come to that in a moment.

No. 72 was an article submitted in behalf of teachers of the city of Worcester. Last year an effort was made to grant the teachers of Worcester a sabbatical year, a leave of absence once in seven years. It was ruled by the city solicitor that it was illegal. An amendment to the Constitution was drafted, submitted to our committee, the committee were unanimous in favor of the amendment, but they were unanimous in agreeing that it was matter of legislation and not a matter of constitutional enactment. Those petitioners were therefore given leave to withdraw.

The committee on Education were asked by the State Commissioner of Education to incorporate No. 157. That was submitted to our committee, the Commissioner appeared before the committee and set forth the facts in this case. Our committee were almost unanimously against that. The Commissioner then submitted a revised form. I have that revised form in my hand, and I will read it for the interest of the members of the Convention. It reads thus:

The Legislature shall have power to determine the organization of the public school system of the State, and to make such provisions by taxation or otherwise as, with the income arising from permanent school funds, will secure a thorough and efficient system of public schools.

Now, the committee on Education threshed that proposition out and incorporated it with very little change, the change being the elimination of the word "determine". I could explain why we eliminated that, if it were advisable, but I do not know that it is worth while to comment on that at the present time. I will say, further, that that suggestion from the State Commissioner is incorporated in substance as the closing clause or sentence in No. 309, beginning with the words "To this end the Legislature," and so on.

Now, there were two other recommendations laid before the committee, one, No. 73, by the delegate who sits in this division (Mr. Maguire). Mr. President, it was a good recommendation, an excellent recommendation. The gentleman from Boston who proposed that, who sits before me in this division, appeared before us and made a splendid argument for it, an argument that appealed to every member of the committee. But, Mr. President, it seemed to us that we should try to be as brief as possible. If we had incorporated everything he put before us, excellent though it was, it would have extended our very small part to an undue length. We, therefore, after full deliberation of the very excellent suggestion, No. 73, made by this gentleman, decided to incorporate one word as embodying the essence of his amendment, and that is the word "physical". I might say that the very closing words of his amendment, "personal and public hygiene”, were objected to very strenuously by an opponent who appeared and gave reasons for his objection. But we did incorporate, Mr. President, the word “physical,” which we felt would embody the essential idea of what the gentleman wished to incorporate, and that comes in the very closing clause, “for full mental, physical, and moral development.”

There was submitted to us one more recommendation, which is numbered 158, an excellent one. But we could not incorporate that. We all agreed that there should be thorough instruction in the duties of citizenship, and all that sort of thing, but we could not incorporate that.

So what did we do? So far as we could, we took the various recommendations and we incorporated them, basing our new form on the older form which has existed in the Constitution for 137 years, and the various recommendations appear, sir, under section 2 of No. 309.

Now, let me say, — and this is in answer to the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Pelletier) who rose to make a statement of explanation a moment ago, — let me say that the committee on Education were unanimous in bringing in this recommendation. The committee on Education were unanimous in feeling that there was nothing in this section which would in the least degree antagonize the provisions of the anti-aid amendment so far as we knew those provisions; and I repeat that we did not at that time know the essence of the so-called anti-aid amendment, and the framers of that amendment themselves did not know it, because of the several diverse amendments suggested, that resulted in one quite different from the original. That is the reason, Mr. President, why no member of the committee rose on this floor to say anything when that most interesting and important question was under way.

Now, I repeat, the committee on Education are unanimous, — were unanimous and are unanimous. We met this morning, eleven of us were there, and we are unanimous in feeling that there is nothing in No. 309, section 2, which, explicitly or implicitly, so far as we are concerned, is against the anti-aid amendment as adopted and engrossed. In furtherance of our opinion, I may say that informally we have talked with a number of lawyers, and we have found, as the distinguished jurist from Wellesley told us last Friday, that some of the ablest lawyers have agreed that that is not and will not be antagonistic to the anti-aid amendment as adopted. More than that, the members of the committee felt that even if it were antagonistic there would be absolutely no feeling on their part of opposition. In other words, up to the point of the publication and setting forth of that section as our will, we shall agree that any words of reservation, any words of qualification, that do not change the essence of that, we shall agree to absolutely. Beyond that I cannot go. I cannot speak for my fellows on the committee. But up to that point, I repeat, we are agreed; and I cannot emphasize too much the feeling we had that there was absolutely no opposition on our part as a committee to the enactment of the anti-aid amendment so far as we understood it.

Now, what is the nature of this section? If you have read it you will note that it is general; it is not specific. It reënacts in a somewhat modified form the former statement of the Constitution of 1780, in general binding the Legislature and the authorities to cherish literature, education, various organizations which have for their aim literature and learning. As I say, it is a general enactment; and we were strongly of the opinion that in any case of interpretation a specific enactment, which we understood then the anti-aid amendment would be, and which we are confirmed in our opinion now the anti-aid amendment is,—that the specific would override the general; and we did feel, as members of that committee, that there should be reenacted in constitutional form the essence of that section that has come down to us from 1780. I have explained the last sentence, the sentence having to do with taxation, which, as I said, we introduced at the request, somewhat changed I admit, of the Commissioner of Education; but our idea of that was that there should be no application of money raised by taxation to anything save the public school system.

Now, if there is anything in this general section which seems to controvert the provisions of the anti-aid amendment, as I have said, I am sure my colleagues and I shall be very glad to agree to any amendment, to any change. I reiterate, and I cannot repeat too strongly what I said before, that our intention was not to controvert that. At the same time our intention was very strongly to lay down those general principles which have governed this State since the Constitution of 1780. It seemed a pity to us, Mr. President, that this matter had not been laid before the combined committees. We regretted at our first meeting that the matter of the anti-aid question had not been referred to our committee, or that our committee had not been called in consultation. But we made no protest. We took the very small task laid upon us and we did our best. We submit this resolution No. 309. I have tried to make as clear as I could our position; and, as I said before, up to a certain point we stand united. What the Constitutional Convention may do we do not know. If it tries to introduce certain measures opposed to the essence here, I am inclined to believe that we shall oppose them as a committee. If there is a saving clause introduced here to obviate the possibility of misinterpretation I feel certain that no member of the committee, certainly not myself, will in the least be inclined to oppose that. I am very glad to have had this opportunity to say a few things along the line of the amendment which we introduced, to make a few explanations, and I shall be glad to add any further information if it is within my power to do so.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Before the chairman of the committee takes his seat I would ask if this Convention should strike out the first section, would not section 2, if adopted, be complete in itself?

Mr. Coombs: The delegate from Brockton does me honor in calling me chairman of the committee; I am simply the humble clerk. I am very glad to answer the question. It came up in our discussions, and what he says I think is essentially true. If the delegates will recall the older form of the Constitution, there are two sections, one referring directly to Harvard College. That was stricken out at the suggestion of the delegate from Boston in the second division. We seriously questioned whether we should not strike out the section here numbered 1, as it appears at first. We called, as I have stated, the president of Harvard University, and he made a strong plea, I think almost entirely on sentimental lines, urging the retention of that, with the addition of one or two words which will take in institutions founded at a later period. "Other institutions of higher learning," are the words. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I think I am safe in saying we decided to retain that for sentimental reasons.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Mr. BROWN: One more question. In the second section, in line 4 from the bottom, is the word "insure", — "insure a complete and efficient system of education which will . . ." If those words are stricken out, so that the section shall read: "To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development," etc., — with that stricken out, would not the entire effect of your section 2 be to kill the anti-aid or anti-sectarian amendment, so that it no longer can be called anti-aid? Is not the full effect of that section to give power to the Legislature to encourage private societies and public institutions, by rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country? Is not that the effect of what you have reported, — that is, that the Legislature shall have certain power which has nothing to do with education?

Mr. COOMBS: I think I am safe in saying that those words were incorporated in order to be consistent with the earlier part of that section, the idea being that the educational systems take in not only the public schools and the secondary schools, but higher schools and colleges, various technical schools, and so on. I am not at all sure that those words could not be stricken out. They were incorporated for that specific purpose, in order to square with what comes before. I do not feel that they are essential to our interpretation of that measure.

Mr. BROWN: I would direct the attention of the gentleman to this suggestion: The anti-aid amendment or anti-sectarian amendment, already reported, provides that money shall not be used except for public schools, etc., or schools and colleges under public control. My suggestion is that those words in your amendment might raise a doubt as to whether we repealed the anti-sectarian amendment, but with those words out you are in full harmony. I am suggesting the idea that your second section, with those words stricken out, without the first section, is in complete harmony with the anti-sectarian or anti-aid amendment.

Mr. COOMBS: I might say in that connection, — this is to anticipate a little, — I might say in this connection that various words have been suggested in order to remove any possible inconsistency between our amendment and the anti-aid amendment. Now, as I said, we do not wish to make any change if we can avoid it; but I will say that this morning a lawyer, — and a good one, I am told, — suggested to me these words to be inserted after the word "shall," about six lines from the bottom: "To this end the Legislature shall, save as otherwise provided in this Constitution, have power to make such provision . . ." Now, I know that the majority of the committee would not be opposed to those words.

Mr. MCANARNEY of Quincy: Will the gentleman explain to the Convention what will follow, so far as the anti-aid amendment is concerned, if the people adopt the anti-aid amendment and then at the same election adopt resolution No. 309? Just what would be the effect upon the anti-aid amendment, and what portion of the anti-aid amendment would then remain in force?

Mr. Coombs: Our committee in their discussions and in this discussion this morning were strongly of the opinion that the anti-aid amendment as passed to be engrossed would take precedence of this in every detail.
We agree that this amendment is a general amendment, and that, while in the last sentence it may seem as though money raised by taxation could be appropriated to higher institutions, the words of the anti-aid amendment are so specific that we never for a moment would hesitate in the interpretation. That was our view of the matter.

Mr. McAnarney: If I correctly understand the question I suppose his interpretation of the law would be that resolution No. 309 would not have any effect in so far as enabling the towns or the State to aid higher institutions of learning.

Mr. Coombs: Yes.

Mr. McAnarney: Then, if that be so, why not strike out of No.
309 all reference to those institutions, if that is what you mean? Limit your amendment to what you say it would apply to, — only public schools. Then I would ask: What is the occasion of adopting the amendment if it would apply only to public schools? Is not the present law strong enough so far as it applies to public schools?

Mr. Coombs: I tried to make emphatic that this section 2 was passed by our committee as a matter of sentiment. It was a general enactment; it was not intended to be a special enactment. If you will note the following section, 2, "Encouragement of Literature," — we felt that we could enact or reenact something covering a general field.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: In 1853 did not the Constitutional Convention then in existence go into the whole question of Harvard College and its relation to the people of the Commonwealth, and pass the clause in the present Constitution now in question? Why should we interfere with that? There is no general demand to interfere with it. It has existed since 1853. Why interfere with it? Why should we interfere with that sentiment to any extent? Why should anything new be done about it? Here is an amendment that has stood since 1853. The gentleman speaks of "sentiment". Now let us see. Is this sentiment, inserting those words that were not in section 2, after the word "Cambridge," — "all other universities, colleges and higher institutions of learning"? Those were inserted in section 2, and then they inserted these words: "To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise . . ." That is in conjunction with "all other universities, colleges and higher institutions of learning above enumerated." What institutions were "above enumerated"? "All other universities, colleges and higher institutions of learning." Those words were put in, and this section down here was to make them applicable to this section on taxation. Now, I claim, Mr.
President, that is entirely a questionable proceeding to pass at this time when we are trying to pass the other measure. Why not dispose of this and kill it? It should not pass. Sentiment should not prevail against an amendment of the Constitution made in 1853, agreed to by the Convention for Harvard College; and, without any doubt, they passed upon it in these amendments.

Mr. Coombs: May I have just a moment to answer the last speaker?
I respect his opinion in all matters. I respect even more, and I think
I speak for my colleagues on the committee, the opinion of the president of Harvard University. I happen to be an Amherst man. It is perhaps a misfortune that I am not a Harvard man. But I have some respect for sentiment, and when the president of Harvard University appeared before us and suggested that we incorporate those words in section 2, I for one was very glad to act upon his suggestion. The last sentence, as I think, was suggested by the Commissioner of Education. I admit that it was put in there, in the minds of the committee, with a good deal of dispute. The question was raised as to whether or not it might not be interpreted as applying to the institutions above. I have said that some of our members felt that it would be so interpreted, but we have taken legal counsel, and the member from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) last Friday had no fear of that. We have another opinion from a high lawyer in this Convention to the same effect. I repeat, and I say this for the benefit of the delegate in this section who has just spoken, I do not believe that our committee for one moment will insist on retaining those words if they seem to injure the so-called anti-aid amendment. I cannot make that too emphatic, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Merrill of Gloucester: It is with some hesitation that I rise to speak on this matter, for I find that I must oppose the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Coombs) and also the honorable delegate from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). As I understood the question which was asked last Wednesday of the honorable delegate from Wellesley, it was this: If the anti-aid amendment, so called, is submitted to and adopted by the people this year, and then resolution No. 309 is submitted to the people and adopted by them next year, what will be the effect of the adoption of No. 309 a year later than the anti-aid amendment? As I understood his answer, it was that the whole Constitution was to be considered together, and that one would not be considered as amending the other. I think that it must be that he misunderstood the question, for there can be doubt as to its effect. We all will agree that if both were passed and both accepted by the people at the same time then they would be considered together and would be reconciled, if possible; but if one was passed and accepted by the people a year after the other, then the one that was passed last must in effect be considered as an amendment to the former. Now, looking at document No. 309, and comparing it with the anti-aid amendment as passed to be engrossed, what do we find? We find in the first place the anti-aid amendment says that we shall not interfere with religion. That is in there. Document No. 309 does not affect that at all. Section 2 of the anti-aid amendment says that no money shall be appropriated to any school or institution wherein any denominational doctrine is inculcated. In all probability document No. 309 would not affect that. Then, going further, the anti-aid amendment says: "Nor shall any money be appropriated to any high school or any college, infirmary, hospital, or educational, charitable and religious undertaking which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control of the State." Now, there is where the conflict will come.

Chapter 5 of the Constitution now provides respecting Harvard College, as has been said by the delegate from Boston in the third division. The committee on Education has placed in document No. 309 words which make it much broader, and I refer to the words at the top of page 3. After referring to Harvard College it says: "And the trustees and governing boards of all the universities, colleges and institutions of higher learning," etc., "shall have the rights, privileges, immunities and franchises which they now have or are entitled to have." Now, what does that mean? Every college in this State to-day has the right to come to this Legislature and ask for an appropriation to assist it. I think that proposition is admitted. Two of the higher educational institutions have done so, namely, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and also the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. Does it not raise a question in your mind, with what there will be in this section 1, the latter part of it, if this is passed, that those same institutions and every other institution would have a right to come to this Legislature, even after the passage of the anti-aid amendment, and ask for an appropriation, and would not the Legislature have the right to give it to them? That is one point.

Then, in section 2 you will notice that "all other universities, colleges and higher institutions of learning" have been inserted, and then at the very end of this thing: "The Legislature shall have the power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will insure a complete and sufficient system of education in those institutions above enumerated."

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: I should like to ask the speaker this question: Whether he considers that the power of the Legislature to exempt institutions of learning from taxation is dependent on this word "immunity" contained in this particular clause, and whether throwing out that clause would tend to take away from the Legislature power to exempt educational institutions not under public control?

Mr. MERRILL: I have not given that point special consideration, but for an offhand judgment I should agree with the gentleman from Milton that if the word "immunities" were stricken out it would tend to take away from the Legislature the power to exempt them from taxation. But the point to which I wish to call the special attention of the delegates is this: That under document No. 309 the Legislature is given absolute power to raise money by taxation which may be used by any institution in this State, college or higher institution in this State, for their own purposes. Now, is not the real question and the conflict of these two proposed amendments this: We have decided by the passage of the anti-aid amendment that public moneys shall be spent by public officials for the benefit of all the public. Now, under document No. 309 is not the effect of that to allow public moneys, raised by the State, to be given to institutions whether public or private, and spent by them for the benefit of people who are attending those institutions? Is not that the real point of difference in both of these, and is not the real question for us to decide whether or not we want our public moneys spent for the public by public officials, or, contra! By the passage of the anti-aid amendment we already have said that we desire to have our public moneys spent by our public officials for the benefit of the public. Now, in No. 309, if we vote for that, are we not saying that, much as we should like to have that done, we would rather have it spent by private institutions for the benefit of private individuals? Mr. President and gentlemen of the Convention, it seems to me that document No. 309 and the anti-aid amendment are diametrically opposed to each other. You pass the one and you kill the other. I cannot see any other solution of the difficulty.

I hope that the Convention will reject absolutely document No. 309 and let chapter 5 of the Constitution remain just as it is, without any change whatsoever.

Mr. Good of Cambridge: I should like to call the attention of the delegates briefly to the history of some of the exemption laws that are now in vogue in this Commonwealth. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Worcester favoring resolution No. 309 to a statute passed under our Constitution, exempting the students of Harvard University and other universities, placed in our statute-book in 1837. As far back as 1808, my city of Cambridge was permitted to tax college property lying out of college bounds, excepting property improved by certain college offices, and in 1818 this exception was extended to all officers and students and to all unoccupied property. In 1829 all officers and students of Harvard, as well as of Williams and other institutions, and their preceptors, and academies, also were dropped. The law relating to Harvard College provided further that "the inhabitants of the town of Cambridge may for town purposes tax such real estate in the town belonging to the corporation of Harvard College as not within the college bounds, and not occupied by the president or any professor, instructor, tutor, student or resident graduate thereof." It went further and exempted property of Phillips Academy at Andover. It continued on and exempted the property of Williams College and of Amherst College. It went further and exempted the personal property of all literary, benevolent, and charitable and scientific institutions incorporated within this Commonwealth, and such real estate belonging to such institutions as was actually all occupied by them or by the officers of such institutions for the purpose for which they were incorporated.

The Supreme Judicial Court, Mr. President, made a finding relative to the constitutionality of the various Massachusetts exemptions. The third article of the Declaration of Rights, and article XI of the amendments, which was substituted for it, recognized the importance of the public worship of God, etc., etc. As taxation to procure property for such uses is permitted, exemption of property so procured is permitted under the special provision of the Constitution touching upon the subject of education, and you have further constitutional requirements for the encouragement of literature and science and for the diffusion of education among the people. Such exemptions did not prevent the taxation of the people from being proportional and equal.

I believe, Mr. President, that the subject-matter in resolution No. 309 is well covered within our present Constitution, and I am in accord with the views as expressed by the gentleman from Gloucester, that there surely is an interference with the anti-aid amendment in this so-called educational resolution No. 309.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: As I have twice been misquoted here this morning I am led to believe that I may have been misunderstood, and while my opinion may be of little consequence I prefer to correct the misunderstanding. The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Coombs), in the utmost good faith, no doubt, quoted me as having expressed the opinion to the Convention that there is no interference between these two resolutions. I am far from having said that or from having entertained any such opinion, for I have never looked into the question of how far there may be interference between them, and have no definite opinion upon it at this moment. What I said here the other day, as I recollect it, and all I intended to say, was that it is not necessarily to be assumed that between two constitutional provisions the one which is adopted later supersedes the other, and that is true. The question is: How far are they necessarily inconsistent with each other? There is no doubt, of course, as every lawyer knows, of the general rule that of two statutes necessarily and absolutely inconsistent with each other, the later statute would be held as superseding to that extent the former. At any rate, there is so much risk that it would be so held that the contrary cannot safely be assumed. How far there is any repugnancy between these two provisions I do not attempt to say, for I have never undertaken to examine the question.

The real difficulty with the situation here,—and I say this with due deference to my friends of the committee on Bill of Rights,—is the difficulty which attended the sectarian measure throughout its whole history, the superiority of the committee to any advice and their intolerance with any interference by the Convention in their conduct of the measure. The only thing they would ever allow the Convention to do with it was to pass it, without one word of change. That they were willing the Convention should do, and that only. Now there is a move in that committee to meet the existing difficulty, for they are afraid that their amendment may be impaired by the operation of resolution No. 309. Probably there are a dozen men in the Convention, perhaps more than a dozen, who can tell them how to meet and cure it, but my advice has not been asked, and I am not in the habit of volunteering it where it is not wanted.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: The committee on Bill of Rights does not ask and does not want the suggestion or advice of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). The committee on Bill of Rights may have been negligent in not seeing this report, and for that we ask the consideration of the Convention, and offer no insinuations against the committee on Education for anything they have done. They put their report in, and we did not see it, and we admit it. Now the thing to do is to make it right. I want to state, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Convention, what my understanding of the law is, and not what the gentleman from Wellesley's understanding is, and I leave it to the eminent lawyers in this Convention, or to the eminent delegate from Fall River, if I do not state the law correctly. If those two propositions were put on the ballot at the same time, and were accepted by the people of this State, then the Supreme Judicial Court would try to reconcile them, and if they could not reconcile them they would nullify them. The other proposition is that if the anti-aid amendment goes on the ballot this fall and is accepted by the people of this State, and a year hence or at some other time No. 309 goes on the ballot and is accepted, the Supreme Judicial Court will say that it is an amendment to the original proposition and that the amendment passed at a latter date is the law, and I say that is the law and ask any gentleman here to speak if I do not state it correctly. There are other former Attorneys-General here, there is a former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, and if I have not stated it accurately I will accept their correction. But I will not accept the correction of a man who has stood here and opposed the anti-aid amendment from beginning to end and never offered a suggestion for its improvement. We have passed that resolution. It has been accepted by the Convention. It has been engrossed. It has been ordered to be submitted to the people. It is out of the hands of the Convention. The matter before this Convention is No. 309, and I agree with the gentleman from Gloucester (Mr. Merrill) that the thing to do is to defeat that resolution. Defeat it, why? Because Harvard College is taken care of in the amendment as it stands to-day. I submit that this resolution is not necessary. It is not needed at this time. It is all covered in the present Constitution. And I suggest, gentlemen, as the gentleman from Gloucester did, that the thing for the Convention to do is to defeat the resolution.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: I want to ask a question of the secretary of the committee on Education, whether or not in his opinion under No. 309 the Worcester Polytechnic Institute might receive appropriations from the State.

Mr. Coombs: I am delighted to answer that question. I feel that under No. 309 the Worcester Polytechnic Institute has no more chance than it has under the anti-aid amendment; it was absolutely ruled out. That was my interpretation from start to finish. It will be as long as I am debating the question.

Mr. Pelletier: I listened very intently to everything that was said here, particularly by the secretary. As far as I can find out, they are wanting to amend the Constitution, — because of some sentiment. I do not know what the trouble is with the old wording. It is archaic, it is old-fashioned, and I do not know whether it is quite up to our literary standards of to-day; but they have not changed any adjectives, they have not changed any nouns or verbs or adverbs, they have added something entirely new. What was the matter with the existing Constitution? What is it Harvard College wants that it was not getting under the old amendment? Why not be frank? Why does the president of Harvard come over here and ask for a change in the law affecting Harvard University? Cannot we get that reply? Does not anybody know, or did the committee, because of his eminence, simply defer to his wish and suggest this amendment to the Constitution? I should like to know wherein the old Bill of Rights was wanting so far as Harvard University is concerned, and I should like to know whether some other college or university came and asked to be placed in with Harvard. "Other institutions of higher learning" were added. What institutions were they? So far as the second section is concerned, it uses very largely the wording, but it attempts to knock into one section the two or three or four sections that the fathers thought ought to be arranged in separate form. I do not know what criticism there is of the old form. We are retaining a great deal of the old Constitution that never should go into a brand-new one to be made to-day. We are doing it out of reverence, doing it because, after all, it is pretty high moral speech that they used in those days and we think that there is some good to come from it. Why this committee should attack to-day that lovely, old-fashioned sentiment and high moral standard of the fathers I do not know. And why this provision, this last sentence, that the Legislature shall have power to tax, and otherwise, for mental, physical and moral development in connection with higher institutions, colleges, etc.? Who asked to have that put in? Does it add something that the Legislature could not do better? If so let us hear it. Let us have it. Let us not ask the people to adopt something that we do not understand. It is just enlarging the power of the Legislature regarding raising money by taxation. Our friend from Worcester says: "I must confess that the Commissioner of Education brought that in," and again shall we assume that the committee bowed to that eminent person? We have two gentlemen here quoted as having asked for something. You and I are asked to vote for it. We are asked the serious, honest question as to whether or not the adoption of this measure would not nullify the anti-aid amendment. There is a difference of opinion on that, and the question is of importance. If they want the Legislature to support any institutions, let them say so. Why, I ask, gentlemen, why did the Legislature need to be given that power? What power does it give the Legislature that the Legislature did not have before? I think if these questions should be answered perhaps I would change my whole opinion, but I cannot for the life of me see where the call came for these changes, and I have listened intently; and I have tried to find reasons that have not been given yet that seem to satisfy my mind.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I do not think that the amendment offered in No. 309 for the resolution in any way conflicts with the anti-aid amendment. I move amendments in section 2, striking out, in line 10, the word "higher" and inserting in place thereof the words "all schools and"; and inserting after the word "towns," in line 12, the words "and cities".

Mr. Kenny: It seems to me that the gist of the anti-aid amendment is to stop the teaching of literature in schools. Now, it is like the German government, going through Belgium, to get a franchise. Certain fanatics apparently wish to drive from our schools learning and everything else that is cultured and refined. I do not believe that any fair-minded man who voted for the anti-aid amendment, anti-aid resolution, can find fault with this resolution which supports the schools. I do not believe that my friend from Newton, my learned friend who rose with the schools, would deny those conditions to a poor community, where perhaps at certain times of the day a denominational doctrine might be taught or religion might be taught in other rooms from the room which he is in. If we believe the gentleman from the Deerfield Valley (Mr. Boyden) he does not take much stock in what has been proposed, because if the towns and cities cannot support the schools, why, then, Massachusetts is going to be in a sad way. If we are going to deny our own Commonwealth and all other Commonwealths the right to receive from the State aid because perhaps they have followed only old customs in their schools, then I say Massachusetts is making a great mistake.

I am surprised that the honorable gentleman from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), the chairman of the anti-aid committee, is so intolerant of the opinion of our distinguished ex-Attorney-General (Mr. Pillsbury). I certainly should like very much, and I think every gentleman of this Convention would like to hear from the ex-Attorney-General of Massachusetts how we can straighten this thing out. And my distinguished friend from Boston's old Ward 8 (Mr. Lomasney) seems to be dreadfully worked up if anybody suggests the slightest modification of that sectarian resolution. But now I say, gentlemen, if the present district attorney (Mr. Pelletier), if the chairman of the sectarian committee and my distinguished friend from Ward 8 will only kindly be a little more tolerant, this is the last time perhaps for a hundred years Massachusetts will have a chance to guard its learning. Agnostics are presenting to you a gold brick.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Does the gentleman understand that the amendment as it stands now does not prohibit the teaching of religion in public schools, but does simply prohibit the inculcation of denominational doctrine?

Mr. Kenny: Now, Mr. President, will the gentleman kindly state to me the difference between the teaching of religion and denominational doctrine?

Mr. Anderson: I am willing to do that. By the teaching of religion we mean the teaching of those great truths of religion which are common to all denominations. By denominational teaching we mean the teaching of distinctive denominational doctrine.

Mr. Kenny: I should like to have the gentleman define what a distinctive denominational doctrine is.

Mr. Anderson: I think we can leave that to the Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Kenny: My distinguished friend is in doubt. He wants the Supreme Judicial Court to pass upon this matter, and if the anti-aid resolution is not perfect, — he does not understand it himself, — why should he ask that we strike out advances in money which we should give to these schools when he himself does not know what denominational doctrine is or what distinguishing truths are. Does the gentleman say that the Ten Commandments are a denominational doctrine, and does he want them stricken out by the law from our school-books? Would he say to the gentleman of the Deerfield Valley: "Although you have been teaching certain great truths I construe them as distinctive denominational doctrines. The State will take the appropriation from you" and thus leave ignorant those people in the Deerfield Valley or in other parts of our great Commonwealth? The great trouble is, Mr. President, it is a very weak measure. It is a measure that nobody can understand. It is a measure that the fanatics have tinctured a little bit, and we should be careful not to destroy learning in our State in order to satisfy the grouch of a few people. I believe that, because they do not understand what they are aiming at, we should not destroy learning in this Commonwealth. Learning went hand in hand with the first construction of this Commonwealth. The safety of our Republic depends upon learning. The great German element in certain sections of our city become acquainted with American doctrines only by being taught in their German schools, and is the German language a distinctive denominational doctrine? Would he have the Kaiser excluded from the German school because of his doctrines? Is that denominational doctrine? It seems to me, when a man does not understand his own amendment, that therefore he has no right to oppose the passage of this measure regarding education.

Mr. Lomasney: The only reason advanced for the passage of this amendment to the Constitution is sentiment. Now, Mr. President, we do not want to send an amendment to the people on sentiment. That is the only reason. Any man here, — and there are a hundred and fifty men here, — knows that when people have a title to a piece of property, old people, they hold on to it; they do not shift. That is the position of Harvard University. They have that title. They are in the Constitution as it was left in 1853. Why start in now to interfere with it? I would say, not so quietly and so impressively as the former Attorney-General, that if my views are wanted as to how to remedy the thing, I will give you gentlemen a simple way: Kill this resolution. That is everything.

Mr. WHITTIER of Winthrop: It seems to me that this whole situation is very much befogged, in the first place with ignorance, and in the second by what is far worse, and that is a spirit of suspicion which seems to be, as we proceed from day to day, the prevailing influence of this Convention. Now, in answer to the estimable district attorney I want as far as possible to meet two or three of the questions that he raises.

In the first place, it seemed to me that this question of sectarian, or anti-aid, amendment should have been submitted to the committee on Education rather than to the committee on Bill of Rights. That was the first mistake, and it was a great mistake, because we were ignoring the committee on Education, and yet we now find that one of the most important phases of that question was met in that committee. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, take into consideration this fact: At the time that the whole question of Education, — and there were four or five different measures before us, — came to the committee on Education, this great principle, so called, had not at that time taken any definite form. I, at any rate, as a humble member of that committee and of this Convention, knew very little about this so-called great principle at stake. To be sure, I voted for the report of the committee, the resolution of the committee on Bill of Rights, but it took me a long time to be converted even to the extent that I could vote for it. At the time this measure was before our committee, — all these various measures were before our committee, — it was extremely nebulous. I, for one, never had expected that the State would be prevented from supporting education as far as granting aid to higher institutions of learning was concerned. Perhaps I was ignorant, but as a matter of fact that phase of the question never had interested me at all. So much for that.

The estimable district attorney raises some questions as to how this measure comes in here. I do not think many members of this Convention have examined the various resolutions which were presented to the committee on Education. The first one seems to some to be making a butt of Harvard University. I want to tell you men that one of the most impressive things in my experience as a member of this Convention was when my colleague sitting in this division, Joseph Michelman, pardon my mentioning him by name, and the President of Harvard College, — two very distinct types of our citizenship, the one the very quintessence of culture, learning, refinement, the other a man who had come to this country as an immigrant and made a valuable citizen, — when those two men stood on common ground before the committee on Education. Mr. Michelman spoke in favor of resolution No. 24, which I should like to have you examine for a moment, which had to do with the striking out of articles 1, 2, and 3 of section 1 of chapter 5, — the striking out of all of said articles 1, 2, and 3 of section
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

1, chapter 5,—and with wholly annulling section 1 of chapter 5. Those of you who ask to leave this Constitution in its present shape, want to examine this resolution and see if you mean what you say.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Does the present Constitution, the section that you strike out, give the Legislature power to do certain things in Harvard College which your resolution takes away from the Legislature? The present Constitution reads: "Provided, that the Legislature may"—but "nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the Legislature of this Commonwealth from making such alterations in the government of the said university as shall be conducive to its advantage," while your resolution says: "It is hereby declared that the Harvard College president and fellows shall hold and exercise forever all their immunities and privileges."

Mr. Whittier: I shall touch upon that shortly. The delegate to whom I have referred in this section desired, and quite rightly I think, to establish all universities in the Commonwealth on an equal basis. Bear in mind that at the time this Constitution was written there was practically, probably, you would say, only one such institution. It was only natural and right that the great University at Cambridge should receive the consideration it received in this original Constitution. But in all these years times have changed. That has been eloquently brought out by the gentleman to whom I already have referred. At the same time, there is a certain amount of sentimental value which I do not believe any man who faces this situation squarely wants to dispense with. The president of Harvard College, to be sure, spoke in favor of the retention of all of these sections which could be done rightly without prejudice to any other institution of learning in this Commonwealth. Harvard did not expect, did not ask for any exclusive privilege,—nothing but what was shared in common by all. She was the older sister university, institution of learning, but there was absolutely no reason why she, in preference to all others, should receive any exclusive privilege or benefit, which should not be shared by all. And in consequence of that, the change was made to which some of you take exception, and which accords to other institutions of learning the same cherished and encouragement.

To go on to the next resolution, No. 73, offered by the gentleman sitting in the third section.

I prefer to follow these four resolutions down through their regular course, if I may be allowed to do so. My purpose here and now is simply explaining my own position, and what I believe to have been the absolutely honest above-question position of the members of the committee on Education, and to meet what I consider to be absolutely unfounded, the suggestions of insincerity, and what is even worse, which have been aimed at the members of this committee.

Here is another question raised in resolution No. 73, a long resolution,—a fairly long resolution,—which touches upon matters which we all grant to be of the very highest importance to us all. Are we going to give absolutely no consideration at all to matters which perhaps may not be possible of special treatment, but which should receive emphasis and consideration in a general way in a Constitution of this kind? Is this Constitution simply to be short, concise statements, without very much inspiration, without very much appeal to the best instincts of every one of us? Is it to be merely something which has absolutely no inspiring force whatsoever, merely a dead letter? We thought not. We felt that this first portion of chapter 5, section 1 and section 2, was much more than that,—that it was an appeal to the very best in every one of us to encourage in every possible way these great, broad, general principles which should govern our education and govern all those other virtues akin to it. We felt that reference should be made to these matters, and consequently, while it seemed to us impossible, quite unnecessary in fact, to add the entire resolution, we did lay emphasis in the latter part,—and it is another section of this resolution which is criticized,—that the opportunity shall be afforded for full mental, physical and moral development, which will aid and encourage all to become unselfish and loyal citizens. Of course if this Constitution is to contain, as I said before, merely certain short, concise statements, leave it out; but we do not believe that this Constitution should be any such thing. It is not to be a dead thing. It should be a living force. It is to be a power, an inspiration.

Let me go on,—Number 157, No. 158. You ask how these things came into this report. It already has been touched upon, I think, by the delegate from Newton as to the disorderly, or, what perhaps would be a better word, disorganized condition of our educational system in Massachusetts. We all of us know what differences there are in the various systems of education in neighboring cities and towns. There is absolutely nothing like a uniform system of education. It has been much more ably touched upon in this Convention than I possibly can do here. It is a fact that the Commissioner of Education did appear before the committee, and I think that if he appeared before this Convention every one of you would appreciate, if you do not appreciate it now, the situation that exists in this Commonwealth at the present time. There should be established in this Commonwealth,—and I for one cannot imagine any better authority than that of the Commissioner of Education to establish such a system,—a uniform system of education. How is that to be done? The Legislature shall have power to determine the organization of the school system supported in whole or in part by the State and to raise by taxation or otherwise money for the support of the same. To use a common phrase, is there any "nigger in the woodpile" in that? I did not see one. I do not believe one is there.

You ask us how this came in this resolution. That is the only answer I can give you, and it is a very necessary situation, a situation that we should meet if we are to do constructive work, and that is what the committee on Education tried to do. We wanted to have it possible for the establishment in this Commonwealth of a uniform system of education that the disparity which exists at the present time should exist no longer; that it should be met. I for one, as a member of the committee on Education, do not intend that any member of this Convention shall criticize my motive or my action in this matter. When we had these various questions before us we had one duty to perform,—to take the best out of these resolutions and incorporate it into an amendment of the present Constitution. We did not want to throw away that which was good; we wanted to keep it, the whole of it, and pass it on to succeeding generations. As much as was good, or as much of these various resolutions as could be incorporated into the Constitution, we took and accepted, and incorporated in one general measure. The result of what the committee on Bill of Rights had done we certainly did not know at that time. We were not prophets. We had no powers of omniscience. We did not know what sort of measure was to come here from the committee on Bill of Rights. It was all in the making then, as I said before. At that time I had not been converted to this great principle of taking away State aid from the higher institutions of learning. We incorporated into this resolution, as I said before, all that was good, all that justly could be retained from the existing Constitution, and added to it as much as we could of the various measures which would make it better and stronger and of more far-reaching good. If, as I say, you bring in another amendment which conflicts with it, we are ready, as far as it can be done, to reconcile the two. But I do not believe that any man in this Convention who really faces this question, who realizes the splendid inspiration that is contained in these first two sections of chapter 5, will want for a moment to cast it to the winds and say that it is no longer of value and of use, because it has been and it is today a power and a means of inspiration to our people.

The debate was continued after the noon recess.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: A number of questions have been asked in regard to this report of the committee on Education, which are very proper and which, it seems to me, can be answered without difficulty. It should be remembered that at the time this report was drawn the committee did not know what the result of the action of the committee on the Bill of Rights in regard to the anti-aid amendment would be. The committee on Education could take no stand, and desired to take no stand, one way or the other in regard to that matter. They simply desired to deal with the matters of education which were referred to them, and not interfere with any other matter before the Convention. It should be remembered also that at that time the committee supposed that anything they recommended would be a part of one Constitution. No suggestion, so far as I know, at that time had been made that any portion of the Constitution should be submitted to the people before any other portion; and I suspect that whatever difficulty has arisen here, if any difficulty has arisen, comes out of the suggestion now made that the anti-aid matter should be put before the people in November next. Now, as this difficulty has arisen subsequently to the report of the committee on Education it does not seem that the proper way to deal with it is to defeat the committee's report, but to have some amendment made to this resolution, if any is necessary, in order to conform with the new course of action which the Convention sees fit to take. As one of the speakers against the committee's report already has said, no difficulty would arise provided this report was part of one Constitution, of which the anti-aid resolution was another part. It would then clearly appear that these general provisions in favor of education were modified by certain restrictions in another part; and I do not see that any possible difficulty would arise. Many of the questions that have been asked in regard to this matter have been asked under a misapprehension of the situation. Harvard College has asked for nothing,—has sought no change in the Constitution. A petition was brought before the committee to remove from the Constitution all reference to Harvard College; and the president of Harvard College appeared before the committee in opposition to that action. He was asked if at the present time the second and third articles of chapter 5, section 1, had any material value,—if their worth had not entirely passed away; and he admitted that he could not see that they had any present value. But (and this was the only place so far as I know where sentiment came in,—the committee has recommended nothing whatever on the ground of sentiment) we were asked to retain in the Constitution a reference to Harvard College, as a matter of sentiment, partly; and that we did in section 1. We went over that section with President Lowell, and he stated that he thought the desire of the petitioners was perfectly fair, that other institutions of learning should be placed upon the same basis as Harvard College. You will remember that in the Constitution, Harvard was mentioned as the only institution of higher learning; and it was, at that time. It seemed to the committee to be unwise, and President Lowell admitted that it did to him, to retain the reference to Harvard without referring to other institutions. And that was why section 1 was slightly modified. Articles 2 and 3 of chapter 5, section 1, are omitted entirely, no one appearing before the committee supposing them to have any value. It seemed a pity to retain and reprint them in the Constitution year after year if they have no value whatever,—not even a sentimental value.

Section 2 of chapter 5, on "The Encouragement of Literature," seemed a proper section to retain; and that section the committee was asked in several particulars to modify. We modified it by inserting a reference to physical education that has become prominent at the present day, but was not so at the time the Constitution was written. We further modified it by a reference to citizenship, to which, although now regarded as so important, there was no direct reference in the Constitution.

The clause which has seemed to receive the most criticism, beginning at the bottom of the third page: "To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise", was a clause which was presented to the committee by the Board of Education, which unanimously requested that we should put that clause, or something similar to it, into the Constitution.

Now, the reason of this was not in any way sentimental. It was for two purposes, as I understand it. First, there was the reference to taxation. Now, it has been a disputed point in this Commonwealth whether a mill tax, which has been adopted in some States, and which has been suggested here for purposes of public education, would be constitutional. Probably it would be; but the Board of Education said that it had been doubted, and they wished that the power should be undisputed, as they thought in the years to come there might be need of such a tax and it was well to have the Legislature have the power to adopt it if, in the future, it seemed wise so to do. And in the second place, they desired to have a reference in the Constitution to a system of education. They deemed it of importance because, apparently, when the Constitution was drawn such a thing as a State system of education did not exist. There was no reference to any such thing in the Constitution, and they thought it desirable, in view of possible legislation to keep abreast of modern views of education, that these provisions should be inserted. For those purposes we put in this clause.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 259

Now, I think, Mr. President, that if the gentlemen will read carefully the whole they will see that it does not mean what apparently people have thought it did mean. Let us read it: "To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education."

Now, that does not mean that appropriations shall be made for the local agencies and institutions. It simply means that taxation shall be allowed for the complete system of State education; and that in considering that system in an old Commonwealth like Massachusetts they should consider the existing institutions and not duplicate them. There is no provision that the taxation shall be for the "local agencies and institutions above enumerated"; but in consistency with them and in consideration of them, the Board of Education may tax for purposes of public education. That is a perfectly fair and reasonable interpretation. It was the interpretation put upon it by the Board of Education and by the committee.

The committee, however, has no desire to insist upon its interpretation, if there is any doubt about it. It is perfectly willing to have any amendment made which does away with any inconsistency with the anti-aid amendment. And a few words certainly will do that.

I do not see, Mr. President, that there is anything in this resolution which is in the least degree inconsistent with or which interferes in any way with the anti-aid amendment; unless it comes by the order of passage of amendments, and that certainly could be taken care of easily.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is desirable that the substance of this resolution should be passed: First, to omit those two paragraphs which are wholly unnecessary; and, secondly, to put in these references desired by the Board of Education in order to give the Legislature ample power to keep our system of education in the future abreast with modern times.

Mr. Pelletier: I should like to ask the gentleman why that provision of the present Constitution appearing on page 61, being chapter 5, section 1, article 3, reading as follows: "Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the Legislature of this Commonwealth from making such alterations in the government of the said university as shall be conducive to its advantage, and the interest of the republic of letters, in as full a manner as might have been done by the Legislature of the late Province of the Massachusetts Bay," — why that was struck out?

Mr. Wellman: I already have explained that, after going over this with the president of Harvard University, we could find no use for it. The gentleman will notice that in the Constitution a very specific form of government of Harvard College was provided, and then follows the provision to which he refers. Long since, that original specific form of government of Harvard College was overthrown by legislation, so that there is no need at the present day of giving opportunity to overthrow again. If this is struck out, the government of Harvard College rests to-day solely upon the statute and upon the Constitution; it can be modified at any time by the Legislature, just as can the government of any other college. That is the understanding the committee has of that matter.
Mr. Lomasney: Did I understand the gentleman to say we had no State system of education in Massachusetts?

Mr. Wellman: At the time the Constitution was adopted, as I understand the matter, there was nothing which, at the present day, would be called a "system of education". A system of education, in the sense in which that phrase is used at the present day, is entirely a growth of later times. There might be said to be a system in Massachusetts, but not in the sense in which it exists in many other States; and the Constitution as at present drawn nowhere recognizes anything like a system of education as do the Constitutions of many other States.

Mr. Lomasney: I repeat the question. Do I understand the gentleman to say we have no State system of education here?

Mr. Wellman: I think I have answered that question as completely as I can.

Mr. Lomasney: I should like to ask the gentleman what our Board of Education has been doing. How have we been getting our children educated in the common and grammar schools, in the high schools and colleges, if we have no system of education? And what is the matter with the present system, that he wants to change it without giving our citizens a hearing?

Mr. Wellman: I have no desire, nor has the committee any desire, to change anything without a hearing. The Board of Education, as I understand it, has gone forward under the present Constitution and has done what it could to build up a system of education. It thinks that it should be freer in the future to ask for legislation which is needed if a system of education were recognized in the Constitution. This never would be done, never could be done, Mr. President, without a full hearing. The amendment simply would empower the Legislature, if it thought wise, to adopt certain measures which it might not be able to adopt at the present time.

Mr. Lomasney: Does the gentleman who was just speaking remember the attempt of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) to put into the anti-aid measure an amendment giving the Board of Education control over the school-committees, and how that matter was defeated by the Convention?

Mr. Wellman: I remember that very well. That same proposition was brought before the committee on Education, and it decided not to report it. But it did decide to report what is here, and it believes this provision to be safe and wise.

Mr. Lomasney: Why did not the committee on Taxation consider this taxation question, rather than the committee on Education?

Mr. Wellman: The committee on Education considered this question because it was given to the committee on Education to consider.

Mr. Good of Cambridge: I should like to ask the gentleman from Topsfield if, in the event of resolution No. 309 passing, it would not act as a lever to forestall any attempt which might be made at some future time to establish a State University, or if it would not act as a lever to forestall any attempt which might be made by the Commonwealth to take over by absorption Harvard College?

Mr. Wellman: I do not think I quite understand the question. Does the gentleman think that the effect of these words would be to favor or to oppose a State University? I do not understand there is anything in this language which deals with that question one way or the other, or attempts to touch it in one way or another.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I desire to call to the attention of the Convention at this time a rather notable contribution to this discussion about aid to denominational or sectarian schools. It is from the pen of a very able citizen of this State, a non-Catholic, — Mr. Ralph Adams Cram, — at present professor of architecture in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; one of the architects of the Protestant Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, one of the architects of the United States Military Academy at West Point, and a notable contributor to literature and the arts for the last ten or fifteen years, not only in this country, but in Europe as well. The letter is somewhat long, but I think it is interesting enough to warrant that I read it here in full. It is taken from the Boston Transcript, June 22 last, and reads as follows:

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Between the intricate cross-currents of political expediency on the one hand and cynical bigotry on the other there is a good chance that a clause may be written into the Constitution of the Commonwealth prohibiting any form of State aid to schools not absolutely and exclusively under civil and secular control. Nothing worse could happen. I am not a Roman Catholic, therefore I cannot be accused of ulterior motives when I say that I believe every Catholic parochial school, and every private school, whether denominational or not, should be able to claim, and should receive State support in exact proportion to its number of pupils, and on the same financial basis as the free public schools of the State, provided only that the educational standards of any private school receiving such support should be maintained at a level at least equal to that of the public schools.

I am perfectly well aware of the fact that this statement will invoke more opposition than any other that could possibly be made. There is a theory, generally held, that the free, secularized, State-controlled public school is the chief bulwark of what are termed (I know not why) "our liberties," and that any school under what is known as "denominational" control is a menace, particularly if this particular control happens to be Roman Catholic. This is a superstition. Of course it is true that the chief governing impulses to-day are superstitions of one sort or another, and not all superstitions are bad; some are beneficial; but this one is wholly bad.

The most ominous fact to-day is not the menace of Prussianism, or the looming danger of Socialist "Internationalism," or even the inevitable and proximate supremacy of a false democracy of method over the true democracy of ideals: it is the universal deficiency in human character, as compared with certain past periods, as this showed itself in the thirty years just preceding the war; a deficiency that is only being made good to a certain extent amongst the soldiers at the front and the women and workers at home, by the abnormal stimulus of an unparalleled war, but thus far is showing itself little enough amongst those who have in their hands the direction of the war, whether military, civil or industrial.

Character, the sole and supreme object of education (pace Dr. Abraham Flexner!), was a sadly deficient quantity amongst men in all categories of life, and in all countries, from anywhere about 1890 on to the outbreak of the war. The fact was obscured by an immense material success and an equally immense development along the lines of applied science. Moreover, we were not interested in character, but in "efficiency," in "putting it over" and in "getting results," all of which we achieved to admiration, or thought we did, until the shock of war, determined by those who had done better than we along these same lines, showed us our mistake. The war was of course inevitable, and its chief object (divine, not human) is to restore the balance by creating character anew after modernism has permitted it to lapse.

Of course this degeneration in human character is due to a complex of many causes, but one of these is certainly our contemporary system of education, which began its evil course with secularization, went on to "free electives," continued into utilitarianism and "vocational training," soared to new heights in the condemnation of the classics and of cultural training, and now approaches its apotheosis under the aegis of the Rockefeller Foundation. Modern education, cut off from definite and dogmatic religious influence, metamorphosed into a farago of superficial eclecticism, debased to the level of utilitarian expediency, subject to the tergiversations of "experts" and to incarnations of the empirical and doctrinaire, has failed to justify itself, even so far as attainment of the peculiar objects it set for itself is concerned, while it has played a large part in the present betrayal of civilization, through the lowering of character, the elimination of leadership and the dominance of the unit.

Education, considered as the constructive force for the building up of character, is completely ineffective unless it is dominated by definite and constant religious direction and influence. It is also a failure if it becomes a kind of experimental laboratory for the ingenious activities of jejune specialists in pedagogical science. There are still many who know this is so, and if they believe it strongly enough, and have a sufficient sense of duty to their children and to society (or if like myself they have had twelve years' personal experience in public schools, and nowhere else), they are ready to pay taxes to support public schools they do not use, and large sums for tuition in the private schools, or for the support of the parochial schools they do use.

In allowing them to do this the State works an injustice. Neither legislation nor administration in political matters, municipal, State or National, during the last thirty years, has been wholly of a nature to give men a blind and reverent confidence in the claim of the State that all children should be handed over to its Board of Education, to be schooled and trained and developed under their complete and arbitrary direction, along such lines, and in accordance with such principles, as they see fit to determine. I am not attacking the State educational authorities; most of those I know, both corporately and individually, are conscientious and earnest and sincere. I am not giving a blanket vote of confidence to the private schools and parochial schools I know, for all of them fail in certain directions, and already many of them are vitiated by their effort to follow the popular lines in vogue in the public schools. What I am doing is asserting that the principle of secularized, mechanized, State controlled education is a mistaken one, and that the State has neither the right to impose this on parents against their will, or to compel those who think differently to pay double for the education of their children.

Instead of making this injustice permanent by intruding in the Constitution of Massachusetts such a clause as Mr. Lomasney has offered, or such a one as may be expected from "The Luther of Somerville" (if that is his correct title), it would be far more just and righteous, and infinitely more for the benefit of society, if the Constitutional Convention would provide in the new organic law that any school, private, parochial, or "denominational," that maintained its educational standards at a level, certified by the State Board of Education to be equal to that of the corresponding grade of public school, might claim and receive, from the State, financial support in proportion to its number of pupils, and equal to that expended, pro rata, on the children in the public schools of the State.

As a professor in a technical institution where I come in contact with upwards of two hundred young men in my own department in the course of a year, I can say that the products of the private schools, and specifically of the Roman Catholic parochial schools and colleges, compare at least favorably with their fellows of a different educational experience. This is true of character, as well as I can judge it in three years of personal acquaintance. When it comes to a question of clear, constructive thinking and clean-cut, incisive expression, the products of the parochial schools generally stand first.

It is, I think, about time we cut ourselves loose from the religious and educational superstitions of the nineteenth century and determined these matters on the basis of justice, righteousness and the testimony of incontrovertible results.

RALPH ADAMS CRAM.

I call this to the attention of this Convention in order that we may realize that outside of the Convention there are men of standing and thought who are giving this subject deep consideration, and that in our very desirable impulse to agree with each other and have nothing inharmonious with the Convention we may be overreaching and we may fail in doing the thing that we all want to do. Personally I have never mixed up in any kind of a religious controversy, and from my present angle of view I expect to follow that course always. I do hope, however, that this Convention will not go on record as penalizing any denomination, whether it is Protestant or Catholic, Jew or Mohamme-
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

263

dan or any other, by declaring that if they teach God in their best way, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is not going to support them if at any time they may need support. It would be a very unworthy thing for this Convention to go on record by suggesting any law which would result in crossing out the name of God and Christ and religion from our school-books. The thought of God was uppermost in the minds of the Pilgrims as they left the Mayflower and stepped on Plymouth Rock, and in every great movement in Massachusetts the belief in God has been openly professed. Massachusetts has grown great and strong and mighty by professing her trust in God, and we in this year 1917, with the terrible calamity oppressing the world, in the Titanic struggle of materialism now going on in Europe, should be the last to take any step that would suggest a want of trust in Almighty God. Remember, gentlemen, we are suggesting laws that are to govern our children and our children's children, and nothing should leave our hands that would in any way suggest to them that the teaching of God is to be penalized.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: I realize that this is a somewhat delicate subject to handle, no matter how fairly it be approached or with what breadth of mind proposed. It is somewhat like touching a prickly pear; you are apt to find thorns in your fingers in spite of all the care you may exercise. Yet, sir, such is my confidence in the good feeling, the broad common-sense and breadth of sympathy that all members of whatever faith and belief have exhibited in our deliberations here, that I feel that we may speak of this frankly. Even if some of us should take a good-natured "slam" at another, I am sure it will be taken in the right spirit.

Now, sir, when first my attention was called in this morning's ses-tion to this matter, I turned to document No. 309 and looked it over.
My first impression was that it was an undesirable proposition, and I hoped that the Convention, in its good judgment, would submerge it deeper than ever plummet sounded. I am not quite sure, sir, that I have reconsidered that view; it may be possible that amendments will so modify this matter that it will prove acceptable to me.

I want, sir, to call the attention of members, first, to this first paragraph. Now, sir, in my poor opinion the initial paragraph of this measure is vague, flabby, irrational, in its rhetoric and its reasoning.
I object strenuously to it in its present form, sir. We see here:

many persons of great eminence have, by the blessing of God, been initiated in those arts and sciences, which qualified them for public employment, both in church and State: and whereas the encouragement of arts and sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, —

Now, sir, far be it from me, and I hope I shall convey the impression to no honorable member that I am seeking in any way to belittle the importance of religious belief in the lives of men. I seek not to do that. If there is anything we should respect it is the religious beliefs of our fellow-men. But let me say, sir, the spear of science knows no brother, and the arts and sciences play no favorites in the field of religious belief.

. . . the encouragement of arts and sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, . . .

Among "good literature" would not the authors of this draft include the Jewish scriptures, the Old Testament? Why, I always have supposed that the Old Testament was pretty good literature! I am laboring, perhaps, under a mistake, as the committee may be able to convince me. I even have devoted a few hours of my life to the study of it. It "tends to . . . the advantage of the Christian religion."

Now, sir, in my own district I have a certain number of constituents, — not a predominating number, not a sufficient number so that I should fear their displeasure for any political reason, — but I have a certain number who are not Christians at all. From my observation and acquaintance with them they are very well-ordered, industrious, law-abiding, good citizens. Now, sir, I object, will object, to the inclusion of any phrase or mention in the fundamental law of the Commonwealth which shall seem to discriminate as between the religious beliefs of those who make up the citizenship of the Commonwealth. I say it is unfair and unjust. The time has come when we should declare boldly that we have got together as Catholics and Protestants here on a common ground of common-sense. We are not singing "Croppies lie down!" or "The Battle of Ross" or talking about what Oliver Cromwell and Sir Phelim O'Neil did. That was done three hundred years ago. They are doing worse things in Europe to-day than ever they did before.

Now let us get together on this. We have got together finely on one fundamental proposition, and it is an inspiring thing to think how splendidly the common-sense of this body triumphed over the prejudice and the bigotry of the past. Now, sir, let us go the limit and eliminate from the fundamental law all reference to specific faith which, by any possibility, can give offence.

Why, my boy in school in the city of Haverhill sat in the school-room with Jewish boys. It did not hurt him any, — those boys went to the public school. Now, I must say that if I honestly believed that the eternal salvation of my children's souls depended upon their having certain religious teaching in school every day, and if I did not think the church and the Sunday-school and the influence of the home were sufficient to bring them along the line that I wanted, then, sir, I should feel that I could not spend my money any more gratefully for any purpose. And I should not ask anybody to be taxed to help me out on the job. I should feel really offended if they suggested assisting me.

[Applause.]

I come now to a specific mention of the situation which is outlined in this proposition. Sir, for Harvard College, as an educational institution, I have the highest respect. [Applause.] I wish I had been so fortunate as to have gone there. I wish I could have gone through college. The United States army was my college. The years that many of you spent in preparatory school and college, in my case were spent in the forefront of the struggle in a world of men. Harvard College, I repeat, as an educational institution, claims, and always must claim, my respect and highest regard. But there are two sides to the shield, and I want to turn the escutcheon.

In the year 1913, sir, if I may resurrect a little bit of political history, a warm struggle was renewed here, — it had been attempted several years before, — to reconstruct the personnel of the State Board of Health, a body which I, upon the floor of the House here, had the privilege of characterizing as a "monumental aggregation of
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

265

senile dementia.” [Laughter.] I repeat that phrase, and add the assertion that at that time it was abundantly justified. Now, sir, at that time the chairman of the State Board of Health was a director or trustee, whatever you call it, of Harvard College. When that bill came into the House, we had twenty-five or thirty votes, a majority of votes, in favor of that proposition. Before the final vote on the third reading came, those men drifted away, and drifted away. I was talking one morning with an enthusiastic young man from the western part of the State who had been an enthusiastic proponent of the legislation designed to reorganize the State Board of Health, and as I talked with him about what we should do when it came to a vote I noticed that his face wore an anxious look. Finally he said: “Webster, I have got to back down.” I asked: “What do you mean?” Said he: “It’s this way. The president of the bank in my town is a warm friend and supporter of mine; he is a powerful man up there; he has done a lot for me, he can make or break me; and his bank has got a lot of Harvard College money that is deposited there, and I have got to vote the other way.” Now, Mr. President, there is the other side of the shield. I say again, for Harvard College, or any other educational institution, I have the highest respect, and I shall do anything that I can to help them as long as they do not overstep the bounds of their educational activities. But I object to this political meddling by any great, powerful interest. Why, when we gave them a million dollars,—it came in installments, $10,000 a year,—for this poor old tax-ridden Commonwealth to offer Harvard College that sum was just about as sensible as it would be for me to walk up to John Rockefeller and offer to lend him a quarter. Now, if this thing is going through at all, I want to see it abundantly safeguarded. But I think the safest thing to do will be to defeat it, erase it altogether. [Applause.]

Mr. John J. Mansfield of Boston moved that the resolution be amended as follows:

In section 1, by striking out, in lines 1, 2, and 3, the words “our wise and pious ancestors, so early as the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-six, laid the foundation of Harvard College, and whereas”; by striking out, in line 3, the word “later”; by striking out, in line 5, the word “other”; and by striking out, in lines 14 and 15, the words “the President and Fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, and”.

In section 2, by striking out, in line 2, the word “being”, and inserting in place thereof the word “are”; by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words “the university at Cambridge,”; by striking out, in line 10, the word “other”; by striking out, in line 11, the word “public”, and inserting in place thereof the word “and”; by striking out, in the same line, the words “and grammar schools”; and by inserting before the word “towns”, in line 12, the words “cities and”.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn moved the previous question.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: It seems to me that while this general subject is not one of very great importance yet it is well enough, for historical and sentimental reasons, to preserve in the Constitution this reference to Harvard College, and this declaration of the fact that education and literature are something which should receive the fostering care of the Commonwealth.

I recognize, however, that as the resolution stands there is a possible conflict between the concluding portion of section 2 and the anti-aid amendment which the Convention already has adopted. To my mind there is a very simple, easy way in which to remove that possible conflict; and it is for the purpose of making it certain that there is no conflict that I now offer a very simple amendment. I move, sir, that the resolution be amended in section 2, by inserting after the word "shall", in the last sentence, the words "save as otherwise and elsewhere provided in the Constitution."

That, gentlemen, removes the possible conflict altogether.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: I hope the previous question will not be ordered. There are some things to be said about this resolution, especially as it affects the anti-aid amendment, which have not yet been said.

A situation has been created by the introduction of this document, this resolution, and the discussion of it, that makes it necessary for this Convention to consider further whether, in the light of what has happened to-day, we have not now stated plainly to the Supreme Judicial Court and to the people of this Commonwealth that the Legislature cannot exempt any of the institutions that heretofore have been exempt from taxation. In the few minutes allowed me to offer my reasons against the previous question, I cannot state the matter that is in my mind. I wish to say that if the previous question is not ordered I shall state briefly, without unnecessary repetition, the objections that I think are now raised to the passage of either or both measures.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I trust the previous question will not be ordered at this time. If the members of the Convention want to jeopardize this amendment before the people, whenever it does go before the people, they will vote for the previous question at this time, before some of our members have had an opportunity to offer amendments which they desire to offer, and before some of our members who feel very strongly and very deeply in this matter have had a chance to express themselves. It is an unfair proposition to shut off debate on this question which touches every member of the Convention intimately, and I hope the previous question will not prevail.

Mr. Brackett of Arlington: I rise simply to join with the two previous speakers, the gentleman from Fall River and the gentleman from Somerville, in protesting against the previous question now being ordered. I do not do this because I have any intention of speaking upon the merits of this proposition; but gentlemen who do desire to speak should have that opportunity, and it would be for the benefit of the Convention to hear them.

Therefore I trust that the Convention will vote down the motion for the previous question.

Mr. Wellman: I rise simply to state that I am sure the members of the committee have no desire to shut off debate or to limit any reasonable criticism, but we wish the best thing that can be gathered from this report.

Mr. George of Haverhill: This is rather a peculiar situation. It seems to me that the previous question ought not to be ordered at this time. Here we have a committee that have considered this proposition and made a report. Some weeks afterwards the committee on Bill of Rights were considering a question akin to it, and they made a report. Under the rules, the report of the committee on Bill of Rights took precedence, and everybody knows how effectively and successfully their report was accepted and the resolution was passed. Now, three weeks later, the committee on Bill of Rights, having succeeded in putting their proposal across, come in here and take out of the calendar a resolution reported by the committee on Education, put it in ahead of everything else, and then tell us how it ought to be kicked out of the window because it is an intrusion on the committee on Bill of Rights.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 267

Now, I think the committee on Education have some rights, just as important as the committee on Bill of Rights. And while I do not discuss the merits of this question, I think at least the committee ought to have a right to make a statement about the only business that they have had before that committee, and about the only report that they will send to this Convention, without ordering the previous question at this time.

Furthermore, I should like very much to hear the gentleman from Fall River discuss this question, because I think he has given some attention to it, and I think it would be interesting to the members of this Convention. I think there are others who want to speak. Therefore I hope that the previous question will not be ordered.

The Convention refused to order the previous question, by a vote of 13 to 139.

Mr. CUMMINGS of Fall River: It is no news for this Convention to hear me say that I am opposed to the anti-aid amendment and that I shall oppose it as strenuously and as continuously as I am able to do so. And yet I should not want to have this Convention believe that in pressing my opposition I would urge any unfair argument or raise any question and support it unless I believed it had actual merit, that it was true as I stated it, and that it should influence the Convention.

When the anti-aid amendment was being considered by the Convention, previously to its engrossment, I raised the question of taxation, — that the provision of the resolution rendered it exceedingly doubtful if there could be any further exemption made by the Legislature, or any exemptions made hereafter, of any of those institutions which formerly had been exempted by the Legislature. The Constitution provides that taxation must be not only reasonable but must be proportional; and the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, when they were called upon to consider this question, stated that the reason why the Legislature was authorized to exempt charitable, religious, and educational institutions from taxation was because the Legislature was authorized to tax to support them, and as the Legislature had the power to tax to support those institutions it necessarily had the power to exempt the institutions from taxation. That already has been discussed; I shall not repeat it. I promise not to make any unnecessary repetitions.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: I wish the gentleman from Fall River would discuss that more at length; it is not clear to my mind as yet. I wish he would make it clear to the lay mind.

Mr. CUMMINGS: I did not mean when I said that I should not be guilty of unnecessary repetition that I had abandoned the question. I shall tell the Convention as clearly as I may the reason why, in the present condition of things, the court would be bound, in my humble judgment, to say that the legislative authority to exempt educational, charitable, and religious institutions from taxation was gone; that there was no longer any authority.

When I stated it before, I deferred, as I informed you, to the opinion of gentlemen in this Convention whose opinion I always am glad to take. I did not dare, for lack of time to consider it then, to assert with any degree of confidence that the anti-aid amendment would expose these institutions to taxation. But I do say now, after reflection, and with opportunity to consider the question, that in the light of the situation now created we have declared that we do not any longer wish to be taxed to support these institutions. Now, if you will keep that fact in mind, the other fact will be easily understood and accepted. The right to exempt an institution from taxation, so that that exemption shall not be exposed to the criticism of being illegal, depends upon the right to tax to support the institution. Because we have the right to tax to support, we have the right to exempt.

Mr. Anderson: Are we taxed now to support the churches? If not, how can their property be exempt?

Mr. Cummings: The question is a pertinent question. If I were to follow literally what the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court said in their opinion given to the Legislature, I should have to say that there was authority to tax to support the churches. Personally, speaking not only as a delegate, but as a lawyer, I am bound to believe that that was an inadvertence, and that the Justices never meant what it said. But in order fully to answer the question I shall read from the opinion, briefly.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the delegate from Fall River if, after his statement about taxation, at the close of debate on the anti-aid amendment, he requested me to give him certain decisions on the subject.

Mr. Cummings: I recall what the gentleman states took place.

Mr. Curtis: I should like to ask the delegate from Fall River if he has read those cases.

Mr. Cummings: I have not read the cases. I had the cases brought to my office; I had them considered by others. My duties here do not give me the opportunity that I had formerly to read cases; I have to leave that work to younger, brighter, and able minds; and so I had to take the advice and opinion of others that those decisions conformed to what the chairman of the anti-aid amendment committee said they conformed to, and that they were not in conflict with his views. Mr. President, does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. Curtis: I thank the gentleman very much for his courteous and straight answer.

Mr. Cummings: I was about to read for the Convention the statement in the opinion of the Justices, which may clear up the fog that is created by this question of taxation of charitable, religious, and educational institutions. I assume, without knowing, that the opinion was written by former Chief Justice Knowlton, as I understand that the opinions on constitutional questions generally are written by the Chief Justice, and he was the Chief Justice at that time. I think it will be accepted without urging, without any argument, that there was no abler lawyer or exponent or expounder of the Constitution in the Commonwealth than the gentleman whose name I have mentioned.
Here is what he says,—it is a short paragraph and perhaps it will meet the objection of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), or answer his question, rather than meet his objection. I am not sure but it will meet his objection:

There are other provisions under which the Legislature has acted, relative to particular subjects which involve taxation or exemption from taxation. The third article of the Declaration of Rights, and Article XI of the Amendments which was substituted for it, recognize the importance of the public worship of God, and of instruction in piety, religion and morality, as promoting the happiness and prosperity of a people and the security of a republican government. Accordingly, taxation for these purposes is authorized. (195 Mass. 607, at 608).

I admit that is a pretty broad statement. If I was asked the question, notwithstanding that statement, as to whether there was power in the Legislature to tax to support religion, I should say no, there was not.

Mr. Anderson of Newton sought recognition.

Mr. Cummings: Will the gentleman pardon me until I finish reading this excerpt? And I ask especially his attention to the next few lines:

As taxation to procure property for such uses is permitted, exemption of property so procured is legitimate, under the special provisions of the Constitution touching this subject. We have also constitutional requirements for the encouragement of literature and science, the diffusion of education among the people, and the promotion of “general benevolence, public and private charity” and other kindred virtues. Const. Mass. c. 5, sec. 2. As taxation of the people may be imposed for these objects, property used for literary, educational, benevolent, charitable or scientific purposes may well be exempted from taxation.

Now I will answer the gentleman’s question, Mr. President.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: As I hear the opinion read by the eminent gentleman from Fall River, I notice that the Supreme Judicial Court says that because, as I understand it, taxation is allowed for these institutions, accordingly exemption from taxation may be had. But does the Supreme Judicial Court say there at any point that that is the only basis of exemption from taxation?

Mr. Cummings: That is the only basis given by the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court. No, they say what I read, and no more. They have not, perhaps, foreclosed the subject so that they may not hereafter give some other reason. That is the reason that was given.

Mr. Anderson: As I understand it,—making a statement first in order to put the question,—as I understand it, the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court were discussing a certain question from a certain angle, and on the basis of that question and from that angle they make the statement that exemption from taxation may be had on the ground of the taxation of these institutions. But they are not discussing the whole question of the exemption from taxation; and I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that exemption from taxation can be had also on the ground that such institutions are contributing to the public good.

Mr. Cummings: Under our Constitution, no. That is nothing more than my opinion. Our Constitution requires that the taxes levied on property shall be reasonable and proportional. The only reason that can be given for taking this class of property to which reference has been made, namely, charitable, religious, and educational institutions, out of the taxable zone, is because it would be ridiculous on one hand to tax to support them, and on the other hand to tax to take away from them. It is self-evident that as our Constitution stands there is no other ground for exempting these institutions from taxation than the ground which the Chief Justice gave. Restating it at the hazard of being a little tiresome: Because you have the power to take to make the building, you are not called upon to take to destroy the building. That proposition runs through all taxation; that is the ground of exemption.

Mr. Anderson: And I suppose still that the gentleman does not know what to do with the exemption of churches, for which we are not taxed.

Mr. Cummings: I do not know whether that was intended as a question or as an expression of the gentleman's opinion. But if it was intended as a question I venture to say that the question of the taxation of churches is not now, in the light of what has happened to-day, whatever the situation might have been when the anti-aid amendment was passed to be engrossed,—in the light of the present situation, the question of whether religious institutions, including churches, are exempt to-day, or may be exempted hereafter by the Legislature, from taxation, is an open question; it is not at all certain.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Fall River if the anti-sectarian amendment as passed does not take away from the Supreme Judicial Court that section upon which it rested which relates to wisdom and education, and so forth, diffused among the people.

Mr. Cummings: I think it did, Mr. President. That was the basis of my argument, as far as I made one, when the resolution was on its engrossing stage.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: If the Convention defeats the proposition now before us, does not the argument of the gentleman fall?

Mr. Cummings: No, Mr. President. On the contrary, it gives additional force to the argument in support of my opinion.

Mr. Creame of Lynn: I would say to the gentleman from Fall River that the committee on Taxation reported, thirteen to two, in favor of striking out the word "proportional." Now, if that should be stricken out of our Constitution would his opinion still hold?

Mr. Cummings: It seems like a bold thing for me to stand here and presume to anticipate the judgment of that learned body, the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, in the event of a constitutional change like the one recommended by the committee on Taxation. If, however, in attempting to answer these questions I do not expose myself to too harsh criticism, I would say that if the word "proportional" is stricken out it certainly would take some of the force away from the argument that I am about to make against the perils to which these institutions are now exposed. Whether it would fully meet it or not, I do not know. Whether the word "reasonable," with the word "proportional" stricken out, would permit the Legislature to exempt certain institutions, any institutions that they decided were a benefit to the Commonwealth, I do not know. But I want to say that it would not be a political question; the Legislature's decision would not be final. It would be for the Supreme Judicial Court in the end; and what the court might say, of course I cannot anticipate.

Mr. Lomasney: I cannot see through this part of the gentleman's remarks. He says, as I understand him, that if this Convention, after hearing the argument on the measure now before us, defeats it, the decision of the court might be affected. I cannot see how our action should affect the position of the court on the other matter.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Mr. CUMMINGS: I shall endeavor to make plain, as plain as I am able to make it, why the defeat of the resolution reported by the committee on Education would make it almost imperative on the court to say that the Legislature had not the power to exempt these institutions from taxation.

When the anti-aid amendment was passed certainly nothing was expressed in that measure, nothing stated, which denied the Legislature the right to tax for the support of any institution. It was not expressly stated. There is no doubt about that. For the first time, the right to tax to support at least one class of institutions has been brought before this Convention in the report of the committee on Education. I hope that is equally plain. Now, supposing that, instead of limiting it to just educational institutions, the right to tax had been declared to be in the Legislature for the support of religious, charitable and educational institutions, and we voted that down, would not that be an expression of the opinion, of the advice, of this Convention that those institutions should not be exempt from taxation? You could not tax to support them, and you declare you cannot. To restate it: If the report of the committee on Education is rejected it means this, simply, that the last paragraph, giving the Legislature authority to tax for the support of education, is denied. If that is so, then its authority to exempt is denied.

Mr. LOMASNEY: We do not deny the right to tax. We only say you shall not tax, give or use public money except for institutions under public control and superintendence, the right to do which has been determined by the Supreme Judicial Court, because they say that is the only thing you have a right to do.

Mr. CUMMINGS: I think what the gentleman means is that the committee on Bill of Rights does not deny the right to tax; and I have stated that. But if we reject the resolution offered by the committee on Education, this part of it especially, the Convention will have declared that it denies the right to tax; not only the right to apply the money, but the right to tax.

Let me read, for the enlightenment, if I may, of the Convention, the last sentence in their report. I am reading from the bottom of page 3:

To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise.

Now, supposing that we deny the Legislature that power, by refusing to pass this resolution after it has been brought before us; we have then expressly declared that the Legislature shall not have the right to tax to support. And if that is true I think it would have sufficient force with the Supreme Judicial Court to compel that court to say that the Legislature did not have the right to exempt.

Mr. LOMASNEY: If this amendment is defeated do we not then stand upon the present Constitution, which says specifically what we shall and what we shall not do?

Mr. CUMMINGS: I am afraid you do not. I am afraid that the anti-aid amendment so far modifies and controls section 2 of chapter 5 of the Constitution that there is no longer authority for saying that we have the right to tax to support those institutions or that we have the right to tax to support any institution excepting those included in the anti-aid amendment.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I want to ask the gentleman, when he makes the statement that the rejection of this resolution would take away, as I understand, the only authority that the State has to tax for the purposes of education, whether he takes into consideration the fact that, at the time the whole question was up on the anti-aid amendment, the committee which had charge of it put in a statement in reference to taxation, in which they said that they did not have in mind at all meeting this question of the exemption from taxation, that their amendment had nothing to do with that question.

I want to ask him as a lawyer whether that statement which was uncontroverted, put in at the time of the debate, would not be taken into consideration by the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Cummings: In construing and interpreting a constitutional provision, as distinguished from the enactment of a statute, everything that is said in the Constitutional Convention that is preserved will be taken into consideration. Everything that is said in the debate even in legislative assemblies, where as an antecedent condition there must be passage of the resolution twice, will be taken into consideration. Undoubtedly it will be taken into consideration. But when the last expression of the Convention, which would be the controlling expression of the Convention, — if the two cannot be reconciled, when they cannot be, — is that when we were asked to authorize taxation to support educational institutions which were not wholly public we denied it, denied it by vote, there is nothing left for the court but to admit that that denial, that emphatic disapproval, condemns the proposition that you can tax to support them; and if you cannot tax to support them, you cannot exempt them. There is no escape from that.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: I understand the gentleman from Fall River to say that the Supreme Judicial Court will come to the conclusion, if we refuse to pass this amendment, that we thereby say that we are not going to permit taxation for the support of education. Is it not fairer, Mr. President, to say that this Convention has refused to pass this resolution, not because it provides for taxation for education, but because it provides for taxation to support certain institutions over which we do not have control, under circumstances and in conjunction with other interests of which we do not approve? Is it not fairer to take the whole resolution, rather than one isolated sentence, and have the Supreme Judicial Court construe this amendment and say that the Convention refused, not to appropriate money for educational purposes, but that the Convention refused to permit or approve appropriations under these circumstances for private institutions?

Mr. Cummings: I suppose the construction and interpretation of a statute or a constitutional amendment is practically like the construction or interpretation of a will. You read the whole instrument. And I should regret very much if anything I said induced the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division to believe that I disregarded the other provisions of the resolution reported by the committee on Education. I had them all in mind. And now, repeating his own language, that we deny the power to tax to support certain institutions, just go one step further and ask: What certain institutions? Certain educational institutions. That is before us. If we deny that right we leave the court no ground to stand upon to justify legislation that will exempt those institutions from taxation.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: May I ask, Mr. President, whether the gentleman from Fall River has in his mind some positive suggestion or proviso which if applied to the anti-aid amendment which has been engrossed would remove the difficulties in his mind and would enable this Convention to do what it apparently desires to do, namely, to submit that amendment in an unquestionable form?

Mr. Cummings: I have an amendment, which I shall offer at the proper time, to the report of the committee on Education. I have no amendment that will help the anti-aid resolution. In my humble judgment, and good-naturedly, it is incurable. [Laughter.] My attitude toward that is very well known.

Mr. Lomasney: I should like to ask the gentleman to define the difference between the anti-aid amendment as passed and the following, except on the question of the time when it shall become operative:

The General Court shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor after the year 1925 shall the Commonwealth or any political subdivision thereof make a grant or appropriation of money or property in aid of any institution not under the exclusive control of public officers.

I should like to ask: What is the difference in principle between that and the anti-aid amendment?

Mr. Cummings: The gentleman calls my attention, — and I think he will be fair enough to bear witness to the truth of what I say, — to an amendment that was drawn by a gentleman who has been referred to in this Convention to-day. That amendment was drawn at a conference at which the gentleman from Newton and myself and the other man, the author of that resolution, were present. It did not express the views of the gentleman from Newton; it did not express mine; both of us at that conference said we could not accept it. The gentleman from Newton was on the committee on Bill of Rights; I was not. And I was willing to take, and did take, that amendment, and made copies of it; one for the chairman and one for the gentleman from Boston. But I declared then that I should not offer it; that it did not express my views, and that I took no responsibility for it. And I did not offer it. It gives me the opportunity, — and I am glad the gentleman asked me the question, — it gives me the opportunity to say that when reference was made to that amendment, saying that I had adopted it, I did not adopt it at any time, and never offered it to the Convention. Beyond that, let me say, in principle it does not differ; it only at least postpones for eight years, giving breathing time to this Commonwealth to see whether or not it is right. But even at that I never offered it other than as I have said, and I ask the gentleman to say whether what I say is true or not.

Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman will permit me, I want to ask another question. Did the gentleman from Harvard College, the President of Harvard College, these men who met at this club, when they were discussing this matter of taxation, did they make any reference at that meeting to this supplementary amendment? Was this supplementary amendment discussed on that occasion?
Mr. Cummings: Will the gentleman from Boston particularize and specify what he means by the "supplementary amendment"?

Mr. Lomasney: I mean the amendment that is now before us,—document No. 309. When the gentleman from Fall River had the President of Harvard College and these men at the Union Club discussing this matter, did they go into the resolution now before us as to how it applied to Harvard College, and how it affected the general proposition?

Mr. Cummings: Document 309 was not before us. And again let me say, lest I get credit for something to which I am not entitled,—although I am willing to be a peacemaker, without being a pacifist [applause],—I did not bring about that conference. And if it is not straining the patience of the Convention too much I beg leave to say that that conference, and the conference which preceded it at the Union Club, were not of my seeking or of my making. I was invited to it, as the least of those who might sit at the table, and I tried to find the last place when I got there. At that meeting I declared, as directly and plainly as I was able, the position that I took in this Convention against the anti-aid amendment, not varying it at all. In the conference which later took place, to which I was invited,—which I did not create, which I did not call, but to which I very gladly gave my consent, because, since the name of the President of Harvard College has been brought into this Convention, let me say, Mr. President, that in the conference which I had with him, in the two sessions which I had with him, I had every reason to believe, as I believe now, that he was actuated by the highest purpose, trying if possible to reach some solution of this dreadful question which threatened and threatens to tear this Commonwealth apart,—it was the highest motive, not the lowest motive, which led him to ask for a second conference, and I attended it. At that conference no mention was made of resolution No. 309; I never saw that resolution until last Wednesday morning; and I believe I should not have seen it until it came up in due course if it had not been for the letter which the distinguished gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) wrote in the "Post" last Tuesday morning or last Monday morning.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Just one thing more, to have the subject-matter perfectly plain in my mind. I want to know whether the gentleman from Fall River thinks the exemption of church property from taxation in Massachusetts to-day is unconstitutional.

Mr. Cummings: No, Mr. President, I do not think it is unconstitutional, although I think that the warrant for it is not the one that was given in the second part of the argument that I read. There is no direct authority to tax, although there seems to be some particular authority not easily defined to foster and protect.

I want to say one word more about taxation. The gentleman from Milton in the fourth division (Mr. Bryant) this morning asked if the word in the report of the committee which was also in the original constitutional provision,—"immunities,"—was not sufficient to take care of the matter of taxation. I do not think it is. I do not think "immunities" ever was intended; in any event, I know of no decision in this Commonwealth or any other that says the word "immunities" means any more than such a release from certain obligations that are either definitely expressed in a charter or that have become a part of the tradition, the law, by usage, by long-continued usage, in a particular section. The word "immunities" will not mean "protection" in and of itself, unless there is something else to protect.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask if it is not clear that the word "immunities" appears in a sentence complete in itself, and relates to agriculture, science, and other matters and not to this subject of education in the anti-aid amendment.

Mr. Cummings: No, Mr. President, I must say I think it does not. I think it referred wholly to the legal emancipation, if I may use the word, of Harvard College and such kindred institutions from any ties or obligations that other institutions might be under where they were not expressly excepted in their charter. The provision that the gentleman refers to is in the second section of chapter 5, and not in the first.

Now, Mr. President, I have an amendment here which I will ask to submit.

Mr. John J. Cummings of Fall River moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by striking out all after the word "enumerated", in the last sentence, and inserting in place thereof the words "promote and encourage the principles of humanity, education, general benevolence and public and private charity."

Mr. Cummings: I offer that amendment to preserve the integrity of this section, which is destroyed if it is omitted in view of the probable passage of the anti-aid or anti-sectarian amendment. That second section is the counsel, the advice, it is the treasure of wisdom that is bequeathed to us and to those who come after us by the men who made the Constitution: Foster these things; foster humanitarianism, foster general benevolence, foster public and private charity, foster education. Now, we are not going to foster them, we are going to turn away from them, unless we reaffirm our adherence to these principles by adopting this amendment. For the anti-aid amendment limits, as the gentleman from Boston said this morning, the use of public money solely for public purposes, — meaning for public institutions. If we limit it to public institutions, then these things that we were almost commanded to do we cannot do; we refuse to do.

I wish to say a word more about these private institutions because of a sentence in a letter to which I have referred heretofore, in which mention is made of the new-born zeal of Catholics for these private institutions. In my case it is not "new-born zeal". I have stood from the beginning to support these institutions that are private, — the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Worcester Polytechnic Institute and others; not because of their names, not because of their organization, not because of the men who are at the head of them or behind them, but because of the good, the service, that they render to the State. And I wish to say now, I never have believed that it was a good principle of human conduct to follow that, if I could not do all the good I wanted to do, I should not do any good. I do not accept that. If I cannot give to the schools, to all the schools that I think are entitled to it, I will not withhold aid from deserving schools. I do not conceal from this Convention or from the Commonwealth my conviction that some day, as the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) read from Ralph Adams Cram's letter, Massachusetts will rejoice that the parish schools taught religion to the children at a time when their minds were impressionable.
Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman believes that firmly, why does he not put in an amendment to carry it out and put his personality behind it and allow the Convention to vote upon it?

Mr. Cummings: I should not have the slightest hesitation in doing that, putting that in, or any other; but the trouble about it is, it is completely overshadowed and destroyed by the anti-aid amendment. Let me say this: Whether I put it in, or the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Lomasney), or somebody else, make no mistake, I shall support that proposition ardently, here and elsewhere. But I do not think this Commonwealth is ready for that proposition. I have said, and I believe, that in time the best thought of this State will see some way of administering these parish schools so as to make them public schools; that the fact that religion is taught will not interfere with their usefulness as public schools; that everything that is taught in the public school will be taught there. And I want to say now, to modify the statement that I made in my enthusiastic response to the gentleman's inquiry as to why I did not offer that amendment, I do not offer it for the same reason, — and I want to change that answer, — not because I do not believe in the schools, not because I do not want them helped, but because I think the time has not come when Massachusetts is ready to deal with it; and I believe it is just as inflammable as the other question that I tried to keep out of this Convention.

Now, Mr. President, I was about to say in conclusion that I did not think it was a good principle of human conduct to refuse to do good at all because you could not do all the good that you would like to do. The fact that the parish schools cannot be helped is no reason why the private schools that have been helped for a hundred years should not be helped. If the parish schools have to go for years and years without aid I shall stand where I stand now: Help the other schools and every institution, charitable or educational, that assists this Commonwealth, and we will wait until such time as an enlightened State will appreciate what is being done for the children of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Will the gentleman from Fall River explain to the Convention what, in his opinion, would be the legal effect of the people accepting the anti-aid amendment and also resolution No. 309, with his amendment, at the same election?

Mr. Cummings: I think, in the first place, that the two amendments, if both are adopted, would have to be construed substantially according to the lines of construction given by the chairman of the anti-aid committee: That if they could not be reconciled, then both of them may fall; if they can be reconciled, then, as far as it is possible to make them workable, the provisions of both may be adopted. But my opinion is, and I believe the legal effect of the amendment is, that it destroys that provision of the anti-aid amendment which prevents granting money to private institutions. I suppose that no delegate in the Convention had the slightest doubt about my willingness to destroy as much of the anti-aid amendment as I could [laughter], and I want therefore to make it clear, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Quincy in the third division (Mr. McAnarney), that if my amendment is adopted I think what will remain of the anti-aid amendment is this, — and I regret that a part of it will remain [laughter], — that is, the eighteenth amendment. I regret that it is offered again to our people. It has a bad history, sir. It came in the troublous times,—the Know Nothing days. It came again and was rejected, but again it was offered. It is the only piece of Know Nothingism that is in the Constitution that irritates. We had another one, but it was repealed. This has a bad history, as I say. I regret it is here. It is in the Constitution, let it stay there; but do not ask the people to reaffirm it who do not want it. To-day or to-morrow I may appeal to my fellow-citizens, as I appeal to this Convention, to consider whether or not at some future time they must not frame some legislation by which they can deal with the parish schools; but if I vote for this amendment I deny myself the right to appeal to anybody, because they may say: "Why, you voted for this; do not raise the question again." So the eighteenth amendment, I say, should not be offered to them the second time.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

But further than that, what would be left of the anti-aid amendment is this: First, the paraphrase of the first article of amendment of the Federal Constitution, providing for religious freedom; second, the eighteenth amendment; third, a distinct, absolute prohibition of legislative grants of money to any religious institution for the support of that institution. That was the only thing upon which the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court differed,—as to whether or not that was necessary. That will remain. And you will have this,—you will have three declarations, all of them of importance: First, religious freedom; second, the maintenance of the public school system in its integrity; third, the prohibition upon the granting of public money to religious institutions. And that is all this Convention ought to ask; beyond that it should not go.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Following the question of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney), I want to ask the gentleman from Fall River: Is it not possible that this Convention may send both of these resolutions to the people, bracketed, and allow the people to take which one they want?

Mr. Cummings: Of course it is possible that it may be done. I regret to say that I find many things are possible that I hoped were impossible; and among others, these. But I do not mean to reflect upon the question at all, and still less upon the gentleman who asked it. It is possible to have both submitted, and to choose the better, not to choose the worse one.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: If the interpretation of the gentleman from Fall River is true, as I understood him there would be a third matter left in the anti-aid amendment, namely, that you could not assist any institution that taught denominational doctrine. Is that right, Mr. Cummings?

Mr. Cummings: No.

Mr. Curtis: I want to state it just as you did.

Mr. Cummings: What would be left would be: first,—I am reading lines 9 and 10.

Mr. Curtis: I simply asked the gentleman if he did not state that one of the three things that would be left in the anti-aid amendment was that section that no appropriation of money should be made to any school or institution where any denominational doctrine was taught; did he state that as one of the things to be left?

Mr. Cummings: No, I did not mean that, Mr. President. I did not mean that. I meant, and I had in mind, a provision in the amendment, as I recalled it, which forbade grants of public money by the Legislature for religious institutions. And I did not mean to include in "religious institutions" schools, ordinary schools, where the catechism or prayers are taught.

Mr. Curtis: The gentleman from Fall River is a personal friend of mine. I regard his great legal abilities, and I give him credit for his high standing at the bar. I also give him credit for being what we used to term, in ordinary parlance, a "last ditch fighter." He brought up all these arguments on the last day that we argued the anti-aid amendment, and threw into the argument of that day the question of church taxation. I think you can all remember my reply to him at that time. Did you notice his answer to me to-day, when I asked him: "Have you looked at the citations which I gave you in regard to church taxation?" He replied that he had not, but others in his office had, and they said that they sustained my contention. Now, gentlemen, that disposes of the whole argument. I have not the citations with me. I had them in my papers. I also had a brief on that question; and I say to you now, without any fear of contradiction, that there is nothing in the point raised so far as taxation of church property is concerned. But I do say, his answer left this question open in regard to the measure now before us, that if that amendment is passed and the anti-aid amendment is finally accepted by the people, the only colleges, the only institutions of higher learning, that will be cut out are the Catholic colleges; and that he has advocated this result if he advocates the amendment that is offered to that resolution. Because if you will read these words, "and other colleges, universities, and institutions of higher education," and then go back to the anti-aid amendment, where they say those words will stand that no appropriation shall be made to any college or university where any denominational doctrine is taught, it would not only cut out Catholic colleges, but would cut out every parochial school forever,—the very thing that he is advocating now.

Mr. Cummings: First let me say, Mr. President, in connection with the authorities that the gentleman from Boston offered me: they were not Massachusetts decisions. There is no Massachusetts authority in conflict with what I have said. They were Iowa decisions. I do not mean to be disrespectful to the Iowa court, but we have not reached the place where we accept the Iowa conception of our Constitution. And there was nothing in them, as I recall, that would change my opinion, although they were in conflict with what I expressed at that time.

But the situation is entirely changed, so that the Iowa decision, first of all, is not binding, and secondly let me say that the new situation is not dealt with by either of the cases that were cited. In the next place, Mr. President, let me say,—the time for adjournment is at hand,—if my amendment excludes Boston College, or any other college that is doing good work, then I want to reamend it, and I will support a reamendment; for I want to treat all these colleges alike.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: May I ask the gentleman from Fall River one final question? I should like to ask him whether, if the Convention adopts resolution No. 309, he is sure that the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution will remain intact.
Mr. Cummings: I think the eighteenth amendment would not be affected if resolution No. 309 were adopted. I think it still would remain in effect. I am answering the question without any great consideration, but I see no reason why any other view should be taken than that.

The debate on the resolution was continued Wednesday, October 3.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the resolution be amended in section 1, by inserting after the word “enjoy,” in the last line but one, the words “save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution;”; and in section 2, by striking out the last sentence and inserting in place thereof the following:

To this end the Legislature shall have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, educational and religious purposes.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended by striking out the article of amendment and substituting the following:

The Legislature shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: I should like to understand this amendment better. The gentlemen with whom I have come in contact, a great many of them, seem to decide upon this matter as to its influence upon the amendment reported by the committee on Bill of Rights,—the anti-sectarian amendment, so called. Now, Mr. President, the town which I have the honor to represent in this Convention is one of many towns in Massachusetts which have very little money and an abundance of children. I should say in the 12,000 inhabitants there is not a single rich man,—not one in the town of 12,000 inhabitants,—and nearly all of the inhabitants are devoting all their time to keeping the wolf from the door. They are essentially well behaved. They cannot be anything else, because they are engaged in the fight for livelihood. Now along come various authorities. It is an unusual day when there is not somebody out there from the State House ordering us to do something and providing no money for the purpose. A man comes around and says: “The fire department is not right. Spend $10,000 and remodel it.” Somebody else comes around and says: “The sealers of weights and measures are not doing right, therefore spend” so much more money, “provide them quarters and provide things with which they can operate.” Then numbers of men come out from the Board of Education, and tell us we must do precisely what Brookline does in regard to all sorts of fads,—and we have no money for the purpose. Our rate of taxation is $26.30 on the thousand. The valuation is so high that the tax which I pay amounts to about $1,500 a year and keeps my nose to the grindstone all the time, and if I had the same property located in Topsfield or other towns around there it would be but $400 a year.

Now, Mr. President, we want to know what the State is going to do about these conditions that have been brought about by great sociological changes. When I was a boy and lived in South Malden and went to school in Chelsea we had in Chelsea and South Malden the greatest variety of business men, oftentimes; and they lived on the same streets with the shoemakers and grocers, the man who worked on the street, who worked as a bookkeeper and what not, and wealth was distributed where the children were. Now the rich and the poor are segregated, more so than the colored people and the whites down south. The rich are in Brookline and Nahant, in Topsfield, in Hamilton, in Manchester and Winchester. The poor are in Chelsea, in Everett, in Saugus, to a very large extent in Lynn, and I might name Clinton, and I might name fifty or a hundred towns like that. Now, if this amendment to the Constitution has got anything in here permitting steps in the direction of a better distribution of the expense of education it is worth considering, and it is very much worth considering. The chairman of the committee on Education yesterday told us, as I understood him, that the last phrase in this measure was put in there at the suggestion of the supporters of what is called the mill tax. I think I understood him correctly. If that be so, then I suppose it is true that there was not sufficient constitutional provision for this distribution of taxes before. If there is not sufficient constitutional provision then this is well worth considering.

And now I am going to stand here, Mr. President, and say that this Convention is dominated by four factions, who care for nothing else except their particular faction: The A. P. A. faction [laughter], — I have got to give it a name, — the Roman Catholic faction, the extreme radical faction, and an extreme conservative faction. This Convention is dominated by those four factions, and nothing of any importance can get a hearing except by the approval of one or two of those factions acting together. And as to this amendment proposed here, — what is the word that has been passed around? "Oh, don’t bother with it. Kill it. Kill it." It is like what the ex-Governor said about matters in the Senate: "Don’t bother with it. Kill it," because it is supposed in some way to be adverse to the non-sectarian amendment. If it is, if there is some merit in this proposition, why do we not consider it? We are not here for the purpose of acting upon these three or four big propositions; we are here for the purpose of revising the Constitution. One of the strongest arguments made in favor of the non-sectarian amendment was by a gentleman from Newton in the first division, who got up here and said something about Massachusetts following the western States in having State systems of education. Now, I say very plainly that a State system of education or further participation by the State in education does not meet the approval of some of those who have supported the non-sectarian amendment. But this matter of a better distribution of school funds is bound to come up. It is as well worthy of attention as anything that has been considered by this Convention. I think, Mr. President, that this matter ought to be understood and ought to be acted upon on its merits, — not as to whether it will injure this matter or that matter, not as to whether it is going to delay the initiative and referendum, but it ought to be acted upon on its intrinsic merits, and I hope, Mr. President, that it will be.

Mr. Winslow of Newton: As a member of the committee on Education, which has brought in this resolution, I wish to say a few words with respect to its being brought in here at this time, and, too, the way in which the present resolution was made up.

If you will refer to chapter 5 of the present Constitution you will find in the first article three sections. In the committee on Education, in consultation with the President of Harvard College, it was determined that the last two sections were absolutely obsolete; also that the first article was without serious purport at the present time. However, it was felt by the committee, and as stated by the President of Harvard College, that it was worth while, for historic and sentimental reasons, to retain the major part of that article. It seems to me that it is not beneath the dignity nor contrary to the purposes of this Convention to retain such language as is distinctly of merit from the historic and sentimental standpoint; but I should say that the last paragraph of that first article, which seems to convey certain powers, was stated by the President of Harvard not to be of particular importance, because the general statutes contain all that is necessary with respect to those matters. It was felt, however, by the members of the committee on Education, that it was distinctly desirable that all universities and colleges within the Commonwealth should be placed upon a par, except that the greater age of Harvard University perhaps entitled it to mention. I believe, however, that it is not of serious importance whether section 1 of this resolution be included in the Constitution or not. The second section is very largely a transcript from section 2 of chapter 5, with a few changes of a single word or two, and with the addition of one sentence which was recommended by the Board of Education. If there is anything in the first part of that section which is in conflict with the anti-aid amendment I should suppose that it would have been in conflict all these years with the eighteenth amendment. Inasmuch as all the essentials of the first part of that section have been in the Constitution ever since the eighteenth amendment was adopted, and no conflict has been discovered, I see no reason why we should consider that there is at present any conflict whatever between that portion of this section and the anti-aid amendment.

The last sentence of section 2 as recommended by the committee, as has been stated repeatedly, was put in at the request of the Board of Education for the purpose of enabling the carrying out of exactly the suggestion made by my neighbor from Saugus (Mr. Bennet), namely, to take somewhat from Newton and to give to Saugus if necessary, in order that a system of education might be maintained which should be fairly uniform. That is to say, education is believed to be a distinct function of the Commonwealth, and it is believed that it is of advantage to the Commonwealth that all children of the State shall have somewhat nearly equal privileges. Therefore there may arise a situation where it shall be desirable for the State to contribute something to the education of the smaller districts, where the same privileges cannot be procured without excessive taxation. I believe that that is the purpose which is back of that provision, and I believe that it is in harmony with the action which is taken in most of the newer western States. It seems to me that the discovery of any conflict between this resolution and the anti-aid amendment is something which has come from a reading of the original Constitution, perhaps for the first time with this particular thing in view. In other words, it seems to me that any conflict which is found in this resolution with the anti-aid amendment was in the Constitution as it stands now.

This resolution deals with the educational system of the State. The committee on Education in approving this language was thinking to present a resolution which should provide proper conditions for the educational matters throughout the State, and was not aiming in any way to counteract or overcome or oppose the anti-aid amendment, however much some members of that committee would have been glad to do so. If there is in this resolution any antagonism to the anti-aid amendment some step should be taken to correct that, because this matter is altogether too vital to the interests of the State to be set aside by so comparatively insignificant a thing as the anti-aid amendment.

The committee on Bill of Rights has presented to us a measure which has met the approval of a very large majority in this body. I understand that it is the purpose of the committee on Bill of Rights in ordering this present resolution before the Convention to press the anti-aid amendment forward so that it may go upon the ballot this fall if possible. There is one point, there is one feature about this, in which I thoroughly agree with the Bill of Rights Committee, namely, that if that measure is to meet with success at the polls it ought to be hurried through and put upon the ballot as soon as possible and with as little consideration as possible, because it seems to me that it contains within itself things which will be discovered to be more and more radical when it remains open to consideration, which will tend decidedly to prevent its adoption. With that in view, and in view of the extreme importance of the general educational features as presented in this resolution, I hope, first, that the opposition or the support of the anti-aid amendment will not result in the defeat of a good and consistent resolution, and I hope also that in the interest of the educational institutions of the State the anti-aid amendment will not be pushed forward to a consideration by the people this fall, but that time will be allowed for its full and complete consideration by the voters.

Mr. Powers of Newton: The gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) made an allusion in his remarks to the so-called anti-aid amendment, and his allusion to that is certainly very timely at this time. Some of you gentlemen will recall that I offered an amendment coming from the Board of Education, of which I am a member, authorizing the Legislature to deal with appropriations made for the support of the aid of local education. At the time I offered that amendment I was told by some of the leaders in behalf of the anti-aid amendment that there was no occasion to do so, that a resolution was coming along from the committee on Education which entirely provided the remedy which I sought through an amendment to the anti-aid resolution. I then examined this resolution, and I was satisfied that the statement was true; and I understood, as I think many others did at that time, that the members of the committee on Bill of Rights approved of this resolution. So I ceased to press the amendment which I had offered at that time, believing that this resolution would fully take care of the situation.

I am entirely in accord with what has been said by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Winslow), that this is a most important resolution. It involves the question of education, and the question of education has been one of the most important here in Massachusetts,—quite as important as the question of religion. We always have prided ourselves upon our system of education.

While it is true that the Pilgrims, when they came to our shores, first built a meeting-house, the next building they put up was a school-house,—and religion and education have gone hand in hand for more than two centuries. Now the time has come when Massachusetts as a Commonwealth is called upon to aid these struggling communities in the education of the youth, and I am quite sure, Mr. President, that every one will agree with me there is no reason why the children of one town or one city should not have the same facilities for common school and public education as the children of any other city or town.
That is to be the policy of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts if those most interested in education are permitted to carry it out.

This resolution, as I understand it, Mr. President, gives to the Legislature authority to promote public education, to give aid if it chooses to do so to different localities, and I sincerely hope that the resolution will be adopted by this Convention. It is said that there is conflict between this resolution and the resolution that was adopted by the Convention, known as the anti-sectarian resolution. If there be any conflict, that conflict ought to be cleared away. There is no reason under the sun why there should be a conflict between the question as involved in the sectarian issue and the question as involved in this issue of education. But do not vote down this resolution. If there is any danger of a conflict between the two, by which we recommand amendments that are not consistent, let us make them consistent, but at any rate let us stand here in Massachusetts for the cause of education and equal education in every part of the Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: What present weakness in our educational system does this resolution seek to cure?

Mr. Powers: At the present time the Commonwealth may make appropriations for local aid of local schools. It has, however, no control over those appropriations. I think that this resolution does give the Commonwealth control over the appropriations which it makes for local uses. I trust that answers the gentleman’s question.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the anti-aid amendment and this resolution conflict.

Mr. Powers: The gentleman asks me whether I do not think that the two resolutions are in conflict with each other. I have not stated that. I do not know. This I do know, that if they are in conflict there is no reason why that conflict should not be cleared away. There are plenty of good lawyers in this Convention who will have no difficulty in clearing up that situation, if such situation exists.

Mr. Curtis: As there are many good lawyers in the Convention, and you are one of them, will you attempt to clear it away before eleven o’clock to-morrow?

Mr. Powers: I will undertake to clear it away to my own satisfaction, but the most difficult thing in the world is to satisfy certain gentlemen in this Convention that it has been cleared away. This Convention, or at least a portion of this Convention, has simply gone mad over this sectarian issue. I do not fully agree with many of them, yet I voted for the sectarian issue. But when an attempt is made to put forward something to prevent different creeds from getting in a contest with each other at the disadvantage of the cause of education, then I say it is going altogether too far. [Applause.] The fact is, Mr.
President, that with sufficient education the sectarian issue would dissolve without any legislation whatever. What you need in Massachusetts is education, and with sufficient education these creeds would be in harmony with each other. As I stated the other day, I belong to a creed that is neutral on this question. We do not have any trouble with anybody. To us everybody looks good, whether he be Catholic or whether he be non-Catholic. In other words, we believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and if these gentlemen who have been contending over this question would adopt the creed of my church, there would be no occasion for this anti-aid resolution.

Mr. Curtis: I should like to have the gentleman, after having given me that discourse, answer my question,—whether he will attempt to remove the difficulty before to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Powers: I will do so, with the understanding that after I have given my opinion on it it will be accepted by the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: Cannot we by legislation do what the gentleman wants? In other words, when the Legislature appropriates the money cannot it designate how it shall be spent, without passing any constitutional amendment?

Mr. Powers: In my judgment it cannot.

Mr. Lomasney: Do I understand the gentleman to say that if the Legislature is called upon to appropriate out of the tax levy the people's money it cannot designate how it shall be spent, by what boards or in what manner?

Mr. Powers: Let me answer that a little more in detail and say to the gentleman from Boston that, while that question never has been adjudicated by the courts, lawyers disagree as to whether it has the right to do it or not; and so long as there is a doubt about it, it ought to be cleared by this Convention.

Mr. Lomasney: Does not the gentleman know that the Legislature every year provides that so much money shall go for roads, so much money for this, that and everything else? If it is appropriating the people's money out of the tax levy, where is there any court decision that says the Legislature could not designate the purposes to which it could be used when it was not in violation of any constitutional prohibition?

Mr. Powers: The difficulty is that the local school-boards claim that whenever an appropriation is made for local purposes they have the absolute control of it. For instance, suppose the Legislature makes an appropriation to be used exclusively for the high school in some town in the Commonwealth, the local board insists that they have not the right to designate the purpose. Now, a conflict between the Board of Education and local boards is most harmful; and while such conflict exists to-day, it ought to be removed by making the question absolutely clear and giving to the Legislature full power to determine the method and the manner in which these State appropriations are to be used.

Mr. Lomasney: The gentleman will admit that the school-boards are creatures of the Legislature; and is not the gentleman trying to give the Board of Education control of the local school-boards in the cities and towns?

Mr. Bennett: I want to make this part plain, if I am right. The Board of Education has power enough, and to my mind I sometimes think it has too much power. I do not know about that. But it does not provide any funds, and the funds do not exist for the poor towns. The Board of Education comes in and tells us that we must do this because it has been successful in Brookline, or Newton, or Winchester, or some other place, and then it says we must do it in Saugus, and Webster, and Clinton, and Blackstone, and I might name fifty or a hundred towns, and they have not got any money to do that. In the days when this system of taxation was enacted the town was the unit and the people were scattered. Now my question is this, then, — I did not notice the gentleman was answering a question already, but my question would be this: Is not that the interpretation of it, not that we want the Board of Education to have more power, but that we want some method of providing funds by which the poor towns can do what they are told to do practically by the Board of Education?

Mr. Powers: The gentleman from Saugus I think served for some seventeen years in the Legislature, and I assume he knows perfectly well that the Board of Education has no funds except through appropriations made by the Legislature. Now, the difficulty is that the Legislature in making the appropriations cannot impose the conditions upon the expenditure of the money, at least the local board so claims, and we insist that when we expend the State's money we should have the right to determine how that money is to be expended. If we are going down into Saugus and we are going to appropriate $10,000 for schools, we should have a right, in our judgment, to say how that money should be expended.

Mr. Lomasney: I think the gentleman did not get the point of my question. If the gentleman's ideas prevail, the Board of Education, of which he is now a member, will be in a position to control the local school-committees in all the cities and towns and compel them to conform to its views. In other words, would not the Board of Education have full control over them? Is not that what he is after?

Mr. Powers: It is true I did not answer the question of the gentleman from Boston, because I left that to the gentleman from Saugus, understanding that he desired to answer that question. Now, it is not true that the Board of Education can use the money for any different purpose than is designated by the Legislature in making the appropriation. In other words, we are nothing but trustees of the fund, agents of the Commonwealth in expending the money under the direction of the Legislature. If the Legislature has not the right to give the direction, then of course we have no authority over the expenditure of the appropriation.

Mr. Reidy of Boston: I should like to ask the delegate if the real story is not that the Legislature has not the power to designate how the money shall be spent, but prefers to trust the local school-boards rather than the centralized Board of Education.

Mr. Powers: I have stated perhaps a dozen times since I have been on my feet that I do not think they have the authority to designate how the money shall be expended.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I thought I understood by the question of the gentleman from Boston that your Board of Education would have control over the local funds that might be raised in that particular town for its schools. Is that true, or is it true that your Board of Education has control only of the State fund which is put into that town in addition to what the town raises itself for its own school purposes?
Mr. Powers: However violent the statements may have been made by the gentleman from Boston, he did not go as far as that. The most he claims is that the Board of Education has control over the State funds, without regard to the local boards. Of course the local boards have absolute control over the appropriations made by the cities and towns. The real question is: Shall the State or shall the Legislature be authorized to control the appropriations, that is, determine the purposes for which they shall be used, that are authorized by the Legislature?

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: The fundamental trouble that exists in discussing this amendment is that an attempt is being made to mix oil and water. That experiment has been tried often but never has succeeded. We shall make very little headway until we understand what the issue is.

The chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) exhumed this measure from that bottomless pit of the docket of the Committee of the Whole and brought it into the light of day, because he thought that in some of its provisions it cast a cloud upon that measure referred to by its friends as the anti-aid amendment and by those less partial to it as the anti-sectarian amendment. The gentleman in the first division, the chairman of the committee, in my opinion, is right in contending that these two measures, in some particulars at least, are inharmonious. I have wondered why, with the complete domination of this Convention possessed by the committee on Bill of Rights, it has not long since asked us to go back to the Constitution as it was framed in 1780, and so use the pruning knife that it might be brought into complete harmony with the views of the committee on Bill of Rights in 1917. The same inconsistency exists between this proposed amendment and the anti-aid resolution. I will now venture, Mr. President, to read a portion of section 2 of chapter 5 of the Constitution of Massachusetts. I invite the attention of the brethren as I go back to the ark of the covenant. It reads as follows:

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth—

To do what? Among other things, — and listen to this, —

... to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures.

That is the article as it stands in the Constitution, and that article as it stands enunciates a policy which the anti-aid amendment seeks to abandon for all time. There is no escape from that proposition, and you cannot harmonize the two views. You either must modify your anti-aid amendment, if it has not passed beyond recall, or you must change this ancient charter under which we have lived for so many years. Ah, Mr. President, as I have reflected upon this proposition, as I have attempted to enumerate the advantages that we might hope for under this anti-aid and anti-sectarian amendment, I have wondered if we are not paying too great a price, — I have wondered if we were not paying too great a price, — and that same doubt rests in the minds of many of the delegates who, like myself, finally voted for it. At one time during that discussion I sought to engratn an amendment upon that measure leaving in the hands of the Legislature the right, if it saw fit, to maintain scholarships in our two great engineering schools. I said to the Convention then, and I repeat it now, that if that right is denied, it will not be long before there will be an imperative demand for the establishment of a State school of engineering. And that is sure to happen.

Let us not engage in a general discussion, but come right to the crux of this proposition. We never can settle any question properly without knowing the truth. It is foolish to obscure the issue. It is idle for any one here to deny that there is conflict between the anti-aid amendment and part of the measure proposed by the committee on Education, and the same conflict exists between the proposition of the committee on Bill of Rights and the Constitution as it was written originally. If the anti-aid amendment is to go before the people as a declaration of a new policy of the Commonwealth, a new policy in response to the wisdom of 1917 as contrasted with the wisdom of 1780, then there should be an amendment changing the original charter, and there should be the same amendment of that part of the measure proposed by the committee on Education.

The distinguished gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr.
Edwin U. Curtis), the benign, the gentle, the pacific, the persuasive chairman of the committee, complained in my hearing a moment ago that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) had not answered his question. I have answered it. I have answered it squarely. [Applause.] And I tell him that in my opinion the original Constitution of 1780 must be amended, and also part of this pending measure of the committee on Education, if they are to be brought into complete harmony with the anti-aid amendment.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I think we all agree that we shall be engaged the next few years in problems more difficult of solution than this government ever has faced, save at the time when it went into the business of government. There are two weapons that we can use to solve these problems, and they are about the only two. One is religion and the other is education. By the amendment of the Bill of Rights, or the anti-aid, we have shut out religion from the helping hand of this Commonwealth. Are we going to take the only other weapon we have, education, and shut that out too? That is what this proposal amounts to.

There is a question about immunity from taxation. How many colleges can live in this Commonwealth to-day and pay taxes? Perhaps Harvard can. Perhaps a few can. My own college, Amherst, cannot, and there are many other small colleges that we love that cannot do it. Are you going to take that chance and subject them to that liability?

For four years I was principal of a high school in the State of New York, and I know the difference between a local system of schools and a State controlled and organized system, and I say that Massachusetts, if it is going to compete with other States, with New York and the great States of the west, has got to come to a State organized and controlled system of schools,—and that system this present resolution makes possible.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

There may be some conflict between this and the anti-aid amendment. We had better let that conflict stand. We had better say that at this time, facing the problems that this old Commonwealth does face, we will do what we can to save from the wreck the one great instrument we have got left to use,—education. [Applause.]

Mr. Samuel L. Powers of Newton moved that the resolution be amended in section 2, by inserting after the word "otherwise", in the last sentence, the words "save as otherwise and elsewhere provided in the Constitution"; and by adding at the end of section 2 the words:

To this end the Legislature shall have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

Mr. POWERS: I think the former amendment removes the objection made by the gentleman from Boston. In other words, if the sectarian resolution is adopted by the people it becomes part of that title, and appropriations made for educational purposes would be subject to that resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: I have two amendments before the Convention which speak of the exemption from taxation for charitable, educational and religious purposes. I have been informed and shown that we ought to add from the statute the words "benevolent, literary and scientific", making it "property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes," to make it conform to the statute of Massachusetts, and I ask unanimous consent so to perfect both these amendments.

No objection was made and the amendments were modified as indicated.

Mr. David Stoneman of Boston moved that the resolution be amended in section 1, by striking out the word "Christian", and inserting in place thereof the word "all".

Mr. CLARK of Brockton: I want to vote right on this question when I vote, and I must confess that I am in the dark, not understanding all the effulgent lights that have been shed upon this body in connection with this matter. I wish to read one phrase of this resolution, hoping that some member of the committee will be able to enlighten me as to just what the scope of it is:

It shall be the duty of Legislature and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth . . . to encourage private societies.

Of course it mentions other things, but it distinctly says that.

. . . to encourage private societies. . . . To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies [the private societies] and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education, which will afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development.

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: The gentleman has been five years an honorable Senator from the honorable city of Brockton, and I should like to know if this is the first time he ever read that section in the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK: I confess in my humility that it takes me longer to comprehend some things than it does my friend from Brockton. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, I desire to know if it shall not be the duty of the Legislature and of magistrates to encourage Young Men's Christian Associations, provided they furnish the means for mental, physical, and moral development, as many of them are doing at the present time. Furthermore, I want to ask him if it is not the bounden duty, if we pass this resolution, for the Legislature to encourage these things by making grants to churches that maintain schools and gymnasiuums, as many of them will if the funds are forthcoming from the public treasury.

Now, Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with every move that makes for a higher education, a broader education, better opportunities and privileges for the poor man's boys and girls. I am with it every time. But, Mr. President, I believe that there is such a looseness in the second section of this resolution that nobody knows what it will do, or rather nobody knows what it will not do. I am afraid of it as it is. I do not see any limits to it.

I want to say before I sit down, Mr. President, that in the first section I recognize great merit and beauty. In fact, it is an essay of beautiful sentiments and must appeal to the moral sense and the aesthetic taste of every delegate in this Convention hall; but when we come to the second section there are things that are absolutely dangerous, in my judgment. I cannot vote for that resolution as it stands at the present time.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I think in fairness to this Convention one question ought to be raised that has not been raised here at all. In chapter 5, section 2, appear the words "public schools and grammar schools". Then was passed the eighteenth amendment, which was "public schools and common schools". That repealed chapter 5. Now by this resolution you are putting back the words "public schools and grammar schools", and you are defeating the eighteenth amendment. That is, if the anti-aid amendment should not be accepted by the people and this amendment should be accepted, you have defeated the proposition of the eighteenth amendment, which already has been determined by the court as saying for what purposes and what schools money raised by taxation shall be used.

As far as the committee on Bill of Rights is concerned I am sorry that I have not the facile tongue of the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) who so aptly described me. Not having that tongue I shall not attempt in this Convention to describe him, but I will say that he is a very skilful and acute man, and that he has put back his institution, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, where we took it out on the 22d day of August, if this resolution is passed. But he was fair, he was square, when he said that there were things in that resolution which it was dangerous for this Convention to pass. Now, then, after that statement and argument I want to ask the 295 gentlemen sitting in this Convention who voted for that resolution if now, six weeks afterwards, they want to change their minds and go before the people and nullify it by another act. Yes, gentlemen, if you show me that a majority of you do, I have nothing to say; but there is one here who never will do it, because I say it is a reflection on the intelligence of this Convention to pass an act in August and repeal it in October.

Mr. Powers: I should like to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington, which appears to have been offered before I submitted mine, does not cure the entire difficulty.

Mr. Curtis: I want to say that possibly I may not be able to answer his question correctly, as I have not studied it carefully. But this does occur to me: That if those two resolutions went before the people at the same time, and the so-called anti-aid or anti-sectarian, — I am not ashamed to use the word, — resolution was defeated, then I think those words would allow the Legislature to make appropriations for public schools, for private schools or anything else that it might want to make appropriations for, and thus would repeal the eighteenth amendment. That is what I think would be the effect of those words if they were both there. That is what I suppose the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) wants me to say. I am not committing myself definitely till I have had time to study it. I should say that with the amendment of Mr. Anderson on taxation, to clear that up, it probably would accomplish the result if they were both accepted.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to one other thing while I am standing here. While the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) voted for the resolution, — finally he did vote for it, — he did not want to vote for it, and from the day that he stopped fighting it I was suspicious; I was suspicious then and I have been until this measure came up to-day. Almost every other man here who has talked against the resolution, who has applauded the speakers, who has said anything, has been a man who voted against the anti-aid resolution originally, who did everything he could against it. The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) is square and fair. He says he wants to take any method, and does not care what it is, to beat the anti-aid amendment, and I applaud his frank statement. There is no concealment about that. There is no stab in the back or anything like that. I think that what he said is probably true, — I think I quote him correctly, — that if those two amendments were accepted at the same time the only university in this State that would suffer would be Boston College. Why? Because they teach denominational doctrine there. Now, I want you all to understand that fairly and squarely. I would not be a party to voting for anything that would deprive that college of the same rights that some other college had. I understand he agrees in the statement. And also the only private schools that would be stopped would be the parochial schools. Now, I am broad enough to say if we are going to give money to other schools, give it to parochial schools; but you will prohibit it by that amendment if those two amendments are passed, as he said yesterday, with the words "denominational doctrine" there. Denominational doctrine is taught in parochial schools, and they will have nothing under this resolution, and neither will Boston College. So I want you gentlemen to know these things when you vote for it.

Between the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) and myself there is no ill feeling, no disagreement. We agree perfectly. He says fairly and squarely that he wants to defeat that amendment by any means, and I say that this Convention ought to pause and think of what they did in August and what they are asked to do now. The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) says fairly and squarely that there is a difference, and I say there is a difference. I say if you pass that resolution you will ruin the other one, and if that is the way this Convention wants to go before the people with its work, I do not want to be a party to it.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: It is obvious that if both amendments are adopted the conclusion which the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), the chairman of the committee, has stated as expressing my view is I think correct, but the way to solve the difficulty is to defeat the anti-aid amendment. It is a melancholy reflection for the sober-minded men of this Convention, the delegates to this Convention, to have before them what the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) stated to be the fact, that we have jettisoned religion, we have thrown religion overboard, one of the safeguards, and we have education only left to us. That remark was based upon the assumption that the anti-aid amendment would pass, would be submitted to the voters at this election and ultimately pass. If it is true, — if it is true, Mr. President, — then it is a serious matter for this Convention to assume responsibility for losing one of the anchors of the State, — religion, — and relying only on the other, and not too securely on the other unless this amendment reported by the committee on Education is adopted.

The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) speaking with his usual felicity, with the charm that surrounds all that he says, reminded this Convention of what I attempted imperfectly to state when the anti-aid amendment was under consideration, that this Convention was advising the voters of Massachusetts to abandon the policy of the fathers, which was to cherish the things that are enumerated in the second section of chapter 5. Mr. President, do not let us become confused here between these two amendments. One of them makes for education distinctly. One of them will help this State. One of them will not start fires but will quench them. One of them will make peace. One of them will tie the people together. The other inflames the passions of the people. The other will start the fires. The other rejects the counsels that have made Massachusetts great. Choose between them. Take what the committee on Education offers to help Massachusetts, or take what the committee on the Bill of Rights offers to destroy Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. DONELLY of Lawrence: As a member, gentlemen of the Convention, of the committee on Education, I should like to state that having five resolutions before our committee we summed them all up into one resolution, which is known as resolution No. 309. It was moved in that committee of ours to give our secretary, who formed a subcommittee, also the so-called power and authority to draft these resolutions into one resolution and report them back to the committee. The sectarian amendment being under discussion at that time, or the report of the Bill of Rights Committee, we possibly did not think, I will say that I did not think, that this measure would conflict with the so-called adopted sectarian amendment now, and up to yesterday morning in the meeting held by the committee on Education I told the chairman of our committee that I would support this measure provided that I saw that it did not conflict with the so-called adopted sectarian amendment at the present time, and I asked the committee on Education to reserve my rights to dissent in that respect. Well, the chairman of my committee said sure enough that I had the right to dissent if I felt as though this measure conflicted with the so-called sectarian amendment. I wish to give notice at this time. As I have listened to the debate on this resolution, I think my own committee along with myself have acted with good faith. Part of them possibly may have been slightly accused of trying to break up the work that the committee on Bill of Rights has done. I think we have acted in the best of faith, but I do feel now as though it does conflict with the anti-aid amendment, and I want to put myself on record as being a dissenter to this measure.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: In view of the fact that this sectarian issue is being brought out so prominently I think it is just as well to meet it now. When that amendment was before the committee on Bill of Rights it was my privilege to meet several distinguished Catholic gentlemen of this city, three laymen and one clergyman, and we went over the question and we discussed it thoroughly. And here was the position of those gentlemen, and they are men of standing in the community, who in the past have represented the Catholic interest at the State House. I will read to the Convention their statement in relation to the matter:

1. They did not desire to prevent any private institution from receiving money from the State for educational or charitable purposes.
2. They felt there was no need of any further constitutional amendment to prevent the payment of money by the State to private institutions.
3. They were unalterably opposed to the Batcheller or Anderson amendments.
4. If it was necessary to pass any amendment they would accept the Curtis amendment.

When the committee on Bill of Rights was considering this matter in executive session the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) asked to have the resolution of the committee changed. He asked to have the words "religious doctrine is taught" stricken out, and the words "denominational doctrine inculcated" substituted. The committee, or several members of it, delegated me to talk with some of the gentlemen who were watching this matter, not only this year, but who have been watching it in behalf of the Catholic population of this State for several years. I talked with one of the most representative Catholics in this city, a lawyer, a man of integrity and ability, who holds a responsible position. I told him the exact situation. I said: "Mr.
Anderson has suggested to the committee that we eliminate these words and take the other words. If we do that, the entire committee will be in accord. It is up to you, now, to say whether we shall have peace or whether we shall have war on this question." He asked:
"How do the committee feel?" I replied: "They have no objection, but so far as I, myself, and several others who are interested, are concerned we want your viewpoint and we will do as you say." He said he would take the language suggested by Mr. Anderson on the matter, and that was how we came to bring in this unanimous report.

Now, gentlemen, it is all very well to talk about kindling the flames and doing all these various things, but who is doing it? We have seen this State House crowded for years, for what purpose,—assailing the Catholic population of this State, and demanding that the Constitution be amended so as to stop them from seizing the money of the people from the treasury of the Commonwealth! Yet the facts show that the Catholic institutions of this State have received but $49,000 out of $16,876,620.24 expended since 1860. And still these men were saying they wanted the amendment passed to stop the Catholic institions from receiving public funds! Then when the Catholic gentlemen came before the committee they said: "We do not think there is any need of any legislation, but if you are going to pass any amendment pass one that applies to all. Why should our denomination be singled out, when we have not been receiving this money?" And for years the Catholics have preached that doctrine before the committees at the State House. They never came forward asking for any money, they never sent a lawyer asking for money, and all they had received was $49,000. But certain men were continually saying: "You do want it," and they further said: "We want this amendment to apply to institutions wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastic-cal control." And I want to say of the gentleman from Newton, and I could not do less, that when we told him the Catholic viewpoint of the words "sectarian or ecclesiastical control," and said that we felt it was a deliberate insult to the denomination to which it was our privilege to belong, he said: "I have no intent to insult them, and I will take those words out." And those words came out and then we drafted a new amendment which was changed after one of the most prominent Catholic lawyers in Boston consented to it; and that brought the matter out of the committee unanimously. The lawyer who approved of it has represented the Catholic people at the State House for years.

The amendment came before the Convention and we discussed it. We had all these innuendos, all these insinuations, but no constructive suggestion; no amendment was put forward; so we did the best we could. Were we not justified when these representative Catholics told us their viewpoint, — which was "equal rights for all, special privileges for none," — when we had heard them say that repeatedly in the corridors of the State House and at the public hearings held in this building?

I have in my hand, sir, a copy of the Boston Pilot of April 10, 1915. It says:

Batcheller Bill is beaten 116 to 107.

Decision Reached After One Of The Most Exciting Sessions Ever Held in The Legislature.

The proposed sectarian amendment to the Constitution of the Commonwealth known as the Batcheller bill, after one of the most rancorous debates ever held in the House of Representatives, on last Wednesday evening, was defeated by a vote of 116 to 107.

Among the bigots who made a pitiable exhibition of themselves were Representatives Fred P. Greenwood of Everett and Fitz Henry Smith, Jr., of Boston.

Among the valiant champions of liberty and true patriotism were: Martin Lomasney of Boston, Edward F. McLaughlin of Boston, Peter J. Donahue of Boston, Joseph J. Donahue of Medford, John F. Doherty of Fall River, John N. Levins of South Boston and Dr. John P. Good of Cambridge.

Before a vote was reached on the Batcheller bill, the so-called Fitzgerald bill was taken up and defeated by a vote of 116 to 111 and the so-called Cross bill met a similar fate by a voice vote.

A complete report of the speeches and details of the character of the voting will be given in the Pilot of next week, as the proceedings were carried far beyond the press time of the Pilot.

Now, Mr. President, if it was true patriotism to support the principle of that resolution in 1915 I cannot see any treason in supporting it now. I state frankly that I for one would not vote for any amend. ment that would give the least insult to any religious denomination in this State, particularly the one in which I was born and brought up.

Now, all kinds of efforts have been made to stop this amendment. Why? Is it an attempt to keep this State in turmoil? Why should those of us who live in this State under our flag, which gives equal rights to all, divide on this question when the amendment applies to all?

Gentlemen, I know this Convention, and I know something about the character of Massachusetts Legislatures. Let any man read the proceedings of the Convention of 1853,—there was not a Catholic member in the Convention,—and see how those gentlemen tenderly, fairly and carefully considered the Catholic interests. One of the worst squabbles was between the different Protestant denominations, for the different denominational schools were then in existence and they were fighting for the money amongst themselves, but they were courteous and kind and discussed the Catholic population then just as fairly as we to-day discuss the Jewish population. But the times have changed since then. There were men in that Convention who told about the dire disaster that was going to happen in this State when the Catholics got in the majority. Why, sir, take the inaugural address of Governor Gardner, when he was inaugurated Governor of our State. In his address he requested that the Irish companies of the militia be disbanded because he said they could not be relied upon to defend the flag of our country; but shortly afterwards the civil war showed he was wrong, and our flag was carried forward to victory by Catholics and Protestants alike. [Applause.]

Now, sir, why be fooled? We are sensible men. Who can dream that the amendment these gentlemen brought here was not all understood? Who had a meeting in the Union Club? What was their purpose? What were they doing? The President of Harvard University was there,—that is generally admitted. I make no reflections on the gentleman,—but these are times when one must talk plainly,—the gentleman from Harvard was in the Union Club privately with some other gentlemen. The President of Harvard University was also before this committee. The sectarian matter has been before the Legislature for years. It was known that it was coming to this Convention. Did they have any measure here to meet the situation? Do you suppose with their education and ability they did not know it? Did they have any amendment? No. They took two or three measures and some skilful work was done. As I told you earlier in this Convention they have able seamen on the job here, and these men,—I make no reflections,—who stand up and cross their hands and assure us that they knew nothing about this matter certainly have nerve. It is a pretty good job for men who did not know what they were trying to do. It seems to me, when you consider that three men on this committee on Education voted against the anti-aid amendment, and a couple more of them were not for it very strong but fell in line, that there were powerful and well-directed interests behind this proposition.

Mr. Creed of Boston: I was very much interested in listening to the clipping from the Boston Pilot of April 10, 1915, which the gentleman keeps in the scrap-book for which he is famous. I should like to ask him: Has he in that scrap-book an editorial from the Boston Pilot of September 22, 1917?
Mr. Lomasney: I think the gentleman must be mistaken. He talks about keeping papers in some book. I have the editorial, and I read it, and I read you the other statement from the Pilot of April 10, 1915. Every Catholic here can say truthfully that he never knowingly voted for a proposition that was an insult to the denomination in which he was born and raised. He was given no such viewpoint. Gentlemen representing the Catholic community, four of them, talked with me on this proposition, and I read you substantially what they stated. One of them talked with at least ten members of this Convention,—Catholics and Protestants alike. They also made the same statements openly before the legislative committee in this building in 1915, and I am informed by a member of this Convention that the shorthand notes of that meeting will show it.

Mr. Creed: The gentleman speaks of four distinguished Catholic laymen. Is not the Boston Pilot the official organ, so called, of the archdiocese of Boston?

Mr. Lomasney: Of course, I do not know what the gentleman means by that. The Boston Pilot has been the official organ of the Irish Catholic population of Boston since I was a boy. I never knew it had changed its policy. I did not catch the exact question, but I want to say, Mr. President, and I am talking of what took place, that one of the gentlemen talking with me is a clergyman, three others are respected men of intelligence. Mr. President, it made no difference to me personally what they said. If I had agreed with them I should have been with them. If I did not agree with them I should use my own judgment, because I could do that, but it would make a difference in the way I should present the case. Now, I talked with members of this Convention, and some of them asked me the situation and I told them with whom I had talked, and some of the men in this Convention themselves talked with some of those gentlemen and confirmed my statements. Mr. President, my point is this: One cannot do what was called a patriotic act two years ago and have the same action denounced as reasonable two years afterwards. The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) yesterday frankly said that there was no difference in principle between the proposition we were advocating and the amendment he gave to me as the result of the Union Club conference, because they agreed in their amendment, Mr. President, to stop the whole matter in 1925.

Now, sir, why is all this brought in here? We are not repealing any parts of the Constitution affecting Harvard University. We have touched only what we have stated there. But we do not specifically repeal any part of the Constitution. We are standing on the law. How was that amendment brought in? It is not the same as the original document. They have smuggled words in there, and I venture the assertion that they did know it. What are we going to lose if we kill the resolution? Nothing. That is what we should do.

Mr. Creed: During the debate this afternoon, if my memory is correct, the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) said that during the debate on the anti-sectarian amendment he was assured by members of the committee on Bill of Rights that there was a resolution coming up that would take care of his amendment. I have understood, since this matter was dragged forth from the docket of the Committee of the Whole, that the committee on Bill of Rights had no previous knowledge of resolution No. 309. I should like to ask the gentleman if he knows what members of the committee the gentleman from Newton referred to.

Mr. LOMASNEY: The gentleman from Newton is a member of this Convention. He is far better qualified than myself to state his thoughts to this Convention and to the gentleman. I am responsible for my own thinking and talking and for no one else. But, Mr. President, when I take a position that I believe is right, as God Almighty permits me to see it, I do not quit for any one.

Mr. BLACKMUR of Quincy: Did I understand the gentleman to say in the course of his remarks that at the time he had his conferences or was dealing with this subject-matter in this committee he was in conference with a reverend gentleman high up in the Catholic church here in Boston, and that he agreed to the final draft of the resolution as it was passed, the anti-aid question?

Mr. LOMASNEY: I made what I considered was a statement of fact. Let me make it again. I said that I talked with four gentlemen in this city, one of whom was a clergyman, a Catholic clergyman, and that we discussed this matter before it was considered. This was their view of the situation. I never talked with a Catholic clergyman present but once. I did talk, sir, and some of the committee members knew I was talking, with another gentleman who was far better qualified than myself, not only on statute law but on constitutional and canon law. I do not pretend to know much about either. It seems to me, however, that this is a civil matter. And as I stated before, I talked with a gentleman on the final solution of this problem. He is a lawyer of integrity and standing and represented the Catholic viewpoint. He decided this matter as it finally was settled, because he decided that it was all right to change the words as Mr. Anderson suggested. The original words were put into the amendment by the gentleman from Taunton, Mr. Swig. Pardon me, I could not be more precise.

Mr. BLACKMUR: Do I understand, or does the gentleman now claim, that the Catholic church is satisfied with the amendment as it was passed?

Mr. LOMASNEY: I certainly am not the one to speak for the Catholic church. I cannot. I have my limitations. When the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) asked me, when I appeared before the committee, whom I represented, I replied: "I represent no one but myself." But I represent in part in this Convention an intelligent constituency, and I am speaking here now for the Fifth Suffolk Representative district. What else does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BLACKMUR: In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Ward 8 —

Mr. LOMASNEY: Ward 5, Mr. President.

Mr. BLACKMUR: ... and in view also, not that I question the fairness of the statement whatever, but in view also that he has read an excerpt from the Pilot, an editorial from the Pilot, I should like to call his attention to the editorial in the Pilot of September 22, 1917, bearing upon this issue, and I understand few gentlemen of this Convention have seen it:

As usual, there arose the third party —

Mr. LOMASNEY: I will admit I have seen that.
Mr. Blackmur (continuing to read):

As usual, there arose the third party, good men, doubtless, sick and tired of all this nasty controversy caused, let us again repeat, not by the Catholics, but by anti-Catholic fanatics.

Their endeavor was to plan a way out of the difficulty in the shape of a compromise amendment. The result was that (without in the slightest doubting their good intentions) they attempted to remedy one evil by applying another.

The bigots wanted to close the doors of beneficence against Catholic citizens. The result of the compromise was to close the doors of beneficence against everybody.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston rose to a point of order which, being stated, was that the matter which the gentleman was reading questioned the motives of the members of the Convention in an undignified way, and therefore was out of order.

The President: The Chair cannot pass upon a matter until he has heard it. The Chair would caution the member, however, against reading any matter which does not bear upon the matter before the House. The Chair is of the impression, although he is not certain, that the article which the member proposes to read relates solely to a matter which already has been finally passed on by the Convention, and has no reference whatever to the resolution now before the Convention. He will depend upon the member not to read any matter which does not relate to the resolution before the Convention at the present time.

Mr. Blackmur: I do not want to trespass upon the feelings of the Convention, nor do anything which seems to be in contravention of the ruling of the Chair. This is entirely in reference to the action of this Convention with reference to the so-called anti-aid amendment. It is, however, exactly in point to the discussion and to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Ward 5. He has stated the position, as I understand it, of the Catholic church in Boston on this question, and has read from the article.

In view of those facts, I believe that this is germane to the issue and the question, and is properly to be submitted by me at this time. I submit, however, to the ruling of the Chair. I do not care to read this article if the Chair believes that it is not in order.

The President: The Chair is aware that the debate has had considerable latitude. No question has been raised in regard to it. It is of course perfectly competent, in order to discuss the measure now before the House, to point out that it is in conflict with a measure which already has been adopted, and to that extent the debate has been proper in reference to the other matter, showing where the conflict lies; but the Chair does not understand that the matter which the member proposes to read has any reference whatsoever to the resolution that is now before the Convention. If that is the case, then the Chair suggests that the matter should not be read.

Mr. Lomasney: I wanted to correct the gentleman. He said I claimed I was speaking for the Catholic church. I never claimed that, sir, at all.

Mr. Blackmur: I think the gentleman is under some misapprehension. I understood him to say in explanation of his position that he was stating the fact that there was a reverend gentleman who converted him, very properly, and that he had got the idea from this reverend gentleman that the Catholics were satisfied, or would be satisfied, with this so-called amendment. That is what I said, nothing more.

Mr. Lomasney: The gentleman from Quincy is a lawyer. He voted against the amendment, and I am not responsible for his understanding. He certainly, sir, cannot put words into my mouth that I never uttered. I said I had conferred with four men; I did not say they conferred with me. Does the gentleman get the distinction?

Mr. Blackmur: No.

Mr. Lomasney: Well, I am sorry.

The debate was continued Thursday, October 4.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: There are several very important amendments now pending to this resolution which it seems to me have not been adequately discussed. I think many of us who voted for the original anti-aid amendment are disinclined to go back on an action already taken, but at the same time we feel that if this amendment now pending could be so worded as not to be inconsistent with the so-called anti-aid amendment that we should be glad to vote for this amendment. Now, the gentleman from Newton in the third division (Mr. Anderson) has offered two amendments intended to deal with a situation that is novel in this Convention. I mean the question as to whether the anti-aid amendment prevents the Legislature from exempting educational and religious corporations from taxation. I do not believe there is a member here who does not desire the Legislature to have the power to exempt from taxation educational and religious institutions. Now, that question is at present in doubt. We have heard from the learned gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), who is very sure that the anti-aid amendment does so limit the Legislature. The amendments of the gentleman from Newton are intended to meet that situation. I think they ought to be carefully discussed; and if that apparent defect in the anti-aid amendment can be so cured without destroying its main purposes, I think that many of the members, including myself, would want to vote for it.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: Yesterday, when we adjourned, I was about to say that there were three other gentlemen from Boston on the committee on Bill of Rights who are of the same denomination as myself. They all gave the best that was in them to settle this question. Each one of them is far more competent to tell his views on this matter than I am. I simply want to say that I am trying to state nothing except my own views.

Now, Mr. President, let me just say a word on the main question. The article we are being asked to amend is one that was passed in the early days of the State. In the Convention of 1853 there was a great contest over denominational schools.

When I use the words "Protestant" and "Catholic" I want the Convention to understand I have no malicious feeling at all. I want to say, Mr. President, in that Convention one of the great contests was on denominational schools, between the different denominations of Protestants at that time. They had the same controversy, the same issues, the same money question,—friends of each denomination charging the other with getting the larger share of the public funds. But they settled the whole question. They went into the Harvard College matter very minutely. There were questions raised about the validity of their holdings, and so forth; but that also was settled. Now, around the time of that settlement, Mr. President, we had coming into this country people of the race to which I belong,—the Irish race; and we now have coming into the country the Jewish people. The Irish people came here,—many of them were Catholics,—and they took our laws as we made them, and conformed to them as a matter of conscience; they built their parochial schools, and supported them as private schools,—because the law compelled them to do that; and they went forward and contributed immeasurably to the best interest of the State by the way they took hold of this great question. Believing in having the education and religious training of their children go hand in hand, they did the best they could to bring about good results for all, and they have gone forward in a magnificent way. The schools that those people built and maintained are a credit to them,—and no one who is fair can say anything else. The Catholics have done this, and they never have asked for assistance. And now, sir, come the Jewish people. In the section where I live they also have their religious schools, where they teach the Talmud and where they also give education to their children. The gentleman from Boston here yesterday, who offered, in accordance with the belief of his people, the proposition to strike the word "Christian" out of the Constitution and insert all religions, so that it will be "all religions,"—speaks the viewpoint of his people on that question.

Now, all these questions are brought in here, and why? They say: To reconstruct this article which has been the settled policy of the State for years and over which there has been no contest. The committee on Education wants us to reconstruct it, rebuild it, and reform it, without showing a serious defect in it or a demand for a change. Mr. President, if you are going to put these propositions into this resolution and allow colleges and institutions of higher learning that are under private control to have an opportunity to take the public money for their purposes, how can the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings),—I am sorry he is not here,—but how can he or any of the other eight men who hold his views,—and there were nine Catholics who voted against the anti-aid proposition out of the twenty-five,—how can they sit here with their views and allow all of us in the State who are Catholics to be taxed to maintain institutions of higher learning that are just as Protestant in their educational purposes and in their control as our institutions are Catholic? Is he to remain silent and allow such discrimination?

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Will you repeat that last sentence, about Catholics and taxation?

Mr. Lomasney: I am a poor hand to repeat anything, Mr. President. [Laughter.] I try to do the best I can; I have no set speeches, and I do not know what I said. [Laughter.] I do not mean exactly that,—I meant every word. I know the principle of what I am trying to say; the words may be different.

I was asking, sir: How can the gentleman from Fall River, with his honest convictions and fears of the future, how can he remain silent now, when these private institutions of higher learning are trying to get public money, without putting in an amendment giving the parochial schools the same consideration? If he does that, I shall offer an amendment to allow the Jewish schools the same privilege. And why should they not have it? If public money is to be given to these private institutions, why are the others not entitled to it? Is the fact that we are going to have academies where the daughters of the rich may enjoy these great advantages, or where gentlemen's sons may be educated out of public funds in private institutions,—does that make any difference?

Now, those are two conflicting elements that come forward at once, and we have to meet them.

Then comes the other proposition,—I mean that of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Stoneman) to strike the word "Christian" out of our Constitution in deference to his views and his people, and put in "all religions."

All of these difficulties are coming up, Mr. President, for what reason? The reason assigned here at the start was "sentiment." Sentiment! The sentiments of the State regarding Harvard College are now in the Constitution, and they have been there for years. The work the college has done is also its record. Why allow sentiment to creep in here now? And right here let me say, as I looked at the gentleman opposite, having caught his eye just now, he has offered amendments which, if adopted, may do the very thing we do not wish, although I have not had time to read them. I mean the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Mansfield. He put in some words which said "all schools." I want to be frank,—I have not read it over carefully,—but that may be the very thing we do not want. We are opening the door to all these possibilities. For what purpose? For sentiment! Because, Mr. President, no one came here asking to have this section changed. It was the result of an attack made on Harvard College, for which I am not responsible and about which I am not talking; they grouped three or four measures and submitted this amendment.

In the early stages of this Convention it was my privilege to suggest to the Convention: "Do not change the old Constitution unless there are sound, valid, and substantial reasons for the change." Now, if sentiment justifies opening up all of these questions, do it, Mr. President,—especially if it means the greatest good for the greatest number. In the course of my criticisms of educational matters, I have paid my respects to Harvard College, but I never would try to change the Constitution in what they have done, and interfere with what is settled, because I believe it is an unsound policy in a great Commonwealth like Massachusetts.

Now, Mr. President, we worked on the Bill of Rights proposition, and the district attorney of this county worked on it; Mr. Callahan, Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Swig and all the other members worked on it. And, Mr. President, when we touched a word we never knew where that line went to; and we never knew where the powder would lead to after we made the least change.

Now, here is the whole corner-stone. The only real argument made has been from the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers), for the Board of Education. That is a matter that can be cured by statute, if it is desirable to be done, and that should not be done until every school-committee in the State has an opportunity to speak for its educational system. Now, Mr. President, just as I said, these private institutions are just as Protestant in their control and management,—and I say that not offensively,—as the other institutions are Catholic in their management. We have tried to start the State upon a policy of no public money for institutions not under exclusive public control and superintendence, and, Mr. President, that is what the anti-aid amendment does.

If we pass this resolution it opens the door to these matters which we have discovered so quickly; and we cannot tell how many more. It is taxation without representation, because it is impossible for a Catholic to live in some of these institutions that have been getting money from the State under private control and be treated as he should be. And I make no reference to any of them specifically. It is wrong in principle. We have struck a blow in the right direction and I hope we shall not change.

Now, Mr. President, the Worcester Polytechnic Institute has done good work, but there are three ministers on that board,—gentlemen of ability. I make no unfriendly reference to the institution. It has done great work in the community. But there are three ministers on the board. What would you say of an institution that had three Catholic priests on the board? Would you not say it was somewhat sectarian? I mean no offence when I say this. Of course you would, Mr. President.

There is only one thing for us to do. Massachusetts to-day is an entirely different State from the Massachusetts of 1853, and we are making a Constitution to last for the future. How can we, in view of the past, pass this amendment to favor these private institutions of higher learning? Are we going to deny to the children of the poor,—Catholic, Jewish, or Congregationalist, Episcopal, Presbyterian or Universalist? They all have the same rights. If we are, why not allow all denominations their own schools and have them all paid out of the public funds, just as they had before our people came here years ago. Of course that means the Catholic and Jewish people will have their schools paid for in the same way.

It is dangerous ground to tread on, Mr. President, and I think the best interests of the State would be preserved if we should defeat this proposition and leave this whole question as it is.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: We have had a very remarkable series of debates here in the last two or three days. First, the genial ex-Congressman in the second division (Mr. O'Connell) read the letter of Mr. Cram. Mr. Cram thinks somehow or other that this whole matter which has resulted in the anti-aid or anti-sectarian amendment is in the hands of fanatics and bigots. God be thanked that it is not in their hands in this Convention; that it is in the hands of men of moderate views, of men who wish to understand each other, of men who wish to come to an accommodation in reference to this matter, and to build here a solid peace. Mr. Cram says also that we ought to turn our backs upon all of the magnificent progress in these lines which was made in the nineteenth century; all that magnificent progress by which we emerged from a State church, by which we laid down the great principles of religious liberty and separation of church and State in this Commonwealth,—we are to turn our backs on the great educational progress which was made under those conditions during the past century. And what are we to adopt in place of the policy of Massachusetts? We are to go back, according to him, to a policy which was rife in the eighteenth and seventeenth centuries; a policy which still prevails in most countries of both Protestant and Catholic Europe, — the old European policy of more or less union of church and State, so that under it in Europe either the State itself teaches religion or has handed it over to the schools to be taught by either Protestant or Catholic churches as the case may be. And what is the result of that? It has been race and class and religious hatred in Europe. It has been bad for the State, it has been bad for the church, and it has been bad for the schools. Why should we go back to that very condition out of which our fathers so painfully and slowly made their way?

Then comes the gentleman from Fall River, — I am sorry that he is not present here this morning, I wish he were, — we come to the gentleman from Fall River, who tells us plainly that he is opposed to the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution; that he hopes that the time will come when the sectarian schools of his own church shall receive the public support. If I had said, — if I had said, — that the Catholic people of this State had those sentiments, I should have been charged with insulting the Catholic people of this State. And I want to say that I have learned something on that point since I came to this Convention. I believe that if I should say that the sentiments of the gentleman from Fall River are the sentiments of all our Catholic population, I should be insulting them; for I believe that there is a very, very large proportion of my Catholic friends and fellow-citizens who are perfectly willing to stand on the doctrine of religious liberty and separation of church and State. I have no doubts on that question at all. The gentleman from Fall River says that he is going to test this thing at the coming election. I am glad to have it tested, and I believe that it will be seen that the majority, and perhaps the large majority, of our Catholic fellow-citizens stand shoulder to shoulder with all the rest of us in believing in religious liberty and the separation of church and State, even to the point of sectarian appropriations. And I want to say that any man who says that he believes in religious liberty, and at the same time stands ready to take a dollar out of the pockets of his fellow-citizens for the sake of propagating a religion in which that citizen does not believe, is self-deceived. He does not believe in religious liberty consistently and to the end, for the very bottom of religious liberty is this: That the State can force no act in the sphere of religion. And if a man says that he believes in the separation of church and State, he does not consistently believe in it unless he is willing to apply it to sectarian appropriations.

I am glad that I stand just where I do. I am glad to cooperate with all of the loyal men on the Bill of Rights Committee, who, of every creed and shade of belief, stand together for this great treaty of peace.

Now, I have told this Convention very frankly why I went over to this proposition, and I am going to tell you one more reason, which I had not yet told you. It is simply this, that I believed that in the proposition of the Catholic members of that committee, and of the whole committee except myself, with reference to this matter, there was offered to our side of the matter an olive branch, and it was not my business to reject it, and it was not in my heart to reject it, and it was not for me to say in what form it should be offered. But it would not have been right for me to have accepted it in that form unless I had believed that "No public money to private institutions" was a good policy for this State. I came to this Convention with an open mind on that subject, and my study here has proved to me that it is the only consistent and thoroughgoing and sound policy for this State to adopt, and I hold to it.

The gentleman from Fall River characterized the anti-aid amendment as a homage which fear offered to intolerance. Do not believe it for a minute. It is a proposition which coming power offers to fear.
It is a proposition which seems to me to be the very finest policy which our Roman Catholic friends could possibly adopt. They do not need to hear it from me. I have no business, perhaps, to say this thing at all; but I do say that if our Roman Catholic citizens want to get the love and the sympathy and the confidence of their Protestant and non-Catholic fellow-citizens they cannot do anything better than to pass this anti-aid amendment.

Now, I wish to speak specifically to this education resolution which is before us, and I want to say, in the first place, that I have no sympathy with aspersions upon the sincerity and the integrity of this committee,—the Education Committee. I believe that they have acted in absolute good faith in the whole thing from the beginning to the end. In the second place, I want to say that I am an educator myself; my father was a college president, and I have lived under the shadow of higher educational institutions all my life long, and there is not a man in this State who believes in the necessity and in the good of education more than I do. But when I look at this amendment I find that it was written in 1780, at a time when this State had a State church, when they were full of a whole world of ideas that we have outgrown; and it is perfectly impossible for us, it seems to me, to be sure that we can cure it in any way and make it agree with the principles of the anti-aid amendment.

Of course I want to cherish education. We were told by the gentleman from Fall River and the gentleman from Worcester who sits at the front of the Convention (Mr. Washburn), yesterday, that we did not want to cherish education; that if we rejected this resolution of the Education Committee, actually the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as I understood it, would turn its back on education, would cease to cherish education. I should like to know whether we have not cherished education in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. No Commonwealth has cherished education so much as we. Are we not cherishing education to-day? Certainly we are. And how many educational institutions are to-day receiving money from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? Not one single purely educational insitution is so receiving money to-day. There are technical institutions and trade-schools, a few of them, that are receiving some money, but there are no purely literary, educational institutions that are so receiving it. And yet we are cherishing education to-day in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In this State was begun the American public school system, the everlasting glory of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and the statue of Horace Mann, the founder of that system, stands in front of this State House with Daniel Webster, and worthily stands there. And this American public school system has gone from this Commonwealth of Massachusetts throughout the length and breadth of this land, and is being copied, and is to be copied in all of the nations of this world. We have founded and cherished this public school system, and we cherish our high schools and our normal schools; and I am one of those who believe that the time is coming, and ought to come, when Massachusetts will have a great university, in which the sons of the poor can have an education in accordance with their means and without fees. [Applause.] And I believe that the time will come when we shall be even prouder of our system of public education than we are to-day.

Now, when the State adopts a new policy and says that it thinks it is best that private institutions should not receive money from the public crib, we nevertheless cherish those institutions just the same. It is a very small and superficial opinion that believes the opposite.

When the mother weans her child and makes that child learn to eat independently, does the mother thereby cease to cherish her child? When I cease carrying my boy in my arms, cease keeping him at home, and send him to France to live an independent existence there, do I cease to cherish him and to love him? Not a bit of it. By this policy the State simply says: "Private charity will be stimulated and made robust if it is made independent and learns to walk alone." If every private institution in this State knows that as a last resort it may come to its Senator or Representative, and by a method of log-rolling get something through the Legislature, it never will have that spiritual strength, that spiritual support in the community, that it will have if it is entirely a private institution.

Gentlemen, we are not opposed to cherishing education. We wish to have it cherished, and cherished in the right way.

Now I want to say a few words about some amendments which I have put in, and I ask you to take up, if you will, the Orders of the Day. Look at page 2, please, at the bottom of the page. When the time comes I shall withdraw my amendment, the second one which is placed upon the Orders of the Day; I shall withdraw that one in section 2, by striking out the last sentence; I shall press the other two amendments, however,—the first one, and the one which is at the extreme bottom of the page and the beginning of the page on the other side.

I wish to say that I offer this amendment with reference to the Legislature having "the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes," not because I have the slightest doubt as to the continued exemption of church property from taxation if the anti-aid amendment should pass. The anti-aid amendment does not in any way deny the right of the exemption of church property, or of the property of charitable and benevolent institutions. I think I can speak for our committee as a whole in saying that we stand by the categorical statement read by our chairman in the former debate with reference to taxation, and reaffirm that our amendment does not deny exemption from taxation to property used for purely religious or benevolent or charitable purposes. But since in the minds of this Convention, and since in the minds of the people of this State, the doubt has been raised as to whether church property really is exempt, even under the present Constitution, I think we ought to still that doubt by putting into the Constitution some such amendment as this:
"The Legislature shall have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes." For that reason I am going to move to strike out the article of amendment entirely, and insert in place of it those words. We might make some amendments to this later, Mr. President, and I suppose they will be in order later, some proposed technical amendments. Of course it will be threshed out in the Convention, and made to be just exactly as the Convention wants it to be.

I want to say that I cannot agree to having this educational report go through. We were told that it was a matter of sentiment. As far as the first section was concerned, I understand the president of Harvard University had no desire particularly that this first section should stand here; and I feel that while sentiment is a most excellent thing, — and I will stand for sentiment as long as almost anybody will, — still if this amendment, founded on sentiment, stands in the way of something real good and substantial, let us have the real good and substantial.

As far as the second section is concerned, if I thought that section added one right or privilege to education I should vote for it. I do not believe that it does. I believe that the Legislature has power to do that for which my colleague from Newton yesterday thought this amendment necessary. I have no doubt on that subject. At least let it not be brought in here, but let us have the bill in the Legislature; and when it is taken to the courts, why, if they say that that is unconstitutional, then let us have a constitutional amendment, — which, according to some brethren here, is going to be a very easy thing to secure hereafter.

Now, that is the way to fix this whole matter, it seems to me. I believe that this resolution does not really do anything for education. I do not believe that its advertisement of education amounts to anything, or its advertisement of Harvard College amounts to anything. I think that something buried in the Constitution of Massachusetts, if people were as ignorant about it as I was ten months ago, probably would be buried forever. I think that there is not very much in that proposition of advertisement. Consequently, I feel that this is an unnecessary measure; and I do not believe that any unnecessary measure ought to be put before the people of the State. Rather let us pass the amendment which is under my name, which does guarantee to education, and to all that is best in the State, exemption from taxation, — a real benefit. And I shall modify my amendment, I think, so as to have it read: "The Legislature shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation," — because I believe they have the power now.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I rise merely to correct a misstatement which the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Anderson of Newton) has made touching my position yesterday; a misstatement inadvertently made, I doubt not.

What I sought to do yesterday in reading from the Constitution was not to suggest that the Convention, if it should not adopt the resolution reported by the committee on Education, would commit the State to a policy of not continuing to cherish institutions of learning. I was calling attention to the fact that if the anti-aid amendment is to go before the people of the Commonwealth unembarrassed by an inharmonious suggestion, both in the Constitution as it now stands and in the amendment proposed by the committee on Education, one of the documents would need to be amended. I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Newton in the third division (Mr.
Anderson) to this quotation which I read yesterday, and which began with these words: "It shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, . . . to encourage private societies . . . for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures." That same phrase is repeated in this amendment reported by the committee on Education.

All that I sought to do yesterday was to call attention to that fact, and to express my surprise that some member of the committee on the Bill of Rights had not already introduced a motion to amend the resolution of the committee on Education in that particular; and if the amendment proposed by the committee on Education shall fall, then to amend the Constitution as it was written in 1780. That was my only purpose. Of course I know, and every one else knows, that the Commonwealth will continue to cherish education.

Mr. Brackett of Arlington: In opposing the motion for the previous question upon this resolution two days ago I stated that I had no desire to speak upon the merits of the proposition. I did not at that time have any intention of debating it; but the peculiar character of the opposition which has been made to it prompts me to-day to say a brief word or two, not only in support of the resolution, but in protest against the unprecedented and unwarranted character of this opposition.

The committee on Education has been criticized by certain members of the committee on Bill of Rights because that committee had not consulted the committee on Bill of Rights before reporting this resolution. Now let us consider for a moment the history of this matter.

It was well stated by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) two days ago. Certain resolutions were referred to the committee on Education; that committee, as was its duty, carefully and faithfully considered those propositions, and reported this resolution upon them.
In doing that it simply was doing its duty, and was not under any obligation to consult any other committee whatever before making its report. And now that committee is entitled to have its report considered upon its merits. If we believe this is a bad resolution, then let us vote against it; but if we believe it is a good one, that it will have a tendency to promote the educational and other interests of the Commonwealth, then let us vote for it.

I believe that it is a good resolution. I favor it because it will promote not only the educational interests of the Commonwealth, but, what is of equal importance, that it will promote equality of educational opportunities between the children of the Commonwealth. And I want to see the power of the Legislature so strengthened, as I believe it will be by this resolution, that it may make such provisions as shall give the children of the poor citizen of Saugus the same educational advantages as are enjoyed by the children of the rich citizen of Brookline.

The debate this morning has taken a wide range; instead of being confined to the resolution before us it has extended to a matter which we already have disposed of. I do not propose to make any reference to the remarks which have been made, in which the names of certain religious denominations and certain races have been brought in. While I am aware that I have many other sins to answer for hereafter, there is one of which I never have been guilty,—in my public life or in my dealings with my fellow-citizens I never have been actuated by anything like racial or religious prejudice. I always have treated my fellow-citizens with equal regard, irrespective of their religion or their race. And I do not propose to go into that discussion. I am sorry that these names have been brought in here. The only thing, as I have said, for us to consider is whether this proposition is a good one or a bad one. Several amendments have been suggested; but if we vote the resolution down, why, that is the end of it, there will be no opportunity for these amendments.

As the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division said in discussing the motion for reconsideration this morning, there are other stages upon which amendments can be made, so if this resolution is ordered to a second reading, then at future stages amendments can be made to prevent any conflict between it and any resolutions which have been adopted heretofore. But if we defeat it, that is the end of it; there will be no opportunity at all for bringing in such amendments.

Therefore I appeal to my fellow-members of this Convention, if they believe that this resolution is in itself a meritorious one, to vote for it, reserving the right, which is theirs of course, to amend it upon its future stages.

Mr. John W. Daly of Lowell: As a member of the committee on Education I find myself in a somewhat unusual position. When the anti-aid resolution was presented to this Convention, for its approval or disapproval, I was opposed to it because I believed that it was un-American and un-democratic; because I believed it was an attempt to influence legislation favoring class distinction. However, after the question had been discussed ably and eloquently by men who, because of their experience and opportunity for careful study and investigation as to constitutional and statutory requirements, to my mind at least, were fittingly qualified to give unprejudiced opinion as to why this question should or should not be submitted to the people for final decision, I became convinced that it was a fair, just and equitable solution of a problem that had been annoying Legislatures and the electorate for a long time. The doubt that had existed in my mind was dispelled until the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), who, if you remember, was practically the last speaker, introduced a new thought that partly revived my former misgivings. At this point quick decision was necessary, and when experts disagreed there was no other alternative for me but to decide according to the dictates of my own conscience. Such dictation and my vote that followed meant that to the best of my knowledge I had chosen the lesser of two evils.

Now comes the report of the committee on Education recommending certain changes in the Constitution. I realize fully, perhaps as well as any man here, that it is a dangerous precedent to establish for any deliberative body to reject or be opposed to the recommendation of any of its committees, particularly when such recommendation is unanimous, as unquestionably it is in this case, in the sense that when the question was before the committee there was no verbal objection or dissent. However, at that time there was one member of the committee at least,—myself, and I have since learned that there were others,—who had mental reservations that if a later analysis of the question in the Convention showed that any of its provisions were detrimental or antagonistic to the anti-aid resolution they would exercise their privilege of dissenting; and such is the position that I occupy at the present time. The chairman, secretary and other members of the committee have said that they do not believe that the recommendations of the committee are detrimental to or antagonistic to the anti-aid amendment. My brief association with those gentlemen has won my respect and esteem and I believe them to be honest. Yet I do not share their opinions. As a consequence, the debate on this question has convinced me that there are provisions in this measure that are antagonistic to the anti-aid amendment, and, inasmuch as I voted for that resolution in the Convention, I cannot now consistently vote to sustain the recommendations of the committee on Education. If I did so, I feel that it would be a reflection on my intelligence or an apparently deliberate attempt on my part to take advantage of an opportunity to change my vote. Therefore, because of these facts, I feel justified in voting against the recommendations of the committee on Education.

Mr. Swig of Taunton: To me it is very significant that those delegates who stood so strenuously in opposition to the Bill of Rights Committee by opposing the anti-aid resolution are to-day the valiant champions of this report of the committee on Education; and because they are the valiant champions of that report I am constrained to believe that there is something in the report which is inconsistent with the action of this Convention when it adopted the anti-aid resolution; and so I ask the Convention: Why undo what you already have done? To-day you are being asked to undo the very first bit of constructive work that you did, and as yet no solid, substantial reason has been advanced for so doing.

In the early days of the anti-aid discussion my heart grieved when I saw my Protestant and Catholic brothers commence a religious debate; and how pleased I was when at last I saw that we were able to bring forth a compromise measure that would still that debate. But now to-day we find it opened again, and why? Because this educational report rips open the question that we wanted to close; and not alone that, but by the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Stoneman) it rips open another religious question. I am sorry indeed that the gentleman from Boston introduced his resolution, because I think that if discretion was the better part of his valor he would understand that at this time at least there was no occasion to present any such amendment, because I do not believe the sober sense of this Convention will permit for one moment this report to go through.

Why take up the time in debating something we already have decided? Of course it is a testimonial to the skill of those who are opposed to the anti-aid amendment, but we are not here for the purpose of giving testimonials to their skill. We are here to decide measures, and once they are decided we are to let them stand decided. And so I ask you, gentlemen of the Convention, to abide by your former decision. Do not open up the question again. Let us adopt the slogan that a merchant in Boston follows; let us paraphrase it: "When in doubt, kill it." And you have reasonable doubt as to whether or not this report of the committee on Education is not in conflict with the action that you already have taken on the anti-aid amendment, and therefore you should kill the resolution as presented by the committee on Education.

Mr. Shea of Dalton: While the learned gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) was speaking in his own calm and persuasive manner, he had almost convinced me that my stand heretofore taken on the anti-aid measure was unsound, and that I, like so many others, had lost my bearings and wandered afar. It seemed to me that, in behalf of education, he was making a wonderful appeal to the Convention to sacrifice all other considerations to the development of all institutions of learning in this Commonwealth. Unfortunately for me his peroration proceeded along other lines. He finished in his customary style, fighting hard for certain engineering institutions toward which he continually has manifested the deepest interests. May I be permitted to remind you of the substance of his closing statements: "This anti-aid amendment may wipe out certain engineering institutions and make a State institution imperative"; and again: "I would remind you further of the amendments I offered long ago that would protect these institutions." Such statements betrayed the real significance of his appeal. If he had spoken of lesser institutions like Deerfield Academy, I doubtless would have remained subject to his eloquence, and felt that he was constructing a beautiful covering to protect education in its entirety from all adverse influences; but when he referred to those patches, which he called amendments, previously offered and urged by himself in the general debate on this floor (and I hold no brief against the illustrious engineering schools which he has so ably championed), it seemed to me that his beautiful covering had shrunk to an insignificant umbrella, intended to shield his own institutions.

Now, Mr. President, it has been urged on this floor that we either should throw the doors wide open to all institutions or only to publicly controlled institutions. I do not understand the gentleman from Worcester favors either course, as I already have stated he merely would protect certain powerful institutions, while the rest are left to their own resources. It is this policy heretofore followed that apparently has caused general dissatisfaction and which has led to the adoption of the new policy embodied in the anti-aid amendment. It is because I believe the new policy is an improvement over the old one, that I voted for it in the first instance, and it is for this reason, together with others uncontroverted on this floor, that I believe we should stand by the anti-aid amendment and kill this hostile resolution.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I would ask the Convention to consider carefully a matter that has developed during this debate. The second section of the resolution, with a few additional words reported by the committee on Education, is now in the Constitution. It was written by John Adams. There is not another State Constitution that has anything approaching it. It is unique. How much are we going to alter it? The members of the Bill of Rights Committee are determined that this resolution shall not pass. They say that it is in conflict with the anti-aid amendment already passed. Well, then it must be that their anti-aid amendment kills this section which is now in the Constitution.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: The gentleman has said that section 2 is now in the Constitution. Will he not change that to say that section 2 except the last six lines is now in the Constitution and that the last six lines are brand new and the subject of objection and discussion?

Mr. Brown: What the gentleman has said is true; it is so printed. There is no escape from it. But those six lines alone and by themselves would mean practically but very little. The life of the objection of the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights is against those words that are now in this Constitution, and the gentleman who has taken his seat has made clear the difference between Massachusetts as she was under this section of the Constitution and Massachusetts as she will be if the anti-aid amendment is adopted. He said very distinctly in speaking on the anti-aid amendment that it was nothing for anybody or it was something for everybody. That is the situation. Until the committee came forward with this anti-aid amendment Massachusetts was governed by this section which contains the grandest sentiments of brotherhood that ever were written in such a document.

I felt interested to know how that section came in our Constitution. I knew John Adams wrote it, but I wondered: Did John Adams have a sudden inspiration, as it was called, when it took us off our moorings yesterday, and was it thus projected into the Convention of 1780? And then it occurred to me that sentiments like these rarely are enunciated through a human instrument unless it has so qualified itself that the Divine Power can speak through it if occasion demands. So I sought last night to discover it elsewhere in the writings of John Adams.

Now John Adams, after he wrote that splendid section, was away from this country for about seven years, and then he came back and he was elected President of the United States under conditions which you well know and which are not material at this time. And in his inaugural address he again used the very thoughts and words that we find in the Constitution of Massachusetts. In this inaugural he spoke of the country, of its economic conditions, of Washington’s administration, and generally how the country was progressing; and then he spoke of “a love of virtuous men of all parties and denominations; a love of science and letters, and a wish to patronize every rational effort to encourage schools, colleges, universities, academies, and every institution for propagating knowledge, virtue and religion amongst all classes of the people, not only for their benign influence,”—here comes the reason why he put it in the Constitution; here comes what he hoped to accomplish: “not only for their benign influence on the happiness of life, in all its stages and classes, and of society in all its forms, but, as the only means of preserving our Constitution from its natural enemies, the spirit of sophistry, the spirit of party, the spirit of intrigue, profligacy, and corruption, and the pestilence of foreign influence, which is the angel of destruction to elective governments;” and he went on further with more that I might read; but that is sufficient for my purpose.

Why now the opposition to this? It is because if this goes to the people it does control that anti-aid amendment, and it is because if this does not go to the people the anti-aid amendment limits its operation or repeals it, and we cannot reason it in any other way. Just as the eighteenth amendment was corrective and restrictive upon this proposition, so the extension of that eighteenth amendment, as our committee has reported it, is a still further restriction, and it is such a restriction that it may abrogate that benevolent section.

You men who have stood in such profound reverence for the Constitution, to my mind, next to the idea that all men are born free, you should reverence this section. The propositions presented for your choice are: Massachusetts, with her hands out, something for everybody; or Massachusetts, her hands behind her, nothing for anybody.

In Britain, when they were driven to the last extremity by the Romans and the Conqueror was making his address, his last words were: "Think of your forefathers and of your posterity." That is the spirit of this portion of your Constitution; it is not the spirit of today. The spirit of to-day is the commercialism in the anti-aid amendment.

I am reminded of a councilman,—I will put the incident in New York,—who, when a proposition was before the body for an appropriation of money for something that might also benefit posterity, rose to say: "I object, Mr. Chairman; what has posterity ever done for us?" And that is precisely the commercial tone of the age. Are we going to refuse to give anything for any undertaking, however meritorious? Why is the member from Newton willing to exempt churches? I am willing they should be exempted, but why not be true to yourself? An exemption from taxation of one man is a placing of the burden of that taxation on the other man. There is no difference between the benefit of a donation from exemption from taxation and the benefit from aiding by a donation out of the proceeds of taxation.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that church property and property devoted to educational purposes should not be exempt from taxation?

Mr. Brown: I want it clearly understood; I will help all churches, although I am an unattached Christian. I am asked: "What is your religion?" I want to say this: I believe in an over-ruling Power, omnipresent, omniscient, controlling every atom in the universe and holding every atom to account; that every atom however minute or aggregation of atoms however large carries within its own atmosphere the impress of all the events through which it has passed. Sooner or later its intelligence must render an account with itself. And in that broad spirit, sir, I am willing to help anybody and everybody who is doing good by religion or otherwise. I want that to be the spirit of Massachusetts; just as I believe it was the spirit of Massachusetts when John Adams wrote it.

Mr. Shea: I should like to ask the gentleman from Brockton if he does not think there is a difference in the proposition that we exempt all churches and all educational institutions,—I say this as a practical matter,—from taxation, and giving to the Legislature the power to appropriate money for the aid of different institutions. As a practical matter is there not a great difference?

Mr. Brown: I will answer your question, No. As a practical matter, I see no difference. If you are going to overhaul this system, overhaul it. If you are going to entirely separate the State from giving any aid to any church, do it.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: I do not understand the gentleman from Brockton has answered my specific question. Does he argue that church and educational property should not be exempt from taxation? It is a simple question and can be answered by yes or no.

Mr. Brown: I do not. I will not only give them what they have got but I will give them more. They need it; we need their help. If there was any uprising at this time, who do you think could control it if it cannot be controlled by the ministers of the gospel, no matter what the denomination or sect? Who has controlled uprisings in the past? Who has upheld the State when the State was in danger and anarchy almost reigned? Who but the Church? I do not argue that the church and State should be united. No, because the church should not be united with the State. It has had its experience; it has passed through it. It does not wish to repeat it. Our Constitution provides amply against any possible union. Our Bill of Rights provides again and again that they never again shall come together. There is a vast difference between the church running the State, — there is a vast difference between the church coming inside the State compared with the State recognizing the fact that the church is doing good and handing out to the church money for charity, piety and benevolence. Because education is doing good the State is giving it money; it is giving to the arts or sciences or agriculture for the same reason. I want this amendment adopted so that it may be known that it was not intended by the anti-aid amendment to repeal this section. I should ask the gentleman from Boston, the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, if I may do so through the indulgence of the Chair and the Convention, if I do him any injustice in suggesting that the anti-aid amendment does repeal this section. Does he want it to appear as a part of the records of this Convention, that can be looked at in the court, that it is not the intention of your committee to repeal that section?

Mr. Curtis: I think I stated the other day very plainly, and so that it could be understood by a child, that in my opinion the resolution now before this Convention was in absolute contradiction to the anti-aid amendment. If the matters contained in this resolution now before the Convention are already in the Constitution, then I say the anti-aid amendment is opposed to those matters.

Mr. Brown: Now, gentlemen of the Convention, you have got it. You have got it from the chairman of the Bill of Rights Committee. Just as I thought. I did not want to say such was the intention of the anti-aid amendment. In all fairness let me say what ought to have happened in this Convention. The gentleman who proposed the anti-aid amendment should have had the privilege of bringing it into this Convention and it should have been voted upon. Do you tell me that you have debated this anti-aid amendment as you have debated it and taken sides as you have, and that the people are not going to take sides one way or the other? Do you think they cannot read? Do you think that if you gave them in one amendment the words "wisdom and benevolence, piety, the arts, sciences, commerce and all the social affections of the people," to be encouraged and aided, and asked them to say yes or no on that, and also yes or no on the anti-aid amendment: "Nothing for anybody"? "Nothing for any religion; nothing," — do you think the generous sentiment of Massachusetts would say "No" on the first and "Yes" on the second?

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I think the gentleman has not read the anti-aid amendment recently. If he does read it he will find out that it does not prohibit the teaching of religion but does prohibit the teaching of distinctive denominational doctrines.

Mr. Brown: This good old Commonwealth used to hold conventions down in Plymouth County where my ancestors came from, and they went into grave discussions concerning creeds, upon righteousness and salvation or something denominational of that kind; but to me as I read it now it was the "whichness of the what," and is about the same when I listen to those who try to expound the differences between religion without denominational doctrine and religion with it. I can recognize the fact that a universal religion exists because there is a Giver of all good and it is an expression of His love. The Bill of Rights Committee said it was unanimous and therefore we should accept their amendment; give us what we have presented; do not change it. What is good treatment for one committee ought to be good for another. The Education Committee comes practically united, and the Bill of Rights Committee advocates the rejection of its resolution. I am opposed, as I have said, to forcing Massachusetts into a discussion of the anti-aid question just at this time when we need that she shall have all the power which she can exercise under the amendment proposed by the Education Committee.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: I was advised after a short but unavoidable absence from the session this morning that some question was asked by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) and that later some reference was made by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) to views that I had expressed. I understood that the question that was asked by the gentleman from Boston was substantially this,—I did not hear it, but he has restated it to me and I want to answer it. I wish to answer it as well as I can. The question, as I am advised, was this: If these two amendments are placed upon the ballot and both of them are adopted, would not an institution like Boston College, for example, be excluded from public aid? I think it would. It is excluded now under the anti-aid amendment from public aid. Keep that fact in mind. The anti-aid amendment excludes it and excludes all others, so that if it is adopted, even though the report of the committee on Education also is adopted, Boston College still will be excluded. I do not want this Convention, or the larger constituencies that we represent without the Convention, to be misled into believing that I ever wished to discriminate between any of these institutions. I want Boston College and Holy Cross College and Tufts and Amherst and Williams and Harvard all on the same plane; but I want Massachusetts to have the right to help any of them when she wishes and I do not want her hands fettered. [Applause.]

I tried to say the other day that I was not comforted by the thought that I was taking something under this anti-aid amendment from fifty private or semi-private schools in this Commonwealth. It is not my rule in life to comfort myself by the thought that I am doing harm to somebody else. Those institutions never received aid because they were private or because of their religion; they received aid because they were useful, because they served this State, because they became agencies and instrumentalities to carry out the advice of the fathers that has been read repeatedly to this Convention and apparently repudiated. I believe that if I cannot do all the good I want to do, I have no excuse for not doing the good that is at my hand. I want,— and everybody knows my views about it,—to see Massachusetts free, if it can be done, but not to agitate at this time, not to inflame the people with the matter of giving to all the schools, to give parish schools and all the rest, aid if they serve the State. Keep that fact clear now and hereafter. But I would not introduce a resolution to give aid to the parish schools. I would not introduce a resolution that would inflame this State, that I know would disturb this State when she needs all her strength.

I want to go further with this matter of the anti-aid amendment.
The gentleman from Newton said a moment ago that it was a mistake to say that the anti-aid amendment forbade or prohibited the teaching of religion; that what it prohibited was the teaching of denomina-tionalism,—the beliefs of the sects; and for that purpose, although in my humble judgment the Catholic Church is not a sect, but considering it that way, that would practically exclude the teaching of all religion. It would be a very short course, a very brief course in religion, that could be given in the public school under his definition, because he wants religion confined to the things that men agree upon. Men do not agree even on the existence of God; that is, it is not a unanimous agreement,—it is not a universal agreement. We could not teach even that without offending somebody. We could teach principles of morality, we could teach the substance, perhaps, of the Ten Commandments if we left out the first two, but we could not teach religion under the anti-aid amendment without offending somebody; and that is not its purpose.

Now, Mr. President, let me say in conclusion so that I shall not be misunderstood,—and I shall not arise again unless in reply to somebody who invites me to answer a question,—I would leave Massachusetts free to give to all the institutions in this State, public and private, whenever those institutions are necessary or helpful to Massachusetts. I will not take away from the private schools of this State, although there is not one of them that is a Catholic school getting aid,
—I will not take away one dollar from them, because they never have misused it, because they have used it for the higher, better purposes of this State. I refuse to withdraw it from them simply because the institutions in which I am particularly interested, as distinguished from those, cannot have aid. I do not want some one hereafter to claim that the Catholic attitude, so far as there is any Catholic attitude, is opposed to the giving to these institutions because it cannot have aid itself,—that it shuts the door on every institution. That is not our attitude, Mr. President. That is not the attitude, that is not the best thought of this Commonwealth. Soberly and seriously, when the time comes for deliberation away from the oppressive atmosphere that I am sorry to say has been found in this Convention, Massachusetts will do right. She will see that she is abandoning the wisdom of the fathers, she will see that she is restricting the counsel of the fathers, and I hope she will come back to it before it is too late.

Debate was continued after the noon recess.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: If it were only possible to come back to the simple merits of this resolution and drop all the extraneous and outside matters that have been discussed under the guise of it, it is very certain that it would be immediately adopted by this Convention. But it has been so obscured and mixed up with other things that it is very difficult for many to realize the real situation. It perhaps ought to be hardly necessary for me to say, and yet I think it is my duty to the committee to say, in view of what has been charged against the committee, that this committee has had no part in any scheme or any arrangement or any design of any kind or sort to defeat the anti-aid amendment or to modify or change it. The conference to which reference has been made I never heard of until I heard it referred to on the floor of this Convention yesterday or the day before. No member of our committee was present, and I am assured by a gentleman who was present, a member of this Convention, that this matter was not before that conference, was not in any way discussed there. It seems to me that all the suspicion that has been thrown round this matter in that regard ought to be dismissed absolutely from our minds if we intend to deal with this matter fairly and clearly.

There is one other matter which it seems to me has been greatly confused in this debate. Much of this resolution, the greater part of it, is simply the language of the present Constitution, and I think the greater part of the criticism that has been made has been made upon the language of the present Constitution which simply is repeated. The result of defeating this resolution will be to bring back the original Constitution. Nothing will be gained in regard to the various matters that have been suggested here; in fact, perhaps, in some respects the old matters will be stronger, if anything.

A great deal has been made of the point that the language has been used to encourage private societies and public institutions . . . for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, etc.

That language is in the present Constitution and we simply have followed it. Can it be possible that any member who will read that language understandingly can come to the conclusion that that is contradictory to the anti-aid amendment? The anti-aid amendment, if I understand it, simply stipulated one thing that should not be done in regard to these institutions, namely, public money should not be appropriated to them; but it did not provide that they should not be encouraged and aided in any other way. If that anti-aid amendment could be construed fairly as contradictory to the provisions of the Constitution that we should cherish education and that we should aid private institutions, so much the worse for the anti-aid amendment. We cannot afford in this Convention to put ourselves on record as saying that this old Commonwealth will not cherish education and will not aid education, whether it be private or public. [Applause.]

Just what did the resolution which the committee reported do? It omitted, as I said the other day, certain things which seemed to be to every one, so far as they came before our committee, unnecessary. It added the lines at the end of section 2, beginning “To this end the Legislature” — and I should like to read them, they seem to have been so misunderstood:

To this end the Legislature shall, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution, have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education which will afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development, and will aid and encourage all to become unselfish and loyal citizens.

I do not think, Mr. President, that there would have been the slightest objection to that language had it not been viewed with a distorted vision. That does not provide anything contradictory to the anti-aid amendment. But if it did, there is no objection whatever to accepting, which I understand the committee is unanimously prepared to do, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) by inserting the words "save as elsewhere and otherwise provided in the Constitution"; and also there is no objection to accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) using the same words in section 1. Now with those words inserted it seems to me that we come back to a simple educational proposition, a proposition which is desired earnestly by the Board of Education. The chairman of that board has urged the necessity of doing something along that line.

Gentlemen have arisen here and told how they desired to forward education and how they desired to assist it, and then they have moved to strike out the only progressive thing that there is in this resolution. It is a fact known to every educator that there are many localities in this Commonwealth where the people are poor and where the educational system is not what it ought to be, and it has been proposed by the Board of Education to help that situation and they have been met in the Legislature by the suggestion,—there is a difference of opinion among lawyers about it, but they have been met by the suggestion,—that it would be unconstitutional to enact a mill tax, that it would be unconstitutional to consider that there is a system of education in the sense in which it is now used; and they desire this amendment in order that they may help the poorer localities to a good education.

Can there be any possible objection to that, and can we afford in this Convention to take our stand against that principle of education equally for all the people? If there is anything in this amendment that is contradictory to what this Convention has done, pass this resolution and amend it so that it will be clear that it does not contradict. But if there is anything in what we have done that is contradictory to the sound principles of education and will not allow us to give education to those who are in humble circumstances and cannot get the money without the aid of the State, then in Heaven's name let us take back what we have done and help these poor people who ought to be helped. We cannot afford to let this Convention adjourn and take our stand against public education. I do not care what the reason is; put yourselves on record for that if you will. I will stand alone against that and I believe that the future will uphold me. [Applause.]

I do not believe there is any reason, any sound reason that can be given why this resolution should not pass. Gentlemen arise here and say it is contradictory to the anti-aid amendment, but they do not explain how or where, and we have then amended the matter so that it is clear that it is not contradictory.

Now there is another stage to this resolution, and if there is any reason which any one can discover that is worth while considering, another amendment can be put in that will make it perfectly clear that it is not inconsistent with anything this Convention desires to do. The committee on Education does not desire to influence the other matters in this Convention one way or the other, but they do most earnestly desire to take care of this educational matter.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 317

It has been suggested that if this resolution is defeated, we can later have another amendment to the Constitution to correct the error.
What are we here for? Are we not here to perfect this matter? Now the fact is this, that the Board of Education is not willing to go in and spend money and start a great enterprise and have it overthrown later.
They want to know before they start that the plan is constitutional.
And it seems to me that we owe it to the educational system of this Commonwealth to see to it that that is put right while we are here.

I understand, Mr. President, that there is an amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Newton, which has not been printed, which places at the end of section 2 a provision allowing the Legislature to exempt from taxation certain institutions. I would say that the committee have no objection to that amendment. They do certainly have an objection to an amendment which will strike out entirely the present resolution. The entire progressive value of this resolution is in the last six lines commencing "To this end". If that is struck out there is little that will be of assistance to the educational system of Massachusetts.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: I believe that if a stranger were to come in and listen to this debate he would be led to believe that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts had no system whatever for educating its inhabitants, that its school system was about to be thrown overboard, and that no provision is made for education of our citizens unless we make it through the endowment of private institutions. I wish, however, to call to the attention of the gentleman from Topsfield chapters 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44 and 45 of the Revised Laws of Massachusetts, which contain a most comprehensive scheme of education for all cities and towns in this Commonwealth. It provides for the Board of Education; it provides for the establishment of every conceivable kind of school, both common and high schools, and further it provides, in places where a town itself is not able to maintain a high school, that it may combine with another town and together maintain a high school.
The laws require that if a town of five hundred householders or more does not establish a high school, that town shall be responsible for the tuition of any boy or girl living in that town who attends a high school in an adjoining town. Such a comprehensive scheme of education in fact cannot be found in any other State in this Union. If that is so, then the cause of education is not abandoned here; rather it is fostered. In chapter 39 we find the scheme of a Commonwealth school fund, a scheme that provides for its enlargement from time to time and gives to the Board of Education the authority to use that fund in such a way as will best advance the interests of education. If that is so, what more do we want? Why should we go out of our way to establish and maintain private institutions?

Mr. Wellman: Is it not entirely true that under the statute to which you refer any grant of money to any one of these towns for a high school once granted is entirely outside the control of the Board of Education so that it can say nothing as to the conduct of the school?

Mr. Flaherty: As I read the statute those things are controlled ultimately, or rather the direction of the purposes to which the money is applied by a city or town is primarily under the control and direction of the Board of Education. The administration of the school, if it comes within the terms of the statute, is left to a school-committee of the city or town in which it is established.

Mr. WELLMAN: I should like to state that that is not the construction which has been put upon the statute.

Mr. FLAHERTY: I would call the gentleman's attention to the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court in the case of Fiske v. Huntington, reported in the 179th Massachusetts, where this subject is fully considered and where this scheme of education, this scheme of establishment of high schools by two or more towns, is approved. But apart from that suggestion, Mr. President, it is not a desirable thing for this Commonwealth, in view of what has been done and what shall be done under and by virtue of these statutory provisions, to establish, or rather foster, private enterprises, enterprises over which the Board of Education, on Mr. Wellman's theory, would have no control. It would be a private institution conducted by private persons for private purposes in which the public have no rights, where public money is expended. This is not the time to insist upon that. If we are going to discuss education here, if the proposal is to save education, what more do you want when you have such a comprehensive scheme of education as is provided for in these statutes? [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM H. SULLIVAN of Boston: The matter on which we are about to vote is document No. 309. A strenuous defence has been made of this document in behalf of education, they say; but it seems to me, in view of the question asked by the chairman of the committee on Education, that the fight here is made not for education but for the vindication of the Board of Education, which has harassed the Legislature for years, seeking to have increased the amount of money it is supposed to devote to education. The gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) says: "We have driven religion from the State, and now we are going to drive away education," and the delegates cheered his statement. Now let us be serious and practical. Let us read the resolution without any of this hysterical eloquence of our members and see what it means.

Some of our members have maintained with apparent seriousness that this amendment does not nullify the anti-aid measure. It is so interwoven with that measure that I feel you will forgive me if I, having been a member of the Bill of Rights Committee, say something about the anti-aid amendment. Certain people came before that committee who were considered bigots by some members of the committee; and believing the people who sent me here to represent them were opposed to any change in the law, or the Constitution, acting in their behalf I cross-examined the witnesses with fervor and enjoyed myself thoroughly. The second day I was advised by representatives of those opposed to the sectarian amendment that a compromise satisfactory to everybody would be brought forth from our committee. From the beginning I was friendly to the resolution we have presented; and when I was led to believe it was acceptable to the people of my district I gladly renounced my cross-examination and stood whole-heartedly with my committee, because I thought that was the proper solution of this religious controversy. Instead of cross-examining with aggressive bitterness I acquiesced in all the committee did, especially when informed by the district attorney (Mr. Pelletier) and the member from
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 319

Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) that every change, even to a comma, had met the approval of the distinguished committee who were in touch with us.

The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) says he represents the Catholics of Massachusetts, speaks for them and knows their wishes. I thought I represented the Catholic sentiment, but at the recent primary, because of the position I took, I was thrown into the political scrap-heap; and when I see the anti-aid amendment destroyed by this amendment I am left with no consolation for my humiliation and I cannot believe that my political sacrifice has contributed in the slightest to the welfare of my Commonwealth. A number of people who came before our committee sought to discriminate further against the parochial schools and the institutions of higher learning under sectarian influences; yet in our investigation we found that these Catholic institutions had received no pecuniary assistance from Massachusetts for years, while millions of dollars had been squandered by this Commonwealth on political and aristocratic panhandlers representing wealthy and powerful institutions. Viewing the situation not as a Catholic, but as a citizen of this Commonwealth who always has sought to protect her treasure from the inroads of the grafters, it seemed to me that if we could protect the Commonwealth from this inexcusable and lavish expenditure of money we could be of some service to Massachusetts, and so I concurred with the rest of the committee upon the anti-aid amendment. Does the anti-aid amendment proscribe religion? No, because our parochial schools thrive, and will continue to thrive, for we think enough of our religion to support it with private funds. We never have asked for any contribution for our religion from a public source. So if the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) thinks there is not enough public spirit in his district to support religion, rest assured that in my district religion will flourish without any assistance from the State.

To-day we are confronted with this resolution from the committee on Education. Does any man who reads that resolution intelligently seriously contend that it does not nullify the anti-aid amendment? Does the anti-aid amendment proscribe education? No, it says that education shall be controlled by the public authorities. Unlimited money is given to education, but only that education controlled by public authorities and not by private institutions. The gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) is in favor of this resolution because most of it was written by John Adams. The gentleman from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman) concedes that the most important part of it was not written by John Adams. Therefore the gentleman from Brockton loses his only excuse for voting in favor of it.

It has been pointed out that those who favor this educational amendment, so called, are the ones who debated most strenuously against the anti-aid amendment. The gentleman from Brockton says no debate was allowed on the anti-aid amendment. Surely there is some mistake, for the record will show that it has been a physical impossibility to prevent that gentleman from debating every question. It is said that document No. 309 does not conflict with the anti-aid amendment. The committee on Education contend now, so the chairman of the committee concedes, that the whole meat of the matter is contained in the last six or seven lines, which read as follows: "To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision"; — such provision,—"by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above specified, insure a complete and efficient system of education." Now under this resolution the door is open to all except the parochial schools and the schools under sectarian influence. The door is wide open to every other institution. The gentleman from Boston has an amendment which would open the door wide to all schools, the Jewish common schools and the parochial schools. If there are any here who regret their vote upon the anti-aid amendment and are anxious to set themselves right before their constituents, let them now go the limit. Here is the alternative. Something for everybody, or, as the gentleman from Brockton says, "nothing for nobody." Now, nothing for anybody, is the way I will put it. Then there is the proposition enunciated by the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney), "equal rights for all and special privileges for none." This resolution discriminates against the common schools or the lower institutions of learning under sectarian influence, but not against the higher. Under this amendment, if it is passed, Boston College and Holy Cross College can get appropriations if they are strong enough with the Legislature. Why not open the door wide? Why not be consistent? Let us take either alternative. Why not submit both amendments to the people and let them settle the question one way or the other, because if the anti-aid amendment is defeated by the people that should settle the controversy; on the other hand, if this resolution, this wide open amendment, is defeated, that ought to settle it. But let us not be led astray by any sophistry, no matter if so eloquent that it needs constant repetition.

If we are going to present the question fairly and squarely, let us adopt the amendment suggested here and give appropriations to all schools. It has been enunciated by various orators here that we ought to open the door wide to parochial schools and all schools. If there is any one here who is fearful of his position or his political future because of his vote on the anti-aid amendment let him now vote in favor of the amendment to open wide the doors to all institutions and to all schools, the parochial schools and Jewish schools, and submit that amendment to the people. That is the way to solve the dilemma. Thus there is submitted to the people the anti-aid amendment, which protects the treasury of the Commonwealth from the hightinders, and there is, on the other hand, the other extreme, the wide open door to everybody who has sufficient legislative skill and power to get an appropriation from the Legislature. That is the situation. There are some who contend that if we defeat this resolution, this educational amendment, so called, it will take away all encouragement from private societies; but we can encourage them without giving them money, we can encourage them with kind words, and that is all that they could receive were it not for these last six fateful lines.

The gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) in his argument has repeated practically all he said in opposition to the anti-aid amendment, and with that resourcefulness and delightful astuteness which is characteristic of him, when the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) in a most impassioned burst of hysteria said: "We have got to protect education, for we have driven religion out of Massachusetts," seized upon that utterance as an inspiration to develop a new line of attack on the anti-aid amendment.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

The chairman of the committee on Education has pleaded, with great vehemence, that it would be fair to say that there are some sections of this Commonwealth where the people are so poor that they cannot support schools. That question was debated thoroughly when their supporters sought to protect the poor little academies in the anti-aid amendment. Everything that has been said in favor of this educational amendment was said weeks ago against the anti-aid amendment, and the same orators said the same things. The gentleman from Worcester in charge of the measure has denied that if this educational amendment is passed the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, in which he is a professor, will be made eligible to receive an appropriation and thereby derive material benefit from this amendment. I do not agree with him. If this amendment is passed every school except the parochial schools, the lower schools under sectarian influence, can get appropriations of the State’s money if they have enough political influence with the Legislature.

Mr. Whittier of Winthrop: I should like to ask the gentleman whether, if we accept from the committee on Education those perfecting amendments, he can rightfully make his last statement. As far as the committee on Education is concerned, it can be shown, and I think it has been shown, that there are perhaps conflicting clauses in this resolution No. 309. Is it not possible to amend them to meet difficulties to which he refers?

Mr. Sullivan: If those amendments are adopted which have been suggested the whole proposition is nullified. It becomes simply so much waste paper, that is all. If we accept the amendment it nullifies the last six or seven lines in the resolution and the rest is a useless repetition of the present Constitution. That is my contention. Now, whether or not the committee on Education had any desire to destroy the anti-aid amendment, they are doing it under this measure if these amendments are adopted. But why not adopt the other amendment, as I suggested? Why not submit the question fairly and squarely? There is no doubt but that for years in this Commonwealth there has been a bitter, acrimonious, religious dispute about this aid to education. One disputation says: “We don’t want any money for our parochial schools.” The other says: “We don’t trust you. We are going to prevent your getting it.” And then some of our delegates say in debate: “We believe in opening the door wide to all education,” and in this educational amendment they have opened it wide to all except the parochial schools. If you want to present something other than the anti-aid amendment, let us present the proper alternative. We have submitted the anti-aid amendment to the people. We cannot recall that if we would. Now, if you wish to recant, if you wish to change, go to the other extreme and submit the two measures and see what the people will do. If you submit the two amendments, and one or both are defeated, then you have settled forever this religious controversy.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I want to put myself in a fair position with the committee on Education. Individual members of the committee on Bill of Rights may have individual opinions. I have known the chairman of the committee on Education for a great many years. I have known also some of the other members of the committee. I wish it to be distinctly understood by the Convention that I do not think the committee attempted to do anything which was not right and proper. I do not think that they tried to nullify the anti-aid amendment, although it is my opinion that their work as presented here in this resolution does it. I think it is only right that I should say this, as I have been asked many times if I had that opinion. I do not have that opinion, and I take the opportunity to say so. I do not say that some others did not know it, and I ask that the Convention place the responsibility for not knowing this on the committee on Bill of Rights. We should have known it. We did not know it. If we had known this resolution was coming what more could we have done than we did the day we found it out, namely, come in here and ask to have it advanced, so that we could argue it before, by any possibility, the anti-aid amendment went on the ballot? If we had known it at that time I should have brought in that same resolution at that time and have tried to discuss the two resolutions together, and I wish the Convention to understand that is my personal opinion, and I believe that it is the opinion of the committee that I represent. And now in a perfectly calm, cool manner, I wish to say to this Convention that they have heard the distinguished gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), the distinguished lawyer from Fall River (Mr. Cum- mings), the distinguished lawyer from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman) and others in this Convention say one does nullify the other; and taking them at their word, gentlemen, I ask you if you are going to calmly and coolly repudiate your own action of August 22 and pass another resolution that nullifies that one.

Mr. Walscott of Cambridge: When this subject-matter was first before the Convention in August I did not speak on it, although a member of the committee on Bill of Rights, because I knew there were more eloquent men in my committee who would speak for it, and speed is a desirable though somewhat neglected quality for this Con- vention to cultivate. As the question now comes up with resolution No. 309, and it appears that some members of the Convention, though I trust, I believe, very few, are about to change their votes on this measure, I desire to say the case is the same with me as with every other member of that committee. I do not intend to change my vote. I am as convinced now as I was seven weeks ago that it is an excel- lent measure in every respect and I am not prepared after this debate to change my vote in the slightest. The eloquent words of the gentle- man in the second division from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), which I listened to with great interest, seemed to me wholly fallacious, — fallacious in this way, Mr. President. He says that the policy of this measure, that is, the anti-aid amendment, if adopted would be de-structive to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Why so? Because, as he said to-day: "Fifty worthy institutions will fail to receive State money." There are probably twenty-five hundred other institutions, private institutions, in the State, of a semi-public nature, which will not receive State money. Why does he seek to preserve the present fifty and close the ranks against other equally worthy candidates? Does he think that the theory of paternalism is better than that of self-reliance? Does he think that a man on an allowance from his father is a more valuable citizen than one earning his own living? In my city of Cambridge there are two excellent private hospitals, the Cambridge Hospital under Protestant management, the Holy Ghost Hospital under Catholic management. Three or four years ago a city hospital was established. Neither before the establishment of the city hospital nor afterwards has either of those excellent private hospitals asked for any money from the city or the State. Does he think for that reason that they are not doing worthy work? Not at all. They have to make their standard an effective and efficient one and excite public interest and get confidence in their management. Does the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) think that the Massachusetts General Hospital to-day is any less competent, useful or efficient than it was eighty years ago, when it was given the use of convict labor by the State? It seems to me the fallacy of his statements is apparent on the face of them. Do we want an unseemly scramble before the Legislature year after year as to which charity should be preferred, whether local, perhaps sectional or religious? That is what they have in Pennsylvania. Is that the policy of the State which he thinks will preserve it? It does not seem so to me, Mr. President. It seems to me the policy of the Bill of Rights Committee is the one that will be beneficial to the State, and not destructive.

Now, then, Mr. President, there was another statement of the gentleman from Fall River which seemed to me equally fallacious, — the statement that it was necessary that objects should be capable of aid by taxation in order to be exempted from taxation. I think there is no basis for this argument whatever. In the same Opinion of the Justices (195 Mass. 608), of which the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Cummings) read only the second paragraph, it is stated in a subsequent paragraph that burying-grounds, Bunker Hill monument and halls of the Grand Army of the Republic, can be exempted from taxation “as properly set apart for uses that are quasi-public.” Private burying-grounds cannot be supported by public taxes, however, though they may be exempted from them. Why, gentlemen, the fallacy of the statement by the gentleman in the second division is proved by this test. If what he says is true, then since the passage in 1855 of the eighteenth amendment all exemptions from taxation to parochial schools have been illegal. If what he says is true, then since the passage of the eleventh amendment all exemptions from taxation to churches and religious societies have been illegal. The Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court in their opinion (186 Mass. 604) say:

It is true that the Commonwealth still aids churches or religious societies of every sect and denomination by a general exemption from taxation of their property (see Revised Laws, Chapter 12, Section 5, Clause 7).

There is no answer to that, I submit, Mr. President.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I believe that this proposition was brought forward by the committee on Education in perfect good faith, but I do think that sometimes matters are brought before us here, as elsewhere, which, with the best of intentions and having in themselves elements of virtue, are not wise when taken in connection with the setting in which they find themselves, and it seems to me that we here have two situations. If the anti-aid amendment should be accepted by the people and this proposition accepted by the people, there would be a conflict which I take it nobody wants. If they both should go to the people, and the anti-aid amendment should be rejected and this proposition accepted, then it seems to me there is at least a possibility of broadening the Constitution in a way which very few of us desire to have done. But it seems to me that there is one thing that we can do. When the anti-aid amendment was before us I think almost all of us had no doubt whatever of the right being left in the Legislature to exempt religious institutions and educational institutions and the others from taxation. I know that is the way I felt. I did not suppose there was any doubt at all, or I should not have voted for the anti-aid amendment. But the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), in whose judgment and wisdom we all have great confidence, and whose character is such that we know he would not suggest anything that he did not think was right, tells us that there is at least a possibility, a probability, a certainty as he puts it, almost a certainty, that the anti-aid amendment if accepted takes away from the Legislature the right to exempt from taxation. Now, if the gentleman from Fall River should be sitting upon the Supreme bench a year or two hence he probably would have the same opinion. And here is something we can do. We all want to have it cleared up; I say all, most of us, want it cleared up and left so that the Legislature may exempt from taxation these various institutions and churches. We want that sure. We want it stated somewhere, if there is any doubt about it, that that right still exists. If we adopt, in my opinion, the second amendment of the gentlemen from Newton (Mr. Anderson), printed at the bottom of page 2,—the second amendment,—striking out this whole proposition from top to bottom and leaving the title alone, that is all there is, just the title, and adopt his amendment saying that the Legislature shall continue to have the right to exempt these institutions and churches from taxation, we shall do something that we all want done sometime, and we might just as well do it here and now and have it done, because if we wait until some other time to put that in we may adjourn and summer may come and it may not be done. But here is a chance to do it right here and now, and it seems to me that that is a thing that is constructive and wise and desirable.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I should like to ask the gentleman who is speaking whether, there being a desire to get the anti-aid amendment this year upon the ballot, if we should order this to a third reading by adopting this amendment he suggests, it would not defeat getting the anti-aid amendment on the ballot this fall. In other words, there would be a third and another stage for this. It would be behind other important matters. Before we could finally consider it, it would be too late to pass the anti-aid amendment, and we would not care to pass the anti-aid amendment while this was pending. Therefore, in order to get the anti-aid amendment upon the ballot this fall, it will be necessary to kill this resolution.

Mr. Montague: It does not seem to me that that is so at all. The anti-aid amendment, I take it, probably will go on the ballot this fall. Now, if it goes with this proposition killed it certainly is gone. There is a chance to put this on with it and send the two together; but even if this does not go on the ballot this fall we have shown our intention, we have shown what this Convention wanted and intended to do, and that undoubtedly would have great weight if the other matter should come up before this finally got to the people.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: I need not tell the Convention that I am wholly in favor of the anti-aid amendment. I spoke in behalf of it and
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

I voted for it, and I would not for the world do anything to impair its efficiency or cut down its meaning. At the same time I am favorable to the proposition that is under consideration, and I want to see that adopted, if we may do so with perfect safety to the anti-aid amendment. The other day I offered an amendment which, I said, in my opinion would eliminate absolutely any conflict between the two proposals. That amendment was to insert in the twentieth line of the second section, or in the second line at the bottom of page 2, after the word "shall", the words "save as otherwise and elsewhere provided in the Constitution.", It seems to me clear that those words will eliminate effectively any conflict that there may be. I am asked by interests friendly to the anti-aid amendment to modify my proposed amendment so as to make it read: "save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution.", and I shall ask that the vote be taken upon the amendment in that form.

The resolution reported by the committee on Education was amended, as shown at the beginning of the chapter, and, as amended, was ordered to a second reading Thursday, October 4.

On Tuesday, the 9th of October, debate was resumed in connection with an order providing for submitting the amendment to the people at the next State election, together with other amendments which had been adopted by the Convention.

Mr. Creed of Boston: This is the first time that I have addressed this Convention: I have the honor to represent in part the Twelfth Congressional District; and while I have deep gratitude that all that district, every portion of it, and every shade of opinion, gave me magnificent support in my campaign for membership in this body, that with eleven candidates on the first of May struggling and striving for place in this Convention, they made me number two in that list and honored me with election,—while I am grateful to the entire district, my nearest and dearest love and affection is for the district in which I was born, and with which I have been identified all my life, the peninsula over there in South Boston, that district which has within its confines as decent, as God-fearing, as upright and as law-abiding people as any other portion of our Commonwealth. I know, and I defy successful contradiction from any delegate from that district, that I, who spend my days and my nights in that district and practically never leave it for any occasion,—and in every interest, banking, educational and charitable, my family have been identified and engrossed with and engaged in that district,—since the 22nd day of August have consulted the people of South Boston, have inquired their real sentiments and their true desires, and I know now that they do not want this anti-sectarian amendment forced upon the ballot at this coming election.

As for my own personal attitude upon this question, my feelings are so intense about the merits of this so-called Curtis-Lomasney anti-sectarian amendment that, to quote the words of a great President on another occasion, I would rather be assassinated upon this spot than surrender my conscientious convictions upon the question. And so, I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Fitchburg, and I am opposed to the amendment of the learned district attorney of Suffolk County.

There are two emergency resolutions that this Convention should place upon the ballot. One is the absentee voting amendment, because, as you know, it cures an unfortunate situation that has deprived theatrical men, traveling men, railroad men, from the opportunity of exercising their franchise in our past elections. But besides that it does a patriotic act. It gives an opportunity to our boys at the front to participate in our civil affairs while they are away on the duty of the country. And as for the public trading amendment,—about fuel, food-stuffs and commodities,—that remedies a constitutional objection of the Supreme Judicial Court, so that our Legislature next winter can cope with any unusual situation that may happen to the inhabitants of our State.

But any other amendment is an amendment that the people will at once ordain, and, if they accept it, incorporate it in the organic law. Why should we place those radical amendments upon the ballot this year? We already know that this year is known in Massachusetts politics as an off year in the election, and there is always a light attendance at the polls. We know that the last primaries, on September 25 last, indicate that our people, engrossed in the troubles and annoyances and perplexities arising out of this world's war, will give a light attendance at the polls in November.

Therefore, is it not wise, is it not proper, to allow these amendments to go over until 1918, and place them on the ballot when in all probability there will be a change in the office of Governor, which will augment the attendance at the polls; when the people, for the first time in three generations, in sixty-four years, will be proud of the opportunity to vote for a symmetrical, whole Constitution, as reported from this Convention? In addition to that, whether we desire it or not, whether it will be wise or not, just as in the dark days of 1862 in the Congressional election, and in the dark days of 1864 in the fight between Lincoln and McClellan, the people will discuss the questions arising out of this great world war, and the attendance at the polls will be increased largely, and there will be an opportunity, so far as that vote at the polls will be binding, to settle this question of the anti-sectarian amendment. I do not doubt that any considerable numbers of the Convention will object to the expense of issuing a pamphlet to explain to the voters, the 650,000 members of our electorate, what this amendment means. I am not referring now to the fact that twenty-one days have been set by the State printer and by the mailing company as the opportune and ample time to get an amendment before the people. We already have had an experience with a conflicting resolution. A week ago last Thursday I called to my seat in this body the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, the ex-mayor of Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), in my division here, and I showed him document No. 309, concealed in the documents of the Committee of the Whole. He was surprised. He had never seen it. He asked me if I had shown it to the gentleman from old Ward 8 (Mr. Lomasney), or the learned district attorney of Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier), and I told him that I had not. He called on those gentlemen. They went to the docket room and got copies of the resolution, and the next morning they called a meeting of the Bill of Rights Committee at 9.30, and you know the rest. They dragged it from the documents and we have had the consequent debate.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Now, in this pamphlet that will be issued to the voters, I confess I do not know how it is to be made up. I do not know whether in one column there are to be reasons submitted by the adherents of the measure, and in another parallel column the reasons by its opponents, or a composite column on both sides. But what I fear is that if we have had one conflicting resolution to the anti-sectarian amendment, in the hurry of getting up this pamphlet some paragraph will creep in there which may inflame the people of the Commonwealth, or it may be so misleading, so vague and so indefinite, that, delivered to the voters a day or two before the sixth of November, they will take it, reading it hurriedly, as an instruction either to vote for or against this amendment.

So I say that we should pause before we force this anti-sectarian amendment upon the ballot.

In addition to that, just before election, the first of May, I called upon my personal friend, the judge of the South Boston court, the Colonel commanding the Ninth Massachusetts Regiment, now known as the 101st United States Infantry, on duty in the trenches of France at the present time. I said: "Colonel, if it is not opposed to your discipline and your military arrangements, I should like to have you give a furlough to the soldiers of your regiment so that they can vote in the election for delegates to the Constitutional Convention." And Colonel Logan replied: "While my paramount duty is to look out for the military arrangements, I desire my boys, while they have an opportunity, to participate in the civil affairs of this Commonwealth." He gave them a furlough, and as a result, I told the candidates for local delegates, and automobiles were sent to the Fore River Shipbuilding Company at Quincy, the Watertown Arsenal at Watertown, and other places, and the boys in khaki came to our district and cast their votes for delegates to this Convention.

Do you think it is fair, do you think it is wise now, when those boys helped to elect men to this Convention, while they are away three thousand miles in France, to force an amendment which is a change, and a fundamental change, in our organic laws? And while this is a non-partisan Constitutional Convention, and while every one here lays aside his party allegiance before he crosses the threshold to come into this chamber, it may not be amiss to point out to those of us who, when we cross the threshold at the recess, will again resume allegiance to the Democratic party, that last Saturday in the Convention, in the platform of principles of the Democratic party of Woodrow Wilson, down there in the megaphone of liberty, in Faneuil Hall, they put in a plank which asked the delegates in this Convention to put upon the ballot,—and it was presided over by the ex-Governor in the second division,—to put upon the ballot the public trading amendment, the absentee voting amendment and the initiative and referendum amendment; and the Democratic party, of which I am proud to be a member, made no reference to the anti-sectarian amendment.

Now, I believe these reasons are sufficient, and all sufficient, so that the amendment of the district attorney from Suffolk County should be defeated.

But I believe there is a more serious objection to the passage of this amendment. One day last summer in debate in this Convention we heard about a resolution which was referred back to the committee on Public Affairs. That resolution concerned the conservation of the natural resources of the Commonwealth in which we live: I ask the gentlemen of this Convention to pause and weigh well whether they should not conserve the greatest source of power in the Commonwealth, the true unity of all our people. Two or three weeks ago we were asked to contribute to a library fund to purchase books and papers for the boys to while away their lonesome hours in France. Do you want the papers of this Commonwealth to be sent across the waters containing statements which may bring sorrow and anxiety to the relatives of either the adherents or opponents of this amendment? Do you want letters from the fathers and mothers, the sons and daughters, the brothers and sisters of those boys in France, to be written over there, saying that things are being said by one side and the other back here, by the folks at home? No; that is something that is not desired by any patriotic member of this Convention.

Now, I regret that my old friend, the gentleman from old Ward 8 and now Ward 5, is not here this morning, because he saw fit the other day to make —

MR. MANCOVITZ of Boston sought recognition.

MR. CREED: The gentleman heard my opening paragraph. I have not taken up the time of this Convention since June 6th. He need not worry that I will say anything concerning his colleague from old Ward 8 (Mr. Lomasney). I want the gentleman to understand that as I get older in life I become more mellow, more charitable, with less of the aggressiveness of the fighting race of which I am a member. [Applause.] But I would not sever lightly the political and personal relationship of a lifetime. My family, personally and politically, have been identified with the gentleman from old Ward 8, I think longer than the member who tried to interrupt my argument that I am making to this Convention.

I will cite one concrete illustration, and I know my brother-delegates will pardon me for bringing it into this Convention. Our family have had the honor of coming from the only legislative district in Massachusetts,—yes, they tell us, and I believe it,—from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that sent five brothers to represent it in the Legislature of Massachusetts. And every time, Mr. President, that we ran for office we were confronted with this charge by our political opponents: "Don't vote for Creed, because, while Ward 8 has two representatives, and Ward 15 has two, if you vote for him Lomasney will have three and Ward 15 will have but one." That shows my relationship with the gentleman from Ward 8. But when he saw fit on the floor of this Convention to try to chastise the band of nine Roman Catholic delegates who exercised their conscientious convictions to vote against an amendment which he fathered in part, I want to say, and I would have said it to him if he were sitting there, and I want to say it on the floor of this Convention and not in the corridors of the State House, that if he will select a time in his ward,—and I prefer his own Hendricks Club,—I will go there, while he is a giant and I am only a Lilliputian, and I will debate with him whether his resolution is or is not an unworthy compromise.

I hold in my hand a paper. It is the written account of a speech delivered in Congress by Hon. James A. Gallivan, on Monday, February 26, 1917. I will crave the indulgence of the Convention while I read you some short extracts from it. It is a speech entitled "The Nuns of the Battlefield," on a joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument in the Arlington National Cemetery, Virginia, to the memory and in honor of the members of the various Orders of Sisters who gave their services as nurses on battlefields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the civil war. In this brilliant speech Congressman Gallivan said to the House of Representatives:

And these heroic women who abandoned home and all the things dear to their sex, ... the ministering angels who gave the best they had to soothe the agonies and bind up the wounds of the victims of battle, — what of them?

Far from the clamor and glory of battle they worked in the shuddering shambles of the conflict's aftermath. Living amid the foulness and pestilence, working with a courage and calm worthy of the most heroic, they faced sights calculated to chill the hearts of the bravest. No patriotic service rendered by the best and the bravest counts higher in the estimate of Heaven than the ungrudging and unlovely toil the nurses of the civil war were subjected to.

Those splendid and heroic women knew no north nor south in their ministrations; they only knew the wrecks of battle were men and brothers, calling for their tenderest care and noblest efforts, and who, remembering the dreadful days and awful nights of the military hospitals established in the wake of battle, will deny these women the highest recognition a grateful country can give?

The nuns of the battlefield were neither of the north or the south in their ministrations; they served humanity; and their love and labor were lavished as freely and generously upon the wounded soldier in gray as upon him who wore the blue. They recognized and served all without distinction.

They have earned the title to this little bit of space out there among those whose hours of pain they lightened, whose dying hours they made happier and sweeter; and if there be gratitude among men and honor among soldiers, the boon they ask will be theirs.

Why did I read the extract from that speech? Because the first exemption of the Curtis-Lomasney amendment relates to the Soldiers' Home over there in Chelsea. That was a wise, patriotic, grateful exemption. I believe in doing all we can for the men who are enfeebled by disease, and disabled mentally by their patriotic service for their country. I desire to do anything, and I did it when I was in the Legislature, for the benefit of the men who walked by the steps of this State House with the Godspeed of the war Governor Andrew in their ears, going forth to fight for liberty and human rights, and to keep this Republic of ours, as our Supreme Court in Washington said it was, an indissoluble Union of indestructible States.

But, Mr. President, let us look into the future. Thousands upon thousands of the black-robed, white-bonneted sisters of charity and of mercy have volunteered to our President at Washington to do service on the field with our armies. Let us look further, and come with me, if you will, to the end of this fearful conflict; because there will be an end, gentlemen of the Convention, and God grant that the end will be soon. Then these sisters will come back to their communities, some of them impaired in their physique, enfeebled in their minds, on account of the privations, toil and disease that they have encountered in their work for their country. Let us assume that a grateful, patriotic people will gather together and by subscription build and maintain for them a home, the disability home for nun nurses; and then later the same patriotic, generous people of the Commonwealth will come up to this Legislature and ask them to appropriate money for the maintenance of that institution. Then I trust that those legislators of that future day, with intelligence in their make-up and with justice, I hope to God, in their hearts, under their oath will listen to the merits of that appeal and will grant the appropriation; and in the corner of this building I hope there will be a Governor, a chief magistrate, who will be actuated by the same noble sentiments, who will believe with Robert Ingersoll, that gratitude is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the human heart, and who will sign the appropriation.

Then what will happen? Under the Curtis-Lomasney anti-sectarian amendment ten citizens of the Commonwealth,—and I am not here to say anything incendiary, I will not say they belong to any organization, I simply will call them strict constructionists,—will apply to the courts, and the State Treasurer will be enjoined from paying out that appropriation, because a just, generous, patriotic Legislature will have no right under the Curtis-Lomasney amendment to appropriate money as a partial recompense to those women for the patriotic service they have done for their country.

On the 15th day of August I listened in this chamber to a speech by the gentleman from Newton. On that very day another speech was being delivered in this country. On the 15th of August, the very day the gentleman from Newton delivered the speech which was so ably answered by the delegate from Fall River,—who, I regret to say, is not here speaking in my place, but through the unfortunate affliction in his family, as he notified us Sunday afternoon, cannot be here until next Thursday,—the very day that the gentleman from Newton was giving that speech Senator Gerry of Rhode Island was speaking in the United States Senate. He was speaking to his amendment to the war tax bill, which exempted legacies to charitable and religious organizations from the operation of the Federal inheritance tax law. I regret that I have not the actual report here, but the gentleman from Quincy, the monitor in the third division, to whom I showed the clipping, will bear me out that I am substantially repeating his language.

Senator Gerry said: "I think the day is coming in this country and that the trend of public sentiment is that philanthropic, charitable and benevolent work will be better done, and is being better done, by private institutions, under the fostering care of the Nation and the different Commonwealths. Take, for example, the case of the Sisters of Charity. Is it not a fact that they do the work, giving one hundred cents of value for every dollar they get, in a charitable, benevolent, kind, sympathetic way, without in any way putting the stigma of pauperism on the people who receive it? And the day is coming in the Nation when that fact will be recognized, and when the private wellsprings of philanthropy will be encouraged and fostered by the Commonwealths and the Nation."

I have trespassed a great deal on the time of this Convention, on a matter that is not on the regular calendar, but I want to say this in conclusion. I earnestly appeal to the delegates of this Convention to vote down the amendment of the learned district attorney of Suffolk County. I ask it as a citizen who loves his native Commonwealth, as a delegate who never in his life, public or private, propagated any doctrine that created discord or disunion among our well-meaning people. I ask them, as an American citizen whose only hope is that when the word comes in France to advance against the common enemy, the militaristic element of the German Empire, that the relatives of the adherents of this measure, and the relatives of the opponents of this measure, in the ranks, like the men from the north and the south of Ireland, will go over the top together and crush and overthrow for all time the despotic, autocratic element that dominates and misrules the German people.

Now, in conclusion, as long as we have been referred to in debate as the nine Roman Catholics who voted against the anti-aid amendment, out of the 94 Catholics in this Convention, I appeal to this Convention as a Roman Catholic, a native son of Boston, and a citizen of Massachusetts, whose every emotion is permeated and suffused with, whose every fiber of his person breathes, unswerving loyalty, unshinching fealty, and allegiance to those two flags we all love so well, the emblem of our country, the Stars and Stripes, and the white banner of this beloved old Commonwealth,—I ask in the name of peace and concord, and the happiness and the unity of our people, on the threshold of our entrance into this world war,—to vote against the amendment offered by the learned district attorney of Suffolk County, and not to jam this amendment on the ballot at this coming election. [Applause.]

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: I was asked to present that amendment after I had presented the other one. I do not think there will be any disagreement on that. That is the little clause of four or five lines which says that the Legislature as heretofore may exempt social, educational, scientific and religious institutions from taxation. That is all it is. There is not a man here, there is not a voter in the Commonwealth, I believe, who would object to those four or five lines.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Does that amendment mean that no other churches which may arise in the future are to receive exemption? It says: "Continue." Does that mean only what we are now doing?

Mr. Pelletier: As I understand it, it gives the Legislature the right to exempt churches and other institutions as it has in the past; not necessarily only the present institutions, of course, but to exercise that same right and power as it has in the past. It cleans up and clears up any doubt; and I hope that the Convention will amend the measure of the gentleman from Fitchburg by adding also those four or five lines.

Mr. Brown: Can the gentleman tell how much each thousand dollars of valuation in this Commonwealth gave away last year, and how much on each thousand of the valuation does the exemption represent? I suppose the committee must have had that before them.

Mr. Pelletier: I cannot answer the question; and if the gentleman told me I would not remember it two minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. Swig of Taunton: I do not believe that this question requires the display of any eloquence, or the defence or advocacy of any political party, and neither does it require the waving of the Stars and Stripes, in order that the members may understand the proposition that is before them.

The only question after all that we have to consider is whether or not we shall adopt the order as amended; and that is a very, very simple proposition.
Very fortunately for me,—and it is one of the few fortunate experiences that I have had in relation to the faith that I profess,—I can look upon this question in a calm, dispassionate way; because I am not concerned, in a way, in the troubles that have existed between the Protestants and Catholics, except that as a citizen of Massachusetts I should love to see this question settled, I should love to see peace and harmony reign between those two factions of Christianity, I should love to see all of us living in unison and not to have any disturbing questions such as this question of sectarian and non-sectarian appropriations. And so I say that very fortunately for me, indeed, I can look upon this question in a calm way, unmoved by any religious prejudices or sentiments.

Now, the proposition is a simple proposition that is covered by the Curtis anti-aid amendment. It is something that will not need any great debate or deliberation by the people, because it is so simple that every voter will understand the proposition; namely, whether or not the State wants to grant money, public money, for private institutions. That is a simpler proposition than any proposition that will come before the people under this whole order.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the voters would be concerned as to whether they were giving away seventeen cents on each one thousand dollars of valuation or whether they were giving away $17 on each one thousand, and whether the voters are so far non-commercialized that it would make no difference to them.

Mr. Swig: I believe the voters will not care whether it is seventeen cents or seventeen dollars on a thousand; that their only thought will be whether or not they want to give public money, if only one copper, to private institutions. [Applause.] And that is the only question, and a simple question,—much simpler than the question as to whether or not the State should go into the public business of feeding and clothing the people, much simpler than the question of absentee voting,—because as the amendment has gone through here it provides for more than voting for soldiers and sailors. This Convention has allowed itself to be carried off its feet, just because the resolution gives the soldiers and sailors the right to vote. The Convention did not give the matter the consideration it should. And this morning another attempt has been made to do something we should not do under the guise of giving something to the soldiers and sailors.

Now, let us act on this proposition simply on the merits of it. Let us not allow those who have opposed the Curtis anti-aid amendment from beginning to end to use this as another means of injuring this resolution.

As I had occasion to say the other day in another respect, it seems very peculiar indeed that those people who were opposed to the anti-aid amendment were taking the initiative in urging another,—the educational amendment; and this morning those men come here and try to persuade you not to put on the ballot the very first bit of business that we did. Are we, the delegates in this Convention who have settled this question, going to allow ourselves to be influenced in any such way as that?

I ask you, Mr. President, and the gentlemen of the Convention, not to be moved by any such appeals as have been made here this morning; not to allow yourselves to be moved by any religious sentiments or take them into consideration; but do as I thought we were going to do when we came into this Convention, leave religion and leave politics aside, and judge questions entirely on our citizenship. If we do only that, I feel quite sure that every delegate here will see his way clear to send this question to the people at the polls in November. [Applause.]
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Mr. BLACKMUR of Quincy: I agree with so much of the statement of the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Swig) wherein he says that this is a simple issue. It is a simple issue, and I, for one, do not intend to go into the relative merits of the proposition, but simply answer the question as to whether or not this is an emergency measure. Because, apparently, we have agreed upon one thing, namely, that there ought not to go on the ballot this fall any resolution that is not an emergency measure.

The question as to whether or not this is an emergency measure is answered in the resolution itself. I refer to section 5, which provides that this amendment shall not take effect until the October first next succeeding its ratification and adoption by the people.

Now, Mr. President, in the face of that provision, how can any one claim that it is an emergency measure if it is not to take effect until a year from now, even though the resolution be adopted by the people?

One other fact in that same line. My friend, the learned district attorney in this division (Mr. Pelletier), says that the people of this Commonwealth have been surfeited with arguments on this anti-aid amendment. I rather think that the gentleman inadvertently stated the proposition incorrectly. It was not the anti-aid that has been debated throughout this Commonwealth for years; it was the non-sectarian amendment which has been debated, and which has been entirely understood to be the question for us to settle.

Now, Mr. President, there is a great distinction between the anti-sectarian amendment and this one, which is not only an anti-sectarian amendment, but is really an anti-aid amendment in conjunction with it. The anti-aid part of the measure has not been discussed and has not been thoroughly understood by the people of this Commonwealth. We have the very best of evidence of that because only within a very short time the head of one of the greatest churches in greater Boston came out for the first time and stated that the amendment as it was finally drafted and passed by this Convention was really an "unworthy compromise." That statement was made by a gentleman of great learning, a man of capacity and ability, and a man who is tremendously interested for his church in this question. That it was not made until recently, shows that there is much in this amendment that the people of the Commonwealth have not understood and ought to have the opportunity of examining.

Another fact. The gentleman who offered this resolution stated that we ought to sit here and finish our work. Very good. If we are to stay here to finish our work, Mr. President, what opportunity is to be given us to go out among our constituents and explain this anti-aid amendment? No opportunity whatever. The gentleman in the first division, in his speech made the very pertinent inquiry as to what form these proposed pamphlets would take, what opportunity would be given to the friends and the opponents of this measure as it was finally drafted to set before our constituents their views on this subject.

I believe, to go back to the first proposition, that there is absolutely no exigency here, no emergency, no reason to now send this resolution to the people. The good old Commonwealth has sailed along serenely for many years without the help of this anti-aid amendment. Is there any great danger in withholding this aid for another year? Considering the clause in the resolution which provides it shall not take effect in any event for nearly one year, I say "No." And I appeal to you, gentlemen, to let that amendment wait and go on the ballot with the other amendments at a later time. Give us an opportunity to explain to our constituents the full meaning and purport of this resolution, and if they adopt it we will all accept it and try to live under it, I hope, happily evermore.

Mr. Parker of Lancaster: I have been surprised and distressed, deeply so, when from time to time in the course of the animated and earnest debate upon the so-called anti-aid amendment it has been suggested that the resolution as reported by the committee suggested or imported any suspicion or distrust of the attitude or purpose of my Catholic fellow-citizens and brethren. Sir, if I thought this resolution had its source or took any impulse from such unworthy suggestion or conception I dare reverently to say that no one of my Catholic brethren would denounce the measure or discard it with more bitter scorn than I would. Because, sir, I believe that this resolution as submitted by the committee is evidence of most generous sacrifice of all temporal interests by my Catholic brethren, because they believe that through this sacrifice of temporal interests, they, with the rest of our fellow-citizens, are offering something for the secure welfare of their Commonwealth, I stand for this measure; no compromise, as I conceive it, of principle, but concessions of temporal advantage, of material interest, upon which is laid the sure foundation of the security for all time in the heart and thought of our people of this great question of religious faith, which if ever tainted or contaminated by temporal or material interests may at any time be thrown into the dust of the arena of political, passionate, or prejudiced controversy.

For these reasons, sir, briefly and all inadequately stated, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Boston may be accepted, and this measure, happily reaching, as I believe, the final approval of this Convention and of the people of the Commonwealth, may go for their ratification without delay.

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I rise simply to make a short statement. This resolution was introduced with no idea of any unfairness to any of the resolutions. I am as strongly in favor of the anti-aid resolution as is the gentleman who has just taken his seat; and I hope that the I. and K. will be so developed, so perfected, that I shall be able to indorse it as strongly as I can the anti-aid, and vote for it.

Mr. Pelletier of Boston: A statement has been made here that ought not to go unanswered on the record, and it may be that it has affected the opinion or judgment of some one here. Some one on the floor here has painted a picture of those returning from the front, particularly the Red Cross and sisters who come back here in a poor state of health, and has pictured their awful condition of neglect by reason of the anti-aid amendment. I simply want to say to that gentleman, and to every one here,—I hope they all know it, I hope he is the only exception,—that under the Curtis amendment those people coming back from the war can be cared for by the State in the most magnificent hospitals that are now in existence, or the State or any city or town can build and maintain for them institutions worthy of their wonderful sacrifice.

I thought it best to state this, because that attack is being made along the line that our hospitals will fail, that we cannot help the worthy and deserving. That is not so under the Curtis amendment. They can all be helped, the State can build and maintain special institutions for them; and that sort of argument ought not to be made.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: If the proponents of such a resolution as ours really want it put on the ballot this fall, why I think that the Convention ought at least to most seriously consider the whole matter. There has been enough debate on this measure, as far as the anti-sectarian feature of it is concerned. For twenty years the thing has been discussed in this State. And as far as the private institution side of it is concerned, the clear-headed gentleman from Ward 5, who usually sits in this division (Mr. Lomasney), put forth an amendment of this sort in 1915 in the House of Representatives. It was really a brilliant idea of his, something which now has formed the basis of this great treaty of peace, and it was discussed thoroughly in the Legislature of 1915, and that debate was sent broadcast over the State in the newspapers. And ever since, that matter has been discussed more or less all through the State at public meetings and in the newspapers.

I wish to tell my positive reason for believing that we ought to put this on the ballot just now. We gentlemen of the Bill of Rights Committee, talking to each other across the table, learning each other, learning each other’s views, beginning an era of mutual understanding in this State which we never have had before, came at last to the unanimous report which, when it was announced, was greeted with great applause in this Convention. That treaty of peace stands solid, every member of the Bill of Rights Committee stands for it to-day just as he always has stood for it in the past. We have, indeed, been attacked on both sides by extremists,—on both sides,—and it seems to me as though the moderate, liberal, solid men in this State must get together behind this great treaty of peace, against the extremists, and put the matter into the Constitution in such a way that we shall have harmony in this State. Now, just because of what the extremists have done, it seems to me almost necessary that we should put this amendment on the ballot in November, because if we are going to have appeals to prejudice and passion let them be brief,—let them be brief. If there is going to be anything disagreeable in this campaign let it be a campaign of three or four weeks at most. And that is the answer to the question about the soldiers, too.

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I should like to ask the gentleman from Newton if he believes that this anti-aid resolution will gather friends during this coming year,—I believe that is the greatest reason why it should be left off the ballot. If he does not think that the anti-aid resolution will gain friends during the coming twelve months, and if it will not gain friends during the next twelve months, will the people of this Commonwealth, at the end of twelve months from now, wish that they had not accepted it?
Mr. Anderson: I wish to say to the gentleman from Fitchburg, whom I acknowledge to be one of the best friends of the anti-aid amendment, and my own friend, that I have seriously considered that matter, and I do believe that on the basis of argument we should gain friends right straight along in this State, if it should be two years before it were adopted. But at the same time I see also that if we are to meet the campaign of religious prejudice and suspicion there may be such an amount of sapping and mining during that time as to very largely, if not entirely, overcome the advantage that we should have in leaving the matter off for one year.

Mr. Mansfield of Boston: From whom does the gentleman charge that the appeals to passion and prejudice would come, and in what form?

Mr. Anderson: I have repeated already in my speech from whom I think it will come. It will come from the extremists on both sides.

Mr. Mansfield: Will the gentleman be candid enough to explain to the delegates here whom he includes in that phrase as extremists? Does he include, Mr. President, the gentlemen whom he said he represented, in a speech here some weeks ago, whom he described as 100,000 noble Minute Men? Does he refer to the gathering of patriotic societies which met in Tremont Temple quite recently, and where I think the phrase “extremists” first was used?

Mr. Anderson: I am delighted, Mr. President, that the gentleman has asked me that question. It gives me an opportunity to say what I long have wanted to say but did not think it was quite germane to my speech to-day. I want to say what I said two months ago, that the American Minute Men are not an A. P. A. society. I want to say that they were not represented in Tremont Temple. I want to say that I never was an A. P. A. and that I fought against A. P. A.-ism in the city of Rochester with all my might, and I always shall. [Applause.] Of course, some of the A. P. A.’s, — or those who hold A. P. A. sentiments, for the A. P. A. is dead, of course, as an organization, — those who hold A. P. A. sentiments are a good many of them going to vote for the amendment, of course; but some of them are not going to vote for it. Why? Because they are bound to have just what they started for and nothing else, and are unwilling to compromise. Now, those men are going to be extremists, are going to inject trouble into this affair.

I wish to go one step further than I ever have gone before, in answer to the gentleman from Boston, — as I understand he is, — in the fourth division. I want to say that I do not believe in any sort of class or race or religious prejudice. I thank God that I have no race prejudice in me! I suppose that was due to my father and my mother, to the education that I received; nothing, I think, which is specially laudable in me in that particular. But that is the fact. I have no race prejudice whatever. And I wish to go farther and to say that when any race or sect or creed comes to have a quarter or a third or a half of the people of this State, — while I do not believe that the Governor ever should take into consideration any man’s religion or race in appointing a man to office, and while I do not believe that any voter in the booth ought to think of a man’s race or creed in doing his voting, nevertheless, when a race or creed has one-quarter or a third or a half of the people of this State, it is only natural and right and just that they should have a quarter or a third or a half of the offices in the State, if they are capable of doing the work which those offices impose.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: Does the gentleman from Newton believe that for the proper consideration of the anti-aid amendment by the people it is necessary or advisable to put upon the ballot at the same time the amendment or resolution for the encouragement of literature, or his resolution exempting churches and other like property from taxation?

Mr. Anderson: Again I am delighted in being asked a question. I had almost forgotten to speak of it, and I thank the gentleman for reminding me. When the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), in whose deep affliction we all are afflicted to-day, spoke in reference to the taxation of church property as being perhaps involved in the anti-aid amendment, he did not move the minds, I found out, of any of the committee on the Bill of Rights; he did not move the minds, I found out, of four-fifths of the lawyers in this Convention; he did not answer the learned judge from Cambridge, who sits in this division (Mr. Walcott), when he mercilessly broke down that argument; and yet he did raise a doubt in the minds of the people of the State, though not in the minds of the people here in the Convention, because it went out all over the State. Consequently, the Convention that votes by a majority of 192 to 62 to record their firm conviction that the Legislature now has the power to exempt from taxation, wish the people to reaffirm that, so that the popular mind may be altogether at rest in reference to it.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Would the gentleman favor placing the anti-aid amendment on the ballot if the amendment he is now talking on is not ready to go there?

Mr. Anderson: I think it is perfectly safe, even if this exemption amendment does not get to the ballot this fall, to go right ahead with the anti-aid amendment. I think it is perfectly safe to do it.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I have followed the gentleman from Newton through all of the controversy on the anti-aid amendment, and I have taken his advice in practically every turn that has been made. But we must part company on this one question, whether it is advisable to submit the question this fall, or whether it is better to let it go over. And in taking this position I wish to remind the gentleman that this committee on Bill of Rights, with their feet under the same table, discussing this subject from day to day, were unable to come to a conclusion on the matter in the length of time which he now allows for the people of the Commonwealth to come to a conclusion as to whether they wish to accept or reject this proposition.

But that is not my chief reason. My chief reason is this: That when the delegates to this Convention were elected there were two great questions before the people. One, as he states, was the initiative and referendum; and the other was the anti-sectarian amendment. And I believe there was as much, and I think I can say there was more interest in the anti-sectarian amendment than there was in the initiative and referendum; I believe that more delegates were elected to this Convention on that issue than were elected on the initiative and referendum issue and I believe the people of the Commonwealth understood the sectarian resolution very much better than they understood the initiative and referendum, for up to the time of the Convention the initiative and referendum had been argued only from one side, whereas this other question had been argued on both sides.

Now, sir, the reason I believe this resolution should go over is because the initiative and referendum in a measure affects it. If the people adopt the initiative and referendum, why, there is absolutely no use for this Convention to take any other measure into consideration, for the people will have it in their power to do about as they please from year to year after the adoption of that measure.

Mr. BROWN: Is it the gentleman's contention that the State shall do nothing until 60,000 people get ready to do it?

Mr. UNDERHILL: That is not my contention. I do not believe in 60,000 people doing these things, and the gentleman knows it. I am opposed to the initiative and referendum in any form, and I do not believe I have to inform the members of this Convention of that fact. I am absolutely in agreement with the gentleman from Newton in his anti-sectarian amendment, and I think the committee and the gentleman himself are entitled to a great deal of credit for presenting a solution of a question that has bothered this State for a great many years.

The resolution was discharged from the Orders of the Day Wednesday, October 10, and was read a second time.

Mr. Arthur H. Wellman of Topsfield moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the new draft cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. COOMBS of Worcester: I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee on Education. If the members will notice, they will find under No. 87 my name appended in a certain way as the proponent or sponsor of the resolution as it stands. I wish to disclaim all responsibility for No. 87 as it stands at the present time. If you will note, No. 87 as it stands at the present time is merely a substitute enabling churches and certain other institutions to be exempted from taxation, — an excellent measure in which I have the fullest sympathy, but a measure which has no place here, it seems to me, as taking the place of the very excellent amendment submitted by the committee on Education and voted down last week. There was discussion of our amendment which came in under my name as proponent. The amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee on Education to my mind is an amendment that should be adopted. I have no idea that it will be adopted. The temper of the Convention seems to be against incorporating into the Constitution as it may be revised anything directing in a broad way the encouragement of learning, literature, and so on. I think that a deplorable fact. Last week there was criticism aimed against the committee on Education, against me personally, possibly veiled in this Convention chamber, far from veiled outside. One Boston daily accused me of trying to put something over the committee on Bill of Rights in the interest of the institution with which I am connected and have been connected for almost thirty years. Another, not a daily, but a weekly, criticized our committee as playing into the hands of the committee on Bill of Rights, as trying to foist upon the people at the election the so-called sectarian amendment prepared by the committee on Bill of Rights. So that on the one hand our committee and I are accused of opposing the committee on Bill of Rights, and on the other hand we are accused of playing into their hands in order to administer a slap at a prominent and splendid part of our population. And here on the floor of this Convention, Mr. President and gentlemen, our motives have been attacked; my motives have been attacked. A week ago to-day or two weeks ago,—I think it was a week ago,—a member on this floor said that the committee on Education had smuggled words into our report, as though our report, laid before this Convention, subjected to the keen criticism of over three hundred men, could get by with those smuggled words. At the same time a member of this Convention accused our committee of being under the influence of the president of Harvard University. The president of Harvard University can stand on his own feet and speak for himself, and I will back his record against the record of that member of this Convention who made that accusation. We were told that our committee on Education were under the influence of the Board of Education, that we took hints and suggestions from the Board of Education. Why should we not, in Heaven's name? Do not other committees ask for support from people outside who are interested? Suppose we did ask support and suggestion from the Board of Education. I am not ashamed of it. We advertised our hearing; we asked anybody interested to come in and speak for or against the measure that we had under discussion. Some came in, some made suggestions; some members of this Convention came in and made suggestions. We welcomed them. We did the best we could to incorporate those suggestions into our amendment as submitted.

Now, Mr. President and gentlemen, I tried a week ago when I spoke here to make my position clear, to make clear the position of our committee. We had our meetings. At most of our meetings every member was present. At the last meeting two or three members were not there. I have no quarrel with two members of our committee who stood up the other day and wished to register their protest as a minority. They speak for themselves. I have no quarrel with them; but ten or eleven of our members are unanimous in bringing in our report. We had no idea of controverting or contravening the report of the committee on Bill of Rights. I wish, gentlemen, I had known as much about some of the things that went on at the time we were discussing that report of the committee on Bill of Rights; I should have said some things and I should have voted differently. I may say that I never have seen such steam-roller methods in my experience,—not excessive, I admit; and whatever I may have felt at that time, I regret now that my name is recorded as approving the report of the committee on Bill of Rights, and I honor the men who voted against it and I honor the men who since have spoken against it. And I may say further that I,—and I speak for at least ten members of our committee on Education,—appreciate the sympathy of the delegate from Brockton (Mr. Brown), the sympathy and the warm support of the delegate from Arlington (Mr. Brackett) who rose the other day and spoke in behalf of our report, the report of the committee on Education. We were accused of being actuated by sentiment,—by sentiment! Cut it out of the Constitution merely because it is sentimental! Well, there were 60-odd men the other day who voted that they would not cut it out even though it was sentimental. I have no doubt what I say will have little weight in the deliberations or action of this Convention. For my part I shall support to the last ditch the amendment submitted by the chairman of the committee on Education. It incorporates the substance of our original report. I defy any member of this Convention to show a single detail in which it controverts or contravenes or tends to upset the report of the committee on Bill of Rights. The saving sentence added at the end, it seems to me, clears our committee, clears this amendment as suggested of every suspicion. The report is there before the Convention; will you take it or will you leave it? It may be I have gone somewhat into detail in regard to my attitude toward the report of the committee on Bill of Rights. I speak for myself. I have not the slightest objection to the incorporation of the clause having to do with taxation. But, gentlemen, do you want to go on record as letting that go out as your idea of what should be incorporated in the Constitution as encouraging literature, and so on, that there shall be no hindrance to exempting certain institutions from taxation? I hope that you will give full consideration to this, I hope that you will give it full support. As I said, I have no idea that you will adopt it but, as I say, my vote shall be recorded for it, and I hope that at least eleven of our fifteen members of the committee on Education will be recorded for it.

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: Not being a member of either of the two committees which apparently have fallen into some suspicion of each other, and having in mind only the facts of the case, I want to speak in behalf of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman). I want to call the attention of the Convention to the ridiculous nature of the proposition which now stands before us with its great sounding title regarding "Universities and Colleges, and the Encouragement of Literature" and that one little measly sentence,—not unimportant, not unvaluable, but very small by way of comparison with the title,—that we continue to allow the Legislature to exempt from taxation property that is used for educational purposes. Is that really all that the members of this Convention care about education? Do they care about education so little that they want to repeal the charter of Harvard University?

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Does the member understand that if the amendment is carried in the form in which it is now proposed, chapter 5 of the Constitution as it stands now will remain?

Mr. Kilbon: I do not so understand, Mr. President.

Mr. Anderson: May I inform the member that that is the fact?

Mr. Kilbon: I am glad of the opinion of the gentleman from Newton, which I respect and honor. I did not read the article that way. If chapter 5 is to stand the objection is less serious, because chapter 5 may be left as an historical monument carrying with it the charter of Harvard University, which is its only practical value in the present day; or we may state, in a way which is perfectly safe and sane and serious, the present attitude of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts regarding education, which is that all our higher institutions of learning and all our means and opportunities for the education of the children of our people are prized by us and fostered by us; that while we do believe that circumstances make it necessary and wise for us no longer to carry on at the expense of the Commonwealth in any part institutions which are not controlled directly by State officers, nevertheless we do believe in them and we wish to continue them, we wish to encourage them, we wish that their rights may be maintained. And I sincerely trust,—for I am very sure that many members voted the other day under a misapprehension of the real meaning of their action in substituting words which they would have been satisfied to append to the resolution,—I hope, more than the gentleman from Worcester in the third division (Mr. Coombs) hopes, that this amendment may gain support which will carry it on to the ballot in the form in which it now stands, a form in which it cannot possibly be interpreted, it seems to me, to be in any wise in conflict with the anti-aid amendment.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I thought, Mr. President, the day this matter was under consideration before, that I had expressed for myself and for the committee regret that anything should have been said that would have impugned the action of the committee on Education,—anything that was said to make the Convention believe that they had done anything that was not straight and right; and I do not think it is necessary for me to reiterate that statement now. If the gentlemen will take the little book on the Constitution and look at page 58, chapter 5 of the Constitution, they will see there that the first and second sections are embodied in section 1 of this amendment offered by the committee on Education; that section 2 of the amendment offered by that committee is embodied in section 2 of chapter 5 on page 61 of this little book. If the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee on Education is passed, then resolution No. 87 is wiped out, no longer before the Convention; and if it is passed, chapter 5 as it appears in this little book is wiped out also. In other words, the amendment offered by Mr. Wellman takes the place of the whole of chapter 5 and also disposes of No. 87; and as we are now in a position to put No. 87 on the ballot, and as amendments can be made at the next stage, I hope it will be passed to a second reading just as it is.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: I think the last speaker unintentionally made a very strange error. There is no question whatever that this amendment does not in any way interfere with the taxation amendment. The language of this amendment provides that it is to be inserted prior to the taxation amendment offered by the gentleman from Newton. His amendment is not in any way disturbed. There simply are added to it the provisions which I have offered.

Mr. Curtis: I admit that the substance of No. 87 as it stands is in the gentleman's amendment, but I nevertheless say that No. 87 as it appears in the Orders of the Day would go out, and the substance would remain in your amendment.

Mr. Wellman: If other language is added to what is now in No. 87 I do not see that in the slightest degree the effect of No. 87 is in any way modified except by what is added. This amendment in no wise changes the provisions in regard to taxation; they remain in full force and effect as offered in the amendment of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), and I am in hearty accord with them, if necessary.

I should like, now that I have arisen, to call attention to the fact that in this amendment have been embodied all the changes from the original report of the committee on Education which were adopted by the Convention, and in addition to that there have been inserted, in order to make assurance doubly sure, these words:

No public money shall be appropriated under the above provision to any school or institution not under public control.
It seems, therefore, absolutely impossible for any person to imagine that there is anything left in this amendment which in any way, directly or indirectly, would interfere with the anti-aid amendment.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: In view of the provision in the so-called anti-aid amendment to take from the Legislature the ability ever to make any appropriation for institutions not exclusively under public control, why should these words be left in the amendment proposed by the gentleman,—the words "private societies and"? As the amendment now stands the Legislature is enjoined "to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences and all seminaries of them" and "to encourage private societies and public institutions",—the language being taken from the present Constitution. Now if the anti-aid amendment withholds from the Legislature any power to make any appropriations for private institutions, why leave these words in your amendment?

Mr. Wellman: The language which the gentleman quotes, as he is well aware, is the language of the original Constitution, simply repeated in the amendment which I have offered. It is general language which requires the Commonwealth to cherish these several private institutions. As I understand the effect of the anti-aid amendment, it is simply to provide that they shall not be cherished in a particular way, namely, by granting them funds. I did not suppose it was the purpose of the anti-aid amendment to say that the Commonwealth never should cherish private educational institutions in any way whatever.

Mr. Washburn: May I add that if these words "cherish private institutions" are left in the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee on Education, and if the people should adopt the anti-aid amendment, then the Legislature is left in this position: It is enjoined to cherish these private institutions under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Topsfield, and under the anti-aid amendment it is compelled, when these private institutions may ask for bread, to give them a stone. Does the gentleman from Topsfield see any inconsistency in this attitude?

Mr. Wellman: The committee on Education did not deem it within their province to reconcile with the existing Constitution the anti-aid amendment; but to answer the gentleman's question still further, it seems to me there are many ways in which the Legislature and the Commonwealth through the Legislature may cherish educational institutions without granting them money. It does not seem to me that this Convention would desire to go on record as saying that this Commonwealth, in any way, by granting charters or granting privileges to give degrees, never should cherish educational institutions in the future. It seems to me that that position would be so extraordinary that this body never would take it.

Mr. Washburn: This naturally leads to a second question which I desire to put to the gentleman. If this amendment proposed by him fails, I understand that the provisions of the Constitution of 1780 will still be left intact. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. Wellman: It has been so asserted recently upon the floor of this chamber, and I suppose that to be the fact. And I will add that I understand that whether or not this amendment fails the inconsistency to which the gentleman refers, if there is such inconsistency, exists. This amendment does nothing to change that inconsistency in any way.

Mr. Washburn: That is precisely my understanding of the situation, and I now proceed to ask the gentleman my second question, which is this: What improvement is to be found in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Topsfield over the section in the original Constitution?

Mr. Wellman: That was the matter to which I was about to call attention. At the end of section 2, on page 20, beginning "To this end the Legislature shall, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution, have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education", etc. That language is not in the present Constitution and is in the amendment.

Mr. Washburn: I am now led to make this further inquiry: In view of the language in the earlier part of the resolution proposed as an amendment, in which the Legislature is enjoined "to encourage private societies", coupled with the language which the gentleman has just quoted, that "the Legislature shall, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution, have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education", — if we read only as far as that, might not the careless reader assume that the Legislature might cherish private institutions by appropriations of money raised by taxation, and that the hope aroused at this point would be suddenly dashed to the ground upon approaching the succeeding sentence, which reads: "No public money shall be appropriated under the above provisions to any school or institution not under public control"?

Mr. Wellman: The gentleman is no doubt thoroughly familiar with the ordinary rules of construction, that the whole of a document or a paragraph is to be used in construing any part thereof. I do not think that any gentleman who uses the English language as accurately and carefully as the gentleman who asks the question ever would be misled by any such hope even if he read a portion only of the resolution. If he will note the language carefully he will see that it is "in conjunction with" these institutions, and the appropriation is not to be made to those institutions. The situation in Massachusetts, Mr. President, is this: There are these old private institutions which exist throughout the State, and no proper system of public education can be made without taking them into consideration. It is not that the State desires to appropriate money to them, but the State desires, in making its appropriations to the public school system, to take into consideration the existence of these other institutions; but there is no proposition that any appropriation shall be made for them. It is desired, for instance, that if in a certain town there is a school which takes the place of the high school, but which is supported by private money, not to appropriate money to that school but to appropriate money to the public schools in that town so that, in conjunction with that institution, the town may have a complete and perfect system of education.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

There is no desire in that language at any point to appropriate money to private institutions.

Mr. HERBERT A. KENNY of Boston: I want to call the gentleman’s attention to the words “To this end the Legislature shall, save as otherwise and elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited in the Constitution, have power to make such provision”, and so on. Now in view of those words I ask the gentleman if he would consent to an amendment striking out the last three lines of his amendment reading: “No public money shall be appropriated under the above provisions to any school or institution not under public control.” Would you accept an amendment striking out those last three lines?

Mr. WELLMAN: I do not know that I fully understood the question, but if I do the proposition is to strike out the words “No public money shall be appropriated under the above provisions to any school or institution not under public control.” If that is correct I can only repeat what I already have said, — that that language did not seem to the committee to be necessary, but it was inserted at the suggestion of gentlemen who were interested in the anti-aid amendment in order to make it perfectly clear that no money was intended under this language to be appropriated to any private institution, and that what was desired was that money should be appropriated to the public school system, particularly in those cities and towns where the poverty did not allow an adequate system of education to be granted to the people.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: If we reject this amendment the old Constitution stands, does it not?

Mr. WELLMAN: I understand, Mr. President, that it does.

Mr. LOMASNEY: Yes, sir. As I understand the gentleman, all this change is for the purpose of introducing these words in section 2:

To this end the Legislature shall have power to make such provision by taxation or otherwise as will, in conjunction with the local agencies and institutions above enumerated, insure a complete and efficient system of education which will afford to every one opportunity for full mental, physical, and moral development, and will aid and encourage all to become unselfish and loyal citizens.

You are using the rest of the measure for the purpose of getting in these words. Is not that so?

Mr. WELLMAN: That is not accurately stated. The other material to which the gentleman refers is the language in the present Constitution, and the matter was repeated so far as it seemed to be essential and the unessential parts were omitted. It is perfectly true that the language to which the gentleman referred commencing “To this end” involves and embodies the important changes which the committee desired to make.

Mr. LOMASNEY: Well, Mr. President, I will make a suggestion. If that be so why does he not leave out all the other words that are not material and come in and meet this question as we have met the other, letting the Constitution stand as it now is? There will be no question about it then. We then can discuss the seven or eight lines as to their meaning and we do not have to refer to the Constitution at all. Why would not that be better, to put the amendment in just as the gentleman from Newton did with his proposition about taxation, in as few words as possible? Then the ordinary man will understand what the real question is. When we bring the Constitution in and change words without changing the substance we mix up the whole matter, and I suggest to the gentleman to leave the Constitution alone and then we can take up this matter and change it if that be the right thing to do.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 345

As to the second proposition, "No public money shall be appropriated under the above provisions to any school or institution not under public control," if we pass this amendment as he wants us to now and it goes on the ballot with the anti-aid amendment, will there not be confusion, will there not be a conflict and will they not be saying all over the Commonwealth: "Vote against the anti-aid amendment (for this, that or the other reason), but vote for the other propositions and you will get the same thing," whereas as a matter of fact you do not? And you thereby put on the ballot something that will assist in killing the anti-aid amendment, which you claim you want adopted.

Mr. WELLMAN: It does not seem to me that there is any danger of confusion, and it does seem to me a very strange thing if this Convention has not the ability to reconcile a matter in regard to education which is comparatively simple with the anti-aid amendment in such a way that both, if the people desire them, can be passed. If this amendment is defeated it simply means that nothing whatever will be done by this Convention for the cause of education. It seems to me that sooner or later the Convention will regret that attitude, and it does not seem to me that it is necessary, in order to pass the anti-aid amendment, to sacrifice the cause of education. And I do not believe that when that matter is thoroughly understood this Convention or the people would desire that result.

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: I would ask the chairman of the committee on Education if he remembers that the answer made to me by the chairman of the Bill of Rights Committee is directly opposite to the assumption now made by the gentleman in the second division and also by the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney). The chairman of the latter committee (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) took the position that this section is directly in conflict with the anti-aid amendment and that the anti-aid amendment controls and abrogates it.

Mr. BALCH of Boston: I still am trying to grasp the thought of the gentleman who offered this amendment and I feel that it still eludes me. In order to find out precisely what his thought is I should like to return to the concrete illustration which he himself used. Take the case of the town which has a private academy hitherto used as a part of the public school system, and which also has public schools, — just what is it that the town can do under the language that the gentleman introduced that it could not do without that language? In neither case can it give any money to the academy; in either case it can give all it wants to the public schools. I fail to see what is meant by the phrase that the town can do all it wants to insure a complete system of education if it cannot give the academy any money and can give all it wants to the public schools.

Mr. WELLMAN: It is not giving power to the town; it is giving power to the Commonwealth and to the Legislature to authorize the State educational body, whatever it may be, to deal with the separate towns and cities and aid them wherever it may be needed by public taxation. This is desired by those who have studied the education of the State from the State point of view, where they see in certain parts of the State that the locality is not able to support adequately its public school, and they desire that the Commonwealth shall have power in necessary cases through its agents and servants,—presently the Board of Education, but if reorganization occurs, some other board would take that place,—to do that work. And this language will do away with certain doubts which now exist as to such power.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Mr. BALCH: That is a new idea to me and I thank the member for his explanation. Am I right, then, in thinking that the primary purpose of this amendment is to enable the State to step in and bolster up the educational system of a weak local educational outfit?

Mr. WELLMAN: The gentleman, I think, has the exact idea.

Mr. PELLETIER of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Topsfield a question. I ask it in all sincerity, and in all ignorance of the answer. Is it not possible for the Legislature at the present time to vote $5,000 for town aid for school purposes?

Mr. WELLMAN: The Legislature has done something along that line, but the power of the Legislature is in dispute; and it has given rise to difficulty which the State authorities in the administration of those funds have met, and it is to resolve those difficulties and make the matter perfectly clear that this amendment is desired.

Mr. PELLETIER: It does seem to me that we are going rather far astray. I think our friend the secretary of the board is responsible for it, because, after all, not one word of the Constitution, so far as the encouragement of learning and the arts and sciences is concerned,—not one word is changed by this amendment nor is one word added. I am going to say something that I hope will not be offensive. I only wish that in those last five or six lines the committee had adopted the plain, simple diction of the words preceding it and taken by them from the Constitution. We then could have understood just what was meant. I understand section 1 of the amendment is just as it was in the Constitution except that other colleges and universities besides Harvard are added and that certain matters pertaining to Harvard are wiped out, including certain rights of the Legislature. I understand that section 2 is the exact wording; every word in favor of education in the Constitution is here verbatim, and as the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) has said, really the one thing before us is the five or six lines at the end of section 2. I am nonplussed, as he was, as to why this committee did not bring in a section 3, and, if they want to give the Board of Education greater power or the Legislature greater power, why it is not stated in plain language under a separate section. Why mix up what appears to be a new question with that old definition of love and encouragement of education? Why mix up a money proposition with those lovely words of the old Constitution? It has resulted in perplexity here; we do not know and we do not understand now what those words mean. I can read from those words that the Board of Education may have money appropriated to it under which it might have a hold on the public library of Boston; under which it might gain a hold and grasp upon dairies which are run by different counties,—the publicly run dairy of to-day. I can see the Board of Education getting appropriations for all these things mentioned above, "to encourage arts and sciences", and behold, without naming the body, we suddenly have created a mammoth institution which is like some of the foundations built on money that have been established in New York; we find a power created in this State that we little dreamed of, and that will be given here and nobody knows it. The Board of Education is not mentioned, but if that is not given the power, some other board will be created by the Legislature and given millions of dollars a year to dispose of like the Carnegie Foundation or the Rockefeller Foundation here and there where the arts and sciences are needed, provided its beneficiaries are already under public control.

Now I do not think anybody here wants to go as far as that. The gentleman from Topsfield has answered me by saying that the Legislature, under the law to-day, can appropriate $5,000 or $10,000 for town aid. He says there has been some difficulty. We do not know what that difficulty was. Let us guess, if that is permissible in such a dignified body. My guess is that the Board of Education has had a row with some town committee. My guess is that the Board of Education wanted to run things and the town committee thought they knew something and opposed the State board running its schools, and wanted to have things their way. The Board of Education, as I understand it, has the right to lay down certain standards for education for a town to follow, but not to manage or run local schools; but who shall say that that is enough to justify this amendment? And, Mr. President, coming down to real bare facts, is not the most criticized form of legislation to-day that which tacks on at the end of it "All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed"? That is a lazy man's form of legislation and never should appear in the organic law. And if we must say "save as elsewhere provided and elsewhere prohibited," we are putting into the organic law something that we always are trying to evade and avoid in statute law. We have been appointed to codify the Constitution and here we are saying to the people: "Don't follow this; be careful; beware; look over the whole Constitution and see if there is not something somewhere that will change your point of view." Have we reached that stage in law-making that we must say to the people: "We do not know exactly what is against this or what this is against, but we think there is some 'Nigger in the woodpile'; it is up to you to look out"? That is what we are doing here.

Again, the last three lines which the gentleman on my right (Mr. Kenny) has asked to have struck out; of course they should be struck out. Are we going to enact into the organic law surplusage, insert clauses to please some doubting Thomas, lines that he who runs may read as being simply no addition to the sense, adding nothing to the law? It seems to me that we are not here to adopt an amendment of this kind; that it is not clear; that it simply is befogging the situation as it now rests regarding literature, the arts and sciences. We do not know what it means. The words are capable of a hundred different kinds of construction and it is bad and absolutely forbidden under the best canons and rules regarding the organic law.

Mr. Samuel L. Powers of Newton moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end of the article of amendment the following:

The Legislature shall have power to pass laws promoting the sound development of the public school system of the State, and to raise money therefor by taxation. No public money, however, shall be appropriated under the above provision to any school or institution not under public control.

Mr. Powers: It seems to me the difficulty with the Convention this morning is that we are in a quarrel as to what language means. We are discussing what the language meant that was adopted by the Convention of 1780. Now my proposition is to let that old chapter 5 of the Constitution with its beautiful language paying tribute to the great university across the Charles,—let that all stand. It has historic value. But we in these days are dealing with things along practical lines. My proposition is that we give authority to the Legislature to make appropriations for public education with the proviso that all money appropriated for public education shall be under public control. If you choose to add to that the further provision with reference to the taxation, why, I should have no objection to that. But I feel that this amendment which I have offered is an amendment that absolutely clears up the situation. The controversy that has been going on between the committee on Bill of Rights and the committee on Education has got down to the question of quibbling over language, and my purpose in offering this amendment is to make it so absolutely plain that the chairman of the committee on Education and the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights will agree that there is no ambiguity; that it simply leaves the Legislature to make appropriations of money for public education under public control.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I think in the first place that the amendment offered by the last speaker (Mr. Powers of Newton) conflicts with the amendment that I offered and therefore I think it ought not to be adopted by this body. The purpose of the last speaker in bringing in his amendment is to nullify all hope of settling this very difficult question. Now we all know, if we are not trying to deceive ourselves, that this Convention will adjourn and we shall sit here another summer. We might as well face that fact. Now this anti-aid amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), is going to be overwhelmingly defeated at the polls. I represent perhaps the strongest Democratic ward in the city of Boston and they are unanimous that it is the worst bungle ever perpetrated by any legislative or deliberative body. Now the chairman of the committee on Education, it seems to me, has not been treated with respect. Why did the anti-aid people rush in here so quickly? Why did the gentleman from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney), with the tremendous acquaintance he has, the tremendous power he has,—why did he bring in the anti-aid amendment the first thing and set the members against each other upon a religious subject? Why did they not let us work? Why was not the committee on Education entitled to have as fair a show as the Bill of Rights Committee? Why did the powerful gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) and the powerful politician from Ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) amalgamate their forces and steam-roller this anti-aid amendment through? My distinguished friend from South Boston in the first division (Mr. Creed) has explained to you thoroughly the attitude of the people of South Boston. I explain to you the attitude of the people of Roxbury. The anti-aid amendment is going to be defeated.

Now is it not much better, gentlemen,—is it not much better to let us face this issue, put on the ballot both propositions, because the next vote will put on the measure suggested by the Education Committee? Now we shall save time; we shall save time of this Commonwealth, we shall conduct only one campaign, whereas we shall be obliged to conduct two if we do not put them both on at once. On the grounds of utility, on the grounds of practicability, the Education Committee should be listened to. The Democratic party of Boston,—not the party of Ward 5, because there is a tremendous foreign element not voting down there [laughter],—the Democratic party of Boston wants to see fair play. It wants to see the Education Committee given a show and not steam-rollered out of this question. What are we thinking of? The gentleman from Ward 5 gets up and says: "Why don't the Education Committee put in simple words and not refer to the Constitution?" Does he not know the Constitution? Do not these gentlemen of the anti-aid who are in charge of this anti-aid amendment know what the Constitution is? Now, gentlemen, let us not have two campaigns in Massachusetts. Let us not keep this religious fight going on for years. When this anti-aid amendment, as I said, is defeated at the polls this fall, this Convention will face an issue of framing a new measure to go before the people, and then the Bill of Rights Committee will crawl on their hands and knees to the committee on Education. Now, why should they not at this time take advantage of the wisdom of the committee on Education? Why could they not allow that amendment offered by the committee on Education? They talk about bigotry! Who is more bigoted than the committee on Bill of Rights? Who tries to throttle debate more than the men on the Bill of Rights Committee? They are organized, thoroughly organized, versed in politics, versed in political machinery; whereas the committee on Education are gentlemen of refinement, students [laughter], not accustomed to practical politics, not accustomed to that kind of ward politics, but living rather in that lofty, inspiring and altruistic air where the sunlight of Heaven touches the top of the mountain. And in that atmosphere, gentlemen, this committee on Education has inspired this amendment, and it is the worst kind of bigotry from my friend the district attorney on my left (Mr. Pelletier), and my companion for life, and the worst kind of bigotry from the gentleman from Ward 5, to steamroller that committee on Education. Gentlemen, they will take their hats off to the committee on Education when the democracy of Massachusetts kills this anti-aid amendment and leaves education upon our statute-books rather than wipe out education for the satisfaction of some political ambition of which now we do not know.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 349

Mr. HALL of North Adams: I want to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that on June 26 I introduced a resolution, No. 157, which reads as follows:

The Legislature shall have power to determine the organization of the school system, supported in whole or in part by the State, and to raise, by taxation or otherwise, money for the support of the same.

I had a good reason for this. Having studied the Constitution pretty carefully, I found, as a certain newspaper reporter expressed it, not a —— thing in it about the public school system. I therefore felt that we ought to put something about the public school system into the Constitution. My resolution was modified by the Board of Education, not entirely with my consent, and you have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers). I am ready to second the motion presented by my friend Mr. Powers, for it covers the point I wanted to make.

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: There is something here that has not been touched upon at all by the committee, and which to me has been the important point. It is so much of the anti-aid resolution and this resolution as relates to the arts, sciences, commerce and agriculture. In the anti-aid amendment, as we discussed it in the Committee of the Whole, it says,—"or any other institution." Therefore you have before you a proposition that no institution concerned in agriculture, commerce, manufacture, etc., is to receive any public aid except it is under public control. That, I understand, is this anti-aid amendment. The next thing I want to call attention to is that nobody asked for the prohibition to which I refer. There is not a resolution introduced into this body asking for that particular proposition. The nearest to it is the anti-sectarian proposition. Thereupon the Bill of Rights Committee introduced the broad proposition that nobody should receive any aid.

Let me call your attention to another fact. I asked a question of two of the members of the committee on Bill of Rights, who have been so loyal to their measure, and this was the question: Would it make any difference as to whether the amount of money that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is giving away is seventeen cents or seventeen dollars? One member in this division (Mr. Pelletier) replied: "No;" and he did not care, and he had not thought as to how much it was. The member in the first division (Mr. Swig), said: "No, I don't care; it is a matter of principle." Very well. We will suppose then that they support this matter before the people on the question that it is a matter of principle; and what is the principle that is involved? That no money shall be paid out to any institution unless it is under public control. As I figure it, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been so munificent in her donations that lately she has given about seventeen cents on each one thousand dollars of valuation to the end that she might foster and cherish education, benevolence, philanthropy, agriculture, and other undertakings and institutions. I make this figure by a hurried glance at the report which was given to us by the commission to compile data for the Constitutional Convention. In the report of the Tax Commissioner is a list of tax exemptions. The valuation of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is found in the manual of the General Court of various dates. Therein can be traced the growth of the wealth of Massachusetts as compared with the liberality of its donations for these propositions. In 1871, for instance, the Commonwealth was giving a much larger per cent on each one thousand; there was no complaint then; wealth has increased to the thousands of millions at the present time; and the amount of donations, if you relate it to the total wealth, is trifling.

If it is a matter of principle, and nothing but principle, if, as proposed, nothing is to be given to these institutions in the future directly, by what consistency under that principle do you give it to them indirectly by exemption from taxation? Should they be exempted from taxation up to the starving point? And if they need one dollar to continue their existence will you let them die because you cannot give them that extra dollar? Is that the position in which the Commonwealth should be placed? How long will it take people to discover that in principle there is no difference between donations made directly and those made indirectly? From the standpoint of those who favor the anti-aid amendment the presentation of this principle is a dangerous proposition.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

A member said to me: "Mr. Brown, where do you find the Websters in this Convention? Where do you find the Banks and the Wilson of 1850?" I had not time to finish an answer and to draw comparisons; but I might say that so far, as to the domineering spirit that was exhibited in 1820 or 1850, you find it in the Websters that are on the Bill of Rights Committee. [Laughter.] We were not given sufficient time to debate the question. We were told in effect: Now, gentlemen, we have thought this all over, we have got this all agreed upon, the newspapers have handed us down a certificate of character, as having earned our money by this one proposition. Gentlemen, you often have been bothered, you who are running for office, by this question of donations to institutions. If you voted one way while you were in the Legislature, there was one set of people who went out in the dead of night with a red lantern to knife you; and if you voted the other way there was another set of people who went out and knifed you in the day time, and you have had a hard time, sailing stormy political seas. Now all you have got to do is to swallow your pill without looking at it, and hereafter your political future will be free from this strife; take this anti-aid amendment and be happy. [Laughter.]

Now, that is precisely what happened, and everybody swallowed it. All thought they had got rid of their political difficulties if they intended to run for office. No more would this A. P. A. spirit call them to account; no more would the Church spirit feel it had been offended and slashed because it did not get this, that, or the other! That is what you think you have settled. Do not deceive yourselves; it is not settled.

Now, the committee on Education comes forward with its resolution. Well, I do not want to disguise what I think is the effect of it on the anti-aid amendment. I agree with the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights. If we enact two propositions at one and the self-same time, of course it gives some effect to both. If we defeat this resolution of the committee on Education and enact the anti-aid amendment, it further limits if it does not abrogate the present section 2 of chapter 5, because chapter 5, section 2, was first amended by the amendment known as amendment XVIII. That was a limitation upon that second section of chapter 5. Then comes the present Bill of Rights Committee and makes a further limitation. What is that further limitation? It is not alone educational. Much of your debate, practically nine-tenths of it here, has ranged round the idea of how this will affect education and religion. My objection is outside of that. How will it affect charity, commerce, arts, sciences, manufacture and the trades? I hold we place a complete limitation on these undertakings unless this second amendment now proposed is adopted. But if we adopt this second section of the amendment offered by the committee on Education, if we reënact this section which relates to arts, sciences, trade and manufacture, my opinion is that it qualifies the anti-aid amendment to such an extent that these other institutions, agriculture, etc., may be helped by the Legislature, and that is what I advocate. The educational amendment will carry the anti-aid amendment through; because the people, if they feel the one hand is harsh, will feel the other hand is designed to modify it. Thus the two come up together, and, as has been said by the lawyers here, the courts will construe them together, and that is what I advocate.

What would have happened if at the time you were considering the resolution from the Bill of Rights Committee you had also before you the resolution of the committee on Education? You might have changed your attitude on the anti-aid amendment. That is shown in the recent vote. There were only twenty-five against the Bill of Rights resolution; there were seventy the other day against the demand of the Bill of Rights Committee, because the committee on Education asked you to change position and seventy men did change. Because of the proverb which says that wise men change their minds sometimes, and this Convention is composed of wise men, I urge the acceptance of the resolution of the committee on Education. I have faith in the gentleman from Fall River. As he presented his views, they are much broader than those of the gentleman from Ward 5, for whom also I entertain a profound respect from my acquaintance and intimate knowledge of him for thirty-three years. The gentleman from Fall River says: It is the position of my Church that we do not care that this money has been given to other institutions. We see only that it is the cause of education or benevolence in its oneness, and we do not analyze beyond it, and we are willing that the Commonwealth shall make such donations. We never have asked, he says, for any aid for our schools; on these grounds he urged you to vote for this amendment. I am sorry that there creeps into my mind a suspicion that the halo that a temporary newspaper paragraph throws over their heads, that they have unified the Convention and the Commonwealth, is too much for them. I believe with the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Herbert A. Kenny) that the people will understand that it is an anti-aid amendment, and that nobody asked for it, that undertakings which have done such great good to the Commonwealth are hereafter to be denied assistance; that the Commonwealth's right arm, in the way of helping benevolence, piety, charity, arts, trades, commerce, etc., is to be stricken from it, and therefore they will reject the anti-aid amendment. What valid objection is there to this resolution of the Education Committee which provides certain powers subject to the anti-sectarian amendment?

We do not know, with conditions changing around us, how long before we may need this provision now endangered. Seed sometimes lies in the ground a long time before it germinates to exemplify the power that governs the seed.

Gentlemen, you cannot believe that the power that surrounded the men who made this Constitution, the power who we hope has selected this State and these United States for the fulfilment of prophecy,—you cannot believe that this section was placed there without purpose. It has not been much used; it has not been abused. Can we not leave it there? I urge that you do that, and I thank you for the attention which you have given me. [Applause.]

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I want to apologize to the Convention for taking so much of their time; I want to confine myself to facts. To hear the gentlemen talk here you would believe that Massachusetts has been doing nothing for education. Have we not got in front of the State House a statue of Horace Mann? Was he not a Massachusetts man? Have we not been going all over the world showing what we have done for education in Massachusetts? At all the expositions have we not made a pretty good showing when we have submitted exhibits of what Massachusetts has done in the line of education? Have we been doing all that illegally? Of course not, Mr. President. You will find it right in section 2, chapter 5 of the Constitution,—public schools and grammar schools in the towns are authorized to do all these things; and the Supreme Judicial Court has so ruled, and Attorney-General Knowlton has stated, that those schools and those institutions, and all that, are lawful. Now, that clearly is the history of the past.

We can do all these things now. We have been doing them for years. Why, Mr. President, here is the report of the Auditor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for 1916, page 184:

General Education (Aid to Certain Cities and Towns).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Amount</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>School superintendents in small towns</td>
<td>$81,000.00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>High school tuition</td>
<td>$80,000.00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transportation of high school pupils</td>
<td>$30,000.00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Premium on securities, Massachusetts School Fund</td>
<td>$5,000.00</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total: $196,000.00

We expended, according to the Auditor’s report, $196,000 last year. That money was not applied illegally. The Attorney-General would not have allowed that to be done. That has been done, and they have given money to the cities and towns all over the State where it was needed. And upon whose suggestion do you suppose they did it? Upon the suggestion of the Board of Education. When the committee on Ways and Means are considering the appropriation bill they bring the Board before the committee, just the same as they do the superintendents of the different institutions. They ask: “What are your needs, what can you get along with, where can you do the best work with the money, what towns need it the most?” And the committee take their viewpoint, and put it into the appropriation bill; and they do it in accordance with the Constitution and the laws, and they have been doing it since our government was established.

Now, Mr. President, that is the fact. We finally have driven the committee,—I do not want to say that word offensively,—we have made the committee on Education admit that the meat of their resolution was in those seven or eight lines. Then I made a suggestion that we get down to facts and put that concrete proposition before the body. The gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers), to whose ability I will testify, is a man capable of drawing a resolution. What has he done? He has given us another anti-aid amendment. He wants to put two anti-aid amendments on the ballot. Do you want two anti-aid amendments on the ballot? I think not. One is enough.

With the two on the ballot the question would be, not as to the principle, but which would do the least and which would do the most and then there would be confusion and conflict of opinion.

In my opinion, it is presumption for any individual to rise here, and, under the sanctity of his oath, say he represents the Catholic people of the State more than any other man, or that any man should stand up here and say that he represents the Democratic Party or the Republican Party of the State more than any other man. No one has a right to take any such position. I do not think any man of intelligence would take such a position, except that in the heat of debate a man sometimes says things that he otherwise would not say.

Now, just a word on the anti-aid matter. I do not like to go into it.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE.

Men say we have had no discussion on it. Why, it has been debated in this State for years; it has been with us underground and above-ground. One party in this State is in such a position that it cannot nominate a man because he is of one religious belief, and the other party in the State is in a position that it cannot nominate a man because he is of another religious belief. All through the State honest and capable men have been defeated for voting as they believed on this proposition, and the Legislature has had this proposition before it many times.

I want to say right here I have found no fault with the nine Catholics who voted against the anti-aid amendment. Why should I? These men had the right to do as God Almighty indicated to them what their duty was, just the same as you, I, or anybody else. Every man has the same rights here. I did not criticize them for it. I mentioned the fact, but I made no criticism of it. No man has a right in this Convention to speak for anybody except the constituency that elected him, and he should hesitate before he undertakes to become a dictator of what a party or a class of people shall do in this community. This matter was before the Legislature, it was discussed there, we had warm contests on it for two or three years, we had the yeas and nays on it several times. I want this Convention to understand that I do not stand here pointing out these things for glorification; I do not do that, but, in justice to myself and the criticisms that have been made, I want to call attention to this fact: On the 22nd day of April, 1914, it was my privilege to stand in this chamber, when the gallery was filled with people of a different faith, very excited and incensed,—it was my privilege then to call attention to and point out the gross discrimination in the distribution of the public funds, and the Legislature on that occasion cast a very small vote in favor of what was then known as the Batcheller amendment, which was a direct drive at the Catholic population of this State, because they provided in it that money should not be appropriated to institutions wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. On that day the Batcheller bill received 87 votes and there were 134 votes cast against it.

Then what happened? Minute men went through the State before the next election and the issue under cover was: "These men voted with the Catholics, they voted against the Batcheller amendment,"—and many good men were defeated for no other reason. A great many men who won also felt the whip; they felt the power that was underneath; and we had another vote on the same question in 1915 and it was again rejected. Now, I say without any malice, for I have no malice against any creed, when we voted on it in the Legislature every Catholic in that body, irrespective of what party he represented, irrespective of race, voted against the Batcheller amendment. John A. Curtin of Brookline, Joseph L. Barry of Lynn, Henry Achin, Jr., of Lowell, the French Catholic, and many other Republican and Democratic members from all parts of the State who were not Catholics joined with us to defeat it. There were three amendments before the Legislature in 1915. The Fitzgerald bill prohibited the payment of any public money to institutions not under public control. The Batcheller bill prevented the giving of public money to institutions wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. In those two Legislatures, the largest vote always was cast for the proposition that public money should be given only to institutions under complete public control. That occurred in 1914 and 1915, and you can consult the House Journals and examine the yea and nay vote to verify my statement. And, sir, it was my privilege during this contest to introduce the distinguished gentleman from Fall River who sat on this floor, a worthy successor of the Honorable John W. Cummings, — I refer, sir, to John F. Doherty of Fall River, — I introduced him to a certain gentleman who asked him to do certain things on that occasion. I introduced the same gentleman to Dr. Good of Cambridge, and he asked the doctor to do certain things on that occasion, and he is the same lawyer with whom I talked concerning the Curtis amendment this year. We went forward and we cast our votes that day for an amendment preventing the giving of any public money to institutions not under public control and there was no feeling then that we were making a mistake; every one then said that the principle of the amendment was right, — no public money for institutions not under public control, — thereby preventing discrimination against any denomination in the giving out of money raised by taxation. Why this change?

Will you gentlemen say, with $16,827,620.24 given to institutions that were just as sectarian in management, in a practical sense, as the Catholic institutions, that it was justice, that it was not discrimination, when that amount of public money was given to Protestant institutions and only forty-nine thousand dollars given to Catholic institutions during a period of fifty-seven years? Will you say that there was not discrimination? I am not charging it in any spirit of bitterness. Do you not think it was discrimination? Of course it was. Why should a Catholic in this Commonwealth be taxed and walk up and put his money into the treasury of the State, to pay for Protestant institutions, any more than the Protestant should go up and pay for Catholic institutions?

Why, Mr. President, you cannot get away from that proposition. I do not know what people may do under certain conditions. But I tell the gentleman who talked about what he could do to me that I will meet him in South Boston, I will meet him in Dorchester, I will meet him in Roxbury or anywhere else that he wants to challenge me to discuss this matter with him; because, Mr. President, I know that I am right [applause], and right over wrong always prevails. You cannot fool the intelligent people of this city and of this State.

This whole proposition from the committee on Education is wrong. I call your attention again to the fact that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) is on the Board of Education, and that they are trying to get more control over our school-committees. I do not know exactly what school-committees they are after, but I have respect for the school-committee men of Massachusetts. No attempt should be made to interfere with the local committees without giving them a chance to be heard, to meet whatever charges are to be made, especially before you put them under the absolute control of any State board. The district attorney of Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier) has pointed out to you what may happen if we put it in the power of any five men to do these things. We know what has happened in New York where that has been done.

We read of wire-tapping; we hear all kinds of nauseating charges.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Boston what there is in the amendment I offered this morning which gives any greater control to the Board of Education than it has at the present time?

Mr. Lomasney: I say that our State has built up this school system since Horace Mann’s day. In my opinion it is the best system of any State in the Union. We do not need his amendment at all. That is what I said the first day; that is what I say now. I do say, the gentleman’s proposition, in view of the statement being made that the gentleman from Fall River made a statement, or reiterated a statement, that he afterwards retracted, when put up to him one day by former Attorney-General Parker, that when he made that statement again it seemed to me to be a wise policy for the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) to offer his proposition, to clear up the situation suggested by Mr. Cummings. If you believe he is right in what he states,—personally, I do not,—it could not be argued throughout the State to affect the anti-aid amendment. But when you do that, Mr. President, it seems to me that you do all that is necessary. We have a good school system so far as our State is concerned; at least, those of us who live here always feel proud in talking about it when we go beyond the confines of our State. I have met many men outside the State and they admit it. Now, then, why strike it down without giving those officials a chance to be heard? Why pass two amendments and put them on the ballot, one doing a thing one way and one doing a thing another way? In other words, going before the people of the State and saying: "If you want to keep money for public schools, vote for this amendment; if you want to give the charitable institutions and the hospitals money, vote for the other amendment." You will have two propositions on the ballot, conflicting, and people may vote for one and vote against the other. Now, the principle, Mr. President, is right here. Who can tell what is going to be the result of the people’s action? Who can tell now what the people of this State will do when they vote on this question?

Mr. Brown of Brockton: What would be the objection to permitting the people to take their choice of those two? Why are not the people to be trusted, from the democratic standpoint? First, they have intelligence; and second, they know the difference between the two propositions; and third, they know which they want,—and the majority prevails.

Mr. Lomasney: The people are given their choice now. They have the present system, created under the Constitution. Money can be given to private institutions; they have been doing that for years. Now, then, if they vote for the anti-aid amendment it cannot be done. There are the two alternatives: The present system, under which money can be given; or this amendment, which refuses it. Why do you want to confuse the issue? There is your principle. The State has been doing it for years; has been giving money to institutions that have been getting it. I am not going to say a word against these people; they have done good work, I am not criticizing them at all. Now, this amendment provides that, if it passes, they shall not receive public money unless the institutions are under public control. Are there not two issues? Does not the gentleman admit that?

Mr. Brown: Does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. Lomasney: I do not. I am making my point clear. There is the proposition. The present situation, which permits it; the new law, which prohibits it.
Mr. Brown: Lest by my silence, Mr. President, I agree with the gentleman,—which I wish that I could,—I think that the broader proposition is involved in the last one, because it gives them the right to distinguish, and to give money for agriculture and other undertakings in which this principle is not involved. Your amendment providing for all institutions,—that is what I am getting so heated about.

Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman will look at the top of page 62 of the manual he will find that all those things are permitted under the present Constitution. We are not repealing that; it stands as it is.

Mr. Brown: Now, that is the meat of the whole proposition. The chairman of your committee says otherwise. The chairman of the committee told me the other day that the anti-aid amendment limits the section to which the gentleman refers, under the words "any other institutions," and we can no longer give aid to these undertakings.

Mr. Lomasney: I know the gentleman is one of the most honest men in the Convention. He must have misunderstood the gentleman. He misunderstood something when he spoke about me, but I would not correct him because I know the gentleman is absolutely on the level and he would not knowingly misconstrue what I said. I know he misunderstood me, but I would not stand up and embarrass him by denying it.

I know, Mr. President, our present Constitution, section 2, chapter 5, mentions agricultural and all those things; we do not repeal them; we simply say that no money shall be given except it is spent under public officers, under exclusive public control. That is the way to do, Mr. President.

I trust and I hope the Convention will pardon me for talking so long. It seems to me that if we want to vote on the proposition fairly and squarely, we shall vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers), who is trying to get it in here, who tried to get it in before, and I do not know why. There is no demand for it; no school-committee men have filled these corridors asking for it. It is a demand of a body seeking power for themselves, and it is a very dangerous proposition. You see to what extent they go to try to put it in here. They went all over the old article, rewrote it up and down, and finally admit that the last seven or eight lines did the work. Then comes the gentleman from Newton with this concrete proposition, showing that he has been the moving spirit. I do not say it offensively. What is he trying to do? Get the power into a State board. Now, Mr. President, I claim that the Board of Education has all the power necessary. I claim that it can expend the money appropriated now. I claim the Legislature can tell it when and where and how the money shall be expended.

I trust, Mr. President, that we shall adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), and that we shall reject all the other amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. Coombs of Worcester: I resent on behalf of our committee the use of the words that our committee were driven to make any allowance. We were not. Our deliberations were absolutely fair, square, and open. What we did we were not ashamed of; we are not ashamed of it to-day. We were not driven to make any admission. Let me say that the Commissioner of Education made a recommendation in amendment No. 157, referred to this morning. He withdrew that at our suggestion. He made another recommendation, which reads as follows: "The Legislature shall have power to determine the organization of the public schools." We would not accept the word "determine" because we felt that that matter should be left in the hands of the Legislature. Let me repeat: The committee on Education did their work fairly and squarely. I hope the other committees, — I mention none, — did theirs as fairly and squarely and openly. I resent those words. We were driven to make no admissions. We stand on our record.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: One thing is not clear in my mind, and I doubt whether it is clear to this Convention now. I think it rests in the minds of some that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) is expected to be adopted in addition to the amendment that was moved by the gentleman from Topsfield. So I want, through you, Mr. President, to ask the gentleman from Newton a question, to see if this thing stands right in my mind. First, is not his amendment an amendment to document No. 362? That document, which has been passed to a second reading, is as follows:

The Legislature shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

My first question is if his proposal is not simply to add a few lines to that. My second question is this: Is it not the idea of the gentleman from Newton that if his amendment is adopted the entire amendment offered by the gentleman from Topsfield should be swept aside, so that article 5 of the Constitution, the second part of the Constitution, may remain as it is now?

Mr. Powers of Newton: The gentleman from Lexington is quite right in his interpretation of the purpose of my amendment. The purpose of my amendment was to add to the resolution that already has been adopted a few lines showing the authority the Legislature should have in developing an educational system throughout the State, and, further, providing that all money appropriated for that purpose should be expended under public authority, so as not to come in conflict with what is known as the anti-aid amendment. My purpose was, further, that if the amendment was adopted it should be in the nature of a substitute for the amendment which had been presented by the chairman of the committee on Education. I offer this, not intending to be in any conflict with the chairman of the committee on Education, but in order to clear up what seemed to be a useless discussion over the meaning of the language in chapter 5 of the Constitution. In other words, to allow that language in the Constitution to stand as it is to-day, because it has historical value, and put this language in such form that there should be no question about it. In other words, if my amendment is adopted it will allow the Legislature to exempt from taxation property invested in educational and religious associations, and further will allow the Legislature to appropriate money with a view of promoting education throughout the Commonwealth, that money to be expended, however, under public control. I understand the amendment is entirely satisfactory to the chairman of the committee on Education. I have attempted to find out whether it was entirely satisfactory to the chairman and members of the committee on Bill of Rights. I regret to say, Mr. President, that I am not quite sure whether it is satisfactory to them or not, but I can see no reason why it should not be satisfactory to every member of this Convention.
ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE. 359

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: The question is: Shall the main question now be put, and I agree that it should be put. Every time anything comes up in this Convention, or has for the last two or three days, that by any possibility could allow the discussion of the anti-aid amendment, passed here the twenty-second day of August, it has been used as a subterfuge to discuss that measure over again. Now, you voted yesterday to put No. 87 on the ballot this year, and we ask you to give it a second reading; and all this discussion that has been brought in here to-day is the same as we shall have to-morrow. When the committee on Rules reports here to-morrow the form for the caption of the anti-aid amendment, I predict some will stand here and fight as to whether that should go on or not, and will fight at every opportunity there is to keep it off the ballot this year. I say you are treating the majority of the Convention who voted to put it on the ballot, who voted on the twenty-second day of August to pass it,—you are treating us like a lot of school-boys, and using the time that ought to be taken to discuss other things.

I hope every amendment will be killed and that we shall pass this resolution to a second reading. [Applause.]

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: I do not see how any one can justly charge the committee on Education with having proposed anything in conflict with the anti-aid amendment. I rise particularly at this time to say that so far as I understand the force of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Newton it accomplishes essentially what the committee on Education did. I therefore am not opposed to it. But I see no reason why it should be passed.

Mr. Coombs of Worcester: I have said all I had to say, I need not repeat it. There has been criticism; I shall not take advantage of it. I have said all I wish to say, but I have felt that the committee on Education should be set right. Our motives were of the best; we stand by them. We did not mean to controvert the amendment of the committee on Bill of Rights; we do not mean to do it now. I do feel that this amendment proposed by the chairman of our committee should go through. Sentimental? If you want to call it that, well and good. Let that be it. It has been there 137 years; let us not throw it out. The member from Holyoke the other day said we had thrown out education. Are we now going to throw out religion? That is a strong way of putting it. But if you put it that way, or more mildly, I certainly hope that the Convention will put itself on record as supporting this amendment of the chairman of the committee on Education. It is a splendid thing. It has 137 years' record behind it. It will do no harm to the amendment of the committee on Bill of Rights. It may do a great deal of good. It will put us on record. For my part, Mr. President and gentlemen, I want to go on record strongly as favoring this amendment.

The pending amendments were rejected and the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

On the following day, Thursday, October 11, Mr. Morton of Fall River, former Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, made the following statement, unanimous consent having been given by the Convention.
Mr. Morton of Fall River: Mr. President, in view of some conversation which I have had with the gentleman from Newton, Professor Anderson, in regard to the amendment offered by him, document 362, I should like to make a statement. I will read the document for your information, Mr. President, and the information of the Convention, as follows:

The Legislature shall continue to have the power to exempt from taxation property used for charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious purposes.

There are, as I understand, one or two amendments that have been proposed to that. What I wish to say is this: That it seems to me that there are two pretty serious objections to that amendment. The first objection I think is that it is unnecessary; in my judgment, entirely unnecessary.

Reference was made the other day by my colleague from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) to an opinion of the Justices in 195 Mass., which he thought, or appeared to think, would warrant the inference that exemption would not take place, there could not be exemption, unless there could be taxation for the purposes for which the exemption was created. I think that is an entirely mistaken view of that opinion. The opinion was dealing with the question as to whether certain kinds of property could be exempted in view of a general tax of three mills a thousand, or something like that, independently of local and State taxation, and the opinion dealt in the course of it with various kinds of exemption; but there was no intention, and I do not think that any fair construction of the opinion would warrant the inference, that the right to exempt depends at all upon the right to tax for the particular property which is exempted. That is the first ground.

The general ground, I may add, on which I think exemption is exercised by the Legislature, is on the ground that it is deemed wise as a matter of public policy to exempt this or that piece of property. The Legislature may impose taxes for the benefit of religion, and literature, and benevolence, and charity, and in that way, by recognizing the contribution which those things may make to the general welfare, it may exempt them; but not because it may have the right to impose taxes to create a certain charitable or public institution. The right to exempt depends upon the right of the Legislature in the exercise of a wise public policy to exempt this thing or that thing as it deems best to promote the general welfare, subject always to the constitutional provision that taxes shall be proportional and reasonable. That, I think, is a fair statement of the general ground upon which exemptions rest, and I may add in that connection,—I think I am justified in doing it,—that since this matter came up I have corresponded with former Chief Justice Knowlton, who, I may add, also wrote that opinion which was signed by the then Justices of the court, and, as I understand his letter, that is in substance the view that he takes of that opinion; so that I do not stand alone in the construction which I put upon that opinion. That is one ground, Mr. President, why I think this amendment had better not be adopted.

Another ground is that I think, if it is adopted, even with the amendments that are proposed to it, it may tend to confusion in regard to the power of the Legislature to exempt at all. Of course it is a well understood rule, which I think certainly all the lawyers in the Convention and probably others will understand, that if you name in an instrument certain particular things which may or may not be done, by that very fact you exclude by implication other things which cannot be done. The effect is to exclude them from the operation of the instrument. The instrument, in other words, would be confined to the things which are named in it, and the things which are not named in it would be excluded from its operation.

It seems to me that the effect of naming these things in this proposed amendment, and not naming other things, might be to lead to a construction of the Constitution which would limit the power of the Legislature to exempting these things and taking away from it, or at any rate furnishing an implication to that effect, perhaps the right to exempt other things. Now, there are many other things in the Revised Laws which are exempted besides the list of things given here, charitable, benevolent, literary, educational, scientific and religious.
There are other things that are exempted besides those. For instance, take the familiar case of the tools of a mechanic, up to I think $300 or $500, whatever the amount is, household furniture up to the amount of $1,000, a widow or a fatherless child's property up to $500,—the amount is immaterial,—and the case, as I remember it, of soldiers and sailors who have been injured in the service of the United States and have been honorably discharged and have property not exceeding, if I remember right, $5,000, $2,000 is exempt if they suffer from certain physical disabilities. So that I think there might be danger, Mr.
President, if this is adopted with its amendments, that an implication might arise that these things which heretofore have been exempted might not be exempted because there was no constitutional provision exempting them.

For those two reasons, which I outline thus briefly, it seems to me,
Mr. President, that it would be unwise to adopt this proposed amendment. [Applause.]

The committee on Form and Phraseology reported, Thursday, October 11, that the resolution ought to be adopted, with two slight changes in phraseology.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: In view of the statement this noon of the learned ex-Justice from Fall River I trust that this measure will not pass.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: We have heard this afternoon from the beloved ex-Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court from Fall River
(Mr. Morton) a very clear statement in reference to this matter, a statement which I think should allay the doubt in every man's mind as to whether the anti-aid amendment interferes in any way with the exemption of educational, charitable or church property from taxation.
The doubt was raised by another learned member from Fall River
(Mr. Cummings), and he based it on a certain decision of the Supreme Judicial Court, which he read. As I understood the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton) in this division to-day, the Justice who wrote that opinion has given him the information, as he thinks, that that was not the meaning of that decision. Consequently, as this amendment was put in to allay doubt, and as all doubt in the Convention is allayed, and I believe that the report of this can go forth to the State, it seems to me that, as it is exceedingly difficult to make an amendment which will cover exactly all cases of exemption which are in the statutes to-day, perhaps it might be just as well to defeat this amendment, on the ground that it is entirely unnecessary under the circumstances.

Mr. Barnes of Weymouth: I coincide with the view offered by the gentleman in the first division and also the gentleman in the third division. I had offered an amendment, which is printed in the calendar, for the very reason that it seemed perfectly clear that the enumeration of classifications stated in the resolution as printed did not include the exemptions that were permitted by statute and the exemptions that were desirable and even necessary. For example, the casual reader of the classifications specified in the resolution as printed will see clearly that there is nothing there that can permit the exemption of cemeteries and cemetery corporations, and yet I take it that every one would agree that that is a proper and necessary exemption.
Neither do I believe that any of those classifications therein enumerated would exempt such property as the old State House in Boston, which I am informed is not owned by the city or the State but is owned by the Bostonian Society. And so I wished to add the words “historic memorials” and the words “cemetary corporations” to the list, because, Mr. President, it seemed clear that the words now in the resolution were not sufficiently broad to include those things. But I never have believed that this amendment was necessary. I never have believed that the power to exempt from taxation resided quite within the narrow limitations and boundaries prescribed for it by the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) when he said that the power to exempt could be found only in the power to tax for support. And, Mr. President, it seems clear that, if his contention was correct, then the greater number of the exemptions now provided by law were unconstitutional. But the trouble was that if we passed the resolution as now drawn, enumerating certain classifications for exemption, we thereby excluded by implication all those that were not enumerated, so that unless we were going to make it broad enough to include all that now are exempted by statute it seems clear that we ought not to pass it at all. Therefore, Mr. President, I trust that this resolution will be defeated, and for those reasons, and in the hope that it will be defeated, I am not going to offer the amendment printed under my name in the calendar.

The new draft recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology was rejected and the resolution reported by the committee on Education was rejected Thursday, October 11, 1917.

On the 21st of June, 1918, Mr. George B. Churchill, for a special committee appointed during the recess (under authority given the President by an order adopted on November 27, 1917), reported the following resolution (No. 385) (Messrs. Morton of Fall River, Lomasney of Boston and Edwin U. Curtis of Boston dissenting):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In providing for education at the public expense it is the duty of the State to secure as nearly as possible the maintenance of uniform standards of instruction throughout the Commonwealth.

The resolution was withdrawn Tuesday, July 23, 1918.
Mr. Churchill of Amherst: I desire to ask for unanimous consent on the part of the Convention to make a request of the Convention regarding item No. 281 in the calendar, document No. 385. If there is no objection, I desire, on behalf of the majority of the committee which reported document No. 385, to ask unanimous consent to withdraw this report.

The Presiding Officer: Mr. Churchill of Amherst asks for unanimous consent, on behalf of the majority of the committee, to withdraw the report embodied in resolution No. 385. Is there any objection?

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if he will make a brief statement as to why that is done.

Mr. Churchill: I prefer not to take the time of the Convention in discussing the reasons that have induced the majority of the committee to withdraw this report. I simply would say that it seemed to a majority of the committee unwise and inexpedient under present conditions to press for the acceptance of this report.

The Presiding Officer: Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the report is withdrawn.
IV.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

Article XI of the Amendments of the Constitution, substituted for Article III in Part the First of the Constitution, is as follows: —

As the public worship of God and instructions in piety, religion and morality, promote the happiness and prosperity of a people and the security of a Republican Government; — Therefore, the several religious societies of this Commonwealth, whether corporate or unincorporate, at any meeting legally warned and holden for that purpose, shall ever have the right to elect their pastors or religious teachers, to contract with them for their support, to raise money for erecting and repairing houses for public worship, for the maintenance of religious instruction, and for the payment of necessary expenses: And all persons belonging to any religious society shall be taken and held to be members, until they shall file with the Clerk of such Society, a written notice, declaring the dissolution of their membership, and thenceforth shall not be liable for any grant or contract, which may be thereafter made, or entered into by such society: — And all religious sects and denominations demeaning themselves peaceably and as good citizens of the Commonwealth, shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law.

Mr. Powers of Newton presented a petition of Frank Ernest Woodward and others for the recognition in the Bill of Rights of the Golden Rule as an indispensable element of the social and civic welfare of the people, and, in document No. 152, proposed an amendment striking out the words "and morality," and inserting in place thereof the words "morality and the practice of the Golden Rule in all social and civic affairs.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported that the petitioners be given leave to withdraw.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: The committee yield to no one in their appreciation of the worth of the Golden Rule, and of its wisdom. We revere Him who spoke these words and some of us make him the Lord of our lives; but we feel that the addition of these words would add nothing to the Constitution of Massachusetts, for the Golden Rule is, after all, not as many people think, a rule of benevolence, but a rule of justice, — a rule of justice so concretely, simply and picturesquely put that it is the most useful rule of justice in this world. But the Constitution of Massachusetts and the government of Massachusetts are founded on justice, the courts of Massachusetts dispense justice, and if we simply put this additional definition of justice into the Constitution we add nothing to it. A good many members of the committee thought that the area of good advice in the Bill of Rights already was too large, and we did not want to extend it.

The report of the committee was accepted without further debate Friday, July 20, 1917.
V.

DEFENCE OF THE ACCUSED.

Public Defender.

Mr. Donnelly of Lawrence presented the following resolution (No. 209):
Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by adopting the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.
The General Court shall have authority to establish the office of public defender.
The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.
The resolution was rejected Thursday, July 26, 1917.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Cusick of Boston: Representing the committee on the Judiciary in this matter it is my duty to present to this body the reasons why the committee reported "ought not to pass." I suppose now that the committee is concerned with document No. 209, but what is said is true of documents No. 210 and No. 211.
The Chairman: The gentleman is correct.

Mr. Cusick: The committee found, and one of the reasons why the committee reported as they did to the Convention, was the fact that they were unanimously of the opinion, that this was more of a legislative matter than a constitutional one. In fact, the proponents of all the measures of that nature, which embrace not only No. 209, but Nos. 210 and 211, with the exception of one, admitted that the Legislature at the present time had power to provide for such an officer if conditions required it. That was the compelling reason why the committee reported as they did.

Mr. Twomey of Lawrence: In bringing before this Convention a proposition that there be established under our Constitution the office of public defender, I did so with the earnest hope that we might offset, in part at least, the public belief expressed in the oft repeated statement that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor; and I trust that you will not sustain the committee in its recommendation that this resolution ought not to pass, at least until such time as you can satisfy yourselves that, in the administration of criminal law, there prevails at all times that justice which our Constitution seemingly guarantees. To hold that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor does not require us to draw upon our imagination to any great extent, nor are we required to delve into the depths of suspicion. By an examination of the docket of any court in this Commonwealth, whether that court be a police court, a district court, or the Superior Court, you will find a startling variation in the handling of criminal cases. You will find, — and now I am asking you to refer to, and to rely upon, your own knowledge of some criminal cases for a moment, — that in a large number of cases the question is not what crimes have been committed, but rather who the defendant is, where he comes from, and what he can do for some judicial officer in the future. You will find that, as to those who have standing of some sort in the community,—whether it be social standing or the standing created by wealth or position in the body politic,—very often the disposition of their cases, if there is any disposition at all, is "placed on file," "probation," or "continued for sentence." And I say "if there is any disposition" because many of the cases that I have in mind never get beyond the district attorney's office.

In your Constitution you guarantee to a man the right to trial by jury. You say that he shall not be deprived of personal liberty unless by the judgment of his peers. You also hold that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. Some little experience in the criminal courts inclines me to believe that when the defendant is in the dock, surrounded by sheriffs, the presumption that is in the minds of the jury is that the defendant is guilty until he is proven innocent. If such a condition of affairs does prevail, if, when a man is brought into the lower courts, he knows that he cannot be defended adequately in the Superior Court before a jury, and he knows that he will be confronted there with the office of the district attorney, of what advantage to him is it to be told: "You shall be presumed innocent until proven guilty; you have a constitutional right to trial by jury"? I venture the statement that the office of district attorney is not what it is supposed to be, and that few of you can recall an occasion when any district attorney ever represented to any jury anything in behalf of the defence. Sometimes they may scratch the surface a little bit; but ask yourself: "Can I recall a district attorney's ever attempting to present all the facts for the consideration of a jury"? So, then, in the case of a man who, either through poverty or through ignorance, goes before a court without counsel, it is almost a certainty that an appeal to the Superior Court is simply a matter of a longer sentence for him, or that after waiting for his trial by jury he will simply be sent back to serve the sentence of the lower court.

I am not asking that the criminal law be changed in substance, nor am I asking that the administration of the criminal law be made more easy for those accused of crime. But I say to you, gentlemen, that, at all events, what the Constitution guarantees should be accomplished,—a trial by jury, a judgment of his peers, before a man is deprived of personal liberty.

But you cannot stop there. You must go further and see to it that no man is deprived of his personal liberty more easily than any of his fellow-beings. This is a more delicate question to handle, whether or not there is any safeguard in our courts to guarantee to every man an equal chance with every other. That to a certain extent may be true in the administration of the office of district attorney; but if you are going to retain the office of district attorney, as I suppose you are, then I say that it is only fitting that you should establish a corresponding, or complementary, office, the office of public defender, so that we shall have a department in the administration of our criminal law which will be just as zealous in the defence of the accused as the district attorney's office to-day is in the prosecution,—that is, in the cases that the district attorney's office sees fit to prosecute.

I take this proposition somewhat seriously, because I submit that it is unfair, that it is shaking the foundations of our courts and of our government, to have the conviction prevalent that if a man is represented by counsel he can get better consideration from a district attorney's office than he can otherwise. What are we to do? Why say to a man: "You shall not be deprived of your personal liberty without due process of law, without trial by jury, without a judgment of your peers," unless you also take a further step and place him in a position where all these constitutional provisions mean something to him, where they are realities rather than mere vagaries? I submit, gentlemen, that, if these constitutional provisions are to mean anything, you ought to provide by amendment to the present Constitution that there be established the office of public defender, an office which shall impose no obligation upon any person accused of crime, but to which any person accused of crime may resort if he cannot secure counsel otherwise. Then let it be known that our courts are just as zealous for the defence of a poor person, just as zealous to protect him in the pursuit of his personal liberty as they are to take it away.

Something is said about the constitutionality of this resolution, that a Legislature can provide for the establishment of such an office; and your committee has reported that one of the compelling reasons why they have reported adversely upon this matter is the fact that they were of the opinion that the Legislature could provide for a public defender. I am not going to dispute that contention, but I will urge this proposition: That it is only fitting that in the same document, or in the same part of our law, where you provide for trial by jury, where you provide for due process of law, where you provide for a district attorney, you can also, and ought to, provide for the office of public defender. I trust, gentlemen, that the report of the committee that this resolution ought not to pass will not be sustained, but that the Committee of the Whole will report to the Convention that the resolution for the establishment of the office of public defender ought to pass.

Mr. Cusick: The resolution presented by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Donnelly) reads:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have authority to establish the office of public defender.

The committee feel that, under the Constitution at the present time, the General Court has that power. In order that the Convention may know upon what we base our conclusions, you can refer to Article XII of the Constitution, on page 109 of the Manual, and read that in connection with Article IV, of the powers of the General Court, on page 126 of the Manual; and I do not believe that any delegate to this Convention will doubt the fact that the Legislature at present has the power to do the very thing which this resolution requires; and I think that this Convention will support the committee on the Judiciary in a matter which would mean nothing more or less than adding something unnecessary to the fundamental law of this Commonwealth. I think that the delegates to this Convention will commend the position of the committee on the Judiciary in that respect. I think that it has been evident throughout our committee hearings that perhaps not enough consideration has been given to the discrimination that should be made between matters of amendment to the fundamental law and those which are simply matters of legislation. This is one of that type.

It may be considered egotistical in me to undertake to answer what the gentleman said in regard to the courts of this Commonwealth or his construction of the duties of district attorneys. I have practiced law in this Commonwealth for nearly twenty years. I so respect the courts of this Commonwealth that I believe, and my experience has indicated, that nowhere in this country has the litigant been able to have his controversy adjusted and adjudged more quickly, more honestly, more expeditiously, than he has in the courts of this Commonwealth. As respects the district attorney, I believe that any district attorney who is fit to hold that office realizes that he is holding that office as the representative of all the people. His duty is not simply to prosecute. His duty is to present the cases that come before him, either to a grand jury or to the courts, in such a way that justice will be done; and the district attorney who so far forgets himself as to become a partizan in that respect is not fit to hold that office. That district attorneys realize their duties in that respect, I call your attention to a statement made in another matter as indicating the way a district attorney feels in regard to the duties of his office. I read the statement of a district attorney, a member of this Convention, in that respect, made at a prior time, which I think states the real position of a district attorney, and also states in practice how the district attorneys view the cases that come before them that are not represented by counsel.

I would feel that I was failing in my duty as district attorney if I did not extend every consideration to the accused without counsel, by advising, by sending for friends and witnesses, by conveying his statements to the court, and by treating him with the utmost fairness in the trial of the case. When men are without counsel the district attorney makes no opening to the jury and no argument at the close of the case. The judge is there presiding, to hold even the scales of justice and see that no injustices is done to the prisoner.

That, in my opinion, is the mental state of the district attorney who is big enough to occupy that position. And without going into the merits of the question as to whether there are any conditions which would require a public defender, we can stand on this point,—that if such conditions do exist, or if there is a necessity in this Commonwealth to provide counsel for prisoners who are unable to get counsel, then the Legislature has the power to authorize courts to supply counsel, which they do now in certain classes of cases; or the Legislature may go further, after going into the details which such a question may require, and may establish something in the nature of a public defender, and your committee are leaving that proposition to the Legislature when the time comes.

Mr. Twomey: There seems to be no serious objection to the argument that conditions may prevail that would make it worth while for us in this Commonwealth to have established the office of public defender, nor does there seem to be any serious objection to the contention that under the present Constitution the Legislature can provide for such an office. But if it is worth while, and if, though our forbears have seen fit to have such a constitutional provision, we have been waiting since 1853 for the Legislature to act under that authority, and there has been no action, then I submit that, if there is a particle of merit to this question, we ought to wait no longer; and if it is a proper matter for the Constitution to contain a general phrase that would permit the establishment of the office of public defender, I say to you that we ought not to delay, but that we ought, without crowding our Constitution with detail, to make that general provision mean something by inserting into it the words "office of public defender."

Mr. Cusick: I would suggest to the members here that the provision of the Constitution backs up that proposition in regard to legislative powers. I will read, cutting out unimportant portions:

Article XII. No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or offence, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel, at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, etc.

That gives the individual right to the prisoner to be confronted with proofs, and they have got to be set forth substantially. Then the Article which gives to the General Court the power to make such orders, rules and regulations as are necessary, is Article IV of Chapter 1:

And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time to make, ordain and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, etc.

Then it is the fact that the Legislature already has legislated in that respect. I can refer to chapter 394 of the Acts of 1893, and no question ever has been raised in regard to its constitutionality. The same is true of section 55, chapter 218, of the Revised Laws, and no question ever has been raised in regard to the constitutionality of this act. So I think that the committee may act fearlessly, convinced that the Legislature has full power to do anything that may be necessary if the facts are as the gentleman states.

Law of the Land.

Article XII of Part the First of the Constitution is as follows:

Art. XII. No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or offence, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel, at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. [A]

And the Legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment, excepting for the government of the army and navy, without trial by jury.

Mr. William A. Burns of Pittsfield presented a resolution (No. 143) providing for an amendment inserting the following sentence at [A]:
But no method of procedure shall be held not according to the law of the land for the sole reason that such method of procedure was not in force and effect in England or in the Province of Massachusetts Bay prior to the agreement upon, ordaining and establishing of the Constitution of this Commonwealth, nor because it has not been in such force and effect in this Commonwealth to the present date.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted (Messrs. Anderson of Newton, Swig of Taunton, Walcott of Cambridge and Merrill of Gloucester, dissenting).

The resolution was considered by the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, July 25, 1917, and was rejected by the Convention the following day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Walcott of Cambridge: The question involved here is the same article of the Bill of Rights which the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Cusick) just quoted from, Article XII, and the clause in question I will read:

And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

This amendment seeks to add these additional words:

But no method of procedure shall be held not according to the law of the land for the sole reason that such method of procedure was not in force and effect in England or in the Province of Massachusetts Bay prior to the agreement upon, ordaining and establishing of the Constitution of this Commonwealth, nor because it has not been in such force and effect in this Commonwealth to the present date.

This resolution, Mr. Chairman, is introduced by Mr. Burns of Pittsfield, stated by him before the committee to be put in by request of Mr. Rosenthal, a member of the Berkshire bar, who had given the subject some consideration. The necessity, as it seemed to him, of putting in this resolution arises from the fact that the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in 1857, in the case of Jones v. Robbins, reported in 8 Gray, 329, gave a definition of the law of the land which is much narrower than that which the Supreme Court of the United States gave eight years afterwards and has consistently held to ever since on the phrase "due process of law", which Judge Matthews in Hurtado v. California (110 U. S. 516) considers the same an equivalent phrase for the phrase "law of the land" as it occurs in the Massachusetts State Constitution.

This case of Jones v. Robbins came up on a Massachusetts statute which provided that a man could be proceeded against for a felony, convicted and sentenced without an indictment as a preliminary, but merely on an information. The court held two things, the opinion being by Chief Justice Shaw; the first: That the statute authorizing the single magistrate to pass sentence in a criminal case without a jury sufficiently maintained the right of jury trial if that was provided for on an appeal; and the second, — which this resolution meets, — holds that giving the single magistrate power to pass upon an offence without presentment by a grand jury violates the twelfth article of the Bill of Rights, because "the law of the land" was the phrase used in Magna Carta, and —

It must, therefore, have intended the ancient established law and course of legal proceedings, by an adherence to which our ancestors in England before the settlement of this country, and the emigrants themselves and their descendants, had found safety for their personal rights —
LAW OF THE LAND.

quoting Lord Coke, and stating that the indictment was the only method, in his opinion, for the beginning of prosecutions for felony at the time of the settlement of this country and at the date of its independence.

The first part of this decision has been affirmed in fifteen Massachusetts cases; there is no doubt of the law involved. The second part, of which I have just made an abstract, was the source of a dissent by Judge Merrick at the time, and his dissenting opinion was quoted with approval by Judge Matthews in Hurtado v. California in the United States Supreme Court (110 U. S. 516) and by our Justice Moody in the case of Twining v. State of New Jersey, subsequently, in the United States Supreme Court (211 U. S. 78).

Notwithstanding that the United States Supreme Court has not adopted the view of the Supreme Judicial Court of our Commonwealth, the only case in which this question, so far as I can find, has come squarely before the court, was Charles Nolan's case, reported in 122 Mass. 330, in 1877, and the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, in the only case subsequently on the point, affirmed the majority opinion in the Jones case. So that so far as now appears, this narrower doctrine of what constitutes or can be included in the law of the land is still law in Massachusetts, and there seems to be no reason to suppose that if the case came again before the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts the court would reverse the decision in the Jones case approved in the Nolan case, notwithstanding that the equivalent phrase has been otherwise interpreted by the United States Supreme Court, by several Federal courts and by a number of State courts. It seemed, therefore, to the proponent before our committee that this was an anomaly which should not persist and an anomaly which most probably the Supreme Judicial Court would not feel at liberty to cure itself by reversing an opinion which had been approved since in the Nolan case cited above and which was not attempted to be distinguished in any way; and a minority of the committee on Bill of Rights shared that opinion. That is the reason for the dissenting opinion here. It seemed to me, and I think to the other gentlemen of the minority, that the question has some importance, because it is desirable that the Constitution should allow the Legislature of this State to do what similar Constitutions allow similar legislative bodies to do in other States, and that therefore the subject should be at least carefully discussed, if possible, in general committee and it may be that the gentlemen here will think it well to have this referred to the committee on Judicial Procedure, before whom it seems to me the question might very properly be taken up,—or possibly to the committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me either of those committees, composed more exclusively of lawyers than the committee on Bill of Rights, could perhaps take it up with more care.

I have one or two references which for the benefit of the lawyers here present I should like very briefly to state. The line of the broader opinion started in the United States Supreme Court with the Hurtado case,—Hurtado v. State of California, 110 U. S. 516. That was a case where the State of California passed a statute allowing a man to be tried for a felony without the preliminary of an indictment of the grand jury but merely on information, and the Supreme Court ruled that that did not contravene the provisions of the fourteenth amendment requiring due process of law. It stated in the course of the opinion that "due process of law" appeared to them to be the same as "the law of the land"; that this was made up, first, of existing English practices at the time of the settlement of this country; second, of practices existing in the Colonies at the time of the Declaration of Independence and those mentioned in the United States Constitution, and thirdly, of any other systems which might be devised now or might be adopted in the future not inconsistent with the general trend of Anglo-Saxon common law. And it is the last point, the third point, on which they adopted Judge Merrick's dissenting opinion in preference to the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in the Jones case in Massachusetts.

I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, either that the minority report in this matter may prevail or that the whole question may be sent to one of the exclusively legal committees to pass upon, either Judiciary or Judicial Procedure.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: I shall strenuously oppose sending this measure to the Judiciary or the committee on Judicial Procedure. I have had some experience with the Judiciary Committee and they are so conservative that anything that has to do with the common person will meet with no sympathy. One dissenter on measures which will appeal to the ordinary individual is all that the Judiciary has done for the people in this Convention.

Now this is not a legal question, this is a simple question and if it was not a simple question the committee on Bill of Rights could understand it. In 1857 one Jones was convicted of stealing $14 in a building and sentenced by the justice of the police court, — 1857, — and since that time no member of the Jones family has remonstrated and no unfortunate who has been committed or has come before a judge in the lower court has sought by his friend or any friend of the common people to change this law. Since 1857 no outcry has been raised against this law. There came before the committee on Bill of Rights a young lawyer, who, like all young lawyers, studies the law more intently than the older and the better paid lawyers, and he thought this was a grievance, as the learned judge who has represented the minority said; why, it was an anomaly, and such a thing cannot be allowed to exist by the young lawyer or by the theoretical lawyer, — not if there is a Convention sitting at the time.

Now the learned judge who has dwelt so eloquently upon the anomaly, — why, he never had heard of this case himself; it was an harassing thought to him that such a thing could exist, and he has read the case carefully since this proposition appeared. Of course what the amendment means really is to give more power to the judge in the lower court; to permit a judge in the police court or district court to sentence a man to State Prison. That is what it means. Of course such a thing appealed to the judges of the lower court in our committee, — three judges of the lower court on our committee. Notwithstanding we have learned judges on our committee this very learned judge wants to send it to the Judiciary, and I have expressed very graciously and impartially my opinion in parliamentary language of the committee on the Judiciary. But notwithstanding we have three learned judges on our committee, he wants to send it to another committee. There are four dissenters to the committee's report; three are judges, the fourth is a lawyer; and giving the judges of the lower courts more power appeals to him because he is majestic enough in appearance at least to some time hope to be a judge of some court.

Since 1857 there has been no hardship experienced. What does this law say, without any legal verbiage? This court decided that a statute which gives a single magistrate authority to try an offence punishable by imprisonment in the State Prison without presentment by a grand jury violates the twelfth article of the declaration of rights — one judge dissenting. The judge who delivered that opinion was Chief Justice Shaw, admittedly one of the greatest judges we have ever known in Massachusetts. And some of the few things he said I will quote very briefly, because it will appeal to everybody who is not a lawyer and must especially to a lawyer who is not a judge of some court.

Of course it has been conceded by the learned judge who argues for the minority that this law of the land comes from Magna Carta, which was wrested from the King by the barons after a serious struggle and which we inherited with a few other things from the English government. And notwithstanding the very persuasive phraseology of this amendment and its invidious misrepresentation of this phrase "Law of the Land" this something that we inherited was really a right of the common people which our learned judges on the committee would take away, because they think the judge in the lower court ought to have the right to sentence a man to State Prison; it is a kindness to the man who comes before him that he ought not to be required to wait for the grand jury to pass upon his case; he ought to be relieved of the uncertainty and nervous tension certainly by being sentenced by the judge at once. Here is what Chief Justice Shaw says; they would like to change this:

The right of individual citizens to be secure from an open and public accusation of crime, and from the trouble, expense and anxiety of a public trial, before a probable cause is established by the presentment and indictment of a grand jury, in case of high offences, is justly regarded as one of the securities of the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive prosecution, and as one of the ancient immunities and privileges of English liberty. Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, 344.

Is there any man here other than a judge who would care to take that right away from the ordinary man, the man who is apt to be accused of crime? Some of the dissenter say: "Why, I believe I would rather go before a judge in the lower court for sentence." Well, perhaps he has been more complaisant and more of a toady to the judge in the lower court than is usually the case, or perhaps has been better acquainted with the judge in the lower court. But if they will read the case Commonwealth v. Harris, — and it happened very shortly after this case, — they will find that a man named Harris went before the judge in the lower court whom he knew and he asked to be so sentenced by him. But the judge, whose power to sentence was so limited as to be unable to punish him sufficiently, said: "I am going to hold you for the grand jury." The prisoner said: "I refuse to go before the grand jury and I desire that you sentence me; you have got jurisdiction here." The judge probably did not dare to give him the limit, — it was like the case of one of these automobile owners. The judge said: "I am not going to take the responsibility, I am going to send you before the grand jury." He said: "I won’t go." He was ordered to give bonds to appear before the grand jury and Superior Court where the punishment would be greater. He refused. He went to jail and served out his time for contempt rather than take his chance before the grand jury. Afterwards the grand jury indicted him and he was punished as he deserved.

Now you see if the judges can get this change in the law, if they can take jurisdiction over manslaughter by owners of automobiles, what a fine time some of the owners of automobiles would have. If one of them exercised a wise discretion in running over a man in the proper jurisdiction, why, he will go before his friend who is a judge and that is the last you will hear of his escapiad. He will be fined. It is a very fine thing to talk of sending this to a legal committee, but while there were men on the committee on Bill of Rights who were not lawyers there were some pretty good lawyers on that committee. They may not make as big fees as other men in this community, but from my knowledge of them for twenty-five years there are just as able lawyers on that committee as there are in this Convention. A man with twenty-five years' practice knows the good lawyers and knows some law. The other men on that committee who were not lawyers know better the highest law of all, and that is the law of the human heart. They did not have to read this case, but they know just what it means. Only one question was asked the one witness who came before us, and, knowing the law of the human heart which is higher than the law of the land, or the law of man, they are against this proposition and are the majority of that committee. There is nothing intricate, nothing that ought to be changed. It is something that was not heard of till this one legal, enthusiastic and delightful young man appeared and gave a most learned address, but his learned address did not conceal the real object, — to do away with the grand jury. The Constitution says every man has a right to be tried by his peers. This proposition really is taking away the right of trial by jury and it is not necessary to send it to any committee on the Judiciary. Of course I know what they would do with it. There is no necessity to send it before that committee. No man here could be elected if he could not understand this proposition. It is a proposition to give the judge in the lower court a right to send away to State Prison a man who comes before him for an offence, — to extend their jurisdiction by this law. And I say no further appeal is necessary to have this Convention dispose of it properly.

Testimony by the Accused.

Article XII of Part the First of the Constitution is as follows:

Art. XII. No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or offence, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself [A]. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. And the Legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment, excepting for the government of the army and navy, without trial by jury.

Mr. Robert Walcott of Cambridge presented a resolution (No. 70) providing for an amendment inserting at [A] the words:

; but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and may be made the subject of comment by counsel.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted (Mr. Walcott, dissenting).

The resolution was considered by the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, July 25, 1917, and was rejected by the Convention the following day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Walcott of Cambridge: This is a resolution that I feel a great deal more interest in than I did in the last one, since I introduced it myself. This has to do with a rather more serious anomaly, it seems to me, in the administration of the criminal law in this Commonwealth. Here again Massachusetts provides a practice not required of it by the Constitution of the United States. Formerly, of course, it was the custom in ancient British times not to permit a defendant in a criminal case either to testify in his own favor or to be forced to testify against himself. This was the result of a still earlier practice in which under the Star Chamber proceedings a witness was forced under penalty of torture to testify whether he wished to or not.
The procedure as brought over to the Colonies here and, as existing at the time the State Constitution was framed, did not permit a defendant in a criminal case to testify even if he wished to, and such was the case in all the other States. As Professor James B. Thayer points out in his "Preliminary Sketch on the Law of Evidence," the change came first as a result not of any popular clamor for the people's rights but rather at the suggestion of an enlightened jurist in the State of Maine, Chief Justice Appleton, who in 1860 put through a statute in that State permitting the defendant in a criminal case to testify in his own behalf. That statute was copied and adopted in this State in 1866. Thereby the anomaly was created that the defendant could testify in his own behalf but he could not be made to testify in behalf of the State against himself, which was neither common sense nor ancient English practice. That it was not common sense is, so far as I know, the opinion of all the men who have thought upon this subject as judges in court, certainly with the dozen or more judges with whom I have spoken in the Supreme Judicial Court, the Superior Court and the municipal courts in this Commonwealth, and of various district attorneys whose letters I presented before the committee on Bill of Rights. It is also the opinion of the text-book writers with absolute unanimity,—Professor Wigmore in particular, Professor Roscoe Pound of the Harvard Law School, Mr. Field, formerly Assistant Attorney-General of this Commonwealth, now instructor in constitutional law at the Boston University Law School, and such eminent practitioners at our bar, amongst others, as Mr.
Moorfield Storey, Mr. Robert M. Morse and a score of others. Several judges of our court are on record in lectures which they gave at the Boston University Law School at one time or another as favoring this as a forward step necessary to the prompter administration of the criminal law. It has been strongly advocated by President Taft. In Twining v. State of New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, it is declared that in the 14th amendment binding on the States due process of law does not include exemption of an accused from compulsory self incrimination.

Now what then is the objection to the change proposed? The objections that I have heard are two: First, that it is unnecessary, because a jury of intelligence will now take into consideration the fact that the defendant does not take the stand as leading to the inference that if he were guiltless he would have no objection to doing so. But the answer to that objection, it seems to me, is this: The jury at present do in an underhand way what they ought to be encouraged to do and allowed to do as a matter of right and common sense, and the result of their carrying on the practice contrary to law is that it makes the charge of the judge ridiculous when he has to charge the jury, if so requested by counsel, that the failure of a defendant to take the stand shall cause no inference unfavorable to the defendant in the minds of the jury.

The other objection is, as I understand my able neighbor on the floor of this Convention who was the principal opponent of this measure in our committee, that if this rule were adopted more defendants might be convicted. But the rule of law would be unchanged, that a man has to be shown to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt in order to be convicted, and it does not seem to me that that objection should hold.

There are several advantages in adopting this wise rule. One is pointed out wittily by Mr. Arthur Train, formerly assistant United and another book “Crime and the Camorra,” namely, that it will tend to mitigate the rigors of the “thirty-third degree” as applied to prisoners. Now we hope that in this neighborhood we may be free from that, but there are always suggestions, — we read in the newspapers that we are not, — and I presume from time to time at places within this Commonwealth the thirty-third degree is given to the prisoners. And why is it given by the police? It is given, as Mr. Train says, because it is impossible to question a defendant in open court with all the privileges of being protected by his counsel and the judge; consequently the police feel that in order to get a conviction in cases where they think circumstantial evidence alone may not suffice, they must extract if possible an admission from the defendant to some police officer which they will endeavor to get by the court on the theory that it was not given with the hope of reward or fear of punishment and so will be admissible in open court through the mouth of a police sergeant or detective, in which case it can be introduced. In other words, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this is a measure in favor of suffering humanity and relieving them from the difficulty and troubles of the thirty-third degree, as well as being a measure based upon common sense and the better administration of criminal law in the courts. I hope very much that it will prevail, as it did in Ohio, where this measure was recommended unanimously by the Judiciary Committee to its Constitutional Convention of 1912; this was one of the forty-two measures submitted by the Ohio Convention to the people; it was one of the thirty-four measures adopted by the people of the forty-two that were submitted, and it was the sixth of those measures in receiving the largest possible popular vote, being carried by 150,000. Accordingly, I submitted it to this Convention, being sure that it was a matter not devoid of merit, and I sincerely hope it will receive careful consideration and not be hurried out of the consideration of this committee by the brilliant and passionate eloquence which I think I may consider myself likely to receive, seeing the signs of action from this very heavily gunned warship on my right hand in this division.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: This is Massachusetts, and we are making laws for Massachusetts, and any one who tries to change the Constitution of Massachusetts should give sound, sensible reasons. What they did in Ohio is not a reason for changing our Constitution. What a few text-book writers say, is no reason for changing our Constitution. What has Massachusetts suffered by this law? What number of individuals in Massachusetts have suffered? That is the question to be presented here. It is a well established principle in this Commonwealth that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. The gentleman who is a judge tells you how easy it is now to convict men. A man is arrested, the police take him in custody, they bar him from his friends and if he makes statements they take them down in shorthand and use them against him.

Mr. Chairman, are we not tired now of paying bills for our prisons? Are they not filled to overflowing? Is not the question now how to keep men out of jail rather than how to put them in jail? Why, Mr. Chairman, they want you to treat prisoners in jail as if they were guests staying in a hotel. They say: "We must treat them as human beings;" and we do treat them pretty well now. But, in my opinion, liberty and property are being held too lightly in this Commonwealth to-day. No man's liberty is as safe as it was years ago, neither is a man's property; and you must have the same respect for one as you do for the other. The fathers of the Commonwealth made the Constitution at a time when liberty meant something, and liberty for all was secured when they made liberty for the individual sacred.

Now, sir, what will this permit? You will have a prisoner at the bar, if this amendment is passed, perhaps as innocent as any one possibly could be, sent away by a sharp and unscrupulous attorney. He no longer is to be tried by the evidence but he is to be tried by the comment of counsel. What has brought about this change? What prisoners have got away because of the laxity of the present law? What cases can you cite where gross injustice has been done to the public by the present law? Why, sir, what does the judge do now? He instructs the jury that the fact that the prisoner has not taken the stand shall not be considered against him. And suppose, as he says, that a jurymen does violate the instructions of the court, which is against his oath of office; the minute he starts to communicate that as a reason openly in the jury room before the other men, he is reminded of his Honor's instruction and he must stop giving that as a reason for conviction and let it guide only his own vote. He cannot openly communicate that reason to the other jurymen. I submit, Mr. Chairman, before you strike at this fundamental right you should have overwhelming evidence that public necessity requires it. The views of a few judges should not be considered. Men should realize that this is a strange world. You, I, every one of us, do not know the day that circumstances may be such that we may have to answer to a criminal charge, and we would want the fairest trial that any human being can have, and what we would want for ourselves we want to guarantee and give to others.

Mr. Chairman, I make no charges against the police, but a police officer is a police officer all the time. I have known a police officer to take the stand and commit perjury and I have seen his brother officer go on the stand and refuse to corroborate him because he knew that he was telling a lie. If the second had corroborated the first where would the poor individual have been? A man arrested for crime in these days, when some police officers stop at nothing to convict, has a hard time to get away if there is any cause at all to suspect him guilty. The district attorney of Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier) is a member of this committee, and he frankly told the committee that they can convict nearly everybody they want to now. Then why this demand from the judge here for more victims? Why this demand to send more human beings into dungeons? Why, Mr. Chairman, is this demand made when our taxes are increasing yearly by thousands of dollars, when we to-day in Suffolk County are paying money for probation services on a scale that would astonish you,—with men walking around, finding out this and that about other men and holding themselves in office thereby? We should realize also that we have to pay pensions for prison officers to hold men; and now he wants us to fill the jails with more victims. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that no man is guilty until the jury returns a verdict against him. In other words, every man is innocent until he is proven guilty, and we should treat him as such. But to-day many say,—and they unfortunately, to my mind, say it too often,—"Why, if this man had not been guilty the police would not have brought him here." But they forget that the police often bring a man in and then hate to see him get away, no matter how innocent he may be.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is bad legislation. It is not the kind of legislation we expect in these progressive days. It is going backward instead of forward. And any man who will read the Bill of Rights will recognize that the men who drew that document realized the fact that they had to deal with this situation carefully; and they did. The opinion of Roscoe Pound and the other men mentioned here does not justify us in changing a Constitution which has stood the test of time. Ohio can give us no points on sound law. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should not allow a man to be sent away by any such practice. If a man is guilty they have opportunity enough to convict him now. Do not change the Constitution for judges and theorists. Do not make it easy to send any more human beings away unless they are convicted by the law as it now stands.

Mr. Walcott: I sincerely hope the subject will receive a little more discussion than two statements, one in favor and one against. There are several ex-Attorneys-General in this Convention, an ex-United States District Attorney and a great many judges past and present, and a number of lawyers, and I trust that this question will receive some discussion from the floor. Of course it is not the intention that this resolution shall railroad people to jail; that is only the comment, it seems to me, of an over-excited passion of sympathy. There is a class of people who sometimes, unfortunately, have to come within the jurisdiction of criminal law. There are cases, — and everybody knows it, — where people have escaped who the general sense of the community believes were guilty, because there was no way to fairly comment on their failure to take the stand. The people in the southeastern part of the Commonwealth well know a murder trial where the defendant was acquitted and nine people out of ten then and now consider her guilty.

Mr. French of Randolph: I rose a moment ago, sir, not to add to the argument upon the merits of this question, but to say that I understood my learned friend, the delegate from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott), to assert at the beginning of his remarks that there is a variance between the Federal law and the law of Massachusetts in this respect. If he made that statement he clearly was wrong, because I have before me both statutes, that of the United States and of Massachusetts, and the substance of each is precisely the same. The statute of the United States referring to the matter embodied in the resolution is as follows:

In the trial of all indictments, complaints and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crime the person so charged shall at his own request but not otherwise be a competent witness, and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him.

And in decisions of the courts of the United States it has been held that that statute means, as the statute of Massachusetts means, that the United States Attorney shall not, in the course of his argument, comment upon the silence of the defendant, either directly or indirectly; and there are numerous decisions by the highest court in the land as well as by the subordinate Federal courts which sustain that proposition as absolutely settled law.

Now, sir, I have had the honor, and the unique and perhaps unenviable experience, of having been a public prosecutor both in the State courts and in the Federal Court. I confess that when I first began the duties of those responsible offices, — or rather when I first began the duties of prosecutor in the State courts, — I was inclined to the opinion expressed by my friend, the delegate from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott). But the more experience I had and the more cases I tried, the more I felt that these provisions were a protection sometimes needed by an individual charged with crime. Of course a protection to a guilty man is not of much consequence, but I am satisfied, sir, that it not only is a protection, though rarely, to the guilty man, but also in many cases is a protection to the innocent man, — the man without the education or the intelligence to withstand the examination of counsel for the government and the man who, though absolutely innocent of the crime for which he is being tried, has unfortunately a record of the crimes of which he may have repented which, if he took the stand, could be made known to the jury and would seriously and improperly prejudice his chances of a fair trial in that particular case. Therefore I hope, sir, that this resolution will not pass.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: The author of this resolution makes a bid for further discussion upon it, but I do not see why the discussion should continue. The final word has been said by the gentleman in charge of the report on this resolution. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the various groups of people in this State shall find a spokesman to champion their cause and their right with the same ability, with the same logic and the same understanding of their problems, as that with which the gentleman in charge of the majority report on this resolution has set before you the mind of the poor and of the immigrant and the others who would suffer by this resolution, why, then we need not fear that our debates here are going to compare unfavorably with the debates in 1820 and 1853.

Rules of Evidence.

Mr. George W. Kelley of Rockland presented the following resolution (No. 189):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In all jury or non-jury trials, civil or equitable, in all courts of this Commonwealth, whether in the nature of contract, tort, or otherwise, — direct or circumstantial evidence which is material to the cause in issue, shall be sufficient for the consideration and verdict or judgment of the jury or court which hears the case; and any existing law or precedent antagonistic to this section is hereby annulled.

The committee on Judicial Procedure reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Tuesday, July 23, 1918; and it was rejected the same day.

Mr. Kelley of Rockland: I desire to state that this resolution, while it bears my name, is no child of mine. Had it been I would have made a different sort of clothing for it, so that one could tell whether it was walking backward or forward. I have no relation to it and am in no way the sponsor for it.

Mr. Lummus of Lynn: May I ask the gentleman from Rockland if he does not admit even the putative paternity of it?

Mr. Kelley: I admit nothing, except that the secretary informed the father that it could be presented only by a delegate of good and regular standing, — and I presented it.

Mr. McMaster of Bridgewater: I desire to say that when this resolution came before the committee on Judicial Procedure I inquired of my friend the learned justice who sits on my right (Mr. Kelley) as to its paternity, and he then denied the paternity, whereupon I stated to the committee that the learned justice so denied paternity, and the distinguished chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) stated that he had known the learned justice for some fifty odd years and he was very glad to learn that this proposal was no child of his.
VI.

CHALLENGE OF JUDGE AND JURORS.

Article XII of Part the First of the Constitution reads as follows: —

Art. XII. No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or offence, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel, at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty or estate; but by [A] the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

And the Legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment, excepting for the government of the army and navy, without trial by jury.

Mr. Louis Swig of Taunton presented a resolution (No. 29) providing for an amendment striking out, at [A], the words “the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land”, and inserting in place thereof the words: —

the law of the land or by the judgment of an impartial, disinterested, unbiased, and unprejudiced judge and jury, and to this end the parties for cause shall have the right to challenge the judge and jury or either of them. The Legislature shall establish reasonable rules, regulations, orders, laws and statutes regulating the exercise of this right to challenge.

The committee on Judicial Procedure reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted; and it was rejected in the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, July 25, 1917, by a vote of 33 to 130.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Swig of Taunton: It is with considerable fear and trepidation that I rise to discuss this measure, in view of the contempt expressed for judges of the district courts by my good friend from Boston (Mr. William H. Sullivan), but possibly he will have some sympathy with me, because I, too, in the measure that I am now going to advocate, have in mind some way of remedying defects so far as they pertain to the judicial administration of affairs in this Commonwealth. And following the example of the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights I, too, am going to read what I have to say, for fear that it may happen that in this present debate and argument I may say something concerning some of the judges which perhaps would be better left unsaid, because I have a considerable respect for the judiciary of Massachusetts. The measure that I have presented for the consideration of the Convention is numbered 29, but there is also another numbered 28. One pertains to the criminal side of the court, and the other pertains to the civil side of the court. All that I ask in my resolution, if you will read it with me on page two of No. 29, is to add a provision. The article reads:

And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty or estate; but by the law of the land — And here is the new part that I propose adding:

or by the judgment of an impartial, disinterested, unbiased, and unprejudiced judge and jury, and to this end the parties for cause shall have the right to challenge the judge and jury or either of them. The Legislature shall establish reasonable rules, regulations, orders, laws and statutes regulating the exercise of this right to challenge.

The whole endeavor of human society from time immemorial has been to secure for the individual an even-handed justice, so that the weak and the strong, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, may stand with equal favor before the blind Goddess of Justice. There was a time when individuals engaged in combat in order to secure justice, and from this crude beginning grew our courts. I dare say in those early days when it was proposed that the system of combat was not in keeping with the times, there were then, as there are now, men who held up their hands in holy horror at the suggestion of a change whereby a more complete justice might be had. What I seek to-day is to place into the fundamental law of our grand old Commonwealth, rich in its traditions of judicial progress, provisions which will insure to its inhabitants, so far as present human failings will allow, the guarantees of justice, so that our judicial system may continue to stand in the forefront and continue to blaze the way toward the goal of even-handed justice. Our forefathers realized, as we realize, that unless there can be an impartial administration of the laws, there can be no security for the people, and that anarchy and chaos follow in the wake of injustice. So, with that in mind, our forefathers, in the preamble of our Constitution, stated that:

It is the duty of the people, therefore, in framing a Constitution of government, to provide for an equitable mode of making laws, as well as for an impartial interpretation, and a faithful execution of them; that every man may find his security in them.

I am asking you to give effect to this sound principle.

There is not a member of this Convention who will not say with me that a person coming into court is entitled to a trial by a fair, impartial and disinterested jury. Then why not put into our Constitution what we say we are entitled to as a matter of right, namely, that there may be a trial by a fair, disinterested and impartial jury? It is as fundamental and essential to have our guarantees of a fair and impartial jury written into our Constitution, the instrument which is the bulwark of our rights, and the ever-living compact between us, as it is to recite any other right that is inherent in the people. Put in the Constitution what most people think is in it. Put in the Constitution what is in the Constitution of most every State in the Union, the right to have a trial before an impartial jury; and if we are to have that right, then we also should write into the Constitution the means of enforcing that right, namely, the challenge. The challenge of jurors is merely a legislative grant in this State, depending entirely on the grace and favor of the Legislature. We should not be beholden to any one for that safeguard of justice.

Mr. Chairman, I feel quite confident that were my resolution to stop right here, there would not be a voice raised in objection, as we now are accustomed to a challenge of juries, and the bugbear of novelty does not exist to scare away the timid. But my resolution goes further; it provides that there may be a challenge of the judge as well as of the juror; and here comes the rub. Let us pause for the moment and consider the resolution calmly and dispassionately. Let us be fair with one another. Let us get away from hidebound precedents, simply because they are precedents. Let us not be deaf to reason, through affection for an institution or for the individuals making up that institution. Let us realize that none of our human institutions is so perfect but what something can be and should be done to make it better serve mankind. I am no iconoclast. I do not want to tear down. I want to construct. I am no long-haired man with visions, tilting against windmills. I believe I am practical, and I want to discuss this matter, and hope that you will discuss this matter, in a practical way, so that reason, not affection, logic, not prejudice, judgment, not worship, should prevail.

A judge is a man. He is no more perfect than the rest of mankind. He has his fads and his fancies, his theories and his notions, his passions and his prejudices, just as the rest of mankind. A judge is only a human being, trained in the law. It is a mistake to mount a judge on a pedestal, and throw the ermine over his shoulders and then fall down in supplication and worship. And when I say this, I do not for one moment mean to attack our judiciary, because no one here has any higher regard for it than I, although to be sure some of the individuals making it up do not measure up to the high standard that we should like. But on the whole we have reason to be proud of our judges, and we should take advantage of every means that will make the weak among them strong.

We are living in a day of progress. Let us be progressive in our judicial administration. We are not living in the day of the kerosene lamp, for electricity lights the torch of liberty. We are not living in the day of horse locomotion, for automobiles dot the highways. We are not living in a day of the simple life with its simple problems. These are the days of strenuous living and complex problems. These are the days of the telephone and telegraph, and the wireless, carrying their messages of social unrest and stirring mankind to ever increasing demands for justice. Our rules for the administration of justice should keep abreast of the times, and should be equal to the demands of the day. Can you say that a judge whose entire life and association has been in an environment that scorns the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow can give fair and impartial and disinterested trial in a matter that involves the intrinsic obligations of capital and labor? Can you say that the habits and thoughts of a lifetime can be cast aside at a moment, and that the biased man can become a paragon of justice? Can you say that a judge on the bench loses all sense of kinship and that he can hear with equal favor a case in which some relative of his is interested? Can you say that a religious bigot, and there are some such on the bench, can so far forget his bigotry as to look with equal favor on all persons who come before him and can dispense justice fairly and impartially? Can you say that a man with a racial or color prejudice loses that prejudice the moment he robs himself in the gown of his office? I can go on and on and point out the various impulses that control judges, as well as laymen, but why take up the time of this Convention, when you are as well acquainted with these conditions as I? And in pointing this out, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the Convention, I am not attacking our judiciary nor our judicial system, but showing only where a link is weak, and how it can be strengthened.
When a person comes into court voluntarily or under a summons or under arrest and is compelled to have his case tried before a judge whom he believes is biased and prejudiced against him, that person, if the result goes against him, rails against the courts, decries society, considers justice has been denied him, and becomes a malcontent. Give that same individual the right of challenge and let the case go against him and he nevertheless will readily acquiesce and lay the result either to the weakness of his cause or to his manner of presenting it. Massachusetts long has recognized this trait of human nature in another way, when it has allowed its people the right of petition to the Legislature and the right to be heard before its legislative committees, and many and many a man who would become a troublesome element in the community were he denied the right to give vent to his feelings and ideas, remains a docile and peaceful citizen, though it means an annual pilgrimage to Beacon Hill to expound his theories whereby the world might be made better. Psychology has a marked influence on the human mind, and the influence on the mind of a litigant who will have the right to challenge should he desire it, will do much to allay the present suspicion of our judiciary, which is reflected by the many resolutions presented to this Convention on judicial tenure.

Judges, like other officials, hold office in the nature of a public trust, and should be accountable to the people. There should be some way by which the people can show to a judge their knowledge of his bias, and by means of the challenge preserve to themselves their right to a fair trial. A judge can go his way now and no matter how autocratic, or bigoted, or prejudiced, or biased, or interested he is, there is no way, upon cause being shown, of removing him from the trial of a cause. Mr. Chairman, I believe that a judge should be independent and that every safeguard should be thrown about him, so that his independence may not be weakened or assailed, so that he can sit on the bench and look every man in the eye without fear or favor, so that he can be his own lord and master, subject to no control but his own conscience and the wisdom with which the Almighty may have endowed him. And were I for one moment to believe that to challenge a judge would impair his independence, then I would not be here to-day advocating this resolution. But the challenge will not impair a judge's independence. On the other hand, it will strengthen it, because the just and independent judge never will be challenged, and his freedom from challenge will be an incentive to continued clear thinking and right doing.

Is it any more essential to have a disinterested jury than a disinterested judge? Let us not deceive ourselves by saying juries decide the facts and judges pass only on the law. In theory this is so in jury trials, but, led on by the subtle charge of the judge, rarely, if ever, does a jury bring in a verdict that is not forecasted by the words of the court. A judge, not only by what he says, but by the manner in which he says it, controls the deliberations of a jury, and any practical lawyer will tell you that the favor of the court is more than half the battle won. It is as essential, yes, more so, that the learned man sitting on the bench, with an eloquent tongue, and with the last word to the jury, should be fair and disinterested, as it is to have the jury panel made up of disinterested men. And to-day, Mr. Chairman, with the equity courts being widely used, and matters of gravest importance being heard by judges without juries, it has become more necessary than ever to have trials by disinterested judges. Only recently in a decision of our Supreme Judicial Court it called attention to the conduct of a certain judge as "substituting the preference of man for a rule of law." It may be argued that the Superior Court is not a court established by the Constitution and therefore nothing should be said in the Constitution concerning the right of challenge, but to my mind, all the more necessary is it to incorporate in our organic law the provision of the right of challenge, so that no matter what court or courts may be established by the Legislature, there should be the protection of the right of challenge of judges. I am not suggesting a brand new idea. Would that I had the brain to conceive an idea that is so conducive to human justice!

The right to challenge prevails to-day in many States, in one form or another. Some speak of it as a "challenge of the judge," others speak of it as "exception to the judge," while others speak of it as the "disqualifications of a judge;" all, however, no matter what term they apply, provide the opportunity for securing a fair judge by challenge or change of venue. And this right of challenge is not given by sagebrush States but by States that are numbered among the leaders in legal jurisprudence, among them being Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Oregon, New York, New Jersey, Iowa, Missouri, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, and many others, even including Porto Rico, the code of which was devised by our foremost legal thinkers. Nor is the practice confined to State courts alone. It is a right in the Federal courts and is provided for in Chapter 231, Section 21, Statutes of 1912. If there are any who feel that the right to challenge a judge is an attack on our judiciary, let them remember that the courts of the United States contain men as honorable, as capable, and as sensitive as our Massachusetts judiciary, and that it was that noble citizen, that peerless judge, that brilliant statesman and that honorable President, William Howard Taft, who by his signature made it the law in the Federal courts. I would ask your permission to read what the provision is in the United States Court.

Section 21 of the Judicial Code of the United States, in force January 21, 1912, reads:

Whenever a party to any action or proceeding civil or criminal, shall make and file an affidavit that the judge before whom the action or proceeding is to be tried or heard has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any opposite party to the suit, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be designated in the manner prescribed in the section last preceding.

And then follows the method whereby that might be done.

It will be argued that the rule that prevails in other States and in the Federal courts is statutory. This is true, because the challenge of judges has come into use only within recent years and since the States adopted their Constitutions, but whatever the reasons controlling in other States, we are here to set forth in our Constitution certain rights inherent to the people, and I say that here and now is the time and the place to give to the people the right to challenge both judge and jurors. It is for the Constitution to give the right and for the Legislature to establish the rules and regulations under which the right may be enforced. And so long as our proposed amendments are to be submitted to the people, the opportunity exists for ascertaining the public will on a matter that means a striking change in our judicial procedure. Were the Legislature alone to grant such privilege, there would be no way of knowing whether it is the popular will.

I will here beg your indulgence a moment to read a letter that I received from the member of Congress who introduced the Federal legislation:

House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C., July 9, 1917.

Mr. Louis Swig, Taunton, Mass.

My Dear Sir: — I am in receipt of your letter. I am the author of the provision in the Federal Statute authorizing a challenge of judges in both criminal and civil cause. It was so emasculated before I could secure its passage that I am much dissatisfied with it as it now is. As I originally introduced the amendment it was in substance as follows:

Whenever a party to any action shall file his affidavit stating that he does not believe he can have a fair and impartial trial before the judge (naming him) on account of his bias and prejudice, another judge shall be called to try the cause; but one change of judges shall be taken by each side in the cause, it matters not how many parties there are to the controversy.

I advocated this in the interest of fair trial. The provision was copied as originally introduced from the Indiana statute. As adopted it requires the party filing the affidavit to prove the judge is biased or prejudiced, an almost impossibility. No man in any case in my opinion should be required to have his cause tried before a judge whom he believes holds bias or prejudice against him or before whom he believes he cannot have a fair or impartial trial.

That was the principle that actuated Congress, and that was the principle that actuated William Howard Taft when he permitted this law to become the law of the Federal courts.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen of this Convention will give this matter the attention it deserves and not be prejudiced because the committee has brought in an unfavorable report, because it is a well-known fact, as Judge Kavanaugh of Chicago in a Chautauqua address at Taunton the other evening said, that it is the lawyers and the judges who have stood in the way of every judicial reform that ever has been proposed in this country, and I hope that the lawyers in this Convention will not interpose any objection to this resolution.

In conclusion, I just merely want to quote what Rufus Choate said in the Convention of 1853 in speaking of the judiciary. He said:

A judge must be a man, not merely upright, not merely honest and well-intentioned, — this, of course, — but a man who will not respect persons and judgment . . . he shall know nothing about the parties, everything about the case. He shall do everything for justice, nothing for himself, nothing for his friend, nothing for his patron, and nothing for his sovereign.

I echo that sentiment, Mr. Chairman, with all the fervor there is in me, and what I propose here to-day is to make sure that the sort of a judge of whom the eloquent Choate spoke is the sort of a judge who will sit on every case.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The Chairman: The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. Sullivan: The gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Swig) after a most eloquent speech said that I expressed contempt for the judges of the lower court. If I did it was most unfortunate, but I am perfectly certain I did not. I have the greatest affection for the judges whom I know in the lower court, and that has been increased rather than diminished by my experience on the committee on Bill of Rights, where three judges of the lower court sat, and I will add that my admiration and confidence and affection for the judges of the lower court has been increased by the able speech of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. My relations with the judges of all the courts for a period of almost twenty-five years have been most pleasant, and only one judge ever has discriminated against me for any reason. Out of probably seventy judges before whom I have come there are only five in whom I have not had absolute confidence, for whom I have not great admiration and large affection. My experience at the bar has been a very pleasant one, and my conduct here is not actuated by any grievance against any judge or lack of confidence in the judiciary. The thought I meant to convey to this Convention was that while I respected the judges of the lower court and the judges of all courts, after years of experience I have much greater confidence in the jury.

Mr. French of Randolph: It becomes my duty to explain very briefly, on behalf of the committee on Judicial Procedure, the reasons which actuated them in reporting adversely against this proposition. I do not know how generally it is known here that this is, in effect, an appeal from an adverse decision of the Legislature at its last session upon a petition introduced by the gentleman from Taunton (Mr. Swig). The first reason known, and the fundamental reason, which induced the committee on Judicial Procedure to report adversely upon this resolution was that it was not within the domain of the organic law. It is perfectly clear to the committee that if this resolution should be presented anywhere it should be presented to the Legislature, which has full power to deal with it as it sees fit. A distinguished writer upon civic affairs has said that "our whole political system rests on the distinction between constitutional and other law. The former are the sound principles laid down by the people in its ultimate sovereignty; the latter are regulations made by its representatives within the limits of their authority, and the courts can hold unauthorized and void an act which exceeds those limits."

The idea embodied in this resolution, Mr. Chairman, has no prototype in the Constitution of the United States nor of any State in the Union. Some of the States, it is true, as has been suggested by the delegate from Taunton (Mr. Swig), have undertaken, in one form or another, to make secure to the people the right to be tried by an impartial judge as well as by an impartial jury; but so far as the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is concerned I am one of those who believe, and the committee on Judicial Procedure with their wide combined experience believe, that the hope contained in the assertion of the framers of the Constitution, that it is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, independent and impartial as the lot of humanity will permit, here, at least, has been realized. In a long experience at the bar of this Commonwealth I never have known a case to be opened before a judge whom I believed entertained bias or prejudice against either party to the suit. If that evil exists it exists to so limited an extent that I believe it most unwise to attempt to put into the fundamental law that which does not belong there, and which, if it did, would protect merely against an evil which is of so rare occurrence and already is so wisely guarded against that it would not be proper or fitting to embody it in the Constitution of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Swig: I should like to ask the gentleman if he did not find it necessary, only very recently, to take advantage of a similar provision in the Federal law.

Mr. French: I assumed, sir, that that question might be asked me. My answer is "yes" and "no." The provision in the Federal law is quite different from the proposal suggested by the delegate from Taunton. One reason why I now am opposing the resolution of the gentleman from Taunton is that I did take advantage of the Federal statute which was at my hand, in the supposed interest of my client, but I became satisfied that it was absolutely a futile thing. Under circumstances where I believed that the rights of my client were prejudiced I found at my hand not a constitutional provision of the United States but a statute, a weapon that I might use, and which under the stress of the moment and implicitly believing that I was justified in using it I did use. It created an unpleasant situation and did my client no good. But even at that time I said to myself that if I had been a member of the Congress that enacted that law I should have voted against it upon principle.

Mr. Swig: Mr. Chairman, the only objection that has been voiced by the gentleman from Randolph is that a provision such as I proposed is not germane to the organic law, and that it should lie simply and solely with the Legislature. I wonder whether the gentleman from Randolph has read our own Declaration of Rights, wherein practically the same language is used, only in a different particular. I call his attention to section 29, page 15, as printed in the small booklet which has been handed to every member of this Convention.

It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit. It is, therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court shall hold their offices as long as they behave themselves well.

Our forefathers evidently thought that that principle should be incorporated in the organic law, in order that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court might hold their offices during good behavior. Now, therefore, if it was an inherent right to be mentioned in the organic law in order that the judges might hold their job during good behavior, why is it not inherent for the organic law to give the right to the people for all times to have a fair and impartial trial?
Mr. Charles R. Johnson of Worcester presented the following resolution (No. 49):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

[A] In all trials by jury in civil causes the agreement of [B] a less [C] number than the whole number of the jurors shall be sufficient to authorize a verdict.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

The Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, took up the consideration of the subject Thursday, July 26, 1917.

Mr. Charles P. Dutch of Winchester moved that the resolution be amended as follows:

By inserting, at [A], the words "The General Court may provide that"; by striking out the article "a", at [B]; and by striking out the word "number", at [C].

These amendments were rejected and the resolution was rejected by the Convention Friday, July 27, 1917.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Johnson of Worcester: This matter is one of three as to juries. No. 49, one which I presented, which, as you will see by your docket, simply is a permissive measure authorizing the Legislature if, in its wisdom, it sees fit to provide for non-unanimous verdicts, to fix any number less than twelve. It might be eleven or ten or nine. I do not suppose any one ever would expect less than nine. The two others provide, one of them for five-sixths and the other for three-quarters. I have nothing to do with those. I am not opposed to them but I simply speak for the measure which I have introduced.

In the year 1898, being a member of the House, I introduced a similar measure as a legislative provision. It was said then by some good lawyers that they thought that would require constitutional amendment and that it could not be done by the Legislature without constitutional provision. But it takes a good deal to get an amendment to the Constitution through by the large vote of both Houses and taking it two years, so I dropped the matter and have waited until this time, and, being a member of the Convention, which if it saw fit could introduce a matter which could be voted upon early, I thought it well to introduce that measure again.

It simply is permissive, authorizing the Legislature to provide for something less than a unanimous verdict of a jury. There has been a good deal of unrest of late years in reference to the matter of juries. Cases have been hung up. Cases have been tried at great expense, a long time spent, and the jury disagreed. Perhaps one or two persons would "hang," as the saying is, in the jury.

It is said, to be sure, that all verdicts are to a degree compromise verdicts, but there would be less of them if there were provisions for nine, ten or eleven jurors agreeing. I believe it is not uncommon for the juries, when they are out and find that they do not agree, and there is quite a large majority one way and they cannot change the others, to sit down and play cards until they tire them out;
if they cannot tire them out then they eventually decide to disagree.
Now, that has been done in a great many cases. I can refer to one specific instance which came to my knowledge,—a great case. That was the case of Tilton versus Beecher, back in the middle seventies.
The trial began about Christmas in 1874 and ended in the latter part of June 1875. The ablest lawyers in New York and of the country were enlisted,—Mr. Evarts, Mr. Shearman, Judge Fullerton and six or eight other very able men. More than six months were exhausted in that trial, and I do not know how much money was spent, only to result in a disagreement of nine to three. That is only one. That is a great case. But here in our Commonwealth you see enough of it. There are men who always are trying to get a disagreement, who try a case simply for a disagreement. If they get only one man that is enough. If such a provision as this were passed it would remedy one of the great defects, I think, of the law.

Some other States have tried this. They are mostly western States, the Dakotas, Nevada, Colorado, I think, and several other western States, and two southern States. Utah is one of the western States, and I remember North Carolina, and I think Mississippi, of the southern States. I think about ten or twelve have this provision. So far as I know there has been no changing back to the old system. I had a list which I furnished the committee on the Judiciary, furnished me by the commission for getting information for the Convention, on this subject. I have not got it back yet, and I can tell you simply the result,—that there are about ten or twelve States in the western part of the country, and a few southern States, that have adopted it; and so far as appeared by the record and the information collected by the commission, they never have changed back again.

Some have thought that this might be prejudicial to the interests of landed or corporate bodies. I do not think it would be. I think that now, where they have a good case and can get it through, they would do much better if they had this provision than to have the tort cases and other cases of like character hung up, and then have to be settled by paying something out of their treasury. I think that a poor man would be benefited also. If there should happen to be on a jury a representative or two of other interests, why, if the great majority of the jury saw fit to vote for him, after hours of discussion, he would get the benefit.

I see nothing in this matter but what is right and what is in favor absolutely of progress and of the despatch of business,—not of holding up matters and causing them to be tried over and over again. I think it is in the interest of good government and of the despatch of business. If you turn this matter around, if we had no provision for a unanimous verdict now and it was brought into this Convention, how many do you suppose would vote for that? I think very few indeed.
Therefore I submit to you, with confidence in the stand I have taken, with confidence in the merits of the case, that this measure should be advanced to another hearing, put on the docket, and that it should be given its chance before the people. I thank you for listening.
Mr. Burns of Pittsfield: The gentleman from Worcester who has just taken his seat is entirely correct when he says that this is a constitutional matter. Let me read you a quotation from Thompson and Merriam on Juries, which has been quoted with approval by the highest tribunals of several of our States:

When a Constitution preserves the right of trial by jury inviolate, the Legislature cannot change the number of jurors either in civil or criminal causes.

The gentleman has stated that all he proposes to do or contemplates by this resolution is to give the Legislature authority to provide that the number of jurors who may bring in a verdict may be less than twelve. I think, sir, that what I have just read to you is an answer to that proposition. Permit me also to read Article XV of the Declaration of Rights:

In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has heretofore been otherways used and practiced, the parties have a right to trial by jury; and this method of procedure shall be held sacred, unless, in causes arising on the high seas, and such as relate to mariners' wages, the Legislature shall hereafter find it necessary to alter it.

You will see, Mr. Chairman, that our forefathers provided that in just two cases the Legislature was given authority to alter it. Therefore, as I said at the outset, the gentleman is right when he says that this is a constitutional question. From the eleventh century the terms "jury" and "trial by jury" have meant twelve disinterested, unbiased, impartial and honest men. Let me also read to you the definition of a jury given by the Supreme Court of one of our States:

The term "jury" as used in the Constitution means twelve competent men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their homes within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and elected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party, duly empaneled and sworn to render a true verdict according to the law and the evidence.

What we would have, Mr. Chairman, if this resolution were adopted and approved by the people, would be a continuous running to each session of the Legislature by parties interested in having the number of jurors who might bring in a verdict any number below the number of twelve; and courts, lawyers and litigants would be unable to tell from one day to the next, if their cases were on the docket, whether they were to have a trial by a jury of twelve men, all of whom were to bring in a verdict, or a jury of twelve men, ten of whom, nine of whom, eight of whom, as the case might be, might bring in a verdict.

Your committee on the Judiciary, while it approached with some diffidence the subject found in the several measures following this resolution, and some of the members of our committee reserved their rights on those propositions, was unanimously of the opinion that this resolution ought not to pass. In short, that it is so phrased that it would be, to use a legal expression, or it ought to be, void for uncertainty; and that if anything of that kind was going to become a part of our constitutional law it ought to be definitely stated whether the number of jurors less than twelve who could bring in a verdict should be five-sixths, two-thirds, or three-fourths, as the case might be and as the people might approve.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we are of the opinion that this is not a proper resolution to be adopted by this Convention, that it never would be approved by the people, and that it does not preserve the rights of trial by jury inviolate, and that it would permit the Legislature to change the number of jurors, which is contrary to law and contrary to all precedent.

Mr. Johnson: There are a number of truisms stated by the gentleman from Pittsfield (Mr. Burns) as to what constitutes a jury, and that jurors and jury are recognized by the Constitution. That of course is true or we should not be here on this question. I have no pride of opinion. I am entirely willing that the other measures, or any change provided in the other two, shall be adopted rather than mine. But I thought in presenting it, in drawing it, that this was so simple that it would leave to the Legislature the right. We are not a legislative body; we are a constitutional body, and I thought myself that a Constitutional Convention was not the Convention, or not the authority, to provide the number. It seemed to me that the General Court in its wisdom was that body.

Now, I desire to make one other suggestion, and that has been made before and by higher authorities,—that this is the last human institution where unanimity is provided for anywhere. You have your selectmen deciding by a majority, you have your Legislature deciding by a majority, you have Congress deciding by a majority; and any decision, any veto, either of a Governor or of the President, may be overridden by a two-thirds vote. So that the jury is the very last institution where unanimity is required.

There is a great deal that might be said of the history of juries and how this matter came about; how, tracing it down to the trial by blood, and the trial by fire, and the other ways in which they used it, they came finally to the system of juries. In some countries they have the arrangement that it shall not be a unanimous jury. That it is the last,—in civilization, the last,—institution where unanimity is required. Great matters have been decided by majority vote only. The battle of Marathon was decided by a majority of one,—that early council of generals, in one of the greatest instances. Simply by a majority of one did they decide that that battle should be fought, and its result was most precious to the human race. I think we can leave this matter safely to the Great and General Court to provide in its wisdom some number,—to agree upon some number less than the total number.

Mr. Peletier of Boston: I rise not in the hope that I can illuminate this subject at all, rather out of a matter of personal pride, in that I should like to be recorded as favoring the proposed amendment. I think it is one of the most important measures that has come before this body. I think it stands the test that has been mentioned here in argument so often: Is there any public demand for such a change? I say there is, I say that any man who has been about the courts for a few years will know that there is nothing which brings more disgust to the human heart and soul, or to litigants, than the news that one man has held up a verdict. It does not correspond to our sense of justice or of fairness that one man should be able to hold up eleven and to put the litigant to further and greater expense. This is no new idea. It has been well tried and long tried in various States of this country, and the record is a good one. Wherever there has been this provision there has been no attempt to change it back to the old system we have here of a unanimous vote. I understand that this is simply permissive, that it does not say what the vote shall be, but it leaves it in a way that the Legislature may say whether it shall be unanimous, a majority, or some certain portion. It leaves the question open; and I predict that if the question is left open that the committee of the Legislature which has a bill relating to this next year will have one of the most largely attended meetings of that session. The people are interested.

It is a strange thing that the one man hold-up happens in a majority of the total cases, in my opinion, in personal injury cases. That ought not to be so, because when a man is injured his whole family knows it, his earning capacity is perhaps impaired. He goes back home and says: "Eleven men felt that I should have got a verdict but one man said No."

I believe it will tend to uphold respect for our courts, to hold the courts in our judicial system in greater respect, and I do hope that it will pass. I know that the gentleman who spoke first (Mr. Johnson) says that if there is any little defect in phraseology he gladly will agree to an amendment, so that no doubt should be left in the mind on that score.

Mr. Creed of Boston: Through the Chair I should like to ask the gentleman who has just spoken a question. Would he favor the Legislature reducing juries in criminal trials from a unanimous vote to a less number?

Mr. Pelletier: I would not, Mr. Chairman, I would not; but I understand this applies only to civil matters, it does not touch the criminal side.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I had not intended to speak on this particular amendment because the amendment which immediately follows, No. 203, is the only amendment which I have introduced into this Convention and I particularly anticipated making a speech on that amendment. The discussion, however, has taken a general turn, and inasmuch as these are all kindred matters I rise to give what arguments I have in favor of No. 203 at this time. If it should be deemed wise in the mind of this committee to recommend this amendment suggested by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Johnson) I would have no particular objection to that. I think it must be apparent, however, as is put forward by the gentleman from Pittsfield (Mr. Burns), that it would be better in the interest of stability to have written into the Constitution what proportion of the jury should agree. Therefore my amendment has followed almost identically the amendment adopted in the Minnesota Constitution and says that five-sixths of a jury in civil cases may agree on a verdict.

Now certain things in this discussion, Mr. Chairman, have been assumed. The first assumption is that this is a constitutional matter, and we do not need to speculate on that. The second proposition that I want to bring to your attention to-day is that this does not violate the provisions of the United States Constitution. That has been decided in Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 594, so that any questions which might have been raised by the learned gentleman from Pittsfield that this is a matter which has come down to us from Magna Carta and that the unanimity of the jury system is something holy and traditional and one of our constitutional rights have no effect whatever. We start to-day to discuss this matter as a new proposition. If we were laying down a provision to-day, would we insist that twelve men, a butcher, a baker, a lawyer, and a clergyman and whatnot, should not render a verdict, — and the word "verdict" means a true saying, — should not render a true saying unless every man on that panel absolutely agreed? Why, Mr. Chairman, the proposition is almost ridiculous on the face of it. While we have pulled along and obtained unanimous verdicts we have obtained them oftentimes, I fear, at the sacrifice of the opinion of some member on the panel.

Now somebody may say that I have not had any experience with juries, and there may be something in that. I have spent about the last six years attending to legislative duties and if I had tried as many cases as some of my colleagues have I could not have served the State with fidelity. But I am discussing this proposition, Mr. Chairman, from the academic and historic point of view. I had the honor to be appointed on a committee of the Massachusetts Bar Association by Judge Sheldon with Mr. Thomas W. Proctor and Mr. John E. Hanning of Boston to look into this proposition. We tried to sound the members of the bar of Massachusetts to see what ideas they had about it. But after all, Mr. Chairman, the lawyers have very small concern in this proposition; this is a matter which concerns the litigant primarily. This is a matter which concerns the man who takes all his property and all his fortune and lays it for determination before a jury of his peers. And I say to you, following out the statement made by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Johnson), that it is unfortunate in the extreme that that individual should be obliged to secure an unanimity of opinion of those men when it is not required in any other walk of life. Why, we have elected a President of these United States, if I am not mistaken, by one vote in the electoral college. Frequently we hear of decisions, — one was quoted here only yesterday, of our own Supreme Judicial Court, which was a four to three decision. If we required that every decision of our Supreme Judicial Court should be unanimous we either would have to stultify our judges or else get no decision at all. And we have in our Supreme Court of the United States instances where on the same matter the first time it was submitted the decision was eight to one one way and later on when the same matter was again submitted the decision was eight to one the other way, and the one man who reserved his rights to write a dissenting opinion the first time changed his mind and wrote a dissenting opinion when the court decided his way.

So we have this in committees of arbitration; so we have it in school-committees and so we have it in the Legislature. With some of the other members of this Convention I was present at the session of 1914 in the Legislature and saw matters decided differently from day to day because of the temporary absence of one member. A vote which was taken one day would be rescinded or reconsidered the next day. The provision for unanimity is traditional and nothing else, and I think to-day, Mr. Chairman, we ought to examine this question in the light of common sense, in the light of efficiency, if you please, in the light of the rights of the ordinary litigant to secure substantial justice and substantial justice speedily.

The opponents of this proposition will say that the facts and figures of the courts do not bear out the suggestion that there is any demand for the change in the law. They will stand on the fact that there is a very small proportion of disagreements recorded. Well, Mr. Chairman, there are disagreements recorded, and when those disagreements are recorded somebody suffers; somebody is obliged to hire a lawyer again, somebody is obliged to pile up the expense and the county is put to additional expense by reason of that disagreement. But that is not the only situation that might arise. A great many juries are practically forced into a verdict which they do not believe in. You may say that is a fair way of arriving at a compromise. That may be so, Mr. Chairman, but it is not the true reflection of the opinion of the men who sit on that jury. Under our present system it is possible that one man by reason of corrupt influences,—which is somewhat rare,—by reason of his friendship and interest in one or the other of the parties, or by reason of a certain turn of mind which he has which is absolutely contrary to the established facts, may hold up the entire eleven. And I submit that is a proposition absolutely foreign to democracy. That is a thing which we, as common-sense men to-day, considering for the first time, ought not to tolerate.

Now it is not to be applied in criminal cases. All the traditional arguments that are brought apply almost entirely to the criminal case. We throw certain safeguards around the criminal, one of which we retained here yesterday, to the effect that he might stand mute when accused. Other safeguards are thrown around him and one of them is that the State shall convince twelve men unanimously that he is guilty of a crime before he is punished. That is a proper and a necessary and a wise safeguard, but that safeguard does not exist in a civil case where one's rights are balanced against another, where the scales of justice should be held between one man and another and the question of the man's punishment by the State is not at stake. Therefore we approach this matter not in the light of tradition, not in the light of sentiment, but in the light of common sense.

Now what have other countries and what have other States in this country done in this proposition? You will be surprised, Mr. Chairman, when I tell you that of the civilized countries of this world the United States and England are the only two in which the unanimous verdict of a jury is required; that even in the United States there are upwards of fourteen States where by constitutional and statutory provisions unanimity in jury trials is not required. In France the jury system was introduced in 1771 and requires the two-thirds vote for a verdict. In Italy and Germany a majority is sufficient. In Austria eight of the twelve agree. An interesting provision applies in British India, where, after deliberation, if six of the jury are united and the judge agrees with them they render a verdict. The States in this country where less than an unanimous opinion is required are as follows: Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kentucky, Louisiana, Montana, Minnesota, Missouri, Nevada, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

This matter, in addition to having been enacted into statute in a number of cases, has been considered recently by the bar committees of various States and by investigating commissions in various States. I hold in my hand the report of the Bar Association of San Francisco made in 1910, and in their second recommendation they recommend reducing the number of jurors from twelve to seven, six to be competent to render a verdict:
Such a reduction in the number of jurors by an amendment of our State Constitution (the report continues) would not violate any provision of the United States Constitution.

It seems that the sacred number of twelve has for its main foundation the fact that the number of the apostles and the original number of the Jewish tribes was twelve.

The advantage of reducing the number of jurors in a saving of time and expense is too obvious to need any elaboration. A reduction in the number of jurors and a verdict of less than all was advocated by Mr. Van Dyke, afterwards a justice of our Supreme Court, in the Constitutional Convention of 1879.

That is the recommendation of the lawyers themselves in California.

In Colorado the agitation was maintained for some time for a majority verdict by the well-known judge of the juvenile court of Denver, Judge Lindsey. After the court there had passed on it they decided that the statute was unconstitutional and made an amendment to the Constitution necessary.

I am sorry that I have not to lay before you, Mr. Chairman, certain letters I received from the States in which this matter is being agitated. I hope that the clerk of the committee on the Judiciary to whom I handed these papers will read them to you before this debate is closed. I do not accuse the committee of secreting my evidence or anything of that kind, but I understand that several of the members of that committee are favorable to this five-sixths proposition and in support of it I hope they will read to you the statement from the judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Ohio, who outlines the workings of the five-sixths majority provision which obtains in Ohio, which was put into effect in the Constitutional Convention recently held in that State. I also submitted to the committee, Mr. Chairman, statements from a man in New York who stated that all of the three bar associations in New York favored majority verdicts in civil cases for the purpose of preventing corruption and retrials and undue influence on juries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, looking at the matter from the standpoint of contemporary history we are forced to the conclusion that a great many enlightened and up-to-date communities have seen the absurdity of retaining this relic of tradition in the jury system. Looking at it from the academic point of view, Mr. Chairman, we see that there is not another walk of life where unanimity of opinion can be obtained and is required to be obtained. And I am going to simply ask this Committee of the Whole, assuring them that I have no particular interest in this proposition beyond the fact that I have studied on it for four or five years in the Legislature, to simply use their own common sense in this proposition, and ask themselves whether, treating this matter as a new matter, it is not wiser and better all round to provide for a common-sense provision.

Mr. Stoneman of Boston: I am one of the members of the committee on the Judiciary who has reserved his rights to dissent from the majority report on one of these resolutions. I am not in favor of document No. 49, for the reason that the delegate from Pittsfield (Mr. Burns) has so well stated this morning. That document is extremely vague and does not furnish sufficient basis for a change of our jury system. I do favor No. 203, upon which the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates) just now spoke.

The origin of our jury system, which required unanimity of jury
VERDICTS OF JURIES.

verdicts, came in the early days of English history, when the English wrested from the barons and from the Crown the right of trial by jury and the right to "due process of law." Those conditions no longer apply, in modern history and in our present day. We no longer have an arbitrary power that governs us, as they did in those days in England. To-day we have a government "of the people, for the people and by the people," and that additional safeguard of unanimity of jury verdicts which was deemed necessary and essential in those days, is no longer necessary to-day.

I do not speak of criminal cases, but I do speak of civil cases. I have tried cases in the courts of this Commonwealth for nineteen years, and, as the learned district attorney from Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier) has so well said this morning, nothing is so great a disappointment, nothing embitters a litigant and the parties and counsel in courts so much as the going through with an important trial involving civil questions, and to find at the end of a long, tedious and expensive litigation that one man out of the twelve has hung up the jury. And generally when a jury is so hung up by one man there is a reason for it, and that reason generally is either ignorance or corruption, and in most cases it is corruption.

A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, I tried a case against one of the public service corporations in this city. It was a very important case, and a very eminent lawyer, who is now a delegate in this Convention, represented that corporation. The case was well tried. It took us a long time to try it. The jury retired and deliberated for thirty-six hours and then brought in a disagreement. The judge who presided was so interested in that case that he informally polled the jury, and it was found that that jury practically stood eleven to one, and that the twelfth man would not yield to argument, would not discuss the evidence, and would do absolutely nothing except to vote the way he did upon the first ballot. That was a disastrous experience in my own practice, and I have no doubt that every lawyer who has practiced in the courts of this Commonwealth has met with similar, if not worse, experiences.

Unanimous verdicts of juries, when they do not bring forth disagreement, bring forth what is even worse than disagreement, and that is a compromise verdict, which does not represent in any sense the true feeling nor the true opinion of all of the jurors. You all know of cases where when one man, for whose interest it is to hold up the jury, or "hang up" a jury, says to the rest of them: "I will stay here all night, and I will not yield from my position," some of the rest of the men get tired; some have wives and children at home, some have illnesses at home, and, rather than sacrifice their own convenience and comfort, which they cannot do in all cases, they have to yield, and yield to that one man, who may be either ignorant or corrupt, but, at any rate, is not the man who represents what justice should be upon that verdict. Then you get a compromise verdict, which is not the verdict that the jury ordinarily would render.

Some time ago a case was tried in our courts in Suffolk County where the plaintiff sued on two promissory notes, each for $1,000. The defence to both of them was forgery, and the only logical verdict that the jury could render was either a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000 and interest, or a verdict for the defendant. The jury was out for a long time and brought in a verdict of $1,000. Forgery was the defence on both notes, both notes given at the same time, by the same party to the same party; and then they compromised upon a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000.

In a great many personal injury cases there is precisely the same situation. A plaintiff injured by a public service corporation has a meritorious case. The question of liability is doubtful, but if the liability is fixed that plaintiff should have a substantial verdict, a verdict that should be commensurate with the injury that he has sustained, if there is liability. The jury goes out. One man or possibly two men on the jury are favoring the defendant, and they come in with a ridiculously low verdict, which does not represent in any degree, and does not compensate for, the injury which the plaintiff has suffered.

Mr. Chairman, as has been said by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Sanford Bates), in no other human institution to-day does unanimity prevail. In this very Convention, which is about to change the fundamental laws, the organic laws, of our Commonwealth, could we do anything, could we enact any proposition, could we make any progress of any kind, if we required unanimity? Could the Supreme Court of the United States, could the Supreme Judicial Court of our own Commonwealth, do any business or render any decision, whenever a division of opinion came about, if the unanimity rule prevailed? In corporations millions of dollars are voted away by directors without the rule of unanimity. In all walks of life the majority rules, and in all walks of life the majority rule seems to be sufficient. Suppose two litigants want to settle their differences out of court, and they refer their differences to an arbitration committee of three. No unanimity is required in those cases, and why, Mr. Chairman, should it be required in cases of juries, where they are thrown together from all walks of life and unanimity is less apt to prevail under those conditions than when you select your own tribunal?

Mr. Shea of Dalton: The last speaker has called the attention of the committee to the fact that when this matter came up before the committee on the Judiciary there were several of the members who reserved their rights. In the first instance I was one of those members. The arguments of my friend on the left (Mr. Sanford Bates) and of the gentleman who has last spoken (Mr. Stoneman) had a great deal of weight with me when they spoke before the Judiciary committee. It seemed to me that the majority rule, which was observed in our affairs of government, would apply also to our jury system, but when you come to analyze it you very likely will note that this is not so. Years and years of experience have shown us very clearly that the majority rule in government is preferable, and the more we see of it the more we are convinced of that. But years and years of experience with the jury system have shown us that it is quite satisfactory and the more we see of it the more we recognize its beauty and its strength, and the more we see in it the wisdom of those men who fashioned it. It is apparent that if we are to make any change, the burden is on those who would make that change to convince us that there is need of it. They tell you that the rule of unanimity is bad in all cases, yet the learned gentleman from Boston (Mr. Pelletier) has told you that he would not change a jury in criminal cases. I ask you why? Does he distrust the rule in one case and trust it in another? Why should he change it on the one hand and retain it on the other? If every man in this Convention is satisfied, and I think most of us are, to retain the present rule in criminal cases, why is it? Is it not true that we wish to get the protection of every man on that jury? Is this because liberty and life are more precious? Yes, indeed they are, but is the principle any different? Gentlemen of the Convention, we of the Judiciary Committee thought not.

It also has been said here that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction found with the present system. Is that a fair statement of the case? They say changing conditions have brought this about. My own years of experience do not justify any statement in that respect but it has been called to my attention by older members of the bar that the litigant of to-day is not to be compared with the litigant of days gone by. In the days gone by they did not mind going out and mortgaging their farms and fighting to the last ditch. They do not do that any more. But if they were satisfied, as they were in the old days when they fought so bitterly, what shall we say to-day, when men approach litigation with so much diffidence and unconcern?

Then they say to-day that the lawyers' position in this matter is only a small consideration. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is not so. Lawyers are most interested. This Convention is made up of a great many lawyers, who know their success in a great measure depends on the outcome of jury trials; not only that, but they know their very livelihood depends on them. If any one has a complaint to offer, they of all others should know it well. I have taken this up with some of the oldest members of the profession; men whom I have heard come out of trials with complaints, and I have asked them in all seriousness if they were ready to change the system. With very few exceptions I have found that they were not. The Judiciary Committee has given this matter a great deal of attention. It is made up of men of considerable experience. It has recommended that this measure ought not to pass. We trust, Mr. Chairman, that this Committee of the Whole will give this matter due consideration before changing the present jury system in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Davis of Malden: I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Boston in the second division (Mr. Pelletier) to the fact that one great State that has tried this proposition has seen fit to change it. The Constitution of the State of Texas provided that three-fourths of a jury might render a verdict in civil cases, but it also provided that the Legislature might change that rule and provide for a unanimous verdict. After trying the system of less than a unanimous verdict for a time, — I do not know exactly how long, — the Legislature of Texas found that it did not work and it changed the rule, so that it now requires a unanimous verdict in civil cases; and, so far as I know, that rule is still in force in the State of Texas.

As already has been said I think it is incumbent upon any one who proposes a change in our Constitution in this Convention to demonstrate clearly to us that the change which he proposes will work better than the present method of dealing with the same subject. He must show us that the method he proposes will better serve in the administration of the principles of justice, will better protect human rights. I do not believe, in this instance, that those who have spoken in support of this measure have sustained their position. I know that the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division (Mr. Stoneman) out of a long experience, covering nineteen years, trying hundreds of cases, perhaps thousands of cases, in this Commonwealth, has selected one or two isolated cases in which he believes that the verdict rendered by the jury was not just and fair. We do not claim that the present system is perfect, and I do not believe that anybody would be so insane as to maintain that any system that is human ever can be perfect. But we do claim that the present system of the trial of jury cases is as near perfection as can be obtained.

The gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates) has called your attention to the fact that less than unanimous verdicts are allowed in Scotland, in many of our States, and on the continent of Europe. I ask you, gentlemen, if this Commonwealth is ready to adopt the system of jury trials that maintains on the continent of Europe? So far as I am familiar with them, from newspaper reports, they seem to be conducted primarily for the entertainment of spectators and not to do justice to the litigants. It also has been stated to you that litigants and not lawyers are interested in this proposed change. If that be true I am surprised that no single litigant who is not a lawyer appeared before our committee in support of these proposed amendments.

Mr. Sanford Bates: I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that not only was his hearing not extensively advertised, but that he did not even give me notice, as the proponent of one of the measures, to come and be heard before the committee?

Mr. Davis: I am not familiar with the means taken to advertise the hearing; but the hearings of the committees of this Convention have been advertised in the bulletin and advertised in the newspapers, and the information was easily obtainable by anybody who desired to be heard; and we were especially careful in our committee to give every person who wished to be heard an opportunity to state his case.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I might state that I personally know of three instances where the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates) was sent for and could not be found.

Mr. Sanford Bates: I also personally know, Mr. Chairman, — not to prolong this colloquy any further, — but I know I sat for three days listening in the committee on the Judiciary before my matter was reached.

Mr. Davis: The Hon. Edgar Aldrich, in an address before the Grafton County Bar Association said, in reference to this proposition to do away with unanimous jury verdicts:

For myself I do not see sufficient occasion for a change. My observation is that there are, comparatively speaking, very few disagreements. Out of nearly one hundred cases, civil and criminal, which I have tried since I left the bar, I do not recall but three disagreements.

This is from a man who, at the bar and on the bench, had had long opportunity and occasion to observe the workings of the jury system. Again, Mr. Chairman, they tell us that the jury is the only body requiring a unanimous decision, that boards of directors, city governments and arbitrators do not require a unanimous decision. I quote again from the speech of the same learned Justice, where he says:
NEITHER DO I SEE MUCH FORCE IN THE CLAIM THAT, BECAUSE A MAJORITY OF THE JUDGES MAY DETERMINE THE LAW, THAT A MAJORITY OR TWO-THIRDS OF A JURY OF TWELVE SHALL DETERMINE THE FACTS. THE JUDGES HAVE A MAJORITY FOR THEIR LAW, THEY HAVE A SYSTEM, A STANDARD; AND IF THE MAJORITY GO WRONG AN INTELLIGENT PROFESSION AND HONEST COURTS WILL CORRECT THEM AND REPAIR THE SYSTEM.

A JURY HAS NO MEASURE OR STANDARD FOR A DECISION OF DISPUTED FACTS. HENCE, THIS GREAT AND NECESSARY PRINCIPLE WHICH REQUIRES A UNANIMOUS VERDICT.

The distinction here made between unanimous verdicts and unanimous decisions of the court would apply equally to decisions by other deliberative bodies as compared with juries. If a board of directors passes a vote which ought not to pass, it can change that vote at a subsequent meeting and correct the error. If a city government acts hastily and unwisely, that act, too, may be reconsidered subsequently and justice done. It is true that by a new trial or an appeal the litigant eventually may get justice, but that is an expensive procedure.

You have been told the result of having a jury held up by one juror who may be ignorant or dishonest. I should like to have some of those gentlemen state to this committee how many cases they have ever known where such facts existed. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in disagreements there are very few cases where the jury stands one to eleven, or two to ten. So that in view of the small percentage of disagreements we have to-day, probably three or four per cent of the total number of jury cases tried, the lessening in the number of disagreements would be very small. Now, there are gentlemen who want this committee to believe that jurors are dishonest. Would they have us believe that in nearly every jury in this Commonwealth there is to be found one man who is willing to sell himself to one of the litigants; who is willing to violate his oath as a juror for a bribe? I, for one, have a higher estimation of my fellow-men than that, and I hope that I never shall be compelled to think so lowly of my associates.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the jury system from the beginning has afforded protection to the weak and the oppressed. It has been the great means by which the poor obtained justice in our courts. If we depart from the well-established custom in our own State and authorize juries to return verdicts which are less than unanimous, we are inserting a wedge which eventually will destroy our jury system. It is but the beginning on the part of those who wish us to break down this system, who wish eventually to do away with it entirely. You have been told that several of our States already have adopted such measures. You will note, gentlemen, that those States are southern or western States, not one of which compares in any degree with this Commonwealth. A citizen of Massachusetts is able to point with pardonable pride to the workings of our judicial system. We have had a long line of eminent judges, who have seen to the just administration of law in our courts; rich and poor can obtain justice; and I do not believe, gentlemen, that we are going to rush to change that system on the demand of a few. It is true that certain writers on the law for years have advocated such a change. But, gentlemen, ordinarily a person who writes learnedly on the law is one who, having failed at the bar, spends the remainder of his life nursing a well-developed grouch, and writing learnedly on subjects about which he has little practical knowledge. I trust, gentlemen, that the report of the committee on the Judiciary will be accepted by the committee in these cases which involve the same principle.
Mr. Whipple of Brookline: I am impressed with the fact that this is an exceedingly important matter which we are discussing; I think it deserves argument and grave consideration. As I have listened to what has been said I have tried to state to myself, to fix in my own mind, the arguments which can be made in favor of requiring a unanimous verdict of a jury, and I can find only one that impresses me, and that is that it is a system which we have had for years, a system which we always have had, and we are reluctant to change. That is the only argument I find in favor of retaining the requiring of a unanimous verdict. But, on the other hand, there have been able and cogent arguments presented, and well presented, why a change should be made. I shall not attempt to repeat them because they are impressive enough as they have been stated, and I can hope to contribute but little in addition to what has been said.

There is one thought, however, which perhaps has not been expressed. Litigation to-day is exceedingly expensive,—expensive not alone to the litigant but expensive to the Commonwealth; and personally I have had an experience similar,—and more than one indeed,—to that of the gentleman who sits at my left (Mr. Stone- man). Only a few years ago, for six or seven weeks we tried diligently a difficult and important case, only to find at the end that there was one man who had made up his mind very early in the trial and who sat disputing with his eleven associates for some thirty-six hours, until they were discharged. When we are late at court we are reminded by the judges that a session of court is held at an expense to the county of $300 a day; you can figure how much it costs the county to have you ten minutes late. You can figure six weeks at $300 a day and see what that trial costs the county, and then also what another trial would cost the litigant. Why, what better judgment would you get by having the decision of twelve men than if you had had a majority of the jury? I fail to see.

Furthermore, although such things seldom happen, it is known that such things as tampering with the jury occur; and if that is attempted it is much easier to reach one man, who can tie up a jury just as effectively, as far as the plaintiff is concerned, as if he could have a verdict declared in favor of the defendant. It is an aid to the wealthy litigant, the man with the longest pocketbook, the wealthy defendant, the wealthy corporation defendant, because everything that goes for uncertainty, everything that goes for delay, everything that goes for expense, makes in favor of that defendant, and makes it unfair for that plaintiff. You are removing an incubus on litigation and in favor of those of slenderer means. As it stands now every advantage is in favor of the wealthy. And you are reducing the cost of litigation, because cases ought to be heard once for all, and one decision, after a long trial, ought to be enough to settle the controversy.

Once more, one other consideration; it affects the willingness of gentlemen to serve upon a jury. If they can be tied up, as they so frequently are, by one or two men, kept from their homes, and kept in narrow, ill-ventilated and smelly quarters all night long, and perhaps two nights, they are reluctant to serve upon a jury. But if you make it possible for a majority of intelligent men to determine an issue, determine it once for all, and determine it shortly, as they would in almost all instances, you will remove that objection, and you will get the better class of men willing to serve upon the jury. For these considerations which have been suggested to the Convention, and those which I have attempted to voice, I am strongly in favor of some measure which will permit the Legislature to enact legislation which will require less than the unanimous verdict of a jury.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: While I personally am inclined to vote against each of these measures,—for I take it we are discussing both of these measures under document No. 49,—I am not prepared to speak at length in justification of that opinion, except I will say this: That I won my first jury case only because one man out of the twelve held up and insisted on serious consideration of the matter for some three hours and won the entire jury to his view, so that my client, who in that case was a poor client and could not afford another trial and could not afford to lose, was protected by the unanimous rule.

What I arise to speak on is this,—a possible confusion here between these two measures, and the point is made by the closing remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Brookline who just spoke for the poor litigants (Mr. Whipple). We had first of all No. 49 presented; then we had those who have favored chiefly this measure saying that they preferred the second one, No. 203, and criticizing each of them for not being in proper shape.

Now it strikes me that if we are to tackle this matter at all it ought to be No. 49 properly amended; that No. 203 is decidedly objectionable as being statutory in character. It goes into details; it tells when the stop-watch shall be put on the jury; it specifies twelve hours rather than eleven or thirteen. Nobody has shown why twelve hours should be selected rather than four or five or six as is provided in the west, but presumably twelve is better than five or six, because I am told in some western States, where there is a five or six hour rule, they take one ballot and if there is a disagreement they proceed to play some little card game until the time has expired, and then they report in and they do not spend the intervening time trying to get serious consideration to the case. But nothing has been shown why we should write into the Constitution an absolute detail fixing this at twelve hours rather than eleven hours or fifteen hours. I submit we ought to put in here only what is proper in an organic law and if we are to make any change whatsoever it should be in line with the change suggested, namely, that the Legislature is authorized to provide that a lesser number than the whole may bring in a verdict. And to that effect I move the following amendment:

Insert at the beginning of line 4 the words "The General Court may provide that"; strike out the article "a", in line 4, at the end; and strike out where it first appears, in line 5, the word "number"; so that the article of amendment will read:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court may provide that in all trials by jury in civil causes the agreement of less than the whole number of the jurors shall be sufficient to authorize a verdict.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that there may be danger of this committee losing sight of the real and controlling reason why in our law to-day we require a unanimous verdict of our juries. How many of you gentlemen have thought it over and are prepared to say that you know why a unanimous verdict is required? What reason has my learned friend on my right from Brookline (Mr. Whipple) or the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates), who has assailed this provision of our law, given to you why the law exists? Out of the wealth of their knowledge and experience they assign only one reason, and that is its antiquity. And yet, sir, there is not a lawyer who has had a broad experience in the trial courts of this Commonwealth but knows that is not the true reason. The real reason, the true reason, the reason is, it is there for the protection of the poor and humble as well as the wealthy and the powerful, for all parties who may come before our courts.

When I sue my fellow-man what do I do? I invoke the courts of this Commonwealth. I take him from his daily occupation. I compel him to employ a lawyer, I compel him to go out and get witnesses, I bring him before the court. In the exercise of my legal right under the law I have a right to do all this. What does the law then say to me in the protection of that man's rights? "Mr. McAnarney, before you take one dollar of that man's money you must go before twelve honest, true men of your county and show to those men, satisfy them by the fair preponderance of proof, that you are entitled under the law to take his hard-earned dollars out of his pocket and put them into yours. When you do that you will be entitled to a verdict in your favor, but unless you do that you will not be entitled to such a verdict."

What does the court say to those twelve men? It says to them: "Gentlemen, before you return your verdict for either of these contestants," — for the plaintiff, if you will, if we are to try this question on the basis of a tort case, — "for the plaintiff, if you will, — you should be satisfied, each of you, — each of you, by a fair preponderance of the proof, that the plaintiff under the law is entitled to a finding in his favor."

What does that mean? It puts the individual responsibility, a solemn and serious responsibility, upon each one of the jurors. Every one of them then takes the cause under the solemnity of his oath; they retire to the jury room each charged with the duty, if they agree, of coming into court and saying: "I have been satisfied by the evidence, by a fair preponderance of proof." None of them is allowed to shirk his duty as a juror and say: "The majority of my fellows agreed upon this verdict and there was no good of my considering it." The law says each of them must be satisfied in civil cases by a fair preponderance of the evidence. And why does the law say that? Here we come to the nub, in my judgment, of the whole thing.

The law says that because it draws together twelve men from different walks of life, of different training, different habits and mode of thinking and in approaching the solution of every problem that may be submitted to them, each has the benefit of the experience and views of all the other members. What is necessary that a just verdict should be returned when twelve such men meet to consider the proposition? It can be answered in one word, — deliberation. Fair deliberation is what is needed to bring in a just verdict. And, sir, if the jury know that they have got to agree before they can find for the plaintiff or defendant, what does that mean? It means deliberation. It spells deliberation and thoughtful consideration of the problem presented by the case by each of those men, with due regard for any honest difference of opinion which may exist between them when they retire in the first instance to their jury room. And is not that, sir, what you would want if you were on trial before a jury? Do you want cases decided without due and careful deliberation by each juror? The very purpose of unanimity is not to preserve a relic of antiquity, but it is to carry into the jury room that which every one of us asks, expects and ought to be able to receive,—calm, deliberate, thoughtful consideration by those who are passing upon our property rights or liberties.

Shall you say to the jurors of this Commonwealth: "Gentlemen, you have not got to decide this case by sitting down calmly and thoroughly considering it; go out and poll it as you would a political contest and decide it by a majority verdict"? Or shall you say to them: "Gentlemen, remembering the responsibilities of your oath approach the consideration of this question from the viewpoint of studying it thoroughly and carefully and then bring in your decision whichever way it may go"?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that is the real purpose of the law requiring unanimity by a jury in returning a verdict for either party, and not, as has been stated here, to preserve any piece of antiquity. Is that a wise provision of law? I leave that to the judgment of the committee. Does it appeal to you to be wise? I wonder which one of the gentlemen on this committee, if he had a case which involved his own home and he had worked hard to gather the money together which bought that home and put it into it,—I wonder which one of you if it were a question of whether that home should remain with you in your old age, or pass on to somebody else, and the question was before a jury, would say: "I object; I don't want the jury to be obliged to be unanimous in agreeing upon a verdict; I don't want that jury to be obliged to give careful, deep and thoughtful consideration and study to the question before they find that my home shall leave me and go to some one else." Would you do that? Is there a man here who would protest and object against a jury being obliged to do that? If so, Mr. Chairman, would I be offensive if I said I think he belongs somewhere else?

The burden is not a hard one that is placed upon him who brings litigation into court. All he is asked to do is to satisfy twelve honest minds that he is right,—not to a moral certainty in civil cases, only by reasonable preponderance of proof.

Sir, I cannot and I will not approach the discussion of this question from the viewpoint of those who come here citing their personal experience in one or two cases. It seems to me that belittles the question. I have had some experience in the trial of causes. My experience as plaintiff's attorney has been very large. I also have defended many causes. There are men sitting in this Convention who have represented corporations when I was opposing them, appearing for the plaintiff. And, sir, speaking now from an experience born from all the litigation in which I participated, in not one case would I have preferred to have had the cause I represented decided by a verdict of a majority only of the jury. I wanted in each case the jury to retire and think well and carefully upon the evidence. How true it is we frequently find when twelve men get together there are some of them, two or three of those men, who, by virtue of their training and business experience, have more knowledge of the particular subject-matter involved in the case than their fellows, and if a majority verdict were to determine the question on the first ballot it might be ten to two; yet when it requires a unanimous verdict those two men, honest and conscientious, responding to their oath of office, sit there and discuss with their fellows and tell them what they know of the problems presented by the trial, lending the weight of their judgment and experience to their fellows. How often their fellow-jurors, profiting by their advice, their knowledge and experience, have reversed the first ballot and brought in a just and true verdict in the end. We have disagreements,—yes, we do; we always will have them. It makes no difference whether you require a unanimous verdict or eight out of twelve or nine out of twelve or ten out of twelve, you still will have your disagreements. But are those disagreements many in proportion to the great number of causes that are tried? Will any lawyer rise in this Convention and out of the wealth of his own experience tell you that in a large percentage of his cases tried under the system now in existence he has had disagreements? None will do so, because the contrary is true; juries have agreed and they do agree in the overwhelming majority of cases.

There is another danger, and if I were to argue this proposition from the viewpoint of a tort lawyer I would say there was a great and an appalling danger to those who represent the plaintiffs in tort cases in less than a unanimous jury verdict. They charge here the possibility that men may be bribed to violate their oath of office, one or two men, and they may control the verdict. Ah, if those one or two men are bribed, if they are of such character they can be bought, how easy it would be for them to bring to bear the fruit of their bribery in the size of the verdict rather than on the question of liability, and how many wealthy corporations there are which would welcome a practice,—welcome indeed with open arms a practice,—if those who represent them were so dishonest as that, which would permit them to throw the weight of their force and their corruption in favor of the small verdict which would mean nothing to the plaintiff. Many times, sir, in my personal experience at the bar, many times within the court-house near by this State House, have I asked the juries in returning verdicts where I appeared for the plaintiff, to return such a verdict, if they decide to render one for the plaintiff, as would be really one in favor of the plaintiff, and not, by bringing in too small a verdict, leave it so that neither counsel nor court could tell whether they really found in favor of plaintiff or for the defendant. What the plaintiff fears is a small verdict, the jury really seeking to bring in a verdict for the defendant.

Mr. Chairman, this is a grave and an important subject. My friend on my left in the first division (Mr. Dutch) when he recited the experience of his first case struck the keynote. It is important for the poor man as well as the rich man. You cannot treat our courts of justice from the standpoint of expense. You cannot measure your administration of justice by the dollars and cents it takes to try a case or what it costs the county. The county does not object. Very often, as my friend on my right (Mr. Whipple) has said, the judges will remind parties that the county is bearing the burden. But there sits in this room to-day a gentleman with whom I fought a hard case not long ago and we tried it for a whole week and the jury returned a verdict of $750 for the plaintiff, and it cost Norfolk County several hundred dollars to try that case. It was a unanimous verdict. The judge thought it was an unjust verdict and he did not hesitate to order a new trial, although he knew it might lead the county to an additional expenditure of several hundred dollars for another trial. So we want to strip from the consideration of this cause any such thought as expense to the county, because when you come to measure human rights by dollars and cents you are proceeding on false premises.

My friend in the second division, the learned district attorney from Boston (Mr. Pelletier), was asked if he would extend this rule to criminal cases and he answered "No." Why not? That answer gave the whole case away; why not? Are you less likely to get a just verdict in a criminal case if you have less than a unanimous finding of the jury than if you adhere to the established practice of having a unanimous finding? Is it essential in criminal causes to have a unanimous finding by the jury? Do you get nearer the truth by unanimous verdicts of your juries in the criminal courts? Then if you get nearer the truth and your verdict is more apt to be a just one when so returned, if that is a sound argument for criminal causes why does it not carry equal weight when applied to the trial of civil causes? Is the property that I have worked and struggled for for years, which I hope to pass on to my child or to those who may be dependent on me, less sacred to me than a trial of a petty criminal case might be? It seems to me the answer the gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) made was a complete answer to his own argument.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken longer than I intended, but to me, speaking in behalf of litigants of all kinds, I think this matter so important that it would be well for this committee to stand by the finding of the Judiciary Committee. Before I close let me, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, refute the suggestion made in the statement of the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates). After he made the statement that the hearings on this matter were not advertised I spoke with the clerk of the Judiciary Committee, himself a man in favor of the new proposition. I asked him as to whether he advertised the hearings as he was ordered by the committee, and he tells me he advertised them in the Boston Herald, the Boston Post and in a Springfield paper and also the hearings were announced in the bulletin. Any one of the clerks in the Secretary's office will attest the truth of that statement. The hearings on this resolution were advertised. In conclusion, not one lawyer of experience in the trial of jury causes, not one party who ever had been a litigant in our courts, not a man who ever has served on a jury, came before the committee and advocated such a change as is proposed, not one. Their absence was eloquent and significant. [Applause.]

Mr. Love of Webster: In reply to the gentleman in this division who has just spoken (Mr. McAnarney), it has not yet been pointed out by any who have spoken on either side of this question that there is a distinction, and a very clear distinction, between criminal cases and civil cases, in this respect: That in the criminal case, the criminal action, there is but a single issue to be tried, and that is whether or not the defendant is guilty or not guilty. In the criminal case there is no chance for a compromise. The jury is to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt on that one single issue, or report a disagreement. But, on the other hand, in civil cases there are two important and two distinct issues to be tried. First: The question of whether or not the plaintiff has satisfied the jury by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant is liable; and then, secondly: The very important issue, in case liability is found, as to how much of a verdict is to be rendered.

It seems to me that the fact that there are two separate issues to be tried in civil actions makes it unnecessary, and makes it in fact undesirable that a jury should be pinned down, confined and constricted, by the necessity of being unanimous in their verdict. I introduced a resolution, Document No. 204, and, like the gentleman from Worcester in the first division (Mr. Johnson), I have no particular pride of opinion in my particular resolution. That provides that three-fourths of the whole number of the jury may bring in a verdict. So far as I personally am concerned, as I said, I have no particular pride in my particular resolution calling for that particular proportion; and I am in accord with the gentleman in the first division, the author of Document No. 49 (Mr. Johnson), as amended by the amendment proposed by the other gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dutch).

It seems to me that this matter, if the principle is carried, may be left safely to the Legislature. I have attended some of the hearings of this committee, and one thing, one fact, which impressed me particularly, in its bearing upon the interest which needy litigants have in this matter, was this: That the representative of one of the largest public service corporations in this Commonwealth appeared before the committee and argued long and earnestly in opposition to this measure, frankly stating to the committee at the outset that he was there in behalf of the public service corporation which he represented, for the purpose of saving that corporation's money. He said, —I am not quoting his words exactly, — but he said in substance to the committee that if this change was made in our jury system it was going to cost the public service corporation which he represented thousands and thousands of dollars in the future, because, he said, there always is to be found, on any jury, one or two men, or sometimes more, — but one or two men at least, — who can be depended upon to cut down the verdict, and keep the verdict down to what he, or what the defendant, considers proper. It seems to me that that is the real impelling reason for a change in our system of trials by jury in civil actions; that always there is in a civil action a chance for a compromise, and that jurors who have had more or less experience on the jury realize that fact; and it is not disputed, and will not be disputed by any lawyer who has had any practice of any extent before juries, that time and again one or two men deliberately at the outset of a case, not that they are absolutely convinced that the plaintiff has not made out liability, not that they are absolutely convinced of that, but for the deliberate purpose of cutting down a verdict, will withhold their vote on the question of liability, will vote absolutely and continually against liability on the part of the defendant, in the hope, which often is gratified by the other members of the jury, that a compromise will be reached which will deprive the plaintiff of that to which he is entitled.

The same thing works, on the other hand, the same rule is applied, in the case of a man who is prejudiced in favor of the plaintiff. A man who is prejudiced in favor of the plaintiff will be in favor of getting the plaintiff something, and will vote absolutely for liability until he brings his fellow-jurors around to the promise of a small verdict. Time and again verdicts have been brought in in civil cases for small sums where there was absolutely no liability on the part of the defendant; and in more cases, the large proportion of cases, the plaintiff has been deprived of his substantial rights. As the district attorney from Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier) has said, when the litigant goes into court he goes in with the expectation of having his case determined, not postponed, or being obliged to go in again. Furthermore, and what is more important, he goes into court with the expectation and the right, if he is a plaintiff, and the jury finds, or a substantial part of the jury finds, that the defendant is liable, — he goes into court with the right to demand that he shall receive every cent that he is entitled to, and that it shall not be within the power of one or two men to cut down his verdict. On the other hand, if he is a defendant he goes into court with the right to demand, if there is no liability on his part, that he shall not be obliged to spend one single cent.

Mr. French of Randolph: After a longer experience than I care to remember, both in the State and the Federal courts, I have acquired a profound though not, I hope, a servile respect for the verdict of a jury. The jury system, sir, like all other human systems, as has been so frequently said, is far from perfect, for "except all men were good," as More says in the "Utopia," "all things cannot go well." And there are bad juries and good juries because there are bad men and good men; there are weak juries and strong juries because there are weak men and strong men. It is unfortunate for a litigant on either side of the case if he is obliged to present his case or his defence to a weak jury or a jury the majority of whom, as is sometimes the case, are the weakest men upon the panel. It is a misfortune if a party comes before a bad jury, for the same reason. Of course we all know who have had experience in jury trials that the men upon a panel often vary widely not only in their experience, in their intelligence, in their education, but in their sense of honesty and justice.

Now, sir, I have had the pleasure and the honor of meeting in contest before a panel of twelve men many times, — more times perhaps than any one man in this Commonwealth, — the able and eloquent advocate from the city of Quincy (Mr. McAnarney), and I should have undertaken, if he had not, to state to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Convention what he has said to you in more eloquent language than I could express it. There is only one thing, sir, that I believe I can add to what he has said. We are dealing now, — and he has suggested it in another form of words, — we are dealing now with a tribunal into the presence of which we are likely to be summoned at any time to defend on the civil side of the court our property, — perhaps all our property, — on the criminal side of the court all that we hold dear, our reputation, our liberty and perhaps our lives. Do we wish by the adoption of any of these amendments to weaken the protection which, under the Constitution and common law, that tribunal has granted to Anglo-Saxons for many generations? Certainly it is obvious that the greater the number that is required by law to be unanimous before our property is taken away or our liberty or our lives,—because the question is the same in either event,—the greater the number that is required to be unanimous the more secure we are. And my learned friend from Quincy has pointed that out. If we reduce that number we are giving up one of the big securities which the Constitution of Massachusetts as framed by the fathers, developed from Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence for many centuries, has given us for our protection.

Now what he has not stated, sir, it seems to me, is the practical reason for demanding that unanimity. It is not a question of tradition, it is not a question of sentiment, it is not a question of twelve individual men; it is a question of unanimity,—and why?

Everybody who has tried cases, both on the civil and criminal sides of the court, who has tried personal injury cases as I have for the defendant and for the plaintiff, who has tried criminal cases both for defendants charged with most serious crime and for the government against other defendants, must come to realize when he arrives at years of experience that there are two things that are inimical to a proper verdict by a jury, two things that are lodged in the heart of every human being, two things that are harder to dislodge than almost anything else, two things that menace the due protection of the rights of the citizen, whether he be a poor man or a rich corporation. Those are the two things, sir, which prevent juries over and over again, if they are weak men or bad men, from rendering a true verdict and lead them to a verdict that is not based upon their reason, not based upon the evidence but based either upon the sympathy or prejudice they acquire regarding the case or regarding the plaintiff or defendant. And that sympathy or prejudice I have found not by any means to be exerted solely against defendant corporations but to be exerted against the poor as well.

I suppose I have suffered from disagreements of the jury as frequently as any other member of the bar. I have tried cases where for the moment I was extremely indignant with a minority holding out against a majority. On the other hand, in an equal number, perhaps, I have been grateful to a minority for holding out against their fellows.

I do not know, sir, whether an illustration from personal experience may be taken in lieu of argument, but I happen to be able to draw from mine an illustration which is familiar to a very distinguished member of this Convention who happened to be on the other side of the case, and which I think is most apt as against the suggestion contained in the second of these resolutions, namely, that the verdict of ten shall be accepted after the lapse of twelve hours as the verdict of the jury.

Ordinarily when a jury stands ten to two there may be a difference of opinion as to whether the two are right or wrong. But unanimity is based upon the well-known human experience that minorities are often right, that the strong men sometimes will stand up against the bias and prejudice of their fellows who are weaker and will not allow an injustice to be done, whether it be against the rich or the poor. Oftentimes, and almost always, it is a matter of opinion merely, but in the case to which I refer I am able to say that the two standing out against the others were right. It was an interesting case, a suit for personal injury, which I defended for a public service corporation in which I was satisfied that the corporation was right. But you will ask how I know that the minority were right in that case. The jury went out at three o'clock in the afternoon after a very able charge by a judge who is now a member of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth. There were two men upon the jury, sir, and only two who had passed the age of 65 years; the others were middle-aged or young men. These two men were men of standing and substance in the communities in which they lived, far above any suggestion of bribery or any improper suggestion of any sort. That jury stayed out all night and came in at ten o'clock in the morning and reported a disagreement. The judge polled the jury and it was found that these two men, — these two old men, — had stood out all night against the opinion of their fellows. It was a sympathetic case; it was a case where the plaintiff was an honest man and partly, perhaps, because he was an honest man, he ultimately lost his case. I had argued to the jury that it was perfectly obvious from the plaintiff's own testimony, upon his cross-examination, that with reference to this accident he had not taken a single precaution for his own safety and that whatever the negligence of the defendant might have been it was clear that he ought not to recover, because, without a particle of care, he had put himself in a position of danger which resulted in his injury. The presiding judge read to the jury a case which is familiar to every lawyer in this Convention, modified to suit the occasion, — the case of Commonwealth v. Tuey, — which is a kind of usual pressure brought by the court on juries to induce them to agree. The jury went out again and did agree and came in with a substantial verdict for the plaintiff. I took the case to the Supreme Judicial Court, which decided that the verdict could not stand and that judgment should be entered for the defendant, because as the court said, it was perfectly apparent upon the testimony of the plaintiff himself, who replied honestly to the questions which I put to him, that he alone was to blame for the injury which he had sustained. That case is the case of Ferguson v. Old Colony Street Railway Company in the 204th Massachusetts. But, sir, I am not discussing this question from the point of view of the Old Colony Street Railway Company or of any other corporation. I have tried many cases for the plaintiff against similar public service corporations and I do so still. But I think, sir, that we do not wish our property be taken away from us by sympathy and prejudice, just as we do not wish our liberty, our lives or our reputations taken away from us, by anything less than the unanimous consent of twelve men who constitute a jury under the common law. [Applause.]

Mr. Crsick of Boston: As a member of the Judiciary Committee, which was described yesterday as a rather conservative committee by the member in the fourth division (Mr. William H. Sullivan), I think it is only fair to ourselves and to the Convention to state our position in regard to this matter, on account of the latitude which this argument has taken. In regard to document No. 49, I believe it was a unanimous report of the committee. The same is true of Nos. 208, 204, 206 and 207; the reason being, Mr. Chairman, that we made a clear distinction between the resolutions under those docket numbers and the resolution expressed in document No. 203, and I believe three members of that committee reserved their right to dissent on document No. 203, but it is not printed in the calendar.

As this thing lies in my mind, and as it was discussed by our committee, there is a great distinction between resolution No. 49 and the rest, and resolution No. 203. We felt that we did not want to go so far as to give the Legislature the right to specify the number of men which should be necessary to declare a verdict in civil cases; we dissenters believed in resolution No. 203, that made five-sixths a part of the organic law of this Commonwealth, not even giving the Legislature the right to change that; and there is a great distinction between those resolutions which we are arguing. I listened to the very seductive speech of the member of the committee in the third division (Mr. McAnarney) in which he discussed this matter more from the point of view of allowing the Legislature to allow a majority of the jurors to bring in a verdict than he did from the viewpoint as expressed in resolution No. 203; and inasmuch as we are discussing No. 49 and the amendment to it, which is in the same class as the other resolutions outside of No. 203, I want to ask as a matter of information whether we should discuss the question embraced in resolution No. 203 at this time.

The Chairman (Mr. Quincy of Boston): The Chair has allowed the discussion to take a wide range thinking that it would expedite consideration of and voting upon the various resolutions printed in the docket; the Chair has not undertaken to confine the discussion to the particular one of those resolutions which comes up first. Strictly, the only matter before the committee is the subject involved in document No. 49.

Mr. Cusick: On the amendment which is the question now before this committee I desire to record myself as being opposed, but I still want the committee to understand that when you take up No. 203, in order that those members of the Judiciary Committee may have their position placed properly before this body for your consideration, we want to discuss No. 203 at that time; and if it is your ruling that we are now discussing No. 49 only, and the amendments of similar character, then I desire that I should be recorded as opposed to that, as we agreed in the committee on that subject.

Mr. Maguire of Boston: The committee on the Judiciary gave this matter very careful consideration. I am bound to say that because of the observations of the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates) and the gentleman from Webster (Mr. Love). We heard them very sympathetically. I heard them particularly with an open mind, because I have known the gentleman in the first division for a great many years, and I roomed very close to the gentleman from Webster at college. The fact that a representative of a public service corporation appeared there against the measures rather disposed me to favor some abrogation of the unanimity of the jury, because when I see a representative of a public service corporation on one end of a proposition I either “see red” or immediately take the other side. This is due to years of experience or years of activity in behalf of the people of East Boston, as president of their trade association. Two-thirds of our time was taken up preventing corporations from getting or trying to get what they ought not to get. Take the matter of the tunnel toll, take the matter of freight railways in the public streets, take the matter of the price of gas,—all those agitations for improvements, or for a reduction in the price of some service that these corporations were obliged to give the people, were always a matter of hard work, a matter of difficult work, either to get their ear or get them finally to give what the public demanded.

So that when the gentleman representing this corporation appeared before the Judiciary Committee in opposition to the proposition, some of us rather inclined in favor of it. But that gentleman, representing that corporation, had very little influence with the committee. For instance, one day he attacked the jury system as a whole, next day he found fault with the judges because they lacked the moral courage to set aside verdicts that he felt were unjust, at another time he found fault with the membership of the bar, because it contained, in his opinion, a number of illiterates. Such a pleader had no influence, no influence in any manner.

When many of the members get up here and debate a proposition on which the committee on the Judiciary has taken the stand that they do not like, the first thing seems to be to "kick the hound around." The gentleman up in the back row there yesterday slurred us because we, from his point of view, were an unsafe committee to consider a proposition. Now, the bricks are flying again and it is about time that the pastime was stopped. This committee has had probably more matters before it than any other. It was presided over by the fine old Roman from Fall River (Mr. Morton). The attendance of members at the committee hearings was almost complete; in fact, so much so that everybody who appeared before the committee remarked on the full attendance. In considering this proposition,—and we debated it thoroughly in committee,—it seemed to us that fundamentally it was taking away from the individual a right or a power which he now has. To some of us the tendency of the time, if the people or some of the people find fault with the way that a political unit acts, is to take away from them, for instance, the right to send members to the city council, or the right to send members to a large school-committee, or to take away from them the right to have district aldermen. In short, there is a tendency, if there is a fault or a flaw in the operation of a governmental function, to take away or abrogate the power or right of the people to control it.

So the proposition with reference to unanimity of the jury is because some lawyer or because somebody who goes into court is dissatisfied with the verdict, and then finds fault with the system. The only trouble from my point of view with reference to the jury system is that most of the public service corporations of the Commonwealth maintain a "gum shoe squad," which infest the court-houses of the Commonwealth. I think that the public service corporations are to blame for the cloud that overhangs the operation of the jury system. I think if the gentleman, the district attorney from Suffolk County (Mr. Pelletier), would apply himself to that particular difficulty with the jury system within his jurisdiction, there would be less fault-finding with it. Let us get to the root of the trouble. Do not abolish and wipe out the jury system because some corporation gets one juror and another corporation gets another juror in different cases. Rather let us get together as members of the bar and as public citizens generally, drive out the "gum shoe squad" from the court-houses of the Commonwealth, and make them disband. Then have the several political units be careful about the selection of the members of the jury, or the jury list. It seems to me the whole thing resolves itself into the question of practical honesty, of a practical operation of our administration of the law. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not right, for this Convention to submit to the people a proposition taking away a power that an individual now has. If you take away the power from one man you take it away from all. That right to stand up in a jury room and insist and fight for what you believe is right has come down through the years; and I do not believe it is just, I do not believe it is fair, because the public service corporations in the last twenty-five years have thrown a cloud over the system by their methods, and every member of the bar knows it, to change the system! Every member of the bar knows that the "gum shoe" squads are interfering with their clients, interfering with every jury trial that takes place in every court-house in the Commonwealth.

I submit, on those facts, that the case has not been proved, and that it is the duty of the district attorney from Suffolk County, it is the duty of district attorneys in every county in the Commonwealth, to see that the jury system is protected, to see that it regains its prestige, that it is preserved as it came to us from the beginning.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I should like to say a word or two in regard to the matter which is now before the committee, and what I say in regard to the pending resolution may be taken also to apply to the kindred resolutions.

It is twenty-seven or twenty-eight years, Mr. Chairman, since I was at the bar. Then my honored and honorable friend, Governor Brackett, whom I am sure we are all glad to see here, did me the honor to appoint me to the bench, and since then, for upwards of twenty-three years, I was upon the court. For half a century or more I have been face to face, at the bar and on the bench, with the operation of the jury system in this Commonwealth, and I have a firm conviction, Mr. Chairman, which has grown strongly as the years have gone on, that for the determination of the facts in the ordinary cases between man and man there is no tribunal equal to that of twelve honest men, guided and instructed by a trained and learned judge.

Of course, as has been said more than once, it is not a perfect tribunal. No tribunal is. But, as I have said, for the determination of the facts in the ordinary cases that come before the courts between litigants, I know of no tribunal that is better than a jury of twelve honest men.

Of course there are disagreements. The lawyers have their disappointments at the hands of the juries, and they have their disappointments at the hands of the courts too. But, because there are disagreements is that any reason why we should change the number which now is required to render a verdict, from twelve to a less number? It does not seem to me that it is. I think, too, that the number of disagreements is not so great as some of our friends seem to think. For myself, — you will pardon a personal reference, — as I have said, for upwards of twenty years I was in a position to know whether juries disagreed or whether juries did not disagree. And in my own experience, at this speaking, — I will not say that I am right, because very likely I have forgotten instances that occurred,—in my own experience I recall only two instances of disagreements. I recall only two or three instances in which the verdict of the jury was such that I felt obliged in the interests of justice to set it aside. I do not mean to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am absolutely correct in that statement. I only make it to the best of my recollection at this present moment. So that when gentlemen talk about the disagreements of juries as a cause why less than a unanimous verdict should be allowed to be returned, I think the alleged evil is, to say the least, much exaggerated.
VERDICTS OF JURIES.

Then, too, I want to speak of another thing, Mr. Chairman. Something has been said here about the corruption of the juries of Massachusetts. I have tried jury cases from one end of the Commonwealth to the other. No lawyer, no party, ever applied to me to have a jury verdict set aside because of improper influences upon the jury which had rendered it. You, gentlemen of the committee, have served upon juries. Your friends and your neighbors have. Were you conscious that bribery and corruption were at work in the panel to which you belonged? Did you believe that your neighbors and your friends were bribed and corrupted when they sat upon the jury? Again I think, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that, if there has been any corruption, there has been much less than people would have us suppose.

Something is said about the compromises which juries make. Of course they compromise, and their right to compromise is recognized by the court, as it should be, and as it has been, as a means of arriving at a just verdict. When a verdict is rendered the court accepts it, and the fact that it is reached by way of compromise between intelligent and honest men should not, and does not for a second, invalidate it.

Mr. Chairman, I think that is the substance of what I want to say to the committee about this matter, about this particular resolution and about the kindred resolutions,—for I class them all together in what I have said to the committee. I sincerely hope that the action of the Judiciary Committee will be sustained. I should regard it as a misfortune to the judicial system of Massachusetts if this Convention should adopt a resolution that less than twelve of a jury should render a verdict, and if that resolution should chance to be adopted by the people of the Commonwealth. [Applause.]

The debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Sanford Bates: I regard it as particularly unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that the impression may have gained circulation that I had in any way criticized the committee on Judiciary. I did not volunteer any such suggestion. The gentleman from Malden in the third division (Mr. Davis) commented, as an argument against this proposition, on the fact that no layman had attended the hearing, and I simply wanted to bring to the attention of this committee the fact that that was not at all to be wondered at, because probably no layman had heard that there was going to be a meeting that day. I want to say now, Mr. Chairman, that I entirely appreciate the courtesy which the committee on Judiciary have extended to all petitioners, and to say that during the three days, or parts of three days, that I sat before them, they all were present and to an unprecedented degree exhibited fidelity and intelligence, which is rare in the State House.
Now, Mr. Chairman, I do want to answer what seemed to me to be one or two fallacious arguments which have been advanced against this measure.

First, taking up the objection which was raised by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch), I had prepared an amendment which I would have submitted to my own resolution when it was reached, namely, No. 203, which would cut out of it all detail and all legislative or statutory matter, and leave it simply a permissive proposition to the Legislature to enact a jury bill, and the matter of deliberation could be left to the Legislature. If they think twelve hours is sufficient, all right. My position now is that any proper amendment which will establish as a constitutional provision that we now resolve to do away with this outgrown, archaic, traditional system of unanimity in juries, I shall be in favor of.

I should like the privilege of examining just for a moment analytically, if possible, the splendid argument of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney). We around Boston have a considerable respect for him, and it never has been better demonstrated than to-day what is the basis for his success at the Suffolk County and other county bars in Massachusetts. But the eloquence of the gentleman from Quincy does not supply the lack of cogency in his argument. He started out, Mr. Chairman, to show us a reason for the unanimity. Stripped of all its eloquence, and stripped of the oratory, it comes down to this: The traditional argument, namely, that we always have had it; secondly, the argument of protection; and thirdly, the argument that it necessitates deliberation by placing the responsibility on each member of the jury. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have stated fairly the three really salient arguments that he advanced apart from his eloquence. The fact that this is a traditional system of unanimity does not mean that we in a Constitutional Convention should adhere to it, unless there is some good reason and some logical reason why we should.

I have not any doubt that when he came to the second point of his argument a great many members of this committee were impressed by it. He tried to link up as one principle that constitutional safeguard which we throw around a defendant accused of crime and apply that same constitutional safeguard to a defendant in a civil case; and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am astonished that a man of the learning and ability of my friend from Quincy should undertake to stand before this Convention and obliterate the distinction in theory and practice in the civil and criminal side of the court. He argues to you that no man has a right to be in this Convention who says that if you abolish unanimity in civil cases you should not abolish it also in criminal cases. Why, Mr. Chairman, the first course that a lawyer takes up shows the difference in procedure in civil and criminal cases, and most laymen who never have studied law are taught that difference. To enumerate only a few of the differences: a defendant in a criminal case may challenge 22 jurors, if I am correct; in a civil case he may challenge only 2.

Mr. McANARNEY: Will the gentleman feel offended if I suggest to him that his recollection of his elementary studies in criminal law must have gone amiss? The defendant in the ordinary criminal case does not have 22 challenges. There are certain cases only in which that is true.
Mr. Bates: I am glad at least that I have informed my friend to the effect that there are other distinctions than those which he named between the civil and criminal sides of the court. That is my only purpose in stating these facts. The burden of proof in a civil case is merely by a preponderance of the evidence; in a criminal case it must be beyond a reasonable doubt. In a civil case, either party may summon the other party to the action to testify; in a criminal case, the defendant cannot be placed on the stand unless he willingly goes there. I submit that there is a vital and a fundamental difference between juries in criminal cases and in civil cases. As I stated before in my argument, the fundamental difference is this: In a criminal case a defendant is opposed to all the power of the State behind the prosecution, and it is fair and right that he should have the benefit of many privileges, and one of them is that the State shall convince every member of the jury that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; but in a civil case, Mr. Chairman, the State takes no part in it, it is merely an argument over property, or over reputation, or over something of that kind, between two individuals.

The fundamental doctrine of our law is the equality of every man before the law, and our Constitution ought to write into it every single provision that will maintain that equality. And what astounding proposition does my brother advance except this: That the defendant in a civil case should be protected? That is what his argument of protection amounts to, Mr. Chairman, that you shall not take the property of the defendant unless you can convince every one of twelve men that you ought to take it. Again, I am astonished that a man who has tried so many tort cases, so many cases before our courts, should come here and argue on the assumption that every plaintiff is trying to steal something from every defendant. That is the logical outcome of his argument, that the defendant at all costs must be protected against the onslaughts of an unscrupulous plaintiff.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the courts of our Commonwealth exist for the redress of wrong. They exist for the benefit of every humble citizen who takes his cause into court, there to get a decision of twelve good men and true. And so when the working-man to-day has his leg taken off in a factory, or the man loses his life on a railroad car, or something of that kind, his widow, or himself if he is still alive, goes into court to obtain back again what that corporation or that defendant has taken. The proposition as outlined by my brother is that at all costs that defendant should be protected; and what does it amount to, Mr. Chairman? The argument amounts to this: That while this man who has been robbed of his rights or deprived of something that he ought to have, or been damaged by the carelessness of the defendant, must convince twelve men, the defendant need only convince one. That is the logical outcome of it, because so long as that defendant can convince one man to hold out, that plaintiff who has been deprived of his rights never can receive them. So the proposition as we put it to you to-day is that you shall legislate equality in civil actions, and that you shall give to the plaintiff as much right, or nearly as much right, as the defendant has, to have a fair hearing. I think that whole argument of his, beautiful as it sounded and eloquent as it was, was based on the fallacious assumption that the plaintiff is seeking to get something that he or she is not entitled to, when as a matter of fact the plaintiff is trying merely to take a peaceable, civilized method of redressing a wrong which has been committed upon him.

His second argument, on which he did not dwell very long, was that the responsibility can be placed more nearly on a jury with a unanimous verdict than with a divided one. I say that the contrary is true. I say that the Legislature under this amendment will pass a law which shall require the jury, if they divide, to record their dissent and record their verdict; will put a responsibility on every member of that jury that he will not lightly side-step. I say that instead of the responsibility being removed, it will be increased. Some argument was made that this was too short a time for deliberation. My measure, Mr. Chairman, requires that this jury shall deliberate for twelve hours before they are permitted to bring in a minority verdict, and I submit to you that a man who will hold out for twelve hours ordinarily has an honest and a sound conviction.

I hope that this Convention will look at this matter squarely on its merits. Do not consider any one of these particular measures. The subject before us to-day is whether we are going to cling to a traditional theory of jury verdicts, or whether we are going to have a common-sense one. It makes no difference to me, or, I venture to say, to any of the proponents of this legislation, which is taken, so long as some measure is taken which shall give the Legislature the power and the right to dispose of this matter in the way that they think proper. I hope that for the purpose of arriving at something which will meet the favor of this Convention this matter will be favorably reported to the Convention.

Mr. BLACKMUR of Quincy: In view of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that these debates are to be preserved to posterity, and that the remarks made by the gentlemen are to be placed in print, I desire to call attention to and to refute specifically a statement made by the gentleman in the third division from Boston (Mr. Maguire). As I understood him to say, and it has been verified by an examination of the record, he stated in his discussion of this subject this morning that "every member of the bar knows that the jury squads maintained by the corporations are interfering with every jury trial which takes place in every court-house in the Commonwealth." Mr. Chairman, I have the honor, or have had the honor, to defend on behalf of one public service corporation some of their cases tried in Norfolk County during the last five or six years, and during that same period of time I have had an opportunity to observe the defence of that class of cases by the gentleman who spoke some time ago and who sits behind me in this division (Mr. French), he defending on behalf of the Bay State Street Railway Company. And sir, I want to repudiate the base suggestion that was made that the corporation which I defended, or any corporation, maintained any squads of "gum shoe" men or interfered with the due course of justice. There is altogether too much of such loose talk made in this Commonwealth, which goes out to the people and prejudices and befogs the issue, and it is high time that some one refuted it.

Much has been said, sir, regarding the disagreements of juries. I have had the privilege of practicing law in the courts of this Commonwealth for twenty-six years only, and during that period eight years were devoted to the defence of the city of Quincy as its solicitor.
I cannot recall one single instance where a disagreement that I knew anything about was the eleven to one disagreement so frequently referred to. There may have been some disagreements where there were two or three holding out, but I do not recall them at the present time. And, sir, I think you will find, as the learned ex-Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court (Mr. Morton) stated, very few instances where a disagreement has been recorded by any small number holding out, as has been suggested.

Now what would be the effect if a majority verdict might prevail in some instances? We will take, for illustration, the young man who is defending his client, the young lawyer who perhaps has had not very much experience, pitted against the learned and great advocate who resides in Brookline (Mr. Whipple). What chance would he have if my learned friend of Brookline had to gather to his way of thinking only a majority of the jury? He would stand very little show. It is therefore as much for the protection of the weak as it is for the strong that we should require unanimity.

I had the privilege here the other day of listening to a statement made by the learned Dean of Harvard Law School, in a discussion of a different subject. He was asked by a member of the committee before which he was appearing what his own views were upon this subject. There has been a statement made that textbook writers and lecturers have little or no experience in the actual practice of courts, but that, sir, cannot be said in reference to Dean Pound, for many years he practiced as an advocate before the courts of several of the western States. He is a man who has had great experience in the actual trial of cases, and he stated that his experience was that in all those States where the majority rule prevailed or the period of discussion was limited to a certain number of hours, then permitting a majority verdict to follow, that it worked badly; and it was he, I think, who said that he knew of cases in many States where the men simply played cards or entered into general conversation after having taken the first vote before they took the other at the termination of the five or six hours, as the case might be.

But, sir, there is one other thing which I desire to call to the attention of this Convention, and that is, one of the great complaints of the jury system to-day is that we do not get the best men in the community to sit. The saving grace of that situation is this: That in a large number, such as twelve jurymen, who are drawn from all walks of life, we have found from experience that we usually get two or three hard headed, common-sense men, whether they be men who labor, small storekeepers or farmers, as the case may be, and it is those men who usually dominate the jury; if they do not dominate it, at least they are the saving grace and furnish the good judgment which saves the jury system. It is usually their discussion, as I am told, the information which they give in the jury room of their own experience, their own common-sense view of the situation under discussion, which has so much to do in ultimately bringing in satisfactory verdicts.

One other thing to which I ought to call your attention, and that is this: We frequently hear complaints about jury trials owing to the frequent setting aside of the verdicts by the court, and yet very few verdicts are in fact set aside by the court, many less verdicts than many lawyers believe ought to be set aside by the court. Now what is the reason most generally given by the learned judge when he declines to set aside a verdict? He says:

Although I might myself have decided this question differently had I decided it myself, you have had twelve men sit upon it and determine the question, and therefore I am very loath indeed to disturb their judgment and their verdict, and therefore I believe that the verdict of the jury should stand.

That is the most common statement and finding of the court in such cases. But on the other hand, gentlemen, the very minute you give an opportunity to a majority of the jury to bring in a verdict and have their finding recorded as the verdict in the case, you are going to have tremendously greater pressure brought to bear on the courts to set aside verdicts, because you will have it said over and over again: “Well, this is a divided verdict. There were five men who thought as I did.” And the court will not be so certain that justice will make necessary the holding of the verdict that was so rendered. So I say I think it will have the tendency to unsettle verdicts more than it ever has, and you will be likely to have a greater number of verdicts set aside.

Only one other word. My friend, I think in the first division (Mr. Sanford Bates), said some time ago that it was no concern of lawyers, and that it was the lawyers who objected to making the change suggested. Well, sir, all I can say is that I deem it as my duty, and always have deemed it such, that it is the most solemn and vital concern of every lawyer to protect the life, property and interest of his clients and to show an interest in his clients, — and, gentlemen, by “clients” I mean every person who comes to him for advice and help, — and that it is his duty to state to you and to state to every one of the people of this Commonwealth the experience which he has had in the courts in this respect. I should like to call upon some of the gentlemen who have had a great deal more experience than I have in the trial of these cases to state what their experiences have been in some of the other counties of this Commonwealth, as to whether or not, take it all in all, the system which now obtains is the only system which safeguards the interests and the property of the people of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Gallagher of Boston: I have no expectation of being able to add a great deal to what already has been said on this question, but I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments for the purpose merely of puncturing, if I may, some of the arguments that have been made in defence of the report of the committee.

Great emphasis has been laid upon the fact that the jury system as we have it is an ancient and therefore a venerable institution, and that we now have it in all its original purity and excellence, and because of the results which it has procured we ought not to change in respect to the number of jurors necessary to return a verdict in civil cases. It would seem upon reflection that the argument for the proposition of the committee to reject this report would derive very little force from the antiquity argument furnished in behalf of the system as it stands. We have been changing, or our forefathers have been changing, the jury system almost from the beginning. At first it is to be remembered that the jury were called not to hear evidence, but to give it, and that the necessary qualification for jury service was knowledge on the part of the jurymen of the facts involved in the litigation or of the persons who were party to it. Not a trace of the jury system can be found in Anglo-Saxon times, although I think I have heard it said that it was an Anglo-Saxon institution. Unanimity of the jury was unknown in England until the reign of King Edward IV, and previous to that time majority verdicts by the jury were the law. The jury system never entered or appeared in England or had its place in the common law until after the Norman Conquest. So that we are mistaken if we think that the idea of having twelve men agree upon a verdict is the original ideal of the jury system. It is a fact that the statutory requirement that twelve should agree was made originally with reference to a jury consisting of a larger number. It seems to me that if in the grand jury, where a majority of the grand jury decide the momentous question whether a citizen shall be indicted for murder, or for robbery, or any of the graver crimes and felonies, if I say, a majority may properly be charged with the very important duty of deciding whether that indictment should lie or not, I am unable to see where justice is violated or where the rights of the individual are at all jeopardized by a provision that in civil juries a majority shall decide with whom the verdict shall lie.

I wish to be recorded in favor of the resolution, — either or both, No. 49 and No. 203, — which will accomplish the purpose of putting it within the power of at least five-sixths of the jury to decide, and at all events putting it beyond the power of the so-called "strong" man, the euphemistically-called "strong" man by attorneys who delight in having at least one man stand with them against eleven of his colleagues.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of difference between a verdict for the plaintiff or defendant, a verdict of guilty or not guilty, and an indictment by a grand jury. If the gentleman depends upon that argument, his side fails. Who is heard before the grand jury? Only one side of the case. The prisoner is not heard before the grand jury. The prosecution summons its witnesses and the grand jury hear what they have to say and they find that there is probable cause, — sufficient cause to indict; but they do not say sufficient cause to convict. And the law properly makes a distinction, because a criminal case differs entirely from a civil case. But if you change this law in one case you may have to do it in the other in a short while. The grand jury system gives the government, — the prosecution, so called, — the power to find out what has been done against the interest of the community, and the grand jury hear the case and if a person is indicted he is summoned to plead to the indictment and to have the case tried, and is not guilty, or supposed to be not guilty, until the jury finds him guilty. And that was what I was contending for yesterday.

Now, sir, they said something about the laws of the Normans and Anglo-Saxons. What have all those things got to do with the question here to-day? We are in Massachusetts and we are trying this case to apply to Massachusetts citizens of to-day, not the people of those days. Go back, sir, to the days when the present jury system was adopted. We had different lawyers, different people, different conditions entirely from those which prevail to-day. We had no telephone, no telegraph, no automobiles, and were without many other improvements. But the Constitution was drafted by men who could look forward for more than a hundred years, and they made it so strong that it seems to me, after listening to the pleas of lawyers on one side and the other, that those of us in this Convention who are laymen should pause and say: When they cannot agree, — these men who are sworn officers of the Commonwealth, who have received the benefits of education, who are supposed to be learned in the law, — when they come in here and cannot agree, why should we change this law which stands for the protection of liberty and for the protection of property? [Applause.]

This law is a great protection for the safeguarding of one's liberty. And, sir, if you change the civil side you cannot help in time changing the criminal side. If you allow the Legislature to say what number of jurors may return a verdict, then the question will first be: Shall it be ten? Then they will fight for nine, then they will fight for eight, and then they will fight for seven, and in the end it will be just as it used to be in the old days when we politicians were fighting to win a convention, — get the majority of the delegates and you win. [Laughter.]

This Constitution of ours has no superior. No one can read it without being impressed by it, especially when one realizes how strongly it is built. Power often oppresses one who is weak, and the early fathers knew that; and they took good care that the minority, weak, humble though it might be, should be properly protected. I can see, sir, great danger to this Commonwealth if it departs from the fundamental system that we have here. It takes men of nerve, — and there are men of nerve in this Commonwealth, — to try to do improper things now, because they know they must get twelve jurors, and even under the most favorable circumstances it requires skilful work to get twelve jurors. You can manipulate, but there is always, — and I hope to God there will be always, — at least one man on a jury who will stand up against power when it is wrong, and will stand for justice, no matter whom it hits, because, as has been well stated here, oftentimes the one obstinate man on the jury is the man who regards his God and his oath and the law of the land as the guides for him to follow, irrespective of the arguments of trained lawyers and sometimes the charges of biased judges, who may not realize the interpretation that is being placed upon their words, and his action often saves the government from doing great wrong and saves innocent men from undeserved punishment.

Do not break down the bars; do not strike the first blow, because to-morrow you may be the sufferer. It is well enough to talk about taking a man's property, — the way we shall do it, — by a majority vote of the jury. What layman came before our committee and said: "Change this organic law"? - What body of citizens came before us and urged that this be done? What great need has been shown for it? The lawyers themselves are divided; the case as presented here shows about an equal division; and I suggest under these circumstances the proper thing for this body to do is to leave the document as it stands because they have failed to make out their case. [Applause.]

Mr. Twomey of Lawrence: I presented to the Convention a resolution dealing with this same general subject, a resolution printed as document No. 208, one that has similar provisions to No. 203, with the exception that the number of hours required for deliberation by five-sixths of a jury shall be five hours. I rise to speak on that particular measure at this moment in the hope that it may expedite the consideration of the general question before us. I have no concern with the phraseology of my measure or of any other kindred measure. My only concern is with the principle involved, whether a jury verdict is to be unanimous, or some majority, be it a bare majority or one that may run as high as five-sixths, to be a sufficient verdict.
VERDICTS OF JURIES.

It has been admitted by all parties to this discussion that the jury system is the most perfect method of a judicial determination of fact that centuries of judicial thought have been able to produce and centuries of human experience have been able to devise, and yet it is admitted by the most earnest advocates of a unanimous agreement that it is not a perfect system, and with that admission on their lips they ask you men to allow those imperfections to remain, to keep your hands off, even though there is evil there. I do not know that a single proponent of this general resolution believes that it is a cure-all for the imperfection which they admit exists; but I maintain that if there is imperfection there, as admitted, then it will be wholesome for us in our deliberations not to pass over this question until some serious effort has been made to minimize the admitted imperfection. Constitutional Conventions do not meet every year, and if this question is as important as the discussion seems to indicate, then I say it may be well not to say: "Hands off; leave the imperfections there;" but rather to let us see whether my proposal or any other that may be made can minimize the imperfection. It may be well for us to remember that this system came down to us through the centuries from an age when life was different than it is at present, when men were independent beings, when each man produced his own crops, spun his own yarn and wove his own cloth. It came to us from a country the people of which were practically of one origin. We did not then have the evil consequent upon the present day of infinite complication of interests. We did not have a population so far apart on racial and religious lines as we have in this country to-day. With our system, developed under conditions which are not the same as we have to-day, to say to us: "You must keep your hands off the jury system with its unanimous verdict," is to hold that corruption in the jury room is unknown. That is something more than a mere assertion. There have been convictions for jury tampering in this Commonwealth. It is useless to say that our jury system needs no revision, to deny that the fires of racial and religious prejudice, — or the heat of those fires, — makes its way into the determination of juries. It is not that my proposal will make disagreements impossible, for you still will have disagreements under the majority verdict.

One feature that has not been mentioned with any great emphasis is the fact that the dishonest person or the biased person on a jury is not at all times concerned with the verdict as such; his real interest more frequently is as to the size of the verdict, in the hope that handing out a little something will cause the party in interest to hesitate before passing over the small amount, even though an unjust one. This proposal will not work to the advantage of plaintiff or defendant. It will mean, as far as the plaintiffs are concerned, that they will lose the sympathetic verdicts which they often get, and get improperly and unjustly. There is no reason why a system should be perpetuated which allows sympathetic verdicts, any more than we should allow a system to be perpetuated which allows dishonest verdicts, either as to the verdict itself or as to the amount. I submit to you, sirs, that if the advocates of the unanimous verdict are right in what they say there is no sentiment for a change of this kind. I would ask them to submit this question to the electorate of this Commonwealth.
They ask us to satisfy them by mathematical accuracy that there is anything seriously wrong with our jury system and I would ask them by the same token to defend that system, which they admit carries with it imperfections. That is an astonishing proposition,—that they are not prepared to defend their system, which has been through the fire. The real question is how it has passed through it. Rather is it for them to demonstrate with mathematical accuracy, than for the proponents of these measures, who ask not necessarily a final determination of the question, but at least serious consideration.

I believe that as the discussion goes on consideration is becoming more serious, and I trust that this Convention, or the Committee of the Whole as it now stands, will not take it upon itself, in view of the wide difference of opinion that has manifested itself here, to say that the question shall be finally determined at this time. I submit to those who urge a unanimous verdict that if they really mean what they say, and I also submit to those who are sitting here with open minds, that a fair proposition is that the Committee of the Whole report to the Convention some one of these resolutions, so that the general question shall go before the people of this Commonwealth to determine whether in the light of their experience, which after all is the experience that ought to control the affairs of this Commonwealth, whether in the light of their experience with our jury system they want an admittedly imperfect system perpetuated, or whether some change ought to be made, not necessarily to remedy all defects, but at all events to minimize the imperfections that admittedly exist in the present system.

Mr. French: If the Convention will be patient with me for a single moment, I should like, sir, out of deference to the obvious earnestness and the obviously honest belief of the gentleman from Boston (Mr.
Sanford Bates), to draw again upon my experience for an illustration which I shall ask him to apply to the argument which he has recently made. It seems to be his view, sir, and it may be the view of many laymen and, perhaps, of some lawyers in this Convention, that the rule of unanimity works in civil cases to the advantage of the defendant rather than of the plaintiff. That, sir, has not been the result of my long experience. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen to this case, and, as I have said, apply it to that argument, which I believe perfectly sound.

A year or more ago I tried a case for a public service corporation against a plaintiff, a woman who was injured by a collision in the highway. Mr. Chairman, you will readily see that I must necessarily refer to this experience with more reluctance than I did to the other;
I am not so eager to tell this one. The result of that trial was a disagreement, which, if the measure which he now proposes had been law, would have given a verdict to the defendant in that case. But there was a disagreement, and the case came on for trial before another judge, with substantially the same evidence as before. The result of that trial was a unanimous verdict for the plaintiff, by which she received a very substantial sum of money, far more substantial, sir, than, judging from my negotiations with her counsel before the trial, she was entitled to receive.

It has been said that the advocates of the system of unanimity have admitted that there are weaknesses in the jury system, and therefore weaknesses in the argument for unanimity. That objection is not sound, sir, because the weaknesses in the system are weaknesses that are incident to human nature and to every human institution, and they will attach equally to a verdict of ten as to a verdict of twelve. But, gentlemen, I speak as a citizen and not as a lawyer, and I say to you that I believe that if you permit any modification of the prevailing fundamental law of this Commonwealth with respect to this matter you will be depriving yourselves and your fellow-citizens of a protection which they oftentimes need and by which they frequently profit.

A Constitution, sir, is of no value, — it is not worth the paper upon which it is written, — unless it protects to the fullest extent four things: Life, liberty, property and reputation; or, putting reputation where it belongs, next to life, if not before it, those are the four things one or more of which every article in the Constitution of this Commonwealth seeks to protect. It makes no distinction, sir. Perhaps individuals may prefer their life to their reputation, or their reputation to their life, or their property to their reputation. It makes no distinction, sir, because it is bound to give equal protection to everyone. The difference between a civil trial and a criminal trial is not one of principle but merely one of degree.

Mr. McKeon of Worcester: Had this question been taken before the recess I would not have troubled the Convention to listen to any observations of one so unimportant as myself, but now that the recess has been concluded and there is ample opportunity for discussion, I trust I may be pardoned if I make a few slight observations, by way of emphasis, perhaps, to what already has been adduced in this discussion.

The topic has been very largely and ably debated, and a great and sharp division of opinion has been discovered here, which proves, I think, conclusively, not only that the subject is an important one, but that it is open to very grave doubts. I think the discussion to which we have listened here to-day proves with almost exact mathematical precision that there is a discontent with the present jury system. That being so, sir, I submit to you that if we can, we ought to endeavor earnestly to remove those defects, and thereby allay the dissatisfaction on the part of litigants in this Commonwealth. I bring no personal experience of any value whatever to this Convention, and, while I therefore suffer from many great disadvantages, I have at least the advantage that I bring no prejudices against the jury system. I approve and applaud all that has ever been said in favor of the proposition that the jury is the most excellent tribunal yet devised by man for the judicial determination of facts, but I do not go beyond that and assume that a jury is infallible. I do not agree that in all instances experience has shown that the best and truest verdicts can be obtained by unanimity of verdict upon the part of a jury. In my opinion, sir, the personal experiences of men, whether members of this Convention or not, are of value only so far as they are supported by authority. Their personal experiences must be placed in the scales of judgment and weighed upon the value of authority, and in that scale, sir, the judgment of the world is against the practice which obtains here.

It has been referred to previously that the jury trial is an ancient institution. It is so ancient that its definite, specific origin is lost in the twilight zone of that far-off day. But the very best opinion that is obtainable by the learned writers upon the law is, as was stated here by a gentleman from Boston (Mr. Gallagher), that when the jury trial was first invented it consisted of a larger proportion of men than twelve in number, and that the only requirement was, that out of that larger number, a unanimity of twelve must have obtained, and I submit to you, therefore, that in its original form trial by jury was upon a majority basis.

May I suggest also that the purpose and the procedure in civil and criminal trials are as opposed as the poles. The purpose in a criminal trial is to surround one individual man who is charged with a public offence with all the safeguards that possibly can be given to him consistently with the public welfare, and the principle behind that practice is that it is far better for the common good that 99 guilty men should escape than that one just man should suffer innocently. And is it to be argued seriously that the same principle is behind the unanimity verdict in civil causes? Is it to be said that it is better for the common good that 99 men who have done wrongs for which they refuse to settle peaceably shall escape the payment of their debts because we require the plaintiff to prove his case with the same degree of care and precision and mathematical certainty as is required from the public prosecutor upon the criminal side of the court? I submit to you that those are two contradictory principles, which, in one harmonious system, ought not to obtain.

It has been argued here in defence of the present system that oftentimes the minorities are right. I submit to you, sir, that no such argument is entitled to be advanced in this Convention, for the reason that the question is not that minority verdicts shall obtain. No man asks that. But if, along the same line of argument, and applying logic to it as far as I can, minorities are often right, is it not more certain, is it not more probable, that majorities more often will be right?

The unanimity of verdict which is required is capable of division, I think, between its theory and its practice. If the practice measured up to the theory, I would be very strongly in favor of maintaining the unanimous verdict of the jury, but in my humble opinion the practice is entirely at variance with the theory. In theory we seek to get the free, unbiased, honest opinion of twelve men. That in itself is a most difficult task. It is against the experience of human conduct and reasoning and the varying intelligence of men that we should reasonably expect any unanimity of opinion among twelve men upon any one topic that is before them, — but such is the expectation. Now, then, does it measure up to that expectation as we find it practiced in the courts?

In the first place, when an issue is ready for decision by a jury they retire into the secrecy of their jury room, and they determine first upon the question of liability, upon which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof. Let us assume that there is a disagreement among the jury as to liability. What usually would happen? What usually does happen? If one or two of the gentlemen who disagree with the majority are persistent in their views, an attempt is made to reconcile that difference into a whole verdict by suggesting to the minority that if they will vote that there is liability the majority will concede that the sum which they ask to be paid may be lopped off, and thus they agree upon a certain, definite sum, which in no way represents, or is intended to represent, that to which the plaintiff is entitled.

Reference has been made here to the opinion of the court as expressed in Commonwealth v. Tucey. I have troubled myself to find that citation. In that trial, which occurred in 1851, one of the jurors disagreed until the jury asked to be brought before the court to receive instructions from the judge, and, in the following language, Judge Hoar told the jury what their duty was on their duty of bringing in a verdict:

The only mode, provided by our Constitution and laws for deciding questions of fact in criminal cases, is by the verdict of a jury. In a large proportion of cases, and perhaps, strictly speaking, in all cases, absolute certainty cannot be attained or expected. Although the verdict to which a juror agrees must of course be his own verdict, the result of his own convictions, and not a mere acquiescence in the conclusion of his fellows, yet, in order to bring twelve minds to a unanimous result, you must examine the questions submitted to you with candor, and with a proper regard and deference to the opinions of each other. You should consider that the case must at some time be decided; that you are selected in the same manner, and from the same source, from which any future jury must be; and there is no reason to suppose that the case will ever be submitted to twelve men more intelligent, more impartial, or more competent to decide it, or that more or clearer evidence will be produced on the one side or the other. And with this view, it is your duty to decide the case, if you can conscientiously do so. In order to make a decision more practicable, the law imposes the burden of proof on one party or the other, in all cases. In the present case, the burden of proof is upon the Commonwealth to establish every part of it, beyond a reasonable doubt; and if, in any part of it, you are left in doubt, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, and must be acquitted. But, in conferring together, you ought to pay proper respect to each other’s opinions, and listen, with a disposition to be convinced, to each other’s arguments. And, on the one hand, if much the larger number of your panel are for a conviction, a dissenting juror should consider whether a doubt in his own mind is a reasonable one which makes no impression upon the minds of so many men, equally honest, equally intelligent with himself, and who have heard the same evidence, with the same attention, with an equal desire to arrive at the truth, and under the sanction of the same oath. And, on the other hand, if a majority are for acquittal, the minority ought seriously to ask themselves, whether they may not reasonably, and ought not to doubt the correctness of a judgment which is not concurred in by most of those with whom they are associated.

Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I understood the gentleman (Mr. McKeon) to say a moment ago that one of the difficulties with the present system is that jurors who believe that the defendant is not liable will compromise with those who believe in liability for a large amount to agree upon a verdict for a lesser amount than the latter think the plaintiff ought to have. I should like to ask the gentleman if that would not be a good deal easier to accomplish if only ten men were required to agree, instead of twelve as now.

Mr. McKeon: In my opinion, it would not be easier where majority verdicts obtain, because the question of liability would be determined first, and upon its merits, and entirely apart from the amount of compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled, if he would be entitled to any, and that therefore very often, and most often, the question of compromise would not at all arise if we had majority verdicts. At least, if that be not true, I think it is absolutely certain that there would be no confusion of the question; that the proposition of liability would be settled by a majority vote in the first instance, and that thereafter there might be some kind of compromise, because that is in the nature of things, on the question of the amount only. But in that kind of a compromise, sir, no man sacrifices a principle; no man says: "I believe that there is liability here" or that "there is no liability here, but I will agree to pay a smaller (or larger) sum than is just in order to get out of this jury room." I think that the principle which has been so ably argued for in this Convention, that we ought to have a unanimity of verdict, takes account of only a partial view of the subject. Even on their own argument they stop with the verdict of the jury. If that is a valuable right, why stop there? Why permit our courts, upon a majority opinion, to disturb that verdict, which they so eloquently have argued for here to-day?

And one more suggestion by way of emphasis before I close. If the gentlemen who favor the committee's report are so absolutely certain that this measure has no merit, they will amply protect their views by voting to submit the question by way of referendum on the ballot as a part of the efforts of this Convention. If the majority of the people of this Commonwealth are content and satisfied with the present procedure of our courts, I submit to you that they will retain the present practice of the Constitution; but if they are dissatisfied, and if they do approve a measure of improvement submitted to them by this Convention, that they will have obtained that for which they long have sought, in which they most earnestly believe and which they most earnestly desire. [Applause.]

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I do not desire to say anything upon what I call the judicial phase of this question. It seems to me that that aspect of the question has been pretty thoroughly covered. However, I feel there is another side to this question of jury trial which is even more important than the judicial.

I came here this morning without having concluded my own mind on the subject. So far as the question between litigants goes I am inclined to support the resolution as offered. But it seems to me that we have confined our discussion to the professional side, to the judicial side, and, excepting the very able and very vigorous remarks which were made by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), the discussion has been confined to lawyer members of the Convention.

I desire to quote a few lines from the observations made by a prominent Frenchman, an aristocrat, who visited America eighty years ago, De Tocqueville. One of the most interesting chapters in his work on Democracy in America is the chapter on Trial by Jury in the United States considered as a Political Institution. I should like to direct the attention of the members to that phase of the question for a moment, especially the attention of some of the gentlemen who have served on a jury, the gentlemen who are laymen and who represent the people, who are finally to decide this question; for if it goes to the polls the lawyers are not going to decide it; the people are going to decide it and, if possible, I should like to stimulate a discussion as to whether or not in some ways the present jury system might be modified. This writer said in 1835:

The jury is, above all, a political institution, and it must be regarded in this light in order to be duly appreciated. . . . The system of the jury, as it is understood in America, appears to me to be as direct and as extreme a consequence of the sovereignty of the people as universal suffrage. They are two instruments of equal power, which contribute to the supremacy of the majority.

I am so entirely convinced... that the jury is preeminently a political institution, that I still consider it in this light when it is applied in civil causes.

When... the jury acts,... on civil causes, its application is constantly visible; it affects all the interests of the community; every one cooperates in its work; it thus penetrates into all the usages of life, it fashions the human mind to its peculiar forms, and is gradually associated with the idea of justice itself.

The jury contributes powerfully to form the judgment and to increase the natural intelligence of a people; and this, in my opinion, is its greatest advantage. It may be regarded as a gratuitous public school, ever open, in which every juror learns his rights, enters into daily communication with the most learned and enlightened members of the upper classes, and becomes practically acquainted with the laws, which are brought within the reach of his capacity by the efforts of the bar, the advice of the judge, and even by the fashions of the times. I think that the practical intelligence and political good sense of the Americans are mainly attributable to the long use which they have made of the jury in civil causes.

I do not know whether the jury is useful to those who have lawsuits; but I am certain it is highly beneficial to those who judge them; and I look upon it as one of the most efficacious means for the education of the people which society can employ.

What I have said applies to all nations; but the remark I am about to make is peculiar to America and to democratic communities.

And he concludes:

Thus the jury, which is the most energetic means of making the people rule, is also the most efficacious means of teaching it how to rule well. (Democracy in America, by Alexis de Tocqueville, vol. i, pp. 361-367.)

I have read those few lines because it seems to me that the political side, the business side, the side of the juror, is more important than whether or not more cases are lost for plaintiffs or defendants by reason of this juror or that juror holding out in the decision of particular cases. On the judicial side my mind is fairly well made up, but I should like very much, Mr. Chairman, to hear some expression, before we come to a vote, from gentlemen who have sat occasionally in the jury-box.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I do not care to unduly prolong this debate, but I do wish to call the attention of the business men in this Convention to a fact that all of them will recognize, and to a fact that every lawyer and every judge knows to be true, namely, that when judges are picking foremen of their juries they invariably try to pick out the most intelligent man they can get, and they usually pick out some man who has some large interest in a business way.

Talk with any business man who has sat on a jury in this Commonwealth in the last twenty years, and every one of them will tell you that they like jury service, but they have one great fault to find with it. They cannot understand why one man should be allowed to hang up eleven, or why two men should be allowed to stand in the way of justice; and nearly every business man will tell you that, whilst he dislikes the single judge system, nevertheless, when he has a case to present hereafter he would rather present it to a single judge, simply because of his objections to a system that permits one man to overrule eleven.

Gentlemen, there is a distinct defect that we are called upon to correct. It is not a matter of protecting property here, as the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) has said. Is property any more sacred in Massachusetts than it is in the sixteen States of the Union where the five-sixths or three-quarters rule prevails? Is property in Boston any more sacred in the hands of a jury than it is in San Francisco or New Orleans? Are the rights of the property owners in Massachusetts any more protected than those of the people in Montana, or Wisconsin, or Minnesota? Some of the greatest enterprises in which vast sums of our eastern money have been recently spent, are located in the State of Montana,—such as the Montana Power Company, the Anaconda Copper Company, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company. Property is just as safe in those States, according to the views of our great trustees, and according to the views of men who hold property most sacred, as it is in this old Commonwealth. I simply say to you, gentlemen, that there is a grave and well-recognized evil to be corrected, and as long as it should be corrected we should address ourselves to it.

The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. McKeon) was interrupted in reading the case of Commonwealth v. Tuyet. He did not read the last paragraph of that case. Lawyers are all familiar with it. The judges try to invoke this same doctrine proposed in this resolution in trials by jury. When a jury has been shut up for ten or twelve hours the judge frequently will call them in, and read this case in 8 Cushing, Commonwealth v. Tuyet. He will try to impress upon them an unwritten law that the minority must yield to the will of the majority. The court says in its concluding argument:

The jury room is, surely, no place for pride of opinion, or for espousing and maintaining, in the spirit of controversy, either side of a cause.

The evil that we are complaining of here is not disagreements on the part of juries. Juries rightly disagree in many cases, but the evil that we are complaining of is that one or two men can frustrate justice and stop men from getting justice in our Massachusetts courts. I, for one, trust that something will come out of these three measures that will correct an evil that every business man in this Commonwealth knows to be a grave evil. Every lawyer should support this, because it protects the jury system, and we lawyers know that the strongest safeguard of the American citizen and his property and person is the jury system, and we should do everything that we possibly can to strengthen and fortify it.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: I am very certain that this committee must approve of the principle of unanimity, for I recall, if I may say so with propriety, the applause which welcomed the announcement a few days ago that one of our important committees had become unanimous, that any dissension that there was had been cured and that there was a unanimous report. That is advisable, because it settles questions, and every matter of unanimity is a matter of yielding and conciliation between discordant or differing views. That is perhaps one reason why every group of persons, directors, English courts or American courts, have acted by majority, while the jury during all these centuries has been unanimous. The jury is a common law form peculiar to England and other common law countries, and as the gentleman in this division (Mr. Gallagher) called to your attention a moment ago, when, in the time of Edward IV, it became unanimous, at that moment life and property and reputation began to be safe in England and safe for us, while on the continent they were still at the will of the powerful and remained so for centuries. That is why every one of us has been brought up in the belief,—we do not know why, perhaps,—but in the belief that somehow our whole system and all our rights hang upon this jury system with its unanimous verdict. The only common law States that have changed that are some States like New Mexico and Idaho and Colorado. It is possible that they have discovered a new principle in the common law, but it may be doubted.

The learned gentleman in the fourth division in his remarks this morning brought to my mind more clearly than before that there is no demand for this change,—no real demand. From the wealth of his experience he must have known evils, if there were evils, and have considered remedies, if there were remedies. Yet if I rightly understood his remarks, he was considering the question this morning for the first time and then found in support simply the argument of antiquity.

I was one of the members of the Judiciary Committee, and tried to divorce my mind from the influence, the conservative influence, of history. It is an interesting question. The committee of the bar of which the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Sanford Bates) is a member sent out a questionnaire to every lawyer in the State and got no replies. Nevertheless it is an interesting question to consider. I, for one, and many of the members of our committee, took it as well as we could, as carefully as we could, as a new question, and there were two things that satisfied me that no change should be made. One is that the jury is not a selected body. Every other body that acts by majority is selected. The judges are appointed. The gentlemen here are elected. The directors are chosen. The jury is not selected, but goes forth as it is drawn by lot. The other point is that because of the requirement of unanimity, so well expressed in the instructions of the late Judge Hoar in the Tuey case, the minority argument must be heard and weight must be given to it. It is not always the right argument, but it is considered, and we know that the matter at issue will be settled.

I hope very much that the change expressed in any of the resolutions here will not be adopted by the committee.

Mr. McAnarney: Twice during the course of this debate has Commonwealth v. Tuey been referred to. May I refer to it a third time and give you the law as finally declared in that case by Mr. Justice Bigelow, who rendered the opinion of the court?

The jury room is, surely, no place for pride of opinion, or for espousing and maintaining, in the spirit of controversy, either side of a cause.

Do you gentlemen agree with that? [Reading]:

The single object to be there effected is to arrive at a true verdict—

Does any man in this Convention doubt the truth of that statement? [Reading]:

and this can only be done—

Mark you, how?

and this can only be done by deliberation, mutual concession, and a due deference to the opinions of each other.

How otherwise, gentlemen, do you want a conclusion of fact to be arrived at? [Reading]:

VERDICTS OF JURIES.
By such means and such only, in a body where unanimity is required, can safe and just results be attained;

And now mark you, sir, these concluding words, because to my mind they are the last words upon this subject:

and without them, —

Without what?

without them, —

Without what?

Without "due deliberation, mutual concession, and a due deference to the opinions of each other."

and without them, the trial by jury, instead of being an essential aid in the administration of justice, would become a most effectual obstacle to it. [Com. v. T'uey, 8 Cush. 1, 4.]

There, sir, you have the opinion of our Supreme Judicial Court. Without that deliberation, concession and deference of opinion to which the court refers, trial by jury becomes an effectual obstacle to justice, and not an aid to it.

Mr. FRENCH: Now that the debate on this question has been prolonged for nearly the entire day, may I be permitted to quote a remark recently made in my hearing by a Justice of the Superior Court of this Commonwealth, a gentleman engaged in presiding at the trial of jury cases from about the first of September until about the first of June of each year? A jury having reported a disagreement, the judge remarked in their presence: "I believe this is the first disagreement in a civil case that I have received at the hands of a jury for at least two years."

Mr. MANSFIELD of Boston: I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the committee is weary after the discussion of this question for so long a time, and that the period is a heated one, and that all sides of this question have been gone into pretty fully; but I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few brief moments while I may be allowed to express my emphatic dissent in the most humble manner from the expressions voiced by my brothers in the legal profession of far higher standing than mine, of a vast deal more experience, of incomparably greater success than mine, and to say to you that it is my profound conviction that if this Constitution should be amended by the action taken it would be a matter of almost irreparable detriment to the good interest of this Commonwealth. It would not necessarily be fatal, Mr. Chairman; the Commonwealth has weathered and can weather many storms.

Matters of policy may be viewed in different lights by many people, but here is something which should be considered from the standpoint of logic and of fact. It does not satisfy me that members of this committee may say to me: "This is an old system, and anything new is preferable to it." If a matter is old, if it is sanctified and hallowed by time, if it has met the approval of countless generations of people, then I think that that goes to show that it is a well-established system of merit, approved by many generations. Something new is not necessarily something better.

I shall be bold enough to say that some gentlemen of this committee who have voiced their sentiments in behalf of this measure have at least some slight trace of political feeling and ambition in the sentiments they have expressed. I think, Mr. Chairman, that no man in this Convention who knows me will venture to say that I have any sympathy in favor of corporations, either in court or out; and I venture to say further that no member of the committee will venture to say that I will be a party to any corruption sought or obtained from any jury or jurymen; but I say this to you, that in my somewhat limited experience during my twenty years at the bar as compared with the vast experience of so many learned and able gentlemen, and during my observation as I have gone daily in and out of the Suffolk County court-house and some of the other court-houses around and about this Commonwealth, I have become deeply and unalterably imbued with the conviction that it is for the best interest of every litigant, plaintiff or defendant, person or corporation, that this existing system should not be disturbed or interfered with.

Before I was a lawyer I sat on a jury. I sat to the limit of thirty days as a member of a jury in the Suffolk County court-house while I was a student at the Boston University Law School. That brief experience gave me, I think, at least some slight insight into the working of that system. All jurymen are not impregnable. There may be corruption. They are not all gifted with an enlightened intelligence which will enable them without any doubt or possibility to determine the exact facts in a given case. I admit that freely. But I want to be as frank in stating to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as my brothers here have been in criticizing the jury system, and the corrupt members of the jury whom they say sometimes exist. I agree with them that it is not only the members of the jury; the presiding jurist sitting upon the bench, who decides questions of law and directs the jury in its deliberations and determination of questions of fact, is at least an equal factor in what is done in the court-room. I know,—and let us talk plainly to one another,—that there are judges and have been judges in our Superior Court in this Commonwealth who have been known, and described, and talked about and bruited about by men as high in standing at the bar as any gentleman who has spoken here to-day, who have been referred to, not only occasionally but commonly, as "corporation" judges, as men inclined to favor corporations, as men whose bias and whose leaning is toward the interests; and that word, which has been used here already so many times, is perfectly well understood.

I have observed, not once but time and time again, how such a Justice has dominated a jury. I recall, to give an illustration, one particular session in the Superior Court of Suffolk County where men drawn as all the other jurors were drawn sat there to decide the facts and attempt to arrive at justice. The presiding justice in that session by his charges to the jury, by his manner to the men who were drawn as jurors, so worked upon their feelings, so obtained their friendship and good will, that during the entire sitting of that jury in that court-room, during the entire thirty days that that jury sat there, every verdict brought in by them, and brought in with unanimity, brought in unanimously, was a verdict for a defendant corporation. I speak of that, Mr. Chairman, to attempt to make this point: That men drawn, however they may be, by lot or by choice or by any miscellaneous method, from the multitude of people in any given community in this State, are not necessarily biased in a certain direction, and that although you exclude one or two or three or some minority of their number from the operation of the law requiring an agreement, it does not necessarily mean that then they will sit free, impartial, honest, and uninfluenced within the meaning of our laws; and I fear, Mr. Chairman, that even then you would arrive at a result very far indeed removed from perfection.

I view this matter from a different point of view from that of some of my friends. They refer to the decisions by boards of directors, by committees, by other bodies, by the body politic itself in electing candidates to office, and I think that in my mind I can make this distinction: That in such decisions, men give vent to an expression of their opinions and desires and say what they want to have done. In the jury room, when twelve men are shut in there free from any word or influence of any other member of the community, they sit there not to say that they would like or would desire to have some plaintiff obtain some money from a defendant, but they sit there for the sole purpose of deciding facts, of saying what the truth is, and not to express their opinion, or their will, or their wish.

Mr. Chairman, my personal experience when I served as a juryman, my observation since then while I have been taking such activities as I could as a member of the bar, has been this: That sometimes the one man of the twelve who sat to listen to a case supplied the very thing which leavened the whole loaf and which inclined and finally succeeded in obtaining a jury to realize and to consider all points of view and to arrive finally at a better decision than they would if that man were disregarded. What would happen were you to authorize the Legislature to pass a majority law, and the Legislature then did so? Simply this: Twelve men would walk into a jury room. They would sit down. They would vote at once. Two or three among them would vote in the minority; the others as a majority would agree. Perhaps among that minority might be the most honest, the most disinterested, the most learned, the most experienced and the most sympathetic with the people, and with the corporations, and with all parties involved, who are sitting upon that jury. In the minority might be one man or two men or three men who might have the pluck, the backbone and the audacity to defy the judge sitting in the court-room, who had purposely and intentionally sought to sway the minds of that jury and to induce them to reach a conclusion which he favored. There might be in that minority, sitting in that jury, one man or two men or three men who, with sufficient force, with sufficient persuasion, with sufficient ability, might explain to their colleagues on that jury their view of the situation, so as to convert them. That has been done, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, far more times than any of my learned friends here, lawyers of great ability, have had juries disagree on cases which they have tried before them. The one man or the two men or the three men have done far more to obtain justice for the poor man they speak of, they have done far more to prevent gross injustice to every party in a case, than in my humble opinion could be attained by giving a majority or any number less than the whole of a jury the power to decide a question. To pass such a measure, to embody it in the Constitution, to institute it in legislation, would mean simply that when a jury considered a case they would give it simply snap and immature judgment, and not a mature deliberation. I hope, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that this measure will be defeated.

The amendments moved by Mr. Dutch of Winchester were rejected and the resolution, No. 49, was rejected.

The Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, then took under consideration the following resolution (No. 203), bearing on the same subject, presented by Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In all civil actions which shall be tried by a jury in this Commonwealth, after twelve hours' deliberation, the agreement of five-sixths of any jury therein shall constitute a sufficient, true and valid verdict. The deliberation of the jury shall be deemed to have commenced when the officer has conducted the jury to their consultation room and the clerk in charge of the session shall enter such time in his records.

Where the verdict is agreed to by all the jurors the foreman only shall sign the verdict; when less than the full number agree on the verdict the same shall be signed by all the jurors who concur therein and the clerk of said court shall enter on his minutes the number of said jurors concurring in such verdict.

Mr. Bates moved that the resolution be amended by the substitution of the following new draft:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Legislature may provide that in all civil actions which shall be tried by a jury in this Commonwealth after twelve hours' deliberation the agreement of five-sixths of any jury therein shall constitute a sufficient, true and valid verdict.

The amendment was rejected, by a vote of 30 to 150. The original resolution also was rejected.

Mr. John C. Twomey of Lawrence presented the following resolution (No. 205), bearing upon the same subject:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The verdict of a jury in any civil action or proceeding shall be a final determination therein, and no verdict shall be set aside on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence, nor shall the damages awarded be reduced on the ground that they are excessive, but after motion filed, the court may recommit the cause to the jury for further deliberation.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted and this report was considered by the Convention July 27, 1917.

The resolution was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. TWOMEY of Lawrence: Well realizing the temper of the members of this Convention upon these matters relating to jury trials, I do not plan to say a great deal with reference to this particular measure, but still I think something ought to be said, so that if the attitude of this Convention that we should retain a majority verdict in civil cases is to prevail, we ought to do so with an express understanding whether or not a proposition such as is submitted here ought to be attached to the decision to retain majority verdicts. This proposition simply recites that, once a jury has returned a verdict, it shall not be set aside on either of the two specified grounds, that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence or that the damages are excessive. I well realize that at times juries may go astray on either of those two questions, and I am not attempting by my proposition to make it possible to change the improper verdict of a jury. I have put in there a safeguard, that if either party is dissatisfied with the verdict of a jury, upon motion filed a presiding judge may recommit the question, either as to damages or as to the verdict with reference to the weight of the evidence,—recommit it to the jury for further consideration; but if that jury after further deliberation is still of the same opinion, or alters its opinion upon the matter, then that determination is to be a final one. Not that our Supreme Judicial Court is not to have the power to take recognition of exceptions or miscarriages with reference to the application of the law; but if there is any merit in our jury system, so ably defended here yesterday, if there is any merit in unanimous jury verdicts, I trust that this Convention will not be so inconsistent as to say that once we have unanimity in jury verdicts, some one individual, or some small group of individuals, whether it is one judge of the Superior Court or four Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, can set aside that unanimity which we voted so strongly on yesterday.

I submit that, with reference to the question of the weight of evidence, all that the Supreme Judicial Court has before it is the record, where, in the testimony, what may have been recorded “No,” an intelligent jury, seeing the expression of the person, noting his conduct and his general demeanor upon the witness stand, may often translate into a “Yes.” So that I say the record of the case, being nothing but the printed words, is not a fair criterion by which a court may set aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that it is against the weight of the evidence.

In reference to the other aspect of the question, the matter of damages, if a jury, especially in actions for personal injuries, sees the victim, sees his incapacity, sees the physical wreck that is left, are we, —who believe so strongly in jury verdicts, in their integrity, in their absolute safeguards for the rights of parties,—are we going to allow some other tribunal, which does not see the physical being, which does not see the injuries inflicted, but rather sees a paper recital of the injuries, to attempt then to define with mathematical accuracy what is the true measure of damages?

I submit, gentlemen, that if our jury system is all that its advocates pronounce it, if it is the most successful system that centuries of experience and centuries of judicial thought can find, then I trust that this Convention will not record itself in such an inconsistent manner as to say, once we have a verdict of the jury, that some other person or group of persons is greater than that jury.
Right to Trial by Jury.

Article XV of Part the First of the Constitution is as follows:

Art. XV. In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has heretofore been otherwise used and practiced, the parties have a right to a trial by jury; and this method of procedure shall be held sacred, unless, in causes arising on the high seas, and such as relate to mariners' wages, the Legislature shall hereafter find it necessary to alter it.

Mr. John C. Twomey of Lawrence presented the following resolution (No. 208):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The right to trial by jury shall be inviolate, and shall extend to all cases at law, but a jury trial may be waived in all cases by the parties after the right of action has accrued, and in any civil action or proceeding the agreement of five-sixths of any jury after five hours deliberation shall be a sufficient verdict therein.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Committee of the Whole Thursday, July 26, 1917, and was rejected by the Convention the next day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Twomey of Lawrence: This resolution, No. 208, states that the right to trial by jury shall be inviolate and shall extend to all cases at law, but that a jury trial may be waived in all cases by the parties after the right of action has accrued. I shall be brief, but I do want to say that I have dispelled from my mind all doubts that majority verdicts by juries are wise. I am convinced in view of the discussion and the vote of the Committee of the Whole that nothing less than a unanimous verdict of twelve men is for the good and welfare of the people in this Commonwealth. But I appeal to those who have so ably advocated unanimity of jury verdicts, to those who have voted for the proposition, that they now give us a jury trial in all cases. If there is merit in a jury trial, if it is as good as they tell us it is, then I ask them to give to that humble litigant, to that person who may have his property taken away from him without due consideration, what he should have,—a jury trial. I ask them now to go on record in this same meeting of the Committee of the Whole as wanting those litigants, humble and poor, to get what they say is good for them, a jury trial.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Will the gentleman specify in what actions at law in our higher courts parties to a case are not entitled to trial by jury if seasonably claimed?

Mr. Twomey: In answer to the question, I would say that that result has been achieved practically in the matter of workmen's compensation.

Continuing, Mr. Chairman, I would add that I shall be exceedingly distressed if those who have defended and voted for jury trial with unanimous verdicts now say to us: "Oh, no, a jury trial is not as good as we would have you believe, it is only good in some cases.” I say that it is my belief that if a jury trial is good for a litigant in one case it ought to be good enough in all cases.

Mr. Francis P. McKeon of Worcester presented the following resolution (No. 151):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by adopting the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

That Article XV of the Declaration of Rights be amended by the substitution of the following:—

Art. XV. In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, the parties have a right to a trial by jury; and this method of procedure shall be held sacred, unless, in causes arising on the high seas, and such as relate to mariners' wages, the General Court shall hereafter find it necessary to alter it.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

By agreement, the subject was acted upon adversely by the Committee of the Whole, July 26, 1917, and was considered by the Convention the following day, and rejected.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. McKeon of Worcester: Mr. President, if you please, I should like to explain before this question is taken the exact issue which I intend to raise now under an amendment which I shall offer if this resolution is not rejected. I think it is a proposal that will meet with very decided approval upon the part of the lawyers of this body. The question which it raises, briefly, simply and plainly stated, is this: That wherever in 1780, at the adoption of the Constitution, and wherever now we have a right to a trial by jury, that in like cases, trying the same questions, determining the same facts, we shall preserve and extend that right of trial by jury to causes in equity. That is the sole question raised by this amendment, which narrows down to a very large extent my original proposal. Therefore I would ask that I may have opportunity to present a brief statement in support of extending the right of trial by jury in equity to those causes wherein that court has concurrent jurisdiction now with the courts of common law, so that we may have a harmonious and complete system of procedure in all those cases where we believe that controverted facts ought to be tried by the jury, as the best tribunal which we have.
ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

VIII.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable presented the following resolution (No. 31):

Resolved, That the following amendment to the Constitution be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection:—

Whereas it is universally recognized that no person has a right to take the life of another except in the extreme necessity of self-defence, and whereas the same principle ought to be recognized in the conduct of the body politic, it is, therefore, hereby ordained that no court of law within this Commonwealth shall hereafter impose the penalty of death for the punishment of any crime.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, Tuesday, July 31, 1917, and was rejected the next day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I rise with some distrust of my ability to present this matter as it ought to be presented to you. I do not know what support I may expect from other members of the Convention, for I have had no time to lobby in the interest of the passing of this resolution. Notwithstanding my distrust of my ability to present it as it should be presented, I am impelled to undertake it because of the teachings of my parents from my youth up, and because of the example of Lincoln, the greatest son of America, who acknowledged that his courage and power to bear such burdens as none of us ever has been called upon to bear, were derived from his reliance upon the great Author of the universe, and I now rely upon that same destiny which shapes our ends, to see to it that the truth which I may speak carries with it the conviction that it ought to carry, in spite of the poor words in which I may convey it.

I know my limitations. I shall attempt no flights of oratory. I shall leave brilliant speech to those among us who are justly reputed to be masters of it. I am well aware of the task I am undertaking. The committee on the Judiciary has reported that this resolution ought not to pass, and you will be reminded that that report is unanimous. But I think some members of that committee will have the grace to admit that in the press of other matters they did not give this matter as much attention as they would have liked to give it. I think all the members of that committee will admit that they did not have before them the data compiled by the commission for the use of this Convention at the time they heard this question and made their report.

But if it is still urged that this committee ought to follow the action of that committee because that report was unanimous, I ask you what, then, is the function of this committee? We might as well let every matter go directly to the Convention. And I also answer, with full deference to the membership of that committee, to their ability and to their honesty, and especially to the ability and honesty of their venerable chairman, that it is a habit of mind of the legal fraternity and of judges to look always backward for precedent rather than forward for some opportunity for improvement.

Another reason why we should not accept the report of that committee is because it is based on the erroneous assumption that this is legislative matter and not a matter for constitutional amendment. This raises an issue which is fundamental to everything which we shall do here in this Convention, and we will do well at this point to give this issue brief consideration.

Let me say at once that I am not of those who look upon the Constitutional Convention as having been called for the purpose of writing into the body of the fundamental law those matters of legislative importance only which have failed to get by the General Court. Neither am I of those who believe that the present Constitution is entirely outworn. The age of that Constitution proves that it has for its foundation principles essentially true and sound, but its very age also indicates that it may need repairs, that it may need to be changed, so that it may fit present conditions.

But let us examine, if we can, the question of what is properly legislative matter and what is proper matter for amendment to the Constitution. Ex-President Eliot of Harvard has included in his list of the greatest State papers of this country the decision written by Chief Justice John Marshall in M'Culloch v. The State of Maryland, which you will find in 4 Wheaton, 316 at p. 407. In that decision Chief Justice Marshall says:

A Constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of a prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.

There is perhaps no better illustration of what Chief Justice Marshall meant, with the possible exception of the Federal Constitution, than the present Constitution of Massachusetts. Keeping these matters in mind let us look for a moment at the character of the resolution before us. I know full well that the text of that resolution is not perhaps the best. It was drawn hastily, but I was satisfied from those who know more about such matters than I do that it was broad enough to cover the purpose I had in mind. I am perfectly willing to have any changes in phraseology made.

But let us look at the subject-matter of that resolution. It deals with the question of capital punishment. That deals primarily with the right to life. Let us see if the right to life is a matter which has been treated constitutionally. We read in the very Preamble of our Massachusetts Constitution that one of the first ends of government is to furnish to the individuals who compose it the power of enjoying their natural rights and the blessing of life. We read in the first Article of the Declaration of Rights that all are born free and equal, that they have certain natural, essential and unalienable rights, that among these may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending life and liberty; and all through the Constitution we deal with the question of life and the conditions under which it may be interfered with.
ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

So the subject-matter of the resolution and the subject-matter of the Massachusetts Constitution are in harmony, and the resolution therefore falls within the definition as laid down by Chief Justice John Marshall, and therefore the basis of the report of the committee on the Judiciary is not sound.

This brings us to a consideration of the main question, the advisability of the retention or the abolition of the penalty of death as a punishment for crime. I hold no brief for murderers. I urge only what I believe to be for the common good,—the protection, safety, prosperity and happiness of all the people. For ages humanity has been struggling upwards from its rude beginnings, where of necessity it obeyed the law of the jungle, the club and the fang,—an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a limb for a limb, and a life for a life. Little by little the light of reason has dawned upon the race, until finally we have come to the point where revenge and retaliation have given place to reason. The old question, "Am I my brother's keeper," we now answer in the affirmative, but in practice how fearfully short we fall of doing what that answer implies.

Probably in no department of human life has there been a greater transformation than in that of the relation between society and its criminal classes. Scarcely more than a century ago over two hundred offences were punished by our English ancestors with the penalty of death, inflicted with varying degrees of cruelty and horror. Now we have reached that more human stage where in Massachusetts we inflict the penalty of death for the single crime of murder in the first degree only, and that is hedged about in many ways. We allow provocation, drunkenness, insanity, to be pleaded in defence, and we take advantage of every extenuating circumstance to save the accused person. If there is any department in our legal administration which justifies the charge that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor, it is to be found in the cases of those accused of capital offences. The man who cannot afford to pay great alienists may be as seriously affected in his mind as the man who can, and if we are going to give the benefit of the doubt to one we should give it to the other. For it should be noted that we no longer punish for the protection of society. If we did we should kill them all,—the provoked as well as the deliberate, the drunk as well as the sober, the insane as well as the sane. But who would stand for such a system as that? No, we must preserve the insane criminal even at the risk of his keeper and of society. So I say we no longer punish for the protection of society.

The only argument which is left for those who believe in the retention of this relic of the rude justice of a more barbarous age is the argument that it deters others from committing the like offence. This, you will find, is one of the four determining questions which the commission for compiling data for the use of this Convention says should determine our attitude on this subject. You will find those four questions on page 13 of document No. 25. This is the first: Does it deter others? The evidence which you will find in that same document, and which you can find elsewhere, is overwhelmingly in favor of my resolution.

If you will read carefully the statistics of those States and those nations which have abolished capital punishment, the statistics of the Federal Bureau of the Census, and the tables on page 31 of document
No. 25, you will reach the same conclusion. I will not deal with the foreign nations, for, as the veteran from the fifth ward (Mr. Lomasney) would remind us, we are living in Massachusetts; but I will deal briefly with the other States of this Union.

Michigan abolished capital punishment in 1846, and nothing could induce her to return. Wisconsin abolished it in 1853; and in this report, document No. 25, you will find that the Governor of Illinois, comparing Illinois with Wisconsin, compared it greatly to the advantage of Wisconsin and deplored the fact that Illinois did not do likewise. Rhode Island abolished capital punishment in 1852. Maine, the last time, in 1887. And among the other States that have abolished it you will find Washington, Kansas, Minnesota, Oregon, North and South Dakota and Arizona.

The statistics of the Federal Bureau of the Census, covering a period from 1900 to 1910, and covering States where capital punishment has been abolished as well as those where it has been retained, show that the crime of murder has decreased in all of these States, almost without exception, and without reference to the punishment for that crime.

This alone should be sufficient to prove to us that capital punishment is not a deterrent of crime. But look at the tables on page 31. You will find, if you will look at least at the New England States, for they are nearest home, that in Maine and Rhode Island, in both of which capital punishment has been abolished for many years, there was a marked decrease of crime between 1904 and 1910. You will find that in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, both of which have capital punishment, there was a like decrease in crime. You will find in Connecticut, where capital punishment has been in force from the beginning, that there has been no change, and that Connecticut has a remarkably high rate per hundred thousand. You will find in Vermont, where capital punishment was in force, an increase, a marked increase, almost double, in that short period of time. And then, if you wish to look a little further, if you look at Michigan and Wisconsin, States in which it has been abolished the longest, you will find there a marked decrease.

It is worthy of note that the crime of lynching does not occur in those States which do not have the death penalty. That crime occurs alone in States where the State sets the example of taking human life because a life has been taken. And if you will stop to consider just a moment I think it will appall you, as it does me, to know of the hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of murderers who are at large in this country, unrestrained and unaccused, for every member of a mob that commits lynching is within the definition of murderer.

Oregon abolished capital punishment by constitutional amendment. The Ohio Constitutional Convention recommended that it be abolished by constitutional amendment, and recommended an amendment to the people, which was defeated. A committee of the New York Constitutional Convention recommended that the death penalty be abolished by constitutional amendment there. The members of the New York Bar Association recommended to the New York Constitutional Convention that the rigors of capital punishment should be modified, because, they urged, the rigors of the present system impel juries not to inflict the penalty if they can avoid it; and many times men are found guilty of minor offences, or not guilty, because of the reluctance of juries to inflict the penalty of death. The New York Bar Association further say, in support of their recommendation, that speedier and less expensive trials could be had if the rigors of the penalty were modified, and that a greater certainty of conviction would obtain.
ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

On this point it may be well for us to consider one or two facts. In England, in a recent year, it was ascertained that of those accused of homicide, 76 per cent of those cases in which capital punishment was not inflicted were convicted as against 33 per cent of those in which capital punishment was the sentence. A comparison of Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, covering a long period of years, shows that in Connecticut only 13 per cent of those accused of the crime of murder are convicted; 87 per cent of the crimes of murder in Connecticut go unpunished. In Massachusetts 17 per cent are convicted and 83 per cent of the murders in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts go unpunished. In Rhode Island, on the other hand, where the penalty of death was abolished in 1852, 63 per cent of those accused of murder are convicted. When you consider, in addition, that in Rhode Island they get speedier and less expensive trials, is it any wonder that the committee for revising criminal law in Rhode Island, as late as 1913, said that they saw no reason for reinstating the death penalty; and you will find the report of that committee on page 11, I think, of document No. 25.

If it is urged that the infliction of death deters those who commit murder in cold blood as paid assassins, like the New York gunmen, for example,—and it should be noted that the infliction of the penalty of death in New York did not deter them,—but if it does deter such as they, their number is offset many times over by those weak, morbid, unbalanced minds which need only the example of a State execution to prompt them to the shedding of innocent blood.

Of 167 condemned men inquired of in New England before their execution, 164 had witnessed public executions. The Tucker trial of Middlesex County was followed by the commission of many crimes of the same kind, and 19 men were awaiting trial for murder in the jails of that county at one time shortly after his conviction and execution. Can you argue that this was mere coincidence?

If it is urged that we should retain the death penalty, then I ask you upon whom should the State inflict this punishment? You must answer, upon the guilty and upon the guilty alone. But it so happens that many times innocent men have been convicted. Phillips, the great English authority on evidence, cites twenty-nine cases where the death penalty was inflicted and innocence was afterward established. In Michigan, since the abolition of capital punishment in 1846, nine of those convicted of murder have been proven to be innocent. And I could cite to you other cases, in other States, in the east as well as in the west, and in our New England States, where innocent men have been convicted of this crime.

Just think what it means! If an innocent man is convicted, and if your electrocutor sends a charge of lightning through his body and reduces him to inanimate clay, there is no power under heaven by which you can rectify the wrong you have done.

But I do not need to argue to you the fallibility of human judgment. You know that judges and jurors are human and are liable to err. You know that it is the fundamental object of government to secure to every man, as the gentleman from Randolph (Mr. French) so well said the other day, the utmost protection of life. I think he went so far as to say that the Constitution is not worth the paper it is written upon unless it does guarantee to the fullest extent the right to life, reputation, liberty and property.

Those who oppose the abolition of capital punishment sometimes do so on the ground that the Governor abuses the power of pardon. I submit to you that that does not meet the issue. It raises another issue. Your quarrel is with Article VIII of the Declaration of Rights, in which the Governor is given the power to pardon. I, however, have no objection, if those of you who otherwise would favor this measure wish it, to so amend my resolution that it will cover that objection; for I do not believe that a man convicted of murder should escape punishment by the interference of the executive with the proper administration of law.

Neither do they meet the issue who urge that the accused man brings upon himself his own punishment, and that the Bible sanctions the taking of human life. I would remind you who may say "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," that according to the more enlightened dispensation of the later version, we find the contrary rule laid down. We find these words spoken of a woman taken in the very act of committing the highest crime known to the Jews: "Go thy way and sin no more." And to her accusers "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." And who is there among us without sin? If it be true that to look upon a woman to lust after her is adultery, who is there among us who has not committed every crime in the calendar in his heart? It is only by the grace of God, or by the more fortunate circumstance of our birth and our environment, that we have not committed the overt act which by the narrow limits of our finite minds we call the crime.

But let us look for a moment at the history of this movement in Massachusetts. From 1835 this question has been considered here. From Edward Everett down to the present executive, including Governor Morton and Governor Long, we have recommendations that this rude relic of barbarism should be put away. We find Attorneys-General, from Austin to Knowlton, urging that the time has come when we should put away this last relic of a rude justice; and we find that the Legislature has dealt with the subject many times, but that it never has been submitted to the people. Attorney-General Knowlton said in 1901, — and you will find the record of his report in this document No. 25, — that the penalty of death no longer should be inflicted in this Commonwealth, since it does not diminish or prevent crime. He based what he said upon a wider experience, probably, than any other man in the Commonwealth ever has had, and upon a close study of the working of this law in this and other States. He said that it did not diminish or prevent crime; that a man so lost to reason that he would commit murder deliberately, premeditatedly, with malice aforethought, does not enter into a discussion with himself as to the consequences of his crime. He said that the time had come to put away this relic of barbarism, — and those are his very words,—for society sooner or later must outgrow this rude system as it has outgrown the rack, the whipping-post and the stake.
ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

With such antecedents before us, is it not time for Massachusetts, the pioneer in constitutional democracy, the State where we have always maintained the fires of liberty and progress, where we have not been content to live in the reflected glory of the past, but have been constantly flashing lights into the future,—is it not time, I say, to finally, once for all, put away this last vestige of such barbarity? How can we be worthy of such sires as ours if we are not willing to face the future, if we must ever look to the past? How can we honor them better than by building, upon the foundations they have laid so well, a superstructure as perfect as we can make it? How can we honor them better, or insure to ourselves the gratitude of posterity more certainly, than by writing a little better than our fathers did the truth they wrote so well? When justice and mercy both point to the same conclusion as irresistibly as they do in this case, how can any of us yield to our prejudices and refuse to adopt the same conclusion, and then have the courage to face our conscience or our God?

So, Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee of the Whole recommend to the Convention that this resolution ought to pass, and I think that I have given you sufficient evidence, no matter what your individual opinions may be, that there is a sufficiently important question of fact here to warrant us in submitting it to the people, who never yet have had a chance to pass upon it, and whose right it is in the last analysis to determine under what laws they will live. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Williams of Brookline: I do not propose to discuss the merits of the question of the abolition of capital punishment, because in my opinion, and in the opinion of the other members of the Judiciary Committee, this Committee of the Whole and this Convention is not the place. Furthermore, it would not be fair to certain members of the Judiciary Committee for me to argue against the abolition of capital punishment (the opinion, by the way, which I entertain) because at least two, and possibly more, of the membership of that committee believe that capital punishment should be abolished. But they do not believe, nor do any of the members of the Judiciary Committee believe, that it should be made a subject of amendment to the Constitution. We believe that it is distinctively a legislative proposition. And why?

In the first place, the only place in which the subject of capital punishment is referred to in the Constitution, in my opinion, is the last clause of Article XII of the Bill of Rights, where it says:

And the Legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment, excepting for the government of the army and navy, without trial by jury.

Clearly it was the opinion of the framers of the original Constitution that it is a matter for the Legislature to provide punishment to fit the crime.

Article IV, Chapter 1, of Part 2 of the Constitution provides:

And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time to make, ordain, and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defence of the government thereof.

Under Article III of the same chapter, the General Court is given

... full power and authority to erect and constitute judicatories and courts of record, or other courts, to be held in the name of the Commonwealth, for the hearing, trying and determining of all manner of crimes, offences, pleas, processes, etc.

In a word, those articles and provisions of the Constitution determined the members of the Judiciary Committee in reporting against a provision for an amendment to the Constitution as suggested by the gentleman from Barnstable. It always has been a matter of legislative determination. We feel that the words of his Excellency the Governor, in addressing this Constitutional Convention on the first day, should have weight with this Convention in determining its action, — whether the Constitution shall be made a bundle of statutes, or whether it shall remain

... a declaration of fundamental individual rights accompanied by an outline of a frame of government through which organized society may perform its work.

I am reading from the words of his Excellency the Governor on the first day we assembled.

In our day, social and economic conditions change with great rapidity and statutes may be required which would soon become obsolete and outgrown. But if the Constitution, — the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, — is made to partake of the nature of a statute, if it shall attempt to specify in detail the rules which should govern the ordinary relations of men to each other and to the State, it cannot hope to have a high degree of permanence. In the period which has elapsed since the Constitutional Convention last sat in this Commonwealth, some of our States have had as many as four such bodies. Those States are not more unstable or prone to change than is our own, but having placed in their Constitutions matter statutory in its nature, they have been obliged to treat it as a statute and resort to frequent revision. It has been the good fortune of Massachusetts thus far to avoid this error. May this Convention preserve her in that happy condition.

Since this Convention assembled the Chief Justice of this Commonwealth, in an opinion published in the Banker & Tradesman of July 7, referring to the Constitution said:

The Constitution of Massachusetts is a frame of government for a sovereign power. It was designed by its framers and accepted by the people as an enduring instrument, so comprehensive and general in its terms that a free, intelligent and moral body of citizens might govern themselves under its beneficent provisions through radical changes in social, economic and industrial conditions.

Note this:

It declares only fundamental principles as to the form of government and the mode in which it shall be exercised. Certain great powers are conferred and some limitations as to their exercise are established. ... It is a grant from the sovereign people and not the exercise of a delegated power. It is a statement of general principles and not a specification of details.

That is the opinion of our court, delivered within six weeks; hence your Judiciary Committee feel that this body should not incorporate into the Constitution a statute, as it would by taking the proposed action. The experience of some of the States which have abolished capital punishment has been such that they have gone back and adopted it again, and it is possible to conceive of a change of opinion in this Commonwealth as time progresses.
ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Now, as I understand, the only reason suggested by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) is that the right to life is an inalienable right, and he quoted from Article I of the Bill of Rights:

All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and unalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

The Bill of Rights goes a little further. Article X says:

Each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, according to standing laws. He is obliged, consequently, to contribute his share to the expense of this protection; to give his personal service, or an equivalent, when necessary.

The point I desire to make is that while the right to life and liberty is inalienable, yet it does not give a free license for a man to act as he pleases. He is bound to observe the laws, he may be required to give up his life in defence of his country for the protection which is accorded him. We see that from day to day, in what is going on in connection with the present war. He is obliged to submit to taxation in order to have his property protected. He is not permitted to go wild, not permitted to commit crime and not suffer punishment. He possibly may have his liberty taken away from him by incarceration in jail. The decisions are innumerable as to what a man cannot do in connection with that right to life and liberty.

The condensation of the idea of what I have said is expressed by Chief Justice Rugg, in Commonwealth v. Libby, 216 Mass. 356:

But the Constitution also guarantees to all citizens the blessings of liberty and the right to happiness and safety, and the right to acquire and possess property. In general terms also the Federal Constitution gives substantially the same assurances. The liberty which thus has such ample constitutional security does not signify absolute and unrestrained license to follow the dictates of an unbridled will. Constitutional freedom means a liberty regulated by law.

That is the inalienable right which you have.

The right of the individual is subject to reasonable restraints made by general law for the common good.

Then follows a quotation from an opinion of the Federal Court:

Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community.

So it seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) that the right to life is inalienable is not sound, and that we should adhere to the suggestion already made in this Convention and in this committee, which was made to us by His Excellency, not to incorporate into the Constitution statutory law. If we do, we shall soon have our Constitution nothing but a compilation of statutes, rather than a declaration of those fundamental individual rights, as laid down in the present Constitution. We of the Judiciary Committee think it is well to adhere to the original plan.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: After the argument of the last speaker, with which I agree, I hesitate a little to say anything. I have long been in favor of capital punishment, but it took an experience to make me a sincere believer in it. Some years ago I was asked by a certain condemned murderer in this State to come and see him and talk with him, and in that experience I learned a great deal. I asked myself, first of all, how can I know that this man has repented? He was very sorry of course, exceedingly sorry, that he was in the position in which he found himself. He was exceedingly sorry that he had been so foolish as to commit the crime, and, of course, he was full of professions as to what he might do if he were released.

But, as it seemed to me, professions of willingness to enter upon a life of service if he were pardoned had a somewhat hollow sound, coming from a man, who, so far as I could see, never had done an unselfish deed in all his life. Of course there was fear in him too, for he believed in God, and he felt he might soon stand before Him, but that fear was no evidence of repentance.

After consultation with some of those whose wisdom I especially prized, I came to the conclusion that the only possible proof of repentance which he could give me was a deed, an atoning deed, which would go below the surface, which should mean everything to him.

I soon found, however, that I had not yet looked at the deeper side of the problem; that the deeper question was: How can this man prove to himself that he is repentant? Sorrow and professions and fear of course would amount to nothing more with him than they would with me, and there was nothing left for him, if he wished to prove his repentance to himself, except an atoning deed; a deed which would reconcile him in his deepest nature and in his own mind to the law of right, written as it is on conscience, so that he could hold up his head before all the universe and say: "I have repented of my crime, and I know that I have repented of my crime because I have made willingly the supreme expiation."

Now, it seems to me that that is the only attitude that a right-minded murderer can possibly take. But my murderer had no such ideas at all. I learned from him that he never would have committed the murder if he ever had supposed he would be found out; he never would have committed the murder if he ever had supposed that they would electrocute him, — him. His whole mind was set with tremendous desire upon a commutation of his sentence; and he was asking me if I would find out for him what was the average time commuted murderers had to spend in prison before they were pardoned, and his only use for me was that I might intercede for him with the powers that be to secure him a commutation.

The other night, I was talking with my father, a man of the largest experience of life, and he told me that in his early days he was the spiritual adviser of a murderer in the city of St. Louis, who killed his wife by drowning her in the Mississippi River. This man had lived in a good home when he was a boy, and after the murder had been committed and he had been tried and sentenced, it seemed that his better manhood came back to him. The father of this murderer was extremely bitter at the court for being satisfied with nothing except his son’s life; but the murderer, on the other hand, again and again expressed the thought that he never could be satisfied except with his execution.

That reminded me that when I was eighteen years old, in Chicago, they apprehended a murderer, a man of kind disposition but a regular demon when he was inflamed with drink. He had lost his wife and was living with a little daughter of about twelve years of age, whom he greatly loved. He came home one night drunk, and, under circum-

Digitized by Google stances which made it first degree murder, he murdered her. When he came to himself and saw what he had done, he was deeply repentant.
He pleaded guilty of murder in the first degree before the judge.
The judge rightly ordered a trial, the verdict was first degree murder, and the judge sentenced him. When he was asked what he had to say against being sentenced, he made a very remarkable speech, in which he said he never could be satisfied with anything else than giving his life for the life that he had taken.

Now, one of the great reasons for this agitation for the abolition of capital punishment is the doctrine which Jesus Christ put forth, in a world which cared nothing for it at the time, but which the world has since accepted within the bounds of Christendom, the doctrine of the immense value of the single human life. Now, those who favor the abolition of capital punishment, with what seems to me a superficial sentimentality, think only of the life of the murderer, but the State must take the view that the life in question is the life of the victim; and just because the State now holds to the thought of Jesus Christ about the immense value of every single human life, it must say that the life which the murderer takes cannot be compensated for by something cheap, it cannot be compensated for with so much money, it cannot be compensated for with a few years in prison, it cannot be compensated for even with life imprisonment. There is only one thing so valuable, so valuable above all else, as will expiate the taking of life, and that is a life itself. I do not believe that capital punishment is a survival of barbarism. I believe that through all of the ages up to the present time, and at the present time, capital punishment is kept upon our books because it is the demand of justice,—a justice which not only the fundamental nature of man demands, but which every right-minded murderer approves. [Applause.]
IX.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COURTS.

Mr. Charles P. Curtis, Jr., of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 188):

Resolved, That it is expedient to add to Chapter III of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Supreme Judicial Court shall have the power to prescribe, from time to time, and in any manner, the form and manner of service of writs and all other process; the mode and manner of framing and filing proceedings and pleadings; of giving notice and serving process of all kinds; of taking and obtaining evidence; drawing up, entering, and enrolling orders; and generally to regulate and prescribe by rule the forms for the entire pleading, practice and procedure to be used in all actions, motions and proceedings at law of whatever nature by the several courts of record of the Commonwealth.

The committee on Judicial Procedure reported, July 16, 1917, the following new draft (No. 313):

Resolved, That it is expedient that the Constitution be amended by adding thereto the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

To the end that the distribution and exercise of the judicial power by and among the several courts may be so coordinated and systematized as to correct defects and promote efficiency, economy and dispatch in judicial procedure, the Legislature may provide for the distribution of the judicial power among the several courts, and the regulation and control of its exercise and of judicial procedure in general, by the Supreme Judicial Court or the Justices thereof, or a council of judges of the several courts, or of judges with such others as they may join, in such manner as such court, justices or council shall from time to time prescribe by general rules; provided, however, that nothing in this article shall be deemed to authorize the abrogation of any rights otherwise guaranteed by the Constitution.

The resolution was read a second time Thursday, July 18, 1918; and it was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I desire to make a brief statement touching this resolution and the one which stands next upon the calendar, with a view as it may be, to saving the time of the Convention. The two resolutions are really but one, being but different forms of expressing substantially the same purpose, and they were submitted with a special report which gentlemen will find printed in Convention document No. 314. The purpose of the resolution, for I will speak of them as one, is to vest in the courts, which already have the whole judicial power under the Constitution, the control and regulation of its exercise, which has been left, whether wisely or unwisely, whether necessarily under the Constitution or unnecessarily, principally to the Legislature. The resolution is in line of a Nation wide movement for the recasting of judicial procedure. I do not say for its reform, because that word may convey an unpleasant suggestion of a need of reform which perhaps does not exist in Massachusetts. The movement is for the recasting and improvement of judicial procedure. It is actively going forward in some of the most intelligent States, and is strongly advocated by many of the most enlightened and influential lawyers in the country, especially, in this neighborhood, the accomplished dean of the Harvard Law School. The general purpose of the resolutions cannot be more shortly stated than they are in the special report of the committee, being to coordinate and harmonize the work of the various courts, avoid waste and duplication of labor by the judges, abridge the unnecessary volume of clerical work involved in the present system, reduce to their lowest practicable limits the expenses of litigation both to the parties and the public, simplify and speed the trial of causes, and especially of small causes, and in general to promote efficiency, economy and dispatch in the administration of justice. These are the purposes of the resolution. I have heard whispers, or have heard of whispers though they have not come directly to my ears, that the resolution conceals some deep laid scheme or schemes of extending the power of the judges to a degree which perhaps none of us would favor. Of this it is sufficient to say that it is pure imagination. There is nothing concealed in the proposal. It is only intended to make the administration of justice cheaper, speedier and more efficient,—consummations which seemed to the committee devoutly to be wished.
ORGANIZATION OF THE COURTS. 451

The long interval which has elapsed since the resolution was reported last year has afforded time and opportunity to develop the sentiment of the people who ought, perhaps, to be most interested in the subject, especially the judges and the members of the bar. I regret to say, as it has been a great disappointment to the committee, that the resolution has seemed to excite little interest among the members of the bar except a hostile interest for which I am wholly unable to account, for it seems to the committee a movement in which all the legal fraternity ought with one accord to join. The fact is, however, that the profession has not risen to the proposal to any extent whatever. The local bar associations have paid no attention to it, so far as I am aware. The able committee on the Judiciary is understood to be arrayed against it, though I cannot conceive why it should be, and I am told that active opposition to it has already been urged upon members of the Convention. There is, as we all know, on the part of the Convention, not perhaps a jealousy of the judges, but a critical attitude toward the manner in which judicial power is supposed to be exercised, which would make such a substantial extension of the power of the judges as the resolution involves exceedingly doubtful. In this state of things it can hardly be expected that the judges themselves would express an active interest in the subject even if they feel it, of which no evidence has reached the committee. In short, for it is idle to enlarge upon it, the committee has come to the conclusion that the prospect of the passage of the resolution is so small that they are not warranted under the present urgency to finish the work of the Convention already too long protracted, in pressing it upon the Convention for the extended discussion which it would probably occasion and which indeed it ought to have before adoption, and accordingly they feel that they are discharging their own responsibility by this explanation unless more is called for, leaving the resolution to the Convention for such action as it may see fit to take.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: In view of the statement made by the chairman of the committee on Judicial Procedure I assume there is no question but what the Convention will refuse to adopt the resolution. This resolution was considered by the Judiciary Committee. Had it been urged upon the Convention, it would have met upon the floor of this hall with considerable opposition. It has not met with favor from the bar, as the gentleman has said, and nowhere have I found any sentiment in favor of it. In view, therefore, of the fact that the committee itself does not care to urge the matter upon the Convention those of us who are opposed to its adoption by the Convention will not take your time in arguing against the proposition.
X.

POWER OF COURTS TO DECLARE STATUTES UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Mr. Walter H. Creamer of Lynn presented the following resolution (No. 47)

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In the determination of any case, all courts, other than the full bench of the Supreme Judicial Court, shall assume that all acts of the General Court or of the Congress of the United States or of the Legislature of another State are constitutional.

No such act shall be held to be unconstitutional and void by the full bench of the Supreme Judicial Court without the concurrence of at least all but one of the justices of said court.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the foregoing resolutions ought not to be adopted and the discussion of them was begun by the Convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, Friday, July 27, 1917.

Mr. George W. Anderson of Brookline moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

No law duly enacted by the General Court shall be nullified as unconstitutional except by the Supreme Judicial Court with the concurrence of not less than two-thirds of all the justices thereof.

The amendment was rejected in the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, August 1, by a vote of 37 to 137.

The resolution was rejected by the Convention Thursday, August 2, by a vote of 77 to 16, a call of the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. Charles Stoeber of Adams presented the following resolution (No. 97):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

No court shall assume or exercise the power of nullifying or suspending the operation of any law, or any part thereof, enacted directly by the people or by the General Court alone or in conjunction with the people on the ground of unconstitutionality or for any other reason.

The resolution was rejected by the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, August 1, 1917, and by the Convention on the following day.

Mr. E. Gerry Brown of Brockton presented the following resolution (No. 212):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Any bill or resolve having the force of a law through any form or manner prescribed or hereafter to be prescribed in the Constitution shall not be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Judicial Court if any judge of said court shall hold and express opinion that the bill or resolve in question is constitutional.

The resolution was rejected by the Committee of the Whole Wednesday, August 1, 1917, and by the Convention on the following day.
THE DEBATE.

Mr. CREAMER of Lynn: This resolution was offered by me at the instance of attorneys of some standing in this community; it has failed to find favor with the members of the Judiciary Committee. It is not my purpose to debate the subject at any length; for, in common with many laymen in this committee, I still am somewhat slightly bewildered by yesterday's avalanche of words. I also realize that a layman ought not to get in between two opposing groups of lawyers, any more than a man ought to interfere between husband and wife. I therefore shall content myself with asking the delegate from Boston (Mr. Montague) who has charge of this report, two simple questions. First: If the unanimous verdict of a jury is necessary for the protection of an individual litigant in a petty civil action, is not the unanimous verdict of the Supreme Judicial Court equally necessary for the protection of the community in setting aside an act of the legislative authority of the Commonwealth, a coordinate power of government? Secondly: Should an act of that same legislative authority be set aside by the Supreme Judicial Court if two or three members of that court say that that act is constitutional?

I believe the distinguished delegate from Randolph (Mr. French) said yesterday that minorities often were right. I submit, sir, that the present practice is a serious encroachment of the judicial power on the legislative power and is fraught with some danger to both.

Mr. MONTAGUE of Boston: It does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that any arguments have been presented thus far which would lead this Convention to consider this resolution with great seriousness. It seems to me that the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney of Boston) laid down yesterday a very good rule for this committee or this Convention to follow, which was, in substance, as I understood him, that unless there was shown some reason, some substantial reason for a change, we had better stick by the Constitution which thus far has carried us so safely and so well and so long.

The committee on the Judiciary, as the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Creamer) says, did report unanimously against this proposition. No person appeared before the committee on the Judiciary to advocate this proposal except the gentleman who has just spoken; and while that gentleman, as we all know, either in this Convention or outside of it, is a host in himself, the fact that only one gentleman appeared, even an eminent one, would not indicate that the faults to be found with our present system had become so widespread and had embraced so many people that there was any even moderate call for a change.

I did find some things in looking up the matter which may be of interest to the Convention, to those who are not already familiar with them,—to the laymen, as he suggests,—although from his argument before the committee and here no one would know that he was a layman. This proposition embraces two distinct features. The first is this: That no single Justice shall be allowed to declare a statute or resolve of this Legislature, or of the Congress of the United States or of the Legislature of any other State, unconstitutional. The second proposition is that our Supreme Judicial Court cannot declare any of those statutes unconstitutional unless all the court save one join in that opinion.

Now, as every attorney knows, and maybe the laymen too, when a case of this kind comes before a court it always comes in the first instance before a single Justice. He may decide the case himself and give the party aggrieved a right of appeal, or he may report or reserve the case without deciding it; that is, he may report or reserve it to the full bench of the Supreme Judicial Court; and we find that that custom has been followed, you might say, both ways.

I find in looking up the history of what our courts have done in deciding statutes unconstitutional, that in the time covered by our reports, which is from 1804 to 1916, almost inclusive, there are only 59 cases in which our Supreme Judicial Court has set aside as unconstitutional either the acts or resolves of this General Court. Fifty-nine cases,—some say less. Some cut it down to fifty-two or fifty-three; but fifty-nine, as far as I can find, covers them all. Of that number eight were set aside for violation of the United States Constitution, and fifty-one for the violation of our State Constitution. I find that in that length of time our Supreme Judicial Court has set aside only once, or has declared unconstitutional only once, an act passed by the United States Congress, and that was in 1814,—a long time ago.

I find that in only two cases has our Supreme Judicial Court set aside the statutes of other States as unconstitutional, and those two cases were cases in which the rights of Massachusetts citizens were involved, and if our courts had not had the power of decision, our own inhabitants, citizens of our own State, would have been wronged.

I find that of the fifty-nine cases that have come before the courts, in twenty-five of those fifty-nine the lower court has decided that question and left the parties to their appeal. In thirty-four cases they have reserved the decision or reported the matter for the full bench of the Supreme Judicial Court. In the twenty-five of those cases which have been decided by the single Justice, in every case except two they have held the statute constitutional, which seems to indicate that it is already a settled and established practice of our courts, referring to the first part of this proposition, for the lower court in the first instance to hold the statute constitutional and leave to the full bench the final decision. Of those two cases, where the lower court did decide, one was a case where this Legislature many years ago passed a law allowing the right of search in certain civil proceedings. The right of search, as everybody knows, always has been confined to criminal proceedings. The statement that a man's house is his castle is not literally true, but practically it is true, and it is one of the great fundamental stones upon which the rights and liberty of the Anglo-Saxon people and our people always have been supposed to rest. But this Legislature passed a law allowing the right of search, and the matter came up as it naturally would, before a single Justice, and it was up to him to either grant the warrant or not grant the warrant. He refused to grant the warrant, held the statute unconstitutional, and that decision was upheld by the full bench.

The other case, where the judge decided it, was where this Legislature passed a law that the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charlestown might grade any private way in any way that they saw fit and assess the expenses upon the abutters. They started out to grade a private way and cut it down eight feet below a man’s doorstep, with no redress to him; and the lower court held the statute unconstitutional. And I will submit that in those cases where a single Justice has decided the statute unconstitutional they were well justified in so doing.

I find, to my surprise, that the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court have been singularly unanimous. I find in the whole hundred and thirteen years that there are only three cases in which dissenting opinions have been written. In two of those cases one judge wrote a dissenting opinion; in the third case two judges wrote a dissenting opinion. I find among those cases, so far as the reports indicate, that there are only four other cases,—only four,—in which the decision of the court was less than unanimous. So that in all but seven cases of the fifty-nine in which our court has held statutes unconstitutional, the decision of that court has been unanimous. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, whether there is made any showing whatever of any necessity for a change.

The question which the gentleman puts up squarely is, in the first instance, a hard one to answer; that is,—why unanimity should not be required of judges as well as of juries. As to that matter I will say this first: That in what reading I have been able to do, whenever it has been brought up, there is not a jurist of any standing, or without any standing, who apparently, as far as I can find, has left his views in print, who advocates that it ought to be a unanimous opinion of the judges. They all find a difference, and I think there is a difference. The question of fact is settled then and there, for all time. It only comes up once. The decision of the jury, the way that it is rendered, is something that we have been accustomed to, we have got used to, we have grown up to for a great many years. The attitude of this Convention yesterday in Committee of the Whole indicates that we do not care to change it.

On the other hand, the custom of a majority opinion of the court has been felt to be for centuries the wisest way, on the whole, of arriving at a decision, realizing that when these great constitutional questions are considered there is a tremendous chance for a variation of opinion, just the same as there is between the attorneys of this Convention. It is an exceedingly delicate and complex matter; there is no doubt about it. We all of us are undecided when it comes to thinking of a constitutional matter, and it has been found, or it is thought to be, practically impossible in the long run that a full bench, the full court, should agree in every particular upon all matters that come before it. The present practice, as I understand it,—as I know,—is the practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, and, so far as I have been able to learn, is the practice in every State in this country; and, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in this particular at least we might leave our Constitution where it is. [Applause.]

Mr. McANARNEY of Quincy: I wish to add one suggestion to this debate. Stripped of all verbiage, this amendment proposes that a minority of two may prevent the Supreme Judicial Court from declaring a statute unconstitutional. If that be so, that in effect is giving a minority of two the power to declare a statute constitutional. That would be unique.
Mr. Brown of Brockton: Why I come into this thing is because you will meet a resolution two numbers below which is substantially the self-same proposition and we may as well have the debate here as on that. It was my purpose not to say anything; I said that before the committee. But I heard the debate yesterday, I listened to every word of it, and it has been asked here: "Where does a layman fit?"
And sometimes perhaps I might take an independent position. And I heard a member, — I mean nothing offensive when I say of the union, but I am so used to saying it, — I heard a member of the lawyers' union, while they were in session, say something which to my mind was nothing more nor less than a, very well, — well, it was a well-worded roast of a Justice of the Superior Court, and I guess of more than one, and he is not the only lawyer whom I have heard do that.
We are confronted also with the spectacle that a gentleman who once had an opportunity to appoint judges wants to defend somebody else who happens to come into office from having any such authority and he wants to give somebody else a chance to "o. k." appointments. So you see the point I am trying to get at now is not what has been but what may be. And while perhaps I do not know and I am not sure, yet I feel and I should hope that I would not in any way feel I was bound because I appeared satisfied when appearing before the Judiciary Committee. Knowing that I was in the presence of our beloved ex-Justice whose words yesterday interested us so much, — I want to pay my tribute to the press who have recognized that scene, and I must say from my long experience as a newspaper man there is nothing that I would like so much as a picture of this Convention at the moment when we were listening to his tribute to American manhood so far as the jury system was concerned. If it could be heard all over this Commonwealth, it might well still a large measure of the complaint against what is called class distinction and make us believe that we are a good deal better than we think we are.
But coming to this question I go a great deal further. The gentleman who has last risen says it is a unique provision that the minority should be held to control everything. Without going at large into the subject before the assembly here, who I know have better learning than myself, look at Poland as she stood for two hundred years, — a very, very much larger body than the judges of any Supreme Court that we have in any State of this Nation, and the vote of a minority of one was sufficient; and you cannot find much fault with the government when men submit to no laws except of their own making; and that making was such that they had the largest possible opportunity for a minority of one to interfere and see that they were not governed by the law. And it did not fall until that accursed commercialism, until that accursed golden calf which is getting into American institutions, found a way to get at men and corrupt them, just the same way as the monarchic institutions now find a way to get into Russia and corrupt her temporarily. I stand for a minority of one, but it is not in reality a minority of one. The gentleman who speaks so eloquently and to whom I listened so clearly when he laid down that decision in the Tuyet case, — I say you have got it just right. It is one with the people, that is what it is, because the people, in all their majesty and through their legislative bodies, and the executive with all the checks and balances that have been contrived to guard against hasty decision so that the people shall feel that it had the fullest possible deliberation, have acted. The bill shall come into the House of Representatives, which represents the people; it shall go to the Senate, whose official capacity, according to the Constitution of 1780, is to protect wealth. The Senate was organized for that purpose,—to protect wealth. The people were told to accept that Constitution because the Senate was to protect wealth. Then the bill goes to His Excellency the Governor, the representative of the people, for his action. It goes through all those stages and finally it comes to be a law; and then what? It goes up to the Supreme Judicial Court,—how? Private interests contending with each other. The public are not represented at all. The great fundamental principle that interested the people when the law was passed is not even presented to the judges. Then comes a decision. Do you say a change may not come here? How, or why not? These decisions are contagious. Look at the court in the State of New York handing down a decision in one of our labor cases and deciding in favor of the sweatshop and saying that they can see no hardship that a man should be not permitted to work in his own tenement making cigars, saying that it seems to be the best possible condition under which a man can work, saying that he can work in a crowded tenement making garments and carrying out the seeds of disease among the people, saying that it is man's natural right and he must be protected in his contract. And so they hand down the decision that it is unconstitutional, and no one was there to present to those judges the broad humanitarian police power, the good health of the whole people. It was the manufacturing interests that wanted that decision.

And again, go to the ideal that labor had when it acted on the great question of hours and conditions for bakers. The unions wanted bake shops clean; we do not want them going in there to make the bread with dirt of every kind all over them. We want if possible to keep the bakers even from going into their shops drunk, lest they may send out the influence of drink into the Commonwealth. And when we had worked and labored in New York to get those ideals into law, why, the court gave a decision that it was unconstitutional on the principle that a baker had the right of contract. That is what we are getting in court decisions. If you say that we do not get it in Massachusetts it is because the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is made up of men of good, hard common sense, just as our beloved former Justice (Mr. Morton) has pointed out. Now how long will it be so? I know how useless it is to argue on a question which perhaps already is decided, but I am here because I do not want to run away from my subject. I do believe in it.

Let me take another point. How eloquently the gentleman asserts and how sure he is that this is a proper procedure! But go to the Madison Debates on the Constitution that was made for the United States and find how many of the men who framed it were willing that the Supreme Court of the United States should hold this power which you say that they ought to have in this Commonwealth. Some of your Massachusetts delegates did not agree to it. Elbridge Gerry did not consent to it, and he campaigned against it. I admit that afterwards, I know not why,—I do not care; but possibly when he was running for Governor, to which office probably he was elected so as to give an opportunity for the Democrats to get in more than they would have got if they had not got the gerrymander, — then he changed his opinion. We have had instances where one branch of government has defied the Supreme Court. In one case in the time of Thomas Jefferson when the Supreme Court laid down its decision, what did he say? "John Marshall has made his decision; let him enforce it. I am the executive of all the people. I stand by my act. That is my duty under the Constitution." The court had not the other arm it wanted in order to enforce its decision.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

You tell me in these great economic and political questions it is safe to leave the decision to the Supreme Judicial Court, — why? Why should you burden them with it? Why do not you lawyers come forward and find some way whereby you can relieve these Justices of that burden? Where is our honored member (Mr. Whipple) who was a candidate for the office of President of this Convention? Will he please put into our Constitution some such change as he suggested down in West Virginia, where he found that there was a reason why the Supreme Court should be divorced entirely from this idea of passing upon questions that were economic, and in the last analysis political, and which depended upon the political will of the people? I ask him that. Returning to the point that I once before made, that there was not one-third of the delegates to the National Convention, as you will see if you read Madison's Debates and read what they thought of the Supreme Court, who would have favored anything of the kind. Go out, for instance, from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, into the State of Virginia or to James Wilson in Pennsylvania, or Hamilton in New York and Martin in Maryland, and see what they had to say about it. They were not at all sure of that principle, that it was wise to adopt it; and I am sure I am not. Later you have got to have the question of the last word, — I suppose it will be fought out here again, how? Because when you come to the initiative and referendum you may have the question as to whether the people shall have a right to review and change the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court on constitutional questions by taking the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court and putting the contrary to it and giving the people a right to say "Yes" or "No." Should they do that on any court question where it is purely a question of constitutional law and not a question of fact? Should they do that on a question of fact which relates to the condition of the people? The condition of the people is merely the result of how you keep house, and keeping house is your political machinery, and your political machinery is governed by your Constitution. When your method of keeping house is such that your house is in disorder and the people do not get enough to eat they are going to ask the reason why, and if that house is not kept right they are going to change the keeping of the house.

I hesitate to speak further because I have got one matter that I am more interested in. I violate no confidence when I say that I crossed over to speak to my friend who first spoke on this subject. I asked him if he was going to defend it and called attention to the fact that there was the same principle coming out in the debate then pending, that juries ought to be unanimous. I ask the gentlemen who speak here, what is the Supreme Judicial Court when it starts to pass upon a division in legal opinion? What is the Supreme Judicial Court in the last analysis? What is it but a jury? It is a jury that is deciding a question on a matter of law, not a question of facts, and how are they going to decide the law? On precedent. They take one precedent added to another, which in some form or other Julian says makes law. They are bound by precedent. I saw a person rise in the course of debate and I asked: "Is that a lawyer?" They said they did not know. Pretty soon he began to talk about authority. I said: "Yes, he is a lawyer; he belongs to the union."

---

1 Referring to an address delivered by Mr. Whipple before the West Virginia Bar Association.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

I say with all respect, I recognize the importance of stability; I recognize that the whole point of a Supreme Judicial Court is to have it settled once for all that men may know the law. But I ask you, what chance have you got between the time that the Legislature passes an act and the time of the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court? Suppose the Legislature passes an act and under that act I suppose I have certain rights and I go forward on my rights and although I proceed according to the law the court in the end holds that I am liable for damages. I accept the act and then the court says, "The law is unconstitutional," and my acts have made me liable to damage, whereas if the law is sustained I am not.

If there is so much doubt that, when it comes to the court, four are one way and five are the other, do you say that that is final? In one of the decisions that affects the pocketbook of every man in this chamber and every citizen of this Commonwealth and of the United States, the court did hand down one decision. They handed it down in the case of the Legal Tender Act, taking the ground that certain acts that Congress had passed they could not do; that they had not the power under the Constitution. The question of what was coin was involved,—whether coin was paper or gold; and the court handed down a decision that the Legal Tender Act could not stand. Then what happened? Why, they changed the court. The incoming President changed the court when he had an opportunity and the court reversed its position and up the case went again. And I suppose your last decision stands and the last decision is entirely opposite; it says that Congress has the power without an emergency at any time to coin the credit of the people, into the legal tender power, into anything that it wants to put it on,—paper or metal. There is the court decision; it is not always stable.

Why was the court changed? Because the power of the people demanded it. Why was that decision of the Supreme Court handed down that the Adamson law was constitutional? I tell you that that court knew what feeling was behind it and what trouble was coming to this Nation if they handed it down the other way. They knew what was smouldering and they made their decision. Decisions of the court are based, I will admit, according to authority, according to precedent, but I will not believe so ill of the Supreme Judicial Court but what if it knows the common welfare and the condition of the people and it can be presented to them, but what they will take it into account. That is why I complain. If you are going to allow the majority in the court to decide, there should be somebody, the Attorney-General or somebody else, whose duty it should be to go to that Supreme Judicial Court when a law that has been passed by the Legislature is called in question and he should stand there as the people's defender and argue the case from all standpoints. You cannot blame the judges if they hand down a decision if you are too confounded lazy to get all the facts into the case. Webster did not hesitate to get in everything he could in the Dartmouth College case, and there he got his decision on a point which he did not consider of any consequence. I know not whether that decision is going to stand always, but he got it on in a direction he was not looking for, showing how easily you sometimes can secure an opinion.

Why should a majority opinion of the judges stand if all the rest are opposed to it? What is there wrong in the idea that one with the Legislature is a majority for the Constitution, any more than there is in the fundamental that one with God is right against the world?
What is there wrong in giving the Constitution the benefit of the doubt?

I think, Mr. Chairman and delegates, that I have said to you all I ought to say on a matter that I think is lost before it is voted on, but at the same time it sets me right. I should hate terribly to have it go out that there was no reason whatever given in this Convention when one man had taken the time to write a resolution and put it in and then when it was debated that he had not even the courage or perhaps the knowledge or perhaps the study to get up and say why he presumed to put in a resolution before the whole people of Massachusetts suggesting a change. Whatever may be the result of this vote I still have the opinion,—I would have it if I was a member of the Supreme Judicial Court,—I would feel that the doubt always ought to be with the people and never ought to be with those who seek to have a matter declared unconstitutional because of the fact that they are going to serve their own private interests.

Mr. MOLLIN of Haverhill: At this time I should discuss No. 97, which is somewhat related to No. 47, Nos. 97 and 212 being along somewhat the same line. I think that will expedite business as we expedited it when we discussed jointly all measures relative to trial by jury. While I agree somewhat with No. 47, my objection to it is that it appears to me as if it would confirm the usurped power now exercised by the courts when they assume to declare whether or not a law is constitutional. Never have the courts, either in the Federal Constitution or the Massachusetts Constitution, or in any amendment to either so far as more able men than I am have been able to discover, ever have the courts been given the power which they now are exercising. In the Articles of Confederation, the first Constitution of the United States, which preceded the present Constitution and which, after having been adopted by the Continental Congress in 1777, became operative in 1778, the courts were not given such a power. And despite the fact that Congress, according to that first Constitution, consisted of but one House, with no Senate being tolerated, and the instant recall being one of the principles of that Constitution,—the instant recall of Congressmen who had been elected for but one year terms,—yet despite all that, the courts were not given the right to interpret constitutionality. Nor were they given that right in the present United States Constitution which was adopted by the Convention of 1787 and later approved by State Conventions in the several States.
Nor have the courts of Massachusetts been given that right. Article XX of Part the First of the Massachusetts Constitution, under the heading "A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts" — that portion of the Constitution of our State says:

XX. The power of suspending the laws, or the execution of the laws ought never to be exercised but by the Legislature, or by authority derived from it, to be exercised in such particular cases only as the Legislature shall expressly provide for.

Now I ask those who are defending the adverse report on this resolution (No. 97) which would restore the rights which have been taken from the people, — I ask those defenders to show wherein the Legislature has passed any such law conferring upon the courts the power which they could have only by the Legislature's consent according to our own Constitution?

Article IV of the Declaration of Rights of our State Constitution says that the United State Congress shall have no rights except what are conceded by the States. Does not all this confirm the fact that neither the Federal nor State courts have the right to interpret constitutionality of legislation?

Now, we inherited our political institutions more largely from Great Britain than from anywhere else. England has no written Constitution. The courts of Great Britain have not been given any constitutional right to interpret constitutionality. The Magna Carta, the only constitutional compact in England, only two articles of which are still in force, the rest having become obsolete, does not give the right to interpret constitutionality. The highest court of England dare not even strike out a comma from a law passed by the British Parliament. Yet in this country our courts interpret as to whether a semicolon is in or ought to be in, or some other phase of a question relating to a law; and they go further and even say that a law is unconstitutional. Nine members of the United States Supreme Court assume the power after the House of Representatives and the United States Senate, which was established as a bulwark by the landed aristocracy, a bulwark of conservatism, — after a law has passed that body and has been signed by the President, five out of the nine members of the Federal Supreme Court assume to become an extra legislative body and declare whether or not that law shall be operative; and that the people who, perhaps, have been fighting for a generation to obtain that law shall not have that law. And in our own Commonwealth of Massachusetts the Supreme Judicial Court of seven members also has assumed the power to say whether or not a law passed by the Legislature shall become operative or remain operative.

I submit to you the question, when our Constitutions say that all authority lies with the people and the authority exercised by our officials is derived from the people, and that our public officers always shall remain subservient to the people, — I submit to you, to carry that theory to its logical conclusion, should not the people be the ones to say whether or not a law shall remain in force? They should give their consent, either by acquiescence or through a referendum if they are not satisfied to silently consent to a law becoming operative or remaining so.

Again, when the Federal Constitution was adopted by the thirteen States of that time, those States were very jealous of conferring any power upon a centralized government, and they provided, as I have shown we did in Massachusetts, against the Federal government or the courts or any branch of Federal authority having too great power. And Elbridge Gerry, one of the few delegates from Massachusetts to the Constitutional Convention of 1787, protested against that Constitution, our present Constitution, after it was adopted, on the theory that he believed the courts had been given too much power because they were given the power, we will admit,—or we will assume that they were given the power,—to interpret what a law meant and enforce it; that is, as to what the Congress meant to have done, not as to whether Congress had a right to pass such law, but only the enforcing of that law.

Now this Federal Supreme Court long ago ruled that even if a legislative body grants a franchise or through any other act does something which is corrupt, anything secured through bribing legislators shall remain in force. They declared that the Constitution did not prohibit a thing secured by corruption from remaining operative, although in all other respects it has been ruled that securing anything by fraud impairs a contract. Gentlemen, the courts made that ruling in favor of predatory wealth and in favor of the large public service corporations and the trusts who are ably,—more or less ably, at least,—represented by corrupt lobbyists and other lobbyists at the State House each year and in Congress. The courts which declared that those things should remain in force although improperly secured, those courts after many years of hesitation following the adoption of the Constitution, finally assumed the power to say whether or not a law passed by Congress was constitutional.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my only doubt in regard to document No. 47 and the ones following (Nos. 97 and 212), is whether or not, if we should pass either of those, we should be confirming a power which never has been given to the courts, a power which, it is admitted by the most learned lawyers of this country, the most learned honest lawyers perhaps I might say, has been usurped by the courts. Perhaps some of the corporation lobbyists will take issue with me upon that subject, but I want them to show me where the courts secured this power if they did not usurp it. Perhaps they will say, as some of them have said to me and to others, that it was not necessary to state in the Federal Constitution that the courts should have that power, because while the courts of England do not have that power,—I do not know whether they exercise it or not, but it never was given to them,—while they do not have that power, yet under our Colonial form of government the King, who was a real monarch at that time, used the courts the same as he used the Governors appointed by himself,—he used both courts and Governors in many instances,—to oppress our people with, and it has been claimed by some of the leading apologists for the present exercise of that power by the courts that from the fact that the courts already had exercised that power it was unnecessary to restate that power in the Federal Constitution.

I submit that that is not a solid ground to base an argument on, because after our Constitution makers had put all kinds of checks and balances in the Constitution in order to prevent an abuse of power by either the legislative, executive or judicial branches of government, to the extent which they in their very extreme conservative view judged should be the limitation, yet four times in that Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787 they very earnestly debated and each time overwhelmingly defeated the proposition of inserting in that Constitution the right of the courts to interpret the Constitution, and, if my memory serves me correctly, not at any time did more than three States or more than half a dozen delegates by their vote support the proposition that the courts be granted this power. I believe what we should do is adopt No. 97, which has been introduced by a member of this Convention, to provide that the courts shall not assume or exercise the power of declaring acts unconstitutional.

I want to call to the attention of those who advocate popular rights and the rule of the people, and the initiative and referendum and other propositions, that if No. 97 should become a part of our State Constitution it would protect laws enacted through the referendum. As there are only half a dozen lines I beg your indulgence while I read it:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

No court shall assume or exercise the power of nullifying or suspending the operation of any law, or any part thereof, enacted directly by the people or by the General Court alone, or in conjunction with the people, on the ground of unconstitutionality or for any other reason.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: There is said to have been a law passed in Colonial times that if a man should shoot a wolf and go to the selectmen and cut their ears off he should receive a bounty. Now I would ask the gentleman if a statute of that sort should be passed by the Legislature should a court set it aside?

Mr. Morrill: Mr. Chairman, while I do not agree that that was a good law, particularly for the selectmen, yet I say that the courts should not declare that law inoperative, because it would be establishing a bad principle to concede them the right to exercise that power in any case; but the initiative and referendum could repeal that law, provided the people wanted it repealed, and I believe they would. I yield for another question (Mr. Brown of Brockton having addressed the Chair during Mr. Morrill's remark).

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman if the Supreme Judicial Court, the lawyers being so busy, would be apt to take the case up until the gentleman had cut off the ears of the selectmen and got into court in another way?

Mr. Morrill: I claim that the people through the initiative and referendum could repeal that law far more expeditiously than the Supreme Judicial Court could, before it reached them and was decided by them, judging from a great many past instances. I hope the delegates are all convinced and will vote to protect our rights which have been guaranteed to us by both Federal and State Constitutions, but both of which have been overridden by the judicial power, which our forefathers held to be the greatest danger that threatened the perpetuation of republican institutions, and which caused many of our States to hesitate to approve the adoption of the Federal Constitution, for, although four times in the Federal Convention the principle of giving the courts that power had been frowned upon, they were afraid that the courts might usurp that power. That it has been usurped and now has been exercised for many years does not make it right. I hope we shall stand by our forefathers, who instituted this government, both Federal and State.

Mr. Merriam of Framingham: This discussion began on resolution
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

No. 47, but the scope of the debate, particularly the remarks of the gentleman from Haverhill, has been so broad that it includes resolution No. 97, which follows. In regard to resolution No. 97 I have the honor to represent the committee. That proposition would prohibit our courts absolutely from declaring statutes unconstitutional. Our committee unanimously reported that that resolution ought not to be adopted.

There is a fundamental assumption in the remarks of the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and in the remarks of the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill), an assumption which is not sound. Both of these gentlemen assume that by some superior claim not authorized by the people the courts claim the right to dictate or to exercise authority over the Legislature; that the Legislature is the representative of the people and the only representative of the people. Mr. Chairman, that proposition is fundamentally unsound. In our Constitution the courts are created as creatures of the people. The Governor is created as a representative of the people. The Governor is the people's representative in the executive function of government. The courts are the representative of the people in the judicial department of the government and the Legislature is the representative of the people in the legislative department. And of those three departments, Mr. Chairman, the court occupies the weakest position. That matter was pointed out by Alexander Hamilton in words that are of pregnant meaning to-day, although they are the words of a century ago:

Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive that, in a government in which they are separated from each other, the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution; because it will be least in a capacity to annoy or injure them. The Executive not only dispenses the honors, but holds the sword of the community. The Legislature not only commands the purse, but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. The Judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of the society; and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither force nor will, but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficacy of its judgments.

That, Mr. Chairman, suggests the true position of our judiciary. The judiciary does not dictate to the legislative or to the executive. A question arises as to what the Legislature may have done. Under the Constitution it is for the judiciary to determine or to define or to construe. Our Constitution is a citadel of the people's rights, but it is not a citadel of exact area with walls that fairly can be seen. This area may seem undefined. There is a power needed to define its exact scope. The Legislature is not the body to do that. That question, by reason of its nature, must be left to the judiciary. And when the judiciary decides, it does not decide as a matter of arbitrary direction to the Legislature or the executive. If a law fails it fails because of its essence; because it is unconstitutional in its character.

Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there may be a dangerous compound abroad in the community; it is uncertain whether it is wholesome or poisonous. People interested in it go to a chemist to find out what it is. "Is this something dangerous or harmful? Is it wholesome as food or is it poisonous?" The chemist takes the substance into his laboratory; he applies tests, he examines it according to established rules, he analyzes it and he determines what is the character of that substance. But the substance itself is harmful by reason of its essence, not by reason of any quality which the chemist has given it.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

From the nature of the question, it seems to me that there is no other body but the judiciary to answer it. The Legislature is interested in its own acts. Such questions must be decided by an institution like our courts, created under our Constitution, given the same rights to speak for all the people that the Legislature itself has. I cannot follow the remarks of my friend from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill). I would follow rather this paragraph from "The Federalist," written by Alexander Hamilton so many years ago, but as I have said, of special meaning even to-day:

The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A Constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges, as a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute; the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

Again, listen to this paragraph:

Nor does this conclusion by any means suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both; and that where the will of the Legislature, declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the Constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter rather than the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws, rather than by those which are not fundamental.

In view of the light of this authority, the action of the courts is not usurpation. It is the legitimate function of the courts acting not in defiance of the people, not in defiance of the Legislature, but in behalf of the people by means of a Constitution which the people have established. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Salem: I want to make a few observations, first with regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Brockton in the second division (Mr. Brown). I think, in the first place, his statement with regard to the decisions of the justices of the New York courts in the sweatshop and bakeshop cases, if he reads them, thoroughly, is a pretty good argument for the appointive system of judges for life that we have in Massachusetts and not for the elective system of judges that they have in New York.

He also made the statement that the people of the Commonwealth were not represented before the Supreme Judicial Court and he referred to the power that the courts seemed to assume or take away from the people. My brother on the Judiciary Committee in the rear row (Mr. Merriam) has taken care of the greater part of that question. But let me state that the Attorney-General not only has the power and the right to appear for the people of the Commonwealth before the Supreme Judicial Court to defend any bill or law passed by the Legislature, but that the Legislature has the power to direct him to appear there. I hold in my hand a book containing a list of all the statutes and laws that have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and I find that the Commonwealth was represented in many of the cases by the Attorney-General himself or by some of his assistants. The measure advocated or supported by the gentleman from Haverhill in this division (Mr. Morrill), (document No. 97), — that measure, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, simply would substitute the tyranny of a majority and take away every protection to individual rights whether the minority of the court remains as it is in certain of these measures or whether the number of the minority shall be changed later.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

Furthermore, he (Mr. Morrill) says that the courts have assumed authority. I think that my brother on the Judiciary Committee in the third division (Mr. McAnarney) has answered that pretty well. There is a decision, however, and a few other things to which I wish to call attention.

In the words of Chief Justice Parker, —

whenever it manifestly appears to the judiciary power that an act, complained of, does in fact violate the Constitution, or affect the rights of individuals in a manner which is repugnant to its character and principles, there is no doubt that such acts must be declared void and inoperative. For the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and the only source of authority to the Legislature, as well as to the other branches of the government.

And for the information of the gentleman in the second division from Brockton (Mr. Brown) I give the citation of that case and he might be interested to read it:

In a later case along the same lines, the court said:

But this is a high and important judicial power —

that is, declaring statutes unconstitutional —

not to be exercised lightly, nor in any case where it cannot be made to appear plainly that the Legislature have exceeded their powers. It is always to be presumed that any act passed by the Legislature is conformable to the Constitution and has the force of law, until the contrary is clearly shown.

This is amplified in the case Norwich v. County Commissioners of Hampshire, 1832, 13 Pick. 60, 61.

Another case which shows the attitude of the Supreme Judicial Court on all these questions has been about the same since the Constitution was originally adopted, reads in part:

And even though the act may in theory be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality may be set up only by the parties affected thereby, and if they do not object, the law will be enforced. (Hampshire v. Franktin, 1819, 16 Mass. 76, 86.)

This shows to my mind that the courts do not usurp or assume any power, they do not declare an act unconstitutional until some of the people whose rights are affected appeal to the Supreme Judicial Court that their rights have been trampled upon and apply for relief.

One other point, Mr. Chairman, it speaks of in this same volume:

As much of the criticism of the courts for their actions in declaring statutes unconstitutional has arisen out of their consideration of labor statutes and statutes having to do with the regulation of public service corporations, it is to be noted that of the statutes in the above table, five (four being special statutes and one a general statute) attempted to regulate and impose obligations on public service corporations, and three purport to be for the benefit and protection of wage-earners. ¹

I think, Mr. Chairman, that covers all that I have to say. I have simply tried to cover some of the points that were not covered by previous speakers.

Mr. Choate of Southborough: I cannot claim to be able to add anything to the clear and satisfactory statement which has been presented by the two gentlemen who have preceded me. It is a timely statement that they have made, and one which ought to come home to every one of us and receive full consideration, because there is no function exercised by our courts that is so persistently misdescribed as the function of declaring laws unconstitutional. Gentlemen who state that the court by that process annul laws and usurp functions that never have been vested in them fail utterly to appreciate the form of government under which we live. We live in this State and in every other State of the Union under a constitutional form of government, where we have agreed to abide by the terms of a written Constitution, and that Constitution, in the language of the Preamble in our own document, is a solemn compact and agreement between the majority of the people, all the people and every individual citizen, for the sole purpose of protecting and preserving the rights not only of the majority but the rights of the minority and the individual.

A slight analysis of the situation which develops when the court is confronted with the question of the constitutionality of a law it seems to me answers all the objections that are raised by those who urge that the power to pass upon that question be taken away from the courts. It cannot be questioned, can it, that the Constitution when once adopted by the people is the supreme law of the land? It cannot be questioned but that is what all the people have bound themselves to obey and to be governed by, that that is to take precedence of every law and ordinance that thereafter may be passed by any authority. Well, then, the Legislature passes a statute. The question arises, is there a conflict between the provisions of the statute and the rights and liberties which the Constitution has guaranteed to protect and preserve? Who is to determine that question? My friend from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) says the Legislature is. What would be the result? The Legislature would uphold its own views, and the Constitution would be gone. There would be no guarantee preserved which was the result of the solemn compact entered into between the people and every individual of the State.

The function of interpreting a law has been regarded for almost all time as a plain judicial function. It is so regarded in England. It is so regarded in every one of our United States. There can be no other body that could be vested with that function except the court. If no one is to decide which is paramount, the Constitution or the law passed by the Legislature, obviously you have a condition of chaos. Neither law would be followed or could be executed, from the very necessity of the thing. That department of the government which is vested by the Constitution with the power of interpreting the laws must interpret between the Constitution and the laws of the Legislature, and when they find that the law passed by the Legislature is in conflict with the Constitution it is their plain duty to declare that the Constitution, which is the ultimate, fundamental will of the people, a solemn compact by which they bound themselves to abide, must prevail and be supreme.

Now, the effect of the two measures which have just been discussed here this morning, must necessarily be this: If resolution No. 97 becomes a part of our Constitution, the power now vested in the courts to interpret the laws and the Constitution and determine which is supreme, would have gone, and with it the supremacy of the Constitution would have gone, and any Legislature which passed a law, which believed in it, if given the power to interpret it would interpret it in such a way as to overbear the Constitution. If, on the other hand, resolution No. 47 becomes a law, it means this, as was so plainly and concisely stated by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney):
That not only do you take away effective power of the court to interpret and construe the law and compare it with the Constitution, and if there is a conflict to uphold the Constitution, but you leave it in the power of two judges, a small minority of the court, to paralyze the power of the court to exercise that essential and vital function.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I do not rise by any means because I think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by members of the committee on the Judiciary and by the gentleman from Southborough, but because I think one view of this proposal may properly be suggested, and perhaps ought to be, to which I have not heard any allusion. Every man in this Convention, including my friend from Lynn (Mr. Creamer) who offers this proposal, knows that if any one obligation of a judge is sacred and inviolable, an obligation upon which the integrity of the whole administration of justice depends, it is to decide every question which comes before him upon his conscience and his convictions. It is now proposed to write into the Constitution that he shall not decide a particular class of questions upon his conscience and his convictions, and if he does, that such decision shall not prevail or be of any effect. That is precisely the substance of the proposal, and the statement of it carries its own answer and leaves no room for argument.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I have refrained from entering into a great many of the debates that have taken place on the floor of this Convention, for the purpose of saying a word or two on this subject and another subject kindred to it, so that I might be listened to without having the delegates feel that I was annoying them too much by speaking thereon. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Montague) who undertook to defend the committee's report on No. 47. He only touched, I believe, on the first part of that, and that is the part in which I am vitally interested, the first paragraph of No. 47. I might say, while this is a non-political assemblage, that there was a large party a few years ago who came out for that article of amendment, and introduced it and tried to advocate it in the Legislature for two or three years, namely:
To take away from the inferior courts of this Commonwealth the right that they had to themselves of interpreting the constitutionality of acts of the Legislature. Now, the gentleman in the first division
(Mr. Montague) admitted that in his research he found fifty-nine cases, I believe he stated, or something like that, where inferior courts had attempted or did undertake to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of the Legislature.

I know, and it is known absolutely to every member of this gathering, because it is not so very long ago since it occurred, that we had a judge of our Superior Court, — not the Supreme Judicial Court, — sitting right here in Pemberton Square, who was sitting in a criminal session at that time, who undertook to pass upon the constitutionality of a statute upon which employees, the six superintendents of the Boston Elevated Railroad, had been indicted. That judge, whom every lawyer practicing in Boston knows, without mentioning any names, as was intimated by a gentleman in the fourth division yesterday, also was charged openly in the corridors of the court-house with being under the influence of that great public service corporation. And what did we find with reference to this particular judge's action on that indictment of those six superintendents? He undertook to say that the law upon which those men were indicted was unconstitutional, and it was stated by the gentleman who attempted to defend the report of this committee that there was no necessity for changing the Constitution with reference to this feature. If one judge even, one inferior judge, undertakes to set aside the acts of any Legislature, is it not well that we should closely define in our Constitution that no judge of any inferior court ought to pass upon the constitutionality of a question upon which the Legislature, which as we know is the one body that does give expression to the will of the people, already has passed?

I am not going to ask this Convention to pass on the second section of this proposed amendment, although I am personally in favor of that, but I do feel that this Convention ought to say in our Constitution that the judges of no inferior court should pass upon constitutionality. We have instances that never come to the attention of the average man, that never come to the attention of the average lawyer. The lawyer may know about it in trying the case. We have had cases in the inferior courts where the judges have said: "Why, the Legislature did not know what they were doing when they passed that law; the law is unconstitutional." That decision is never recorded. There is no way that any lawyer can know about it. The only people who happen to know about that judge's decision and his interpretation of that act, are the parties who happen to be in the court room at that time. And there is no appeal from it. The judge may not say: "I find the act to be unconstitutional," but in his argument he will tell the lawyers who are assembled in the court-room that he bases his decision on the fact that the Legislature went a little too far in passing that law, or that the Legislature did not intend what it seemed to have said in the law that was passed. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it will not do any harm to put into our Constitution a provision limiting the power of the judges of our inferior courts, when we have those instances that have been cited here of certain judges who have forgotten the duty that they owe to the people or to their oath of office and have undertaken to pass upon the constitutionality of an act. I have had judges ask me, when I appeared before the Judiciary, if I knew of any instances where judges of inferior courts had attempted to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of the Legislature, and I have told them the different instances that I knew.

Now, what harm can it do? What harm can it do for us to say in our Constitution, as part of our fundamental law, that no judge, of an inferior court at least, shall declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional? In that case of the six superintendents of the Boston Elevated Railroad, the district attorney and his office had no right of appeal to bring the matter to the Supreme Judicial Court. There was no way in which he could test the constitutionality of that act, because the prosecuting attorneys had no right of appeal. The only objection that I hear to the proposition is that it does not happen very often.
Mr. Chairman, if it happens at all, if any judge, any inferior court judge, — and it has been admitted here that that thing has happened a good many times, — if any inferior court judge does undertake it, if it is absolutely clear that it is unconstitutional for him to undertake to pass upon the constitutionality of any act of the Legislature, I think all doubt would be removed from his mind, and the matter then can go up and the party who may be affected by the law can bring the question up before the Supreme Judicial Court and have the Supreme Judicial Court pass upon the constitutionality of the law.
That is the only way that we can have that question settled, the only way it ought to be settled, whether we should decide that it ought to be settled by a majority of the Supreme Judicial Court or whether we should decide that it ought to be settled by six judges of the Supreme Judicial Court.

While I am not at this time going to propose any amendment, I do feel that there ought to be an amendment introduced here that embodies the first section of the proposed amendment, namely: That no judge of any inferior court shall have the power to pass upon the constitutionality of any act of the Legislature. I feel with that done we shall have gone a great way.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the member in this division behind me (Mr. Merriam), wherein he stated that the judiciary were just as much the representatives of the people as the legislators, that our form of government presupposes that our judiciary shall be just as much the representatives of the people as the legislators are; but you must remember that in this State our judges are not so classed. They are appointed for life. They are appointed and, because of that appointment, they cannot be said to represent the whole of the people, only in so far as according to their conscience they deem that their duties and their obligations should be so extensive as to be representative of the people. I have given instances, and I know of instances, where they do not represent all the people; they represent simply in a great many cases the influences and the interests that were back of their appointment. So for that reason, if we are going to continue to have our present form of appointing judges to office, namely, that they are appointed for life, surely we ought not to say that it is too radical to ask that some limitation shall be put upon their power whereby they attempt to pass upon the constitutionality of the acts of the Legislature.

The only defence that I have heard, Mr. Chairman, to this proposition, is that it does not happen very often. Some of the judges have told me that they have arranged among themselves not to attempt in the lower courts to pass upon the constitutionality of any law which they are called upon to interpret; but I say that it is all very well for the ones who have agreed and carry out their agreement; but the one judge who may be up in the western part of the State may attempt while he is sitting in his court to say: "Well, I don't think the Legislature knew what they were doing. I think they were not a very bright lot anyway," as has been said, "and I think that a great many times Legislatures pass laws of the meaning of which they have not any knowledge." When a judge attempts to say that kind of thing he is usurping power, Mr. Chairman, and I feel that it ought to be clear that a judge of an inferior court, who is called upon to administer the law as he finds it, should not go beyond the law-making power and say: "They did not know what kind of a law they were passing when they were passing it."

So I ask the Convention, again, if they will consider just the adoption of the first half of No. 47.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: During a long service of nine years in the Legislature it has been my duty to be a party to framing a great many acts involving the rights of owners of land. Those acts have included all of the great metropolitan takings, and the principal one has been, doubtless, the Metropolitan Water Act. They are very difficult acts to draw, for the reason that in invading the rights of the individual the committees drafting these laws have to be extremely careful not to interfere with the constitutional provision in regard to taking private property without compensation and for a public use. Now I understand the position of the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) to be that in the enactment of legislation the General Court, the Legislature, shall be supreme and that it is proposed to take away from the Supreme Judicial Court all power of passing upon the constitutionality of these acts. I wish to say that from my experience it is absolutely impossible in the framing of these great pieces of legislation for the legislative committee or the Legislature to pass finally upon these questions, — it is absolutely impossible. We do the very best we can, but we must of necessity leave the final decision as to the constitutionality of some of these great acts to some other tribunal, and what other tribunal is there to whom this power can be left except the judicial department of the government? It is not to the executive, it is not to the legislative; it must be for the judicial. I rise simply to ask this question, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) realize that in striking down this power which now is exercised by the judicial power of the government they are striking down one of the most sacred and solemn safeguards that is thrown around the property rights of all the people in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Morrill: I notice that the gentleman said striking down this power now exercised. Whether that was stated that way intentionally or not I do not know, but it was stated correctly. He did not state that it was striking down a right which they are exercising, but a power which they are exercising. Now, I have failed to hear any member who has taken the other side on this question, — I have failed to hear one of them, — show wherein either the Federal or State Constitution grants to the courts this power. The principal points I have heard them advocate are that some brilliant lawyers, many of whom obtain very large fees from corporations for their services, believe that the courts should have that power and continue to have that power, — not the right, but the power. Why, one of the men who obtains large fees for appearing before the Legislature every year in behalf of the corporations also took the floor, and despite the fact that he has previously served as Attorney-General of this Commonwealth I failed to hear him show wherein they have been given this power.
Now, I quoted Article XX. Oh, first I will say that Alexander Hamilton was quoted by the member in the rear of the third division (Mr. Merriam). He quoted Alexander Hamilton as saying that the courts ought to have this power. I tried to get the floor to add at that time some points in regard to Hamilton, but I could not get the floor, because too many others wanted it, and it was correct that they should have the next turn; so at this time I will read for the information of this committee in regard to who Hamilton was:

But Hamilton wanted the President, after a select little group had elected him, to serve for life. Hamilton wanted United States Senators, after select little groups had elected them, to serve for life. Hamilton wanted to give the President power to appoint all Governors of States. And Hamilton wanted the President and the Governors of States to have the power of absolute veto over Congress and the State Legislatures.

No overriding of vetoes with Hamilton.

He was a brilliant man, but he was almost the last man who should have found favor in a republic. Socially, he was an aristocrat. Politically, he was a monarchist.

And to quote Thomas Jefferson:

Hamilton was not only a monarchist but for a monarchy bottomed on corruption.

Mr. Chairman, I quoted Article XX, Part 1, of our State Constitution to prove that the courts have not been given this power and are forbidden to exercise this power. I will not re-read that, but I will read Article XXX, Part 1, of the Constitution of Massachusetts, which says:

In the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them: the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them: the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them.

This ought to be in large type:

... the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

When the judiciary assumes to throw out a law enacted by the Legislature does it not assume the legislative function? Does it not prevent legislation from becoming effective?

Mr. Shea of Dalton: Does the gentleman mean to say that the Executive exercises a legislative function when he vetoes a bill and suspends a law? Would that be contrary to Article XX, which you quote?

Mr. Morrill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, he does in part, and he is authorized to do that by another section of the Constitution; but I want the opposition to show in some other section where the courts are given the right to do what Article XXX, Part 1, forbids them to do. I cannot find it. I never yet have found any one who could find it, in our State Constitution. I should like to find any one who can show in our Federal Constitution where courts have that power, either. As far as I have been able to hear, and I think I have heard practically all that was said, none of the speakers has shown where that power has been granted. I claim it has got to be granted before it can be honestly and rightfully exercised. Now, I will pause for a reply to that, to find out where that power is given.

Mr. Murphy of Chelsea: I should like to ask the gentleman, if the courts have not been given the power by the Constitution to decide upon the constitutionality of acts of the Legislature, but through the necessity of things have taken that power, if, and it has been proved during a long time and through long experience, that power has been properly used and is necessary in order to interpret the acts of the Legislature, does the gentleman think that merely because the power was not given originally by the Constitution that now it should be taken away by the Constitution?

Mr. Morrill: I do not concede that, because something which is wrong has been repeatedly perpetrated, age gives it correct standing. The Legislature passes laws, and they remain in force for a long while, until they are repealed. Some of them may be unconstitutional, but it never is brought to the courts and they remain in force. On the other hand, city governments do things which are contrary to law, the same as Haverhill for many years contributed toward the support of an armory, the same as other municipalities did. One citizen of Haverhill, who prefers to study the Constitution and laws more than to eat, knew that that was illegal. He brought that to the attention of the proper authorities, and had it decided that it was not proper for the city to contribute, and they were stopped from doing so any longer although they had been doing it perhaps for a generation or more. That is the way things go. I do not claim that long standing makes a thing right. I do not admit that.

I want the members here to read chapter III on page 58 of the Manual of the General Court, headed Judiciary. In there, under the heading of Judiciary, you do not find this power granted to the courts, and in the articles which I have read it is expressly forbidden to the courts. Why should we try to override our Constitution? If you want to give the courts this power, why not be honest and attempt to amend the Constitution, giving them the power which they now exercise and which we claim they have usurped? Why not do it straight out from the shoulder, and go on record that way? We who do not believe in it will oppose it and vote against it, but if we are in the minority we shall be defeated. The courts, however, will be given a confirmation of their usurped power in that case. Do not try to do it around Robin Hood's barn; do it honestly, if you want to do it.

Mr. Parker of Lancaster: I apprehend that the range of debate upon document No. 47, which I understand defines the subject of our present consideration, has far outrun the limits of that document or the subject which it properly and in terms embodies. We are not here and now considering whether it is wise or unwise to amend our Constitution by a provision that shall expressly prohibit our Supreme Judicial Court from exercising any jurisdiction over questions which may involve the reversal or annulment of legislation upon the ground of its being in conflict with the constitutional compact. The most casual examination of the document before us reveals that, whatever may be its covert purpose, it does not assail or attack this long and wise exercised power of the Supreme Judicial Court to hold legislators and other governmental agencies to strict compliance with their constitutional duties. The proposition here involved, as has been pointed out by the delegate in the third division (Mr. Morrill), instead of directly assailing this long exercised power of the Supreme Judicial Court to reverse legislation because held to be unconstitutional, in fact recognizes the power which the court has exercised, but seeks to impa.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

abate, stifle the exercise of a power which is recognized. Because a provision embodied in this measure does not raise this other question that may engage the delegates to this Convention in debate when it is before them, it is to be opposed, none the less because, while recognizing an undoubted judicial authority, it abates its exercise, and to stifle its expression. Assuming a court has a power, the proposal intends to prohibit, or in law, prohibit, its exercise. It would compel a court assumed to have authority to deal with the questions submitted to it, a uniformly proceeding in the responsible exercise of judicial determination and authority, to a certain and inevitable adjudication, to the adjudication, which it was so required to pronounce. The preposterous proposition would compel the court to with declaration of a judgment manifestly required by the law. The omission would compel a court to stand mute, though prepared, its judgment through a majority of its judges, in accordance with universal practice under which the court when sitting in banc, declares its decrees. The proposition would forbid a majority of the Supreme Judicial Court, having deliberately and gravely arrived at a conclusion, from giving to the people the benefit or protection of an authoritative expression of the court's decision, because, forsooth, argued, that since the determination of all questions of construction must be matter of judicial opinion, such opinions have neither force nor expression, if two of the Justices should dissent in opinion from their five associates who were in concurrence. The result would be that the opinion of an overwhelming majority of the court would go for naught, and so the opinion of a numerically insignificant minority might finally deprive a citizen of life or liberty.

The proposal, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the lower courts, presents an obnoxious anomaly. While it is true, and I think the evidence of all the lawyers in this Convention is the same, that courts, even a single Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, even in a case of a manifest, unmistakable statutory disregard of constitutional prohibitions, will assume for the moment and for the duration then under consideration that the statute must be constitutional, invariably, within my experience, the question of constitutional or unconstitutional, a statute is passed, upon the presumption of its constitutionality, to the final review of the Supreme Judicial Court sitting in banc. If, contrary to this experience, with which we are all familiar, a justice of the lower court, even a justice of the general trial court, the Superior Court, should hold a statute unconstitutional, it is open to either party, aggrieved or aggrieved by itself to be aggrieved by that adjudication, to take the question for the final, deliberate view of the Supreme Judicial Court, sitting in banc, where alone it can be finally reviewed.

There may be cases, however, Mr. Chairman, where the constitutionality of a statute upon which a prosecution affecting the property, or the good name of an individual is involved, that to the magistrate trying such case it is immediately apparent that the Legislature had overlooked or disregarded the prohibition it prescribe its authority and had enacted a statute that unconstitutionally deprived the citizen of his liberties; restrained, by variations here proposed, such judge, helpless and in silence, must the outrage to go on, until finally the innocent victim of a law that never ought to have been enacted may be rescued by an appeal, and a delayed though final adjudication of the Supreme Judicial Court. It is true under our law that the Commonwealth may not appeal from an adverse decision in a criminal case, and it might be true that in the hypothetical case that I have suggested a magistrate of a lower court might erroneously adjudge the statute to be unconstitutional yet even then the error would be in favor of life and liberty; but if the statute were unconstitutional, pray what justification is there for enacting this restriction that would compel the trial court to declare a man guilty of crime, when no crime known to the law had been committed?

The question here presented, Mr. Chairman, is simply whether, by this proposed amendment to the Constitution, you shall abate, stifle, the inherent authority of our courts. That is all that is involved here. If there be a question ultimately to be raised, whether or no the power of the court finally reviewing the constitutionality of statutes, shall be revoked or annulled, we will face it when it is presented. It is not presented here. There are those of us who hold that the proposal to deny that authority to the court is a proposal to deny the last safeguard of the lives, liberties and property of our citizens, to deny that there is any compact of government and to conceive that all this boasted civilization, built up upon our scheme of government, means in its last analysis nothing but the power of might and of the rule of numbers. When such provision engages the attention of this Convention, I shall modestly, resolutely and earnestly raise my voice in protest. But that mighty challenge is not raised upon this measure. Shall you stifle the conscience and the power of the court by adopting this preposterous provision now before us?

Mr. Bouvé of Hingham: The argument of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Carr) in regard to the lower courts should not pass without a reply. The Constitution of Massachusetts and the laws passed in accordance therewith are the supreme law of this Commonwealth, and under that Constitution and laws so passed every judge, whether of the highest tribunal or the lowest, is bound by his oath, and he is bound to administer justice in his court to the best of his ability and knowledge in accordance with that Constitution and the laws passed thereunder, and in no other way. Many litigants in the lower courts have not the means to carry their contention to the Superior Court or to the Supreme Judicial Court. They should have justice absolutely done to them in those tribunals which are nearest to the common people, and to which alone they have the power, financially and otherwise, to resort; and it is the absolute duty of a Justice of the lowest court in the land, if he believes that the Constitution or the laws thereunder require him to give a certain judgment, to so give it, and if he believes the laws are not under the Constitution it is his absolute duty to render justice as he understands it in accordance with the Constitution,—which is over all laws. And I want to say one word more. The Justices of the lower courts are in many instances among the first lawyers in this Commonwealth. They are men of large experience and of high learning and of noble aspirations, and they will render justice in accordance with the laws, very properly presuming and assuming that acts of the Legislature are in accordance with the Constitution,—and until convinced otherwise; but when convinced otherwise they have no right to render a decision contrary to such conviction, merely because a Legislature has passed a law which they are compelled to believe to be unconstitutional.

Mr. Creamer: I shall take but a moment. I wish to say in the beginning that I congratulate the delegate from Lancaster (Mr. Parker) upon his reverence for majority rights, even if that reverence is restricted to the majority rights of the judiciary. I hope that when this later matter to which he alludes comes up he will show an equal reverence for the majority rights of all the people. One thing more. I want to say that the reason I consented to introduce resolution No. 47 was because I do believe in the judicial review of statutes enacted by the Legislature. I do not believe in resolution No. 97 nor resolution No. 212. I regard what I have offered as an insurance policy against those other resolutions, an insurance policy that may be necessary in the chaotic times that are bound to come in the next generation. The mere fact that the power of the courts has not been abused materially in the last fifty years does not signify that it may not be abused in the future.

Mr. Parker: I wish that my learned colleague's policy had been more plainly a life rather than a fire policy.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Mr. Chairman, I take the floor because I have been referred to. I respect the fact that I am pledged by my oath and by my conscience to do my duty, and I do not do my duty except by raising my voice here now, that is all. I do not propose to sit here and see questions that later are going to be taken up here disposed of by such an argument as that by the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), who undoubtedly is advocating the idea that the people shall not have the last word.

The discussion of the subject was resumed Tuesday, July 31.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to say a few words in regard to both of these resolutions. I understand their purport is the exact opposite of each other. Document No. 47 seeks to establish, although it seeks to limit, the right of judicial review of legislative action. Document No. 97 seeks to abolish that right. I personally wish to discuss very briefly the arguments, or the lack of arguments, of those who on Friday opposed document No. 47. The chief argument made by the gentleman from Boston in the first division in charge of the adverse report (Mr. Montague) seemed to me to be that the exercise of this power would be infrequent, and that the evidence of a desire for a change was small. Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Boston is unaware of the prolonged agitation in this country for a long time for a check on the judicial power? The very presence of this next resolution, No. 97, is evidence of the fact that that agitation is taking a very radical form. My resolution was introduced as an offset to that radical form. If tempestuous times are in the offing, and many of us think so, why not shorten sail a little and cast an anchor to windward? That is all my resolution seeks to do.

And then, Mr. Chairman, I should like to dwell a few moments on the argument of the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate), or rather, as far as my resolution is concerned, on the assertion of the gentleman from Southborough. If I remember correctly, he said resolution No. 47 would paralyze the Constitution. That is a mouth-filling phrase and is a horrible accusation, but is it true? Is it paralysis to give two members of the Supreme Judicial Court the same power over questions of law that you give to one juryman over questions of fact?
I have a higher opinion of the people fit to sit on the Supreme Judicial Court than that. Is it paralysis, also, to require legislative violation of constitutional rights to be clearly apparent before being proclaimed? I wonder if the gentleman really thinks so. No man here knows better than he does that the measure of the power of the law is not an exact measure, that law is not an exact science, and that it is constantly in the making.

And now let me very reverently approach the inner sanctuary, and consider the able but specious argument of that suave and eloquent gentleman, that distinguished, delightful, but distinctly dangerous delegate from Lancaster (Mr. Parker). [Laughter.] His kaleidoscopic mind is hard to follow. His argument was first noted for the beauty of its diction and the comprehensiveness of his verbs and of his adjectives.
I believe I was accused of trying to stifle something. Then his argument suddenly changed and he shocked some of us, staggered some of us, by professing a very sudden and earnest interest in the rights of majories. It is true that he rather clannishly wanted to confine that principle of majority rule to the members of his own profession, but I suppose that is lawyer-like. At any rate, it seemed to me a hopeful symptom; perhaps in his case, only an unconscious reversion to the ideals of his young manhood but nevertheless hopeful. I know some cynics may say beware of the Greeks bearing gifts, but I would rather think of that other saying: "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." Not that I would have you think for a moment that I put the delegate from Lancaster in that category. I simply think that he is a genial but misguided gentleman, the victim of his environment.

And now seriously, Mr. Chairman, I want to urge upon my conservative friends in the committee the value of the policy of insurance my resolution presents to them. It is a conservative resolution. It seeks to conserve, to protect and to establish beyond question the right of judicial review of legislative enactments. The next resolution seeks to do away with that right. It is true my legislation would limit the right but, is it true conservatism to be obstructive? I do not believe it. In connection with this I should like to make a motion to this effect: That this resolution be recommitted to the committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to divide the question and to submit separate reports on each paragraph of the resolution.

(The motion was declared to be out of order.)

Mr. KENNY of Boston: In spite of the fact that my brother on my right (Mr. Creamer) is demanding roll-calls I thoroughly agree with him in regard to resolution No. 47. I come from one of the largest Democratic wards in the city of Boston, made up of laboring people, and we throw our weight with the labor men in this measure. We must adopt some such measure as this or a more socialistic development, the recall of judicial decisions. The need which has given rise to the widespread demand for so-called recall of judicial decisions is the fact that our State courts, by their ultra-conservative interpretation of the police power, are preventing the enforcement of many progressive industrial and social laws. The courts in declaring such laws unconstitutional invariably do so under the "due process" clause. Neither the due process clause nor the police power has any definite application that is apparent on its face. The interpretation of both is altogether elastic and must be determined by the surrounding circumstances. They are necessarily in conflict with each other and must be determined by the surrounding circumstances. They are necessarily in constant conflict with each other, because the due process clause guards the personal rights, while the police power subordinates the welfare of the individual to the welfare of society as a whole and sacrifices the rights of the individual to the welfare of society.

The foundation principle of all government is that the rights of the individual are subordinate to the rights of society. It is the police power of our government which is designed to accomplish the subordination of the individual to society; and when you deny to the people the right to exercise this power you are placing the right of the individual above the welfare of society and striking at the basic principle of government. This is exactly what the State courts are doing by declaring unconstitutional, as in violation of the due process clause, the laws passed by the Legislature in the exercise of the police power.

But let us get some idea of what this police power is.

The Cyclopaedia of Law defines it to be that inherent sovereignty which is the right and duty of the government to exercise whenever public policy in a broad sense demands regulations to guard its morals, safety, health and good order, or to insure in any respect such economic conditions as advancing civilization of a high complex character requires.

The Supreme Court of the United States says:

The police power extends to all the great public needs. It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare.

Can you conceive of a government without that power? It is the only living, growing tissue which should be included in our Constitutions. Yet our State courts have refused to recognize the prevailing morality and preponderant opinion of the people. I do not refer especially to Massachusetts courts. These courts have held to precedents, such as the fellow-servant doctrine, the doctrine of proving due care on the part of the man killed on the railroad track, precedents established in medieval times, and have placed the individual above the welfare of society. It is for these reasons I support labor's voice in this Convention. I support this resolution No. 47 and in supporting it we do not intend to impeach either the integrity or the ability of the judiciary. The State courts consider themselves bound to follow established precedents and it is right that they should follow precedents. However, it is this which has caused the present dissatisfaction with the judiciary. As Judge Howard of the New York Court of Appeals says:

Many of the edicts issued today record not the views of judges who sign them but judges who lived before the Renaissance.

We should like to ask those who propose to hold us closely to the present Constitution if they expect us to regulate modern gas and electric corporations by decisions rendered in the days of the tallow candle of Ben Franklin's time. Do you expect us to control our modern railroads by the laws of the stage coach? In the rapid change of social and economic questions arising from the great industrial progress of this age, laws and precedents are constantly becoming obsolete and their continued enforcement not only obstructs progress but often works injustice.

Let me cite an instance of the decisions of the Illinois Supreme Court. In 1893 the Illinois Legislature, realizing the need, passed an eight-hour law applying to women in certain occupations. The law was designed for the protection of society at large. Yet the Supreme Court of that State in deciding the case of Richie v. The People, 155 Ill. 98, refused to recognize the police power of the Legislature and declared the law unconstitutional, in violation of the due process clause, and the eighth syllabus stated that "the said Act of 1893 cannot be sustained as a police regulation on the ground that it is designed to protect women, as sex alone will not justify the exercise of the police power."

Thus was the first attempt of Illinois to protect women and prevent her future citizens from paying the toll of modern industrialism set at naught. We cannot dispute the correctness of that Supreme Court's decision. They undoubtedly decided correctly according to the precedents which they had in their books. We cannot blame them, — they were simply not in a position to know the crying need for the health of those poor women and their offspring.

It took sixteen long years to make its cry penetrate the walls of that Supreme Court, and compel that court to recognize the need of such legislation.

In 1909 that same Legislature passed such a law and in the case of Richie v. Wayman (244 Ill. 509) that same Supreme Court declared this law constitutional, saying in the fifth syllabus:

... the law is not invalid as discriminating between men and women. The physical structure and maternal functions of women, and their consequent inability to perform without effect upon their health and the vigor of their offspring, work which men may do without overexertion, justify the discrimination between men and women.

It took that Supreme Court sixteen years to find that out. Was this justice? Would it not be better, after a Supreme Court has declared such a law unconstitutional upon precedents established in medieval times, to give the people a chance to decide in the light of present conditions?

As my brother from Brockton (Mr. Brown) says, the question of what falls within the police power of the State is not a question of law but a question of fact as to whether a certain law operates for the general welfare of the people.

There is to-day in America a cry welling up from millions of voices calling for adequate social justice. When our State Constitution was adopted the factory system and other products of capital were in an embryonic condition. Now times have changed. But in this century of time our Constitution, except for a few minor amendments, has not changed. Yet our courts are basing many of their opinions which determine the constitutionality of social legislation upon instruments which in their inceptions of social justice are now obsolete. Shrewd corporation attorneys point out technicalities of a minor nature which a judge must follow, and thus the will of the people is circumvented.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES. 481

The Workmen’s Compensation Act of Massachusetts is now practically nullified by decisions of Mr. Justice Crosby and others as regards a travelling salesman and a longshoreman. A travelling salesman in Lowell, who is injured while crossing a street to go from one store to another, is not injured. Mr. Justice Crosby of the Supreme Judicial Court says said traveler was not in the course of his employment or assumed the risk. There are similar decisions along that line. The people are clamoring against these antiquated ideas, these minor technicalities, this blocking of justice. You know that the people who passed these laws know the conditions which make it imperative that these laws be had. Shall the court test these laws by applying to them ideas prevalent in the past or present?

My brother in the second division (Mr. Montague) speaking of Massachusetts, said there were few statutes declared unconstitutional. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that from 1902 to 1908 there were 468 statutes declared unconstitutional in the United States, the greater part of these being laws for more adequate social justice. Such are the conditions with which we, the people of the United States, are confronted to-day.

When our courts were established they were meant to interpret the law, but to-day, through their ability to declare laws unconstitutional they have become virtually a law-making body. We do not believe that the power to declare laws unconstitutional should be taken from them but that they should be limited or restricted in their use of this power.

Dr. William Draper Lewis, the eminent jurist and dean of the Pennsylvania State School, says:

We should not assume that a court was wrong in interpretation of the Constitution. We should assume it was right. But we should assume that the people have a right to know whether they want that particular enactment as a part of their laws.

When the existing laws fail to meet the conditions, there is need of a final court of appeals and that court should be the people. In the case of Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co. [N. Y.], the New York Court of Appeals held a workmen’s compensation act unconstitutional. But the need for such a law and the popular demand being so insistent, it was changed.

Now Alexander Hamilton has been quoted by my brother behind me in the same division (Mr. Merriam) and I want to quote from Alexander Hamilton regarding this Republican form of government. We feel that no statement as to the essentials of republican government could be more acceptable than that of Alexander Hamilton:

The people are the only legitimate fountain of power; from them all government is derived. It seems strictly consonant with the republican theory to recur to the same original authority, not only whenever it may be necessary to enlarge, diminish or new-model the powers of government, but also whenever any one of the departments may commit encroachments on the charted authority of the others; for how are the encroachments of the stronger to be prevented, or the wrongs of the weaker to be redressed, without an appeal to the people themselves, who, as grantors of the powers of government, can also declare its true meaning and enforce its observance.

Even the New York Times, a paper famous for its non-progressive views, has said:

That the definite will of the majority of the voters, deliberately formed, consistently adhered to, and fairly expressed, should determine the treatment of public affairs in all branches, even the judiciary, is the fundamental principle of democracy.
Some courts have usurped the power to declare laws unconstitutional by changing the wording of a law as passed by the Legislature. Take, for instance, the case of Adair v. The People, or the Compulsory Arbitration Act in Illinois. The Supreme Court held that a single paragraph in that act was unconstitutional and read it out of the law. This paragraph was the vital paragraph of the entire law; without it the law was entirely inoperative.

Another example, — that of the New York street car transfer case. The street car systems in New York were owned by the same holding company, but each line was run independently from the others, so that it was necessary to pay a fare every time one wanted a transfer. The Legislature passed an act forcing the companies to give transfers and provided a fine of $50 for every violation of the act. A test case was brought up, and in deciding the case, the court held that the Legislature meant to say for each violation of the act. Hence, on account of the excessive cost of bringing suit, it made the act inoperative, and, in reality, made the law unconstitutional.

Another case, — a Federal case, that of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Up to April, 1911, it was illegal for any contract or combination in restraint of trade to exist in the United States. Since that time the court has held that only those combinations working an unreasonable or undue restraint of trade were intended to be affected by the law. The Supreme Court has made itself the judge as to whether there was undue or unreasonable restraint of trade.

A few years ago the Standard Oil Company was fined $29,000,000. The fine never was collected. It was clearly proved that the company was guilty, but its immense influence with the higher court made punishment impossible.

Oglesby, a Missouri Pacific brakeman, lost his legs in a wreck in Missouri. He carried his case to the State Supreme Court, winning in the lower courts. When he lost he was refused a new trial. But when the railroad company lost it was granted two new trials. Oglesby naturally lost, but the people of Missouri had good stuff in them and knowing he had not received a square deal, elected him to a State office with a lucrative salary.

I also cite the Bakeshop Case of New York, or The People v. Lochner, that was referred to by my brother from Brockton (Mr. Brown). The law involved in this case provided that the bakers of New York could work only ten hours a day and all underground bake-ovens should be abolished. But when the interests came to bring a case to test the constitutionality of the act, they went out to Utica, N. Y., a small city, and they found a sanitary bakeshop in which the owner and his sons worked. The bake-oven was above the ground; but upon this framed-up and unfair case the act was declared unconstitutional. Out of the twenty-two judges who passed upon this case, twelve held that the law was constitutional, while only ten, a minority, held that the law was unconstitutional. The minority decided the case.

The Jacobs or Tenement-House Case cited by my brother from Brockton (Mr. Brown), is another typical example of a bad court decision. The New York Legislature passed an act to regulate the manufacture of tobacco in the home. The bill had the support of every labor-union and of all social settlement workers. This act was declared unconstitutional because it interfered with the sanctity of the home. Jacobs lived in a seven-room apartment, in one room of which he maintained a cigar factory. The Jacobs case decision retarded all tenement-house reform for the last fifteen years.

When the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Fugitive Slave Law was constitutional, Massachusetts was not afraid to criticize the court. It cost this country millions of dollars and hundreds of thousands of lives in a civil war to rectify that usurpation by the courts. The State of Kansas has lost in revenue a hundred thousand dollars a year because of one decision in the Western Union Telegraph Case.

In April, 1895, the Supreme Court declared the Income Tax Law was constitutional by a vote of five to four. A month later, May, 1895, Justice Shiras changed his mind, and by changing his mind he changed the decision and thus made the Income Tax Law unconstitutional.

In order that our Constitution may not be degraded it must have elasticity. It must be a ready tool for times of stress which always come to every nation.

Let us refer to Justice Holmes, our revered judge from Massachussetts, probably the sanest judge on the Supreme Court of the United States. He says in a unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in 1908, in defining the police power:

The police power extends to all public needs. It may be put forth in what is sanctioned by usage or held by the strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare.

Under this power the Legislatures and Constitutional Conventions may pass law for social betterment. Let us put this matter up to the ballot-box. This law then will be constitutional because it will be favored by the strong and preponderant opinion.

Some people would prefer to perish by precedent rather than die by innovation, but I believe if Massachusetts wants to be again the pioneer State of the Union she should liberalize her Constitution.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: The gentleman from Lynn in the third division (Mr. Creamer) has asked the question as to why members who were in favor of a unanimous decision of a jury on questions of fact are in favor of a less than unanimous decision of a court on questions of law, and he has endeavored to point out an inconsistency. Personally I was one of the remnant who voted for a less than unanimous decision by the jury. I am also in favor of a majority decision of the court, so if there is any merit in the question of consistency which the gentleman raises, certainly I am free from criticism as to that. And although it has seemed remarkable that so many of the delegates who were favorable to unanimous decisions of the jury on fact also hold that our liberties are at stake unless we have a majority decision on a question of law, and vice versa, as many who favored a less than unanimous verdict by the juries are insistent now on a unanimous decision by the courts, yet I think there are very grave distinctions and one of the distinctions is this: We have got to have a final decision somewhere, and if these measures involved not merely a question of constitutional law but involved all questions of law, we would see very clearly that the majority of the Supreme Judicial Court have got to decide some questions of law. It is important that questions of law be decided rightly; it is of equal importance that there be a final decision. Whereas we may be able to get another jury, where one jury disagrees on questions of fact, it is difficult to get another Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts to decide questions of law. I think that reasoning will apply also to the question of determining the constitutionality of a statute. Because while a majority of the court under the gentleman's resolution could not render a decision that an act was unconstitutional, the act would remain, and that majority of the court that did not believe in the constitutionality of the act would be forced to construe and interpret it for the people as a valid act; and I think we would find that they were on very swampy ground at times and that some of the value of our Massachusetts precedents would lose their force in this and in other States.

Now, gentlemen, I wish to give a little illustration. The chairman has ruled that these several measures are under discussion. They are all varieties of the same species. They are different in form and they are different in their coloring, but they all go pretty much to the same thing. And I should like to bring an illustration to bear upon the members of the committee. My illustration will not take long. It does not go back to Magna Carta or to any of the great and important early decisions. I think the barons who wrested the privileges from King John at Runnymede are entitled to a little furlough at this time. But I should like to go back not to 1215 but to the year 1915 and ask the members of the Convention to consider what I have to say in connection with document No. 97.

Suppose document No. 97 had been a part of the Constitution at the time the act I am about to refer to was enacted by the General Court, namely, chapter 292 of the General Acts of 1915. That is a Mechanics' Lien Act. I have no doubt that some of the attorneys in the Convention have heard of the Mechanics' Lien Act of 1915. It contained many wonderful and weird provisions. When the date for its enforcement came, which was January 1, 1916, the General Court of that year found it was necessary to enact two acts, chapters 163 and 306 of the General Acts of 1916, to remedy the errors and the defects of the Act of 1915. It was impossible on January 1, 1916, for any man who had a mechanic's lien in the courts to find any way whereby he could enforce his lien. There was no possible way of enforcing it.

Now let us take an example. Let me suppose that the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown), who is the father of one of these resolutions, after the passage of this Act of 1915 and after a Constitutional Convention had decided that no court could upset a law on constitutional or any other grounds,—let us suppose that he had advanced a sum of money, something out of his substance and capital, for construction of some building for educational or business purposes in the city of Brockton, and had taken a mortgage for it in due course and that that mortgage was duly recorded in the Registry of Deeds. Well, work was undertaken. By the time the building neared its completion there were difficulties, as sometimes happens. The sheriff was around the corner and there were altercations between the workmen and the employers, and the men who furnished the materials were not being paid, and as a result there were several liens put upon that building. Being a naturally careful and prudent man, the gentleman from Brockton would then go and consult his attorney and see what his rights were. The attorney would say: "You have got your mortgage and it is on record and you are all right, you are perfectly safe; but the Legislature is constantly changing the Mechanics' Lien Law and we will look up and see what they have done this year." And his counsel reads until he comes to section 6 of the Acts of 1915 and he reads the following sentence, — this is only one of the minor discrepancies of the act:

Section 6. No lien . . . shall avail as against a mortgage . . . unless the work or labor performed is in the erection, alteration, repair or removal of a building or structure which erection, alteration, repair or removal was actually begun prior to the recording of the mortgagee —

"prior to the recording of the mortgagee." "Why, what does this mean?" "Why," counsel would say, "it would seem as though you have got to go on record." "How am I going to do that?" "I don't know, but there is the law. All your money is in this building and you want to protect yourself and the Legislature is not in session; I don't see what you can do except to record yourself."

So suppose the gentleman goes up to the registry in his shire town and says: "Here is the Mechanics' Lien Law and it says I have got to be recorded." The register of deeds would probably say: "My appropriation only allows me to record legal documents. I make copies of legal documents and put them in the books and index them, but how can I make a copy of the gentleman from Brockton? Is that possible? I can't copy a human document. I don't see what there is to do if you want to protect your funds but for you to remain here permanently on record."

Now, gentlemen, that is the situation. Read the section of the act and read the proposed amendment. And then, naturally, as the other mortgagees of the county began to learn about the condition of affairs they would want to protect their rights and I think, gentlemen of the Convention, you can soon realize what a beautiful collection of mortgagees there would be assembled in the registry of deeds of the county.

We can see also something of the manner in which the gentleman might address those mortgagees and I think he probably would say to them, in a style with which we are familiar, that if there ever was a bunch of "two-footed calves" that had enacted foolish provisions into the Constitution it was the assembly that required that no justice could say that any act passed by the Legislature, no matter what its defect was, could be declared unconstitutional or void on any ground.

Now gentlemen, I do not think that I have said this in a particularly facetious manner. I have not mentioned —

Mr. Brown (interrupting): I should like to know if that gentleman who made that assertion as to the Legislature is also aware how largely his own profession, whose duty it was to write correct laws, were in force in that Legislature?

Mr. Leonard: Certainly; I am absolutely aware of that. Of course lawyers make mistakes, but you have to rely on judges, even though sometimes they are the judges of the lower courts, to detect mistakes and, within the limits of their jurisdiction, to correct errors. I think the judge of the lower court in a general way resembles the family doctor, as the Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court resembles the specialist, and we have got to admit that sometimes the lower court justice is capable of reaching and arriving at a sound decision. This error I have referred to was due to the addition of the letter "e" in the word "mortgage" in the drafting of the act.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman this question: Does a lawyer become any the less incapable of making a mistake when he is on the bench than he does when he is in the Legislature? Is not the argument he is making a reason why we should restrict the Supreme Judicial Court to a verdict that is more unanimous rather than why we should let it remain as it is?

Mr. Leonard: Absolutely true. The judges do make mistakes on the bench and our legal system has provided means of appeal therefrom. But does the gentleman mean to say that because there are lawyers in the Legislature when matters are considered in there that no mistakes are made in the Legislature, but that they may occur in the courts where the lawyers are on the bench? Is the lawyer in the General Court less liable to error than the lawyer acting as a judge in the deliberations of the court of law?

Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I understand the gentleman from Boston uses this illustration as an argument that the judges ought to retain their power to declare statutes unconstitutional. I should like to ask him who corrected the mistake that he refers to now, the court or the Legislature.

Mr. Leonard: The courts were powerless on other grounds than those I have mentioned to enforce this Act of 1915. As far as the legislative act went they did not know what to do. There was nothing they could do, and the only thing to be done was to go to the Legislature and ask the Legislature to repeal the bungling job they had done the year previous and to enact a law in correct form.

Mr. Sullivan: I should like to ask the gentleman, then, if the instance that he cites is an argument that the Legislature should need judicial supervision.

Mr. Leonard: I cannot quite catch the connection of the gentleman's question. I certainly do not believe the Legislature needs judicial supervision. I am making no argument of that sort; I am just urging this resolution.

Mr. Creamer moved that the Committee of the Whole recommend to the Convention that this resolution (No. 47) be recommitted to the committee on Judiciary with a view to a division of the question and a separate report on each paragraph.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I cannot feel otherwise than somewhat depressed. It is something of a jump from the subject we had last (capital punishment) to this, especially when I have heard a minister of the gospel expound God as he understands Him. I say that it is somewhat hard for me to immediately take up my subject when I have listened so intently to hear expounded here the God of love as He is understood by a minister of the gospel. I am going to come as quickly as I can to my subject.

I am satisfied if the motion means that the resolution is going to the Judiciary so that the Judiciary can present it in a different form. The subject-matter of this resolution, and also of one which I had the honor to introduce, is the idea that the verdict of the judiciary in interpreting or expounding the constitutionality of laws, and particularly those dealing with social questions, or questions which relate to the well-being of man, shall be made substantially unanimous rather than being left to a majority of a divided court, as it is at present. The subject grew into discussion as far as I am concerned because I listened so intently to the debate of the members of the legal profession. I learned much. I heard them declare for a unanimous verdict in jury trials. I voted with the majority. It is in my mind that the Supreme Judicial Court as it is constituted should follow that general rule; that it should be unanimous in its verdicts on such questions. I question if the gentleman from Framingham (Mr. Merriam) was justified in his inference that I was trying to make the Legislature the supreme branch. Certainly he could not think that I had lost sight of the fact that all power was in the people. I have enunciated that proposition frequently. I certainly do know that they are coördinate branches. I certainly do know, as was shown by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill), that the intention of the Constitution was to balance one with the other; it was to make them coördinate branches, and, as far as possible, to define the line of demarcation. I am against the idea of unduly enlarging the power of any one of the coördinate branches. I see that it is the tendency of the judiciary gradually to enlarge its power as it interprets the Constitution.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES. 487

I wonder what the gentleman who so eloquently has talked to us on capital punishment would say if somebody should rise and say that he thought inasmuch as some very, very able men had expounded the Bible, had interpreted it, had told what the original author intended to say when he wrote the Bible, that therefore, because they had expounded it, their expositions should become a part of the Bible. We should be up against it along those lines. And it is along those lines that I am objecting to the expositions of the Constitution by the judiciary. It is not necessary for the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) to think that I am attacking the conscience of the Supreme Judicial Court. The conscience of any man is either square in his breast, so that every time it turns it hurts him, or else it has turned so often that corners are knocked off and are round. If the corners are round it does not hurt him. Each and every one of us is liable to that experience. So, therefore, I am not attacking the judiciary, and if you say the discussion has broadened it has broadened only because of the fact that we undertook to trace where they got that power.

If you are going to follow it at all down through the line of the early fathers you will find each and every one of them feeling that the Massachusetts Court is to interpret the Constitution of Massachusetts. What does every legislator do when he takes his seat, lawyers as well as the rest? He takes an oath to support the Constitution. So does His Excellency. Does anybody undertake to say that they have not closely in mind what the Constitution of Massachusetts is when they are enacting laws? They do have it in mind. Some one may have reason to call their attention to the fact that it is unconstitutional, yet nevertheless they have proceeded, and the lawyers without any question,—I know they would do their duty,—have looked up precedent decisions and have determined their course in voting upon the question of constitutionality. They enact laws on the social welfare of the people designed to improve it. As soon as they pass them the judiciary veto them. If they cannot base the veto on the police power they base it on the right of contract. If the law undertakes to protect the laborer from being injured, then the manufacturer puts up a Federal case that his property is attacked; then very easily do the judiciary find that it is taking his property without due process of law. If we intend to protect labor in some such way for the common good, then the court says: "You have taken away the right of the poor laborer to contract."

If the Judiciary Committee will take up this question on the line of criticism made by the honorable member to whom I referred in my first address, Sherman Whipple, I will support it; but this is the only place you ever can make any such change. If you cannot change it now when are you going to change it? It is not usurpation as the gentleman from Somerville said. It is not usurpation. It is using a little power now, and then a little more power and finally reaching the point where it creates complaint and discussion.

A gentleman says: "Why, if you demand unanimity, except one or two, we will lose all the valued decisions which should be handed down from the judiciary." No, I say not. If one member says it is constitutional, and thereby stands with the Legislature it makes it constitutional; then the other six may give opinions telling why it is not constitutional. I hold that if proof was thus produced that an act that had been passed by the Legislature was unconstitutional the Legislature itself would reverse its own action especially if the act was in derogation of the rights of any individual.

When I was talking so loudly as I talked here on Friday, and was saying: "Wake up, members, on the initiative and referendum, I want that explained," my idea was this: I did not wish this Convention to grow gradually by what it fed on. I did not wish to see it grow more and more conservative. I did not wish to see it take the attitude that because the Constitution is as it is now, it must therefore continue in that way. I tried to declare that while we are governed by the Constitution, while we all support it, it is our duty here to revise that Constitution if it is necessary. We should revise it upon the merits of the proposition to revise it. The argument has been that the judges had this or that power, and it must not be changed. We have demonstrated that this Convention is made up of positive men.
We should either sit and debate this question or send it back to the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman from Lynn suggested changing the conditions so that the people will get rid of the idea that their rights are not being protected in the courts. Please take notice, if I may interject it here, of the labor situation. Please remember that there is a very, very, large body of men who try to be fair, to be conservative, to be honest. Remember also that there is a different body of men endeavoring to lead the labor movement and rush it we know not where. It is said that we are not properly protected by the judiciary. It is said that the judiciary are continually unmaking the will of the people after the will of the people has been expressed clearly by the Legislature. That is a danger that warrants the taking of all the time that has been taken on this resolution.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: In approaching this resolution, No. 47, and the very excellent reference which the delegate from Lynn recommends be made of it, I should like to discuss it from the standpoint, not of a lawyer, not of a laboring man, but from the standpoint of a business UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

489

man who has been a close student of government matters for some thirty years. In that effort I have had many times by men of great legal training what I thought a Supreme Judicial Court decision would be on certain questions; and after a research of constitutional decisions by the Supreme Court in very many States of this Union I have come to the conclusion that the Supreme Court decision on a constitutional matter is governed almost entirely by the personal, political and social environment of each one of the judges of the Supreme Court at the time the decision was made. That has been brought home to me after a great deal of research of Supreme Court decisions on constitutional matters in very many States, and it has brought to my mind the fact that, after all, the Supreme Court of any State is only a human tribunal, subject to the influences and the environment to which all human beings are subject. For that reason I believe resolution No. 47 has a great deal of merit. It involves two very important questions. To my mind they should be decided separately. I trust that the motion for a reference on the part of the delegate from Lynn to the Judiciary Committee will prevail.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Salem: The committee on Judiciary did consider both phases of the question and the committee on Judiciary was unanimous in its recommendation that the resolution ought not to pass. If it is referred back to the committee on Judiciary, I think I am interpreting the sense and the temper of the committee correctly in saying that about all that committee can do under the motion of the gentleman from Lynn in deciding the question will be to bring in two separate reports, saying ought not to pass on each phase of the question, that is, the first and second paragraphs. Therefore I hope that the time of the Convention will not be wasted by recommitting this matter to the committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANDERSON of Brookline: I do not think that resolution No. 47, or No. 97, or No. 212, in the form in which it is submitted, ought to pass. I do think that each of those resolutions attempts to strike at a really important matter which calls for careful consideration and the submission of an amendment of the Constitution to the people. I am satisfied, after a careful examination of the question, extending over a considerable number of years, dealing with various aspects of the constitutional power of the courts to declare measures unconstitutional, that that power ought to be more narrowly limited than it has been limited heretofore. I believe that whatever the arguments may be, historical or other, in favor of leaving the ultimate decision to the legislative branch, the decision to leave it to the judicial branch was a correct decision, and that no other branch of the government would have given us as real constitutional government as the judicial branch has given us. But I remember that more than twenty years ago, when the learned member of this Convention now sitting for Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) was Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, that in his report as Attorney-General he even then called attention to the increasing number of decisions by a mere majority or much less than the full court, holding the deliberate acts of the Legislature, approved by the Governor, invalid on constitutional grounds. If the learned delegate was at all correct, and he always is correct, in the statements made in his report as Attorney-General twenty odd years ago, that there was an increasing and undesirable tendency on the part of the courts to nullify the deliberate acts of the Legislature, a fortiori that statement might be made to-day; for I apprehend, —
I have not the statistics before me, — that there have been ten times as many decisions of the courts by less than all of the court, and sometimes by a bare majority, holding statutes unconstitutional, within the past twenty years as there were in the period reviewed by the learned Attorney-General some twenty odd years ago. It has become an abuse, which has increased, and justly increased, the antagonism toward the courts, and which threatens to destroy, or at any rate to injure, that popular confidence that we ought to have in our courts.
The Supreme Court of the United States will not recover in this generation the prestige that was destroyed by the five to four income tax decision grounded upon the change of mind of a very elderly gentleman who had had great difficulty in making up his mind. It was a scandal that the taxing power of this great Nation should require an amendment to the Constitution to undo the error brought into our constitutional law by the change of mind of one out of nine Justices of the Supreme Court. It is inconsistent with a proper regard for the oath of office of the members of Congress, (if we are dealing with National matters,) of the Senate and of the chief executive, each one of whom, as has been stated here this afternoon, is as much bound by his oath of office to enact only constitutional legislation as is the Supreme Court bound to declare and enforce only constitutional law.

When I say that, I retract no part of what I said a moment ago, — that I think the final decision of that difficult question was well left to the judiciary. There are certain advantages in testing the constitu-ionality of law that the judiciary have when the law is put into actual operation, — they have, for instance, the benefit of the argument of counsel, — that do not accrue in a legislative tribunal.

And so without reviewing the very many aspects of this question that I have been called upon during the past ten or fifteen years to review in various addresses that I have attempted to give, or going over the field of so-called police regulation law, I think this Convention ought to submit to the people something substantially to this effect:
That no law should be declared unconstitutional except by the court of last resort, and then only by not less than, say, two-thirds of the Justices. [Applause.] That would amount in Massachusetts to five, leaving two on the other side. It would require six in the Supreme Court of the United States, assuming for the moment that by analogy there should be a like amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It would relieve the courts of the odium, — and it is an odium, and a just odium, — of having the deliberate act of the Legislature, and of the executive approving it, upset by the decision of a single man. Five to four decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States are, as I said, a scandal. Four to three decisions in Massachusetts I am glad to say have been rarely, if ever, made, and I hope never will be made, but if they ever are made they will constitute a scandal.

I want to add one other thing. Massachusetts has less call to complain of her judiciary than we have cause to complain of the Supreme Court of the United States, and than they have cause to complain in Illinois, Missouri and New York. I am not sure that there may not be other States in our class, but some years ago I made a fairly care-FUL examination, for the purpose of preparing an argument, of a lot of the decisions in those courts that are elected by popular election, and I found that they had been far less responsive to what we call modern ideas, had been far more arrogant in the assertion of judicial power as being superior to legislative power, than in Massachusetts. In this connection it is not unfit to pay a word of tribute to a former Chief Justice of this Commonwealth, now a Justice of the Supreme Court in Washington. I think it was the unusual sanity of the views of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes which went far in our Supreme Judicial Court to prevent it at one time, some years ago, from yielding to a tendency which seemed almost the prevailing tendency in various States of the country. He always asserted from the time of his dissenting opinion in Commonwealth v. Perry in 1891 that it was for the Legislature to determine those questions, and that it was none of the court’s business, unless the Legislature obviously, clearly, encroached upon some of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But I regret to say there have been other, much less learned men, of entirely different environment, perhaps growing up in an environment from which you might expect more democratic proclivities, who have gone to the extreme in misconstruing the great bills of rights, the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the due process clause, — as imbedding in our own system of law their own somewhat antiquated ideas of economic and sociological questions. They have constituted themselves in effect a fourth legislative tribunal.

Now, I say that ought to be stopped. In working out the machinery to stop it my own notion is this, — I am not at all dogmatic, — to limit the power to the court of last resort, and then to provide that there should be a vote of not less than two-thirds of all the judges of that court, — would be the safest middle ground on which to secure both the essential guarantees of the Constitution and the right to move forward.

Mr. Montague: As a member of the committee on the Judiciary, having nominal charge of this matter, No. 47, I hope that it will not be recommitted to the committee on the Judiciary. As the gentleman from Salem (Mr. Sullivan), a member of the committee, has stated, the committee on the Judiciary did give this matter very careful consideration. They considered both aspects of this matter, No. 47, and they were unanimous, not only without a dissenting vote, but without in the committee a dissenting voice, that neither of these propositions should be favorably reported. We had before our committee the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown), who spoke there as he has here and who always speaks very interestingly, but who did not speak to the committee on the Judiciary convincingly. I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this matter should be referred again to the committee on Judiciary it simply would result in delay, and that the same report would come back here for your consideration.

This matter has been debated almost two whole days. It seems to me that, although we continue to have light every time a member speaks, as we have just had an excellent illustration, we have had almost as much information as we are likely to obtain, and it seems to me we can deal with it better if we proceed in the usual and regular order to deal with it now.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

There is one thing to be noticed, and that is that in the strong arguments which have been made in favor of the proposition it is not Massachusetts that is referred to, it is the United States Supreme Court, it is Illinois, it is New York, it is North Dakota, it is Arizona, it is some other place besides the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee on the Judiciary did not feel that we had any jurisdiction or that it was our business to interfere with or even to pay any attention to what was occurring in those other States. It seemed to us that this matter, like all these matters, should be decided with reference to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, what we have done here in the last 137 years and what we are likely to do here in the future.

As far as the reports go, there has not been a dissenting opinion filed in our Supreme Judicial Court on a matter that has been declared unconstitutional since 1892,—that is, 25 years ago. There has not been a majority opinion, so far as the reports filed indicate, since 1892. There were in that year both a dissenting opinion and also a majority opinion, and there was one the year before. It looks to me, and it looked to the committee on the Judiciary, as if, taking Massachusetts, our own Commonwealth, considering the fact that in all the reports from 1804 to 1916, inclusive, only 59 statutes, parts of statutes, or resolves have been declared unconstitutional in this Commonwealth, an average of one every two years and an average of the acts and resolves of the Legislature one in about 850 acts and resolves passed, we had better leave well enough alone. I was surprised at that showing, because I have been a member of the Legislature and I am surprised and gratified that it has not made a mistake of this kind more than once in 850 times. It did seem to the committee on Judiciary that, taking the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in view of what our judiciary had done and is doing, we had better let them keep on rendering the same splendid service and in the same way as they have heretofore done.

Mr. Balch of Boston: What my friend the learned member from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) has said has struck a sympathetic chord in myself, yet I rise to make an argument on the other side, for I draw a different conclusion from premises which are in part the same. I call your attention, gentlemen of the Convention, to the fact that this debate has concerned itself almost wholly with one narrow aspect of the question of the relation of our courts to constitutional law. Let us be frank with one another. Let those on my side who agree with me be frank. There is, indeed, a grave question here; and when the learned professor of constitutional law in the Harvard Law School tried hard to teach me constitutional law twenty years ago he was aware of it and never scrupled to point out to his classes in the most forcible terms: "It is a dangerous power for courts to wield." He also never scrupled to point out with equal justice that it is an absolutely indispensable power to our fundamental liberties. The trouble arose at one point and practically at one point only. Some twenty or thirty years ago a new theory was given impetus in this country, the theory which can be best defined as that of the superior value of human rights as contrasted with property rights; the abandonment of the old doctrine of laissez faire and the partial substitution therefor of the doctrine which some, hostile minded toward it, characterized as paternalism. This conflict of new theories drew into the courts great social and political questions which would better have been kept out of them, if they could have been kept out. Conflict most typically arose when hours of labor and the like were regulated and the regulations were claimed to contravene the Federal constitutional provisions for liberty of contract and the like. Then it was for the courts to say whether or not they could uphold the paternalistic legislation, so called, under the police power, as coming under the emergency power for the protection of health and the like, and therefore not subject to the provision of the Constitution for the sacredness of the right of free contract. There was a time when the whole situation thus arising was charged with political thunder and lightning; when a very dangerous crisis confronted the courts; when there was a rapidly growing jealousy of their power as interpreters of the Constitution; when there was a long series of decisions which had thrown out great pieces of constructive legislation to the extreme irritation of large sections of the population. But, Mr. Chairman, within the last four or five years I submit that a great change for the better has come over that situation. Men like Mr. Justice Brandeis have taught us of the bar how these great questions should be treated, how they should be brought home to the members of our courts. Even where the courts were fairly conservative we have been shown how they could be convinced that legislation limiting the hours of labor, not only for women and children but even for men, could come under the police power. We have been shown how the attorney with sufficient ability and patience to work up the case properly can carry the court with him if he has merit on his side. The number of cases where great constructive legislation is overthrown by the courts is diminishing, and is diminishing fast. Furthermore, as Mr. Montague well said, that trouble, serious as it was, never had anything like as serious a nature in this Commonwealth as it had in certain Commonwealths which had elective judges and in our United States Supreme Court,—a happy fact partly due, as both the gentlemen who preceded me have pointed out, to our own Mr. Justice Holmes, who has done much the same service for the bench that Mr. Justice Brandeis performed for the bar in showing from what angle these great judicial questions should be judicially reviewed.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this debate has been almost wholly confined to that one aspect of the matter, to so-called social welfare legislation.

Have we sufficiently considered, all of us, that the prime constitutional function of the courts is not to pass on those social welfare matters under the police power, but to safeguard our fundamental rights, such as our right not to be put under military law in time of peace, and not to have soldiers quartered upon us save in accordance with the Constitution; our right not to have free speech and liberty of assembly taken away from us, except under the Constitution and the similar intimate personal liberties which, since Magna Carta, have been our shield against tyranny? Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that in the hurly burly of this war and the excitement which may attend its closing hours, we should have some Governor who so misconstrued his mandate from the people as to declare labor under martial law while the Legislature was not sitting and proceed to the measures which necessarily would flow from such a military order; then no one would be quicker to insist that the court of first instance should declare the usurpation unconstitutional than some of the men who now fancy that they would like to see that decision delayed until the Supreme Judicial Court could be assembled and pass upon it. I take it, if the Governor or the General Court violated their constitutional duty in any such manner, no one would be so ready as my brother, the learned member from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), to see to it that the court of first instance righted that wrong efficiently and immediately, without waiting for the court of last resort. And I submit that in concentrating our attention exclusively on one narrow aspect of the constitutional aspects of the work of our courts, the gentleman has caused us dangerously to lose sight of the broader and more truly typical aspects of that work,—aspects which absolutely require that the courts should retain the power of giving prompt, as well as full, protection to our fundamental liberties.

Mr. MERRIAM of Framingham: Although in behalf of the committee I have spoken once on this question, I desire to add a few words at this time in view of the latitude the debate has taken.

I cannot agree to the statement made recently by the gentleman from Lynn that as he has studied our history the decisions of our judges have been influenced largely by social associations. I want to call to the mind of that gentleman, Mr. Chairman, and to the mind of this Convention, the action of our Supreme Court recently in Washington in declaring unconstitutional the statutes and provisions made by our southern States for the purpose of depriving many of the common people of the right to vote. In many of these States laws were passed that no one could vote, although it might be that he was entitled to vote, unless in addition to other qualifications his grandfather could have voted under the same qualifications. Mr. Chairman, those laws in the course of time came before the Supreme Court of the United States for final construction, and it was a southern man, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who pronounced the decision of the court to be a subterfuge, to be an infringement upon the rights of the humble people, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution and as such unconstitutional and void.

The question before us, however, does not concern the Federal jurisdiction as much as it concerns the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I cannot conceive of anything touching our courts more lamentable than to have any doubt remain in the minds of our people as to the fate of this proposition.

The other day we were asked what was the source of the constitutional authority of our courts to set aside the statutes under our Constitution. That question was answered early in our history, when it was shown that the courts were subject to the Constitution. The Constitution was made the supreme law of the land. In our Federal jurisdiction it is the supreme law of the United States. The Constitution of Massachusetts in our jurisdiction here is the supreme law of the Commonwealth, and our courts must recognize it. It is their fundamental duty. They cannot decline to see it. Usually as they have exercised it it has been in the interest of the rights of the individual, in maintaining rights of equality under the Constitution against infringement. I have here an article recently written upon the subject, reviewing the authorities and concluding with this statement:
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

They are still bound, if the Constitution is an expression of fundamental law, to determine judicially the validity of acts of Congress under that law. No other result is logically possible, unless either the Constitution is disregarded as law or Congress is made the highest court for its interpretation. In either case, the fundamental law which we now have would disappear.¹

In order that that fundamental law may continue to be fundamental in our Commonwealth, I feel that we ought to vote upon this proposition in the most decisive manner, so that the power of our courts to enforce the provisions of our Constitution may be maintained.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: This is one of the most satisfactory days of this Convention, because we find ourselves a "con-vention." A body of men is now come together, not simply sitting in separate committees for the preparation of material, but actually discussing fundamental questions; and hardly any question that will come before this Convention is more serious for the people of the Commonwealth than that of the status of the judiciary.

I own to great enlightenment from the speeches made from different aspects and upon different sides of this question, and hesitate to discuss a somewhat different phase of the question in the midst of so many men of legal training, accustomed to practice before the courts of this Commonwealth and elsewhere. I want to speak as a plain citizen, somewhat acquainted with laws and Constitutions, but not adept in the practice of the courts. I speak as a man of the people, and the men of the people feel that somehow or other, without their being consulted, the people of the United States, including Massachusetts, have set one of the three coequal departments of government upon a pedestal; that the judiciary department in this State and in the United States is recognized as having powers and prerogatives different from those of the other representatives of the people.

I affirm on the contrary that there is no sacred department in this Commonwealth; there is no sacred body of public servants; they all spring precisely from the same origin, namely, from the will of the people of Massachusetts, and it is not the will of that people, and it never has been their will, that they should create three departments, two of which should be subordinate to the third. Furthermore, it was not the original purpose of the people of Massachusetts to create a court which could contravene the decisions of the other departments. I say the "other departments," because we forget when we talk about the present authority of the courts over legislative acts that they have and exercise an equal authority in many cases over executive acts, sometimes in decisions on formal suits, although commonly through the formal writs which have reference to the executive powers.

Permit me to say, as a life-long student of constitutional history, that when the present Constitution of Massachusetts was framed it was not in the mind of any member of the original Convention that the courts of Massachusetts were to have the power to set aside acts of the General Court on the ground of unconstitutionality. And what is the proof? In the first place, that it never had been done under the old provincial government. It is true that a considerable number of statutes of the Province of Massachusetts was set aside in England; but I challenge any member of this Convention to find a single case in which a statute was set aside upon the ground that it was inconsistent with the charter of the Commonwealth. Further, up to 1780, not one of the States of the Union, in their existence of four years, had taken action in this direction. Between 1780 and 1787 six or seven legal cases arose in which the courts of some other States did set aside statutes. I have examined them carefully, and every single one of those cases arose out of the abnormal conditions of the Revolution. They were mostly statutes directed against loyalists, disallowed as contrary to general principles of law. One was the Rhode Island statute for compelling people to accept paper money. All of them were statutes of a transitional, a passing period. It is true that Thomas Jefferson gave currency to the statement that the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts previous to 1787 had set aside a statute. Some years ago I instituted a search in the manuscript records and can say positively that there never was any such decision. No State in the Union in 1787 had arrived definitely at the system of judicial disallowance of laws, although there had been some advances toward it.

Then what brought that system into this country? Not a demand in the States, but the creation of a powerful Federal government, with a Federal court and with Federal legislation. Here was presented a new situation: A Congress of two bodies with very extensive powers which operated throughout the Union, the superior to Legislatures and the courts of all the separate States. If you will follow the debates in the Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787 you will discover that it was the purpose of the Convention in creating that Constitution to give the Supreme Court of the United States the power to set aside State statutes because they were not in accordance with the supreme law.

It was not distinctly settled that Federal statutes should be set aside by Federal courts; in fact, it was no less than 69 years after the Constitutional Convention before a general statute of the United States not relating to the judiciary was set aside by the Supreme Court. That was the Dred Scott decision. Five years later Congress passed a series of statutes in absolute derogation and defiance and contempt of that decision, and those statutes stood. After the civil war, the court took up again the practice of reviewing the statutes, and that has ever since continued.

That experience does not carry us far, because since 1789 the system of judicial review has grown up in all the States of the Union. We have it in Massachusetts. The real question is not so much what was intended a century ago, but what do the people of Massachusetts desire now, and what are they receiving?

The historical question in itself is not of great importance, unless some member of this Convention is convinced that we must now have and must continue to have this special judicial power because we have "always had it." We have not always had it. It came slowly, indirectly, imperceptibly into the courts of the United States and into the courts of Massachusetts after 1789. In this Commonwealth we have a special system of government of which, curiously enough, the people hardly seem aware. As I am a newcomer in the State, having lived only 40 years in Cambridge, these things strike me with more force than they do you who are to the manor born. In all the other States of the Union the constitutions contain a large number of specific powers assigned to the Legislature, exactly as to the executive and the judiciary, and also many limitations upon the powers of the Legislature. The Massachusetts Constitution is singularly modest in such provisions. You have the general limitations of the Bill of Rights, and a few other specific limitations on the Legislature. There are only half a dozen places in the text of the Constitution, which I have examined within a few minutes, in which the Legislature is specifically given authority to do anything. Why? Because it was then, and is now, the theory that to the Legislature fell all the powers which can be exercised by a government in this Commonwealth, which are not prohibited by the Federal Constitution or elsewhere in the Constitution of Massachusetts with its amendments.

What is the effect of this lack of precise definition upon the courts? Why, simply this: In other States which are provided with a large body of constitutional precepts the courts can force legislation to accord with specific clauses of the Constitution. In this State to a far greater degree the courts are applying to legislation unwritten principles which are nowhere stated in the Constitution. That is, you have upon the one side the Legislature, acting in a large way under its general power; upon the other side you have the courts discovering and applying unwritten conditions and statements as to the powers of government which are made limitations by the Legislature. We have nothing like the elaborate, fixed, adjustable and ascertainable system which prevails in some other States.

Now, the truth is that the system in Massachusetts has worked well. Every resident of this State feels that the judiciary is one of the soundest parts of its governmental organization. The Supreme Judicial Court has taken an unfair advantage of this Convention by sending as a representative here from Fall River (Mr. Morton), sitting among us, a jurist whose honor is unassailable and whose abilities and whose impartiality are absolutely beyond dispute. We fairly judge the courts by those members of them with whom we are acquainted; and we may well rate the Supreme Judicial Court and most of the other courts of Massachusetts high. Nevertheless, there is no use in trying to go through our work under the superstition that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court are a different kind of being from other citizens of Massachusetts. We look to them to suggest, improve and reform. I felt pained and disappointed to be assured so eloquently by a member of the Judiciary Committee, as I understood it, that that committee, including a former member of the Supreme Judicial Court, did not see anything that could be improved in our present judicial system.

That leads to another point, which ought to animate our minds throughout this Convention upon every subject that we discuss, namely, who are the "we" in this Commonwealth? Who are the people of Massachusetts? How far are they satisfied with the government which was made, in many cases, before they came into this country? Are we to accept the principle that the immigrant from another State or from another country arriving in Massachusetts is thereafter precluded from making any suggestion for the betterment of the government under which he finds himself? It is a fact which we must take to heart that a very considerable number of the inhabitants of this State, including large numbers organized in powerful ways, headed by very astute and able leaders, a considerable number of whom are in this Convention, are not satisfied with the present condition. Very likely when you come down to it some of them could not more articulately explain their difficulty than the labor leader in England who was asked: "What do you fellows want?" "Well, we doant want what we've got." Now, there are hundreds and thousands of people in Massachusetts who, whether right or wrong, do not want what they have got, and it behooves us to examine as carefully as we can the ground of these protests so as to see what can be conceded that will satisfy some of the dissatisfied.

The discussion at the present moment is relieved of some of its purpose by the fact that it seems evident from the temper of the Convention that no serious changes are likely to be made in the judiciary, —not even that set forth in the educative proposition of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson). The Convention is startled to hear a lawyer who is not satisfied with the state of the law and the courts in Massachusetts! You would think that he had had no experience of courts and justice did you not know the contrary.

What is to be the relief? The committee on the Judiciary tell us that there is none to come from them because none is needed, because everything is for the best in "the best possible of Massachusetts." Some people think that there must be a way out of the present dissatisfaction. In the first place, they believe that the courts have no more fundamental constitutional right to declare upon statutes than has the Governor or the Legislature; that the right of review is an acquired right, a derived right, a definite right. If it works well, so far so good; if it does not work well it is for us to suggest a remedy, and we are not shut in from putting limitations on the method of review.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I should like the opportunity of asking the gentleman three categorical questions, and I should like, if possible, a categorical reply. The first question is this: Does he believe in a written Constitution and frame of government as a guide to governmental policy?

Mr. Hart: The gentleman's questions are evidently such as will require a careful and positive answer. I will therefore yield at this point and will resume to-morrow, and will ask the gentleman to give me his questions in person.

Mr. George W. Anderson of Brookline moved that resolution No. 47 be amended by substituting the following new draft.

No law duly enacted by the General Court shall be nullified as unconstitutional except by the Supreme Judicial Court with the concurrence of not less than two-thirds of all the Justices thereof.

Discussion of the measure was resumed the following day.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I shall occupy the attention of this committee only a very few minutes in concluding the remarks on which I was engaged at four o'clock yesterday afternoon. There is but one thing which I wish if possible to bring to your attention, and I shall put it as briefly as possible. That point is simply that our system of declaring legislative acts void by the judicial courts is not a system founded in natural rights or in the nature of American government, and that therefore the present system in Massachusetts cannot claim that it must be sustained precisely as it stands lest otherwise we should lose our Commonwealth government.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES. 499

Yesterday I tried to make clear that the system was not to be found in the text of the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780. Since that time I have noticed in one of the morning papers a letter written to the Advertiser July 31, in which the effort is made to show that this power is embedded in the Constitution of 1780 because it declares that all the laws of the Province, Colony or State previous to 1780 should be in force until altered or repealed by the Legislature, — "such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this Constitution." And he deduces from that language that the courts were expected to maintain that clause of the Constitution by annulling legislation. The complete answer to that statement and all similar statements is that the Constitution was adopted in 1780 and there is not a single case previous to the Federal Constitution, which went into effect in 1789, in which the Massachusetts courts declared void or set aside an act of the General Court. It began to do so after 1789, and it began to do so because of the example of the Federal courts, which in the period from 1789 to 1807 were reaching out to annul State statutes, a process necessary under our principles of Federal government, but not equally necessary within this Commonwealth.

Another reason for supposing that this system is not a vested right, an irrepealable principle of government, is that it does not prevail in some other Commonwealths which are essentially republican. For instance, in Great Britain it has been for ages the principle that the last act of Parliament was the prevailing act of Parliament, that it repealed all previous acts and that the courts were bound to take jurisdiction and to respect those acts accordingly. It is true, as Mr. Bryce has said, that should Great Britain be organized as a great imperial federation, which seems not unlikely, it then would be necessary to create a Supreme Federal Court, in order to maintain the Federal Constitution against the Constitutions of the States; and there is great reason for thinking that might be done because the Canadian federation, the Australian federation and the South African federation, particularly the Australian, have a system very closely akin to ours, by which the Federal courts can set aside the acts of the States of those federations.

The main point, then, is that the present system may be altered without stumbling against any vested interest or rightful principle. No part of the Massachusetts government has a vested right. The only things resembling vested rights are the rights of the people as embodied in the Bill of Rights, and there are other rights not so embodied which are commonly respected. The General Court, the executive, the courts themselves, are the creatures of the people of Massachusetts acting through their constitutional authority. It is competent, therefore, for this Constitutional Convention to propose to the people such measures with reference to the courts as may seem wise to this body.

That leads me to the final point, which is, that other methods are possible which may limit to some degree the authority of the courts to pronounce upon statutes, — such a proposition, for instance, as was made yesterday, and, I suppose, in the course of this morning will come before you directly for your consideration; a proposition by which a two-thirds vote of the courts should be necessary. There is one obvious remedy,—and I tell you again, gentlemen, as I said yesterday, that there is something to remedy,—that however we may feel within this body of 320 highly respectable men, there is a large part of the population of Massachusetts which does not understand and is not satisfied with the present powers of the courts. It is one of our great misfortunes that in a State which has such an admirable judiciary, such an unquestioned judiciary, there should be nevertheless a wide-spread distrust of the judicial system.

A gentleman yesterday asked me to yield because he said he had some queries to put to me. Those queries have not reached me in the interim, but I shall be very glad to answer them offhand.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I cannot resist the invitation of the gentleman to put these questions to him again. I looked for him after the session last night, but I did not find him.

These are categorical questions, Mr. Chairman, and I do not care to enter into any discussion on them, and I should like if possible to have a short reply.

My first question is: Does the gentleman believe in a Constitution as a frame of government as a guide to governmental policy and as a short statement of the principles which are essential to a democratic government? Does he believe in such a Constitution,—a written Constitution?

Mr. Hart: Certainly, I believe in it,—a written Constitution for the United States of America and for every Commonwealth. Is the gentleman answered?

Mr. Bates: My second question to the gentleman is, assuming that he believes in such a Constitution, does he believe that the legislative department and the executive department of the government, in common with all other people, ought to live up to and obey that Constitution?

Mr. Hart: Most certainly.

Mr. Bates: Assuming, Mr. Chairman, that he believes in a Constitution which all the people should obey and be governed by, does he believe that there ought to be some impartial and expert tribunal to decide whether or not the people have obeyed it, or not?

Mr. Hart: I believe that it is entirely possible to create democratic communities in which the courts have not the power to set aside the action of the legislative or executive departments. On the other hand, I believe that in Massachusetts we are accustomed to that method of government; that on the whole it works well,—works so well that according to the statement made upon the floor here yesterday, if there had been a two-thirds rule, by far the greater part of the setting aside of statutes would have been accomplished nevertheless; so that a proposal to limit the number of judges would not much interfere with the actual operation of the courts upon statutes. Are there any further questions?

Mr. Bates: My attention may have been distracted, but I have not heard the answer to my third question yet. My question is, assuming that the legislative department of government oversteps or disobeys the mandates of the Constitution, would the gentleman let the Legislature be the judge of its own acts? Would he let the executive department be the judge of its own acts or would he require some impartial tribunal interpreting and expounding that Constitution to be the judge of the acts of these other two departments of government?

Mr. Hart: I believe in Massachusetts it is better to have such a tribunal as it now possesses, such as is suggested by the gentleman, to place the legislative under proper restrictions by the judiciary.

One of my friends entering the hall remarked to me that apparently I expected to break every rule of this Convention, and I corrected him by saying that I expected to learn every rule before I got through. I thank all those who have assisted me in the teaching.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: During the first day's discussion on this resolution an allusion was made to the English constitutional system, which has been renewed this morning by my friend from Cambridge (Mr. Hart). On Friday last, if I understood him correctly, the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) referred to it in support of his contention that our theory of judicial control is extra-constitutional. There is, of course, an elemental and a fundamental difference between the English and the American systems. That difference is obvious, and perhaps it already has been referred to in this debate. As we all know, the Constitution of Great Britain is unwritten; it is based on precedent. There the law of the land is precisely what the English Parliament, which is well-nigh supreme, chooses in the light of precedent to make it. Here we have proceeded upon quite another theory. Here the measure of our liberties is sought, at least, to be exactly expressed in a written instrument, with its checks and its balances, and all that that implies.

Mr. Chairman, most bodies of men if uncurbed are prone to usurp power. This, I take it, is a very human weakness. In Massachusetts it has been our boast, and we have made good the boast, that every citizen, the most humble as well as the most powerful, finds his security in our laws. Suppose, now, that upon one plea or another the legislative branch of the government should transcend the bounds of its authority — suppose that it should encroach upon the rights of the citizen, whether weak or strong I care not, what is to be his remedy, or is he to have no remedy save that which appeals to the whim of a transient majority? I have heard as yet so far in this discussion no answer to this query, save that suggested in the resolution, which seems to me unwise, of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson).

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able speech of the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart). His thesis, if I understand him, is that the theory of judicial control is a modern, not to say a dangerous, innovation. Now, it may well be that the Dred Scott decision was the first conspicuous example of the exercise of this power. I do not question his statement on that score. But he goes farther and says that the theory was unknown in the Constitutional Convention of 1780. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any man now living can say with precision just what was or was not considered and debated in that Convention. The records are much too meager. But, sir, there were men sitting in the Constitutional Convention of 1820 who lived so close to the Revolutionary era as to make their testimony of the utmost value. Daniel Webster made a speech in that Convention upon the proposal that the judges should be removed only upon the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. There are some things which he said in that speech which are very pertinent to this discussion, and this seems to me an appropriate time to read them into the record for the benefit of this Convention. I quote from Mr. Webster's speech:

The Constitution being the supreme law, it follows, of course, that every act of the Legislature contrary to that law must be void. But what shall decide this question? Shall the Legislature itself decide it? If so, then the Constitution ceases to be a legal and becomes only a moral restraint on the Legislature. If they, and they only, are to judge whether their acts be conformable to the Constitution, then the Constitution is admonitory or advisory only; not legally binding; because if the construction of it rest wholly with them, their discretion, in particular cases, may be in favor of very erroneous and dangerous constructions. Hence the courts of law necessarily, when a case arises, must decide upon the validity of particular acts. These cases are rare, at least in this Commonwealth; but they would probably be less so, if the power of the judiciary in this respect were less respectable than it is.

I call particular attention to this language:

It is the theory and plan of the Constitution to restrain the Legislature, as well as other departments, and to subject their acts to judicial decision, whenever it appears that such acts infringe constitutional limits,—and without this check, no certain limitation could exist on the exercise of legislative power. The Constitution, for example, declares that the Legislature shall not suspend the benefit of the writ of Habeas Corpus, except under certain limitations. If a law should happen to be passed, restraining personal liberty, and an individual, feeling oppressed by it, should apply for his Habeas Corpus, must not the judges decide what is the benefit of Habeas Corpus, intended by the Constitution; what it is to suspend it, and whether the act of the Legislature does, in the given case, conform to the Constitution? All these questions would of course arise. The judge is bound by his oath to decide according to law. The Constitution is the supreme law. Any act of the Legislature, therefore, inconsistent with that supreme law, must yield to it; and any judge, seeing this inconsistency, and yet giving effect to the law, would violate both his duty and his oath. But it is evident that this power, to be useful, must be lodged in independent hands.

And, again,—this citation is not very long:

There is nothing after all so important to individuals as the upright administration of justice. This comes home to every man; life, liberty, reputation, property, all depend on this. No government does its duty to the people, which does not make ample and stable provision for the exercise of this part of its powers. Nor is it enough, that there are courts which will deal justly with mere private questions. We look to the judicial tribunal for protection against illegal or unconstitutional acts, from whatever quarter they may proceed. The courts of law, independent judges, and enlightened juries, are citadels of popular liberty, as well as temples of private justice. The most essential rights connected with political liberty are there canvassed, discussed and maintained; and if it should, at any time, so happen, that these rights should be invaded, there is no remedy, but a reliance on the courts to protect and vindicate them. There is danger also, that legislative bodies will sometimes pass laws interfering with other private rights, besides those connected with political liberty. Individuals are too apt to apply to the legislative power to interfere with private cases, or private property; and such applications sometimes meet with favor and support. There would be no security, if these interferences were not subject to some subsequent constitutional revision, where all parties could be heard, and justice administered according to standing laws. These considerations are among those which, in my opinion, render an independent judiciary equally essential to the preservation of private rights and public liberty.

Those words are as true to-day as they were the day they were uttered. In the Federal field this doctrine was early recognized. The truth is, of course, that it was accepted by the Federalists and not accepted by the Non-Federalists. I think the use of the word "oppose" would convey a wrong meaning there. There was very little discussion on this matter during the period preceding the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It was swamped in the then greater question of State sovereignty.

Judges possess, and no doubt at times display, human frailties, but what tribunal created by man is as likely to be as impartial, as unprejudiced and as fearless, as an independent judiciary? The doctrine of judicial control naturally and logically results from a system of government which rests on a written Constitution. It would be unfortunate of course if the public or private rights of the citizen were to be indicated by a close decision, say a four to three decision; but it would be still more deplorable if those same rights, while being upheld by a majority opinion, were nevertheless denied the citizen because one less than the two-thirds called for by the resolution of the gentleman from Brookline should fail to agree with the majority of the court. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this and kindred resolutions, and the amendments thereto, will not prevail.

Mr. McNamar of Quincy: I cannot help feeling that some of the speakers on the matter now before the Convention have lost the proper viewpoint of the question. Let me illustrate what I mean by giving you an example.

We will assume that the Legislature of 1917 passed a law providing that no man shall teach in any of our higher institutions of learning unless he has first obtained a license from the Board of Education, and further providing that whoever did so teach without such a license would be subject to two months' imprisonment for each year he had so taught, and that the law should take effect as of and from the first day of January, 1912. Now we will assume that the district attorney of Middlesex County, feeling the act of the Legislature should be obeyed, procured an indictment from the Middlesex grand jury against one of the learned professors of Harvard College, alleging a violation of the act since 1912, and an officer of the law takes the professor into custody and to the Cambridge jail. He procures bail; and being a wise professor he consults a lawyer. The lawyer tells him: "Why, you needn't worry. That act cannot be enforced. It is what we lawyers call an ex post facto law. It undertakes to make that an offence which happened before the act was passed. Impossible; that cannot lawfully be done." The professor, happy in the advice he gets, on the day assigned for the trial of his case in the Superior Court, takes his stand before the bar of justice where he is arraigned for trial. His counsel, having filed a proper motion, asks the court to dispose of the proceedings accordingly. Now what would the professor say if the judge of the court were to say: "The act of the Legislature should not be enforced. The Legislature has no power nor authority to pass an ex post facto law. It violates the Constitution of Massachusetts, Article XXIV of the Bill of Rights prohibiting the doing of any such thing. Your client should not have been placed at the bar of this court. But I turn to the records of the Constitutional Convention of 1917 and I find in the debate learned gentlemen saying that this court, being a court of inferior jurisdiction, not being the court of last resort, ought not to declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional. As I do not wish this court to do what it ought not to do, there is nothing for me to do if I follow the view of those gentlemen but to impose the penalty provided by the statute. I therefore sentence your client to ten months in the house of correction, two months for each of the past five years that he had had no license to teach from the Board of Education.” How would the professor feel then?

If the professor were a rich man as well as a wise one he would give the lawyer some hundreds of dollars to take his case to the Supreme Judicial Court; but if he were a poor man and found himself up against a law of that kind, and placed on trial before a judge adopting the views of those gentlemen, he would be compelled to submit to imprisonment. Would it be right? Would it spell true to your sense of justice and square dealing, to have such a result occur? To tie the hands of the lower court so that it cannot declare an act so oppressive and illegal as that act unconstitutional and give to a subject of this Commonwealth the right which is guaranteed to him by the Constitution? Will men rise in this chamber and say that a judge would be true to his oath of office if he denies to a defendant before him that freedom which the law of the land said should be his? And yet is not that what these gentlemen say when they urge that a judge of the lower court should not have the power to hold an act unconstitutional which is so obviously so?

Now our friend the professor carries his case to the Supreme Judicial Court, and there again the arguments in favor of the defendant are urged upon the full bench. And we will assume that after argument the Chief Justice of the Court says to the professor’s counsel: “All that you say is true; the act is directly in contradiction to the provisions of the State Constitution. But we read in the debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1917 that learned gentlemen there said that this court, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, has no right to declare an act unconstitutional; not wishing to usurp a power not constitutionally vested in us, we must refrain from declaring it unconstitutional, and therefore your client must serve ten months in jail.” To what a result would the reasoning adopted by these gentlemen lead us if we were to say that the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth shall not declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional? Now either the court has the power to declare legislative acts illegal or it has not that power. If it has the power from whence does it derive it? From the written law of the land and from its inherent power.

It is written in the Constitution of Massachusetts as clearly as words can make it that courts have that power and authority.

It has been said here by a learned gentleman that prior to the adoption of the Constitution of Massachusetts this power never was exercised by our courts. And yet go into the hall of this State House, stand before that picture of James Otis, the great patriot of revolutionary days, and call to mind the words that fell from his lips in 1761, nineteen years before this Constitution was adopted, and hear him declaring the power to rest in the courts of Massachusetts to declare an act unconstitutional when it was clearly so.

Mr. Hart: May I ask the gentleman if he knows what was the decision of the court in the case which he has mentioned.

Mr. McAnarney: I am referring to the speech of the patriot James Otis in which he said, speaking of the writs of assistance which were applied for: “Reason and the Constitution are both against this writ.
An act against the Constitution is void.” And in 1784 he published his pamphlet on the right of the British colonies in that respect.
James Otis in his speech made this significant argument:

Men cannot live apart and independent of each other; yet they cannot live together without contests. These contests require some arbitrator to determine them. The necessity of a common, indifferent and impartial judge makes all men seek one.

Here we have the authority of that learned patriot and one of the fathers of this Commonwealth. But we go back of him. We go back over a hundred years earlier and find in the records of the courts of this Commonwealth a decision bearing upon that very subject. In 1657 in Massachusetts the magistrates held void the vote of a town-meeting giving a minister a house as being against the fundamental law of Massachusetts, and declared that vote unconstitutional as being against the fundamental law of the Colony.

And do we have to go back to ancient times? Need we look outside the walls of the document that we are now considering? Let us see. Did the fathers think that there was no occasion for such a tribunal? Let us look at the Constitution, Chapter 6, Article VI:

All the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used and approved in the Province, Colony or State of Massachusetts Bay, and usually practiced on in the courts of law, shall still remain and be in full force, until altered or repealed by the Legislature;

Now note these words, because they state the whole case:

such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this Constitution.

So much of those laws as were not repugnant to the Constitution were to be retained. Who was going to decide what portions of those laws were repugnant to the Constitution? Were the two parties whose interests came in conflict left to decide it? Do you think the fathers did their work in such an incomplete manner? The Constitution declares who shall decide it. We turn to page 15 of the little booklet that we have here (State Constitution) Article XXIX of the Bill of Rights:

It is essential to the preservation of the rights of every individual, his life, liberty, property and character, that there be an impartial interpretation of the laws, and administration of justice. It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial and independent as the lot of humanity will admit.

If, therefore, a man were now to be brought up against a provision of our Colonial laws in conflict with the Constitution, he has a right to invoke the decision of the judges in the express language contained in the Constitution. You have in the Constitution itself an express declaration that the rights of citizens were to be determined by a free and impartial tribunal, to wit: The courts of this Commonwealth. In my argument I take it for granted that there is no occasion for my addressing the lawyers of the Convention on this subject, because they know that in the Constitution that right is clearly given to the courts.

Passing to another branch of this question: If our courts have that power and right, shall it be preserved to them? I want to speak for those who are not here to speak for themselves. I want to speak for the citizens of this Commonwealth who cannot afford to engage in lawsuits and litigation. I want to have it written into the records of these debates that here and now, — at least at this time, — a voice was raised in their behalf. Are we going to say to the citizens of this Commonwealth: "Here is your Constitution, your fundamental binding law. Within the rights which are granted to you therein you must live and within the limitations there expressed and implied the courts of the Commonwealth must protect those rights;” and in the same breath to say to them: “The rights guaranteed to you there we cannot say will at all times be preserved to you. The Legislature may at any time take them away.” Who rules in this Commonwealth of Massachusetts to-day, the people or the Legislature? The people rule. The people have made this Constitution; they have declared it; they have declared that the laws contained in it shall be the standing, governing law of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts until they, the people, change it. And yet if you were to follow the arguments of the gentlemen who have spoken against the report of the committee you will say that this Convention should take away that power from the people and give it to the Legislature, that in any one year the Legislature of Massachusetts should have the power to suspend or wipe out in whole or in part the Constitution of the State. Such an argument is an alarming argument to make in a tribunal of this kind and it ought not to receive weight or consideration. Is not that the logical conclusion a man must come to who follows the argument of those opposed to the report of the Judiciary Committee? If the Legislature has power to pass a single law which goes contrary to the Constitution and the courts have not the power to declare it unconstitutional, then the Legislature has the power to declare the whole Constitution void and there can be no tribunal in this State which shall say Nay to their will.

Mr. Chairman, it is suggested here as a remedy that we restrain the courts from declaring an act unconstitutional unless more than a majority shall approve of such conduct. The other day I was amused as well as interested in an appeal which was made by the venerable delegate from Brockton (Mr. Brown) when he stood in the front of this division and raised his voice and cried out to the “initiative and referendum” men of this Convention: “Where are you, initiative and referendum men? This is an initiative and referendum matter.” Well, if ever any matter that has been before this Convention was an initiative and referendum matter, the proposition that is now before the Convention is an initiative and referendum matter, because you are asked to say that the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court by a majority of one, or four against three, shall not be accepted as binding upon the people of this Commonwealth. Do you know where that will lead you? Adopt the report of the committee on the Initiative and Referendum. Put into it that principle. You will read in the report of that committee that, having complied with certain preliminaries, the signers of the petition may cause to be submitted to the people a proposition to amend the Constitution, and if that amendment of the Constitution be adopted by a majority of one the Constitution shall be considered as so amended.

Now if it is right to have written into the initiative and referendum law a provision that one vote in this Commonwealth, — a majority of one vote, — may amend the great fundamental law of the Commonwealth, if that is sound from that standpoint is it not equally sound to say that the vote of a majority of the members of the Supreme Judicial Court is sufficient to declare an act unconstitutional? The opponents of the initiative and referendum urge that in such a case the new amendment would be adopted by one vote,—as these other gentlemen charge that an act declared unconstitutional by a majority of one, would be so declared by one judge. But you and I know, sir, that the reasoning is not true which says that when there is a mere majority, a majority of one, that one man's vote is the vote that declares the act accepted or the amendment adopted to our Constitution. It is not stating the case fairly to so state. If we have 500,000 votes cast in an election and 250,001 votes are for the amendment, it is not right, it is not stating the case accurately to say that that one vote is what adopts the amendment. It is that one vote and the other 250,000; it is the 250,001 votes that adopt the amendment and not the one vote. So when we are discussing a majority decision of the Supreme Judicial Court it is not stating it accurately, it is not stating it correctly, to say that it is a decision of one man that declares an act unconstitutional. It is not the decision of one man; it is the decision of one judge and three other judges. It is the decision of four men that declares the act unconstitutional. And it is that reasoning, I apprehend, which will lead many men to vote for, if they do vote for, that provision of the committee's report on the initiative and referendum.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are not approaching this matter from the proper angle when we argue that a decision of four members of our Supreme Judicial Court is the decision of the fourth man, the deciding judge, in favor of declaring an act unconstitutional.

But there is more than that. If I have not referred to it already I wish to refer to it now. The Constitution provides how it shall be amended. Are we satisfied with the method provided in the Constitution to amend it? Some members of this Convention are, others are not. They want the additional relief which may be afforded by the proposed initiative and referendum law. If an initiative and referendum law should be adopted, then we shall have two methods of amending our Constitution and will not that be enough? Will you not be satisfied with that? Will you want a third method of amending the Constitution? By a mere legislative act? Why, what was the basis of this argument which has been advanced—

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: If the Legislature of Massachusetts passes a Workmen's Compensation Act and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court nullifies or varies an essential part of the Workmen's Compensation Act, what remedy have the people to restrain the Justices in such a case?

Mr. McAnarney: May I inquire of the learned gentleman, did the Chief Justice of our Supreme Judicial Court make a ruling declaring the Workmen's Compensation Act to be unconstitutional, or did he merely send down a decision as to the application of a certain provision of that law?

Mr. Kenny: In order to answer that I may say that the Legislature passed the Workmen's Compensation Act and said that a man injured in the course of his employment was entitled to compensation. Mr. Patrick Donahue, a travelling salesman, was injured as a travelling salesman on the streets of Lowell in the course of his employment, and Chief Justice Rugg said that he was not entitled to compensation.

Mr. McAnarney: I have here that decision, because my friend referred to it yesterday, the case of Donahue. The opinion was rendered by Mr. Justice Crosby and not by Chief Justice Rugg, and in that opinion the court does not declare the act unconstitutional. The court makes no criticism or question as to that act. It indirectly acknowledges it and approves it and merely declares that the man when he met with his injury was not engaged within the scope of his employment, a question that has nothing to do with the subject-matter before this Convention. And if the gentleman doubts my interpretation of that law let him read to you the decision in the Donahue case. I had assumed that all lawyers were familiar with that decision. Mr. Chairman, the great big question back of this whole proposition is this: Shall we give to the Legislature the power of amending the Constitution of Massachusetts?
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

Mr. Kenny: Will the gentleman kindly answer my question? I do not think he has answered my question.

Mr. McAnarney: Yes, Mr. Chairman, if I have not answered I will answer it very readily. If the court's decision, which had nothing to do with the constitutionality of that act, is unsatisfactory, all that those who find fault with that act or decision have to do, — and it is the true remedy in cases of that kind, — is to go to the Legislature and have an act passed which shall extend the scope of the law they complain of and make it applicable to the condition of facts they are concerned with. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come back to where I was at the time of my last interruption. Are we going to say to the Legislature of Massachusetts: "We give to you a third method of amending our Constitution"? Have we not heard during the past few years, scattered broadcast throughout the Commonwealth, a charge, — was it not put into the annual message of one of the Governors of this Commonwealth, — that there is a form of government known as "invisible government," which sometimes controls administrations and directs legislation in Massachusetts? And are we prepared to place the Constitution of Massachusetts and the amendments to that Constitution in the hands of a Legislature that may be under the control, influence and domination of this invisible form of government? Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the men who stand here speaking for the laboring classes, for laboring men, instead of being arrayed against the Judiciary Committee should be fighting shoulder to shoulder with the Judiciary Committee, because we want to stop any corruption on the part of the Legislature, to prevent any giving up by the Legislature to the hypnotic power or eloquence of any great leader or commanding influence that may dominate or secure the passage of special legislation at any particular time, contrary to the principles of the Constitution.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the time never will come in Massachusetts when that great fundamental law which defines our liberties and under whose protection we exercise all our rights shall be declared, by such a mere passing creature of the hour as the Legislature of any one year, a mere "scrap of paper." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I have noticed that there are fifteen resolutions bearing upon some phase of judicial reform that have been considered by the committee on the Judiciary. Each and every one of those resolutions is reported "Ought not to pass." I contend, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Convention, that this number of resolutions, each striving in some one way to limit the excessive, or what seems to the proponents of those resolutions the excessive, power of the judiciary, represents a large force in public opinion in this Commonwealth. I believe that that force cannot be ignored. Some who have spoken here, more or less dimly recognized that there are social forces at work. I remember that the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

Hart) has referred somewhat or in part to those social forces. I know that my venerable friend from Brockton (Mr. Brown) more than any one else probably has sensed the social forces that are at work not only in the Nation but in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and those social forces reflect themselves in a desire for a reform in the judiciary.

Although we are considering at this time resolution No. 47, I believe other resolutions that follow are very closely related to that resolution. And when we dispose of that, if we dispose of it intelligently and in a manner that shall be at least partially satisfactory, there is a possibility that the other resolutions bearing upon the same matter will not be urged with such excessive zeal as they will otherwise.

I should like to call to your attention, — some of you possibly have read this item that appeared in some of the Boston papers, — an article by Roger W. Babson, in which he refers to certain tendencies that are present throughout the world. I have heard muttered imprecations against honest lawyers who have attempted to get up here and who have assumed to have an opinion upon the judiciary.
It has been felt, no doubt, that they have been encroaching upon a sacred jurisdiction. Nevertheless, they are the spokesmen and have the clearest understanding of those social tendencies that are at work, and I think it might be well for the delegates to give some consideration to this wide-spread demand.

It may seem to some of the very dignified looking gentlemen here, who have expressed some contempt for the voice of labor that has been heard persistently in this Convention through the gentleman from Brockton, that they can depend upon the “iron heel” to crush any manifestations of industrial or social unrest. But I really believe, gentlemen, speaking as one who wishes to see stability in government, one who wishes to see these great social problems intelligently met and solved,— I say that those men are not giving due consideration to the real facts of our day. The gentleman from Lynn in the center of the division (Mr. Bauer) referred to something that I believe,— at least that I am in full accord with, — and that was that “from his observation, a long observation of the acts of the judiciary,” he was convinced that the social and economic environment of the several members of the judiciary to a large extent moulded their decisions upon any fundamental matter. In other words, they reflected the policy that they themselves approved, and they disapproved any policy that they themselves opposed. Their own environment had tended to determine their opinion. I believe that that cannot be gainsaid. I believe it is shown by the differences of opinion that have existed when certain decisions have been made. I refer particularly to the case referred to by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) which was known as the Income Tax Case. This was referred to yesterday as a “judicial scandal,” and as evidence that it was such and held to be such by certain members of the Supreme Court, I will read what the gentleman who wrote the opinion held. I believe it bears out fully what the gentleman from Brookline stated —
Mr. Montague of Boston: I desire to ask whether the gentleman is referring to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts or to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. Donovan: I will answer that in this case I am referring to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe that the principle involved in our State is the same principle involved in the criticism made against the Federal judiciary. It might be somewhat enlightening to hear the opinion as expressed by Mr. Justice Field, who wrote the decision in the matter in question, the Income Tax Law. I believe that this opinion is very pertinent to the present situation and is no doubt about the same line of argument that will be used by those who oppose any change in the Massachusetts judiciary. Mr. Justice Field writes as follows:

The present assault upon capital is but the beginning. It will be but the stepping-stone to others, larger and more sweeping, till our political contests will become a war of the poor against the rich; a war constantly growing in intensity and bitterness. If the purely arbitrary limitation of $4,000 in the present law be sustained, none having less than that amount of income being assessed or taxed for the support of the government, the limitation of future Congresses may be fixed at a much larger sum, at $5,000, $10,000, or $20,000; parties possessing an income of that amount alone being bound to bear the burdens of government; or the limitation may be designated at such an amount as a board of "walking delegates" may deem necessary.

Now it does not require a lawyer to perceive that the Income Tax Law was declared unconstitutional because the court did not approve of the policy of taxing incomes.

I have heard many learned gentlemen in this body uphold the integrity, the honesty and the goodness of the Massachusetts judiciary. I do not combat that argument in any way; I make no such attempt. It is not the contention that they are bad men; but bad interpretations of law have been made by good men, at times, and it is merely the power that has been delegated, — or not delegated, but usurped rather, — by the judiciary that we as representatives of a certain part of the people are opposed to.

After the Income Tax decision another decision a short time later that caused considerable criticism was that under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law relating to the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases. There was considerable criticism of that decision. That perhaps was not such a scandal as the other, but at least it called forth considerable wide-spread criticism. The part that I am particularly interested in, however, was the interpretation of that law, the same Sherman Anti-Trust Law, which referred to the Danbury Hatters' Case. That is peculiarly pertinent at this time, because we in this Convention must consider matters later on that are very closely related to that decision —

Mr. Montague: I should like to ask if the Danbury Hatters' Case, so called, was decided in any one of its phases by any court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts?

Mr. Donovan: No. I believe, gentlemen, that the principle involved here is the principle —

Mr. Brown: I would ask whether the courts of Massachusetts are not bound to take cognizance of the decisions of the Danbury case in the United States courts if they decide any case here?

Mr. Donovan: I would answer, they have, by all means, in my estimation. The decision in the Danbury Hatters' Case, I believe, is very pertinent to the deliberations of this body, because I understand that later on there are some questions to come before the Committee of the Whole and before this Convention which are a result of that decision. I am going to quote from the dissenting opinion written by Mr. Justice Harlan of the United States Supreme Court. This has reference particularly to the decision upon the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, but it expresses, I believe, the wide-spread demand that is now evidenced by the fifteen resolutions that are before this Convention,—the wide-spread demand of the people for some change. This is what he writes:

When the American people come to the conclusion that the judiciary of this land is usurping to itself the functions of the legislative department of the government, and by judicial construction only is declaring what is the public policy of the United States, we will find trouble. Ninety millions of people—

now increased to a hundred millions—

all sorts of people with all sorts of opinions—are not going to submit to the usurpation by the judiciary of the functions of other departments of the government, and the power on its part to declare what is the public policy of the United States.

So you will see, gentlemen, that the dissenters in this committee are not entirely alone; that we have such men as Mr. Justice Harlan, who also recognizes the right of the people to modify or to reform the judiciary.

Now underneath all questions that we are to consider here, from my viewpoint,—it may be a somewhat narrow point of view in the opinion of some of the learned gentlemen who have opposed any change,—but in my point of view the basic question will come before this committee later on, and it is a question that has been touched upon by other speakers who have discussed this matter. It was not my intention, if we could avoid it, to project into this discussion anything relating to the real fundamental, basic question which is to be given consideration later on. But I will mention before closing that the question of labor as a property right is a matter that we cannot overlook and a matter that is vitally concerned with this question that we have now before us.

There is a Latin legal maxim which says: “It is the office of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction.” One in my position can understand how a craft-conscious organization like the Lawyers’ Union should seek to maintain and extend their jurisdiction, but it is equally plain that the people must oppose too great an extension of such power.

Mr. Costello of Boston: There was a statement made yesterday by a member in the second division from Lynn (Mr. Bauer) and repeated a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Donovan) on this question. From the observation of the member from Lynn he had come to the conclusion, after examining the decisions of various States, that those decisions in a great measure were governed by the social and economic environments of the men making them. He has not cited one instance in Massachusetts to bear out that assertion of his. I, on the contrary, have gone to the trouble of finding a decision of great interest to the laboring men of this Commonwealth, one of their landmarks in our legal history, the great case of Vegelahn v. Gunther, 167 Mass. 92, in which case the dissenting opinion on the right of the laboring man to peacefully picket was given by that aristocrat of aristocrats, Oliver Wendell Holmes. In Massachusetts, then, the case that I have found there seems to warrant the conclusion that if his remarks apply to other States they do not apply in any measure to Massachusetts' judicial history. For one moment may I trespass on your time to read what Oliver Wendell Holmes said in the peaceful picketing case:

One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services, and that of society, disguised under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is patent and powerful. Combination on the other is the necessary and desirable counterpart, if the battle is to be carried on in a fair and equal way.

If it be true that working-men may combine with a view, among other things, to getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, it must be true that when combined they have the same liberty that combined capital has to support their interests by argument, persuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they otherwise lawfully control. [Vegealan v. Gunter, 167 Mass. 92, 108.]

Those are the kind of decisions in Massachusetts that make us proud of our judicial system. Everybody knows the social environment of the man who gave that opinion,—born, bred and reared an aristocrat. Never by association was he considered a laboring man, and that statement of the gentleman from Lynn is not borne out by the history of our judicial system. I come from one of the biggest labor sections in this Commonwealth, the Roxbury district in the city of Boston. I came here unpledged or unhampered by any pledge to any proposition of any kind. I came here with the mandate of the people over my head to do that which I thought was the proper thing for me to do to protect the Constitution of Massachusetts,—not the Constitution of Illinois, not the Constitution of New York; but to remedy those evils that exist, if any do exist, in the Constitution of Massachusetts. Every man who has taken this floor during this period of debate has confined himself to examples and illustrations that are entirely without the confines of this Commonwealth. Nobody has said for one moment that the evil sought to be remedied by this proposed amendment or the original proposition has ever been in Massachusetts.

Mr. HERBERT A. KENNY of Boston: The gentleman refers to Oliver Wendell Holmes as the Justice making those remarks. Was it not a dissenting opinion?

Mr. COSTELLO: Yes, sir, it was a dissenting opinion. I made that remark prefacing my reading of the citation. But, gentlemen, it seems to me that we ought to strike at the root where the evil exists. If the evil exists in the Federal system why not go to the Congress of the United States? And I would suggest that this is the most propitious time that you can go there. It is a time that it is easy to get amendments to the Constitution. You can get it tacked onto the food bill, the same as the Constitution of the United States has been sought to be amended in a certain particular by adopting a proposition and calling it an emergency measure. This matter does not affect Massachusetts. We are here to deal with the Constitution that we were born under, we have lived under and of which we are proud, and let every man here stand for that Constitution that has made us grow to full manhood and prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. WASHBURN of Worcester: I had not intended to participate in this discussion. I belong to the class of "non lawyers" referred to by my friend in the first division. I have, to be sure, an attenuated connection with the bar of which I am very proud, but a connection not close enough to warrant me in discussing with any degree of authority this important question which is now before the committee. I desire, however, to address a few words to the laymen of the Convention which perhaps may have some bearing upon the question under discussion. I am speaking for the moment as a man who now, at least, is earning his bread by the sweat of his brow [laughter], which I think entitles me to the attention of the committee. I said a moment ago that I have had no intention of projecting myself into this debate, which is literally true. The presence of these fugitive notes on my desk is what has prompted me to speak, although they were not prepared with any particular reference to this occasion. I make the statement deliberately that there has been no time during the last 25 years when the criticisms we have heard of the judiciary were less justified than now, and that there has not been a time in the judicial history of Massachusetts when the courts have been more responsive than they are now to what we are pleased to call public opinion. It is for that reason and because of that conviction that I purpose to resist any attempt to make any change in the existing law.

While I am not a practicing lawyer, I venture now and then to read some of the decisions of the courts. I have read enough of them to know that this is not a new question, but has been discussed in this Commonwealth and in the country for over a hundred years.

In 5 Mass. 524, 533, the following statement occurs: —

It is true that the Legislature, in consequence of their construction of the Constitution, cannot make laws repugnant to it. But every department of government, invested with certain constitutional powers, must, in the first instance, but not excursively, be the judge of its powers, or it could not act. And certainly the construction of the Constitution by the Legislature ought to have great weight, and not be overruled, unless manifestly erroneous.

And in 1812 Chancellor Waties of South Carolina said upon this subject: —

... The interference of the judiciary with legislative acts, if frequent or on dubious grounds, might occasion so great a jealousy of this power, and so general a prejudice against it as to lead to measures ending in the total overthrow of the independence of the judges, and so of the best preservative of their Constitution. The validity of the law ought not, then, to be questioned unless it is so obviously repugnant to the Constitution that, when pointed out by the judges, all men of sense and reflection in the community may perceive the repugnancy. By such a cautious exercise of this judicial check, no jealousy of it will be excited, the public confidence in it will be promoted, and its salutary effects be justly and fully appreciated.

This question of the interference, as it is termed, of the judiciary with the exercise of the legislative power, is one which always has been recognized, which sometimes has aroused criticism, sometimes even more than that, protest; and sometimes even more than that, a well-conceived determination among certain of our people to revolt against what they have termed the tyranny of the courts. This feeling has been manifested more particularly against the disposition of the courts to restrain the exercise by the Legislature of the police power, and the position has been taken, — my friend from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) took it this morning, — that the people and not the courts should constitute the tribunal by which this question is to be ultimately determined.
Those of us who are called conservatives, on the other hand, prefer to rely upon the influence of public opinion on the courts to correct any evils of this sort that may appear from time to time in judicial decisions.

There is nothing, gentlemen of the committee, that so impresses a truth as an apt illustration. I shall not attempt to engage your attention long, but I wish to refer to three cases in the courts, all of which at the time challenged criticism, complaint, outcry, denunciation of the judiciary, but every one of which within a very few years was reversed; and I mention these cases to demonstrate what I believe to be the fact, that an honest and an independent judiciary, without coercion, in the orderly progress of events, ultimately will correct any mistakes that it may make.

The first case to which I call your attention is that of Sarah Knisley v. Pratt, 148 N. Y. 372, decided in February, 1896. The court held that a woman employee who had assumed the risk of operating a dangerous machine, not safeguarded as the law required, could not recover for the loss of an arm. This case was overruled in Fitiswater v. Warren, 206 N. Y. 355, decided in October, 1912. The court held in this case that a servant does not assume the risk caused by a master's violation of the law.

The next case is entitled The People v. Williams, 189 N. Y. 131, decided in June, 1907. The court held unconstitutional a provision in the labor law of New York which prohibited the employment of an adult female in a factory, — labor legislation, you see, — before six o'clock in the morning or after nine o'clock in the evening. The reason given was that it violated the constitutional provisions guaranteeing to every citizen the right to pursue any lawful employment in a lawful manner, and was discriminative against female citizens in denying to them equal rights with men with respect to liberty of person or of contract. It cannot be upheld, the court went on to say, as a proper exercise of the police power, having for its purpose the preservation of the health of female citizens, since it arbitrarily takes away the right of a woman to labor in a factory during the prohibited hours, without any reference to the number of hours of such labor or the healthfulness of the employment. That was the judgment of the court, denounced as harsh, unfeeling and unsympathetic with the rights of womanhood. How long did it take the court to be influenced by public opinion? Why, it took only eight years, because in a case arising in 1915, — People v. Schweinler Press, 214 N. Y. 395, — the court sustained a similar statute providing “that no woman shall work in any factory in the State before six o'clock in the morning or after ten o'clock in the evening,” and held that the law entitled “period of rest at night for women” violated no provision of the Federal law or State Constitution. Who here or elsewhere says the court is not responsive to an intelligent public opinion? In another case, decided in 1911, a case that was discussed from one end of the country to the other, — Ives v. South Buffalo R. R. Co., 201 N. Y. 271, — the court held unconstitutional under both Federal and State Constitutions a law relating to “workmen's compensation in certain dangerous employments” and aroused a torrent of criticism of the courts of New York in particular and the courts of the country in general. How was that condition remedied? Not in any violent way. The Constitution of New
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

York was amended. Another act was passed, and, in Jenson v. Southern Pacific, 215 N. Y. 514, decided in July, 1915, the court held that the Workmen's Compensation Law is not violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution for taking property without due process of law . . . and is a valid enactment within the police power of the State for the promotion of the general welfare.

The law has since been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I ask every delegate who favors now, or ever did favor, the recall of judicial decisions, every delegate who would restrict the right of the courts to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation, to recognize the fact that the courts, sometimes slowly but always surely, have responded to the best public opinion.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: Every delegate to this Convention is under oath to support the Constitution. We who are defending the Constitution here to-day are not indulging in passion or in eloquence in order to try to induce you to remain true to your oath. We are leaving it to the other side to use those tactics, in their attempt to induce you to become backsliders.

Last week I called to the attention of every delegate the fact that four times the Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787 debated, and almost unanimously, each time, defeated the proposition of giving to the courts the right to interpret constitutionality, and also we quoted from our State Constitution, Article XX, Part I, showing that the power to suspend the laws "ought never to be exercised but by the Legislature, or by authority derived from it;" and also quoted Article XXX, Part I, which says that "the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them,"—and neither the Federal nor the State Constitution has been amended contrary to what I have just stated,—in other words, it has not been amended in such a way as to give to the courts this authority. And no one in debate has shown that it has been amended in that way, or that the courts ever have been given that authority, despite which you are appealed to to bear down against our Constitution in this respect.

Article VI, Chapter VI, Part 2, of our State Constitution, says that the laws in force at the time of the adoption of our State Constitution shall remain in force until repealed by the Legislature, except in so far as repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this Constitution. That limited the Legislature and limited the courts in their power, and yet a member of the bar has quoted that same section here and claimed that that gives the courts the right to interpret the constitutionality of legislation enacted later by the Legislature, if I heard him aright. Those are the tactics that have been pursued here each day on this question, to reverse existing requirements, existing restrictions rather; in other words, in their attempt to overturn our Constitution in this respect.

The restrictions defining the power of the courts contained in the Federal and State Constitutions and laws have been cited and claimed to give the courts the power to interpret constitutionality. If you listened quietly, or if you read for yourself what they were quoting from,—and you can understand it better by reading than you can by listening to some one in this large chamber,—if you read for yourself you found out that what they quoted simply defined the power of the courts in regard to interpreting and enforcing laws, and that is a function the Constitution gives the courts. What they quoted did not give the courts the power to suspend laws or abrogate laws after they had been enacted. Daniel Webster, Alexander Hamilton and other famous forefathers have been quoted as believing that the courts should have this power. What of it? If they thought that, they had a right to their opinion; but their opinion did not prevail with the majority and has not been put in the Constitution, so why should we go by their opinion rather than by the Constitution which we have taken an oath to support? When those forefathers are referred to, those who quote them indulge in great eloquence in defence of the forefathers. Do they believe that those forefathers, need any defence here?

It has been said that ex post facto laws are forbidden by the Constitution. During my past eight years' service in the Legislature no attempt to pass an ex post facto law was made, nor do I understand that any ex post facto law has been enacted for a generation or more in this State. Why should so much time be consumed as was consumed in talking ex post facto and everything connected therewith when it does not enter into the argument before the Convention, the question here discussed? Why, speakers appear before the aliens of this State and refer to the fact that no ex post facto law can be passed, and they also refer to the fact that every citizen of this State has the constitutional right to introduce a law into our Legislature. Those are the two arguments I hear year after year from politicians, yet no citizen can introduce directly a bill into the Legislature; legislative rules forbid it. Even in a monarchy they may ask a representative to introduce a law.

The ex-Attorney-General, who represents large corporations before the Legislature annually, and who yesterday presided in the Committee of the Whole, has on the calendar put in a defence on two propositions, — you will find it on page 21 of the Docket of the Committee of the Whole, documents Nos. 313 and 314, — giving the courts still greater power than they now exercise. I wish you would read those documents (Nos. 313 and 314), and see if you think it wise to adopt them, and whether you are surprised that the man who favors those will also take the floor in a defence of the usurped power now exercised by the courts.

The opposition said, repeatedly, that we who are defending the Constitution want the Legislature to be its own judge of what is constitutional, and the sole judge. We do not make any such claim. We claim that the people, the source of power, should be the final judge if the Legislature oversteps the Constitution, and in this we are backed up by one specific section of the State Constitution itself. Article V, Part 1, of the State Constitution says: "All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them." That is what we have been trying to advocate here for the past several days, and yet we are told that that does not exist in the Constitution and that these other provisions of the Constitution are non-existent. We each and all have the Constitution here. Why should we not support its provisions as long as they are in line with the republican form of government?
The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in the early nineties decided that the Legislature had no right to voluntarily submit any law to a State wide referendum. Think of that in a republic! That decision was quoted on the floor of this House, by a man who is now a delegate in this Convention, after I had had a State wide referendum added to a law by a roll-call vote of 160 to 23 in the House of Representatives. He quoted that as a decision of about 25 years previous. The next two years ex-Senator Tinkham and myself, in turn, introduced an amendment to the Constitution, and got the Constitution amended so that the Legislature should have the power to submit propositions to State wide referendum; and under it many laws have been referred to the people. That was a case where a court was opposed to the right of the Legislature to enact laws and of the people to have that law enacted, but the people decided that the Legislature should have that right and that the Legislature was right in the premises.

I hope that we shall not listen to those members of the lawyers' union, the high priced, high salaried members of the union, who crack the whip over the more humble members of the profession. I am not a lawyer, but it is told to us laymen by many of these humble lawyers of the House that they know we are right, but that they have to practice before the courts, and so they dare not take the chance of standing up for what we are fighting for and which they have taken an oath to support. They tell us in private what they dare not say in public.

Why should we stand by an adverse report, a report which has been turned down by a committee every member of which is a member in good standing in the lawyers' union? Every proposition of this or a similar nature goes before a committee composed entirely of lawyers, and it gets turned down each time it appears, but that does not make it right. The Constitution is superior to any committee composed of lawyers.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn withdrew his motion that the resolution be recommitted to the committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CREAMER: The announcement I wish to make is that I accept as a friendly amendment the resolution of the gentleman from Brookline, which I think you have before you:

No law duly enacted by the General Court shall be nullified as unconstitutional except by the Supreme Judicial Court with the concurrence of not less than two-thirds of all the judges thereof.

In making this announcement I want to say very briefly that, referring to the remarks of the delegate from Quincy, I do wish to preserve the right of the judiciary to pass upon legislative enactments, but I am just as much opposed to the whims of a judicial majority as to the whims of any other majority. I believe that minority rights are just as much entitled to protection from the whims of a majority of judges as they are from the whims of a majority of the Legislature.

Mr. BROWN: When I heard the gentleman from Boston, for whom I have great regard, cite James Otis in support of his contention, I would that I might find the eloquence of Wendell Phillips, who, when in Faneuil Hall certain men were invoked as being in favor of slavery, talked of the recreant Americans. There never has been given to James Otis all the credit that was due to him as a leading figure that inspired the Revolution. James Otis was against the decision of English authority. But James Otis, who would have taken the leading position, was deprived of that honor by poor health. As he mourned in his home he made one wish, and that was that if the Almighty was kind to him when he passed out that he might die by a stroke of lightning. That is the way that Otis died, and after that his sister carried on that particular work. Otis was altogether against the idea of the sacredness of authority. And Sam Adams, where was he? On taking the degree of Master in 1743 in Harvard College, he proposed the following question: "Whether it be lawful to resist the supreme magistrate if the Commonwealth cannot be otherwise preserved?" He maintained the affirmative.

Can it be said that Sam Adams, who had so much to do with this Constitution, wrote that the courts were sacred? The leading controversy in the minds of men of the time the Constitution was written was that of centralization on one side and the sovereignty of the States on the other side.

Montesquieu, who gave about twenty years of study to the science of government, wrote his opinions on a system of checks and balances. He said a little something about the English government and its triparte formation. That pleased Blackstone, who gave out his commentary about that the same time. Adam Smith produced his Wealth of Nations. Blackstone spoke favorably of Montesquieu and his spirit of laws.

Burke said in his remarks on the freedom of the Colonies that there were more copies of Blackstone read in this Colony than there were in the whole of England; there had been more sold. I am intending to argue that these men knew this whole subject better than it is known in this Convention. I say that on the ground that I hear men again and again here reverberate the idea that this Constitution is so sacred that we must not touch it even though we do think it is insufficient. We should conceive the possibility that these men did not have before them the conditions of to-day. There is a body of men in this Commonwealth with whom their natural right, — their natural right to live, their right to a living wage, their right to protect the woman from labor that crushes, the right to save the child from any labor that is detrimental, — is so closely identified with their sense of duty and their conscience that they line up alongside of the old Abolitionists for the second edition of the "irrepressible conflict"; and to declare that without authority no one may take the bread which they have not earned from the mouth of labor. Stand face to face with the problem. Understand that all through this Nation this conflict is raging. Understand that the social question is here. When you talk about "invisible government," do you mean organized labor, or do you mean organized privilege? If you mean organized privilege I leave it to the gentleman who is attacked to defend it. But if you mean organized labor I undertake to tell you that it wants nothing but the common welfare. Yes, their power does show itself. You had your compulsory arbitration in the Adamson bill, and it is out, and it was labor that took it out, and it was taken out because it was for the common welfare.

The idea of the initiative and referendum has developed because of this conflict. It developed because of these rulings on these social questions. Woman, on whom we depend for the safety of the republic, evidences what she has been subjected to in her offspring; and her men are not able to defend the Commonwealth and the Nation; they are exempt because of physical infirmities thus imposed upon them. You are face to face with this problem. The Convention can remedy the trouble partially by limiting the power of the judiciary to decide these social questions,—questions that are political rather than judicial. I hope that the gentleman who aspired to be the President of this Convention and who has spoken recently on this subject in West Virginia will expound the same doctrine concerning the judiciary system in Massachusetts and in this Convention.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to give away time enough for my friend, Mr. Creamer. I think I have got rid of all I should at this particular moment and I shall allow Mr. Creamer to make his motion if he is here. [A pause.]

Mr. Creamer: I move that the amendment offered by the delegate from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) be substituted for mine.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I regret that so important a subject comes before this Convention in Committee of the Whole for discussion at so inopportune a time. However strenuous we may be in our assertion of midsummer performance of duty, there is such a thing as "midsummer madness." I venture to think that there have been indications of midsummer madness in some of the discussion which has here taken place. I should like to discuss soberly, uneloquently, in common-sense fashion, a matter of real importance,—saying a few things in support of the amendment which I offered yesterday.

It is to repeat what I said yesterday, that I believe that the decision was properly made that the constitutionality of statutes should be finally determined by the judicial, and not by the legislative, branch. I recognize the arguments on the other side. I do not accept them. But I repeat again, when I say that such decisions as have been made, with considerable frequency in some other States, have deprived their courts of the moral power and prestige that ought to have been theirs; that some decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have lessened the respect and prestige of that great court; and that it is therefore now for us in Massachusetts a seasonable time to consider the same danger that has proved so actual an experience in the Federal court and in the courts of some other States, and to provide, if we may, that ours shall be a happier lot.

Most that was said during the morning,—and I say it with entire respect,—had nothing to do with the subject-matter which was before us; at any rate, nothing to do with this very moderate and conservative amendment. So far as there was athletic eloquence in favor of taking away from the courts the right finally to determine the constitutionality of a statute, I have nothing to say in support of that athletic eloquence. On the other hand it is pleasing to know that the learned gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) is of the opinion that the courts of New York hold as devoutly as he holds that "woman, lovely woman," ought not to be trammeled in "her right to labor." I enjoyed very much the regained freedom of the Harvard professor,—who had been put in durance vile by the eloquent gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McNarney) under an ex post facto law enacted by the Legislature of Massachusetts, consisting of two branches, and signed by the Governor,—retroacting five years only, I believe. Certainly he rescinded that gentleman, with the help of the towering constitutional intellect of some inferior or police court judge,—probably in Quincy,—very nobly from the trammels of a law thus enacted in the very teeth of our Constitution.

But, passing that,—for it is all persiflage,—let us talk sense. The facts are, as we all know, that all officials take an oath to obey the Constitution of the Commonwealth; that every legislator and the Governor takes that oath. It is therefore simply a practical question as to where you can get the best final decision as to whether that oath has been kept. That is all there is to the question. Now, I agree that it ought to be finally determined by the judiciary,—not because they necessarily are purer or know more than the Senate or the House of Representatives.

To digress for a moment into the question of comparative merit: I have had occasion in the last three months to read with more industry than ever before in my entire life the debates in the Senate of the United States, for which they have been roundly abused in a good many newspapers. I should like to abuse them myself for some things they have done and have not done. But I am impressed with this fact: You can pick out from the present Senate of the United States nine just as good, just as conscientious lawyers, as constitute the present Supreme Court of the United States. They may not know quite so much about the very last decision that has been made, but they are equally able, they are equally conscientious, they are equally learned in all that makes up the thoroughgoing American lawyer. There never has been a time in the quarter of a century or more that I have known with some intimacy the Legislature of Massachusetts that there has not been in both Houses a substantial number of lawyers just as competent as the average of the men on both benches. I will not say that there have been men in the Legislature demonstrated equal at that time to the best of our experienced judges, but it is a matter of common knowledge that there is hardly a man on the bench now who has not at some time served in a legislative capacity.

And so I come back and say it is simply a question of plain common sense, viz.:- Where can you get the safest and best decision of the question as to whether any particular enactment is or is not accordant with the fundamental law which is binding upon us all? I say that that best and final decision should be made by the judiciary. And my moderate suggestion is for such modification of the present system that this power be exercised only by the court of last resort; that no bare majority should set up its decision, as against the deliberate judgment of both branches of the Legislature and the Governor, not infrequently advised, if the question be a close one, by the Attorney-General, who sometimes knows some constitutional law.

Now, we have had everything here from eloquence about James Otis down to our incarcerated ex post facto Harvard professor. Let us brush that sort of stuff all aside and come right to the point. It is undeniable that this Convention will fall very far short of its duty if it does not recognize that there is in America a substantial feeling of distrust in our courts. I rejoice to say that there is less of it in Massachusetts, and deservedly less of it in Massachusetts, than elsewhere. But we should be blind to the signs of the times if in this Constitutional Convention we failed to recognize social and economic facts; failed to recognize that all over this country there have been propositions destructive in our view, — in my view, — of the very foundations of judicially declared and determined liberty.

It is not a pleasant thing to say, but I think it is a pertinent and fit thing to say: There have been speeches made on this floor which, in lack of enlightenment and in lack of recognition of the signs of the times, seemed to me to be fairly comparable with the speeches of the German Junkers. We cannot afford to have in Massachusetts in these times, in places of important power, men who have the mental and moral equipment, and the social and economic point of view, of the German Junker. It is time to deal, with an open and an honest mind, with facts as they are, with tendencies as they are, with the forces that are seething underneath.

You will pardon me if I give you a little bit of a personal and official touch. I happen to be United States Attorney in this district. It has fallen to my lot in the past three years to deal with certain phenomena, actual or threatened, socialistic, anarchistic, and all the other istic kinds, as never before. That has been, as you will easily understand, particularly true since war was declared. I venture to think that I have an opportunity to know something about what is seething underneath in this country that some of you lack the opportunity of knowing; and I am addressing you now soberly, as a man who yields to no one in pride in Massachusetts history, in confidence in the Massachusetts judiciary, when I ask you to approach this question soberly and with open mind, and not be carried off your feet by flaunting eulogies of "an independent judiciary."

What are some of the suggestions which have been made, — briefly to run over them? I have said enough about this mythical ex post facto law which was referred to by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) this morning, and by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch) yesterday. All that sort of argument goes upon the assumption that the Legislature is either idiotic or corrupt, and the Governor of like kind.

I never have served in the Massachusetts Legislature. It may be I think too well of it. When I hear what some of you who have been there say about each other I think I do think too well of it. Nevertheless, as long as I have any faith in our institutions I am bound to believe, and shall continue to believe, that there is a saving majority of good sense and good morals in the Massachusetts Legislature. I stated here on some occasion, — I have forgotten what it was, — that in the memory of living men there had not been a Governor of either party in this Commonwealth who had not commanded the genuine respect of supporters and opponents alike. If there is any exception it is away back in far history as to which only a very few of those present would admit that they had even a memory.

Now, it is not true, as was suggested by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch) yesterday, that this contest between the legislative and the judicial branches has been limited to what are called "questions of social justice;" it is true that it has been more obvious and more publicly known there than elsewhere. But there is another class of questions in which probably the same problem will shortly be of paramount importance, even if it be not now. There is the question of finding entrenched under the fourteenth amendment the so-called "Reproduction Cost Theory," as the basis for making rates for public utilities. That means millions, — hundreds of millions, — to rate payers or to speculators and investors. What is the problem? I shall not stop to discuss it, — I shall merely state it.

Under the Fourteenth Amendment the Supreme Court of the United States has been called upon to determine whether rates fixed by State or Federal authority are confiscatory. Unfortunately in most of the States the capitalization of public utilities has borne no sound or approximate relation to the original investment, — the money furnished for the public benefit. We in Massachusetts have had a different theory, — that the capitalization and investment in public utility companies have been supposed to be (and generally have been) approximately equivalent. But in the search for justice as between rate-payer and investor, the Supreme Court of the United States sought for a sound basis upon which to reckon the return from any given schedule of rates. Thus originated the specious and appealing, but fallacious and blind phrase: "The fair value of the property used should be taken as the basis for computing a non-confiscatory rate."

After the enunciation of this doctrine, ingenious gentlemen, some of whom are members of this Convention, noticing that prices have been rising pretty steadily since 1897, claimed that the present "reproduction cost" of the properties was the test of "the fair value" of the properties. They noted also that many of these public utilities owned large quantities of real estate in growing communities. They therefore set up the claim that the unearned increment of this real estate was the equivalent of capital contributed by investors to the public utility. And so we have a judge-made rule of law under which it is sought to compel the rate-paying public to pay five, six or seven per cent upon millions, — hundreds of millions, — of property or alleged property never furnished by the investing public to create or to increase these public utilities. With this grossly unjust claim our Legislatures, State and National, must deal.

It is for the Legislature, — the admitted rate making power, — to determine, as a part of a far-reaching question of public policy, the basis upon which rates are to be calculated to make a fair return. The sole function of the judiciary is to prevent confiscation of private property devoted to public use.

But signs are not wanting that some judges, — and in some courts there is ground to fear a majority of the judges, — may fail to recognize the strict limitation put upon their power of nullifying rates made. Signs are not wanting, — ominous signs, — that under the guise of enforcing the "due-process-of-law" provision in the fourteenth amendment, some judges are willing, even desirous, of putting their own economic theories as law paramount to the enactments of any Legislature, State or National. That tendency must be checked. It is as important to assert and vindicate the proper power of the Legislature, the law-making power, as it is to assert and vindicate the proper power of the judiciary, the law-declaring power.

I must not pause for further statement of this imminent problem, great as is its importance. I have had occasion for several years to consider it rather critically. But I urge upon your attention that a final determination of that problem may turn upon the question as to whether a bare majority or not less than two-thirds of the Justices of our court of last resort may be permitted to assert their own views of the effect of the Constitution, as against the views of the Legislature.

Mr. CHARLES P. CURTIS, Jr. of Boston: Under these new social and economic laws, which mostly come up under the United States Constitution and the fourteenth amendment, suppose one was passed by the General Court, and it went before the State Supreme Judicial Court, and four judges out of seven found that it was unconstitutional under the United States Constitution. Now, under this amendment, I should like to ask the gentleman if the State Supreme Judicial Court would then hold it unconstitutional. They take an oath. That oath includes the support of the United States Constitution; and would they feel that this change would apply to them, as they would adjudge a law that came under the United States Constitution and not the State?

Mr. ANDERSON: It is perfectly clear that this Commonwealth of Massachusetts can adopt no Constitution, and enact no law, that runs counter to the Constitution of the United States, and that no court of Massachusetts can make any decision which is finally determinative of any Federal question. Now, the question as to whether a statute is contrary to the Constitution of the United States is a Federal question. The proposed amendment means exactly what it says:

No laws duly enacted by the General Court shall be nullified as unconstitutional except by the Supreme Judicial Court, with the concurrence of not less than two-thirds of all the justices thereof.

I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. MORTON of Fall River: I should like to ask Mr. Anderson one question. As his amendment reads, it is "with the concurrence of not less than two-thirds of all the Justices thereof." The present number of Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court is, as Mr. Anderson very well knows, seven; and under his proposed amendment what would the two-thirds mean?

Mr. ANDERSON: Five, I take it.

Mr. MORTON: Five — I supposed so. That is all.

Mr. ANDERSON: This is a very moderate amendment, but it asserts what I still maintain is a very important principle. All that I ask to do, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, — and addressing myself particularly, with the great deference that I always feel for his opinion, off and on the bench, to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, — is to prevent the possibility of a four to three decision, destroying, nullifying, an enactment of our Legislature, so long as the number of the Supreme Judicial Court remains what it now is, — seven. If it should be increased to nine, then it would take six. (Mr. Morton rose.) I yield for a question.

Mr. MORTON: If I understand my friend right, the only matter in which he would require a two-thirds opinion by the Justices of the court would be a constitutional matter?

Mr. ANDERSON: Quite right.

Mr. MORTON: In every other matter the Supreme Judicial Court would still have authority to decide cases by four to three?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. MORTON: And the gentleman is aware that the statute under which the Supreme Judicial Court acts provides that in all cases pending before it four Justices shall constitute a quorum, and, as a matter of fact and as a matter of law, four are required to decide all cases coming before the Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Anderson: Quite right; and I should like to be corrected by the delegate from Fall River if I have not the correct construction. As I now understand it, four is a quorum. Ordinarily five sit as the full court. I do not suppose that there is any precedent of anything less than the full court, all the judges, ever deciding a constitutional question here; but I know of no reason why under the present Constitution and the present statute a majority of only five could not decide a constitutional question and declare a statute invalid. I should be glad to be informed if I am correct in that.

Mr. Morton: I assume that you are. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the gentleman is right in what he states.

Mr. Anderson: I beg to say, then, — for I doubt if the other members of the committee heard, — that the learned gentleman from Fall River informs me that he considers me right in saying that as the Constitution and the statutes now are, a majority of the full court, which is five, might declare a statute unconstitutional; so that three out of the seven judges could put their judgment against the combined judgment of both branches of the Legislature and the Governor.

Mr. Morton: What I meant to say was, — what I thought the gentleman understood me as saying was, — that four are required to decide anything and everything; there cannot be any decision by three. A quorum of the court is four, and under the statute a quorum of four, four judges of the court, must take part in and decide the case.

Mr. Anderson: Must concur?

Mr. Morton: Must concur, as I understand it.

Mr. Anderson: Then I was wrong in the inference I drew from what the member from Fall River stated; and it remains true, as I now understand it, that no less than four could either declare a statute unconstitutional or decide any other question calling for full court decision.

Mr. Morton: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: But it is true also, as the law now is, that a single judge of an inferior or of the Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts may take the responsibility of declaring a statute unconstitutional. I think that has been done since I have been in practice, but I am not absolutely sure that a single judge ever has so declared.

Now, some things were said by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch) yesterday concerning which I want to make one or two observations.

Mr. Charles P. Curtis, Jr. of Boston: I do not think the gentleman quite answered my question. I did not mean whether his amendment would try to do this. I wanted only to raise the doubt whether we had power to do it. Is it not beyond our scope to say upon what majority the State court shall act upon United States matters, — what they shall judge on questions under the United States Constitution? I thought there was some doubt on that, — that the gentleman’s amendment did not go as far as that. It seems to me on the great social questions, economic questions, there was such a void left in his amendment that there was not much left of it. That was my only doubt.
MR. ANDERSON: I regard the question as pretty remote from the gist of the proposition that I put; but, if I understand the question, my answer is that I think the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by its Constitution may limit the power of its courts,—any State court,—to deal with a constitutional question arising under the Federal Constitution except by two-thirds of all the Justices of the court of last resort. The practice to-day, under which four out of seven Justices may declare an act of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts unconstitutional under the Federal Constitution, is grounded upon our own Constitution. The Constitution of the United States does not give the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts power to declare an act of Massachusetts contrary to the Federal Constitution. It is because our court, drawing its powers from our Constitution, is bound to enforce, not merely the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but the Constitution of the United States, and because the established practice is that it acts merely by a majority of the Justices, that that result now accrues. I think I have answered it now.

Coming then,—and I am taking more time than I intended,—to one or two of the points which were made by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch) yesterday, to the effect that judges of some States, even if they had been wrong for a long time and had nullified proper legislative enactments, had at last become educated and seen the light; and that Mr. Justice Brandeis, now on the Supreme Court of the United States, probably would assist to a like desirable result in that court,—I beg to call the attention of the committee to a decision which came down in that court on June 11, 1917, and to suggest to you that there is no ground for believing that the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts is, or for a generation will continue to be, any wiser or more accurate than the present Supreme Court in Washington. For, mark that, we are not making attacks on judges as persons; we are dealing with a system; and with the practical results of that system. And after I have called your attention to what happened this last June in Washington, with a court of nine, I shall call your attention to what happened in Massachusetts less than a generation ago, with a court equally honest and (though as Dr. Johnson said, "comparisons are odious"), I venture to say, equally able with the court that we have now or have had at any time during the past twenty years.

There came before the Supreme Court in Washington, No. 273 of the October term, the case of Adams v. Tanner, Attorney-General of the State of Washington. It involved the question of the constitutionality of a statute of Washington, declaring, in substance, that fees taken by employment agencies from actual or prospective employees for getting jobs should be illegal. In an opinion of a majority of the court, written by Mr. Justice McReynolds, that statute, although sustained by the Washington court,—so that we had the Washington Legislature, including the Washington Governor of course, and the Washington Supreme Court, all declaring it a perfectly valid exercise of the police power,—was held by a majority of the Supreme Court invalid as running counter to the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. Justice McKenna dissented "... upon the ground that under the decisions of this court, some of them so late as to require no citation or review, the law in question is a valid exercise of the police power of the statute, directed against a demonstrated evil."
He thought that was enough to say to make it clear that this statute was a constitutional one if not a desirable attempt to deal with a demonstrated evil. Mr. Justice Brandeis wrote a pretty long opinion, which I shall not stop to read, in which he quoted in extenso from elaborate studies made of the operation of the employment agency system. I find that there has been such a study in Massachusetts of which I never before knew. Mr. Justice Brandeis pointed out that labor troubles, all sorts of friction between employer and employees, had been promoted by these employment agencies in parts of the country for the very purpose of creating vacancies in which to put new fellows and get new fees,—a practice as vicious as the promotion of litigation by lawyers. In this dissenting opinion joined Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Clark. Nevertheless, that attempt to deal with that "demonstrated evil," as Mr. Justice McKenna called it, is thwarted, after years of experimentation, by five judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, tell me, is the fact that we have been lucky enough not to have any like,—I had almost said, scandalous,—exhibition of inability to deal with a great question in a proper fashion, in Massachusetts, in the past twenty years, any reason why, when we are dealing with our fundamental law, we should not stop the gap?

Mr. Brown: I desire to ask if he (Mr. Anderson) will answer this? Was it not brought out in that case that the trouble was that one could get lists of employees to break strikes?

Mr. Anderson: I think that appeared in some of the documents. I have not read Mr. Justice Brandeis' opinion in extenso for some days. There are a lot of foot-notes and references to a great mass of literature, with which I never was familiar. My impression is that such a fact is somewhere adverted to. But that has comparatively little to do with the question which I am now discussing before this body, which is a question of constitutional amendment.

The undeniable facts are that there was in official literature the record of long experimentation, with attempts to regulate employment agencies,—report after report demonstrating that they could not be regulated as long as there was left alive the mercenary motive of getting from people who wanted and who needed jobs fees for getting them jobs; almost forcing to the conclusion that the only way to deal with it was to wipe out that part of the business, perhaps providing for State employment agencies, as we have done in this Commonwealth.

The point is that five men, sitting in Washington, knowing perhaps little or nothing about the question, and, judging from the opinion, not having interest enough in it even to read the literature pertaining to it, have set their opinion of the constitutionality of that law up against the entire law-making force and the entire judiciary of the State of Washington, and against four out of nine Justices of the Supreme Court.

Now, what is the use of talking about "living under liberty through law," and having our judges enforce, for the benefit of the great mass of the people, the "guarantees of liberty found in the Constitution," when there are five Justices who say one thing is fundamental (constitutional) law and four who say another; and, because that body of nine men happens to be the Federal court of last resort, the five make the law both for Nation and for State.
The plain facts are, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that we are a court ruled people, that our laws for two generations have been made largely by our courts. Consider for a moment the history of the agitation of the past twenty-five years. Against what laws have we been fighting most of the time? Against judge made laws. Who created the doctrines of "fellow-servant," "assumed risk," "due care," — all those unfit rules that have had to be legislated out of existence? The judges. I would undertake to demonstrate, if I had time and this were the proper place, that in spite of the fact that I never have known a judge who I thought was corrupt, and that I have the profoundest respect for the ability and character of nearly every judge before whom I have practiced for more than a quarter of a century, — I would undertake to demonstrate that there has been more bad (unfit) law made by the judges of America than ever has been made by the Legislatures of America. [Applause.]

Now, I said that I would point out something in our own history indicating that this was not altogether a hypothetical question; that, although we have been very fortunate in the past twenty odd years, both in our courts and in our Legislature, in the care exercised to see that no unconstitutional legislation was enacted, or legislation which was not so clearly constitutional that no reasonable men could differ concerning it, — that we have history not so remote as to be beyond the memory of living man to indicate that some time we might have a court in Massachusetts no wiser or more enlightened than the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the 160th volume of Massachusetts reports, page 63 et seq., are two opinions of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, then consisting of Field, C.J., Allen, Holmes, Knowlton, Morton, Lathrop and Barker, J.J., dealing with the constitutionality of the interchangeable mileage law. The Chief Justice, for whom I had as profound a respect and affection as for any judge before whom I ever had the honor to appear, wrote an opinion in which he declared that the act was unconstitutional. At the end of the opinion, page 93, he says:

Mr. Justice Lathrop and Mr. Justice Barker agree that the informations are rightly brought by the Attorney-General, and that the court has jurisdiction, and are of opinion that the necessary effect of the statute is to apply and appropriate individual property to the public use without the owner's consent, and without legal provision for a reasonable compensation therefore; and for this reason they agree that the statute is void, without expressing an opinion upon the other matters discussed in this opinion. A majority of the court are of opinion that the petitions should be dismissed.

(The italics are mine.)

Judge Knowlton, afterwards Chief Justice, wrote a dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice Holmes concurred, reaching the conclusion that the statute was constitutional. Two of the judges, Judges Allen and Morton, expressed, in no written opinion, the grounds for their views, but joined, as I understand the record, in the conclusion stated by the Chief Justice, that a majority of the judges thought the petition should be dismissed, — which amounted to declaring the statute unconstitutional. That was in the year 1893, twenty-four years ago.

I now desire, having stated all that I have stated, as you will all agree, with very great moderation of language, to read some language used by an official concerning this decision. After sketching the case and some of the issues discussed, the document which I now am reading, the character and author of which I will disclose later, contains the following. I beg your attention to this, for if what I have said is not worth listening to, what I am about now to read is worth listening to.

This decision is noticeable, as indicating a tendency to depart from the fundamental rule that a statute shall not be held unconstitutional if there is any ground on which, in any view, it can be sustained, and also on account of the position of the court in making it. Three Justices hold the statute unconstitutional on two specific grounds; two other Justices hold it unconstitutional on another ground; and two Justices hold it constitutional. Thus the statute is set aside for reasons no one of which commands the open assent even of a majority of the court. It may therefore properly be inferred that the majority is against each of the reasons assigned. If the same process is carried a little farther, the validity of the most deliberate and important acts of the Legislature may turn upon the opinion of a single judge in which no other judge concurs, and they may be declared void by force of a reason existing in the mind of a single judge which all the other judges agree is no reason. It is not too much to say that such an exercise of the high power to overrule the acts of the legislative branch of the government, within its proper limits a most valuable safeguard of the rights secured by the Constitution, would endanger its existence.

In this connection it is to be remarked that the number of decisions in this Commonwealth against the constitutionality of statutes is much greater in recent years than it formerly was. From a careful examination of the reported cases it appears that from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time —

And this was January, 1894 —

— the constitutionality of two hundred and forty-seven statutes has been considered by the full court, of which forty-one have been set aside. Down to 1860, out of sixty-two statutes drawn in question, ten were held unconstitutional; from 1860 to 1870, out of forty questioned, four were held unconstitutional; from 1870 to 1880, out of sixty-three questioned, thirteen were held unconstitutional; from 1880 to 1890, out of thirty-five questioned, eight were held unconstitutional, and from 1890 to the present time, out of twenty questioned, six were held unconstitutional. The proportion of statutes set aside to the whole number drawn in question was, prior to 1860, less than one in six; from 1860 to 1870, one in ten; from 1870 to 1880, a little more than one in five; from 1880 to 1890, a little less than one in four; and since 1890, a little less than one in three. Within the last four years more statutes have been declared unconstitutional than in the first seventy years under the Constitution.

While this statement does not conclusively prove anything, a tendency so unmistakable can hardly be accounted for on any theory of chances. It indicates an increasing liability of the Legislature to exceed its constitutional power, or a growing disposition of the court to restrain its exercise. The Legislature cannot be unmindful of its own responsibility to guard against unconstitutional enactments; a responsibility which cannot be devolved upon the judiciary and ought not to be shared with it. On the other hand, an eminent judge long ago said, foreseeing the absolute importance of preserving the right equipoise of power between the different departments of the government: "The interference of the judiciary with legislative acts, if frequent or on dubious grounds, might occasion so great a jealousy of this power and so general a prejudice against it as to lead to measures ending in the total overthrow of the independence of the judges, and so of the best preservative of the Constitution. The validity of a law ought not, then, to be questioned unless it is so obviously repugnant to the Constitution that when pointed out by the judges, all men of sense and reflection in the community may perceive the repugnancy. By such a cautious exercise of this judicial check, no jealousy of it will be excited, the public confidence in it will be promoted, and its salutary effects be justly and fully appreciated."

The document from which I read, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is the annual report of the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth for the year ending January 17, 1894, and the name of the Attorney-General who wrote it was Albert E. Pillsbury, now a member of this Convention from Wellesley.

I beg now therefore to say to this Convention that there is demonstrated in the most recent history of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in not remote judicial history within our own Commonwealth, that there is need of providing in our Constitu-tution against the disgracing and discrediting spectacle of a four to three decision of our Supreme Judicial Court. I do not want to see our court ever put in that position, and that is one reason why I am saying these things.

Now, I am taking more time than I ought, but I beg you to bear with me again. [Cries of "Go on, go on."] I repeat, if what I say is not worth listening to, what I am going to read you, again, will be worth listening to. One member at least of the Convention ought to be satisfied with my last attempt. I hope my present attempt may satisfy certain of the rest of you, for I am going to read from a book written in very excellent English,—when I finish reading I will tell you who wrote it.

Much was said by various eloquent gentlemen about this serener, higher atmosphere in which dwell the great judicial minds, — free from economic prejudice, free from social prejudice,—tribunals set apart, where no one by induction, or in any way, except by argument in open court, ever has the slightest influence on the movement of their minds straight through to the absolutely correct determination of the application of our fundamental law to the question before them. I have here a little book by an author whom you will permit me to leave anonymous until I read certain passages dealing with the Dartmouth College case, and the part taken thereon in 1818 by the "Great De-defender of the Constitution," Daniel Webster, who was in the Massa-chussetts Constitutional Convention of 1820, and there delivered such eloquent eulogies on an "independent judiciary."

There is a long sketch of the case and of the argument, in March, 1818, before the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the issues, which, you will remember, were as to whether under the Constitution of the United States the charter of Dartmouth College constituted a contract between the State of New Hampshire and that college. The case is sketched as really a row between Federalists and Democrats, and certain other contending factions in the community.
This book, by this anonymous gentleman, proceeds as follows — and listen, for what I am now reading is worth hearing:

March 12 the arguments were closed, and the next day, after a conference, the Chief Justice announced that the court could agree on nothing and that the cause must be continued for a year, until the next term. The fact probably was that Marshall found the judges five to two against the college, and that the task of bringing them into line was not a light one.

In this undertaking, however, he was powerfully aided by the counsel and all the friends of the college. The old board of trustees had already paid much attention to public opinion. The press was largely Federalist, and, under the pressure of what was made a party question, they had espoused warmly the cause of the college. Letters and essays had appeared, and pamphlets had been circulated, together with the arguments of the counsel at Exeter. This work was pushed with increased eagerness after the argument at Washington, and the object now was to create about the three doubtful judges an atmosphere of public opinion which should imperceptibly bring them over to the college. Johnson, Livingston, and Story were all men who would have started at the barest suspicion of outside influence even in the most legitimate form of argument, which was all that was ever thought of or attempted. This made the task of the trustees very delicate and difficult in developing a public sentiment which should sway the judges without their being aware of it. The printed arguments of Mason, Smith and Webster were carefully sent to certain of the judges, but not to all.

"Not to all"!
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

All documents of a similar character found their way to the same quarters. The leading Federalists were aroused everywhere, so that the judges might be made to feel their opinion. With Story, as a New England man, a Democrat by circumstances, a Federalist by nature, there was but little difficulty.

"A Democrat by circumstances, a Federalist by nature." A splendid type to have on the bench.

A thorough review of the case, joined with Mr. Webster's argument, caused him soon to change his first impression. To reach Livingston and Johnson was not so easy, for they were out of New England, and it was necessary to go a long way round to get at them. The great legal upholder of Federalism in New York was Chancellor Kent. His first impression, like that of Story, was decidedly against the college, but after much effort on the part of the trustees and their able allies, Kent was converted, partly through his reason, partly through his Federalism, and then his powers of persuasion and his great influence on opinion came to bear very directly on Livingston, more remotely on Johnson. The whole business was managed like a quiet, decorous political campaign.

(The italics are mine.)

There is more to the same effect. The book from which I have just read, pages 89, 90 and part of 91, is the Life of Daniel Webster, by Henry Cabot Lodge. [Applause.]

That is the way the decision was obtained in the famous Dartmouth College case. Now, some of you who are following critically political and economic contests know that by very closely analogous proceedings the decision was obtained in the income tax case, just about twenty years ago.

Mr. BROWN: And does that case bind us all to the principle that a contract in perpetuity was made in the Dartmouth College case?

Mr. ANDERSON: As I understand it, that case determined that all charters issued prior to that time, unless containing some saving clause, were binding in perpetuity. In 1831 this Commonwealth enacted a statute which ever since has saved us from the slavery under which we otherwise should have gone. So far as I understand the general history of legislation in this country, every community in this country by some form of legislation has set itself free from the trammels which otherwise were attempted to be imposed upon the American people by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States obtained in the way described,—in a manner, as I think, too weak, to describe the actual facts,—by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, in his Life of Daniel Webster.

Gentlemen, you might as well face the facts here. If you do not face them here you are likely to face them somewhere else, and in a far more offensive form. Here you may face them fairly, dispassionately and constructively. The facts are that there is in this country an increasing distrust of the judiciary, and that we in Massachusetts have been fortunate to escape hitherto much of that distrust. Sitting here in this Convention it is for us to provide safeguards that may leave us in the future in the same happy condition in which we have been during the past generation. I would do nothing more. There is not one of you, the most conservative,—the ex-Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, to whom I address myself now as a delegate as I have addressed myself to him many times on the bench,—there is not one of you that would go farther than I in maintaining that the very essence of democracy is liberty, under law declared by judges.

Mr. SHANAHAN of Somerville: I should like to ask the speaker in the second division whether or not his proposed amendment would remove the element of finality which should accompany decisions on constitutional matters by our Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Anderson: My answer is No. I think the entire effect of this amendment may be stated in two propositions: First, it prohibits any judge of any court, except the court of last resort, from refusing to enforce a statute as unconstitutional; second, it provides, so long as we have a Supreme Judicial Court of seven, that not less than five shall concur in declaring a statute unconstitutional; otherwise the statute stands. I yield to the gentleman from Randolph.

Mr. French of Randolph: May I ask the gentleman from Brookline if he thinks that the indignation of the populace would be materially diminished if the required majority of the court were made five instead of four?

Mr. Anderson: I think it would, Mr. Chairman. I think it would have an effect that would be curative; that it would be a panacea, I do not for a moment claim. I have no belief in panaceas. I know no method of providing for any form of democratic institutions that will not be open to criticism as imperfect; but I say (and I put myself right on this narrow ground, and you may attack it because it is so narrow, if you choose), that to allow the possibility to remain of a four to three decision under our Constitution is wrong and dangerous. I would remove that possibility. I do not now see a better way than to say two-thirds. If some one else wants to say three-fourths I have no quarrel with him. I am not ready to go to the extent of saying that if a single judge holds a statute constitutional and all the others say it is unconstitutional that the one man, even although buttressed by the Legislature and the Governor, should prevail against the majority, after they have heard the case fully argued by able counsel.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: If we are going to give the courts this power I would ask why not require their decision to be unanimous, the same as we require a jury's decision to be unanimous?

Mr. Anderson: I think there is some weight in that suggestion. I do not know that this answer is adequate, but what I said a moment ago is the only answer that can be made. My propositions are essentially these: While the Legislature and the Governor are as much bound by their oaths to enact only constitutional legislation as is the court, their opportunity of testing the actual operation of the statute is not as good as that of the court when a case comes before it, and it has the issue presented in the light of actual facts and illuminated by the argument of counsel. Hence I say leave that question to be determined by the court. When you have a majority of the court deciding most questions, this being a case of more than ordinary importance, which already has been passed upon by a coordinate tribunal,—I think that it ought to be passed by at least two-thirds. It is like the veto: When the Legislature enacts a law and it goes to the Governor, and he vetoes it, it comes back, but has to be passed over his veto by two-thirds. That is an analogy that has some weight, but no controlling weight, upon the proposition which I urge.

I now yield to the gentleman from Worcester.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I should like to ask the gentleman one question. I know his experience has been very wide. I want to ask what cases he can cite in which statutes have been declared unconstitutional in this State by judges of the inferior courts — how many instances of that sort he recalls.

Mr. Anderson: I stated before (I think the gentleman probably was out) that I think there have been two instances within my memory in which that has been done, but I am not ready to vouch for that. I cannot tell you what the cases were. I think there are probably men in this room who can remember the cases. The most that I am ready to say is that my impression is strong that there were two such instances within the last twenty-seven years, during which I have been in law practice.

Mr. Finn of Chelsea: I should like to ask the gentleman whether he still would press this measure as he proposes to amend it, if judges were either elected or appointed for a term.

Mr. Anderson: I think, if I could contemplate the judiciary of Massachusetts elected or appointed for a term, I should want unanimity, and not merely a two-thirds vote, before a statute was declared unconstitutional. Not to anticipate unduly matters which may come for debate before this Convention, but not having the slightest objection to stating my own view at the present time, — one reason why I would keep the judiciary of Massachusetts within proper limits by an amendment of this kind is because I want to see go no farther than already has gone the opposition to the present method of appointing the judiciary for life. I go on record now as stating the matured opinion of one member of the profession and of this Convention to the effect that by and large we have had the best judiciary in the United States, appointed under the best system, and I am going to stand by it. [Applause.] I know of no amendment that I would vote for unless it be an amendment that judges should retire at the age of 70, subject to special assignment by the Chief Justice, on which I could listen with an open mind. But I am prepared, if changing radically our judicial system becomes an issue before this Convention, to take issue with some people who probably approve of my position taken here to-day, men supporting what I have called the radical movement, and undertake to demonstrate to them that the rights of the mass of the people, — the common man, — are safer under a judiciary appointed by the Governor during good behavior than under a judiciary originating in so-called "popular election," but really by the appointment of certain subterranean forces.

And now I close what I already have said at too great length. I beg your pardon for speaking so long. I express my appreciation of the courteous attention that I have had. Let me end by saying that one reason why I want this amendment is that people who now are sharply critical of the judiciary, — not so much the judiciary of Massachusetts as of the Federal judiciary and of the judiciary of other States, — will find the grounds of their opposition narrowed if this wise, conservative amendment which I now advocate is made a part of the fundamental law of the Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Choate of Southborough: I honor and respect the gentleman from Brookline always, but never more than in the expression of those sentiments of respect and admiration for the court which he has just presented to this Convention. The court always has been in a position where it could not defend itself, and it is to such fair-minded and honorable men as my friend from Brookline that it necessarily must turn for its own justification. It is very true, as he has just said, that the question now has narrowed itself to a point that is almost microscopic. I think I fairly express the views of the delegates here present in venturing to assert that we now are fairly harmonious in the view that the right and power to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes ought not to be taken from the courts, and that there is no other body in which that power can be so well and safely reposed as in the courts. The question now is whether we will change the practical rule by which the decision of those courts always heretofore has been governed, whether we will say that the majority of the court cannot decide certain cases, but that in certain cases which involve the question of the constitutionality of a law five judges out of seven must be required to concur. I ask, in the first place, if there has been suggested to this Convention any abuse of the power that heretofore has been vested in the inferior courts or in the Supreme Judicial Court, and in the exercise of the function which we are discussing, to declare a law repugnant to the Constitution. The gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) says that in twenty-seven years of practice he thinks he has heard of two cases in which a justice of the inferior court has so decided, not one within his own personal observation; and I may corroborate and perhaps strengthen his statement by saying that in a practice slightly less and less broad than his, but covering at least twenty-five years, I never have known a justice of an inferior court to venture to hold a statute unconstitutional. I think it will be the consensus of the opinion of the bar as represented in this body that judges of inferior courts invariably uphold the constitutionality of a statute unless perhaps some vital question of the liberty of a citizen is involved. Then those courts ought to be free to protect the individual. They have taken their oath to support the Constitution, and one of the guarantees of the Constitution is that the rights and liberties of a citizen, no matter how humble he be, shall not be taken away from him. Now, if there were a well demonstrated abuse of that power the resolution which is advanced by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) might well be favorably considered; but I submit there has been no more sagacious word spoken in this assemblage than that spoken by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Costello) when he said we ought to be satisfied that the provisions of the present Constitution are wrong and ought to be changed before we venture on a change. We have not been shown that the provisions of the present Constitution in this respect are wrong or even defective.

Now with respect to the change that is proposed with respect to decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court. My friend from Brookline comes here and rather ventures to alarm us by the suggestion that he has been sitting on the lid and he knows what is going on underneath it. Well, I have no doubt he has been doing it, and doing it well. Some of the reverberations escape him once in a while, and we know how serious they are, like that, for instance, which escaped from his office the other day, when we were advised that an armed band of anarchists was going to invade our streets and shoot up our citizens. I wonder if he is not a little bit over-anxious from some sleepless nights sitting upon the lid.

But, after all, am I impertinent when I venture to inquire whether we have not seen the mountain in labor and bringing forth a mouse?
Have the various things that he suggested, the social unrest or disquiet which he has indicated might break out at any time, been so substantially demonstrated that they have got to be met by a change in the number of judges who are to decide a Federal question or a question of the constitutionality of a statute? As the gentleman from Randolph (Mr. French) asked, if it is true, as the gentleman from Brookline suggests, is it going to be appeased by any such change as this? That is why I say the suggestion as made is really microscopic; it is utterly unimportant. It is not suggested in answer to any real danger or to satisfy those who complain of any real abuse. Consider for a moment the practical confusion which would be introduced into our practice in the courts. Every one of these questions of the constitutionality of a statute arises in the course of a litigation, that is, a lawsuit between two parties, usually between private individuals, occasionally between the Commonwealth and one of its citizens. As to judges, the rule that he suggests is that it must be five judges who must concur, but as to all other litigants it is to be only four. I think the point taken by the gentleman from Boston in the second division is well taken. Will it not be true, gentlemen, that with respect to questions arising under the Constitution of the United States, which the Justices of our Supreme Judicial Court have taken an oath to sustain just as much as they have taken an oath to sustain our own Constitution, is it not true that with respect to every question arising under the Federal Constitution a decision of four to three will still be valid and terminative as settling that question? I think, Mr. Chairman, that the rule which we have lived under for a hundred years has proved itself sound, and hope it will be continued.

Mr. Anderson: I desire to ask the gentleman from Southborough a question, if he will permit. I was not quite sure whether I understood the gentleman to argue that under our Constitution it could not be provided that not less than two-thirds could declare a statute unconstitutional under the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Choate: I think the point made by the gentleman from Boston in the second division must be a sound one, that our Supreme Judicial Court, having taken its oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which restrains in certain respects the passage of legislation by State Legislatures, could still find, in spite of the resolution which he advocates, by a majority of four to three, a law unconstitutional, as being repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Anderson: May I ask a single further question? Is it not true that the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is absolutely the creation of the Constitution, and that in that Constitution it might be provided, if the Commonwealth saw fit, that our court could decide no question except by unanimity, as a jury may decide nothing except by unanimity?

Mr. Choate: I think the question is one of grave doubt. Dealing with a statute which violates the Constitution of the United States is one thing; dealing with a statute which is suggested to be repugnant to the Constitution of the State is quite another.

Mr. Horgan of Boston: It is with some trepidation that I ask the indulgence of the members of this Convention for a few moments only, not that I hope that I may be able to add anything to the discussion, which already has taken place, that may aid us in arriving at a proper conclusion on this and the subsequent propositions under consideration, realizing that I do not possess that eloquence, which is a rare gift, and a pleasing adjunct to intellectuality at all times, but at the same time hopeful that I at least will not be charged with that lo-quacy, which apparently is possessed by some members of the Convention, and which, as has been suggested at least once, indicates not only impudence, but perhaps also ignorance, and believing that the propositions which are under consideration are sufficiently grave and far-reaching to ask you for a few moments to consider with me what has impressed me during the deliberations of this body, and what perhaps has aided me in arriving at solutions of various problems that have been under consideration, and on which we have been called to vote, I crave your indulgence that I may briefly set them forth.
UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES. 535

The first thing that struck me was the remarkable statement which has been suggested by at least one delegate, namely, that this instrument under which we have lived for 137 years is archaic. Mr. Chairman, I wish that I too had the wisdom of a Solomon, and did not feel that I was perhaps a pigmy when compared with those great men of that illustrious period, in order that I might also be able to criticize, and perhaps condemn, an instrument under which we have so successfully operated for so many years. But, Mr. Chairman, when we realize that from 1776 to 1780 those men who finally drew that instrument under which we now live, were in the stress of strife, and that their lives and liberty were at stake, and that their knowledge of human nature was at least as great as is ours, and that they had before them the wisdom of the sages themselves to enable them to guide their pens to provide not only for the present but for the future as well, does it not give us cause to reflect that before we alter or add to the present Constitution we must demand that, what has been so aptly suggested more than once to-day, those who propose alteration or addition shall present indisputable evidence that there is grave reason for a change, and necessity for addition? And keeping that thought in mind, Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to call your attention to a few words from a gentleman who at least once upon a time was considered illustrious, and whose words and thoughts were considered to have been animated by pure and lofty statesmanship and patriotism. I refer to the Father of our Country, George Washington, who, in his final address, among other things, called attention of the people of our country to this:

It is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to affect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard, by which to test the real tendency of the existing Constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion.

And, Mr. Chairman, because I bow to that superior judgment, because I feel from a careful study, a thoughtful and, as I hope, an intelligent analysis of the conditions which confronted not only this country but also this State, when the respective Constitutions were finally agreed upon, with the firm conviction, Mr. Chairman, that those men had almost as much intelligence as is possessed by some of the Solomons to whom we have been forced to listen during the debate upon this and the other proposition, I at least am doubtful, and it is with timidity that I determine as a delegate either upon this or any subsequent proposition to change an instrument which has been so successful, which has afforded prosperity, happiness and general content, until and unless absolute necessity has been shown.

Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to emphasize that as far as the effect of the various arguments presented here to-day upon my mind have been in favor of this substitute proposition or the immediately subsequent proposition, I am absolutely convinced that no necessity for a change has been manifested here. What gentleman who has addressed this Convention has pointed to specific instances in this Commonwealth under the present judicial system by which personal, individual property or social wrongs or economic conditions have been so affected or changed that it is vitally necessary to our future happiness and prosperity that this proposition should be submitted by us to the people of this Commonwealth? We, as I understand it, are sitting as the jurors of the people. We are supposed to consider the evidence, and to recommend as propositions favorable for action by the people of this Commonwealth only resolutions which we are convinced ought to be considered by them because the evidence has been such that in conscience and justice we must recommend the adoption by the people of those recommendations.

I may venture, I think, to give an additional reason, perhaps, that might be suggested, namely, that the conditions which now exist are such that if we care not only for the present but for the future, we must provide under a sufficiently elastic system for conditions that may thereafter confront us that have not been sufficiently substantiated here to justify me, as one delegate, in supporting this or any of the subsequent propositions. I trust that I am not one of those with the athletic eloquence which has been so aptly described by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson). At the same time, I hope that I may not be described as that bird of Japan whose sole note is "Me, Me, Me." I hope that most of us at least in considering this and other questions will consider them from the broad-minded viewpoint of agents and representatives of the public weal, with a desire to submit and favor only propositions which, in our humble judgment, as best we may determine, will be beneficial, and will at least merit our support at the polls.

I want to add only one other thought, Mr. Chairman, because I have listened with much respect, appreciating his ability as well as his experience, to the distinguished United States District Attorney from Brookline, who is an honorable delegate in this Convention, and that is this: With 247 legislative enactments, with the constitutionality of which the Supreme Judicial Court has been compelled to pass upon, he has called our attention to the fact that, in 41 of these cases, it was declared by the Supreme Judicial Court that those enactments were unconstitutional; but yet he has failed, and I think that is an important detail, to indicate what the vote of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, upon those various propositions declared unconstitutional, was. Personally, I should very much like to know, if at any time, on any one of those propositions, more than two judges favored the constitutionality of those forty-one propositions.

Mr. Montague of Boston: The gentleman asks a question which I think can be answered now if he desires to have it answered. In the fifty-nine cases,—forty-one up to 1894, fifty-nine all told,—in which the constitutionality of any act or part of any act or of any resolve of this Commonwealth has been held unconstitutional, in only seven cases is there any indication that the judgment of the court was not unanimous,—seven out of fifty-nine.

Mr. Horgan: Unless additional evidence may be adduced, it seems to me that that perhaps is the best evidence that we ought to require that the Supreme Judicial Court, in deciding on the constitutionality of the legislative enactments, has not only given careful consideration and thought in this State to those propositions, but, also with the knowledge that no particular criticism has been levied at any one of those decisions, it ought to convince us of the fact that, working under this system, no injustice has been done. As experience is the best lamp by which to guide our footsteps, and, as we have successfully labored under this system that we now are operating under, not only wisely but judiciously, it is a duty that we owe to the people of this Commonwealth not to recommend any change in this or in any other proposition unless, as I already have indicated, evidence of such a character can be presented that we must be able to say, because the common good is the chain that holds all the people together, that it is necessary to make this change. We ought not to make any recommendation rather than make a mistake which may bring retribution in the future with it. [Applause.]

Mr. Fisher of Westford: The present document and the two succeeding documents have brought into discussion this question under two phases. I understand my honored friend from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), as well as my honored friend from Lynn (Mr. Creamer), do not favor the first phase of this question, for which I think they are entitled to a considerable degree of credit.

Is there any common ground on which we can discuss or begin to discuss the first issue here, to wit: The question of whether or not the Supreme Judicial Court should have the determination of whether a statute is unconstitutional, or void for any other reason? Unconstitutionality is not the only reason why a statute or a previous statute at times has not been effective in this Commonwealth, and with that I think we can start on a common ground. Supposing the Legislature of 1917 passes an act which raises an issue whether it is inconsistent with an act of 1916. That issue has been raised many, many times, and the Supreme Judicial Court, as those of us know who have served in the Great and General Court, sometimes says in a bit of irony that “the Legislature in its wisdom” did so and so. If the issue is raised whether or not the act of 1917 repeals the act of 1916 in whole or in part, who is to decide the question? Is there a delegate here who would say other than that the Supreme Judicial Court or the lower courts in the first instance were the arbiters of that question? However, I have heard no one as yet argue that such was not the case. And if then the Supreme Judicial Court, as the last court of judicature, has the decision by the unanimous approval of the populace at large, to say that the act of 1916 violates the act of 1917 and therefore the act of 1916 is void, what is the situation when the act of 1917 violates the great fundamental law which the people have embodied in their Constitution? It is only an extension of the principle. And so it seems to me that the delegate from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) this morning has annihilated the first proposition which is presented in the resolutions here. And now let us take up the second proposition, which has more assumed merit in it, but which, it seems to me, when you diagnose the situation, has at least one fatal defect.

You start on the basis that constitutional rights are the only great rights which are accorded to us under the law. That is not true. Some of the greatest legal questions which arise in all our courts of justice do not involve constitutional questions. They involve the very life, liberty, property, and home of ourselves and our families. Let us stop to consider the matter just a moment and take a practical view of the question, and perhaps even a ridiculous view of the question, because it is when we view it in that light that we sometimes get back to facing facts.

Suppose the fair city of Lynn, or the Hub of the Universe where we are now seated, or the aristocratic town of Brookline undertakes to pass an ordinance limiting the perigrinations, if you will, or the amours of our old friend Mr. Thomas Cat, whose limitations perhaps in some extent coördinate with the human race, as was so ably expounded by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) yesterday in the debate on the abolition of capital punishment. Either my friend Sir Thomas Cat has got to reform his methods of living or else the owner has got to limit his nocturnal visits. That is an extreme case, but time and time again the question has arisen whether or not certain legislative enactments which authorized the passage of ordinances were constitutional; for instance, in what were called the Chelsea rag cases and other matters. Those cases which went to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts involved no really serious fundamental questions as matters of constitutional determination.

What is the issue on the other side? Not many years ago in this Commonwealth a man was tried for murder. He was defended by one of the ablest counsel that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts could afford, the late lamented ex-Governor Long. The jury convicted the defendant. The matter went to the Supreme Judicial Court. He was convicted because the Superior Court, following a previous decision of the Supreme Judicial Court, had decided that certain evidence was inadmissible. The matter came before the Supreme Judicial Court and after careful consideration the Supreme Judicial Court reversed its former decision and decided that the evidence should have been admitted. A retrial resulted, and, Mr. Chairman, the defendant was acquitted. I have heard it said, rumor has it, that a guilty man escaped, but I pass no judgment on that question. This was not a constitutional question. And yet the decision of that question whether that man should have a retrial with life and death hanging in the balance was to be decided on the majority opinion of our Supreme Judicial Court. It was not decided on a majority, but under this supposed amendment it still would remain to decide by a majority of the court, while the little, I might say in comparison the inconsequential, question of a local city ordinance would have to be decided by a two-thirds vote of the Supreme Judicial Court. Go home and stand on the street corner, sit down in your office and talk with your neighbor in his home, and when he asks you: "Why in your wisdom does our Constitution require that the decision of a practically immaterial question,"—because some of your constitutional questions are practically on that basis,—"why do you require a two-thirds decision of the Supreme Judicial Court in order to declare that act unconstitutional, when in a case where the very life and liberty of a man are at stake you let the same court decide it by a majority decision?" If you can answer that satisfactorily to your neighbor, proceed to support the resolution. I cannot, and for that reason among others I am opposed to this proposed change.

And now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Boston who sits in front of me (Mr. Lomasney), who always is solicitous of the rights of the people, in speaking on the question of less than unanimity of a jury in deciding a verdict in civil cases, said: "You are making an opening wedge;" and I agreed with him. And I say here now: You are beginning to make an opening wedge; you are making practically class constitutional enactment. One man goes before the court on one proposition and it takes two-thirds of the court to decide that the act was unconstitutional. Another man goes before the same tribunal with the life of his brother, sister, son, daughter, father, mother at stake, and the majority of the court say the word whether that man shall practically live or die, as was done in the case which I cited to you. Every one is familiar with the case. And they tell us of the distrust of the people in the courts. Every lawyer has had his hour of distrust when the decision was against him.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman from Westford bring to the attention of the Convention a single instance in the history of this Commonwealth, or indeed in the history of any other of the States, where they have hung a man on a four to three or a five to four or a bare majority opinion?

Mr. FISHER: I did not catch the question.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understood the gentleman to argue, that a mere majority should be adequate to determine a constitutional question, because on a question involving life, death or liberty we left it still for a mere majority decision. I ask if in the history of the courts of Massachusetts, and indeed I should like to ask if in judicial history outside of the courts of Massachusetts, any man's life ever has been taken under process of law by a mere majority opinion with dissenting opinions. I ask the gentleman who is now addressing the committee.

Mr. FISHER: I did not contend that the decision was a majority decision, but that is the situation as far as the legal condition is concerned, that such a decision could be rendered involving the life or liberty of a man, when another question, inconsequential as compared with the life and liberty of a man, has got to be decided by two-thirds of the same body. I have been reminded since the honorable gentleman from Brookline took his seat that there was a decision in New York State five to four. We have heard here precedents cited. We have heard here theories of government expounded to prove to us that some change should be made to govern us in our decision of this question. But, Mr. Chairman, let us come back home. We are in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the pioneer of constitutional government. And if we exercise what I believe we are going to exercise, a safe and sane attitude toward our future constitutional provisions Massachusetts still will lead the world in the matter of written constitutional government.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what are you asked to do? You are asked, I say, to make this change in the Constitution, changing the simplicity of the rule of the Supreme Judicial Court, the uniform rule of equal justice to all on exactly the same basis of a majority decision, and now you are going to elevate one step and say: "It depends on what your rights are,—not the question of whether life and liberty are involved,—but the question of what your rights are, constitutional or otherwise, on what number of the Supreme Judicial Court are obliged to act in order to settle the question." You are putting a new factor into our constitutional government, and, Mr. Chairman, you are substituting for the rule of reason a rule of percentage.

Mr. BROWN of Waltham: Yesterday in the Committee of the Whole I voted to recommend to the Convention the adoption of resolution No. 47. I did so because I believe firmly in the second part of that resolution, which provides that a unanimous opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court shall be required to declare a legislative enactment unconstitutional. I have no intention and no desire to prolong the discussion of this resolution. I rise only to state briefly some of the reasons which prompt me to support it.

Under our Constitution the Legislature is constituted the law-making body of the State. For that reason I believe that any law enacted by the Legislature should not be lightly set aside. Admitting that as a matter of expediency and perhaps of necessity the Supreme Judicial Court should have the power to review acts of the Legislature, yet it is a most extraordinary power to vest in any body constituted as is the Supreme Judicial Court to override the acts of the Legislature, which is composed of representatives elected by the people, elected annually, therefore coming direct from the people, who, after all, are the source of all power under a democratic form of government. And the exercise of that power by the Supreme Judicial Court should be surrounded by every possible safeguard and limited by every reasonable and proper restraint in order to avoid abuse.

The Legislature in enacting laws is surrounded by certain safeguards to guide its action and to prevent it from passing any law that violates a provision of the Constitution. But if it should enact a law that clearly violates any provision of the Constitution there can be no question but that it will be held by a unanimous opinion of the court to be unconstitutional. But when the Legislature enacts a law, and a question is raised concerning its constitutionality and the question is so close that any Justice of the court, for instance, a Justice like former Chief Justice Holmes, should hold such law to be constitutional, then, in my opinion, that law should continue to have full force and effect until it shall be declared to be unconstitutional by a unanimity of opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court.

The gentleman in the second division who is in charge of this report (Mr. Montague) has asked repeatedly for an instance in the history of the Supreme Judicial Court decisions of this State that would afford a reason or a justification for the adoption of this resolution. My answer is the dissenting opinions of former Chief Justice Holmes and the dissenting opinions of other Justices of the court. These are a justification and a complete justification for its adoption.

The Committee of the Whole rejected Mr. Anderson's amendment of Mr.
Cramer's resolution (No. 47) by a vote of 37 to 137, Wednesday, August 1, 1917, and, on the same day, sustained the adverse report of the committee on the Judiciary on the three resolutions, — Nos. 47, 97 and 212.

On the following day, August 2, the measures were considered in Convention and a call of the roll was ordered when Mr. Cramer's resolution (No. 47) was acted upon. It was rejected by a vote of 161 to 77. The other resolutions were rejected without division.
Mr. E. Gerry Brown presented the following resolution (No. 231):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The properties of water, coal, iron and oil in their original states are among the essential rights of the collective body of people as a common heritage; and therefore cannot be held by any title as private property except as a trust to be exercised and administered equitably with a recognition of common ownership.

The committee on Public Affairs reported that the above resolution ought to pass in the following new draft (No. 321):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution
2 by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The conservation, development and use of agricultural,
4 mineral, forest and water resources of the Common-
5 wealth are matters of public interest. The General Court 6 may therefore authorize the taking, by purchase or other-
7 wise, of such lands or easements or interests therein, 8 including water and mineral rights, and may enact such 9 legislation as may be necessary or expedient for securing
10 and promoting the proper conservation, development
11 and use thereof.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 3, the word “agricultural”.

Mr. Charbonneau of Lowell moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word “taking,” in line 6, the words “by such public body as it may designate”.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution be amended by inserting before the word “agricultural,” in line 3, the word “undeveloped”.

Mr. Montague of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word “agricultural,” in line 3, the words “and of”.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 3 and 4, the words “agricultural, mineral, forest and water”, and inserting in place thereof the words "all the natural”.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word “mineral”, in line 4, the word “and”; by striking out, in line 4, the words “and water”; and by striking out, in line 8, the words “water and”.

The resolution (No. 321), with the pending amendments, was recommitted to the committee on Public Affairs Wednesday, July 25, 1917.

That committee reported the following new draft (No. 344) Wednesday, August 8, 1917:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2 tion by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The conservation, development and use of agricultural,
4 mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth
5 are public uses for which the Legislature may take or 6 authorize to be taken, by purchase or otherwise, lands or 7 easements or interests therein, including water and 8 mineral rights, and may enact legislation necessary or ex-
9 pedient for securing and promoting the proper conserva-
10 tion, development, use and control thereof.
The new draft was read a second time Thursday, June 13, 1918, being the first of the proposed amendments to be debated in the 1918 session of the Convention.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 3, the word "agricultural,"; and by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

The conservation, development and use for agricultural purposes, of low, swampy, waste or otherwise undeveloped lands are public uses for which the Legislature may take, or authorize to be taken, by purchase or otherwise, lands or easements and interests therein.

These amendments were rejected, by a vote of 31 to 90.

Mr. Frank E. Lyman of Easthampton moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 3, the word "agricultural,"

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution (No. 344) was ordered to a third reading Thursday, June 13.

The resolution was read a third time Wednesday, July 24, 1918, in the following form as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 379):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution
2 by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The conservation, development and utilization of the 4 agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Com-
5 monwealth are public uses, and the General Court shall 6 have power to provide for the taking, by purchase or other-
7 wise, of lands and easements or interests therein, including
8 water and mineral rights, for the purpose of securing and 9 promoting the proper conservation, development, utilization
10 and control thereof and to enact legislation necessary or 11 expedient therefor.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in line 3, the words ", development and utilization"; and inserting in place thereof the words "and development"; and by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words ", development, utilization and control"; and inserting in place thereof the words "and development".

These amendments were rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 79 to 106.

Mr. Augustus P. Loring of Beverly moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in line 4, the words "and water resources" and inserting in place thereof the words "water and other natural resources".

This amendment was adopted.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "by purchase or otherwise"; and inserting in place thereof the words "upon payment of just compensation therefor".

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. David Manicowitz of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by inserting after the word "taking", in line 6, the words "by the Commonwealth".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. James P. Richardson of Newton moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "taking, by purchase or otherwise"; and inserting in place thereof the words "purchase, or taking by eminent domain".

This amendment was withdrawn.
Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in line 9, the word "proper".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Patrick S. Broderick of Waltham moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "and the standard by which the value of water rights and water privileges shall be determined shall be the volume of power utilized by the owner or owners or lessees thereof".

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution, as amended, was passed to be engrossed Thursday, July 25, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 127 to 74, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment.

The conservation, development and utilization of the agricultural, mineral, forest, water and other natural resources of the Commonwealth are public uses, and the General Court shall have power to provide for the taking, upon payment of just compensation therefor, of lands and easements or interests therein, including water and mineral rights, for the purpose of securing and promoting the proper conservation, development, utilization and control thereof and to enact legislation necessary to accomplish or expedite thereon.

The resolution was considered again Wednesday, August 7.

Mr. Frank F. Dresser of Worcester moved that Rule 53 be suspended that he might move that the resolution be amended by striking out all after the title, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Section II of chapter V of part the second of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting before the words "to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity" the words "to foster the development and use of the waste or undeveloped natural resources of the Commonwealth;"

The Convention refused to suspend the rule, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 114 to 91 (two-thirds of the members present not having voted in the affirmative).

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that Rule 53 be suspended that he might move that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 3, the words "development and utilization", and inserting in place thereof the words "development and control"; and by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "development and utilization and control", and inserting in place thereof the words "development and control".

The Convention refused to suspend the rule.

The Convention voted, Wednesday, August 7, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 136 to 86, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 172,111 to 102,768.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I do not know whether the other members of this Convention have had an opportunity to read this measure carefully. I have looked it over a little and I must confess that I am somewhat at sea as to what it means. I think it would be well to have some explanation as to what it really provides for. I hardly think the gentleman who has charge of this measure is here, but possibly some other member of the committee, or some member of this Committee of the Whole, can explain the matter to us.

Mr. Hoobs of Worcester: The chairman of the committee which reported this measure is unavoidably absent, but I will endeavor to explain, as briefly as I may, the reasons for the committee reporting it.
Committee had before it several propositions, one being No. 231, related to the public interest in natural resources. I do not think any member of the Convention will seriously question but there really is a public interest in our natural resources. Up to now the abundance of our natural resources, we have been concerned with private interests in those resources than with the public interest. But unfortunately we are approaching a time when we must count our resources a little closer, when we realize that they are not infinite and that the public interest demands the best use of the resources. To the end that the public may obtain the greatest possible benefit from such as it has. The question of conservation and development is therefore one that in recent years has come to the fore. It is a problem that is, I think, one of the burning problems of the day. The United States government has spent enormous sums of money in the development of waste lands and is endeavoring to conserve, as far as it can, both forest and mineral resources.

In Massachusetts we have no very extensive mineral resources. Our forest resources are not so great as they might be. We have considerable tracts of land that are marshy and that the State might well develop. In order that there may be explicit recognition of the right of the Commonwealth to protect itself through the use of its own resources to the best advantage that the committee have reported this resolution. It is in order that there may be no question as to the right of the Legislature to exercise that right. There is some question as to whether the conservation of natural resources is in all cases public use as that term is used in the present Constitution. On this reason it would seem that there is cause for the adoption of this amendment, and I trust that the Committee of the Whole will see fit to recommend it favorably.

Brown of Brockton: That is my resolution,—at least what is left of it. I introduced a resolution containing the fundamental declaration that there could be no just private property in natural resources. The gentleman of the committee says that there is nothing in the Constitution upon that subject. There were very few resources when the Constitution was framed. The only one was in the purview of the makers of the Constitution were water and the principle is carried out. The larger ponds are for the public use. The committee have reported, and I hope the amendment will pass. The time will come when the legality of the title to natural resources will be questioned. It will be so considered, and, I hope, no doubt. It enters at this moment into the question which affects and perhaps some time may shock this Nation,—that is, the cost of living. To illustrate: Some people obtain a piece of land by the bounds as set forth in the deed; then they discover the ground and underneath the ground are vast resources of iron. They then take to create a monopoly in iron. Then the market price of iron rolls, as it is controlled now by the steel corporations. Thus the price of railroad rails fixed so that steel stock, the common stock which is mostly water, is yielding nearly 100 per cent profit. Profit, or part of it, is made out of the price that is charged for road rail. The rail is laid to transport the raw material in the factories that transform it by the labor of people therein.
Then the railroad carries that product from the laborer back to the workers of the field. Every time that the material or product is moved then labor pays a tribute to those who own the iron. They have taken wealth which they did not earn. Thus they profit at the expense of labor by owning valuable resources. They did not create that value. The value is a natural, inalienable inheritance belonging to all of the people. It certainly is fundamental. Connected with the declaration that a man has a right to life, that he has a right to acquire property, and that he has a right to be protected in such labor. While he labors his wages change every time that the price of the commodities change into which he exchanges his wages. The prices exacted by owners of natural resources are embodied in these commodities. Therein comes the robbery, if I may use so harsh a term, but it certainly is robbery morally if you take something and do not render an equivalent. Because of the lack of the acquiring of these titles there has grown up a new kind of property, a dangerous kind of property. It was not contemplated by the makers of the Constitution, or those who revised it in 1853. The extent of such resources was unknown. Then property was a horse or a cow or a house, but it was so clearly property directly connected with a man’s labor that any man would be a robber who undertook to take from him that property, without proper equivalent. Monopoly in the natural resources has taken to itself a privilege. It exercises a taxing power. Thus there is enthroned outside of this government a monopoly and a privilege which proceeds to fix its own price upon what it calls its property. I suppose has a clear right so far as it can exercise any influence here to prevent the touching of these titles. The great trouble in our economic situation is because the purchasing power of the producers of wealth is never stable; that something is taken from it without full equivalent being rendered. Throughout this Commonwealth as well as in other States people have nothing left to take and they all can get to pay the price to live. Once or twice has this fact been touched upon in this Convention. The gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), trying to save what to him seemed to be an unnecessary expense for the printing of these Convention reports sounded the word that in this Commonwealth there is suffering. He tried to draw attention to the condition of a number of people. It seems to me that you might almost hear the men of the Constitution, whom you have quoted here, ask: “What have you produced with the Constitution which we gave to you? What have you produced with that Constitution which intended that people should own their homes, sit under their own vine and fig tree so that no man make them afraid? Have you any less poor in this Commonwealth than when we founded it? Have you so far exercised the powers of government that the laws you have passed by the very fact that they were passed and the people recognized that they were passed for their interest? Have you so administered the affairs of this Commonwealth that there is no such feeling to-day in Massachusetts? Are there any people who feel that they are not being legislated for and that it is only the corporations and the interests that receive attention? Have you answer it. I am not going to answer it for you. The conditions are here in this Commonwealth.
solution touches the subject. It provides if the exigency shall exist, this Commonwealth that ownership of natural resources cannot be dealt with as all affairs ought to be dealt with in the Common-wealth—on the basis of equity. It is going to recognize ownership or rights and authorize the Legislature to take that property at whatever might be fair. That is something. To my mind it is more than your sectarian amendment, because it affects all the people. If there is a power in this State or a power in this Nation that gives the right to tax the wealth production and to take from wealth producers more than it gives in return then you have got the power exactly as you tackled the slave power, because the principle is the same. If any man can take a part of your earnings and rendering you an equivalent, he to that extent is your slave. You may be free to come and go as you please, but he touches point of your life, your wages or your earnings, whatever they be, and through the power of the law he makes you pay if you buy of his goods whatever at the price he sees fit to demand in it. It is against public policy, and you never should and you can have given a good title to natural resources, because it is yourself into slavery. If, for instance, a man may hold an title to the coal fields, then he may, charge what he pleases. If coal is essential for your life and you have sold the title coal and the title is absolute, then the owner of the coal can and you to work at his price for the coal. You cannot escape it. principle of ownership is the principle of the slaveholders' ownership. That ownership seeks to control the government. That owner-ship is too powerful. The people are feeling it. They are voicing it. The natural voice that teaches them that it is an injustice. So ussets, if it passes this resolution, may be the first to declare honest title has been gained to these resources. I hope that solution may pass.

CLAPP of Lexington: I think perhaps I ought to say a word on this matter as a member of the committee on Public Affairs, as reported it. For all that appears on the calendar, this was a famous report of the committee. That, however, was not the case. I do not remember how many men voted in the negative, but I did for one. It was understood that on this and certain other matters, though reported with no formal dissent, our rights were understood to be preserved.

My objection, or at least one objection, to adopting this proposition is the vagueness and uncertainty of its meaning. For one, utterly opposed to engrafting any amendment upon our existing constitution where the meaning of what we add is not clear, definite and certain. I do not believe that there is any man in this Convention can tell exactly what this proposition means.

But to call the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact that another resolution has been recommended by the Senate which deals with the same subject-matter, though not with coal and iron. That subject would hardly need to be dealt with; now there are not any such minerals in this State. But the resolution does deal with water rights, timber rights and other subjects of that nature. I will ask you to read it; it is resolution No. If you will permit me I shall read it myself:
The conservation, development and use of agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth are matters of public interest. The General Court may therefore authorize the taking, by purchase or otherwise, of such lands or easements or interests therein, including water and mineral rights, and may enact such legislation as may be necessary or expedient for securing and promoting the proper conservation, development and use thereof.

Now, I think, sir, that that proposed amendment has some merit and would be worthy of your careful consideration. In my opinion it is slightly too broad and should be pared down a bit. But the point I am making now is that whatever merit there may be in No. 231, which the gentleman from Brockton has just discussed, may best be taken care of in connection with this proposed amendment, document No. 321.

Mr. BROWN: I wanted to know if the gentleman understood me as accepting the resolution under discussion as a substitute for mine, — that I am satisfied with it? I am speaking for the committee’s report. I am satisfied with it.

Mr. CLAPP: I did not quite gather that. I understood the gentleman from Brockton to be arguing in favor of the adoption of resolution No. 231, to which I am opposed, — if that is the one that we are now considering on the docket. I am trying to make it plain that I hope No. 231 will be rejected.

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I should like to confer on the committee, on this and all future occasions, the great favor which I have bestowed upon it and upon the Convention more than once, unknown to it, by holding my peace when I felt strongly inclined to say something. But, assuming that the resolution before the committee is document No. 321, a new draft reported by the committee on Public Affairs, as seems to be the case, there is one feature of the attention of the committee ought to be called before it is acted upon. If the gentlemen have this document No. 321 before them they will see that it begins with a declaration in these terms:

The conservation, development and use of agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth are matters of public interest. The General Court may therefore authorize the taking, by purchase or otherwise, of such lands or easements or interests therein.

In other words, it authorizes the Legislature to take, in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, every farm in the Commonwealth and every foot of agricultural land, for no declared reason whatever, because no declared reason is necessary, but only because in the view of the Legislature there is some reason for taking that particular land for the purposes of conservation of resources.

Perhaps I ought to say for the benefit of lay members of the Convention, although many of them may know as much law as I do, that the constitutional principle is that property can be taken by eminent domain only for a recognized public use. The effect of this resolution would make anything which in the eye of the Legislature appeared to be the conservation of natural resources a sufficient public use to warrant the taking, and the power, as I have said, extends to the taking of every farm in the Commonwealth. There may be reasons why we ought to do that. I have no doubt that a minute will be enough to enable the committee to dispose of a trivial question of this character, and so I will not make any motion to delay the resolution. But, as I said in rising, it ought not to be acted upon, as it appears to me, until
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES. 549

Clapp: I wish to acknowledge my error. I see now I was in. And now I should like to say a word in regard to No. 321. As I said when I was on my feet before, is that while that the resolution has some merit, it is too vague. So far as to water-powers and forests I am in its favor, I have long held that our Constitution and laws should be in such shape that it could be competent for the Legislature to regulate the cutting of our forests, to the end that we might conserve our resources of timber, and in the shape of water rights, which are yet in a great measure upon the due protection of the forests. I agree with the delegate from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) that the solution is altogether too broad. I voted in the committee to strike out the phrase "agricultural resources." While I am willing to recognize the substance of this resolution should recommend to the attention, I am opposed to the recommendation of it in its present form.

Clark of Brockton: I rise to make this inquiry relative to Nos. 321. What I wish to know is if No. 321 is broad enough in its terms, or if it include the provision in No. 320, last line, which provides that the Legislature may authorize the construction of homes for citizens. Clapp: Obviously not. I move as an amendment to this resolution that the word "agricultural" appearing in the first line be stricken out.

Clark: I am somewhat interested in this subject-matter as well in these two resolutions, and especially in that provision of the resolution that relates to the providing of homes for citizens. It is a well recognized fact that the home is the unit, the most important unit, of our civilization, and that the home is the most important factor underlying our institutions and the best guarantee we have for the perpetuation of our democracy in America. At present time the tendency is for the people to concentrate to such an extent that there is congestion in our cities in the great centers of industry. And it is detrimental, in the opinion of social reformers and all those interested in humanity, to the best interests, social, moral, of these communities and of this State at large. I am pleased to note, Mr. Chairman, that the development in our State and in our larger towns of the policy of establishing school gardens working beneficially and I believe it is destined to work an important change in our social, in our agricultural and in our domestic life. In the city of Brockton we have over 3,000 school gardens and work yards and girls, who a few years ago were restless and uneasy during summer months, the time of the long vacation, now find employment that is useful to them and to their families. It is beneficial to them in various ways. There is less mischief, there is less juvenile delinquency, there is a better standard of morals and of social culture among those people already beginning to manifest itself. I look upon it as important matter in connection with our public educational institutions and I hope it will be extended and the tendency will be for boys, when they grow to manhood, when they marry, when they form families, to desire to get out on the line of one of our street railroads and I hope that the railroad will form such a network all over this Commonwealth.
and have a little piece of land, an eighth or a quarter of an acre or perchance an acre, and cultivate that land. In one corner of the rear there will be a little garden plot; in the other corner there will be a poultry house and yard. Around the house there will be a flower garden in which the wife and the children will be interested. At night when the father comes home, instead of immediately after his evening meal, his supper, finding his way into the heart of the city or the village and finding his way into some place that is objectionable because of its effect on the morals and the social nature of the man, he will go into the garden, he will go to his poultry house, he will develop those better qualities of fatherhood and those qualities that pertain to the highest type of a husband. It will inure to a better condition in our entire Commonwealth.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, because of these reasons and various others that I might enumerate, which have come to my mind as I have studied this matter in the last few years, that this resolution 320 will be passed and that it will authorize the Legislatures which will sit in this chamber in future years, if in their judgment and wisdom they shall deem it best, to pass legislation along the lines proposed there.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: May I be permitted to ask my friend the Attorney-General (Mr. Pillsbury) who has just spoken, a question? I am not certain that I apprehended his meaning, but I should like to ask him whether his objection to this resolution was because in his opinion this resolution takes away from the courts the power of declaring what is a public use and gives it to the Legislature, or whether it was not.

Mr. Pillsbury: The question of my distinguished friend from Quincy was addressed in terms to the Attorney-General, and while there is a gentleman in the west wing who probably would object to hearing me so designated, I assume that my friend from Quincy meant to address the question to me. Am I right?

Mr. Adams: You are right.

Mr. Pillsbury: That is not my principal objection. In my opinion, the terms of this resolution make the conservation of natural resources, or anything which the Legislature is disposed to regard as the conservation of natural resources, a new public use sufficient to authorize the exercise of the power of eminent domain to take any or all of these things described in the resolution. That appears to be its effect, and the question in my mind is whether, in this view, it ought to extend to all agricultural lands.

Mr. Adams: May I ask further whether that objection is one which goes to the basis of all these questions of the extension of taking for public use? That is to say, he defines, as I suppose correctly, the power of the Legislature at present to authorize any taking under eminent domain subject to the approval of the court. Now I want to ask him whether his objection goes to the root of the matter, whether he objects to any interference with the power of the courts to limit the takings of the Legislature?

Mr. Pillsbury: I will try to make my answer short and clear. That is not the ground of my objection, and the resolution may not present that question. My only criticism is that it appears to me, at a moment's notice and without time to seriously consider it, to go too far in putting into the hands of the Legislature the power to take color of the conservation of natural resources any and every farm, for of course it extends to that. And if the gentleman Lexington (Mr. Clapp) had not moved to strike out the word "cultural"); I was intending to do so. In other respects it appears to have merit. I am inclined to favor it as extending the power by eminent domain for the conservation of mineral, forest, and water resources.

Butler of Brockton: As the only farmer on the committee on Affairs and the member who worked the hardest to have this "agricultural" inserted in the measure, I want to explain to this why I saw fit to have it inserted. It was not the purpose of that committee to take from anyone in the Commonwealth a farm that is of any use to him. It was the purpose of that committee to the Legislature the right to take land that to-day has no value in commonwealth and is of no use to our citizens. For example, I say to you, the Hockamock swamp that lies between Brockton and Canton, when that can be ditched so that the water can be from it there will be thousands of acres of land that will be as good crops as any of the land in the Missouri valley. is land in Marshfield that to-day, if it were properly cared for, show the same results, and you have the same kind of land on the North Shore, and that is the reason why the word "agricultural" was put in. It was not to take from any rich man his farm, it to convert any big estate for the use of the Commonwealth, was to take land that to-day is worth but very little and make it at agricultural value. [Applause.]

Adams: I wish to thank the gentleman who spoke next before (Mr. Pillsbury) for his definition of what he thinks there is in solution, and I am extremely glad that the question has been made before this Convention, because it seems to me one of the important questions which can arise. We are living in a of great and rapid and violent change, and it is very essential we should consider carefully whether it is desirable for us to permit state to be hampered in those takings which the Legislature or the public safety because some property owner or other has to appeal to the judgment of the court. It is the old question arises, has arisen from the beginning of this government and continuously is increasing in importance every day, whether the interests individual shall be allowed to stand in the way of your laws, at the cost of public safety or of public welfare. It is, in other substituting the decision of a bench of gentlemen for the decision representatives of the people as to what is reasonable. Now, the decision is taken by the Convention on that subject, — the the decision, — I hope that this committee will pause and consider mentous character of this question. Is or is not this country, crisis in which it now stands, willing to put into the hands of a of gentlemen the power of saying what is or is not a reasonable the of public defence or a reasonable measure for promoting the welfare? I do not think that it is a question which can be in a moment; it is a question which deserves the most careful attention and the most thorough debate.

Clapp: A man who has been for some years engineer of the Board of Agriculture, and who is now a delegate to this Convention (Mr. Wheeler of Concord) has just brought to my attention something which I think deserves consideration. He says, while he agrees with me that the term "agricultural resources" is too broad to appear in this amendment, yet there is a real need in this State to-day of some constitutional and legal authority whereby the flats or low lands may be obliged, compelled, to unite in a cooperative scheme for their development. I think, therefore, that it would be well at this stage to have this amendment, the whole proposition, laid upon the table. Let us do this, to the end that, as the delegate from Quincy (Mr. Adams) suggests, we may give the subject more thorough and careful consideration; and to the end especially that the suggestion which has come to me from the engineer of the State Board of Agriculture may be considered. I move you, therefore, that the whole resolution, with the pending amendment, be laid upon the table.

The Chair declared that the motion to lay on the table was not in order and subsequently, Mr. Clapp moved that the Committee of the Whole recommend to the Convention that the report be recommitted to the committee on Public Affairs.

Mr. Charbonneau of Lowell moved that the resolution (No. 321) be amended by inserting after the word "taking", in line 6, the words "by such public body as it may designate.

Mr. Pillsbury: I have no objection whatever to the last motion of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) to report that the matter ought to be recommitted, but I venture to believe that there is a short and easy way of accomplishing what I now think the committee would be disposed to do in view of what has been said, and that is by inserting in line three, before the word "agricultural", — leaving that instead of striking it out, — the word "undeveloped", so that it will be confined to a power to take "undeveloped agricultural" resources, which I am now given to understand is what the committee have in view. For the purpose of taking the sense of the committee upon that question I will move that amendment. And in respect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau), Mr. Chairman, that is in the resolution anyway. The power of eminent domain may be exercised by any agency to which the Legislature sees fit to delegate it.

Mr. Brown: This seems to be Brockton day. I was waiting to hear a farmer get on this floor. I am against the motion to add the word "undeveloped." The chairman of the committee resolution is Delegate Anderson (of Brookline), who yesterday said that because he was in court on a matter of National interest he could not be here. A man who has held the positions which he has held and who is recognized as he is recognized, would not report the resolution if there was any legal objection to it.

The United States at this very moment is saying that if a man belongs to the agricultural army he need not join the fighting army because we need food to feed the fighting army. It has urged the farmers to raise crops and to take the chance that possibly they may be recompensed. Yet to-day, take it through the State of Maine or Massachusetts, you find the farmers are not breaking even. They are preyed upon by all of the trusts. We are in perilous times. How long before you in Massachusetts will draft men and take farms for the purpose of raising food that must be had if the Nation is going to live
Almighty making a Napoleon out of a Kerensky in Russia who make the revolution and guide liberty in its proper channels? Will liberty overflow its banks and carry destruction before it? Shows not.

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform.

Do not know how the new dispensation is coming, when men are made wholly free. In this Commonwealth the old natural order is reversed. It was agriculture first, manufactures next and trade last; now it is commerce first, and manufactures next, and trade last. Everything is weighed in the scale of dollars. You and your sectarian amendment in the scale of dollars. You told any dollars you had given to educate young men; but you did not what you made by educating young men. The greatest work Massachusetts or any other State can accomplish is the raising of men and women. Look to it when the draft comes, and see the effect of the past one or two generations. Look to it when you see other man rejected because he has not got the physique to serve in the army. Look to it when you see that the people's feet are no longer on the ground they own, where they ought to be, defending their soil; but rather that they have got nothing but a personal right.

Not put that word "undeveloped" in. Why do you continually make the Legislature? What is the matter with the Legislature? It is as though the people. You never can give out any laws better than the people are able to receive, and you cannot long give out laws that are better than they want. Why should you put in the word "undeveloped"? Leave the resolution as it is. What great natural resources are worthy of being developed to-day than the resources of agriculture. If the farm cannot be made attractive, if it cannot raise the soil, if every one is to be a distributor, if the farmer, worker, is to carry the unneeded distributor on his back, as he is going on his back now, where are we going to land? Let the land be taken if it is necessary. Help the farmer, if he needs help. You have gone so far as to recognize the fact that you give him a minimum price. I want my position understood. I advocated a broad declaration of no private title in agricultural land. It came before the committee. I advocated it before the committee. The committee in its wisdom made its report. It gives to the Commonwealth the right at any time to take the property. With me satisfied. I fail to see why, when a committee has been appointed unanimously in one case, you should now oppose a unanimous committee report in this case. I ask that this amendment "undeveloped" be voted down, that there be no reconsideration, that the committee's report be accepted.

Montague of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting the word "agricultural", in line 3, the words "land and of", so as to read: "conservation, development and use of agricultural land and of mineral, and water resources".

Montague: The amendment that I suggest presupposes the deletion of the amendment "undeveloped", which already has been struck out, so that if my amendment and that word "undeveloped" should be adopted it would read in this way: "The conservation of undeveloped agricultural land and of mineral, water and forest." My idea is this: It seems to me that the word "undeveloped" alone applies not only to land but to forests, water rights and minerals. We do not need to worry much about the minerals, but it seems to me that it might fairly be said with the word "undeveloped" alone that the State could not take any interest in water rights which are wholly or partially developed, but that it would have to take wholly undeveloped water rights, and those are very scarce in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Chairman, the feature that appeals to me mostly is the one mentioned by the gentleman in the fourth division, whose name I do not know (Mr. Butler), and that is with reference to the flats, hundreds of thousands of acres of which lie along our coast, and which now are practically undeveloped. It seems to me the day is coming when here in Massachusetts we have got to do the same as they do in Holland, which I have seen, where every one of those flats such as we have to-day up and down our coast is all diked out and pumped out and is producing tremendous crops. We can do it all along our coast. When I was in the Legislature people who owned some flats, — I forget just where, but it was down the North Shore, — came up here and desired to do that very thing privately; but they could not do it, because one man, who owned about six acres right in the middle of the tract, sat back and would not do a thing. He would neither fish nor cut bait. They could not do a single thing in developing those flats because that man would not do anything or allow others to do anything even at their own expense. It seems to me that, considering the way that prices of foods are going up, within 25 years we have got to utilize every foot of available land in this Commonwealth in which there is any fertility, and there is fertility in all these flats, all that I know anything about. After they have been diked out and two or three years have gone by, so that they have got dry, they will be the most fertile lands in this Commonwealth.

I believe there is something in the forest line, and also in the water rights, and I would not like it restricted to the purely undeveloped forests or water rights, because who can say what water rights or what forests are wholly undeveloped? They are all developed to some extent. And so I would say "undeveloped agricultural lands," and then leave the minerals and the water and the forests just as they are in the bill, developed or undeveloped. If they need improvement, improve them.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: I earnestly hope that none of the amendments to this resolution will be considered by this Convention. I believe that the word "undeveloped" was purposely put in there in an unfriendly spirit to the resolution. It means a great deal to this Commonwealth whether or not in the future we shall have the right to own and operate the natural resources of this State, and there should be no restriction and there should be no protection to vested rights that now may be in existence when it conflicts with the rights that are fundamental, those of the people of this Commonwealth. There is no doubt about the natural resources of the Commonwealth, when they concern all the people, being of such vital interest to them that there should be a constitutional provision and it is fundamentally a constitutional
Mr. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that to put in the word "undeveloped" would strangle for all time the development of the Merrimack Valley, for example, a development for which cities and towns in the northern part of this Commonwealth have been earnestly striving, and some day it will be granted them. There are on that certain water-powers that were given away, certain water-powers belong to the people of this Commonwealth to-day in spite of the fact that Legislature has given them away, and it may be in the future that the people of this Commonwealth will want to take over rights for the benefit of the people of a large portion of this State and the Constitution to my mind should permit such an act on the part of the Commonwealth. It should not be restricted by the word "undeveloped." That word "undeveloped", placed where it is, diseverything in that resolution, mineral resources and everything and the legal mind that inserted it there knows very well the tendence of it and knows very well that it is an unfriendly act to resolution. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this Convention will be wise enough, will have vision enough to see that the natural resources of this State should be conserved for the people of the Commonwealth and the Constitution as this resolution permits, without any unfriendly amendments.

O'Connell of Boston: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the motion of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) will prevail, and that subject will be referred back to the committee for further deliberation in their part. It is certainly one of the important subjects that came before this Convention, and I trust this Committee of the Whole to-day will send it back to the committee on Public Affairs for the purpose of getting more light upon it.

In line with that purpose, I want to submit as an amendment, the thing: To strike out, in lines 3 and 4, the words "agricultural, mineral, forest and water", and insert in place thereof the words "all natural", so that it may read as follows: "The conservation, enjoyment and use of all the natural resources of the Commonwealth are matters of public interest."

I think that covers it in a broad way, possibly too broadly; nevertheless I think it brings it before us concretely in the form that we have to discuss it. If any exceptions are to be introduced to it they will be brought in from that proposition. I shall reserve the right to discuss that feature of it later, but I do trust that this will go back to the committee for the purpose of having it brought out in such a shape as to remove the suspicions of the suggested change by the gentleman from Lynn (Mr. Pillsbury) expressed by the delegate from Lynn (Mr. E.) may not be possible.

Hobbs: I am not at all hostile to the idea of sending this back to the committee if the Convention feels that there is really any great necessity disclosed by the several amendments that have been made. I take the one first, striking out the words "agricultural, mineral, forest and water", and substituting simply the words "all the natural", the only other natural resources that I can readily think of the fisheries and game, and the protection of those is already a mental part of our public policy. I really do not think that the amendment will add a great deal. I should like to be convinced if it would, because I would not willingly reject any worthy idea, but at present it does not seem to me that the proposal would add a great deal to this amendment.

As to the amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), I assure him that I am not one of those who think that they know more law than he does, because I know that I do not; but I must admit that I could not approve of his amendment, because in the place that it is it must necessarily apply to and limit all the succeeding words. I think that the result of that has been pretty adequately covered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Montague) and the gentleman from Lynn (Mr. Bauer). If it goes in with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston of course it would affect only agricultural resources, and the question then would naturally arise whether undeveloped agricultural resources means merely land in a state of nature or is broad enough to include land with a certain moderate amount of cultivation. Suppose, for instance, a gentleman owns a large tract of land suitable for agriculture and fixes it up for a game preserve; that in a way would be developed, since it is developed for a certain use. Then the question would arise whether it would come within this amendment if it were desired to take it for some agricultural purpose.

As to the necessity of the whole article of amendment, I think perhaps enough has been said. The State Board of Agriculture, as I understand, claim that such an amendment might be necessary in order to provide for proper development of low lying lands. That is a thing that would add a great deal to the wealth, both in respect to taxable wealth and production, and it is a thing that the Legislature might well want to do. For that reason I should oppose the striking out of the word “agricultural” entirely, as the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) desires to do, and I should, I think, oppose the limiting word. There is no real danger, I think, in entrusting this power to the State. The Legislature never has shown any great inclination to run wild in the matter of taking land by eminent domain. It has been complained of, if anything, for being a little conservative in its undertakings. So far as the power has been given to it I think it has been used well and wisely, and I see no reason why it should not be used well and wisely in the future. There is no danger, I think, of the State going into the business of agriculture on a broad scale, except under the spur of urgent necessity. The greatest difficulty with the farming situation is not the making land available, but finding men to work it, and I do not think that we shall go very far in the solution of that problem by refining the language of the amendments authorizing the taking.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau) which limits the authorization of taking to public bodies alone, I should question if that was advisable. I think that the power may be safely entrusted to the Legislature in the first place, and in the second place I think that the power of eminent domain might be given under proper restrictions to cooperative undertakings such as the State Board of Agriculture evidently has in mind. That would be manifestly impossible if the limiting words suggested by the gentleman from Lowell were adopted. If the Committee of the Whole is convinced that the committee on the matter sufficiently, I think that we might properly report to the convention that it be referred back to the committee; but if the committee of the Whole is convinced that it is entirely safe, as I think it to leave the words as they stand, then there would seem to be no reason for sending it back. It is a matter for the Convention to judge the last analysis, and I leave it in their hands with great confidence.

J. DRESSER of Worcester: I hope that this resolution will not be altered, certainly in its present form, or else will be much more carefully worded. The first sentence of the resolution, declaring these matters to be of public interest, is no news. They always have been of such interest in the Commonwealth. Many statutes on our statute-books are now based on the fact that agriculture and forestry and water are matters of public interest. That sentence adds nothing. But the earliest acts which were passed by the Colony had to do with the development of water resources. My own county of Worcester has been built up entirely by the development of its streams and their waters under the Mill Acts, which were passed on the theory that those were of public interest, and that the conflicting rights of various persons along the stream were matters of legislative regulation and judicial adjustment. On the faith of that legislation every mill in this Commonwealth, every reservoir, has been erected. Rights have been secured under those Mill Acts and under that declaration, and this sound policy of the State has made the State a prosperous manufacturing community. If this committee and this Convention should go so far as to grant to the Legislature this power of condemnation, every mill title and every water title will be shaken. The power of condemnation that is given in this resolution is not controlled, as the power of condemnation in the Constitution now is, by the judicial interpretation of public use." I think the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) reads the law as I understand it, or certainly as I understand it as in this resolution, that if the Legislature should determine to take a means of what it called conservation or adjustment of rights among all the mill owners on a stream, or to regulate the use of water at one mill or to condemn it, that that might be a taking of property from one mill owner for the benefit of another mill owner for a taking for a private use in fact, and because the Legislature had so determined it, the taking would not be subject to review by the courts. It is, it seems to me, a matter that we ought to look at very sharply, and in order that the matter may be brought sharply to the attention I have proposed the following amendment:

Line 4, strike out the words "and water"; in line 8, strike out the words "and"," and again in line 4, insert after word "mineral", the word "and".

To read:

Conservation, development and use of agricultural, mineral and forest resources of the Commonwealth are matters of public interest. The General Court may authorize the taking, by purchase or otherwise, of such lands or easements thereon, including mineral rights, and may enact such legislation as may be necessary or expedient for securing and promoting the proper conservation, development and use thereof.

It seems to me, sir, that there is a distinction to be drawn between the agricultural question which has been debated here and the water questions which I am now raising, and perhaps the others. That distinction, it seems to me, ought to be considered more fully than I at least have been able to consider it, and therefore I hope, if it is possible, that this resolution with the amendments may be recommitted for further inquiry.

The resolution, with the pending amendments, was recommitted to the committee on Public Affairs Wednesday, July 25, 1917.

The committee reported the following new draft (No. 344), August 8, 1917:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3. The conservation, development and use of agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth are public uses for which the Legislature may take or authorize to be taken, by purchase or otherwise, lands or easements or interests therein, including water and mineral rights, and may enact legislation necessary or expedient for securing and promoting the proper conservation and development, use and control thereof.

This was the first of the proposed amendments to be debated in the 1917 session of the Convention, after a motion to postpone its consideration had been defeated. Debate was begun Thursday, June 13.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: This resolution, gentlemen, is of a very broad and almost revolutionary nature. If passed, it introduces into Massachusetts a new rule of property with respect to agricultural lands, water resources and numerous other things mentioned in the resolution. Heretofore a man who has owned his farm in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has had a complete title to it; and so long as he owned it, he could cultivate it and make such use of it as he saw fit. I do not believe you realize what is the meaning of this declaration as it stands in the resolution. It starts off by saying in substance that the taking or the regulating the use of the property of the enumerated classes is a public use. Now, when you declare a public use with regard to a certain kind of property, or say that that property is affected by a public interest, you do something which is followed by many and important legal consequences. One of those consequences is that that property, and the use of it, becomes subject to regulation by the Legislature or by some board created by it. It follows, therefore, that under that law, — under that amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, — the Legislature, if it saw fit, could pass laws regulating the way in which the farmer should use his land, prescribing, if you please, the crops which he should raise and the order in which he should raise them. The Legislature might say that this year he should devote his land to the cultivation of beets or carrots, and the next year to the growing of onions, and so on. I do not believe, in the first place, that there is any need or exigency requiring a Constitutional amendment of that scope. In the second place, I do not believe that the farmers in this State desire to have their holdings of farm lands and their homesteads put into the possible control of the Legislature in that way.

Now, gentlemen, as I have been able to understand the situation after giving this subject some study for the last year, there are two possible things for which this Constitutional Convention might well provide. One of them relates to agricultural lands; the other one relates to water-power.
not take the question of land. It has been said here time and time on it is perfectly true, that there are large areas of low, waste undeveloped land in Massachusetts which might well be brought into cultivation and made to increase the food supply of the State.
Under the present condition of the Constitution and its laws there is no way anything that can be done. We have had for a hundred and more upon the statute-books a law under which the several parishes in common may go to the court, with the consent of a majority in interest, and have a commission appointed for the pur-pose of draining and improving in other limited respects those lands and in common. I will not discuss the details of the statute, but the effect of it is such that nothing can be done unless, in the first instance, you get a majority in interest as regards the area or value of land and join in the petition to the courts, and that sometimes is a thing to do. At all events, I am sure that the secret of the Department of Agriculture would tell you that that substancial difference of interest, and that in the experience of the board they find that they cannot force the improvement of these low and swampy lands.
I agree that the Constitution may well be amended in such a way that the Legislature may compel the development of such broad areas of waste land as, for example, the Sudbury meadows or other lands that readily come to the recollection of any one of us.
There is only one way by which that thing can be forced, and see how by authorizing the Legislature to provide by any appropriate means, such as the creation of a corporation, for the taking by right of eminent domain, of those areas of land paid to the owners of just compensation, and then having them taken by or the corporation which takes them given authority to pro-with their development and improvement. That is a rough, out-statement of what the need is as regards the development of agricultural land.

This is a single need, and so far as I have been able to see by a single need, with regard to the water-powers of the State.
I am much impressed by a statement made by the delegate from (General) (Mr. Loring) in some connection last summer, when he said that a fact the water-powers in Massachusetts, on the whole, had developed efficiently in the public interest by public-spirited men, that there was little, if any, criticism that could be passed upon them in which those developments had been made under the pres-current Constitution. But, gentlemen, with the increasing field that comes with the use of electricity for power, and perhaps for heating purposes, is a need, — or may be a need, — of something which perhaps be had under the existing limitations of our Constitution. Let explain what that is. You have upon a stream, the Connecticut, Rivers, or the Miller's River, for example, a series of dams already with the incident water-powers pretty fully developed, and you may say offhand that there is not anything further that can be done of those streams; but you find a rule in those cases that there is a least amount of water in the spring of the year, flood time, coming to that stream, going over those dams and running to waste, doing any good. Now there is an opportunity in a case of that by the construction of a pond or storage reservoirs up the stream, to gather up and save that large volume of water which now goes to waste in the spring and, by regulating the withdrawal of its flow, cause a vastly increased amount of power to be produced on that stream, especially during the warm portion of the year. But in order to do that it becomes necessary to construct storage dams and reservoirs up the stream. Who is going to pay for it? Obviously, that improvement should be paid for by all of the several owners of the water-powers who participate in the benefit of it; but it usually happens that the fellows down the stream play the part of a dog in the manger. They know that if somebody above them goes ahead and makes the development they will get the benefit of it. It costs money to make these large developments, especially on the scale needed in these times, and it looks to be a reasonable proposition that if some men of enterprise, having in mind not only their own interests but those of the public as well, get together and are willing to raise the money to build these upper reservoirs which will so much conserve the water-power, they should be encouraged to do that by laws which would enable them to make those who share in the benefit with them pay their proportionate part of the cost. I do not know just how to get at that. Perhaps I am not called upon at the present stage to tell how to do it, but I think something like this would be all sufficiently for that particular purpose, namely: Provide that —

For developing, extending or conserving the water-powers of this State in the public interest the Legislature may authorize the construction and regulate the use of dams, storage reservoirs and other like improvements, due compensation to be paid for private property taken therefor, and may provide for the assessment of a just proportion of the cost of such improvement upon water-powers benefited thereby.

I throw that out merely as a suggestion in passing.

Now come back for a moment to the agricultural end of the proposition. I worked out last year something which seemed to me to cover the matter adequately, namely (see No. 346):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The conservation, development and use for agricultural purposes, of low, swampy, waste or otherwise undeveloped land are public uses for which the Legislature may take, or authorize to be taken, by purchase or otherwise, lands or easements and interests therein.

To that extent I am willing to stand for a modification of the rule of property as it exists in Massachusetts to-day, and I think that is as far as we should go at the present time.

Finally, Mr. President and members, you can see readily from what I have said regarding the very broad scope of this main resolution now before us, that there must exist differences of opinion as to what you should do with the resolution and the different parts of it. I think that it will simplify the situation and make it easier to deal with the subject if we divide the resolution into parts, and I want to conclude the desultory remarks which I am making now by moving in substance that the resolution be divided, to the end that the agricultural portion of it be treated separately; and if that motion prevails, as I hope and believe it will, then I shall move the adoption of this agricultural resolution which I have just read. Then, having disposed of the agricultural portion of it, the Convention will be free to come back and deal with the other part of it. Now that is my program; I want help me carry it out. I move that the resolution now under on, if this motion is in order, be divided so that the part re-o agriculture shall be treated first and separately.

PRESIDENT: The Chair is of the opinion that the resolution is in such form that it cannot be divided. The member can amendments if he desires.

CLAPP: Very well. Then I move as an amendment the adop-
document No. 346.

BAUER of Lynn: I have listened with a great deal of amaze-to the argument advanced by the member from Lexington as to wanted a change made in this amendment and his document ed for the one now before the Convention. I cannot conceiv-telligent man in these times failing to see that there should be friction placed on the obtaining possession of our natural re-on the part of the people of this Commonwealth when they are for community interests, upon the payment of proper return to ho may own them. He mentions marsh land as being the only al land that should be returned to the State by eminent
. I wish to call to the gentleman's attention the many very acts of land in the western part of this State, in the Berkshire
, some of them to the extent of twenty thousand acres, that.
en bought up by wealthy people, not residents of this State, for reserves and other purposes. They have bought up hundreds of farms that were engaged in the occupation of producing food-or our people, and they have wiped out those farms that they have these large estates in the Berkshires and invite their s to them; and the non-productiveness of those tracts has been r by all the people of the State. The time is coming, Mr.
nt, when every available acre of our agricultural land that can od-stuffs will have to be taken by the people for that purpose, man shall conserve any large tract of land so that it may be r him to shoot game birds or to fish in its streams without tion or interference. The principle that he is trying to combat inciple so broad and so important to the people of this Com-that a restriction of it should not be considered for a minute in st of his resolution as an amendment.

States further that our water-powers have been developed by spirited men. Public spirited, indeed! They are all of them, one who has developed a water-power in this State, dollar
; and he knows it. The Connecticut River has been harnessed; ion has stopped. The coal for all the people in that great has been paid for at an advance of two to five dollars a ton,— of what? Because of certain private interests who have taken om the people the right to that river and have harnessed it up production of power that they may make an enormous profit

Merrimac Valley has been throttled for fifty years, has been ack for all these years, because the Essex Company has grabbed water-power there without the return to the State of a single under a most unusual charter, the only one ever granted by this wealth. What has that resulted in? It has resulted in the ed price of coal and commodities to many hundreds of thousands le in those communities west and north of Haverhill. They have been paying that advanced price for fifty years in order that a few stockholders may make an enormous profit out of what is a natural resource and which should belong to the people of this Commonwealth. This ownership should not be denied to them, nor should any of its advantages. I believe the time is coming after this war, when our men come back from the firing line, when all class and social and financial distinctions will be reorganized on an entirely different basis from anything we ever have known, and we should have our fundamental laws so liberal and so broad that they in their wisdom in the years to come can take advantage for the people of this Commonwealth of every natural resource in the Commonwealth that really belongs to them. And I hope the men in this Convention will be far-sighted enough to see the restricting and narrowing nature of the proposed substitute resolution that the gentleman wants adopted, and I hope they will oppose it.

Mr. Butler of Brockton: While I think that the farming interests of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will be protected with either one of these measures, I think document No. 344 would be the better one, but I think that the farming interests will be content if you will pass the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), and when it comes to its next reading we will be prepared to show to you what advantage it will be for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: The question is on substitution. To substitute the resolution of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) is to narrow the whole subject to conservation of waste lands. If you vote for substitution and the motion prevails, then we talk about nothing but waste lands. If the substitute is rejected, the question then is broadly on conservation of natural resources. In its broad form no question of more importance is before this Convention. It occupied much time during our previous session. If I had been arguing for delay to-day I should have urged that Mr. Anderson (of Brookline), the chairman of the committee, ought to be heard.

I want the attention of the attorneys. I want to ask them this question: To whom did the natural resources of this Commonwealth originally belong? Did they belong to all the people or to a part of the people? Is it true fundamentally that a man is born free and has no right to sell himself into slavery? Do you believe that? Well, if you believe that, then how can you in any way indorse legislation that has put into the hands of a few the natural resources by which they might enslave the many? Slavery does not consist merely in wearing chains. Any man who is in debt is in slavery. If he has bound himself to pay this debt, that bond is voluntary. But society has no moral right to authorize a few men to put you in debt; knowing it, or not knowing it, unquestionably has given some men that right by giving them the control of natural resources. How the evil shall be remedied is the great question to solve.

This legislation that has placed natural resources in the hands of private parties was passed when the people were not looking. On what plea did they get their titles from the Legislatures? It was on the plea of public convenience and necessity. That is the phraseology — public necessity and convenience require that certain people should be made a corporation, for what? Why, for the public convenience and necessity and not for private profit. On this plea they are
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES.

The question of our natural resources to-day. Therefore if the people feel that they can do better to take over these resources instead of allowing them to remain in private hands, why they should have the duty, and then reward the private owners as they should be rewarded. I claim that there is no natural resource of this country that is held morally as private property except it is held as a trust to be administered for the common welfare, the holders of the title to be rated for any efforts they have made in developing the resource, but otherwise it is for the interest of all the people. Had that grant we should not be in the confusion that we are to-day toward these natural resources.

That resolution declares that certain resources may be conserved. Does my friend from Lexington object to agricultural land being for the great people for their necessities? Is the land greater for the man who walks on it? If we may take the farmer from the army, may we not take also the land to support the army which he has gone? Who knows how long it may be before this Commonwealth must be reorganized on a fighting basis? How our Constitution principles are swept aside. Necessities do not provide for manufacturing that could be offered anywhere in the Commonwealth. What shall we provide that the people may say that natural resource whatever they are, may be conserved by the people for their use, or shall we lock the door and say: "No, whatever title a man has got to-day he may hold?" What would be the fate of some of your Massachusetts cities if they owned the water-supply on their borders? They could develop it and give the cheapest water for manufacturing that could be offered anywhere in the State. When you have cheap facilities you invite capital, you have settlement, you make possible the development of the largest city in the Commonwealth. But many of them to-day find themselves throttled because some private individual was the first to throw the water-power might be developed. Do not narrow this down by the substitute of the gentleman from Lexington. It ought to be no debate on waste land. Of course everybody here will be willing to have waste and swampy lands reclaimed. Of you would. We ought not to waste a great deal of time in reviewing the substitute. But this great measure that is before you is not to the advantage of some individuals. I would not be unfair to corporations, but they have no vested rights. Some think they have and there is the possibility of trouble. It was the claim of vested rights by the holders of vested rights that made trouble in this country, and if a claim of vested rights is raised again it will raise trouble again. Cannot we unite and bring these titles of ownership of our natural resources in cord with our institutions? You bring them into harmony; you permit public ownership if they do not properly fulfill their ends in the public interest.

Sire, sir, that the motion to substitute will not prevail; that the resolution when it comes to pass will not be amended. In the session we made suggestions and the committee modified and codifying their original draft and they have made a resolution which could be acceptable to the Convention.
Mr. Clapp: I am not seeking, gentlemen, to make my draft which relates to agriculture cover the whole field of the resolution. Perhaps it would, in the form in which my motion now stands. I do not want to cut off your opportunity to treat in some proper and fair way the question of conserving the water resources, and therefore, Mr. President, perhaps it will be proper for me to ask the leave of the Convention to change the form of my motion, which now is that document No. 346 be substituted for the entire resolution, and make this motion I move to amend the main resolution by striking out the word "agricultural", in the third line, and by adding as a separate paragraph document No. 346. Then if you adopt that amendment you will practically have your agriculture and your water business upon a separate basis, as I think they should be, and the resolution will be in form where, if you please, you may amend the paragraph of it which deals with water resources. I hope I may have the privilege of making that change in my motion.

The President: The Chair understands the member to move to strike out the word "agricultural", and to add at the end of the proposed amendment another paragraph reading as follows:

The conservation, development and use for agricultural purposes, of low, swampy waste or otherwise undeveloped lands are public uses for which the Legislature may take, or authorize to be taken, by purchase or otherwise, lands or easements and interests therein.

Mr. Hoar of Worcester: Owing to the absence, on affairs of the Nation, of the member of the Convention who is in charge of this matter (Mr. Anderson of Brookline), it devolves upon some other member of the committee to say a word or two as to the intentions of the committee in framing this resolution. The gentleman from Lexington has described this resolution as revolutionary. Of course, in times like this a mere word like "revolutionary" means very little, because we have matters upon us so much more important and far-reaching than a revolution that a touch of the red banner does not scare us as much as it used to. We live at present in times when a man's right to his life, liberty and also to his property is being subjected to great and important modifications. Nowadays we cannot regard anybody's right to his own property in so absolute a manner as sometimes has been the case. In these days, when every man's effort is needed in order to produce the food and the bare requirements for existence that the people of the Commonwealth require, no one ought to urge the sacred right of a person to develop and use his land as he pleases. If he is not using his land, if he is permitting to lie waste his land that is capable of producing crops in this time when every inch of land that can be cultivated ought to be bearing its crop, is the Convention prepared to say that his right of property and his right to let that land lie idle is a right that the community at large ought to respect? I do not think that it is. As a matter of fact, the community ought to have a right to protect itself in such emergencies, and if anybody sees fit to assert a right to let lie idle property of such a nature that it otherwise might feed the community, it is a proper part of the State's functions to see that that land does produce; and a right of property to let it lie idle is not a right that the State is bound to respect. If that is revolutionary, let anybody who wants to make the most of it I do not think it is. I think it is a fair statement of the right of the
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES. 565

...nity to protect itself, a right that is superior to all personal or private rights.

It bears upon one side of what the gentleman from Lexington that is, as to whether we ought to set up a right in the Legislature, to step in, and say what sort of crops land should be made to bear, what sort of use one should put his land to. Ordinarily, of course, not a function which the State would or could properly exercise. The legislature, singular as it may seem, is not omniscient and ordinarily cannot exercise as efficient control over private land as the individual. In ordinary times the familiar doctrine of supply and demand is entirely sufficient to take care of making the land produce that which the community really wants. It is in extraordinary times that a power of this sort would be useful, when the supply and demand in a way are shelved by the more important laws of necessity.

The gentleman from Lexington has mapped out pretty well two great directions, that is, this resolution covers at least two principles which seem to have considerable merit. One of them is the development of low grounds, and incidentally the irrigation of dry lands. The other is to the conservation and the development of water-power. I think I think, the importance of those two things.

The question has been put with regard to water-power as to whether it now is a public use, and if so, what is the need of a Constitution amendment? The answer to that is very simple. If it were a use there would be no need of this amendment. There is a case as to whether it does come under the definition of public use established heretofore by the courts. If I recall aright, in the earliest part of the laws, an attempt was made to justify them on the ground that public interest was promoted by the development of water-power and building up of the industrial life of the community. That attempt, however, was discarded and an attempt made to justify the acts on the ground that they were an exercise of the police power so called, discarding the idea that it was a proper exercise of police power in the domain to take private property for the purpose of developing power. I think that was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and received acceptance there.

Brown of Brockton: If you please, I should like to know on the ground around the Mill Acts were sustained finally, — on the ground of police power or the public interest?

Hobbs: I believe, — I am not competent at the present moment to discuss the decisions in detail, but I believe, — that the theory at one time was that it was on the ground that the Mill Acts were an exercise of the police power, although I believe one late went to the extent of saying that while the Mill Acts were intended to justify in theory, in practice they had been carried on so as to have become a part of the law of the Commonwealth.

The development of water-power is becoming a much more important one at this time on account of the development of hydro-electric power as an important source both of power and of light for communities. Water-powers which were of rather minor consequence heretofore have become, in view of modern inventions and discoveries, of considerable real advantage. Even our municipalities have been taken into serious consideration the question of developing the overflow from their reservoirs which heretofore has been allowed to run to waste. In this very year we passed legislation to authorize the city of Springfield to develop the overflow from its water system and to use the current thus developed. The metropolitan water system for some time has developed and sold the water-power from the overflow from its reservoirs, and all up and down our streams where developments have been made there is opportunity to effect a saving in this way. Our streams, of course, have been developed as water-powers from very early times. A large part of the law regarding water rights has been worked out in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts because in this Commonwealth water rights very early became of importance. Owing to the lack of coal and the ease with which these water-powers could be turned to account, water-powers became of importance somewhat earlier, perhaps, than they did elsewhere, and all of our water-powers to a large extent are developed. There is an opportunity for large future development. The Commission on Waterways and Public Lands, in a very elaborate report to the Legislature, listed the streams of the Commonwealth and the undeveloped water-power upon them. I cannot recall the figures. If this matter goes to a further stage I shall hope to have some of them. It is sufficient to say that they regard the possibility of a large increase in the water power of the Commonwealth by the establishment of some sort of legislative authority to develop and promote those water-powers as a matter of distinct possibility, running into the tens of thousands of horse-power,—I am told that it is about two hundred thousand horse-power,—undeveloped in the streams of the Commonwealth. Therefore there is an important actual resource of the State involved in this proposition relating to conservation.

The constitutional amendment will not do it all, of course. But we were considering, at the last session of the Legislature, a measure advocated by the Commission on Waterways and Public Lands; and we were considering, and the cry of all of the attorneys who attended in opposition, and I think a very well justified cry,—there are some of the attorneys sitting in this chamber, so I am sure that what I say must be said carefully,—the cry of all of them was that the legislation undoubtedly was unconstitutional, and on looking it over I was inclined to think they were right. In the first place, there was a question as to the power of the Legislature to impose a betterment tax for the purpose of meeting the cost of the improvements and assessing it on those who benefited by it. In the second place, of course, there was the question as to whether the purpose of developing water-power is a public use. One of the attorneys for one of the water-powers concerned,—and in this he met with no enthusiasm from his brothers at the bar who were there in attendance,—stated that in his opinion the most efficacious way of enabling proper legislation to be drafted was the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution declaring the development and conservation of water-power to be a public use, and I think that he is right. The matter trenches so closely upon private use that it is questionable if the courts would regard a proposition for the use of the power of eminent domain for the conservation and development of water-power other than for strictly public uses as a public use. Of course if the water was to be used for drinking purposes, that would be a public use. If it was to be used purely for public lighting pur-that also would be undoubtedly a public use. But where the rivation is for the purpose of developing power for a multitude uses,—for manufacturing, for milling, for any one of the various uses for which water-power can be used,—then it becomes a question as to whether that development is for a public use or for a private use and is it for those purposes that the Constitutional amendment that the committee have drafted would be of importance. It seems to me that it is a desirable thing to broaden out the Constitution to such an extent that in this day particularly, when we are hard up to get sufficient fuel to keep our factories running, when we hard put to it to get enough coal to keep our lighting plants run-ing that the Commonwealth be given ample power to develop its powers to the fullest extent. Of course the larger aspects of rivation cannot come through the State; the largest water-powers developed that run through the State must be conserved, if at all, ble of the bounds of this Commonwealth.

Continuing after the recess Mr. Hobbs said:

regret very much that owing to proximity to the closing hour I compelled to divide my speech. I am not going to repeat at any what I said this morning, except to summarize it briefly thus:
the reason for this amendment, the reason for declaring that the rivation, development and use of certain natural resources are uses, is a reason that develops from the necessity of events;
in our economic progress we have reached a condition whereby conservation, development and use to the fullest extent of all our atural resources is one involving the highest good of the community;
therefore in the light of self-preservation the community ought to order them public uses, and to devote its collective functions, its ors of government, toward the conservation, development and use them.

The gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) has offered a substitute motion which differs from the one before us in scope. I think that limits, if I understand him rightly, that in certain respects these be considered of such public importance that further powers be given to the Legislature to accomplish them. The difference seen us is therefore one of degree.

think the difference rests on a somewhat fundamental concept of erty rights. There is a disposition,—there long has been a dis-son,—in constitutional thought in this country to look upon erty rights as rights which are above the Constitution, and as which are natural in their nature, which have a certain sanctity them, and which even Constitutions cannot assail successfully, the State has no right in fact to deal with. The more modern ption of property rights is, I think, that they are rights which are ized by the State as an essential of community existence. That recognize rights of life, liberty and property, because without we cannot very well have a State.

is not possible, as humanity is constituted, for us to put our erty into a common fund and expect a satisfactory result to g therefrom. We act together for certain purposes. We de-certain portions of our property in the form of taxes, put them a common treasury, and devote them to a common purpose.
But in the main we cannot deal with our property that way, for the reason that what is everybody's property is nobody's property, and that the same incentive which leads a man to work to improve his own property for his own profit is absent when it comes to working with the community property for the common good. It is a very common fact, I think it is known to us all, that in their State activities frequently do not exhibit the same thrift and care that are exhibited by individuals in their own private affairs; and this is true, unfortunately, of many men of affairs who have come into the Legislature, who, when dealing with the public property and the public interests, manifest a carelessness that they never exhibit in their own business.

The right of property, however, is not one about which there is anything sacred. It must yield of necessity to the common interest; and personally, so far as I am concerned, when property rights stand in the way of the common interest it is so much property rights; and in my legislative career, at least, I never have gained any rating as a radical at that. The difficulty with all of the water conservation legislation that we have dealt with, and the difficulty with the proposition, as I take it, from the standpoint of the gentleman from Lexington that we have before us, is this: That it may give the Legislature power to dispossess the owners of property rights and damage such rights as they have.

Now, what he wants to do in the case of agricultural resources is to hold us down to the simple proposition of drainage and irrigation, if I mistake not his idea. If I recall rightly the advocated, but which I think he did not move as an amendment, relative to the form which this amendment should take relative to water rights, it was that it should be confined merely to two propositions,—the building of storage dams and reservoirs, and the assessment of betterments on those who are benefited by those schemes.

Now, taking up the subject of water rights at large, I want to point out this,—that the Commission on Waterways and Public Lands in their very thorough study of the subject point out two things: First, that the creation of new storage facilities is only part of the problem; second, that the assessment of betterments is only part of the problem.

There is a field in between there where perhaps in this matter may be made, that is not touched things. Take, for instance, an owner of water rights along a river who is developing them, but is developing them only to a part of their possibility. So much as he has not developed goes to waste. The water runs down the river, the power never the community loses that which otherwise it might man who operates his plant for only part of the when he might operate it all the twenty-four hours,—during the hours that he lets it lie idle the water runs down the river over the dam, and there is so much waste or loss to the community. Take also the case of a man who is using his property in a wasteful manner and letting the water that otherwise he might use for power go to waste. In all of those cases there is an economic which it is highly desirable should not occur. The loss is not to the man alone but to the community at large. It is for that reason I think such a proposition should be somewhat broader than somewhat restricted form in which the gentleman from Lexington have it. It is for that reason that I would urge the amendment as it stands rather than in the form in which he has put it, which he has moved as an amendment.

There is a certain fear in this Convention which sometimes is mani-festoG, either tacitly or openly, that the General Court, having been vested power, ample power, might run wild and do all sorts of things vested interests. That is very unlikely to be the case. At the session of this Convention we passed a constitutional amendment submission to the people which gave the cities and towns, under in restrictions, the power to provide in times of emergency shelter for their inhabitants. The proposition was brought up to the General Court that in time of emergency cities or towns might build shelters for their inhabitants. The General Court in its wisdom threw out of the window without very much delay; and worth while to say, in view of some things that have been said at the branch of the General Court of which I happen to be a member, that the funeral on that occasion took place, not in the graveyard of legislation," but in the supposedly popular lower branch. experience, running over some nine years in the General Court, seen that private interests in the hands of the General Court been pretty safe; that the General Court in that time never entertained legislation that was at all confiscatory in its nature, never has failed to observe a measure of fairness and justice in dealing with all property interests that have come before it. Its in those respects has been the reverse of revolutionary and I no expectation that it would be otherwise. The safeguard property interests in this Commonwealth is not the Constitution the Commonwealth, important though that be; is not the courts, are supposed to safeguard constitutional rights, and is not the General Court. It is the public sentiment in the community; and sentiment, so far as I am able to be a judge of it, would be much opposed to any action which unjustly deprived a man of fruit of his labor or deprived him of the property which he was duly and justly employing.

The safeguard of property in this Commonwealth is beyond any written Constitution that is supposed to protect it. It rests on public sentiment, and in that public sentiment, in the absence of great change, it is entirely safe. I do not think that if this amendment goes through the course of legislation would be markedly changed. We already have had a number of propositions in the General Court looking to the conservation of water resources, either one stream or along several streams. They always have met the difficulty, which has seemed very great, of dodging around the Constitution. Results which a very general sentiment deemed to desirable, — the saving of power, and the application of it to purpose of public and of private use, if you like, — were defeated because of the difficulty of framing such legislation in constitutional

It seems to me that it is desirable, if you wish to accomplish good, have this matter in the hands of the General Court in such way that they can deal with the proposition broadly and without straining themselves too much to dodge around the angles. It is for that reason that I would urge the proposition in the simple form in which the committee gave it rather than in the more detailed form by which the gentleman from Lexington would seek to prevent from acting as it probably never would act.

I therefore hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington will not prevail, and that the resolution as drafted by the committee will be ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I trust that this recommendation of the committee will be adopted. It seems to me to be on the whole one of the most important questions which can come before this Convention. It brings us directly up against the fundamental question which blocks all hope of a consistent improvement in our administration in this country; that is to say, against the interference of the judiciary The whole question here lies upon a so-called protection to private property. Now, there is a great confusion of opinion, as it appears to me, on this whole question. It has long been the law of this country that there is no such thing as private property; that is to say, there is no such thing which is protected by law as a man's own. Everything that we have belongs to the public if the public has need of it. The only question is whether or not the public has need, so that it is a public purpose for which that property is used. It is not so very long since in the common law it was accepted doctrine that the property of the individual was at the mercy of the community without compensation if it were taken.

Now, you come down to the basis of this thing, and in primitive communities property is considered to be a man's own, and that the public has no right to it. It cannot touch it in any way; to touch it is a sin. But no community can survive in a high state of civilization where the public does not have the absolute right to take over a man's property if that property is needed by the public. That is the law of eminent domain. The only question is when the exigency arises, and our system is to leave that to the courts to determine. In every other civilized community in the world, I believe without exception, it is held, always held, that the exigency is determined by the people; that is to say, by whatever corresponds to what we should call the Legislature.

We are up against that question, and we have got to determine it; we have got to decide it one way or the other. You have got to lodge your supreme power in your people or in your courts. It has got to be somewhere, and it is a mere question of whether or not you are going to prefer the private interests to the public welfare. That is all there is in it. The courts have acted as the defender of the private interest. That is, from the beginning of our government, National and State, I think that I may say in a general way that is so, and in every country in the world it has been so. It has been so in England, so far as the English courts could act. The English, for their good fortune, never have allowed their courts to assume such a position as that. It has been so in France. As far as I know it has been so everywhere. The question has been, and still is: Where lies the power which is to regulate what is a public use? That is the supreme power, and you cannot go on, as I understand it, with any public work of any great magnitude or any great continuance, where this must not be determined by the people, — by the people in themselves or by the people in their collective capacity. It is not a question which can be de-
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES.

...ed by law or by any abstract notion of what is said in a document. It is a thing which is determined by public necessity. It is a Mr. President, which is determined from year to year by the ties of the people, and it can be determined in no other way.
The citizen whose property is taken should be compensated tly is not disputed anywhere now. There is no danger that su-sal law will be infringed. It is simply a question of whether or private interest is to come here and is to interfere between the ments of public opinion or public necessity because, as it con-its private interests will be damaged or interfered with. That is here to it; and wherever we turn here, on every hand, we see at the moment a considerable private interest is threatened, that that the public interest goes down.

, Mr. President, we are up against this problem, and it lies in a arrow compass,—a very narrow compass indeed. It is brought before us by this war. I do not see how any reasonable man can ulate the position in which this country is now, with the diffi-by which it is encompassed, and fail to see that we must have and of our resources, that we cannot have private interests ening; that if we do we are going to lose this war and there can help for us. The private interest must go down, the private nt must be absorbed by the public interest, and whichever way ote goes it makes no difference. The same result will be arrived the end. It will be arrived at by economic competition, by these es, once this war is settled, competing with each other, and it terminated in one way only. That is to say, that every com-must have the most perfect command that is possible over its ources, in order to use them in the most economic way: It so that or the lagging community must perish.

useless for us to go back and say, as a gentleman said in a comto which I belonged: "John Adams thought differently, and I with John Adams." But John Adams was a man of much too a mind for this. If he had lived to-day, he never would have the position which he did a hundred and fifty years ago. In a ed and fifty years this world, the world in which we live, has ed more than it had done from the time that our ancestors came their caves; and to say that you undertake to stand on the al that John Adams stood on means that John Adams must have an imbecile. If he stood on any such ground or any ground ching that, now, he would be an imbecile, because the world has so that opinions he held then would be imbecile opinions now.
ise you would agree that his mind would not have changed, not changed in a hundred and fifty years, and that is an absurd ition, Mr. President. Of course his mind would change. Of be would be influenced by the events which would go on about ms the minds of all of us must be.

must concede that we must move with the world, with the of science, with the march of industry, or else we must yield to who can so move; and we must accept propositions of this kind ifications of our common law, as public benefits of the highest le kind. Otherwise we simply must say that we are incapable of a acy of movement, that we are incapable of thought, that we are able of keeping pace with the movement of the age in which we live, because we are a democracy. Mr. President, if that is so, democracy ought to and must perish. If democracy means that we are to be hampered by written restrictions made a hundred and fifty years ago, then we must consent that we are ready to be wiped out.

I have occupied the time of this Convention quite long enough, but on a subject on which I feel very deeply. I feel that the very existence of this Nation depends on our recognizing this great principle, and I cannot conceive how any man, in the face of this war, can hesitate.

Mr. Lyman of Easthampton moved that the new draft be amended by striking out, in line 3, the word "agricultural."

The Presiding Officer: The attention of the gentleman is called to the fact that that amendment already is proposed by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp).

Mr. Lyman: I am not so informed. I move to strike out the word entirely; he offers an amendment to take the place of it.

The Presiding Officer: The amendment of the gentleman from Lexington was in two parts, one of them to strike out the word which you have proposed to strike out, and the other was in addition.

Mr. Lyman: Then that amendment, to strike out the word "agricultural," is before the Convention?

The Presiding Officer: It is.

Mr. Lyman: I do not know much about the water-powers or mineral lands generally, but I know that in my district there is a lead mine that I do not think it would require an amendment to the Constitution to compel the owners to unload. [Laughter.] I am opposed to the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Lexington in regard to the swamps, because that is very well taken care of in Senate Bill No. 388 of this year, a plan that whereby marsh and swamp lands can be drained without burdening the Commonwealth with the entire expense. So, sir, with only one-third of the area of land under cultivation that formerly was under cultivation in this Commonwealth, and with thousands upon thousands of acres that could be brought under cultivation at comparatively small expense in this Commonwealth, and with those farms which now are under cultivation capable of doubling their output without reaching their capacity, an amendment of this character is absolutely unnecessary, and for this reason: Because I believe, sir, if the time ever comes when conditions again justify the tilling of a larger area, private enterprise and the Legislature itself will take care of it. Therefore I say to you, if you must pass this resolution, you ought to adopt my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: While I regard this as a very important question, I do not believe by discussing it any longer you are going to change any votes, and I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I sincerely hope this Convention will pass the resolution as recommended by the committee and so ably argued by the gentleman from Worcester and the gentleman from Quincy. But it is pointed out to us by the Governor of the State in his inaugural that this State at the present time is producing only one-seventh of the food that we consume. Out of about $360,000,000 worth a year only $50,000,000 is produced in this State.

Now, Mr. President, if you will go through the five western counties of State you will find vast tracts of unused land. The farmers who own that land, or the owners thereof, do not have the means to put land to any use. It is not developed. They have not the money to buy machinery, they have not the money to stock the places, they have not the money to get the labor to clear them up. If those vast tracts of land are to be used again it must be developed by public money, by public capital, that can wait three, four or five or six years, necessary, for its return. Private capital cannot go there. And what more, the people who live in those places do not have the outlook, if they had the money; they do not have that large vision of col-collective interest on public action that is necessary under the conditions.

much as we hate the use to which scientific German collectivism out the resources of that Nation, we pay tribute through the fact it is taking twenty nations of us to beat her; that Germany, by such a thing as would be possible by this amendment, before the was the largest exporter of wood pulp for making paper. The most infective of all forms of the use of anything that is grown on the land in cutting down of everything to make wood pulp for paper, and yet scientific reforestation Germany has become the largest exporting country in the world of that sort of thing.

that shows to us what a collective action, that sees the needs of whole people, can do. If we will pass this amendment, as proposed the committee, the Legislature will be free, the people will be free the future, to take just such action as is needed. I hope all these advantages offered will be rejected.

Mr. Hobbs: I am not going to use my ten minutes. I have dilated ly on this subject at some length. The only thing I desire to upon is as to the exclusion of the word "agricultural."

e gentleman refers to an act in the General Court with which I not familiar. Of course we have had for a long time legisla-ing to drainage districts and to schemes for draining low-lying areas. They are of quite ancient origin, and have been utilized in very stances. It is a question in my mind if it would be possible to here really satisfactory legislation of this sort without further connional power, and on that subject I think the secretary of the Board of Agriculture was inclined to agree with me. He came e our committee at the time that this matter was under con-ation, and spoke of the necessity of doing something to increase power of the State in dealing with low-lying lands. I admit that difficulty with agriculture in this Commonwealth is the difficulty of putting people to work on the land, but that we trust is merely a orary condition and not a permanent one. What we can do under amendment I think would be of distinct advantage to the comity in increasing the amount of land which shall be used for agricultural purposes.

The amendment moved by Mr. Lyman was rejected.

The amendments moved by Mr. Clapp were rejected, by a vote of 31 to 90.

The resolution (No. 344) was ordered to a third reading, Thursday, June 13.

The resolution was read a third time Wednesday, July 24, 1918, in the follow-form as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 379):
Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution
2 by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The conservation, development and utilization of the 4 agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Com-
5 monwealth are public uses, and the General Court shall 6 have power to provide for the taking, by purchase or other-
7 wise, of lands and easements or interests therein, including
8 water and mineral rights, for the purpose of securing and
9 promoting the proper conservation, development, utilization
10 and control thereof and to enact legislation necessary or 11 expedient therefor.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: The resolution which is now before us and the reception it has received thus far, even from the conservative side of the Convention, have stirred in me certain feelings which I should like briefly to express.

I think that all of us have found in this Convention a school which has taught and is teaching us useful lessons. One of these lessons is to respect the honest opinions of our fellows.

The President: The member will suspend for a moment. For the information of the Convention the Chair directs the attention of the Convention to the fact that the resolution in its present form is the form as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology, and will be found printed in document No. 379. That is the form that is now before the Convention.

Mr. Clapp: One of these lessons so taught us is to respect the honest opinions of our fellows, and to reexamine the basis of our own opinions. When one finds himself differing widely from another member who he always has regarded as a man of high character and sound practical judgment, that fact tends to shake his confidence in the soundness of his own opinions, and to force him to a more careful study of proposals as to which he has sustained definite convictions.
At times I have found myself greatly surprised at the views expressed by men in this Convention with whom in most things I am in entire accord. To some extent I have been consciously influenced by them; and probably the subtle influences which operate through contact of mind with mind will produce in me later on effects of which I now am unaware. I do not anticipate that I ever shall find myself in general accord with the delegate from New Bedford who sits near me (Mr.
Harriman); but long ago the sincerity of conviction which shines through the expression of his mistaken theories about government led me to respect the man, and his keen interest in all things human touches a responsive chord in all of our hearts. This general thought about the influence of our surroundings upon us brings to mind an anecdote of my boyhood days. In the little town of Montague, where I was born and where I attended the public schools, there was a small family consisting only of the father, mother, and a single son. The boy, who attended the same school with me, in some way became ad-ddicted to profane and vulgar language. His habit in this regard became a subject of anxiety to his parents. They were at a loss to understand how he acquired it; and one day in the youth's absence they entered upon a discussion of the question, the father advancing a theory only to have it negatived by the mother, and then the mother suggesting an explanation which the father said was not right. And conversation went on until finally the father as by an inspiraought the true reason. "Why, Mary," said he, "I know what makes Johnny swear so and use such bad language: it's t school children!" I do not know just what the final of this subtle influence of the atmosphere of the Convention be upon me, whether in time to come I shall be more or less tive, but that it is having its influence I do not doubt.
v, while I have tried to give due weight to the views of those ning the resolution, I am unable to persuade myself that in its broad form it is either necessary or wise. It has not yet rethe attention and discussion which its importance deserves; trust that the delegates will not advance the measure another without a full understanding of what it means.
here is I think no proposal now before the Convention which is adapted to bring out the opposing views regarding the proper and function of our Constitution. On the one hand there are of whom the delegate from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) spoke the day (and of whom I infer that he is one) who believe that we adopt substantially the British system of no constitutional ments so far as the powers or functions of government are con-

Bodfish of Barnstable addressed the Chair.

CLAPP: I would rather not yield until I have finished these ks, and then I shall be glad to answer any questions that I may e to. If I have done the gentleman injustice by classifying him that group, I shall be only too happy to withdraw the suggestion.
y there is one class of people who believe that we should adopt entially the British system of no constitutional restraints so far powers or functions of government are concerned, and that, save clauses in the Bill of Rights, such as those giving compensation ivate property taken for public uses, guaranteeing freedom of ence and of speech, preserving trial by jury and the like, the stitution should be drawn so as to leave what may be done by the ent to the free determination of an all-powerful Legislature, better say, perhaps, of the law-making power. On the other there are those who still would have our Constitution operate so make it unlawful for the government to enter upon the owner-property and the conduct of business in competition with pri-gencies, save only in cases where experience may have demonthat such a policy is clearly a wise thing to adopt. To this class, I need not say, I personally belong. Rather than throw constitutional limitations and trust to the Legislature to see that istic experiments shall not be carried to the extent of undermsystem of individual initiative and freedom, I would approach ent-day problems from the opposite angle, and, holding to the ence of that system, as to a sheet-anchor, broaden the author-cope of government only as reasonable necessity therefor shall and to exist. Such course of procedure to my mind is not an ction to progress; rather is it the course of orderly and true ss. Let us not be deceived by the existence of the war and the al problems which it presents. In war time, Constitution or no stitution, the government has inherent powers adequate to meet all needs; and in the performance of the duties imposed upon us as delegates to this Convention there is nothing more constantly to be borne in mind than the fact that we are legislating for periods of peace and not of war. Let us keep in mind also another fact which some seem to forget, namely, that the opportunity to amend our Constitution will not end with the passing of this Convention.

What necessity, then, exists, or reasonably may be supposed to exist in the future, for declaring, as in substance the pending resolution does declare, that hereafter there shall be no constitutional objection to the State's acquiring, owning and operating, for the purposes of their development and utilization, the water, timber, agricultural and other natural resources to be found within our borders? I venture to say that no one can point out any such necessity or even expediency. Have the doctrine of this resolution been in the Constitution of the State, when the cities of Lowell, Lawrence and Holyoke were established, I doubt very much whether capital could have been found to make the water-power developments which in fact were made in those places and which have done so much, gentlemen, to promote the industrial prosperity of this great Commonwealth. To be sure there is not left a great abundance of natural resources that can be developed, outside of agriculture, and not a great many there; but such as they are, I for one, am willing to trust in the main to what may be accomplished by private enterprise. I have pointed out at an earlier stage in this debate one difficulty that possibly may stand in the way of conserving some water-power that now goes to waste; but obstacle, if it exists, we need not authorize State ownership and control of all the soil in Massachusetts, or governmental competition with private enterprise throughout the whole field of water-power utilization and agricultural enterprise. The resolution says that the use of utilization of these resources is a public function. If so, I see no reason why the State or a municipality, with the approval of the Legislature, might not construct and operate upon some stream a mill or factory, and thus enter the field of industrial enterprise; to do so would be to utilize a water-power or water resources. I do not know what would be the limit of the Legislature's authorized power under the proposed article of amendment. You may say that the Legislature would not abuse the power. I say do not confer it.

Again, there is in the proposal an attempt to broaden the police power as applied to the properties already developed. There is a grant of power to enact all laws necessary or expedient to regulate and control the conservation, development and use of the enumerated resources. That you can enlarge, as against the Federal Constitution by State constitutional declaration, the existing police power, may be impossible theoretically; but in deciding whether a State statute unduly infringes the rights of private property, the United States Supreme Court, I think, would be influenced by a constitutional declaration pursuant to which the statute was passed. I have no fault to find with the decisions of our Massachusetts court in regard to the application of the so-called police power, which really is nothing but the power inherent in a government to protect its people, and which as was said by Chief Justice Shaw, finds expression in that clause of the Constitution which says that the Legislature may make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws.
member from Fall River in the third division (Mr. Morton), sitting upon the bench, well said in the case of Turner v. Nye, 1 Mass. 579, speaking of the police power as authorizing to some extent the impairment of property rights without payment of compensation: necessity cases will arise where there will or may be a conflict of interests in the disposition of property, and questions may and will come up affecting the public welfare in regard to the use which shall or shall not be permitted of certain property. Property may be so situated or of such a character that the absolute right of the individual owner to a certain extent must yield to or be modified by correlative rights on the part of other owners, or by what is deemed on the whole to be the public welfare. Whatever differences of opinion there may be with regard to the action of courts in protection of intangible property, such as liberty or property, I do not see how any one can read the numerous cases in which the courts have upheld laws which limit and regulate the use of property in the interest of the public welfare, without being convinced that the Constitution needs no amendment,—so far as the power of the police power in the aspect now being considered is concerned. The delegate from Worcester in the second division (Mr. Bond), a member of the Public Affairs Committee, when supporting the amendment under consideration, spoke, as it seemed to me, in rather a light, easy-going fashion, with regard to rights of property, saying that in these days the tendency is to respect them more than formerly. Such I fear is the fact. If so, I say, let us not generously sanction the practice by constitutional declaration. To pretend that such rights ought to be abridged in respect of tangible property, I for one am willing to trust the matter to the judges, who, I know, are responsive to the demands of matured public opinion; and under the liberalizing influence of this Convention outside of its enactments, they may be expected in future to respond even more readily.

Gentlemen, in conclusion, let me add a few words as to the practical aspect of the resolution as applied to agriculture. If the question shall pass it, I want the members to understand fully the vast scope and possible effect of the proposal. When last year the question of municipal trading was under debate the Convention was disposed to negative any intention to authorize an invasion by the city or by any city or town in normal times of the field of individual enterprise; and the provision adopted was restricted so as to become only an emergency measure. What an opportunity, then, men, to smile at the absurdity of a situation we shall have, if the present proposal be adopted,—adopted, I mean, without any narrowing or amendment; for here the authority to be granted would permit the State or any municipality to engage in agricultural pursuits at any time and without limit, so be it that the enterprise or business results in the utilization of agricultural lands. The city of Boston could be authorized to condemn and put to commercial use any suburban farm. I see no reason why it could not be permitted to engage in the business of market-gardening in competition with the farmers of the neighborhood. The Legislature could say to the farmers of Arlington: "You shall cease, or suspend for a period of one year, the growing of celery, and devote your lands to the cultivation of some other crops”; for the law-making power is to have the right to regulate the use, and control the use, of agricultural lands. Thus farmers in the Connecticut Valley might be forbidden to grow tobacco and required to substitute what the caprice of the moment might think a more useful crop. And the owners of farms throughout the State, in times of profound peace, could be made to rotate their crops in such fashion as the Legislature should prescribe rather than in accordance with their own judgment. Such possibilities, however remote, I feel one do not believe in sanctioning, — at least not until experience shall have demonstrated some necessity for the action.

Now, my fellow-delegates, I do not want you to set me down as reactionary conservative. I am willing to liberalize in some respects. I am willing to stand for progress. I am not opposed to the State’s giving some aid and encouragement to the development of agricultural and other resources. I would not oppose even the giving of financial aid, under some circumstances, to help individuals get started in the use and cultivation of these agricultural lands, — particularly the low, waste and undeveloped lands to which reference has been made so many times in the past debates. What I do object to is this wide open proposition which, as I have tried to make you see, authorizes the State to enter upon agricultural and even manufacturing business in competition with private agencies. Then I am opposed to, and I believe that a majority of the delegates to the Convention are of the same opinion.

It is a pleasing sentimental declaration to say in substance, as does the resolution to which I am directing attention, that all natural resources are held in trust for the public benefit, just as it is to state that every citizen is a trustee who must exercise his right to vote for the benefit of those who cannot vote. In a sense both such declarations are true; but are they not rather for use in appealing to the reason and patriotism of the people than in laying down legal principles for guiding and limiting the Legislature or law-making power under the Constitution? Phrases of vague and uncertain legal meaning should not be employed either in statutes or constitutional provisions, however praiseworthy the general sentiment declared.

Because of the opening of the door to possible State socialism within a very broad range of industrial and agricultural operations, and the discouragement of individual enterprise which would result from its passage, I oppose the resolution in its present form.

I move an amendment which is in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. Clapp moved to amend the resolution as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 379) by striking out, in line 3, the words “and utilization”; and by inserting between the words “conservation” and “development” the word “and”; and by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words “utilization and control”; and by inserting between the words “conservation” and “development”, in line 9, the word “and”, so that the article of amendment would read:

The conservation and development of the agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth are public uses, and the General Court shall have power to provide for the taking, by purchase or otherwise, of lands and easements therein, including water and mineral rights, for the purpose of securing and promoting the proper conservation and development thereof, and to enact legislation necessary or expedient therefor.
Loring of Beverly: There is printed in the calendar notice that shall move two amendments to the resolution as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology. I think the Convention understands now that the committee on Form and Phraseology sets to report back the measure in concise and legal language in such a way that they believe the Convention meant to pass it. That is the way in which the committee, or members of the committee, would care to see it passed; and it is to remedy some of the defects of the resolution as it passed the Convention, after careful consideration to every debate that was had on it, that I have suggested the amendments which bear my name.

First of these amendments which I move is that the words “and resources” be struck out, and in place thereof “water and other natural resources” be inserted. That is, I broaden the measure by inserting “other natural resources”, and the reason for doing that is that there are some resources which are not enumerated and which are not to be excluded, although we know them at the present time by name that they are omitted. For instance, there is the great force of tides, which has been utilized heretofore in the Commonwealth. I was a boy in Boston I used to skate on what was called the Basin, and sometimes, when the ice was hard enough, on the Basin. Beacon Street was the mill-dam in those days, and Newbury Street was the cross-dam. The water flowed in at high tide into both basins. Then as the tide receded the outer basin, containing the mill-dam, was used for power. While the tide was rising, the basin having been emptied, the other basin, behind Exeter Street, was used for power, filling up that basin part way, and so on. Thus was obtained whether the tide was rising or falling. In days when coal became cheap it was not expedient and it was not practical to use the power of the tides for mills, but now that coal is becoming scarce and becoming dear it may be that we shall wish to have the power of the tides again; and so there may be other natural resources, which we have not in mind at the present time, that we wish to use, which would be covered by the amendment that I propose. If there are no other such natural resources that we wish to use, then the amendment will not do any harm, because it will cover those which are in existence.

Another amendment which I have proposed, and which I now move to strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the phrase “by purchase or otherwise”, and insert in place thereof the words “upon payment of compensation therefor.” That is to say, that the Legislature, paying “just compensation therefor;” they cannot take by purchase or otherwise, which would cover not only taking by eminent domain but taking under the police power without paying compensation whatever, possibly. I think the phrase “taking by purchase or otherwise” is the customary one in statutes, but the decision this Convention has shown very conclusively that we are getting to construe things differently, and if there was a taking “by purchase or otherwise” it easily might be construed before long that it is taking by purchase, or taking by right of eminent domain, or under the police power without paying any compensation whatever. It seems to me that the matter ought to be settled definitely so that taking shall be only upon paying compensation.
Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Shall I disturb the gentleman in his argument if I ask him a question at this time?

Mr. Loring: Not at all.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I am very glad that he has made the suggestion to substitute for the words "by purchase" otherwise the words "upon payment of just compensation therefore". As his committee says in its report, it seems to express the intention of the Convention. But what I want to call to his attention is this,—and it has just come under my observation, that in No. 278, at the bottom of the page, "Resolution to extend the power of the Commonwealth to provide homes for citizens" (document No. 391), the committee has made there also the same recommendation, but in the amendment proposed the word "therefor" omitted, so that it reads "upon payment of just compensation". So, too, in No. 285, on page 8 of the calendar (document No. 393), reported by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs), the committee has inserted the phrase "upon payment of just compensation". Of course the committee intends a uniform practice in this respect. Perhaps it is not very material, but either of the amendments should contain the word "therefore", or it should be eliminated from all.

Mr. Loring: I think that a uniform course is desirable, but I was not aware that there was any difference. I do not think the word "therefore" is particularly material in any of them.

Mr. William S. Kenney of Boston: Will the gentleman accept instead of the words "upon payment of just compensation therefore" the words "by eminent domain"?

Mr. Loring: I have not considered the full bearing of that scope, and I would rather go on with the rest of my speech. If the gentleman from Boston (Mr. William S. Kenney) cares to substitute that motion, why, the Convention can consider it.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I should like to ask a question of a different nature, namely, whether there is anything in the form proposed by the committee on Form and Phraseology which in any way would impair the right of the Commonwealth to receive real estate or similar property by gift.

Mr. Loring: I do not think so. There is an inherent power in a corporation or in any political body to receive things by gift, and do not think that you could take it away from them without specific legislation. For instance, when you say a member of Congress shall not receive any gift, or foreign decoration, or something of that kind, I think there has to be a specific provision of law that the thing shall not be taken by gift before the court will presume that a gift cannot be accepted by any corporation or individual.

Now, coming to the main question of the resolution itself, I should like to say a very few words. The member from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) in his interesting address says that we do not want to be carried away by the fact that we are at war and to treat these questions on a war basis. It is precisely on the contrary basis that I think this measure should be passed by this Convention. We are at war, but we all expect to be at peace again. When peace comes, however, we do not wish to be caught entirely unprepared for peace, as we were caught entirely unprepared for war. In fact, if we do not take some measures looking toward peace and preparing for peace we will...
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES. 581

Only Nation in the world that is now at war that is not consider-quish questions. In Australia already there has been a commis-appointed to take care of the soldiers when they come back from war, and that commission proposes to start soldiers in farming, to act them, to start them in agriculture, in raising beets, in raising grass, in raising many products that might be and may be raised Australia that are not raised there now. They mean not only to ide these soldiers with the land on which to settle; they mean to ide them with the means for starting a farm, and they mean to men among them to instruct them in farming, so that they shall ake the failure which a person who is not educated in farming is to make when he undertakes to cultivate the land. They do not be confined to themselves only to that; they mean to develop their returning soldiers many possibilities of power and manu-ing which that Commonwealth has and which it has not yet deed. And it seems wise that we, too, should provide some means which we can take many of those young men who are coming back who will come back without an occupation, so that they can be o something that will be very useful and will advance the fortunes the Commonwealth as well as their own fortunes. It is not, thereas a war measure but as a peace measure that I think this matter ld be viewed.

to the suggestion that it is a novelty for us to regulate the crops a man shall raise on his land, I have had something to do with ng down in Kentucky, and I know that the mountaineers down think that it is very outrageous that they cannot use their corn ake corn whisky or their rye to make rye whisky if they choose, they should be restricted to raising it for the purpose of bread, they do not like so well. So that really, gentlemen, it is nothing ovel that we should say that a man down in Connecticut, who, way, we have no jurisdiction over, should not be allowed to tobacco on his land. If there was a sentiment that tobacco was ious weed, — and it makes me sick, — it might be that we should hat they should not raise tobacco on their land, and it would not novel principle if such a thing was said.

I understand the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) his objection to the resolution, — and I want to be perfectly fair, — at while we might take the land, and we might take the water-er, and we might take other natural resources for the matter of opment, we should not afterwards keep them and control them. e is something to be said in favor of this attitude. I confess that s a great deal of my sympathy. I think that I do not go so far aring for the government's keeping the railroad lines and the aph lines after the war. I think it is all right for them to take as a war measure; I do not care for them to keep them and ol them. And so after the government has taken the water-power ome other utilities of that kind I think they well might turn them to individual management, and I think they would be managed as well as they would by the government themselves. And so, men, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from ington (Mr. Clapp). I hope, however, that the resolution other-will pass, with the three amendments designated.
Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by striking out, in line 9, the word "proper".

Mr. Kinney: Unlike the two gentlemen who have preceded me, I am not only in favor of the principle of the resolution in its present form, but the amendment which I offer will broaden the scope of the amendment to some extent. I offer this amendment after a conference with the special committee of the Legislature appointed to study the question of water resources of the Commonwealth, and after a conference with the Attorney-General's office. Such legal opinion as can be secured is to the effect that the presence of the word "proper" in the eighth line of this amendment will constitute the question of the propriety and advisability of the Commonwealth's developing the water resources a legal and judicial question for the Supreme Judicial Court. That is the effect of the retention of the word "proper" in this resolution. If the word "proper" is stricken out the question of the propriety or advisability of the Commonwealth's developing its water resources will be a question within the sole jurisdiction of the Legislature.

This question of water resources is not in any way involved with returning soldiers or any other special war purpose. What the Commonwealth can do with the water resources of the Commonwealth which already has not been done by private capital, the practical benefit of its citizens by the utilization of its water resources, is substantially this: It can create at the head-waters of such streams as are available for these purposes reservoirs for the purpose of preserving the water which now runs to waste in the spring and in the time of the year when we have high water. It may retain that water in large reservoirs at the head-waters of these streams, and this water can be used as an equalizer to insure such a flow of water during the rest of the season as will permit the plants to be operated by a smaller use than they now make of coal, and in that manner conserve the coal supply and probably by the introduction of large hydro-electric plants which can be used for heating and for lighting purposes and for power throughout the Commonwealth. Therefore, in so far as the water resources go the proposition is quite simple. Most of the important water courses of the Commonwealth already have been developed by private capital to a very large extent. There is this possibility of the Commonwealth's being able, by the construction of the reservoirs which I have indicated, to increase the utility of these water courses, and it can do so with a freer hand if this word "proper" is stricken out of this resolution.

