I hope for that reason that the Convention will strike out the word "proper" and will reject the amendments offered by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) and the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring). The words which the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) moves to insert, — "upon payment of just compensation therefor," — are not adjudicated words. If he had moved to insert the words "eminent domain" there perhaps would be no objection, because the taking by the Commonwealth of property by eminent domain is an adjudicated process, familiar to attorneys and courts and parties in interest; but no other compulsory taking is known, and it would be a uncertain matter to write the words "upon payment of just satisfaction therefor" into the Constitution, as no one would know fully what sort of a taking was contemplated. Therefore I object to the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman Lexington (Mr. Clapp) and the amendments offered by the man from Beverly (Mr. Loring).

Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask the gentleman this on: Would the use of the words "eminent domain" confer upon who at present hold such title as they have to natural resources more title than they now have? Suppose the question of their raised; that a natural resource being a common heritage, — the way, I am the mover of this resolution, so that I am inter-— whether it ever could have been transferred to an individual.
using the words "eminent domain" cure that possible defect in le so as to make it more valuable to the holder?

Kinney: The language in the resolution as it is printed, saying "take by purchase or otherwise," would leave open a taking,
by the police power, without compensation —

Brown: That I do not favor.

Kinney: — possibly a taking by the Commonwealth under the use of the police power in emergency cases without compensation.
substitute the words "may take by eminent domain," as I under-it, we, to answer the gentleman, will not acquiesce in the title of persons claiming under the Mill Acts or otherwise. We simply will in language which will be known to everybody conversant with language, and to the court, the power by which the Common-may make a taking.

Avery of Holyoke: I should like to ask the gentleman from a question. In your opinion would this resolution enable the al Court to authorize a great power company, such as the New nd Power Company, or the Turners Falls Power Company, to and take by eminent domain, for the development of its own uses, private property?

Kinney: I should say that the language of this resolution pro-that the Commonwealth may make these takings for public uses, that it itself is limited to such takings for public uses, and that this resolution the Commonwealth would have no authority to ite to any private corporation authority to make a taking for a use. I so understand after conference with the Attorney-

Blackmur of Quincy: A question. I should like to ask the man if the exercise of the right of eminent domain does not ecessarily the payment of just compensation therefor; and, is true, is it not better to state it in plain language, that does quire a constitutional lawyer to determine what it means?

Kinney: To answer the gentleman, — and I think he knows swer as well as I, — not only do the words "eminent domain" the payment of compensation, but they also to a certain extent the character of the taking, while the use of the words as moved the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) in no sense define the er of the taking. They are uncertain, vague words, which to est of my knowledge and belief never have been adjudicated.
ore I say that if the Convention proposes to adopt, — as I hope it will not, — but if it does propose to adopt any such amendment as that moved by the gentleman from Beverly, I hope it will adopt, in place of the words found on page 3 of the calendar which he has suggested, the words "by eminent domain."

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Boston to the tenth article of the Bill of Rights, which is the article under which the Commonwealth is supposed to exercise the right of eminent domain. I will not ask him if the language of that article contains the words "eminent domain," because it does not. But I will ask him if the language used in that article, which is as follows: "Whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor," — if those words are not practically the words of, or whether they are not along very similar lines to, the amendment under discussion?

Mr. Kinney: To answer the gentleman from Worcester, the language that he quotes is merely incidental to the exercise of a public power, in no sense defining the power itself. The amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Beverly is more comprehensive. Therefore I suggest that if we are to create at once a power and attempt to define it, we might better use well adjudicated words.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: I should like to pursue a little further, purely for purposes of information, the question raised by the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery). If I understood his question rightly, it was to this effect: Whether under this article as worded it would not be possible for the Commonwealth to allow a private corporation to make use of certain water resources taken over under this amendment by the Commonwealth; and the answer of the gentleman who is speaking was that the amendment limited such use to public use. I should like to ask whether, in a certain respect at least, that is not warping the words of the amendment. "The conservation, development and utilization" of these resources "are public uses." I want to make absolutely sure of the interpretation of this amendment. If the amendment declares that the utilization of a resource is a public use, and this resource is utilized, does not that under the terms of this amendment, by definition, a public use? And is not then the question of the gentleman from Holyoke not answered by the statement of the gentleman from Boston? Would not his statement, in other words, imply that he is interpreting this amendment to be that a utilization of the water resources of the Commonwealth is a public use, provided such utilization is for a public use?

Mr. Kinney: As I understood the question of the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) to which the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) now refers, the gentleman from Holyoke asked me whether or not the Commonwealth, if this resolution is adopted, could delegate to the private corporations, such as the Turners Falls Power Company, authority to make takings, and then use the benefit derived for their private purposes. I answered that, as I have been informed by attorneys, and by the Attorney-General's office of this Commonwealth, it is the opinion of the majority, — there are one or two who take an opposite view, — that the Commonwealth itself might make a public taking of water courses, and that such takings hereby are declared to be public uses, but that not delegate to private concerns the authority to make takings for purposes.

Mancovitz of Boston: I might suggest to the gentleman that take the fifth line of the resolution reported by the committee on Phrasology and add the words “by the power of” after “authorize,” would not that amendment prohibit the General Assembly from giving the power to private individuals?

Kinney: I did not get the word that the gentleman suggested be included.

Mancovitz: “By the power of” (the Commonwealth) after the word “authorize.”

Kinney: I think that would be undesirable, because I think highly probable that the Commonwealth would create some person or corporation to make any development which it might contemplate.

Mancovitz: Does he mean by that the Commonwealth delegate its power to private individuals or corporations, to develop natural resources after their own pattern, under the control and direction of the Commonwealth?

Kinney: I assume that in discussing the question in this phase of it we may say about it would be mere assumption and conjecture, because it will be a question for later legislation to decide; and surely I assume that if the Commonwealth decided to go in and further the water resources of this Commonwealth, the Legislature will deem it advisable to create some agencies to do that work, under the control and direction of the Commonwealth, perhaps analogous to the metropolitan commission.

Kinney: I should not care to encumber the solution by words that would restrict the authority of the Commonwealth to create such agencies, making it necessary, in the language of the gentleman just now, that the taking be made under the Legislative act, rather than under the authority of the Legislature. Every individual act, if that is adopted, would have to be by an individual and special act.

Hart of Cambridge: I should like to ask why the gentleman used a form of words which does not include the ordinary form of eminent domain?

Mancovitz: Admitting this inherent right in the Commonwealth, inherent right as applied to a novel use proposed in the amendment, his words are “eminent domain”: he says nothing of the other.

Kinney: Evidently the gentleman from Cambridge has misunderstood my attitude. I say I am opposed to the adopting of the amendment of the gentleman from Beverly, and also the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington, as they are narrow-minded, and a restriction upon the powers conferred in this amendment. I believe those amendments should be defeated. The language of the resolution now is very broad as to the power to make a sufficient provision for all the purposes which I believe are now contemplated for public action. The only restrictive word in here is “proper” in the eighth line, which I have moved to have stricken out. I simply said that if you were proposing to adopt the amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Beverly it would be in that event, to use the words “by eminent domain,” rather than use the words which he has suggested.
Mr. Adams of Quincy: Might I suggest to the gentleman a question? I take it that all these amendments which we are presenting now are presented on the general principle that the Legislature of Massachusetts is a common thief, that it is not to be trusted, that it will steal if it can, and the object is to fence it about with as many restrictions as possible.

I wish to point out here that we are on the brink of a very great increment in industrial competition, and it is necessary that the community shall have its hands free to act for the common interest. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is worth while to tie up the hands of the Legislature by all sorts of restrictions, when he must know that if the Legislature really is put under pressure to get that property it would take it without any compensation at all. It always can; the majority always can if it wants to. It is only respecting the rights of others that secures us; it is not these “scraps of paper” that the courts are called on to construe. The courts have not got the power to enforce respect for their construction. It is nothing but the opinion of the public as represented in the Legislature that we depend on for the sanctity of our property.

Mr. Kinney: The gentleman has grasped the reasons why I opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Beverly and the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington,—because I do not wish to tie the hands of the Legislature any further than this resolution does, and because their amendments are for the purpose of narrowing and restricting the powers which it would grant to the Legislature.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Boston if he has taken note of the fact that the resolution or amendment by the gentleman from Beverly has added “other natural resources,” which might bring in peat?

Mr. Kinney: I had not given particular attention to the first part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Beverly. The first part of the amendment which he offers does add which I suppose to that extent really would broaden the power.

Therefore, in closing, I would say that I hope these amendments will not be adopted, and that the word “proper” will be stricken out of this resolution.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: I hope that the amendments offered by the gentleman from Beverly and the amendments offered by the gentleman from Beverly will be adopted,—all of those amendments. It is quite true that, as the last speaker says, they are restrictive amendments. They are restrictive in this degree: They do not prevent the development and conservation of the waste or the undeveloped or unappropriated or unused natural resources; they do prevent the interference, direction or control, outside the police power, of the developed forests or agricultural lands or water-power.

Mr. Kinney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that, so far as the water resources of the Commonwealth go, private capital already has developed them in some degree, and that if we should adopt his suggestion and confine the future activities of the Commonwealth to such water resources as have not been developed at all, the resolution, so far as real constructive work went, would be practically useless?

Mr. Dresser: I do not so understand. I do think that from PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES.

Heretofore the water resources of the State have been developed so far as it is practicable, or perhaps from the southern part of the State to the east. There are still some rivers which are capable of development; and, so far as I can see, we should make possible the development of our agricultural and our natural resources so far as they are natural resources.

This resolution finds its germ, its "natural resources," in the resolution (No. 231) by the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown), who states the point, because he said in his resolution: "The proper-water, coal, iron and oil in their original states are among the rights of mankind," etc. When the rapacious hands of the one on Public Affairs got hold of that particular resolution they said: Not only will we deal with the natural resources, will deal with the resources as developed by the investments of men.

Iron in the ground is a natural resource; when iron is beaten, though it is not. When water runs down a declivity it is a natural resource; when it is dammed and stored and power thereby created, it is not. The power that is created, the storage that is used is an instrument made by man and is not a natural resource. Brown of Brockton: I would ask the gentleman, if he cares to raise the question, can any generation bind the generation which is coming after? In other words, can you develop a property right, private, which is to the common right?

Bresser: To-day you can. When this resolution is passed you can. Every water-power, every farm, every forest, dealing with it is being made a public use, and subject to the control of the legislature, not only through its police power, but through its taking and regulating.

It is undoubtedly to my mind, that these resources being developed for public use, any agency which develops or conserves or utilizes whether it be a power company, whether it be a mill on the river that wants to develop the head-waters and assess the damages done by the stream, may be authorized by the Legislature to do and may act and be regulated just as the municipal light plant is performing a public use, although it is a private concern for the benefit of the water company in our towns is doing, just as railroads. The reason why I think that this question of the use of developed land or developed water should not be left open, the sort of dealing that it may get. It has got to be handled by the commission. Let me call the attention of the Convention to an amendment which was proposed this last winter by the Commission on Ways and Public Lands. That commission asked the Legislature to trust it with the "general care and supervision of such water and water resources within the Commonwealth as are or may be of further development."

In 2 says: "For the purpose of securing a greater use of the water resources now wholly or partially within the control of citizens," this commission may order the owner to carry out the plans of construction or development as it sees fit, and in the event such orders are not complied with the commission is authorized to take possession as receiver of the property of the owners to complete such development and to operate the old and the new properties until the costs to the Commonwealth are paid.

That was proposed to this year's Legislature by the commission that will have charge of the water question. Of course it is unconstitutional now. When this resolution is passed it will be constitutional. Do we want to do that? This is the time to decide whether that shall be the policy of the State or not. It means as a practical matter this. That a commission may come to a mill owner and say: "You must raise your dam ten feet, because during three months in the year the water wastes over the spillway, and if you raise it ten feet it is quite true that you will get no benefit of it, because you already have developed it to its economical capacity, which is never using the full value of the stream, but you are making possible some storage for somebody down below." And the man says: "Well, I can't see any return on that investment." And he cannot, because every mill owner has investigated that question ever since 1718, when the Mill Act began.

Mr. CREAMER of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester if he desires to have this power confined wholly to the absolutely undeveloped resources of the State, or if he is willing to have it apply to these resources which are only partially or perhaps improperly developed?

Mr. DRESSER: I desire to have it apply to the undeveloped resources of the State, where this thing can be done practically and usefully and economically.

Mr. CREAMER: I should like to have the delegate from Worcester answer me, absolutely and directly. Does he desire to have this power restricted to those natural resources which have not been developed at all, and to refuse to grant this power to the government over those resources which have been only partially and improperly developed?

Mr. DRESSER: I thought I had answered it honestly. I will answer it again. I desire to keep it to the undeveloped and waste lands or waters, which in this State are needing development. I do not think it is wise that there should be established as a principle that the commission or the waterways commission shall compel an owner to make developments for others, because I recognize and believe in private ownership in such matters. Of course if that is to be taken away, why then all my argument falls.

Mr. CREAMER: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester what he would do with those people who hold the natural resources of the State out of use, and only partially develop those resources that they hold out of use, for the sake of getting a larger price than they could if they properly developed them?

Mr. DRESSER: I do not know what could be done with such persons. They do not exist, as far as I am aware. The engineer, or one of the engineers of the commission, I believe, has stated that the water-powers that have been developed, the old privileges, have been developed as far as is practicable. I do not know how definite that is, but I understand that as a broad proposition, speaking now of water-power, the existing powers have been developed as much as possible.
happened to have occasion a few years ago to inquire into some of the values of disused powers. I found that in Massachusetts there were 65 water-powers on the market selling at far less than their value.

The small powers, the little village powers we all are familiar with, where the mill and the little village are one, have practically gone into disuse. Such properties are revived sometimes, but it is an economical proposition. It is not economical always. Here is a report of the National Chamber of Commerce which calls to the attention of its members some question as to water-powers, comparing them with steam, and combating what it calls the widely held but mistaken view that every water development is economical.

Our mill owners of Massachusetts have founded their business on the availability of water-power.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should ask the gentleman if he will not in his argument, to the point where he was interrupted by the gentleman from Lynn. He was speaking about this private ownership, as they had done, and I want to hear him on the question: Is that a definite title absolute? Could those who delegated the power give an absolute title that could refuse to raise that dam if it was necessary to greater use than theirs? I wonder if I make myself understood.

Do any private title to a natural resource be superior to a demand for the common good?

Mr. Dresser: There is such a title by virtue of the grant of the owners of the Colony, by virtue of the Mill Acts, which first appeared, I think, in 1718, when mills were established for the common use.

All these titles relate back, or the principal ones probably, to the sources. It is possible for this Convention to wipe them out; it cannot be done. It is for this Convention to say that there shall be private property in land or water, or the development of land or water. I suppose that this Convention can take property without compensation, if it wishes, so far as our State Constitution is concerned, because we are deciding upon our fundamental guarantees, and only thing that gives a title to property is our Constitution, state law, of course, of the State Constitution.

Now, it seems to me that it is unwise, as a practical matter, especially in view of one striking example from one commission which I quoted, that this authority should be given so broadly as the question provides, and it is on that ground that I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington and the gentleman from Beverly will prevail.

With reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (William S. Kinney), striking out the word "proper," I should say that the opinion was sound that the word "proper" in the original resolution is the only thing that is an anchor to windward. That is stricken out there undoubtedly would be no supervision by courts of any act under it. If the amendments of the gentlemen in charge of, — the proposed amendments, — are adopted, why, then I do not think it makes much difference whether "proper" is left there or not, because they will leave to the power of the Legislature the power which I suppose we all are content to leave there and have used. We want our wastes, our agricultural deserts, to blossom like the rose. We want our streams to be conserved. We want, if it is possible in any way, to develop hydro-electric power. We want it brought to our houses. If it is possible to increase our manufacturing powers, or to cut down our costs, we want it done; and probably there is no stream in the Commonwealth now where a single individual, or a single interest, would find it economical to make In New York it has been attempted; it is being attempted in other States; I would be glad to see it attempted here. But let us deal with the natural resources, and not deal with the property which years of effort on our part, years of effort in our mills and in our farms under the guarantees of our laws, have developed.

Now, perhaps that is selfish; I suppose it is, if anything is to be secured to individuals, but it seems to me that distinction ought to be made.

Mr. David Mancovitz of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 379) be amended by inserting after the word "otherwise", in line 7, the words "by the Commonwealth."

Mr. MANCOVITZ: The purpose of the amendment, offered by me, is to clarify the intent of the resolution. I believe all of us agree, if the grant of power is to be exercised, it should be exercised by the Commonwealth alone and not by private individuals. As the resolution now reads, it is possible for the Legislature to empower a private company to do the thing the Commonwealth can do. I believe the intention of the author of the amendment was to limit that power to the Commonwealth alone.

Mr. MORRILL of Haverhill: I hope the words "eminent domain" will not be placed in this amendment, because if they are it will be solely for the purpose of further handicapping cities and towns when they desire to institute public improvements; to build a school-house, for instance, when they must secure land on which to build it. As soon as a site is decided upon, or expected to be decided upon, the value of that site goes up. The city has to pay more for it than a private individual would have to pay. The fact that the public desires it for a public purpose becomes at once a valuable asset of the landowner and is at once incorporated in the price.

Now, in contrast to that, we might consider Germany's method of doing things. There are some good things done in Germany; at least there were before the war. Now, in Germany, when it was decided to enter into State ownership of some enterprises, there was not a great outcry made about it. Here we should cry long and loud for the effect on the stock market, if for no other reason. The thing was done very quietly over there. The government indirectly obtained the possession of a majority of the stock in certain enterprises, while that stock was at a low figure in the market. Then, having acquired the stock, the government came out boldly and announced that it was going to take over those enterprises upon whose ownership it had decided beforehand to exercise an influence. Thereby it secured the properties a great deal lower than American cities now secure land and other commodities needed in the public service after the owners have been "put wise" to what the municipality intends to do.

Also, in Germany, they have what they term excess condemnation. If they want to build a State highway, for instance, they obtain land for a great distance on both sides of the proposed right of way. After constructing the highway, the surplus land is sold at an increased
The expenditure of public money on the highway has added value of all that land; the government takes the surplus value. Highway in consequence costs the people nothing, or costs the amount nothing as one wants to figure it. But in this country, the spokesmen for the vested interests and for our veiled people government always are endeavoring to place restrictions on progress by the people and to hamper them when they seek to do anything new.

I insert in this amendment the words "eminent domain" would do just that,—to interpose the usual handicap. I hope that, at least at least, we will stand by the report of the committee. We found that all the committees up here have acted conservatively, and none of them can be accused of having been too radical. There is no reason, therefore, why we should try to overturn the action of the committee in regard to the methods by which the acquisition of the public should be brought about.

ADAMS of Quincy: I have spoken often in the Convention and afraid I have occupied too much of its time already, in pointing out the one great issue which is before this country and before this state which is the clash between private and public interest. Now, we have got to take one course or the other. If we undertake to hold the public, that is to say, if we undertake to throw the weight of convention in favor of the private interest, which always is trying to check movement in every direction, to that extent we are doing our part toward the future revolution that is bound to come, and we need to undertake to delude ourselves on that subject. We are exactly like those who harnessed a horse to a load which is going downhill. They can keep going, backing, trying to hold the load up, but the time comes, and certainly the time will come, when if that load is not lightened it breaks down and there is destruction.

I can consider this question exactly as well as if we were standing before the whole people. The tendency of not only the whole country, but our whole country, is in one direction, and we are in the corner of that great world, trying to back up against it and go out from movement. We cannot do it, and the more we struggle the more does it become more and municipalities of private interests, the more those private interests will thrive when the inevitable movement comes.

I have got to consider the public interest. In our own self-defense we have got to put it in the power of the public to utilize its resources in their greatest extent; and those resources can be utilized more economically and efficiently by the community acting as a community, than they can be by private individuals. That has been the secret of the marvels which Germany has wrought for four years in fighting the whole world; simply because it has been able, by its system of public administration, to utilize its resources more economically than the Allies have been able to utilize theirs. Had the Allies been able to establish and carry out a system as the Germans, the war would have ended within a few months. Now we have been called into this war, in order we may expend our resources with relation to a wasteful system, a wasteful system in comparison,—because we cannot utilize our resources as cheaply as other people. If we cannot do it now, waste now, we have got to do it at some later time. We have got to establish and carry out a system which shall be economical and this resolution now before the Convention is one very moderate step in that direction.

Mr. Creed of Boston: Last summer we heard this matter discussed three days in Committee of the Whole, we heard it on its other reading, and I move the previous question.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I have an amendment in the hands of the Secretary, which I should like to get in, — to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "taking, by purchase or otherwise," and insert in place thereof the words "purchase, or taking by eminent domain."

Mr. Hoskins of Worcester: I dislike to object to the previous question, but I feel as though this was a sufficiently important proposition especially as this is the last stage, for us to give it a little more time. We have some five or six amendments moved; they never have been in print. They will be on the calendar probably for the first time tomorrow. I, for one, have not had the opportunity that I should like to study those amendments, which are thrown in at the last minute and which, if discussion is closed at this time, must be considered very immaturely. I consider that the spending of a little more time at this last stage is a great deal better than to run the risk of voting on these matters without careful consideration. I have endeavored to sit in the background thus far and not monopolize the time of this Convention on this subject, which I have discussed on several occasions before this body.

Personally I hope the previous question will not prevail, because I should like a little more than the ten minutes which the rules allow the member in charge of the report to speak after the previous question is moved. For that reason I hope at this time the previous question will not be ordered.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I do not want to take but just a moment, but I hope the previous question will not be put just now. I do not intend to take up any time of the Convention; but this is a big proposition.

Some years ago a private corporation thought it would contrive a scheme to get power from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, taking the land of private companies, building a great reservoir district, and then assess the cost of the development and operation on the owner of water-power away down the stream. That made an alliance with other organizations in the State of Connecticut at Windsor Locks. It has plans to sell its power in Connecticut and in Rhode Island. I should like to see this resolution so thoroughly discussed that there will be nothing in it which will enable a private corporation to come in and get powers from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, involving eminent domain and public use, and then use those powers to the detriment of Massachusetts and to the private advantage of the corporation. There is a lot wrapped up in this resolution that does not show from a reading. I am in favor of its general principles. I believe in it, but I think we ought to take ample time to scan it pretty thoroughly.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I hope the previous question will not be voted at this time, not because I expect to speak upon this measure but because I want some more instruction myself and should be very much interested to hear further than we have heard about this large important subject. I hope the previous question will not be at this time.

SHAW of Revere: I sincerely trust the gentleman in this division (reed) will withdraw the motion. We have here one of the most important propositions that has come before this Convention at this time. There are no restrictions placed upon the Legislature, assumes and there is nothing in this matter which will prevent that from turning over to the Waterways Commission, if need be, the authority to lease these rights for a nominal rental, without the purpose of discussing them, in order that we all may understand exactly what we are doing, I sincerely trust the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Convention rejected the motion that the main question be put forthwith. The debate was resumed Thursday, July 25.

HORNS of Worcester: This matter was discussed very thoroughly yesterday. It is gratifying to the committee which worked on this matter to see a large and extensive interest in the matter, with personally I am somewhat disconsolate at finding myself at variance with a number of the members of this Convention with whom I should be most glad to be in accord. I think it is fair to say that the school of political economy in which I was reared in no great degree from the school of political economy of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) was reared. And this subject, although laboring upon the same committee, have not been able to come to an agreement as to the precise wording of the amendment. To be sure, the difference is not a great one, determined by the single word "utilization." The gentleman from Lexington is willing to go so far as to contemplate and develop but he is not willing to stand for utilization because, as he said, opens the way for the Commonwealth to go into all sorts of business. In a measure, of course, that is true. "Utilization" means the turning to account. And I presume if the Commonwealth was to turn to account these properties which the amendment provides it to take, it unquestionably means that it could go into many private businesses. As to whether that is the probable effect of the amendment I shall have something to say later. Suffice it to say for the present that it is by no means probable that the Commonwealth would enlarge its present functions in any marked extent except under the press of dire necessity.

The past few months, as I think the gentleman from Lexington here, would agree, we have seen a most portentous development of the functions of the State and of the Nation. He has urged us, disregarding war conditions, to deal with the subject on the basis of normal condition. That may or may not be a safe thing to do. However, after the war, we shall have a reversion to conditions as prevailed before the war is a consideration by no means certain. It may very well happen, as has been urged on this floor, that the war we shall see battle on the field followed by competition in the world markets, a strife in social conditions which will necessitate a further expansion of the functions of the State. Therefore we must look on this matter not on any assumed former basis, but with the possibility ever before us of abnormal conditions, not on such as prevail in the present but such as may prevail in the future. For we are building a Constitution that is to work not only in peace, but in war as well, that is fitted not merely for sailing on calm and friendly seas but is fitted also to weather the storm. Therefore, if we decline to meet the gentleman upon his basis of normal conditions, it is because I think it is necessary to take into account what has been happening in the last few months.

The great virtue of war is that it brings out at once the best and the worst that is inherent in humanity and in human institutions. To go no further than the one conception of property,—which is the one that is immediately concerned in this matter,—and the conception of the proper functions of the State, conceptions that we, I think, can visualize at a glance, let us consider the results of this touchscreen applied to our conditions. On the subject of property we have seen on the one hand the nauseous take of profiteering, of seeking to gain out of the necessities of the Nation an unjust gain, of taking advantage of a tragic position to control the necessities of life, to extract an unjust gain from the public. We have seen our friends of labor going forward under a formula for winning the war which may perhaps be adequately summed up in the line of the old poem:

Strike! Till the last armed foe expires.

We have seen the no less portentous instance of Lazarus emerging from the bosom of Abraham to go into partnership with Dives in the business of selling the Government rotten raincoats.

On the other hand, we have witnessed the concept of property yield to the public interest in a notable degree. We have seen the people of this Commonwealth and of this Nation yielding up generously of their property in charity, in taxation, and even contributing from their own sugar bucket and flour barrel to meet the necessities of the Nation and of our allies. We have seen even the sacred subject of land treated in an equally casual way. We have seen the man who had land that he could not use say to his brother who had none: “Come and till,” and all about our great cities we have seen the wilderness blossom like the rose. We have seen the power of the State used with willing assent of the people to put these revolutionary things into actual effect. Fortunately rigorous action has not been needed. Had it been needed the strong arm of the State to commandeer property unquestionably would have been exercised. Therefore, when we approach the subject of increasing the powers of the State to take, we want to remember that the taking that we propose to authorize means more radical than the powers that the storm and stress, already is using.

As to the functions of the State, we grew up, I think, with the idea that the functions of the State should be relatively restricted, that they should go as short a distance as was consistent with the carrying on of the public affairs and that as much as possible should be left to private initiative. That principle I am far from claiming is entirely out of date. A State cannot overestimate the value, the overwhelming value, of private initiative in moulding and forming the character of its citizens. And yet during the last series of years, even befo
For, we have seen the functions of the State and of the cities and slowly added to. Our cities and towns very generally have gone the business of supplying their inhabitants with some of the necessities of life. Water, for instance, is almost entirely now in the hands of cities and towns of the State. The supplying of gas and electricity has been taken up by some of our municipalities, and others of municipalities under authority that we have granted this last year, hesitatingly, perhaps, already are seeking to enter on the business of supplying their inhabitants with fuel. That process is, I think, an inevitable one under present conditions. When I first had the General Court nothing would have been further from the minds of the citizens of this Commonwealth than that the Commonwealth should undertake to operate the great street railway systems of the Commonwealth. And yet when the emergency arose the very men who would have opposed it at that time were the ones to come forward in favor of it. So times change and so do things.

The proposition involves matters which have been under consideration for a long time,—the public interest in natural resources. The state's wealth consists in land and the minerals under it, the streams flowing through it, the winds that blow over it and all of the matters are given to us not by our own industry but by the bounty of nature. Those cannot be increased or added to, in the main in any appreciable degree. There is a fixed quantity of them there and acting upon the use that we make of them we may grow great and strong as we are.

The matter of farming,—and I am no farmer and therefore on this subject with considerable difference,—in the matter of farming there has been more than one occasion in the history of our country when a marked condition of social progress followed the introduction of new methods of farming, making it possible to raise more upon the land they had and therefore making it support a larger population. The condition easily may arise whereby the State by intelligent action can increase the net product of food from the land of our commonwealth and thereby confer an inestimable boon upon its tenants.

The subject of water supply, of increasing the power that is derived from our streams, of conserving the flow of water, of preventing floods, has been considered by the United States government has carried out. I think that those are matters to all of us. Lately, of recent years, it has been proved that streams contain in the water the means whereby the lack of fuel from which so many localities suffer can be supplied through the means of electricity; and the question arises now as to how that power may be made most easily available for that and for other purposes.

The use of our streams in this Commonwealth are pretty well tied up with the interests of water rights. A great deal of our water-power has been developed. It is my fortune to have before me of the Commission on Waterways and Water Supply, a report that I have before me of the Commission on Waterways and Water Supply, a report that I have before me of the Commission on Waterways and Water Supply, just in print, indicates pretty clearly that a notable portion of our available water-power already is developed. It is my fortune to have before me a report that I have before me of the Commission on Waterways and Water Supply, a report that I have before me of the Commission on Waterways and Water Supply, just in print, indicates pretty clearly that a notable portion of our available water-power already is developed.
turing and industries which grew up, many of them, a considerable time before the present age and the later discoveries in science. It once appears that there is a possibility of remolding and reconstructing those water-powers so as to produce the greater quantity of power which the Commonwealth needs. I wish to read, incidental to this, a small paragraph from this report which I have referred to. The paragraph refers to Miller's River and to the Westfield River:

The greater part of the undeveloped fall of these streams is owned by private companies, and if the plans they have prepared for their development could be carried out there is little doubt but that a part and perhaps all of the proposed reservoirs could be profitably built. If, however, this storage capital it will probably require the cooperation of all the parties who will benefit therefrom; but the projects are so large and so many that it is doubtful if it can be accomplished by a voluntary organization of the mills similarly to those joint efforts which have brought about the construction of numerous small reservoirs on various streams throughout the State. Either State supervision of the reservoir companies, or possibly even State construction of reservoirs, may prove desirable, and in any event it may be necessary to invoke the right of eminent domain to accomplish the desired result. The financial support of the State may also be necessary, and would undoubtedly be of great value to the projects.

The advantages arising from the proposed systems of reservoirs would be:

1. An improvement of the existing privileges.
2. The development of the undeveloped stretches of the river, thus further utilizing the State's natural resources.
3. The equalization of the flow of these streams, which would increase their ability to overcome pollution during the summer months and make possible greater industrial development.
4. A lessening of floods, particularly on the Westfield River.

It is believed that these projects are of sufficient size and importance to warrant the attention of the State.

I do not think I need to go into that matter at very great length. The subject is an immensely complicated one considering all the private interests involved. If left to individual initiative to bring about the desired result, it probably would fail. It already has been tried in one case and has failed through inability of the parties to get together. Unless the State undertakes to take a hand in this matter and unless the power is given to make necessary takings of land, that projected development, in particular, which involves the possibility of a large increase in the resources of the Commonwealth would not be possible. That is one thing that this resolution undertakes to secure. I submit to the Convention that it is a reason why this resolution should pass.

As to the mineral resources of the Commonwealth, they are not particularly extensive. Still, we have some.

As to the other natural resources, I do not think, after the dissertation on them by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) that I need to go into that matter further. Enough that there is at stake in this resolution the possibility of good.

As to the form of the resolution, there seems to be a greater degree of difficulty. A number of amendments have been moved. I wish to discuss them in somewhat other than the order in which they appear upon the calendar.

The first amendment of the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring), striking out, in line 4, the words "and water resources," and inserting in place thereof the words, "water and other natural resources," have no objection to. Nor have I objection to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Kinney), on page 2, striking our word "proper." I think that it would make no conceivable differ from the second amendment moved by the gentleman from Beverly, out the words "by purchase or otherwise," and inserting in have objection to the adoption of that amendment. I must that I cannot concur in the criticism of those words made by tment from Boston yesterday. The words used are precisely ed in the tenth article of the Bill of Rights which I think does can contain the words which he would have inserted, "eminent Walker of Brookline: I am sorry to hear the gentleman say no objection to that amendment, and I wish to ask him ly really means that or not. The words "by purchase or words "by purchase or otherwise" are well-known, adjudicated words. They mean that prop-be taken by purchase and sale or by eminent domain. They mean anything else. It does not mean that property can be without paying for it. If property can be taken under the police it can be taken whether this resolution is passed or not. It me that the words "by purchase or otherwise" are eminently ly to be in this resolution and I trust that the gentleman will ought to stay there.

Hobbs: I am not at all certain that the net result is going to different whether the words are inserted or not. I do not however, that there can be any question, after having made a tion of public use, but that the power of the State to make ises is entirely inherent and would follow as a matter of course.
clined to think that if the language of the resolution remained ns, that the guarantee of the tenth article of the Bill of Rights, roperty should not be taken for public uses without compensa-bould be entirely adequate to secure the same result. There are er of members of the Convention who feel that a stipulation be inserted relative to the payment of just compensation, and o harm in inserting that. Therefore I am not inclined to what I already have said.

Dresser of Worcester: May I ask the gentleman whether the
if this resolution would be either in whole or in part altered, fter the words "public uses" were stricken out? In other not the essence of the resolution contained in the first

Hobbs: That is rather a large proposition. I am inclined to that the declaration of these matters as public uses is the meat position. At the same time I do not feel that the succeeding are entirely without value.

as to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston novitz), printed on page 1, that the resolution be amended ting after the word "taking", in line 6, the words "by the wealth", that may be considered in connection with the ent moved by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), involve entirely different concepts. The one desires to t the word "utilization" for the purpose of limiting the power State; the other desires to insert the words "by the Common-so as to secure that nothing shall be done except by the State. The two propositions are entirely opposed. If you adopt one you must not adopt the other. It is my impression that we would do well to adopt neither. The amendment of the gentleman from Boston, confining this matter to the functions of the State, it seems to me is highly undesirable. There are a number of these propositions which can be efficiently, and ought to be, worked out by private enterprise and private capital. There are, on the other hand, projects like, for instance, the Miller’s River project, so complex and so difficult to carry through at all, that it is very questionable if they can be carried out entirely by private initiative. Suppose the State went in and built a series of reservoirs, such as the Commission on Waterways and Public Lands contemplated, — and this is said without passing upon the merits of that scheme. To whom is it going to turn them over after they have made the development there? It is for the benefit of all the enterprises all the way down the stream. There is no one to whom it can turn the development over. It either would have to erect an artificial person, a new corporation or association, to which it could turn it over, or else it would have to keep it itself. Now, it might be for the benefit of everybody that the State should retain control of those reservoirs, which are for the benefit of a great number of people, rather than undertake to bring the various parties into co-operation, in some form or other of organization. On that ground, if on no other, it seems to me that the amendment of neither gentleman ought to be adopted.

I do not feel that there is any such danger as the gentleman from Lexington anticipates of any great extension of the functions of the State. Our guarantee against State socialism is not the paper words of our Constitution; it is the sentiment of the people, which on the whole is in favor of private ownership and private activity, so far as practicable.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I should like to ask the gentleman, taking the resolution as it stands, with the word “proper” stricken out of it, which I understand him to assent to, — is there any limit to the extent to which the Legislature might go in deciding what conservation, development, etc., may warrant?

Mr. Hobbs: I am not familiar with any definition of the word “proper” that would furnish any serious handicap to the activities of the State in that respect. I may be wrong on that point, but it did not strike me, on such consideration as I was able to give to it, that the presence of that word would be a serious limit on the activities of the State.

Mr. Morton: I did not mean to put any special emphasis upon the word “proper,” but I understood the gentleman to assent to striking it out, and I took the resolution in the form in which that would leave it; but with it in or with it out, is there any limit, as the resolution is drawn, to the extent to which the Legislature may go in deciding what conservation and development, etc., require?

Mr. Hobbs: I think that the limit of the power of the State in other respects has been given in very general language and no serious harm has resulted therefrom. As to how far you want to tie the hands of the General Court down to specified lines and limits of action is, of course, a matter of discretion for the Convention. Some people think that the General Court, or the State, can work better hackles upon their limbs. I am not given to that way of thinkit seems to me it is better to make the language of your power big enough so that they can work without having too many con-spatial impediments to rise and plague them and turn them aside desirable lines of activity.

There are certain lines of activity upon which I believe I have perused some of the Convention, at least, that there is a possibility of good. You can give the General Court this power broadly and fully, or you can tie it down and fetter it with restrictions that, at turn, will be a perpetual handicap against their doing anything, paring a perpetual resort to the courts to find the limits of their

There is a possibility that you may decide to take that course. I hope you will not. I hope you will leave the Legislature as proposed in these matters as you dare to. Consider the broad and full language in which the police power, so called, for instance, moves to the Legislature, namely, the authority to pass all sorts of reasonable and necessary laws. Can any power be broader than that, no serious harm resulted from the granting of so broad a proposed to the Legislature?

Presiding Officer interrupted the speaker to announce a great victory by using forces in the European War.

HOBBS: This bifurcation of my speech brings me nearer to the mission of it. It is not easy to work up to a climax which would anything more than an anti-climax after that announcement. I shall not content myself with a very brief request to the Convention be as generous as possible to the powers they give to the Gen-court, remembering that in any event the action of the Legislation is apt to be in contravention of the popular will. The General Legislature has been proclaimed by many authorities to prefer to the people than any other State Legislature in the United and I think a fair inspection of its legislative records will indiicate that it has not strayed very far from the beaten path of public in the formulation of its State policies. Now, so long as the principle of private ownership and management is tained there is no danger that the Legislature will do any-else.

The functions of the State were designed not for the sake of giving the opportunity to do something, but because those functions were essential for the well-being of the community. If the State makes up its mind that these propositions, or any other propositions for the community to handle, it will take more words on paper to stop them. Therefore it seems to me the waste of time in trying to forge verbal fetters to the Legislature from doing what it is not at all likely to do.
A well-known and persistent tendencies of the General Court are not consistent with the public welfare may well be checked; en it comes to the question of tying them up so that they cannot get into the farming business, cannot go into the manufacturing bus., neither of which they are at all apt to go into on any extennal, although both of which they do go into to some extent at
I think you are taking a very great deal of unnecessary
Mr. Newton of Everett: I should like to ask the gentleman if he has accepted the suggested amendment of the committee on Form and Phraseology, striking out the words "by purchase or otherwise," and inserting in place thereof the words "upon payment of just compensation therefor?"

Mr. Hobbs: Subject to correction, I did. I may say, while I do not see the necessity of it, I do not see any real good reason why those words should not be inserted if anybody considers they are of any value. The Constitution now guarantees for property taken for public use the payment of reasonable compensation, and I think that guarantee probably would extend to this amendment if adopted.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: While we are on this point, it seems to me to be pertinent to pursue the discussion a little further. I understand the proposition is to strike out the words "by purchase or otherwise," and then insert other words in their place, — "upon payment of just compensation therefor." Of course, as the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) has said, in one sense it is unimportant, if property is taken just compensation will be paid therefor. The only point that I make is this: The words "by purchase or otherwise" are thoroughly understood. They have been interpreted by the courts. They do not mean that property may be taken without payment therefor. They have but one meaning, namely, that the property may be taken by purchase by the Commonwealth, or it must be taken by eminent domain.

Now, my point is this: That with words so well known, so thoroughly well adjudicated, it would be better to use them than to strike them out and use other words.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: The amendment proposed by me is to strike out the words "by purchase or otherwise." The reason for that amendment was that though "by purchase or otherwise" is used in statutes by the Commonwealth it is not used in the Constitution. It has not been interpreted that I know of and I have yet to see an instance in which it has been used, so far as constitutional provisions are concerned. It is true that as a statutory provision it has been interpreted, as the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker) suggests. Now, if "by paying just compensation" is the language of the Bill of Rights, it seems to me in a constitutional provision it is better to have been interpreted in the state constitutional language. Moreover, having been interpreted in the statutes, being subject to the interpretation, "by paying just compensation," it does not follow but that a strain was put on the interpretation of the statutory words, being subject to the constitutional provision would be very well interpreted in the future not as it statutes, but a new interpretation given said that in making a Constitution the constitutional provision was altered, and the statute operated under "just compensation," and did extend it to the police power, — taking it either by right of eminent domain or under the Commonwealth's right to take by the police power.

Therefore it seemed to me that this phrase, which might define perfectly the settlement of the question, was better than leaving it hung up with any doubt, to the possible future determination of the courts.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: If I may be allowed to pursue the thread of my argument, which now has been badly scattered, I want to say conclusion, that the principal amendment in importance is the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp). That I introduce a serious limitation, it seems to me, upon this conditional amendment. It would do two things. In the first place, it would do what the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) aptly wants to do,—it would prevent the State from doing anything with a property which already was fully developed, irrespective of the necessity that might be to a general scheme of development. It seems to me that this is an undesirable result.

On the other hand, it would do what the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) wants to do. It would confine the utilization of these properties, so far as the power to utilize them is contained in the power of the State to conserve and develop, to private initiative. I am fully prepared to agree that in a great many cases it is fair that that should be the case, there is a certain class of cases, particularly those of large importance, where it might be essential for the State to be the controlling factor. So many of our large water developments are intimately concerned with the question of electric lighting and the distribution of power, both of which come close to the present conception of proper fields of public endeavor, that it is not extending the matter a great way to allow the State to enter into this field. Therefore I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) will not prevail.

I hope also that the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Livitz), limiting this to the Commonwealth, will not prevail because I think that would be equally mischievous.

To the several amendments relative to the form in which we put the language relative to the taking and the payment of compensation, I think that the Convention has heard sufficient from me, and I will leave them to the guidance of those who may desire to discuss the question after me. I am firmly of the belief that no great grief will be done by the adoption of the amendment, either of the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) or of the gentleman from Newburyport (Mr. Richardson). Either one will work about the same thing.

The words "just compensation therefor," not having been inserted, I presume it is a fair thing to say that no section of the Constitution has been under closer judicial scrutiny than the tenth article of the Bill of Rights, and if those words have not been judicially considered, it is because they are too clear to need further construction.

Broderick of Waltham moved that the resolution be amended by adding end thereof the words "and the standard by which the value of water and water privileges shall be determined shall be the volume of power utility the owner or owners or lessees thereof."

BRODERICK: I am aware that other members desire to be heard on this time and I shall say now only a very few words, though I hope I may have the opportunity to speak more at length before the debate is taken. I have offered this amendment because I believe that the fact and utility of this amendment, if it should be adopted by this Convention and ratified by the people, will be hampered very seriously with the complications and expensive litigation that will arise in determining the value of water rights and water privileges. I believe that a standard should be fixed by this Convention whereby such values may be determined.
Mr. Quincy of Boston: I want to add only a very few words to the very excellent speech of the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs), the chairman of the committee. I think he has placed this whole matter before the Convention in a very clear light. It seems to me that this is eminently a case in which the Convention would do well to stand by the report of the committee and the attitude of the committeee in regard to the various amendments proposed. My only excuse for taking a few moments is the fact that I have given a great deal of thought and study to this particular question which is covered by this amendment, and that I want particularly to emphasize the importance of adopting the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring). There is a difference of opinion in the Convention, perhaps quite an acute difference, as to the desirability of adopting his second amendment, which relates to the form of words to be used.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: If I may interrupt the gentleman at this point, I wish to say that I am satisfied with the explanation that has been made by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring), and I would like to withdraw my objection to that amendment.

Mr. Quincy: I did not intend to say anything about the second amendment of the gentleman from Beverly or to take any position upon that question, but to ask the Convention not to separate this first amendment from his second amendment. Now, his first amendment, to my mind, is very important, and I am very glad that the chairman of the committee has accepted that amendment, because it broadens in a very important respect the application of this amendment. It extends it to all natural resources, and clearly its scope should be as large as that. We are trying to provide for the development of the natural resources in Massachusetts, whether agricultural or fuel or power. I am specially interested in the development of the great peat resources of this Commonwealth. The amendment as it stands, without the amendment of the gentleman from Beverly, would not allow action by the Legislature in regard to the control and development of our great deposits of peat. With the additional words in the amendment it would bring these within the scope of the action proposed. If he had not moved that amendment I should have done so myself.

In regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancovitz), I think that the chairman of the committee has taken a very sensible attitude in favor of entrusting the full power to utilize these new constitutional powers, in such manner as it sees fit. Why should we, if we are going to trust the Legislature with these new powers, undertake to say that they shall be used only by direct legislative action? I believe we should trust the Legislature to deal with each question upon its merits and upon its particular conditions, as it comes up. It may be the best policy for the Commonwealth to take directly, but it also may be the best policy for the Commonwealth to authorize a municipality, which perhaps was operating an electrical plant, to exercise this power of taking. It might be the best policy to authorize some public service corporation to exercise the power of taking. So let us not tie the hands of the Legislature in advance and prevent them from dealing with these questions according to the circumstances of each particular case.
be, in closing, merely express my own great satisfaction as a member of the committee, at the very important work which this committee has done. I wish to recognize the very great value which I believe will inhere in this measure if adopted by this Convention and by the people of the Commonwealth. The prosperity of this State depends on the furnishing to the people of sufficient food, which we raise in our own limits, of sufficient fuel, which we cannot produce for ourselves because we have not got it here; and of sufficient power to turn the wheels of our industries. Anything that we can do to the supply of food, to the supply of fuel, and to the supply of power in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will contribute in a large degree to maintaining the basis for our future prosperity. We use in this State nearly 2,200,000 horse-power. Our prosperity is founded upon the production of that power in the most economical manner possible. I think it is a conservative statement to say that at least 100,000 further horse-power could be developed from the powers by the kind of action which the Legislature would be called upon to take, and possibly would take to a considerable extent, if this measure passed.

As a member of the committee, I shall follow the committee, not only upon the amendments but in our action upon the amendments thereto proposed; and, more particularly, I trust that we shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), which eliminates the word "utilization." The whole conservation program of the National government has been criticized severely upon this point, that it provided only, in its initial stages at least, the matter remedied in the next amendment, for conservation. What did that result in? It was the tying up of an enormous amount of valuable natural resources. They were conserved but they were conserved by being tied up so that for a time no one could use them.

We need conservation first, the taking, the securing for the public benefit. We need the power to develop; but we need to subject legislative discretion, which I believe we should trust, to utilize as it seems best to the Legislature, to utilize on its own account. There is no dangerous extension of the sphere of trading here. I myself and various other gentlemen in this Convention would go a good deal further than this amendment goes; I have refrained from proposing to go further in the interest of the committee, of securing the very value which inheres in proposition as it stands.

The town of Revere: I yield to no man in this Convention in respect to the conservation of the natural resources of our Commonwealth when you place the word "utilization" in this resolution, and incorporate it into our Constitution, I firmly believe you are going to do a wrong thing. As I understand that, it seems that if I own a piece of land, I do not own it, that it becomes a public use, and at that time can be taken by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, under a legislative act, for the furtherance of that legislative act, be given to various or otherwise, or municipalities.

Not a critic of the Legislature, but there are certain limitations which should be placed upon such tremendously broad, extraordinarily powe as are contained in that resolution. We have instances in the tax matters in this Commonwealth where lands of the Commonwealth have been singled out from the other lands owned by the Commonwealth; and the statute of 1909, chapter 385, part I of section 1, states that if a certain part of the lands of the Commonwealth, located in one ward of a city, are leased for business purposes, the lessee should be taxed as if he were the owner of the fee. Mark the language of that statute: That if the lands of the Commonwealth, located in a particular ward of a city, are leased, the if he were the owner of the fee. That proposition came before the Legislature of Massachusetts in 1904, when the present mayor of Boston was a State Senator. At that time, when it was sought to enact that statute, he desired to include an amendment that if the lands of the Commonwealth were used for business purposes they all should be taxed to the lessee as if he were the owner of the fee making a general tax act. After various ramifications through the legislative committees, the committee decided to pick out that one ward of a city, after all the facts had been presented to them and they put that statute through. That is an instance of the vast powers of the Legislature and their ability pick out one particular piece of property and give it treatment not given to all others of like kind.

There are pieces of Commonwealth property in East Boston, there are pieces of Commonwealth property in Quincy, which are leased for business purposes and are not taxable. When the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by right of eminent domain takes lands by virtue that act, those lands are withdrawn from taxation and it requires a special act of the Legislature in order to make those lands taxable. Now, in the case in point, there are other lands in the vicinity, this one ward of the city of Boston, that are held under a bond for deed; there are others held under a license, business performed, a person taken, on that very land, and no taxation to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is unfair, it is unjust, it is unwarranted; and the very resolution places in the hands of the Legislature that same unwarrantable and unjustifiable power, that they may take in dealing with that property.

I am opposed to that amendment; — at least, opposed to this proposition; and if any amendment is passed by this Convention, I trust it will be the amendment of the gentleman from Boston. We have no quarrel with private ownership, nor have we fights amongst themselves. Let me instance this case: Suppose the Legislature takes the water-powers of Massachusetts by right of eminent domain. They pay reasonable compensation for the same. That property is withdrawn from taxation. Then the commission under which this particular division comes may take that property and the may lease it to their competitors for a nominal sum, and exempt from taxation. They may take my farm lands, if I have them, and the State Department of Agriculture may tell me that "you must do a certain thing upon your farm, otherwise you are deprived of your right to them." They lay down special rules for me to follow on land which I own, occupy and utilize. Therefore I say that this word "utilization" is too broad; it makes it so that the operation and ownership of private property, utilized, becomes a public use. I think it is wrong in principle; and those illegitimate acts get their first footing from eviations from recognized modes of legal procedure. We all have the right to be taxed and to operate under general laws, and I believe it right that we should incorporate into our Constitution a resolution which would give the Legislature of Massachusetts tremendously broad powers to utilize as they saw fit. [Ap-

UTLER of Brockton: As a member of the committee on Public Lands and perhaps the member who was responsible for the word "cure" appearing in this measure, I feel it my duty to say a word in regard to the vast amount of wet and waste land in the New England States. There are between 300,000 and 400,000 acres of waste lands in the State; it has been estimated that there are 500,000, but there are between 300,000 and 400,000 that are good for agricultural purposes. And I want to say that I have the honor of talking with an expert employed by the United States to look over the wet lands in conjunction with our State Department of Agriculture in Massachusetts, and he has said to me that the great cedar swamp which is located within 40 miles of the city of Boston, within 20 miles of the city of Boston, there is land that is better for agricultural purposes than the great tidal lands of Holland; a better per cent of vegetable matter and would be better for agricultural purposes. And I want to say that there is need of the products, — of words that can be put into our Constitution giving the Legislature the right to develop those most valuable pieces of land that are told by the State Department of Agriculture that private owners have combined together who would like to develop some of the pieces of land, but there are a few people who own some farms around amongst it who say: "Here, you are going to make money out of this. We won't sell you our property at a reasonable price so that you can bring a public benefit to the people of Massachusetts." And so you see it is of vital importance that we should make this, as far as the agricultural part is concerned, as strong as possible, so that a vast amount of land in Massachusetts can be utilized. We to-day raise but about 15 per cent of what our people use, and I am of the opinion that if we could utilize the land in Massachusetts as it should be utilized, if we could raise as much as they should be raised, we could feed from 60 to 80 per cent of the people of Massachusetts from our own soil. That will be possible, but if you figure the amount of food that can be raised upon one acre of land you will see it would be an easy matter to feed a large part of the people of this State from its own soil.

RYANT of Milton: I should like to ask the speaker where the farms are located which it is proposed to take away from the State under this amendment goes through.

UTLER: I will say that I am not prepared to name the exact farm, but I will say that it would come in the range of one of our most productive sections of this waste land which is to be drained.

RYANT: I should like to ask the gentleman if he will specify the farm to which he has reference, — the general location of the farm.

UTLER: I will say that the location is within 20 miles of the City House.

MAN of Easthampton: I should like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to strike out the word "agricultural" and insert in place thereof "wet and waste lands", which to all intents and purposes, according to his argument, would cover the situation.

Mr. BUTLER: I think the word "agricultural" is the more important word, and I should not be willing to strike out the word "agricultural".

I think that there are other things that should be brought into consideration. In those wet lands in Massachusetts there are 25,000 acres that are of a peat nature, and that in time will be developed. To-day already there is a development of machinery which will compress peat. I hold in my hand a piece of compressed peat which the for ton contains more heat units than a ton of coal, it is much cleaner to handle and much easier for the houses to use, and I claim that when the machinery is got together, and will be, that will compress that peat quickly —

Mr. ADAMS of Quincy: Would the gentleman kindly inform us of the Convention as to the relative cost of the peat which he is speaking of now and of a ton of anthracite coal delivered at a person's residence?

Mr. BUTLER: I am willing to say that at this time anthracite coal would be cheaper than peat, but when the machinery to compress peat quickly and take it from the ground is perfected peat would be cheaper on the basis of coal, and even cheaper than coal. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMS: I had understood that the scientific men at Technology were of opinion that the peat could be compressed and delivered more cheaply than anthracite coal at the present prices.

Mr. BUTLER: That is the understanding that I have had with improvements in machinery, but to-day I do not think it can be done, because peat contains from 80 to 90 per cent water and it must be done at a process. It must be taken from the bed, which is an easy matter, and when it leaves the machine it must be comparatively dry. So you see it is the development of machinery that stops the process to-day.

I earnestly urge the passage of this resolution as coming from the committee, with the exception of the first amendment of Mr. Lorin.

Mr. WELLMAN of Topsfield: For a long time I have been very much interested in the conservation of natural resources. I think it very important in Massachusetts that we should do what may be done in this direction, but I am not able to see that anything in that line requires the passage of such an amendment to the Constitution as is now proposed. I am inclined to think it is one of the most far-reaching of the measures now pending before us. We are trying to decide the policy of the Commonwealth.

It should be borne in mind that eminent domain is a tremendous power. We use it now to a limited extent, but every person of much experience in such matters well knows that grave injustice to the individual is often done at the present time. Now, here is a proposition to extend the right of eminent domain in regard to certain properties almost, if not entirely, without limit. I do not believe that we appreciate the extent to which the power is extended if this amendment is made. It is said, very properly, that the Legislature may restrict it. So it may, but we are doing away with all constitution tees, and do we want to do that in regard to such a matter? Get the individual some rights that ought to be guaranteed by constitution in this matter? The policy, as I understand it, under the Constitution was drawn, was that individuals should be vested in their individual rights so far as that was consistent with the public interest. Now, is it desirable at this time to wipe all those guarantees, as we are doing in this amendment, and let the government at any time may stand before a man’s farm and say: “This is no longer yours”, and give on whatever and ask no court to pass upon it? That is giving up a tremendous power. Has that worked well? In the case, if the government has that power, I think we may reason-suppose that under present circumstances that power will be used with great extravagance and with great inefficiency, and power is exercised in that way sooner or later the people have in the next place, you are depriving individuals of their rights in property. You may say that that is for the good. Well, now, who is going to be the government that has tremendous powers?

Significant to my mind that two of the speakers who have preceded this act have referred to Germany as their model, and the speakers asked yesterday: “Do you hear any outcry over these laws in Germany?” I do not think you do. I think you who outcries against the power of the government in Germany ceases to cry at all, because he is crushed. You may say, however, that this power will be exercised by the people, but is there any instance in history of a government given such enormous power in which those powers sooner or later have not fallen into the hands of a comparatively small class of the people? If you establish these great powers, are you not building up here a form of government precisely like the despotism that you are trying to cut across the sea, and is it not an anomaly that on the very day we are cheering the fight across the sea to crush the powers in many, men rise in this Convention and propose to adopt here methods that have built up the German military despotism? [Applause.]

CHANDLER of Somerville: I believe that a prolonged debate on the object will not change the general vote on it. I therefore move a previous question.

Main question was ordered.

BROWN of Brockton: I want to ask a question of this Convention, following the gentleman who last spoke. The natural right to individual! Have I not, in common with others, a natural right which now has been delegated? I claim I have. It was a natural heritage. Has any delegation of power conferred any right upon an individual? Has the individual a right to recover what he has expended upon it? Yes, because the people were guilty of what you lawyers call it. My position is that to protect natural rights in the future we should have this control over natural resources. I put it in here, and it was my only purpose in getting the idea that there is one natural resource which has not been alluded to, and in the future, if you pass this act and the Supreme Judicial Court looks to discover all of the possible construction that was placed upon the words "other natural resources," it will find this one. What is your largest natural resource? What is that you cannot part with, because if you do you lose the Commonwealth? Why, it is the man power. There is a natural resource that is running to waste. If you are going to take some property for some purpose may it not be for the utilization of waste man power? Make the use direct and not as incidental. Let it be the direct purpose for which you take it. I want that to appear as one of the natural resources of this Commonwealth.

And that word, too,—Commonwealth. I believe there are only three other States that have got it. Cromwell, I think, is the fellow from whom it comes. But the beauty of it! Commonwealth, common weal, common good. The State to act for the common good.

The gentleman talks about Germany, about the dawn of peace about the new democracy, about conflicts between labor and capital. Allow me to assume what I think is a possible case, a natural resource owned at the present moment by private title and the courts determining that the title is absolute; having been given without any reference to revocation and without any limit it is in perpetuity. If that individual can thus hold a natural resource, and essential that man cannot live without it, then the man's title to that natural resource may be used to take away the natural right of freedom. That would be slavery.

Yes, this is a vital question; the objection to the resolution often urged is that power if delegated may be used harmfully. Granted but on the other side is the possible good. If you assume that good is liable to come uppermost, if you assume that 90 per cent of the people are liable to be good, then you must assume that in the natural order of things the Legislature will legislate for good and not for evil. I am an individualist, the very strongest. I believe in that government which governs the least and just enough to restrain the few from injuring the many.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: I am glad the previous speaker said he was not a State Socialist, because I should not have reached that conclusion from his remarks. I believe the issue presented by this resolution in its present form is not whether we are in favor of conservation of natural resources or whether we are not in favor of the conservation of natural resources. This resolution spells down to this: Are we in favor of putting into the Constitution this declaration authorizing State ownership and operation of not merely mines if we have them, water-powers if we have them, but of the timber or lumber industry of the State, the wood industry of the State, and the farming of the State? That is the issue, — State ownership and operation of those Last fall, at the eleventh hour, this Convention hesitated and declined to pass on to the people a proposition for the State to engage in industries, even in connection with the necessities of life, except in times of emergency. It has been pointed out that there are no such limitations to this proposition. I simply wish to make clear that what has been thrust upon us, so that we are compelled to face it in our votes is that if we vote for this it is for a declaration authorizing State ownership and operation of these industries. I for one cannot go that distance.
HARRIMAN of New Bedford: That the old order is changing is apparent to the most casual observer, and that the spirit of change is abroad in the land is also apparent. Statesmanship is in the realm of both National and State party politics and is in the realm of the reconstruction of our social system. It is true that is here to-day before this Convention, and every act of legislature which seeks to limit in any way private industry or property is an invasion upon the established order that has protected the welfare of the great mass of our people. The budget of England in 1909 was the greatest that ever has been received by the landed aristocracy, and the fact that budget is heard here to-day in this Convention. All the America which take over the oversight of private business are into the regions heretofore forbidden in State or Nation. I face this condition, and this resolution brings a clear cut this Convention. I welcome it because it is the only issue, or not private interest shall be allowed to be paramount in the welfare of the great mass of our people. Private industry and ownership were necessary at one time, and it is necessary to-day to certain well-defined limits, but I submit, sir, to this Convention that the great mass of our people being driven from the farm manufacturing, and with the harder days for the farmer, that ought to realize, and we who are not farmers ought to realize, live by them. Burn our cities, and they grow like magic; raise farms, and grass will grow in the streets of our cities. It is utterly necessary, sir, that the farm should be taken care of, the conception of a time when it will be necessary for the welfare of commonwealth, and it will be absolutely necessary for the various cities, for the State to help finance the farmer. I believe that bad principle should be placed in our Constitution, and allow the future untrammelled to deal with conditions that at that reason I do not believe that there is any use in dealing with anything that you cannot use, and for that reason I am opposed to the having the word "utilization" taken from this amendment so that the amendment will be passed as reported by the committee.

DRESSER of Worcester. The delegate in charge of this measure (Mr. Cobb) agrees, as I think we all do, that there is only one clause which is of any account, and that is the very first one: "The conservation, development and utilization of the agricultural resources of the State," All the rest might be stricken out. That declaration of public use opens those properties to what from time to time is thought wise by the Legislature, to limitless regulation, to the exercise of the power of eminent domain. If I may state the proposition, by way of illustration perhaps, suppose this: my father did place the land here, and our grandfathers came and cut the stumps, tilled it and passed it on, developing it until somebody has his farm or his water-power. His farm as a piece of land is an agricultural resource; it is not, in my opinion, a resource. The resolution as reported you will notice simply agricultural resources," so that the farm that has been made colorful by the sweat and toil of generations is now declared a present state of development and in its present utilization to be put to use. When you say that that is a public use any regulation is possible. The price of milk may be fixed. Take something which perhaps has analogy to water-power. The agricultural commission what not will say to the owner: "If you will more heavily you will increase your crop, and you must do it." The man says: "I have been all through that. I know that for the additional fertilizer that I put on that land I cannot get enough crops in addition to pay the cost of it, therefore it is uneconomical." To which under this resolution the commission may you may not be able to pay the cost, but for the community and you must do it. That is precisely the situation with the waste water which we hear of mill-dam. Lately the city engineer of Worcester was asked whether it was not possible to utilize the flood water of our storage reservoirs in the spring in some way, and in a very recent report he said that that was entirely impracticable. Under this resolution, whether it be municipal supply or a private supply, the Commission on Waterways may say: "You shall raise your dam and know you, Mill Owner, cannot use it, but it will help all the stress from Massachusetts to the Sound." Now, that is a very wide principle. I have every sympathy with the attempt and the desire to conserve or develop our waste lands and sources, a desire to such an extent that so far as I have been able to have tried to draft a resolution which would accomplish that and nothing else. I have not been able to do it. I have asked various people to help me, and they do not seem to be able to do it.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: It may be worth while to take the time of the Convention to make just a single point, and a single point only. The words "by purchase or otherwise", as the gentlemen from Beverly (Mr. Loring) has said, are they statutory words, and have been able to find a single instance of the language. It may be true that the phrase "by purchase or otherwise" has been construed; I do not find it word "purchase" has been construed. Now, what is the constitutional language? Is it "eminent domain" or "just compensation"?

Eminent domain to a limited extent, yes, but the usual language employed in most State Constitutions is "just compensation." The phrase is employed in thirty-seven State Constitutions that I have been able to examine. To give one or two illustrations: New York Article I, section 6, provides that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." Maine Article I, section 121: "Private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation." Connecticut Article I, section 13:

"The property of no person shall be taken for public use without just compensation therefor." Pennsylvania, Article I, section 10: "Nor shall private property be taken or applied to public use without security in law and without just compensation being first made or secured." Not to go further, I say then, that that is the usual language. Georgia and Louisiana employ the phrase "just and adequate compensation", Texas employs "adequate compensation", and Massachusetts, as we have been told this morning, "reasonable compensation". The phrase "just compensation" has been construed in a number of States, its meaning is pe obvious and well understood, and I think the recommendation of the committee should be followed.

PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I share the feeling so forcibly expressed a moment ago by my friend from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman), and I am entirely in accord with my friend from Winchester in this man (Mr. Dutch) and like him could not support the resolution in present form; but the possible importance of it cannot be overestimated, and I think it has a feature which we may well preserve if we preserve it without the rest. There are cases in which the State may intervene for the conservation and development of natural resources, and by the exercise of its sovereign power bring about results which are not likely to be and perhaps cannot be accomplished by private enterprise. To that extent I favor the resolution; but if you go so far, as the resolution goes, and put into the hands of the State the power of utilization and control of all our natural resources, which means that the State may set aside private enter-prise and go into trade or production to any extent whatever, there is a line, and unless the resolution is amended in the manner proposed by my friend from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) I cannot support it with that amendment, I am willing that it should be extended to natural resources, as proposed by my friend from Beverly (Mr. ).

CLAPP of Lexington: Of course there is no time for debate, have nothing that I wish to add; I had my say yesterday. I simply to say that I am in favor of both of the amendments proposed by the delegate from Beverly (Mr. Loring), and expect to vote for them. As to the elimination of the word “proper”, as suggested by the delegate from Boston in the second division (Mr. William S.) for it, it seems to me well enough to do that. I hope that all amendments, excepting my own, will be defeated.

CLARK of Brockton: I do not wish to discuss this matter, but I would like to inquire of the gentleman in this division who has just taken his seat (Mr. Clapp of Lexington), if he believes it would be proper to authorize the Legislature to provide for the development of natural resources and expend an unlimited amount of money in doing and then prohibit the Commonwealth from utilizing them and that money to lie idle.

Hobbs of Worcester: The discussion seems to be mainly upon joint whether we shall include utilization or shall not include it. That seems to be the great point of separation of the opposing sides. It is true that if the resolution goes in with that still something will have been accomplished; at the same time, that it would be a serious limitation on the effectiveness of this section. In the formulation of the original Constitution, in determining the power of the State to take land the only limitation that I of was that it should be for a public use. No definition was of that term. The only limitations are such as the courts have ever been in the minds of the framers of our Constitution when used that word. In other words, our forefathers left that matter and plainly before the Legislature with full powers to act, subject only to an indefinite and unnamed restraint reposed in the hands of the courts. No great mischief has resulted from that. I think the likelihood of any serious mischief resulting from the granting of the broad power would be infinitesimal beside the chance of damage which we might do by holding the Legislature down to too strict rules.

The gentleman from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman) has utilized one argument that I think ought to receive some consideration. He has attempted to damn this proposition by stating that it was one of the devices of the tyrannical powers across the water. It is an easy way to cry down a proposition by referring to Prussianism. Possibly the gentleman from Topsfield (Mr. Wellman) thinks that we have arrived at the point where we can disdain our opponents. It would seem to me to be profitable for us to consider this: That until we have arrived at that point it might be rather desirable to consider and to whether they have not a few leaves in their book that we could profitably inspect, and as to whether it would not be advisable to copy so much of their methods as would enable us to prepare for the future a development of the resources of our Commonwealth that will be efficient and enable us to bring to bear at the moment of danger the full resources of the Commonwealth. It seems to me that this is a proposition that the Convention might well consider.

The amendment moved by Mr. Clapp of Lexington was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 79 to 106.

Action on the remaining amendments was deferred until after the recess.

The two amendments moved by Mr. Loring of Beverly were severally adopted and the amendment moved by Mr. Mancovitz of Boston was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Richardson of Newton was withdrawn.

The amendment moved by Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston and that moved by Mr. Broderick of Waltham were severally rejected.

The resolution (No. 379), as amended, was passed to be engrossed Thursday, July 25, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 127 to 74, in the following form:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment.

The conservation, development and utilization of the agricultural, mineral, forest, water and other natural resources of the Commonwealth are public uses, and the General Court shall have power to provide for the taking, upon payment of just compensation therefor, of lands and easements or interests therein, including water and mineral rights, for the purpose of securing and promoting the proper conservation, development, utilization and control thereof and to enact legislation necessary or expedient therefor.

The resolution was considered Wednesday, August 7, for submission to the people.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I have expressed my opinion of this resolution at a former stage, and do not suppose it will be of the slightest effect to repeat it, or to add anything to what I have said before, but I feel constrained to remind the Convention, now that we are beyond the amending stage and the resolution is liable to be submitted to the people, that it is probably the most extensive and mischievous piece of State socialism which has passed the Convention. If it had been confined, as the minority tried to confine it, to conservation and development, bringing in the power of the State for that purpose, which at times may advantageously be exercised when private enterprise or private power is insufficient, there would have he substantial division of opinion. In the form in which its ers insisted upon keeping it, it may be held to authorize the not only to conserve and develop the power of the streams, for se, but to own and run every factory upon their banks. In this the resolution ought to be rejected.

DRESER of Worcester: I trust that the Convention will pause passing this resolution further. I have tried to call to the at-of the Convention somewhat of the legal effect of it. I want oment to restate that. This resolution declares that the use sination of agricultural, or water, or forest, or other natural es, is a public use. It is left to the law-making body to deterhat the public use is, without any supervision or passing upon sion by the court. I am not aware at the moment that there ther similar provision in the Constitution. Now, that means that any person who owns a farm, who owns a wood-lot, who watercourse, becomes, if I may use the expression, a little service corporation. He is utilizing a thing which is declared Constitution to be a public use. Private ownership of farm watercourses, of forests, is in effect swept away by this
on. It is not merely a question of the taking of the property State. Of course, being a public use, by the words of the resot self it may be taken by the State, but it is taken upon comon and the man is presumably as well off. It is not, therefore, estion of taking that is important, it is the question of use and ation and of direction.

aste agree with what the gentleman in charge of this measure has

Under this resolution it is possible to direct that a mill-wheel erate so many hours, that water shall be let down or held that every man shall keep so many cattle on his farm, that the his products shall be fixed, that, as we have seen in the reguof street railways, of railroads, of water companies, of light-es, everything which is conducting a public use, all sorts of ons can be applied little by little here. Now, that is a very hing thing. There is only one place in the world where this which is a pure socialistic theory, is in practice. It is to-day ince in Russia, where the farm lands, the forest lands and the es are taken over. That has been done in Russia by force and , — a revolution of force. The same thing can be done in the wealth of Massachusetts when this resolution is passed, but be done here not by force or by blood but under the sanctity ield of our Constitution, which adopts in this resolution ly the same theory that we see in practice there.
may say this is silly. Perhaps it is silly. It is a question of Convention to-day work the greatest social revolution has happened in the Commonwealth. I do not think I talk wildly about it, sir; I mean precisely what I say. A little thought will bring out to every one's mind these facts. It is unnecessary to pile up instances. There are many who say: "Why, we want to get at somebody who has grasped under the force of which ought to be left for the people at large." That is a perfectly understandable thing. But when you grab at that land of the little Polander who bought a little waste land a year ago and has started to develop it. He comes under the same rules and under the same laws. If in this resolution the purpose is to reach the rich or those who have acquired property by their efforts and their toil through generations, remember that at the same time there are those who have little property, little farms or watercourses, that are subject to the same rule. Now, we do not want to do that. It is certain that we do not want to do that. What we do want to do is to conserve and develop the waste things, the things that are impossible practically now to develop without aid or without what actuates that desire, actuates many who have voted for this resolution.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) if he contends that the surplus development and utilization of the surplus agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth are proper uses.

Mr. Dresser: I contend this, and perhaps I can state it best by an illustration: When there was granted to our forebears the waste land of the Commonwealth, that the Lord had placed here and that the hand of man had not touched, and when through generation after generation by toil, labor and money the forests were cut down and the fields were made capable of yielding produce, the result belongs to the individual; and if it does not belong to the individual, there we have a socialistic State.

Mr. Creamer: I should like to ask the delegate if he cannot differentiate between the natural resources and their value from a location standpoint in their crude and undeveloped state and those improvements that have been made by generations of mankind. As I understand it, this resolution applies only and is applicable only to the natural resources, not the value that may be in those resources that has been produced by the individual who happens to possess them.

Mr. Dresser: I am obliged to the delegate for that question, because it raises the great doubt: when is a natural resource not a natural resource, if ever? Is the land which is waste, a natural resource? Yes. As it is developed does it still remain a natural resource? None of us can tell. The courts will have to decide that sometime. If there is a point in the development of the land or in the development of the watercourse where it is said that the natural resource has become something else, let me suggest this. For illustration, iron in the ground is a natural resource, but when it is made into steel it is not. Water running in the streams is a natural resource, but when a dam is put across and a new thing is created, water power, is that a natural resource? If it is not, when does the change come? When does the change come? Now, that is a serious doubt, and it is my fear that it is impossible from the course of this debate, which perhaps will have to be looked at when the question is passed upon, to determine what we meant when we added "and other al resources". There were two arguments. There was the argument which was urged that we wanted to confine the resolution to resources in the state of nature. There was the argument that "other al resources" must be put in to take care of the possible use of mines, or of the sunlight, or of peat, or of other things that were there. That is a serious question, which no one, I think, can pos-Sibly answer. But there is the effect of the resolution, unless that shall be laid down, and if it is laid down the purpose which many have in their minds, of getting at the development of a certain idea is lost.

Now, I wish to ask, sir, the favor of the Convention for this. We have to bring out distinctly the two issues. I think it is possible to safeguard the use or development of natural resources and leave out the doubtful question. If the Convention permits I wish to offer as an amendment for this resolution the following phrase, to be placed in Section of the Constitution which in this little black book is found on page 61 (Part II, Chapter V, section 2), and which outlines the laws and policies of the Commonwealth. I want to put in this:
"to foster the development and use of the waste or undeveloped natural resources of the Commonwealth." This is an important measure, sir, and I feel that we ought not lightly to let the debate end before I ask consent of the Convention to offer this amendment:
"to take out the article of amendment, and insert in place thereof the following:

Section II of chapter V of part the second of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting before the words "to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity the words "to foster the development and use of the waste or undeveloped natural resources of the Commonwealth;"

"and to read:

dom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of the arts, which shall be established, especially the university at Cambridge, public schools and grammar schools in the state; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immuner the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, a vote of 114 to 91 (less than two-thirds having voted in the affirmative), the convention refused to suspend the rule so that the amendment might be considered.

PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I move to suspend the rule which is the introduction of amendments at this stage, and if necessary, in which I do not understand that it is, I ask unanimous consent to the motion, and to make a brief statement in explanation.

think there is some reason to suppose that the Convention refused to suspend the rule for the introduction of the amendment proposed by friend from Worcester in the view that it would work so radical change in the resolution as practically to nullify it, so that a vote on the rule or to adopt that amendment would practically be the effacement of the resolution. Now I should like to test the terms of the Convention on an amendment of a less radical character. I am flexibly opposed as I am to the resolution in its present form, I am entirely content to see the State vested with the power to conserve and develop, but not to use and control, our natural resources; and to move an amendment to carry that view into effect, striking out the word "utilization" in the first line of the resolution and the words "utilization and control" in the 8th and 9th lines, and making the necessary verbal change of inserting the word "and" before the words "develop" in each case.

Mr. Creed of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Wellesley if his amendment is not in fact the one that the delegation from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) proposed and argued for so ably and completely in the debate on the early stages of this resolution.

Mr. Pillsbury: My recollection does not enable me to answer the question categorically, but I think it quite possible that it is so.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: In the absence of or lack of memory of a friend in the first division (Mr. Pillsbury) I think I can answer the question. I think the amendment which he proposes is practically identical with the one which the Convention debated at great length and upon this Convention from the beginning of this controversy. I think that it is the standing proposition which he has had before this Convention and which the Convention has debated with great elaboration and after long debate has defeated. That is to say, it is the refusal of this Convention to recognize the proposition that the Convention should overrule the proposition laid down by the Supreme Judicial Court in the Woodyard Case (Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 59). That is the substance of the conflict. And if there is anything which we have had a long and exhaustive debate on, it is that proposition — that proposition which has been decided decisively by the votes of this Convention.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: Without saying a word about the merits of this amendment as it stands, I think I may properly suggest to a gentleman from Wellesley that he is asking to have a regular standing rule of procedure of this Convention, a rule which he took a large part in framing, suspended in this particular case. I do not think he has given any reason to the Convention why we should adopt an extraordinary method of procedure in this case and throw open this particular amendment to amendments on this its last stage when the rules provide otherwise. I wish that the gentleman from Wellesley could offer to the Convention, if he is able to do so, any good reason why we should depart in this case from the procedure prescribed by the rules, which he had as large a hand as anybody in reporting, unless we are to throw the door wide open and suspend the rules in all cases in order that we may redebate and further amend measures which we thought we had brought down to the point of a final vote.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: Without discussing the merits of the document itself I want to call the attention of the Convention to the matter that has just been disposed of, the proposition of providing homesteads for citizens. That was killed by indirection, and the action of this Convention a few moments ago in refusing to suspe

...rule I think was well taken, and I believe that we should adhere to that particular principle. I cannot divorce myself from the idea that the attempt to amend this measure is an attempt to defeat it, as final passage in this Convention.

Mr. HoBbs of Worcester: The question before the Convention is a formal suspension of the rule. It is not a suspension of the rule upon the single amendment. If adopted this throws the whole matter open as it has been hitherto on two debatable stages, to any amendments whatsoever. It seems to me that that is a bad policy to establish at this time. It seems to me that we have had enough of discussion of details and of the paring of words upon this question, that about time we made up our minds as to whether we want this vote so popular a fair and square vote upon the proposition. The vote upon the last proposition, which was about as ridiculous a piece of emasculation as has been attempted in this Convention, is an indication, there is a strong opposition to this measure. It has been thoroughly lined up, the stage is entirely set and I would beg the Convention, if such be their mind, that they proceed to the major division rather than to tarry upon minor details. It seems to me that subterfuge such as was moved by my colleague from Worcester (Mr. Dresser), any tucking this away under the guise of an "encouragement of literature, and so forth" [laughter], is something that we well omit and that we might proceed to a fair and square vote on the main issue. [Applause.]

Mr. LUMMUS of Lynn: I do not understand this amendment to be an attempt to defeat the resolution by subterfuge. On the contrary, I wish to the Convention that some such amendment is necessary to make the parts of this resolution that are really needed by the Commonwealth. There is, I think, a strong feeling here that some right be given to the Legislature to provide for the development of our natural resources is necessary, but I think there is fully as strong a sentiment in this Convention that we do not wish to embark in a career of State Socialism and that the whole measure is very likely to fail unless some amiable amendment is made that will obviate some of its obvious errors. Therefore I think some such amendment is necessary to save the Commonwealth the power that it ought to have to deal with development of its natural resources. It is much more important, omit, that we make no mistake upon this very important matter, that the technicalities of parliamentary procedure be observed.

Mr. EDWIN U. CURTIS of Boston: I agree with the gentleman from Worcester. I have been opposed to this amendment ever since it was moved by the former United States Attorney (Mr. Anderson of Brookline) and ever since he has deserted it and passed the baby over to a friend from Worcester, I still have been opposed to it. I hope hall vote now not to suspend any rule or to put on any more amendments, but let us go to vote on the main question. We have had it long enough, we all know what it is, we all are ready to vote. [Applause.]

The Convention refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. LUCE of Waltham: I conceive that in creating this Convention the majority of the people of the Commonwealth, as far as the ballot was expressed a desire that there should be improvement in our... system of government. We have voted to submit to the people a method for exercising legislative power and amending the Constitution which is known as the initiative and the referendum. Gentlemen are aware, I think, that in my own judgment this is a clumsy and imperfect device to accomplish ends that can be secured better in some other way, and, so believing, I voted last year against the initiative and referendum. But, sir, may I call the attention of the Convention to the fact that this fall the people of the Commonwealth are to say whether they desire to have at their command the initiative and referendum with which to supplant the Legislature whenever they may suit their wish? And there are gentlemen within the sound of my voice who are very anxious that the people shall not declare on behalf of this new method. Sir, every day here I see from one to ten thousand votes added to the support for the initiative and referendum. [Applause.] I saw five thousand votes added when the Convention refused to take the word "proportional" out of the Constitution. [Applause.] I know of men of substance and standing as conservatism who since the rejection of that proposal by the Convention have said deliberately and publicly that they are glad to have the opportunity to vote for a device with which they can overrule the judgment of this Convention. And I warn my fellow-delegates that those of them who adhere to their purpose to set a stony face against all improvement and progress, are but inviting destruction. "When the gods would destroy, they first make mad." [Applause.] Sir, the people of this Commonwealth do not want State socialism. The people of this Commonwealth do not desire to see the hobgoblins that are conjured up in the brains of my reactionary friends, established in this State House. The people here do not desire the Bolsheviki in Russia, but the people do desire that moderate, reasonable steps should be taken to increase the happiness of the people in ways from which they are now precluded by the interpretation put upon their Constitution.

Our forefathers,—and I am not ashamed to invoke their wisdom —our forefathers said that they would give "full power and authority" to the General Court "to make, ordain, and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions". Will any man here stand and say that in the one hundred and thirty-eight years during which the people have had the power to do those things through the Legislature, they have been unmindful of the common welfare? Will any man here stand and say he so mistrusts representative government that he dare not let the people, acting through their representatives, do such things as I do not plead for any of the excesses that have been pointed out under the proposed extension of power. Were I in the Legislature I would hold up both hands in protest against such excesses, but shall I be terrified and be scared out of deliberate, reasonable and prudent action, because, forsooth, a coming Legislature may do something that all the Legislatures of the past never dreamed of doing?

Let me give you a concrete illustration. England, which has had the foresight to see that the war will end, already has established the Ministry of Reconstruction. The other day I read a report filed by that Ministry, signed by Haldane, pointing out to Parliament and the King that by the establishment of central power stations, twelve in number, scattered over England, it would be possible to an incredible degree to reduce the waste of the present system for which coal is burned beneath a hundred thousand boilers.
Can you open your eyes to the future? Cannot you see that to meet petition we may have to do precisely the thing that England proto do? Cannot you see that we may want to harness our rivers effectively, may want to establish central stations to distribute just as Haldane and the Ministry of Reconstruction advise in and? Will you turn your face against opportunity? Will you the doors shall be closed and double fastened so that our suc-ors cannot save themselves?

The gentlemen here too often, in my opinion, conceive that they are legislature. They fasten their eyes upon the merits of this or that specific course of action which has been held up to them as a possibility under a general power proposed, and fearing this or that thing, thing if they were to vote on this or that law, their inclination behaving the argument would decide them against it, they say:
never shall be granted even to consider such a course.” Sir, the gentlemen to face seriously this question of whether they are serving the people of the Commonwealth in fairness, in justice, truth, when they say: “You shall not even discuss the wisdom is or that policy.”

Let me ask my friends who are young in public life to look toward the future. Let them remember what one of the greatest statesmen the world ever saw, Edmund Burke, told his countrymen was the rule that should guide the course of legislators and statesmen: “Timely concession is wise statesmanship.” Timely concession is wise statesmanship and a timely concession to the demands of the people may save from evils with which we are threatened, may postpone to distant moments the day when a reign of Bolsheviki can here arise; the wise concession that shall allow ourselves through our chosen system of government to do that which we think for the best interests of people, which shall allow our successors and all future generations to live as this Constitution shall stand, to follow their own judgments and what is wisdom and what is virtue. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. Choate of Southborough: The remarks of the last speaker, apt and persuasive as they are, are not of a character to enlighten the judgment of this Convention, but rather to obscure the exercise of that judgment in its soundest way. We ought not to be frightened into any action that our cool, deliberate common sense not support. We ought not to be led into following any course where generalities. We ought not to be induced to pass a resolution that may be cast upon one side or the other.
I rejoice in the knowledge that my distinguished friend who spoke is a candidate for a very high office, and I pardon when I know that he is indulging in these happy visions of votes ich tremendous blocks and I hope those hopes will be fully realized. But I doubt if those votes that he pictures are arguments that will sway us here. This resolution is not any glittering generality; ne concrete proposition and to know whether it is wise to adopt it must be analyzed. I ask your patience for a moment in that issue.

PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES.

When the proposition that is now embodied in this resolution was first presented to the Convention by its original mover the thought that was in his mind and the thought that was presented to the Convention, I submit, was this: That it was wise to empower the Commonwealth, — the Commonwealth, mark you, — to develop her own natural resources herself and to prevent their exploitation by any private interests. That was the one simple proposition that was advanced by the original mover of this resolution and which attracted the approval of the Convention in its original form. That is, that the Commonwealth should have the power to develop her own resources and that those resources should not be permitted, contrary to the wishes of the people, to fall into the hands of private individuals for private gain.

That is not the resolution that is before the Convention. This resolution, which many of you may believe is a resolution to bring about that result, is a resolution which is masquerading, I submit, under entirely false colors.

Now pause a moment and see what is the language of this resolution. Does it mean that the Commonwealth is to have power to develop her water-powers, that as her water-powers are limited and some of them are in private control the Commonwealth may take the water-powers and develop them for the benefit of all the people? Now that is not at all. It means this: It means that the Commonwealth may empower private corporations to which it may give the power of eminent domain to bring about the very result you have sought in the thought that has been in your minds to prevent.

Read the language of this resolution again before you vote on it. You recognize to-day that the power of eminent domain is delegated by the Legislature to private corporations. How are your railroads built except by the delegated power of eminent domain, the power that belongs to the Commonwealth, to the people, and which is given to the railroads? Is that not true? How are your water companies erected? Is it not by the same delegated power of eminent domain? That is the very danger that is contained in this resolution, — that it does not amount at the Commonwealth developing its own natural resources, but it aims at permitting the Commonwealth to delegate to private corporations the right to do the very thing we do not want them to do, — that they may to exploit for their own benefit the natural resources of the Commonwealth.

Is it not exactly what will follow if you give to the Legislature the powers in this general and loose language which this resolution contains, — that immediately there will spring up applicants for the passage of either general or special laws to build a water-power here to develop a forest proposition there and to be given the right to take other men's land and other men's property under the guise of devoting it to a public use? Is that what this Convention wants to accomplish? I submit it is not.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: Does not the power which is given in the amendment here exist already in many or most of the States of the Union, and has it not been the basis of the upbuilding of their agriculture, culture and industry?

Mr. CHOATE: I am unable to answer that question from any search that I have made myself.
DRESSER of Worcester: I understand that there is some such constitutional provision written into the Constitution of Idaho lately, in no other State.

BENNETT: Let me ask the gentleman this direct question: Is not such authority as this in the Constitution of Indiana, and not been the cause of the change of Indiana from a morass in places to the richest agricultural land in the world? I ask the man to answer that question.

DRESSER: I recall there is no such constitutional provision.

CHOATE: I am not now contending against the wisdom of allowing the Commonwealth to develop her own natural resources. I there is much to be said on both sides of that question. If, for instance, the natural resource which is the subject of such proposed opment be a water-power, of which in the very nature of things possibilities are limited and restricted, it may be a very wise for the Commonwealth to exercise that power. If, on the other it be the development of agriculture, I think the proposition is on quite a different basis. In the first place, it is not a thing the Commonwealth alone can do successfully. It is not a thing can be done advantageously for the benefit of all the people. a single illustration, if you please. How would it be feasible for commonwealth to go into the business of agriculture? Would it inevitably follow that she would be brought immediately in common with all those men who make their living through farming, would it not inevitably follow from all the experience that we have that, inasmuch as the question of cost rarely enters into any public taking, we would find the Commonwealth, with its immense resources and the possibility that the right side of the balance sheet be a fundamental point,—find the Commonwealth brought competition with all those men who have to do that business for living? Whether it would be expedient to engage in such a public opment might be a very grave question.

DONOVAN of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman objection to this amendment is based upon his interpretation of amendment as being such that it would provide for private corporations to control natural resources, and is not that inconsistent the position taken by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) and the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) who held that should be in the line of State socialism? In other words, the gentleman who is speaking opposes this because it is not State socialism, the other gentlemen oppose it because it is State socialism.

CHOATE: I base my objection upon two grounds, one which the man from Springfield has just voiced and which I think is an onal and it seems to me a more serious objection than that which been urged by the gentleman from Wellesley or the gentleman from Worcester. In the second place, I base my objection to the notion upon the vague, loose, uncertain language of the resolution. What is meant by “the other natural resources”? Who is going to use the courts will be called upon to do so. We shall have a line of judicial decisions somehow or other in the long run market for what are and what are not natural resources. Certain things, one say, would come pretty plainly within the comprehensive phrase other natural resources". The fisheries, for instance, would they not? The granite quarries, would they not? Take, for instance, such industries as the brick-making industry, the whole material used in it is derived from the soil, the clay banks. Are not those natural resources? Shall the Commonwealth either itself engage in that business, or is it wise to give the Legislature the right to erect private corporations with the power to take a desirable piece of land and carry on that industry away from that citizen if they want it? That is the resolution, that gives the opportunity to the rich and the covetous man. I think the danger is greater upon that side than it is upon the side of State socialism.

Mr. Donovan: I should like to ask the gentleman if he realizes that the two points of view are contradictory, that to give the power to private corporations to exploit natural resources would be the direct opposite of State socialism and that the two fears cannot coexist.

Mr. Choate: It does not seem to me that the two ideas are consistent. I think they may both exist, and exist at the same time, and be subjects of danger to the people at the same time. It is perfectly possible for the Commonwealth to engage in activities with reference to a certain portion of this field and to delegate the power to engage in activity as to other portions of that field to private individuals. As, for instance, it is perfectly conceivable that the Commonwealth might go into the development of water-power. It is perfectly conceivable that under this resolution the Legislature might delegate to private corporations the right to engage in forestry and to take over tracts of forest lands which had been developed by individuals or to take over tracts of farm land which had been developed by individuals and to allow those corporations to go into competition with other individuals, only with the tremendous added advantage of possessing the power of eminent domain. It seems to me that power is vast too great to be entrusted under the conditions that are contemplated here out of the hands of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Creaner of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Southborough if he does not think his argument implies a profound distrust of the General Court.

Mr. Choate: It does not seem to me that it discloses a profound distrust of the General Court. The resolution, if it is approved by this Convention and submitted to the people, is not only an innovation but a direction to the General Court to do what the resolution contemplates. The risk of the step proposed to be taken is ours. We take the step they certainly are justified in going further.

Mr. Creaner: I should like to suggest to the delegate from Southborough that his argument presupposes that whatever action might be taken by the General Court would be an extreme action. In other words, in one case he presupposes that it might degenerate into State socialism, and in the other case he presupposes that the General Court might give away the property of the Commonwealth or the property of the individual to selfish interests of some kind.

Mr. Choate: The latter proposition that is submitted by the gentleman from Lynn is perfectly clear and perfectly obvious, that it now let me ask your patience for just a moment to a scrutiny of language of this resolution. I have said that this language was nebulous and uncertain, and I repeat it and ask you to at it again to see if I am not right. What is meant and intended, can be meant and intended, by the word "utilization"? Does mean, as has been argued here, that the Commonwealth may dicthe method of use by another of his own property without taking way from him? That is what has been suggested here. Do you that? I submit that you do not wish that. I submit that is not in the four corners of the proposition that as a general thing you have shown your approval of at all. Am I not right in saying that proposition that you gentlemen heretofore have given your ap-was that simple proposition that the Commonwealth ld have the right to exploit its own resources and that you did expect to go beyond that? I am not arguing against that; I am pointing out to you that it must be plain upon a careful reading is resolution that that is not what the resolution means and what will accomplish, but it will accomplish a great deal more than that a thing which is entirely inconsistent with that and will accomresult which may be full of danger, may bring about the exact use of the thing which I believe it is that this Convention wishes

... [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM S. KINNEY of Boston: The real issue that is at stake has not been mentioned this morning. The developments in an omic way, particularly since the outbreak of the war, have brought people of Massachusetts and of all New England to a realizing ce of their dependence upon other sections of the country for fuel light and power. The people of New England last year went ugh a winter during which they suffered privation on that account.
er led to a study of conditions in New England in order to deter-whether or not we have at hand the means of supplying these s and relieving us of this dependency upon other sections of the try, at least to some extent. The direction of that inquiry finally led to the water-powers of Massachusetts. Modern invention has veloped the hydro-electric plant to a point where if properly utilized r, light and heat can be developed now by the use of the natural ower of the country. The last Legislature created a special comon which is sitting this summer to investigate that subject.
now what did they find to be the situation with reference to the -powers of Massachusetts? The bugbear raised by the gentle-from Southborough is not something that may happen if this vention passes this resolution; it is something that already has \ens and is now a fact in this Commonwealth. That is this:
re are a limited number of streams and river courses in Massa-etts whose flow is such as to make it wise to use the flow for the ose which I have indicated. Those river courses already are ated by and already are in the control of private corporations ed by the Legislature to exploit the water-powers of Massachu-
We need not raise that bugbear as something to deter us from action, because that is the situation which exists to-day in Massachusetts, and in order, sir, that the people of Massachusetts, that the Legislature of Massachusetts, may have an opportunity to redeem and reclaim the power to further develop those watercourses which already are in a state of partial development by private capital, this resolution is necessary.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I should like to ask the gentlemen whether or not it is within his knowledge that the passage of this resolution or amendment is being favored if not actually sought by one or more of the great power companies which at present are operating in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Kinney: It is not within my knowledge. At recent hearings the representatives of practically every water-power in the Commonwealth have been present and the one fear they State contemplates the actual taking of their property. As I understand the position of the water-power companies of the Commonwealth, the legal representatives of some of which companies are members of this Convention, they do not object to a development, as the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) put it, of such watercourses as have not already been developed by private capital. In other words, they fear perhaps that the Commonwealth is about to make the taking of their property.

I have pointed out that the erection of corporations to exploit the streams of the Commonwealth already is an accomplished fact, therefore the "hobgoblin" raised by the gentleman from Southborough as a future evil in that regard is disposed of beyond cavil.

Now as to State socialism. Massachusetts needs its proper development. This is a development which Massachusetts needs to make herself economically independent. Did the west, when they found that they make arid lands fertile it was necessary for their Commonwealths to create great dams and reservoirs to provide a proper system of irrigation, consider that State socialism? The State of Maine, sir, already has this very power. The State of Maine has carried it in the form of statute to the extreme. In the State of Maine under the existing statute, if a water-power company refuses to obey an instruction of the State to make a further development, under statute the State immediately may make a taking of its property and control it in the direction in which the State desires it used, and returns it or may keep it upon the payment in other words, by eminent domain. The State of Maine has realized the necessity for the development of its water-power. It has realized its dependence upon coal fields which lie in other sections of the country and has met the situation. Why should Massachusetts lag behind?

We need not fear that the Massachusetts Legislature is composed of men who are going to dispose of the interests of this country without proper considerations. Why, only a few years ago this very proposition confronted the Legislature. One of the streams has its head-waters in Massachusetts, differing from the Connecticut and the Merrimack, which have their head-waters in other States, is Millers River. A very prominent capitalistic concern on State Street which has done very much in the west in the development of hydro-electric power conceived the idea that it would be possible at the head-water Miller's River to construct storage reservoirs and retain the high of the spring to use them later in the season when by nature use of the river would be low, to equalize the flow and thus re the water-power, making unnecessary the use of steam-power the summer months by those plants. This corporation con-the possibilities of that situation and it came to the Legislaly 1913, I believe, first, — I was a member of the body, — and for a charter to be allowed to construct at its own expense those reservoirs at the headwaters of Miller's River and to be l to charge and assess corporations lower upon the stream for vilege of using the water that later might be realized from these reservoirs. The Legislature killed that proposition because in ception of the majority of the members of the Legislature it was proper to place this vast power in the hands of any private cor-on, the Legislature feeling that if this vast power, this practical of the flow of Miller’s River, was to be created at all, it should be by the Commonwealth itself. And that was the line of argu-which mill owners lower down Miller's River presented through ounsel to the legislative committee which considered the matter, that was the determining factor in the rejection of that proposition at time by the Legislature.

The question of the erection of private corporations should not in us, neither should the suggestion of State socialism.
coal proposition is this: You know and the people of Massa-know to their sorrow that we here are dependent on other ities for our coal. You know that the only way you can help that deficiency in Massachusetts is to pass a resolution of this ater which will make possible in Massachusetts the development water-power in order that to a certain extent at least we may this deficiency of light, heat and power to the people of Massa-
. Is that a proper demand for the people of Massachusetts ake on this Convention? If it is, then this Convention should his resolution. If you believe in leaving the water-powers of achusetts where they now are, to wit, in the hands of private al, then kill this resolution. [Applause.]

WALKER of Brookline: There are about three minutes before one for recess. Three minutes is all I shall wish on this subject.
have listened to two very great and very able speeches in favor resolution, one from the gentleman from Waltham treating of eral subject and one from the gentleman from Boston treating specifically of this measure itself. The situation is very clear.
ue in Massachusetts agricultural lands and we have some min-
. We have some forest and we have some water resources. Those resources now are in the hands and under the control of pri-individuals and private corporations and will be developed and ed and used solely for their private interest, from their point of regardless of the general welfare of the Commonwealth. Very

So long as those private interests in developing those natural ces for their own benefit incidentally develop them in the inof the whole Commonwealth, we are glad to have them develthat way. But when the Legislature sees that those natural ces are not being properly developed, sees that they are not developed in the interest of all the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, then the State, in the Interest of all the people, ought to step in and control the situation. This resolution may give to the Legislature the power to step in and control the situation when the public interest demands that control. I do not believe the Convention is going to withhold that power from the Legislature of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I move the previous question.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: It seems to me the previous question should be moved at this time. The matter has been discussed by several; I was hoping for a little more than the minutes that are allowed me under the rule. Of course the Convention is a law unto itself and if it does not desire I at least have that. At the same time it does seem to me that it might have fairly a little more time than the ten minutes to discuss this important question.

The main question was ordered. Debate was resumed after the recess.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: It is an accepted axiom of philosophy that action and reaction are equal and opposite, and with almost equally inexorable certainty might we draw from history the decision that never has there been an era of social dissolution and anarchy that was not preceded by a period of social injustice. Had it not been for the Bourbons, with their fatuous policy, culminating in the assumption of identity by an individual with the State, the pages of French history would be unsullied with the blood and tears of the French Revolution. Had it not been for ministerial stupidity and oppression exercised toward these struggling Colonies the empire of Great Britain would not have been bereft of the brightest jewel in its crown. And so, sir, to-day in Russia had it not been for Czarism, with all its conspicuous features of knout and dungeon and its long files of the most liberal of the bravest in the realm threading their way through dreary wastes of the death-in-life of Siberia, there would have been no Bolsheviks, who mad acts now, even while our voices are raised, threaten the security of civilization. Sir, I am filled with alarm as I see that, in this enlightened assembly, still the voice of reaction and repression, repudiation of perfectly legitimate as well as undoubtedly sound and scientific conclusions and aspirations of the people of this country, shall continue to be raised. I shrink, sir, from the contemplation of consequences which may ensue if we longer refuse to recognize the trend of events in the present day and deny to the people that measure of exercise over their own resources which every man of us sitting here knows they are entitled and expectantly demanding.

I have had occasion before in this assemblage to ascribe the possession of statesmanship to the honorable member from Waltham who sits in this division (Mr. Lucre). To my mind, sir, he never gave me convincing proof of that to this body than in his remarks of this morning, and I want to join his appeal for a forward-looking vision as we approach our vote upon this matter. Some of us perhaps may sympathize with the view of that parliamentarian who once inquired: “What has posterity done for us?” Nevertheless, I believe that the claims of posterity should be recognized in this deliberative assembly. The natural resources of the Commonwealth are the present instrument of the common possession of all who dwell within its confines.
are the common heritage of those who must come after us, and which is seized every child born in the Commonwealth of Massa-c sets with his first breath. How shall we decide, in view of that way which coming generations will apply to our acts here, how we decide that this common heritage shall be administered? For common good,—for the common good, sir?—or according to the acts of individual or corporate bodies which always must be narrow provincial in their approach, and perhaps may be selfish?
It is the attitude I assume we are to take if we vote against this tion.
It is an affront to humanity, it is a challenge flung in the face making men, it is a denial of every principle in defence of which we supposed now to be shedding our life and treasure. And we asked to do this in the name of conservatism. Conservatism for-It is the conservatism of the engineer who ties down his safety and shovels fuel beneath an already overstrained boiler. It is ervatism of the ostrich, with its head in the sand imagining anger, because unseen, is afar off.
I plead for the adoption of the resolution. [Applause.]

Powers of Newton: It certainly is somewhat amusing to hear aim made that the resolution which we now have under considis of a progressive nature. If we were to go back into Engli — for instance into the 17th century,—we should find that had upon its statute-books laws very similar to this. In fact, atutes of England at that time fixed the wages which were paid pering-men, the prices of every commodity which was sold in the ets of England. The industries of that country were controlled ature law, and practically the terms of every contract were fixed . That policy continued for nearly one hundred years, and results in what is known as the Industrial Revolution of and, out of which grew the industrial policy known as the laissez or, as it was translated, "Let things go." From that time a olicy was adopted in England, which not only revolutionized ountry, but changed industrial conditions throughout the civil-orld. It was the adoption of a policy of individual liberty and ve, and that is the policy which has built up England. It is me policy which has developed France; the same policy that en in existence in this country ever since the settlers landed at town and Plymouth. The State or the government stands in ation to the individual as policeman, and says: "Work out your ortune; acquire property; till your lands; do whatever you ice, but you must not interfere with another man doing the same that you are doing."

The freedom and initiative have developed this country, cleared off rests, built canals and railroads, developed the great middle west, donally worked its way over the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific

We now have come to the parting of the ways. If we adopt resolution, we say to the Legislature that we put our stamp of val upon pure socialism in Massachusetts, and against individual ive. Is this Convention prepared to do that?

Butler of Brockton: I want to appeal to the members of this ition to consider this resolution. Do you want to see Massaducetts produce from 65 to 75 per cent of what the inhabitants of the State use? Do you want to see that, when to-day they produce only 10 but 15 per cent? If you do, pass this measure along as it is, so that it will give the Legislature the right to grant legislation that will follow that. And that is not an idle thought; that is a thought which has been considered by the National government's experts and our State's experts. Those are facts which will be realized if we let the man power of this world comes back from destruction and work for construction again, which will come after the close of this most cruel war. You have learned, gentlemen of this Convention, that leaders in the counsel for the corporations have called this a socialistic measure. I believe there is not one particle of socialism mixed in it. I think that it is purely and justly a measure to upbuild the agricultural interests and other interests which may be developed in the State. For these reasons I hope that this Convention will pass this measure as it stands.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: I cannot help feeling that this is one of the most important measures before this body, and it seems strange to me, in view of the importance of the measure, that many of the arguments in its favor are such that I ought not in the least to consider them. Is it to be supposed that I, in pursuance of my duty here, should vote for a measure in which I do not believe because, forsooth, there would be some votes gained somewhere against another pernicious measure? Is that the ideal with which we should stand here and vote? And then it is said, that a certain state of affairs exists here, somewhat like the French Revolution, and that this measure is a measure which is designed greatly to benefit the people. But that has not been proved. That assumed. There are some things about this measure, however, with which we do know, and I cannot help feeling that the men here are voting because they do not quite understand the vast power that exists under this measure. The right of eminent domain is a tremendous power always liable to abuse, and we are extending it beyond the vision of any man who listens to me. We do not know the vast extent to which we are extending that power. Now, when you give government such power, that goes in all our places, and what is the temptation that will be before the party? And the power and before the Legislature? It will be clearly this: To say the man who owns property "You do as we say, or we will crush you". That is the exact position in Germany to-day with just those powers. No man can do great business there and oppose the government and live, and we put that same power into the hands of the Legislature. You say: "They are wise men. They will deal well with it." I grant it. But is it well to trust any man with that kind of enormous power? This measure is not progressive. It is an attack on human liberty. It is the greatest attack on personal liberty that has been brought up in this Convention, and I say stand by personal individual liberty if you want progress and great success for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: My friend in the first division (Mr. Powers), who also sits in the rear and wisely speaks from the floor, declares that this is the most important measure of the session. I do not remember any measure in this Convention so insignificant or so modest that some sympathetic soul has not arisen and pronounced most important measure of the Convention. This is an important one. It must be broad.

Let me tell you how the water-power of Minneapolis was used. At St. Anthony's Falls the rock was so soft that it moved its great many feet, if not a mile, every year. They got an application from the Federal government to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. They ran a tunnel under there, and put it in, and made a false terminal, and they put somewhere about a thousand to ten thousand little lakes up north of Minneapolis created permanent reservoirs and created a water-power which made Minneapolis the foremost manufacturing center in the United States. When they created the cities of Lowell and Lawrence the enterprise had to do everything. They had to take the water of Lake Winnipesaukee, and they had to build dams at Man and Lowell and Lawrence, and twenty-five years ago all the cotton goods used in the United States were imported. In a hundred years we had not been able to fully develop that industry.

Let us not be so much afraid of the Legislature. You have got to somebody. You have got to trust the manager, you have got to trust the salesmen, you have got to trust the bookkeeper. Let us trust the Legislature, because this matter has got to be broad.

I have not much time, but take this, for instance: Here is a man with an ice pond. The water-power was a woolen mill. Then woolen mill went to pieces, and it was a wool pulling establishment. Then wool pulling became unprofitable, and it became an end, and somehow or other that became illegal, but nobody looks into it. Now the ice pond floods all the shores and makes acres or miles of morass which ought to be removed. The Commonwealth has got to get into the business of straightening these matters out, — the Commonwealth, which is shown as never before the effectiveness of governmental action in enterprises.

Need something of this kind. I am not afraid but it is going to be adopted, and I should not have been the least afraid had it not for the astonishing action of the Convention this morning on the modest, little, insignificant proposition, — the homestead law. The Convention went so curiously that it seemed to me this is the ultra-conservative days, and they are liable to err in that direction.

Reply to the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) there is a State in the west that does not have a law like this. In their ditch companies and their ditch aggregations of neighbors reclaimed the agricultural land. The same is true in Indiana, and gentleman showed you this morning that it is being adopted in the State of Maine. If we adopt it here we do something to put in the other Commonwealths for the preservation and development of natural resources, and I think we can do it. Let me say that, because I hope the amendment will

Hobbs of Worcester: It is obviously impossible to cover so tangled a subject in ten minutes. I shall therefore confine my remarks to one or two points that have been touched upon in this
The gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) has intimated that there is some reason for this resolution so far as development and conservation go. With that admission I feel this resolution has some virtue and approach the utilization which in his mind and in the minds of others seems to be the sticking point.

The gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate) stated that it was one great objection to the measure that it left in question as to whether this proposition did not give the Legislature the right to tell a man how he should use his own property. I am going to give you one illustration to indicate how some men in this community are using their own property and these resources. There is a certain right in this Commonwealth upon which there are some seven mill privileges. They all were used once. One company, a large, power company, has acquired those seven privileges one after the other, and six of them now are lying idle and waste, not because they are not valuable but to keep away competition. It is that sort of thing that is going on under the sacred untrammeled right of individual property that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) has pleaded for powerfully. I wish to put it to this Convention if there is anything so sacred in vested right that it justifies us in countenancing wasting that it justifies us in countenancing letting lie idle that which ought to be turned to the good and profit of the community. That is the question which is involved in this proposition.

So far as relates to water-powers I would suggest to you that the regulation of the use of the property is one of the most important things in conservation legislation. It makes all the difference in the world whether the powers along the stream are being used properly as to the development of the maximum of power in that stream. They are developed only to a small portion of their value, if the power once developed is allowed to run to waste, that never can be made in any other way, and it is for that reason that the word "utilization" was put into this measure.

As to what the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate) has said, that this would be a bulwark to the greedy rich, if he had been here when the matter was discussed in the preceding stage he would have known that the Convention had before it a proposition to limit the use of this article to the Commonwealth alone. That proposition was discussed and rejected by the Convention on the argument that this was not a proposition directed toward establishing greater State activity alone; it was intended to give greater power to individuals under proper restrictions as well.

The gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) has indicated some of those ways. The western States have constitutional provisions under which private associations of individuals can get their land properly, irrigating the dry land, draining the wet land, and thereby conserving that individual initiative which I join some of the opponents of this measure in appreciating, and not tending toward the State socialism which apparently is so great a bugbear in the minds of many of this Convention.

As to State socialism, I would call to the attention of this Convention that the writing of a few words into our Constitution brings the State no nearer and no further from State socialism. The thi
PUBLIC INTEREST IN NATURAL RESOURCES.

Produces socialism is the existence of conditions that breed socialism, and I know of no condition which will go further toward the propagation of socialism than seeing men placed, by virtue of the ownership of a certain property, in a position that authorizes them to prey on the community, using that property only for their own selfish interests, neglecting entirely the proper development of the community for the needs of the community, and feeling themselves free to use it as they see fit. Those propositions, it seems to me, go further to create socialism than any words that we may write into the Constitution.

Loring of Beverly: Having addressed the Convention once on an object I should not have spoken again had not the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate) called to my attention certain facts I did not mention in my former address. In the first place, he mentioned the clay banks of this Commonwealth and bricks. Now, these are made from a natural resource, and they cannot be brought into competition. I do not know whether the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate) was counsel for the company, but I do know that the bricks and every clay bank in Massachusetts and in the leading States are absolutely owned and controlled by a foreign corporation, and that when I build a mill or you build a chimney you are paying tribute to that corporation.

Another point that came to my mind when the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate) was speaking was this: That he comes from part of the country where the largest public undertaking by the State, that has been done for a great many years took place, and as the establishment of the metropolitan water supply. A great amount of land and a great deal of other land which was used after was taken from the owners of the land for the public use, have yet to see a single individual who was not fully compensated for everything that was taken from him. Now, this resolution with it, owing to the way it was amended, full and just comsistent with that provision in it it safely and necessarily can be passed. [Applause.]

Convention voted Wednesday, August 7, by a call of the yeas and nays, te of 136 to 86, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 172,111 to 102,768.
MESSARIES OF LIFE.

XII.

MESSARIES OF LIFE.

On the 11th of July, 1917, the committee reported the following resolution (No. 318):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

   ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

   3 The General Court may authorize the Commonwealth to take by purchase or otherwise food-stuffs, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, and to sell the same to the inhabitants thereof or to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein; and may authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants such necessaries of life, and to harvest and manufacture ice.

   10 The General Court may authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth, cities and towns, of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like means for producing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life.

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution be amended by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:

The Legislature, when and so far as in its judgment a public exigency exists therefor, may provide for the purchase or taking by the Commonwealth of foods or food-stuffs, fuel or ice, for sale to its inhabitants or to any county, city or town and resale by such county, city or town to its inhabitants.

This amendment was withdrawn and the following was substituted:

The Legislature, when and so far as in its judgment a public exigency exists therefor, may provide for the purchase or taking by the Commonwealth, paying reasonable compensation therefor, of foods or food-stuffs, feeds, fuel or ice, for sale to inhabitants or to any county, city or town and resale by such county, city or town to its inhabitants, and in connection therewith may provide for the purchase or taking by the Commonwealth, paying reasonable compensation therefor, of the right to occupy and use any building or structure with the machinery or fixtures appertaining thereto, or any other premises, so far and so long as may be necessary to such purposes. If in the judgment of the Governor such public exigency arises when the Legislature is not in session, the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may exercise the authority vested in the Legislature by this section until the Legislature reconvenes.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 96 to 157.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Fred H. Williams of Brookline moved that the above amendment be adopted by striking out in the first line the word "Legislature" and inserting in its stead the words "General Court". The amendment was rejected.

The same gentleman moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Pillsbury be adopted by adding at the end thereof the following: "The public exigency arises when the General Court is not in session, the Governor, by the approval of the Council, may exercise the authority vested in the General Court in this section, until the General Court reconvenes." The amendment was withdrawn.

Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 4, the word "and"; by striking out, in line 5, the words "and other necessaries of life"; by inserting before the word "slaughter-houses", in line 13, the word "and"; and by striking out, in lines 14 and 15, the words "and other like means for producing, selling and supplying the necessaries of life". The amendment was withdrawn.

Robert E. Bigney of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 14, the word "like"; and by inserting after the word "means", line 15, the words "incidental thereto". The amendment was withdrawn.

Samuel W. George of Haverhill moved that the resolution be amended by striking out all the section and enacting the following words: "Every thing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing or permitting the sale of spirituous or any political division thereof to deal in spirituous and intoxicating liquors." The amendment was withdrawn.

John Q. A. Brackett of Arlington moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 9, the words: "provided, that a just compensation for all property so taken shall be paid to the owner thereof." The amendment was rejected, by a vote of 48 to 169.

Brooks Adams of Quincy moved that the resolution be amended by adding the following words: "The General Court may further authorize the Commonwealth, acting either in its public capacity, or through the agency of such municipal or other corporations as it may select or create for the purpose, to organize, conduct or administer such agricultural, industrial or trading undertakings or enterprises, as the General Court shall deem conducive to the public welfare." The amendment was withdrawn.

Francis N. Balch of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting, at the beginning of the resolution, the words: "In time of war or general distress"; and by adding at the end the words: "Such authorization shall be limited to not more than two years at a time, but may be repeated from year to year as the war or time of general distress shall last. The General Court shall judge of the existence of the conditions justifying such authorizations. In this article contained shall be construed as permitting any taking of public property without reasonable compensation therefor." The amendment was withdrawn.

Edwin U. Curtis of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 318) be adopted by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:
NECESSITIES OF LIFE.

The General Court, when and as far as in its judgment a public exigency exists therefor, and while it continues, may authorize the Commonwealth to provide temporary shelter and to take by eminent domain and feed for animals, and to sell the same to the city, town or other municipality, or to any county, city, town or other municipality corporation therein, which may resell the same to the inhabitants thereof or to any county, city, town or other municipality corporation therein, which may resell the same to the inhabitants; and in connection therewith may authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth, cities and towns of markets, docks and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries and slaughter-houses. When the General Court is not in session, the Governor, with the approval of the Court, may exercise the authority vested in the General Court by this section, until the General Court reconvenes.

On a call of the yeas and nays, this amendment was rejected, by a vote of 156 to 156.

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the above amendment be amended by striking out the words "may authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth, cities and towns of markets, docks and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries and slaughter-houses", and inserting in place thereof the words "may authorize the Commonwealth to purchase or take, paying reasonable compensation therefor, the right to occupy and use any building or structure with the machinery or fixtures appurtenant thereto, or any other premises, so far and so long as may be necessary to such purposes".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Josiah Quincy of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 318) be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Until otherwise provided by legislation, the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may take possession, use and employ any commodity included within the terms of this article in the same manner as authorized by existing law to take possession, use and employ fuel, and subject to all the exercise of such authority, and may further authorize the Commonwealth to secure the production, sale, transportation and delivery of any such commodity, whether within or without the Commonwealth, and may further authorize any municipal corporation to purchase or take, paying reasonable compensation therefor, the right to occupy and use any building or structure with the machinery or fixtures appurtenant thereto, or any other premises, so far and so long as may be necessary to such purposes." This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution (No. 318) be amended by striking out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the following:

"The Legislature, when and as far as in its judgment a public exigency exists therefor, may provide for the purchase or taking by the Commonwealth, paying reasonable compensation therefor, of foods or food-stuffs, and sell and deliver any such commodity to its inhabitants or to any county, city or town and resell by such county, city or town to its inhabitants, and in connection therewith may authorize the Commonwealth, paying reasonable compensation therefor, of the right to occupy and use any building or structure with the machinery or fixtures appurtenant thereto, or any other premises, so far and so long as may be necessary to such purposes. When the judgment of the Governor such public exigency arises when the Legislature is not in session, the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may exercise the authority vested in the Legislature by this section until the Legislature reconvenes.

This amendment was superseded by the final new draft offered by Mr. Anderson, which was adopted.

Mr. George F. Willett of Norwood moved that the resolution (No. 318) be amended by adding at the end thereof the words:

"The use of a uniform method of accounting throughout the Commonwealth shall be provided by law for any undertakings under the authority of this article."
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

amendment was not acted upon, it being incorporated in the final new er by Mr. Anderson, which was adopted.

George W. Anderson of Brookline moved that the resolution be amended out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the fol-

Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize the taking by purchase wise of food-stuffs, feed, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reason-compensation therefor, and the sale of the same to the inhabitants thereof or to any, city, town or other municipal corporation therein; and may also au-municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants such necessaries of life, harvest and manufacture ice. The Commonwealth may also by statute duly authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Common-cities and towns, of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, ware-caneries, slaughter-houses and other like means of producing, selling and dis-g the necessaries of life.

Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the amendment moved by erson be amended by striking out the words proposed to be inserted, and ing in place thereof the following:

Legislature, when and so far as in its judgment a public exigency exists there-provide for the purchase or taking by the Commonwealth, paying reason-compensation therefor, of food or food-stuffs, feeds, fuel or ice, for sale to its-ts or to any county, city or town and resale by such county, city or town to itants, and in connection therewith may provide for the purchase or taking Commonwealth, paying reasonable compensation therefor, of the right to use any building or structure with the machinery or fixtures appurtenant or any other premises, so far and so long as may be necessary to such pur-action was taken on this amendment because the Convention had rejected r amendment moved by the same gentleman as a substitute for the resoported by the committee (No. 318).

Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the amendment moved by Mr.
be amended by inserting after the word "warehouses," the words age plants;" and by inserting after the word "collecting," the word amendment was withdrawn.

amendment moved by Mr. Anderson was withdrawn and the following stituted:

Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize the taking by purchase wise of food-stuffs, feeds, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reason-compensation therefor, and the sale of the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any, city, town or other municipal corporation therein; the Governor, with the 1 of the Council, if he deems that a public exigency exists, may, until other-vided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted. The Commonwealth may, ute duly enacted, authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitary necessaries of life and to harvest and to manufacture ice; and may also inner authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Comith and by cities and towns of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, eses, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like means for collecting, convert-g and distributing the necessaries of life.

amendment was withdrawn, and the following was substituted (docu-
o. 358):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

2. Provision may be made by law to authorize the taking

NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

6 paying reasonable compensation therefor, and the sale of 7 the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any county, 8 city, town or other municipal corporation therein; the 9 Governor, with the approval of the Council, if he deems 10 that a public exigency exists, may, until otherwise pro-11 vided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted.
12 Provision may be made by law to authorize municipali-13 ties to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the neces-14 saries of life and to harvest and to manufacture ice; 15 and to provide for the establishment, maintenance and 16 operation by the Commonwealth and by cities and towns
17 of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, ware-
18 houses, canneries, slaughter-houses, cold storage plants 19 and other like means for collecting and converting,
20 selling and distributing the necessaries of life. The use 21 of uniform methods of accounting throughout the Com-22 monwealth shall be provided for by law for any under-23 takings under the authority of this article.

Mr. David T. Montague of Boston moved that the above amendment amended by striking out the word “Commonwealth,” wherever it occurs, and inserting in place thereof, in each instance, the words “The General Court.”

These amendments were rejected.

This amendment (document No. 358) was adopted and, accordingly, the new draft was substituted for the resolution reported by the committee (No. 358) and was ordered to a second reading Wednesday, September 26.

Mr. Charles F. Dutch of Winchester moved that document No. 358 amended by inserting at the beginning of the article of "When and so far as a public exigency exists therefor by striking out, in lines 8 to 12, inclusive, the words “the Governor, with the approval of the Council, if he deems that a public exigency exists, may, until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers herein granted. Provision may be made”, and inserting in place thereof the words “and”; and by inserting after the word “life”, in line 20, the words “when the General Court is not in session the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may, until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers herein granted.”

These amendments were withdrawn.

Mr. John W. Cummings of Fall River moved that the above amendment amended by striking out the words proposed to be inserted at the beginning of the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the words “Whenever public exigencies require.”

The amendments moved by Mr. Dutch having been withdrawn, action on the amendment was precluded.

Mr. Josiah Quincy of Boston moved that the new draft (No. 358) be amended as follows: By striking out, in lines 3 and 4, the words “Provision may be made by law to authorize the taking by purchase otherwise by the Commonwealth of”, and inserting in place thereof the words “The Commonwealth may be authorized by law to contract for or to take by purchase otherwise”; by striking out, in line 5, the words “the sale of “, and inserting in place thereof the word “to sell”; by inserting after the word “therein”, in line 8, the words “also provide temporary shelter”; and by inserting after the word “converting in line 19, the words “preserving, storing”.

These amendments were withdrawn.

Mr. James P. Richardson of Newton moved that the new draft (No. 358) amended as follows: By inserting after the word “fuel,” in line 5, the word “and”; by striking out, in line 5, the words “and other necessaries of life”; by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words “necessaries of life”, and inserting place thereof the words “food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice”; by striking out, the words “the necessaries of life,” and inserting in place thereof the food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice”; and by adding at the end thereof the and all offices and positions created in connection with any such under-shall be filled in accordance with the laws and regulations governing the civil service of the Commonwealth and its municipalities.”

The amendments were withdrawn.

Edwin U. Curtis of Boston moved that the new draft (No. 358) be d by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof owing:

One of emergencies and distress provision may be made by law, while such ences and distress continue, to authorize the Commonwealth to provide tem-shelter and to take by eminent domain, or to purchase in any market foodecines, fuel, ice, clothing, boots and shoes, and feed for animals, and to sell e to the inhabitants thereof, to the inhabitants of other States, or to any city, town or other municipal corporation in this Commonwealth, which may be same to their inhabitants, and in connection therewith may authorize the ment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth, cities and towns oks, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries and slaughte-

When the Legislature is not in session, the Governor, with the approval of ill, may exercise the authority vested in the Legislature by this section until slature reconvenes and acts.

Amendment was withdrawn.

Martin M. Lomasney of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 358) be d by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof
owing:

maintenance, at reasonable rates, of a sufficient supply of food and other ecessary of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress, e function and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities ar to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner egislature shall determine.

Amendment was adopted, by a rising vote of 142 to 85, and the resolution, ce form, was ordered to a third reading Wednesday, October 3.

George W. Anderson of Brookline moved that the resolution (No. 358) be d by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof
owing:

on 1. Whenever the public exigencies require, provision may be made by orize the Commonwealth to contract for or to take by purchase or other-sts, feeds, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reasonable com-therefor, and to sell to the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any county, offices and positions created in connection with any undertakings under this shall be filled in accordance with the laws and regulations governing the clasiservice of the Commonwealth and its municipalities.

Amendment was withdrawn.

Arthur S. Kneil of Westfield moved that the resolution (No. 358) be ed by adding at the end thereof the words:
Provision may be made by any such law for the payment of damages to any person owning an established business, whether the same shall be taken or not, for a decrease in value of such business, whether by loss of custom or otherwise, by the carrying out of such law.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Whenever the public exigencies require, the Legislature (1) may authorize the Commonwealth to provide shelter and to contract for, or to take by purchase or otherwise, paying reasonable compensation therefor, foods, food-stuffs, feeds for animals, coal, coal, and ice, and to sell the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any municipal corporation or political division therein; (2) may authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants said necessaries of life and to harvest and manufacture ice; and to those ends (3) may authorize the Commonwealth and cities and towns to establish, maintain and operate all necessary means for collecting, converting, preserving, storing and distributing said necessaries of life. When the Legislature is not in session, the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers hereby authorized. The use of uniform methods of accounting throughout the Commonwealth shall be provided by law for any undertakings under the authority of this article.

Action on this amendment was precluded by the adoption of the amendment moved by Mr. Lomasney of Boston.

Mr. Charles T. Tatman of Worcester moved that the above amendment be amended by inserting after the word "Whenever", in line 1, the words "during times of war, emergency or distress."

This amendment was not acted upon for the reason stated above.

Mr. Augustus P. Loring of Beverly moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Section 1. Provision may be made by law whereby the Commonwealth, or any political division thereof, may at any time contract for, or take by purchase or otherwise, upon payment of a reasonable compensation therefor, food-stuffs, feeds, coal, coal, and ice, and in a time of public emergency any other necessary of life, and may sell the same to inhabitants of the Commonwealth, or to any county, city, or town, or any municipal corporation therein; and may establish, maintain and operate markets, central yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses, houses, coal storage plants, and other similar means for collecting, preserving, converting, selling or distributing the same.

Section 2. The existence of a public emergency within the meaning of this article shall be determined by the General Court, or, if it is not in session, by the Governor and Council.

Section 3. Provision shall be made by law for the use throughout the Commonwealth of uniform methods of accounting in the conduct of any undertaking carried on under the authority of this article.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Louis A. Coolidge of Milton moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words "to buy and to sell to the inhabitants the necessaries of life and."

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Arthur H. Lowe of Fitchburg moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by inserting before the word "collecting", in line 19, the word "producing."

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. David T. Montague of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by striking out, in lines 3 and 12, respectively, the words "Provi made by law", and inserting in place thereof, in each instance, the words "general Court may".

The amendments were withdrawn.

Robert Luce of Waltham moved that the resolution (No. 358) be amended by striking out the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:

General Court may determine what is a public use.

on this amendment was precluded by the adoption of the amendment by Mr. Lomasney of Boston.

committee on Form and Phraseology reported Wednesday, October 10, the resolution ought to be adopted in the following form (No. 363):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The maintenance and distribution at reasonable rates, during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and the providing of shelter, are public functions, and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein to take and provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the General Court shall determine.

new draft was discharged from the Orders of the Day Wednesday, October 10, and was specially assigned for debate at 2 o'clock on that same day.

new draft recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology adopted, by a vote of 138 to 47.

Era W. Clark of Brockton moved that the new draft be amended by striking out the following:

Legislature, during the times of war, emergency, distress or public exigency, provide for control and regulation of the distribution, storage and sale of other common necessaries of life. The Legislature shall have the sole and exclusive power to determine when a state of war, an emergency, a condition of distress or public exigency as contemplated in this article of amendment, exists.

Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the new draft (No. 363) be amended by striking out the article of amendment and substituting the following:

maintenance and distribution at reasonable rates, during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress, of a sufficient supply of food for man and animals, and ice, and the providing of shelter, are public functions, and the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein may, under such conditions, take and provide for their inhabitants in such manner as the General Court shall determine.

John F. Cusick of Boston moved that the new draft (No. 363) be amended by striking out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the following:

During times of war, public emergency or public distress, the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein shall have power to take by right of eminent domain or otherwise, and to sell and distribute food and the common necessaries of life and provision of shelter for their inhabitants in such manner as the General Court shall determine.

amendment was rejected.
Mr. Edward Carr of Hopkinton moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by striking out, in lines 3, 4 and 5, the words: “during the time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress.”

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Francis N. Balch of Boston moved that the new draft be amended by striking out the comma after the word “war”, in line 4, and inserting in place thereof the word “or”; by striking out, in the same line, the word “exigency” by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words “or distress”; and by adding at the end thereof the words “during such time as the General Court may adjudge that war or public emergency exists.”

These amendments were rejected.

Mr. Robert Luce of Waltham moved that the new draft (No. 363) be amended by striking out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the following:

The General Court may determine what is a public use.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Arthur H. Lowe of Fitchburg moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by inserting after the word “maintenance”, in line 3, the word “preservation”.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by inserting after the word “maintenance”, in line 3, the word “preservation”.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. George F. Willett of Norwood moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by inserting in line 3, at the beginning of the article of amendment, the words “The material welfare of the people depends upon the encouragement of enough initiative in developing the economic resources of the Commonwealth and upon fostering the industries and enterprises of the people.”

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Charles F. Dutch of Winchester moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by striking out, in line 4, the word “exigency”.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 83 to 104.

Mr. Joseph F. O’Connell of Boston moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by inserting after the word “distress”, in line 5, the words “to be determined by the Legislature”; and by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words “are public functions”, and inserting in place thereof the words “may be considered to be public functions when so determined by the Legislature”.

These amendments were rejected, by a vote of 63 to 98.

Mr. Abner S. McLaud of Greenfield moved that the new draft (No. 363) amended by striking out, in line 3, the words “At reasonable rates”; and inserting after the word “take”, in line 8, the words “paying reasonable compensation therefor”.

These amendments were rejected.

Mr. Clarence W. Hobbs, Jr., of Worcester moved that the amendment recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology be amended by the substitution of the following:

Section 1. Whenever the public exigencies require, provision may be made by law to authorize the Commonwealth to contract for or to take by purchase or otherwise food-stuffs, foods, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reasonable compensation therefor, and to sell the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein for resale to the inhabitants thereof, also to provide temporary shelter; the Governor, with the approval of the Council, if the Legislature is not in session, may, until otherwise provided by law, except the powers hereby granted.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

2. Provision may be made by law to authorize municipalities to harvest, extract and to sell ice; and to provide for the establishment, maintenance by the Commonwealth and by cities and towns of markets, docks, coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses, cold storage and other like means for collecting and converting, preserving, storing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life. The use of uniform methods of accounting for the Commonwealth shall be provided for by law for any undertakings under the authority of this section.

Amendment was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 2.

Convention adjourned and reconvened immediately in order that the amendment might be acted upon in time to submit it to the people at the coming election. Perfecting amendments in phraseology, offered by Mr. Frank of Worcester, were adopted and the amendment was submitted to the people Tuesday, November 6, 1917, by a vote of 61,119 to 51,826.

THE DEBATE.

Anderson of Brookline: If the members of the Convention look at the report which precedes the resolution which has just passed (No. 318), they will observe that there was a very large number of documents referred to us and dealt with in this single report and any resolution. I do not believe that it is desirable for me to go into detail as to all the various propositions for our legislative power. You can find them from the first page of our report. I think you will conclude that the matter of this resolution invoked as much public interest as any matter before the Convention, except of course our old and enemy, the L. and R. Indeed, the fact that without the committee on Public Affairs the Convention almost sponaneously has given this matter precedence, in order that, if possible, we may go on to the ballot for the November election and enlarge our legislative power for the coming winter, indicates the large degree of interest and Convention interest there is in this subject-matter.

As we took, in the committee on Public Affairs, the numerous sections set forth in the documents referred to, and worked out the sections on page 3 of document 318. I now direct your attention very briefly to just what that signifies. It is, by mere read-most as plain as it can be made. Perhaps a few words may make it a little clearer. "The General Court may authorize the Commonwealth to take by purchase or otherwise,"—that is a grant of the right of eminent domain, couched in the ordinary language,—"food, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life."

Proposition is to authorize a taking in case of necessity. Please mind that we are not now legislating, we are providing power to do, — a distinction which I find many of the learned members of the Convention, as well as many of the witnesses who came before the committee, are constantly forgetting; it is not now a question of whether that power ought to be exercised, now or at any other time. The question is whether the Legislature ought to have the power at any time to exercise any or all of the powers which we now are discussing. I digress further to say that I for one, never having been a member of this Convention, those of us who have been accustomed to plain living and high thinking sometimes think are mere luxuries. I know of no method by which you can avoid that possible difficulty in a constitutional grant of power. I think it should be left for one wise Legislature to determine what is necessary, naming it in the legislation enacted.

The next grant of power is for legislation to sell these necessaries, whatever they may be, to the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein. We will observe that there is no grant of eminent domain to any other political division than the Commonwealth. It is the view of our commonwealth that if, in time of war or any other stress, we ever should meet conditions that the right of eminent domain,—the power to commandeer, so to speak (as an army commandeers everything),—should be exercised, then that power should be exercised by the Commonwealth, and by no subdivision. It is a very drastic power; in this view, it ought not to be exercised except by the Commonwealth. Assume that it would be exercised only under extraordinary circumstances. But if we go on as we have been for three years past,—as the rest of the world has been for three years past,—engaged mainly in the business not of “making a living” but of making killing, if that is to be the main business of the world, Heaven knows what necessities may meet us here, as they have met the peoples of Europe. It is our belief that there is no danger in giving to the Commonwealth the power, that every army has, to take and distribute the necessaries of life. Such power may be sorely needed.

The next power, proceeding after the semi-colon that you find after the word “therein,” is this: The Legislature “may authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants and to harvest and manufacture ice.” That, you see, is a plain grant of new constitutional power;—bear in mind again that it is not a relative power,—of constitutional power to authorize municipalities (we left out counties intentionally, for the county is more a judicial unit than it is a trading unit) “to buy the necessaries of life and sell them to their inhabitants.”

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I want to ask the gentleman what is the meaning of the word “such?” Does that word relate to what the General Court has taken by purchase, or otherwise, and does it authorize the municipality to buy and sell on its own account necessities other than those that have been taken by the power of eminent domain? What is the intention of the committee?

Mr. Anderson: I think “such” means any and all of the necessaries of life. If there is any doubt about it, it ought to be put beyond doubt. My understanding of the purpose of the committee was language "and may authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to inhabitants such necessaries of life, and to harvest and manufactures," was intended to give to the Legislature a general power to so municipalities all trading powers in all of the necessaries of which would include food-stuffs, fuel, ice and other necessaries of whichever the Legislature might think them to be.

BROWN: I would inquire of the gentleman whether if you strike the word "such," it would not have just the meaning he intends?

ANDERSON: Personally, not speaking for the committee on that I should have not the slightest objection to striking out the much." I suppose you would have to substitute the word "the" or to make your English good. Any amendment of that sort the committee on, — I forget the name of it — which polishes we get through, — found necessary, I should find no fault with.
will say to the delegate from Brockton that there is no doubt

Justice Holmes wrote an opinion of about eight lines in length, so pertinent to the situation, as we think it exists, that I shall
The question, you see, Mr. President and gentlemen, is the as to whether this proposed use is a public use. Mr. Justice said:

that last sentence, like every word in that very short opinion, is pertinent for us here. As it was not for the court there to the need or expediency of that legislation, so I venture to not for us here now to consider the present need or expedithis legislation, except in so far as present world conditions do that that need is here, or shortly may be here, as to some or these matters. Just when, or under what circumstances, a — which has been so frequently needed that at least twice and three times within the memory of men now active, the Legis-has asked an opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court as to for it might not relieve present necessities, — just when such a as that should be exercised is for the Legislature, and the man in this Convention who holds the worst opinion of the Legislature, whoever he may be,—not I,—must concede, I think, that the Legislature, if it is good for anything, is fit to deal with a question of that kind.

Again in 182 Massachusetts, page 605, the question was put to the Supreme Judicial Court as to whether there was constitutional power "to enact a law conferring upon cities and towns authority to establish and maintain municipal fuel or coal yards, or to purchase coal and wood for the purpose of selling it generally to their inhabitants or others at cost, at less than cost or at a profit." And again the Supreme Judicial Court in an opinion signed by Chief Justice Knowlton, Justices Morton, Lathrop, Barker, Hammond and Braley, said no. Mr. Justice Loring in a separate opinion reached, for all present purposes, pretty nearly the same conclusion, but on a somewhat different ground.

Such is the state of our present constitutional limitations with which we undertook to deal. The opinion of this committee was that the Legislature should be entrusted with the power to say when, to what extent and in what articles which were necessary municipalities should be authorized to buy and sell.

Now, I have passed to lines 10 and succeeding. There you will find an additional grant of power to the Legislature with relation to dealing by public bodies in the necessities of life and in the means of distributing necessaries.

Mr. Theller of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman if in the word "fuel," or elsewhere in the first part of the resolution, the committee took into consideration the power of the Legislature to buy and sell gas or electricity; whether that is included in this resolution?

Mr. Anderson: The committee was of the opinion that there was not the slightest doubt of present power to buy and sell gas. There are already various municipalities within the State engaged in the business of furnishing gas; the present constitutional power to deal in gas and electricity is, as we take it, absolutely beyond question. So all those resolutions which came before us that dealt with what are called municipal lighting plants we regarded as being outside of the realm of arguable need.

A Delegate: I should like to ask the promoter of this measure if he would be willing to accept an amendment to his resolution inserting after the words "of life," in line 15, the words "to sell the same and dispose of the necessities of life at actual cost of same to the inhabitants of said city or town."

Mr. Anderson: I think not. I do not believe that you can give that power to a municipality or to any other public body to be used effectively; and, at the same time, limit in your Constitution such public body to selling it at cost. Clearly they must face business conditions, if they go into business, just as any person or private corporation must face business conditions. It may be found advisable to sell at a profit. Presumably, under ordinary conditions, the Legislature would require a municipality or those engaged in that administration to attempt, at any rate, to sell at a profit, and only a moderate profit. But if legislation of that kind should be enacted to meet an emergency and afterwards conditions became normal and a municipality found itself with a lot of stuff on hand and the market had gone down, we ought not to have constitutional limitation to prevent them from selling it at less than cost. Otherwise you would hamper the doing of that business; they must be left free.

Mr. Brown: I want to ask, Mr. President, this question: Whether the word "or" in place of the word "and" would change the tenor of that resolution in this way? Whether or not, as it at present stands, it would not have to be a general proposition of which no one town could take advantage unless there was action by the Commonwealth, cities and towns? Whereas, if you had the word "or," it could be made presumptive by the Legislature that any one town or city could vote yes or no whether it would go into it or not?

Mr. Anderson: Where?

Mr. Brown: It reads: "Commonwealth, cities and towns." Does that word "and," in line 12, connect the "Commonwealth, cities and towns," so that they would all have to go in or else no part of that combination could go in?

Mr. Anderson: The view of the committee was that the language used was adequate so that the General Court might authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth or cities or towns,—any or all. It was intended to be a broad general grant of power to the Legislature, and the Legislature, I take it, could enact its legislation in such form as to leave it either compulsory or optional. The word "and" it is suggested to me is used distributively. I think the construction is as I stated, but I should easily yield to the wiser judgment of others; I agree, if there is any reasonable doubt about it, it should be put in such form as to resolve that doubt.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: Does this resolution permit the sale of any of these things at less than cost, and if so, did the committee so intend that?

Mr. Anderson: I thought I undertook to answer that a moment ago, that so far as the grant of constitutional power was concerned there was no intent on the part of the committee to limit the power of the Legislature; my own view would be that to limit it (as I stated a moment ago), so that if a municipality was authorized by the Legislature to go into business to meet an emergency, and yet were prohibited from selling at less than cost, it might find itself with a lot of stuff on hand that it could not dispose of at all. And, to repeat myself again, if the Legislature authorizes a public body to go into business, it must meet business conditions, whatever they may prove to be.

Mr. Cusick of Boston: Was it the intention of the committee to limit this power to times of emergency and distress?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir, it was not the intention of the committee in the resolution reported to limit the power of the Legislature, that wise body, to times of emergency and stress. Among other reasons which affected some,—and I am inclined to think all the committee,—was the reason that if we undertook so to limit the power and discretion of the Legislature we almost certainly would raise a question for litigation,—which perhaps would prevent the power from being exercised at all. What is an emergency? Nobody knows until the Supreme Judicial Court is compelled,—I say it with entire respect,—to make the last guess. Suppose somebody says: "There has been an emergency this year for coal;" the Legislature three months later enacts a law under this resolution; but there is a nice little combination of coal companies and coal dealers who say: "This is no emergency. We are a set of philanthropists. We are distributing coal a great deal better than these public officials could." They go to the Supreme Judicial Court and raise the question whether there is an emergency.

Mr. Cusick: And what would the Supreme Judicial Court say?

Mr. Anderson: It is very probable that pending that litigation it would be nearly if not quite impossible to exercise that power safely.

Mr. Cusick: Is it not true that there are a number of cases similar to the ones that you have described which have been decided by the United States Supreme Court and by other State courts, in which it is stated that the question of emergency is for the Legislature, and not for the courts?

Mr. Anderson: I think that is so. But the question was raised in our committee, and as I now remember it there was a considerable difference of opinion,—we had some very good lawyers in the committee,—as to whether it was conclusively a legislative question; I hope some member of the committee will correct me if my memory is at fault. I think that we reached finally the conclusion that there would be serious danger of laying a foundation for crippling litigation, if it were undertaken to say that this power should be exercised by the Legislature only in times of emergency. I may add this, which influenced some of us (doubtless it would not influence the member who now asks the question); some of us thought the Legislature of Massachusetts could be trusted not to abuse a power of this kind. Others doubted that.

Mr. Cusick: Just one more question in regard to this. What does your committee mean, or what is your conception of what the committee means, by the word "otherwise" in the fourth line of the article of amendment, in other words, where you provide that the Commonwealth may "take by purchase or otherwise?"

Mr. Anderson: That is the language which has been used I suppose in a thousand statutes.

Mr. Cusick: No, no, but what does it mean in this statute?

Mr. Anderson: It means, take by eminent domain. You can go out and buy it, and if you cannot buy it you seize it, leaving the value to be determined by a jury, just as you do when you take land for markets or land for the State House or city hall.

Mr. Cusick: What construction have you put on the word "purchase?" Would it not be the same as by eminent domain, as it is used in this resolution?

Mr. Anderson: The words "by purchase or otherwise," as I understand, are the stereotyped phraseology for a grant of eminent domain. If the delegate from Fall River (Mr. Morton) is not of that opinion, change the expression. But as I understand it, practically all the statutes which have been enacted intended to grant eminent domain, since the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, have used those four words. I beg to ask the learned justice of the Supreme Judicial Court (Mr. Morton) if I am not correct.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: As I am rather opposed to this measure as it at present stands, I think I had better not answer the gentleman's question.
Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: Trying to find the efficacy of this measure, I should like to know what the gentleman would do in case the milk contractors refused to sell milk or the oil contractors refused to sell oil under this resolution, and if said oil contractors or milk contractors were outside the State what would this resolution do and what measures would have to be taken for the State?

Mr. Anderson: It is quite clear that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts cannot legislatively deal with interstate commerce or with production outside the State, or with anything until it comes within the jurisdiction of our own law. Very many abuses from which we suffer, whether among milk producers and distributors or oil producers and distributors, are far beyond the reach of any power that may be granted to the Legislature of this Commonwealth. Of course the Commonwealth and its subdivisions can be authorized to contract for necessities outside the State.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I should like to ask two questions of this gentleman, and the first one is whether or not in all those statutes which have in them the words "purchase or otherwise," there is not invariably a later provision which provides for compensation in case it is taken otherwise than by purchase.

Mr. Anderson: That question was considered by the committee, and it was the opinion of the committee, — and I think we looked up some statutes at that time and found that the answer to the gentleman's question was no, — it was the opinion of the committee that the obligation to pay reasonable compensation was necessarily implied and that it was not necessary to put it in. It was left out because we regarded it as necessarily assumed.

Mr. Bryant: I would ask further whether that assumption was not on account of the provisions of our Constitution, and whether this may not do what a statute cannot do, to wit, repeal the previous provisions in the Constitution as to compensation?

Mr. Anderson: Of course it is conceivable. Some of you appear to fear it. The foundations of all our liberties including the right of property and the right of life may be destroyed as the result of measures reported by this Constitutional Convention. But for my part I cannot conceive a Commonwealth of Massachusetts in which property will be taken for public use without the existence of an obligation to pay for that property, and I do not regard it as necessary to repeat, in various grants of power to the Legislature, the constitutional obligation to pay for that which is taken for public uses.

Mr. Bryant: I do not want to take too much time. There is one more question I should like to ask for information. Assuming that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should go into business, assuming that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should purchase certain of these food-stuffs for the benefit of certain towns or certain individuals and a loss should result from that transaction, would that loss be borne by those towns or would it be spread all over the Commonwealth which was not interested in that particular purchase?

Mr. Anderson: That again would be a question entirely for the Legislature to deal with when it exercised all or any part of the powers which this resolution undertakes to give to the Legislature. There is an additional answer to the question last asked by the delegate from Milton. Under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and, indeed, under the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, no persons can be deprived of their property except by due process of law, and no State could enact a law as long as the present Federal Constitution exists which would take from the citizens their property, except for public purposes and paying a reasonable compensation therefor. That itself, entirely apart from our own domestic guarantees, is an adequate answer to the question raised.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Like the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Cusick), I, too, am concerned about the precise scope of the word "otherwise", in the fourth line. Accepting the gentleman's explanation of what the committee intended, I ask him whether he would be willing to strike out the word "otherwise," and insert in lieu thereof the words "by the power of eminent domain," so as to read, "take by purchase or by the power of eminent domain"?

Mr. Anderson: My understanding of the stereotyped form of legislation is that no statute with which I am familiar says "by right of eminent domain." I think I am correct; but there are many lawyers here who know a great deal more about it than I, very many of them, — I bow to a few. If they want to put in "by right of eminent domain," I do not object. But I venture to think that I myself must have read and perhaps dealt with many scores of statutes in which this precise language is used; I never before heard it questioned, in more than a quarter of a century that I have been at the bar, that the words "by purchase or otherwise" were not proper phraseology by which to give the power of eminent domain.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: The question I want to raise, Mr. President, is whether the chairman of the committee will accept, where the language appears, in line 4, "take by purchase or otherwise," the substituting of the words "purchase or take by eminent domain," so as to read, "The General Court may authorize the Commonwealth to purchase or take by eminent domain."

Mr. Anderson: My attention is directed to Article XLIII of the amendments to the present Constitution which provides that the General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth to take land and hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same, and so on. Now, I do not believe you need to say "take by purchase or otherwise." If you simply say "take," probably you have granted the power. My understanding of those words always has been this: That when a public body, by the right of eminent domain under this grant, took "by purchase or otherwise," it could go out and trade, settling at the time of or before the taking, the consideration to be paid to the then owner; that if it could not agree with the owner of the property as to the value thereof it seized it in such manner as is provided in the machinery of the legislation; this results, as a matter of constitutional right, in remitting the owner to a trial by jury for the assessment of damages.

I think perhaps we would get on faster, if there is any doubt about that language, if we allow the committee on Form and Phraseology to make any rearrangement or revision of it they wish; this they may do so far as I am concerned. What I am interested in is the power itself. We worked over it quite a while, and, as I say, we had some very wise men on our committee.
Mr. Loring of Beverly: In line 5 in reference to the words "other necessaries of life," in the opinion which was quoted by the gentleman, real estate was referred to. Would the gentleman consider that "other" would entitle a city or town to deal in houses as a necessity of life?

Mr. Anderson: The answer is, I think, no, but our committee has reported another amendment which will authorize, if it is submitted, the dealing in houses. If the gentleman from Beverly will look at No. 320, he will find there the results of our committee's consideration of what power should be granted with relation to homes.

Mr. Loring: The question is whether real estate is raised in this measure, not in No. 320, and I think we should like to know definitely whether they mean to raise all the necessaries of life, such, for instance, as clothing and houses and things of that kind, by the word "other" in line 5.

Mr. Anderson: I think it was the opinion of our committee that No. 318 was not broad enough to authorize the Legislature to permit a public body, whether the Commonwealth or any subdivision thereof, to go into the business of furnishing homes as necessaries. It was partly for that reason that we reported No. 320, which does provide that the General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth, and the cities and towns thereof, to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease and sell the same for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens. That is a separate grant of power, and I think in the contemplation of our committee not included in No. 318.

Mr. Cusick: I should like to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that in resolution No. 320 you limit the power. To that extent No. 320 differs entirely in the basic power which you give the Legislature in No. 318.

Mr. Anderson: If the gentleman looks at the last part of No. 320 I think he will find that is not so; and in that connection, as we are digressing from No. 318, which, as I understand, Mr. President, is the only thing before the Convention, although I am quite willing to discuss No. 320 for the purpose of showing the limitations in No. 318 —

Mr. Cusick: My question was directed at this time only to the fact that your committee limited the power in a kindred resolution, No. 320, but did not limit it in No. 318.

Mr. Anderson: The language "and providing homes for citizens" at the end of No. 320, in the opinion of the committee, was broad enough so that the Legislature could go outside the necessities of relieving congestion. The delegate perhaps has in mind the forty-third amendment of the present Constitution, — I read a part of it a moment ago. That provides that the General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease and sell the same for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens:

Provided, however, that this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.

Now, what we did in No. 320 was to amend the present forty-third amendment, which the Convention will observe is intended to be repealed by No. 320, by inserting after the word "Commonwealth" the words "and the cities and towns thereof"; and also by striking out the proviso which would prohibit the sale of any of this land "at less than the cost thereof," which would leave the Commonwealth or the public body that might embark in that business hopelessly saddled with anything that they had purchased unwisely or which had gone down in value or price because of conditions which could not have been fairly foreseen, — thus making, as we thought, the present Article XLIIRI nearly if not quite unworkable.

Mr. Parker of Lancaster: I would beg to inquire of the gentleman from Brookline whether he entertains any apprehension, however remote it may be, that, in the event of legislation under the permission of the resolution now under consideration declaring some condition of public necessity, exigency or emergency as warranting the taking of property under such circumstances, a contention, — and a serious contention, — might be made that the taking was by virtue of authority under a police regulation rather than under the exercise of the power of eminent domain. In order to avert such apprehension, which I admit would be remote, would he not consent to the insertion of words declaring that the taking should be in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, whereby that doubt, remote though it were, might be eliminated?

Mr. Anderson: I am not quite sure that I understand the exact scope and purpose of the delegate's question. We did consider in the committee this: I suppose that under the police power government may take property without compensation. It was not the purpose of our committee to extend into this domain the police power so as under conceivable circumstances to authorize the Commonwealth to take a citizen's property without compensation. It was the purpose of the committee to extend the business-doing power of the Commonwealth and of the subdivisions thereof if and when the Legislature thought it wise to exercise that power.

I, therefore, if I understand the delegate's question, would say that if in any reasonable view of this resolution it might be held a grant of power to extend the police power (which would not necessarily involve compensation), have it reframed so as to eliminate that doubt.

Mr. Parker: I do not desire to take the time of my honorable friend, but I desire to assure him that my question was put wholly for the purpose of gaining an interpretation of this statute and possibly eliminating a doubt in my own mind, for I am not opposed to the proposition that is embodied in this measure, but I do fear the measure, unless there is plain phraseology that would exclude forever any reasonable or possible contention that the taking was in the exercise of the police power. Perhaps your question has fully answered my doubt.

Mr. Anderson: I only repeat that if there is reasonably arguable doubt as to the construction to be put upon this grant, I should be heartily in favor of removing that doubt and should welcome the most critical and careful scrutiny of the delegate from Lancaster on that proposition before we have finished the consideration of this proposition. Now, Mr. President, I turn again to the latter part of the resolution.

The General Court may authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth —
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

"and or" you may put in there, as some careful lawyers do when they are drawing wills,

... and or cities and towns, of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like means for producing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life.

Now, that is not very long but it is pretty pregnant. Note that you have in the first place the Commonwealth and the municipality. There is no grant of that kind to the county. It was not the opinion of the committee that counties should go into that kind of business. It was the opinion of the committee that it was desirable that the Legislature should be permitted to put the Commonwealth into any business that it thought desirable, provided that business was a "necessary." We put before the committee, in order to test the powers which would be given by the amendment of the delegate from Quincy, the question as to whether we wanted to authorize our public bodies to go into the business of "dealing in Easter hats." I was not in favor of it. Some members of the committee were in favor of it. Some of them even argued that Easter hats were articles of prime necessity in their families and there ought to be some way of reducing the price. But passing the persiflage, — the conclusion that we reached was that public business in the necessities of life, at the present time, should be the limit of constitutional power, "even to an almost all-wise Legislature. Then we put in the word "market." There is no doubt that there is present power on the part of the Commonwealth to go into the market business; but out of excess of caution, lest some captious gentleman should hereafter argue that exclusio unius inclusio alterius was operative here, we put in "markets." Fuel and coal yards fell within the condemnation of the present outstanding decisions of the full court; that, therefore, is an additional grant of power. Elevators never have been ruled on. Probably elevators, under our present Constitution, would fall outside the limits. At any rate, they might fall outside the limits, as do fuel and coal yards. Warehouses might be argued to be either within or without. Canners might fall in the same category. Slaughter-houses we formerly thought to be public uses. Whether they would be held to be so now, under the modern method of distributing meats, ought not to be left to litigation; so we put them in. "And other like means for producing." You will observe that it is not limited to buying, selling and distributing. The word "producing" is in there. You can go right into the business of running a market-garden, a shoe factory, or anything else which is the production of a necessity, selling and distributing the necessaries of life. Now, that is a very large additional grant of power to the Legislature as compared to the power that it now has.

Mr. Theller of New Bedford: I understand that lines 14 and 15 of the resolution provide for the establishment and operation of agencies for producing, selling and distributing. I should like to ask the gentleman if that includes the establishment of systems of transportation.

Mr. Anderson: It is plainly within the present constitutional power of the Legislature to provide all kinds of transportation, as we assumed. Railroads, railways, highways, bridges and the operations of vehicles thereon we understood to be so plainly within the present recognized powers of the Legislature that there was no need of mentioning them in this proposed amendment. As to shipping, I think that was given no consideration. Whether or not it would be held under our present Constitution that the Commonwealth might establish a line of steamboats to run from here to Norfolk to bring up coal, we did not consider. A ferry across our own waters undoubtedly is within the present Constitution; no doubt about that. We can operate ferries across Boston harbor or across a river. Anything which is a highway is within the present power.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have stated the gist of the considerations which affected us. We had before us propositions which were somewhat broader, which would authorize the Commonwealth and municipalities to go into any and all kinds of business. We thought it should be limited to necessaries. We did not think it should be limited to times of emergencies, for the reasons that I have stated. We thought also that the Commonwealth should be given the grant of eminent domain, treated as an army is treated. We thought that the general broad power should be given under which the Commonwealth might delegate the power of producing, selling and distributing to cities and towns, but not to counties. Mr. Clapp of the committee dissented on some part of the resolution, I think, but I am not quite sure.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: This subject, as perhaps you already have learned by the questions that have been sent back and forth, is one of really great importance. To my mind there is nothing on your whole docket, with the possible exception of the I. and R., which is of so great importance as this and deserves more serious consideration. The conclusions reached by the committee on Public Affairs, I may say in passing, were not marked with that high degree of unanimity which characterized the decisions made by the committee on Bill of Rights. We had a very pleasant time together, but there were many and considerable differences of opinion, and that statement holds true with regard to this particular resolution. So that when the gentleman who has just taken his seat spoke about what he did, or spoke about the conclusions reached by the committee, please understand that very frequently those expressions should not be taken as including every member of the committee.

Mr. Anderson: I should like to inquire whether the last statement about agreement is to be taken to indicate that he or any other member of the committee dissented on this particular resolution?

Mr. Clapp: I did not register any formal dissent. But the gentleman will recall the statement made in the committee that every single one of us reserved his right to express his individual opinion upon this and every other measure when reached in the Convention. You may recall, too, that when, some months ago, the resolution relating to natural resources was reached the statement was made on this floor, certainly by me and I think by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs), now sitting on my right, that it was the general understanding of the committee on Public Affairs that a member had the right to oppose any resolution reported by the committee although at the time in the committee he had not made a formal dissent or given notice of any minority report.

Now, as I say, this is a subject of great importance and I apprehend that in this Convention we are going to develop the same differences of opinion, and perhaps to an even greater degree, than those which obtained in the committee.

My friend, the delegate from Quincy (Mr. Adams), who was sitting here a moment ago, thinks that this resolution is too narrow, that it ought to be greatly broadened. On the other hand, I, while sympathizing with the main purpose, think it is too broad, and I want to see it narrowed. And before I finish the brief remarks which I propose to make on the general subject I shall offer an amendment.

Now what is the main purpose of this resolution? What does it grow out of? It grows out of the fear possessed by a great many people that in times of war or other public distress coal and fuel and food-stuffs, — those things which are of such a nature that they may form the subject of monopoly, — may fall into the hands of speculators so that the interests of the poor people may suffer unless the State has power to seize those articles and sell them, either with or without a profit, to people who need them. I am willing to stand for a measure which will afford the people protection against a calamity like that. But nobody appearing before the committee or discussing the question anywhere else so far has referred to any exigencies that ever occurred in the past except that of there being an insufficient supply of coal. Possibly some one did say that there might be a shortage of some kind of food products, like potatoes or onions, so that there may be the same need of protecting a community against speculations in those articles.

Now I think we are all agreed upon the general proposition that it is bad policy for cities and towns as a rule to enter into competition with private industry. There are certain well established exceptions, exceptions that are based upon special and peculiar considerations. It is settled that cities and towns may properly own and operate the public waterworks; that, if the citizens think best, they may own and operate the lighting plant in the town or city. I am willing for one to go a step further and so amend the Constitution that cities and towns may be authorized by the Legislature on occasions to enter into the business of dealing, not broadly in the necessaries of life, but in fuel and in food-stuffs, and that is where I would draw the line. I think that is going quite far enough. The gentleman from Brookline who has just taken his seat (Mr. Anderson) has said a great deal about the advisability of giving the Legislature the power. He says: "You can trust them; give them the broad power and they will not exercise it in any unreasonable fashion." Well, now, gentlemen, that argument leads to throwing down all constitutional restraints upon the Legislature. That is the logical tendency of it. If there is a certain power or function which we agree the State never ought to exercise, I say, so surround it with constitutional restraints or limitations that the Legislature may not exercise it; and I stand here to say that we ought not to open wide the gate and broaden our governmental functions so that it will be possible for the Legislature to authorize a city or town to go into the business of manufacturing or dealing in boots and shoes in competition with an individual or a partnership or a corporation. I do not believe in that and I should hope that a majority of the members of this Convention do not.

Mr. HARRIMAN of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman from Lexington who, in the course of his remarks, has stated that he believes in this measure only when necessity arises, if he does not think that in our great industrial centers, where men and women are forced to work for low wages, and the supply of fuel and food and other things which are necessary for them is in the control of a few men,—if he does not believe that that necessity exists and always will exist so long as those two things obtain in our industrial life?

Mr. Clapp: In answer to the gentleman, my idea is that, basing my judgment upon experience and what we may observe of the past, there is not the slightest danger of any monopoly in the hands of private individuals or agencies of necessaries of life in the broad sense, meaning boots and shoes and clothing, neckties and collars and handkerchiefs and what not. I recognize the possibility of there being a monopoly in coal and wood and food-stuffs, although I think that is extremely unlikely, and I cannot see how a city or town is going to get coal if individuals cannot get it. But recognizing the possibility I am willing to stand for a constitutional amendment similar to the one that has been proposed, but in a much restricted form and scope.

As this resolution stands it is competent for the Legislature, so far as any constitutional restraints are concerned, to pass a law authorizing cities and towns to go into the grocery business and to set themselves up as dry-goods merchants; and I think the resolution is broad enough to authorize a law which would permit a city or town to manufacture boots and shoes. Boots and shoes are necessaries of life, and toward the end of this resolution is a clause authorizing municipalities to put into operation means for producing necessaries of life.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: How far would you extend the principle that a town, in order to upbuild itself, may take a part of its money for the purpose of encouraging a manufacturer to come to the town or taking the money for the purpose of having him come without such purpose?

Mr. Clapp: That question is a little remote from the principle which underlies the measure under consideration. All I can say is that in general terms I never favored the expenditure of much money by a town to bring manufacturing plants to it. I think that every community has or has not certain natural advantages for manufacturing, and if it has natural advantages that is a good point and the industries will come; if it has not such advantages in a marked degree, it is a foolish expenditure of money to give them a bonus for coming or to exempt them from the payment of taxes in consideration of their coming.

As I have said, under this measure as it stands, the Legislature may pass a law authorizing the town in which I live to go into the grocery business and to go into it on a basis which might yield a profit, or they might sell goods at cost, or they might sell goods at a loss. Now it is perfectly obvious, it seems to me, that you are putting a very unjust burden on the grocery men already there when you subject them to a competition with the town, with the possible result of their having to pay increased taxes in order to be put out of business; for certainly they might be put out of business, if it was conducted at a loss.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman who is speaking if his objection to this amendment is based upon his recognition of what he thinks is a fact, that it would interfere with individual rights. Is that your objection?

Mr. Clapp: That is one objection; it would interfere with individual rights in a case like that of which I last spoke,—a town going into the grocery business or dry-goods business in competition with merchants already engaged in that line of business.

Mr. Donovan: The reason for asking that question was that I wanted to find out if his objection to that amendment was based upon the same reason that the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) had in opposing the initiative and referendum. In so opposing the initiative and referendum he made this statement: "That people consider the common welfare, not individual rights." I take it that the gentleman who is speaking objects to this amendment upon the same grounds.

Mr. Clapp: Of course we all know there are times when individual rights ought to give way in order to promote the general welfare. But in the case to which this resolution appertains it seems to me that there is no need of curtailing what I have described as the rights of the individual. I do not believe the common welfare would be promoted thereby. It is my experience that municipalities, as their affairs are conducted, do not and cannot carry on business,—private business,—with the same economy and efficiency as that which characterizes the conduct of business by private agencies. And if the towns under authority conferred by this or a similar resolution should go into the business generally of selling necessaries of life, using that term in the broad sense, it seems to me that through the increased burdens of taxation which would be likely to come in consequence, the communities as a whole would not make any gain, while, as I have indicated, the rights of individuals might be infringed.

Gentlemen, this is a Socialistic proposition, standing in the broad form in which it is now put; and it might constitute a direct and considerable step toward the establishment of State Socialism.

Mr. Francis N. Balch of Boston moved the amendments cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Clapp: Now, gentlemen, personally I would not have much objection to that amendment, and yet it is an unnecessary and I think rather a foolish one. I gave a good deal of consideration to the question,—I will not arrogate this to myself,—notwithstanding our differences of opinion I think we all gave a good deal of consideration to the question whether anything would be gained by referring to a stress or exigency as that suggested resolution does. It is a curious fact that every man who appeared before our committee in advocacy of this or a similar measure would begin by saying that there were likely to be great emergencies during which it would not be possible for people to get their necessaries of life through the ordinary channels. I believe every speaker put it on that ground, that there were likely to be these emergencies.

Mr. James J. Brennan of Boston: As a member of the committee which heard these different propositions I should like to ask the member who now rises and objects to the report of the committee if that remark which he says almost every man presented, that it would be hard to get the necessaries of life, was anything more than the ordinary comment which it would be natural for people to make with the present advance in prices as they are and have been for the last year in this immediate vicinity.

Mr. Clapp: I did not understand those gentlemen to be referring to that kind of an emergency. I thought they were talking about a shortage of supplies due most likely to the corracling of those things in the hands of speculators. Now, as I have said, the speculators might corral the coal, they might corral the food-stuffs, but I do not see how they could corral all the dry-goods and groceries.

To come back to what I was saying, I say that we all considered the question whether it was practicable to tie up this authority in some way to the existence of an emergency. I think that we came to the conclusion that it was not; if you attempt that you must do it in one of two ways: Either you must put it in the form in which it has been put in this last proposed amendment and say whenever in the judgment of the Legislature the exigency exists, and that is what this practically comes to; or else you must put it in such shape that the question of the right to exercise the power will depend upon the existence of the exigency as a matter of fact. Well, now, obviously you do not gain anything by saying that the power may be extended when in the judgment of the Legislature there is an exigency, or that they may do it in an exigency, with the provision that the Legislature shall be the sole judge of the exigency. If put in that way it does not serve as a limitation. If the Legislature wants to do it, it will; and if it does not want to do it, it will not. That kind of a limitation I think the chairman of our committee very picturesquely described as a "rhetorical limitation"; it does not amount to anything.

Now you have the other kind of limitation. If you limit the right to do this to the existence of an exigency as a fact, then you have a question that is reviewable by the court, and I think with the matter put in that way you might sometimes get into a difficult and involved situation. A city or town, believing that the exigency as a fact existed, might make contracts and incur obligations only to find later on, after the question of the exigency had been litigated, that it did not exist; and you can readily see what great embarrassment might follow.

So that, gentlemen, I say that, as a practical matter, you had better wipe out all reference to exigencies or stresses or calamities or what not, and confer whatever authority you do confer in straight, unqualified language, as does the resolution to which the gentleman from Brookline has just spoken; and that you should simply look out and see that you do not make the scope of it too broad so as to authorize municipalities to go generally into commercial business in competition with private owners.

Messrs. Clapp of Lexington and Bigney of Boston offered the amendments cited at the beginning of the chapter.

The debate was continued Thursday, September 20.

Mr. Samuel W. George of Haverhill offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: When we adjourned yesterday I was giving some reasons why I thought that the resolution, in the form in which it was submitted by the committee, is altogether too broad. I had nearly concluded the remarks which I intended to make, and I shall not much longer tax the patience of the delegates.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

I pointed out the fact that the resolution is so broad as to enlarge tremendously what have been heretofore legitimate governmental functions. The Supreme Judicial Court of this State, when answering the question whether it was lawful for the Legislature to provide for the dealing in coal and wood by the different municipalities, said that one of the leading purposes of the Constitution of Massachusetts was to protect business men, private individuals, in the exercise of their legitimate calling, — was to protect them in conducting such kinds of business as ordinarily had been conducted by private enterprise when the Constitution was adopted.

Let me read the exact words which the court used:

The object of the Constitution was to protect individuals in their rights to carry on the customary business of life, rather than to authorize the Commonwealth or the municipalities to undertake what had usually been left to the private enterprise of individuals.

Now, it is proposed to open wide the gate and to give the Legislature the power to authorize the Commonwealth and the municipalities to enter into competition with private enterprise so far as the necessaries of life are concerned. But, mind you, the term "necessaries of life" means, in this day, at least, practically everything that is sold in the grocery store or in the dry-goods store; and, I think I may add, in a boot and shoe store.

Now, I submit that we should be very careful, before adopting any such wide open proposition as this, to see that there is some public necessity for it. Past experience in this Commonwealth has not indicated the necessity for any such authority on the part of the municipalities except in the one particular case of fuel, — coal and wood; and in my judgment, in adopting some constitutional provision giving a little more liberty in this general matter, we should not extend it beyond fuel and food-stuffs. We should permit nothing to fall into this category of authorized dealings except those things which are of a nature such that possibly they may become the subject of a monopoly. I think you cannot say that, gentlemen, as to the general necessities of life.

Let me call your attention next to the fact, — it is not perhaps of great significance, but it is some, — that there are very few if any States in the United States which have gone as far as it is proposed to go here. I know that it is rather a dangerous argument to refer to what other States have done or are doing. That argument applied to the judiciary, in order to determine whether it should be appointive or elective, would not operate, as I think, to our advantage. But, still, it is worth while to note briefly what has been done elsewhere.

As far as I can ascertain, gentlemen, the State of Arizona is the only one that contains a broad, wide open provision upon this subject. The Constitution of Arizona contains a provision to the effect that the State and each municipal corporation shall have the right to engage in industrial pursuits. That is the only State, so far as I can find, in this Union, which ever has adopted anything of that sort.

There are several States, like South Carolina, which give the Legislature power to authorize municipalities to sell intoxicating liquor, and under that provision have been enacted so-called dispensary laws. In South Dakota there has been adopted recently by the Legislature an amendment which permits the authorizing of cities and towns and the State, for the purpose of developing the resources and improving the economic facilities of South Dakota, to own and conduct proper business enterprises. I am uncertain whether that has been adopted by the people or not, but I assume that it has been. But, mind you, even there a limitation is put upon the Legislature, in that no money shall be appropriated in furtherance of that purpose except by a two-thirds vote in each branch of the Legislature.

I am informed, though I cannot prove it from the records, that the State of North Dakota has adopted, or is proposing to adopt by submission to the people, a similar amendment; but the power cannot be exercised except by a vote of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I interrupt to gain the opportunity to correct a statement that I inadvertently made yesterday. One of the morning papers confirms my memory that I stated that the fair construction of the last half of the resolution was that the Legislature might authorize the towns to go into the market-garden business. That statement was made in response, as I remember it, to a question asked me concerning the meaning of "like" at the beginning of the fourteenth line. My memory was at fault in that answer. I was stating something which was considered in the committee but not adopted in the committee. I beg now to ask the Convention to note what the real operation of the last sentence is. I shall take only a moment.

The Convention will note that all of those things enumerated are in the nature of marketing or distributing facilities, except that in canneries you have a species of manufacturing process added to the marketing and distributing process. And because of the fact that we feared putting in canneries (which are absolutely necessary in order to enable the collection and preparation, and subsequent proper distribution, of a lot of small fruit and vegetable stuff, — which we hope will be produced in the future in much larger proportions than it has been in the past) might be improperly limited, we inserted the word "producing." The functions of some of the enumerated distribution facilities, — fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries and slaughter-houses, — may fairly be deemed to involve a certain producing function.

Now, the word "like" before the word "means" was intended, as I now remember, in the result of the deliberations of the committee, to limit the activities of the Commonwealth and of the municipalities under that sentence to means of distribution and of merely incidental production, — like the preparation in the cannery, — and not to authorize the Commonwealth or the municipalities to embark generally in production. That was our conclusion; I misstated it yesterday. I thank the gentleman very much for his courtesy in allowing me to correct my error.

Mr. Clapp: I was just showing you that there are probably only three States in the Union at the most where it would be competent for the Legislature under their Constitutions to permit cities and towns to enter into the business under any circumstances of selling dry-goods and groceries, and boots and shoes, and such necessaries of life, in competition with private enterprise. Even in Oklahoma, which is supposed to have about as broad a Constitution as any State in the Union, I doubt whether this thing could be done. That Constitution does authorize cities and towns to engage in those kinds of business which require for their exercise a franchise from the municipal or State authorities. Under that, of course, cities and towns can operate, as they can almost everywhere, public utilities, — railways, electric light plants, and the like, — but a franchise is not required from the cities or the towns to carry on an ordinary commercial business; so I infer that even in Oklahoma it would not be constitutional to permit towns to engage in the sale of commodities in competition with private agencies.

In South Carolina there was adopted recently an amendment authorizing cities to issue bonds for a public market, but an examination of the facts shows that this refers only to the construction of a market-place and does not cover the business of running that market or buying and selling commodities in it.

Now, there may be found in a discussion of this general question by the Supreme Court of Maine something that I think is rather illuminating, as showing what should be the principles to govern in cases of this kind. The Constitution of Maine is very like that of Massachusetts, — at least, so far as this general subject is concerned, — and under it the Supreme Court of that State reached a different conclusion from that to which our own courts came in regard to the constitutionality of a law permitting cities and towns to establish coal yards. The Maine Legislature passed a statute authorizing cities and towns to maintain a permanent wood, coal and fuel yard for the purpose of selling at cost wood, coal and fuel to the inhabitants. That statute the Supreme Court of Maine held to be constitutional. The court summarized in the following fashion the conclusions which were reached by our own Supreme Judicial Court:

1. That it is beyond the power of a municipal corporation to engage in the sale of commodities which are and can be easily conducted by private business concerns in competition with one another, and which can be sufficiently regulated thereby. In this we most heartily concur.

2. That the sale of fuel falls within this class of commodities and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake this form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprises.

"Here," says the Maine court, "we differ." The court then proceeds to lay down two tests which should be applied in determining what is and what is not a proper governmental function in regard to this general question. They say that the first test is whether the subject-matter or commodity is one of public necessity, convenience or welfare. Fuel clearly comes within this category. The second test is the difficulty which individuals have in providing it for themselves. The causes of this difficulty may vary, but if there is a difficulty approaching an impossibility under any circumstances, then the test is met.

The court then proceeds to say that so far as coal is concerned, it is a matter of history, of which the court cannot fail to take cognizance, that there has been great practical difficulty in getting, at times, a sufficient supply of coal, and that that difficulty has resulted in great hardship to the poor people. They say that under modern conditions the mining and transportation and distribution of coal have fallen into such few hands as to bring a real danger of monopolistic control, and that therefore it is proper and reasonable that the Legislature should have the power to pass laws such that in times of great stress or emergency the coal supply may be seized. And, as I have said in what I already have stated to the Convention, I am going to stand for enlarging this category of authorized dealings by putting into it food-stuffs in addition to fuel. But that is as far as I am willing to go.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose the Commonwealth of Massachusetts issues a charter which is so broad that it may acquire a monopoly of a necessary of life. The State issues that charter and men proceed under that charter to acquire and hold these goods. As, for instance, you have at the present time a holding company which holds in charge all of the street railway companies. Now, in the absence of some such provision as is reported by that committee, how will the Legislature propose to deal with property? To what extent may property go in enforcing its demand against the other natural right of a man to live? Where do you draw the line between the two?

Mr. Clapp: It seems to me that there are really a good many questions involved in what the gentleman has just stated. The question which he asked at the beginning of his remarks, as I understood it, was this: Suppose the Legislature should authorize the incorporation of a company with such broad powers that it might monopolize some necessary of life. What would happen? My answer to that question, Mr. President, is that in my opinion such a charter as that under the existing Constitution would not be valid.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman, then,—how does he account for the existence, for instance, of the Massachusetts Electric Companies, which is a holding company and which has a monopoly of a portion of street railway transportation? Why does that come into existence?

Mr. Clapp: I do not understand that the Massachusetts Electric Companies is a monopolistic combination. In the first place, it is not a corporation at all; it is an arrangement under which the owners of the stocks and bonds of sundry street railway companies in Massachusetts have put them together for management in the hands of trustees, who issue, as representing those securities, certificates of interest.

Mr. Brown: Continuing that line,—they issue stock certificates to the extent of $39,000,000 on a basis of $23,000,000 stock of the Bay State Street Railway Company where there is only $7,000,000 of equity, according to their own expert. Now, they proceed to demand of the Commonwealth that $23,000,000 of stock shall be remunerated. Certainly transportation is one of the necessaries of life. Now, wherein can you check that Massachusetts Electric Companies in its demands as owner of the Bay State Street Railway Company's stock?

Mr. Clapp: I do not understand that the Massachusetts Electric Companies have any justification for demanding, or that they do in fact demand, the right to earn a return or dividends upon the aggregate amount of these trustee certificates. According to my information, that is not true. But the companies,—the several companies which together constitute the Massachusetts Electric Companies,—are each and every one of them right under the thumb of the Public Service Commission, or the Board of Gas and Electric Light Commissioners, whichever it may be, and are entitled to earn a fair return upon only the amount which they have invested in their properties. And according to my view, the public interest is scarcely affected by the number of pieces of paper which these trustees issue to represent the stocks and bonds which are in their hands.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I want the gentleman to make a little clearer, if he will, his notions about unconstitutional grants of corporate charters. The delegate from Brockton a moment ago asked him what he would do, or something to that effect, if the charter of a corporation were granted in broad enough terms so that it got practically a monopoly of some of the necessaries of life. I understood the gentleman to reply, in substance, that such a charter would be unconstitutional. Now, I should like to know whether it is unconstitutional under the Constitution of Massachusetts as it now is, as we propose to have it, or unconstitutional under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. Or whether it falls into that beautiful category of unconstitutionality that I found the other day in a decision rendered by the police court judge of Springfield thwarting the recent attempt of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to regulate the jitney traffic,—laying down in broad and general terms that anything in the nature of an ordinance or a statute which was unreasonable was unconstitutional,—which, being interpreted, meant anything that did not appeal to him as reasonable was unconstitutional. Now, I should like to know what the gentleman's views are of the unconstitutionality of a corporation charter which might give what we now have pretty nearly in effect,—an essential monopoly,—for instance, in the ice business in a large part of the Commonwealth, and very easily in contemplation within the entire Commonwealth.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: As a member from Springfield I wish in a slight degree to correct the statements of the gentleman from Brookline. As I recall the facts in Springfield and the judge's decision as it was rendered by him, the legislative authority that was granted to the city councils of the State was to pass certain reasonable ordinances. He found, not that the statute was unconstitutional, but that the ordinance that was passed was not reasonable, which, as I understand it, was his duty. He did not in any way dispute the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature. The reasonableness of the ordinance made under that authority was in question.

Mr. Anderson: I have read the opinion within the past few days,—I am not sure it was not sent me by the member who just spoke. While it is true that in certain parts of that opinion the learned justice of that court did say that he would not hold the statute unconstitutional, it is also true that he laid down flatly in other parts of the opinion that anything that was unreasonable was unconstitutional, and in broad enough terms to put his own opinion of reasonableness as the test of the constitutionality not only of the ordinance but of the statute.

Mr. Clapp: It is difficult for me to see what bearing upon this question under discussion any decision made by the police court of Springfield regarding the jitney ordinance has. It is very likely true that he would have done better to have sustained that jitney ordinance and to have let the higher court pass upon the question of its unconstitutionality. But, however that may be, it seems to me to have very little bearing upon the subject under discussion.

Now, the gentleman asks the question: What is going to happen if the Legislature charters a corporation so that that corporation, in the exercise of its powers, comes to monopolize the necessaries of life? In the first place, if the charter on its face is so broad as clearly to authorize, or attempt to authorize, the coralling of all of a certain kind of necessaries so as to create a monopoly, I think such charter on its face would be void. That is my contention. But I can see that a corporation might be organized with its powers so stated or so disguised that it would not appear on its face as a corporation purporting to have a monopoly, but as time went on, in the practical conduct of its business, it might come to exercise a monopoly. Well, if it did, the remedy is in the hands of the Legislature. The gentleman from Brookline knows as well as any of us that ever since, I think, the eleventh day of March, 1831, no charter has been granted in Massachusetts which has not been subject to revocation, alteration or repeal by the Legislature.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Lexington if the Legislature has not still the right to pass such a charter as it used to pass before 1831 and has not passed since then.

Mr. Clapp: Theoretically, yes, because the provision against granting a charter without the reserved right of repeal is contained in the Revised Laws and not in the Constitution. But I take it that, as a practical matter, there is just as much danger that the sun shall fall from the Heavens as that the Legislature of Massachusetts will to-day undertake to pass an irrepealable charter. Logically, however, that provision against passing an irrevocable charter should be contained in the Constitution, and for one I am willing to see it transferred to that place. In fact, there is a resolution reported by the committee of which I am a member recommending that that thing be done. It goes a little further than that and deals with another subject-matter at the same time, but it does deal with this specific thing, and I should suppose that the Convention would think it proper to make the suggested transfer.

Mr. Creamer: I should like to ask the delegate from Lexington if he does not think there is as much chance of a Legislature doing wrong in that direction as of a Legislature doing wrong in the direction which he fears it might because of the powers contained in this amendment.

Mr. Clapp: To that question I have no hesitation in saying, no, because I do not think there is. But, mind you, I am in favor of putting this provision about the repeal of charters,—the provision reserving the right of amendment and repeal,—into the Constitution itself. That is where it ought to be.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I now want to ask the gentleman: What will you do in the case of a foreign corporation which gets its charter in another State and then comes into Massachusetts and operates? You cannot take that property and you cannot take their charter away. What would you do?

Mr. Clapp: I should like to ask the gentleman from Brockton to make a little more specific the danger which he apprehends. I do not comprehend it myself.

Mr. Brown: I want to call his attention to the age of specialization, to the age of having control of the various things centralized. For instance, the company that is absorbing all of the drug stores, the company that is absorbing all of the tobacco business; there are associations which find the means whereby they can continually capitalize and absorb. Massachusetts is a very fertile field. How would you deal with the situation?

Mr. Clapp: The Legislature does not need for its protection the power to set up an opposition business. It is perfectly true, as the gentleman suggests, that this is the day of big business, and probably will continue to be such; but big business seems to be having a harder and harder time of it under the restrictions which are being imposed by Congress and the State legislatures, and for one I do not have any apprehension of any harmful results.

But coming to a little more specific answer to his questions, we all know, or should know, that the Legislature can prescribe whatever conditions it sees fit upon foreign corporations coming into this State. It can exclude them altogether or it can say that no foreign corporation shall come into this State unless it shall do thus and so. Why, the power to deal with and restrict foreign corporations is as ample as anything possibly could be. I want to say, Mr. President, that he (Mr. Brown) may understand it, that I am not here holding any brief for the foreign corporations or for the Massachusetts Electric Companies, or for any of the combinations or corporations to which he has referred.

Mr. Brown: The point is this: Not that we could control that corporation, but we cannot take their property. Unless the State has the right to set in operation a counter proposition, what can be done? Competition cannot inaugurate itself. The power back of these monopolistic corporations controls the sinews whereby you finance any corporation.

Mr. Clapp: I do not know as I can say anything more than merely repeat what I have said, namely, that personally I see no danger to the public interest through the operations of foreign corporations in this Commonwealth. And I should like to answer the gentleman's question further by asking him if he can point out any foreign corporation operating in Massachusetts to-day which seems to him on the point of controlling or monopolizing any commodity which is of importance to the public.

Mr. Brown: If he yields to me, I can say, yes, I see it in the drug store business for one. I might name others. The combination can absorb and is absorbing anything that enters into competition with it.

Mr. Clapp: As I say, I cannot add anything beyond saying that in my judgment the Legislature and the courts in Massachusetts to-day have abundant power to check and curb any approach which they may observe toward monopoly in the conduct of any business,—I do not care what it is.

There is just one thing further that I want to say, and then my contribution to this discussion will have been finished, for the present at least. When this question was before the Maine Supreme Court those who were seeking to get the court to deny the constitutional power for cities and towns to deal even in fuel, put up the argument that if that were allowed there would be nothing to prevent the Legislature from authorizing the municipalities to enter into other fields of industry. But the court said that that did not follow. It said:

The answer has already been indicated in the two tests which we have laid down. If it is asked why, if a city can establish a municipal fuel yard, it may not enter upon any kind of commercial business, carry on a grocery store or a meat market or a bakery, the answer is as has already been indicated. Such kinds of business do not measure up to either of the accepted tests. When we speak of fuel, we are dealing not with ordinary articles of merchandise for which there may be many substitutes but with an indispensable necessity of life.

And, as I have said, I am willing to put in food-stuffs, so that we might say in trying to elaborate a rule:

When we speak of fuel or of food-stuffs, we are dealing not with ordinary articles of merchandise for which there may be many substitutes, but with indispensable necessities of life; and more than that, the commodities mentioned are admittedly under present economic conditions regulated by competition in the ordinary channels of private business enterprise.

Now, gentlemen, listen to this concluding remark by the Supreme Court of Maine, which I think embodies a wealth of sound economic principle, and something that should guide us and be of compelling force in making us decide to draw the line where I ask you to draw it:

The principle that municipalities can neither invade private liberty nor encroach upon the field of private enterprise should be strictly maintained, as it is one of the main foundations of our prosperity and success.

Mr. Brackett of Arlington: As one of the original resolutions which were referred to the committee on Public Affairs, and upon which it reported the resolution before us, was introduced by me, and as it contains one provision which the pending proposition does not, and in some other respects differs in phraseology, I ask your indulgence for a moment while I read that original resolution. It is as follows:

The General Court shall have power, whenever it deems it important for the welfare of the people, and upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, to authorize the Governor, with the consent of the Council, to take by purchase or otherwise, in the name and behalf of the Commonwealth, food-stuffs, fuel and other necessaries of life, and to sell the same to the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, and to the towns and cities thereof, and to authorize such towns and cities to buy such necessaries of life for sale to their inhabitants.

It also contains this proviso:

Provided, that a just and reasonable compensation for all property so taken shall be made to the owners thereof.

That clause is not in the pending resolution. The gentleman from Brookline said yesterday he did not think it was necessary. That may be, but where there are two ways of proceeding and one way is certain while the other may involve a question, it is better to avoid the question and make everything plain and definite. Therefore I propose to move an amendment by inserting those lines in the pending resolution.

It was not my purpose in introducing this resolution to authorize the Commonwealth, or the cities or towns thereof, to enter into commercial transactions generally. My object was simply to apply to food-stuffs and fuel, and other necessaries of life, the principle of the law of eminent domain. You know that, under that law, if, for example, a railroad is to be built, and if a person whose land is necessary, which lies, perhaps, across the route which the road is to take, refuses to sell it, under the power of eminent domain the corporation can take that property,—it may be his home, around which cluster his dearest associations. The corporation can take it, but of course it must pay him therefor a just and reasonable compensation.

I believe that at the present time that principle should be applied to the matter of food-stuffs and fuel, and perhaps other necessaries, although those were the two principal ones which I had in view in introducing the resolution. Here we are to-day in the midst of a great war with a scarcity of food, not only in this country but all over the world, and at this time speculators are getting control of the food-stuffs and the fuel of the country and holding them for their own enrichment at the expense of the public.

This is a time when the strong hand of the government should intervene for the protection of the people against extortion. One of the objects of government is to protect the people,—protect them against burglary and highway robbery, larceny and other crimes. It is also the duty of the government in exceptional times like these to protect the people against extortion, against robbery of that nature. And I believe here is one means of doing it,—by passing this resolution.

There is no conflict between this proposition and the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court which has been cited. That decision simply stated what could not be done under the existing Constitution. That is no reason why we should not change that Constitution. We are here for the purpose of considering whether in certain respects the Constitution should not be so changed as to allow the government to do those things which the court has held they cannot do under the existing Constitution.

The Legislature already has acted in this direction. The last act passed by the last Legislature contained these provisions in section 6:

Whenever the Governor shall believe it necessary or expedient for the purpose of better securing the public safety or the defence or welfare of the Commonwealth, he may with the approval of the Council take possession: (a) Of any land or buildings, machinery or equipment. (b) Of any horses, vehicles, motor-vehicles, aeroplanes, ships, boats, or any other means of conveyance, rolling-stock or steam or electric railroads or of street railways. (c) Of any cattle, poultry and any provisions for man or beast, and any fuel, gasoline or other means of propulsion which may be necessary or convenient for the use of the military or naval forces of the Commonwealth or of the United States, or for the better protection or welfare of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants. He may use and employ all property so taken possession of for the service of the Commonwealth or of the United States, for such times and in such manner as he shall deem for the interests of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants, and may in particular, when in his opinion the public exigency so requires, sell or distribute gratuitously to or among any or all of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth anything taken under clause (c) of this section and may fix minimum and maximum prices therefor. He shall, with the approval of the Council, award reasonable compensation to the owners of any property of which he may take possession under the provisions of this section and for its use, and for any injury thereto or destruction thereof caused by such use.

Now, under the decisions which have been cited I doubt very much whether, if a case under that statute should go to the Supreme Judicial Court, it would be held that the Legislature had the constitutional authority to pass such an act. Therefore, I believe it is time that we should settle this question, that we should give the Legislature the power to act in an emergency like this for the protection of the people.

As far as I am concerned, I am not particular whether the general phrase "and other necessaries of life" is in the provision or not, but what I am particularly interested in is that the Legislature shall have authority to empower the Governor and Council to take property when it is being hoarded by monopolies, when the people are asking for it, not as a charity, but asking for the right to buy it and pay for it a reasonable price. I believe that the Legislature should have the authority to give that power.

We must remember, as the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) said yesterday, that we are not legislating here; we are simply giving an authority. We do not know that the Legislature ever will exercise that authority. Even if it should empower the Governor and Council to take the action referred to, it may not follow that the Governor and Council would deem it wise to do so. I think we can rest upon the assumption that this authority will not be given by the Legislature, or if given will not be exercised by the Governor and Council, unless there is some great emergency which requires it.

Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "ice," in line 9, the words ", provided that a just and reasonable compensation for all property so taken shall be paid to the owners thereof."

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I am speaking, Mr. President, for myself and one or two members of the committee with whom I have talked, but not speaking for the whole committee, because we have had no opportunity to consider it. If there is any feeling in this Convention that there is a reasonably arguable doubt of the obligation to pay for property so taken, we should be willing to agree to the insertion of language which would remove that doubt. My own view is that when you insert in line 5, after the word "life," the words "paying reasonable compensation therefor," you certainly have gone to the limit in making it clear that this is an eminent domain power and not a police power referred to in this resolution.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I have had the honor to offer an amendment to this resolution,—not because I think that it is necessary, absolutely, to have such a provision as I suggest passed at this moment of time. If this provision is suggested by my friend, the chairman, only as a stop-gap for this winter, I have no objection to withdrawing my amendment. But if he suggested it as a permanent settlement of this great question, I must protest. I do not believe it is possible for us to reach any conclusion of this question upon any such very scanty change in our fundamental law as this. I submit, Mr. President, that it is only necessary for any reasonable man to look back over the history of the last generation to be convinced that it is necessary for us,—if we propose to hold together as a country and if we propose to hold a place in the competition of the world,—that it is necessary for us to make very radical changes in our system of government. And as we are a part of the whole community of the United States, it is necessary for us to take a stand which will be sufficient for us in the end. We must look forward, that is, for a certain length of time. All our legislation hitherto has been piecemeal, it has been fragmentary, and it has been insufficient. It is only necessary for us to look back a few years to see how perfectly futile the action of the nations has been in this emergency.

A few years ago, in the years 1906 and 1907, Great Britain undertook to reorganize its army after the Boer War, and Field Marshal
Roberts, then in the House of Lords, protested against the measures which the government proposed to take as being absolutely insufficient, and as necessarily conducting the Nation toward difficulties with foreign countries. Field Marshal Roberts was laughed at. And within a few years Field Marshal Roberts saw his country absolutely defeated for the reasons that he then pointed out, and which any man who wants to understand this issue can read for himself in Hansard, in some of the very ablest speeches which have been made in England in the last half century, and which were treated as ridiculous by both parties.

But not to stop with Roberts. We can go back a generation to an able man than Roberts,—Prince Bismarck. Seventeen years after the French War and French peace, Bismarck became aware of this tendency, this irresistible tendency, this tendency which we must all face,—the tendency which he called State socialism; that is to say, the tendency towards collective action. He, being an intelligent man, got hold of the ablest man who represented that kind of opinion in Germany,—Ferdinand Lassalle,—and had conversations with him on this subject. Lassalle presented his views and Bismarck afterwards in the Reichstag told his audience: "Yes, we have got State socialism, and you have got to have more;" and they had it; and it is on that system Germany has lived during this war, and nothing but that has saved Germany.

Now, Mr. President, it is well for us in the face of these examples to recognize the fact that the world,—the whole world,—is going through one of those tremendous catastrophes which occur about once in a century. The last one began in 1754 when General Washington fired the first shot at Great Meadows. It ended in 1815 at Waterloo. That is sixty years, and the chances are that it will be at least thirty years before we see another settled peace. The gentlemen may smile, but that is the fact, and if you go back another hundred years you will find conditions still worse. Those conditions began the same with us as when they began the Thirty Years' War in Germany which ended more than a half century after.

We, if we are sane men and are sent here to do our work as sane men, as patriotic men, must recognize that, as a Nation, we have got to go under, or we have got to give up and abandon this selfish principle of individualism, this talk that I have heard here ever since the beginning: "Oh, the public good must give way to private interest." Unless we are patriotic enough, and unless we are clear-sighted enough to be able to understand that we are part of a community, and that as part of this community we have got to yield our private interests to the public interests, we cannot survive as a Nation. [Applause.] That is what I believe, Mr. President.

Mr. Chase of Lynn: I hesitate to rise in opposition to this measure, as I realize with all of you that something should be done to curb the speculation in food, fuel and the necessities of life. I have four reasons for opposing this measure, and I will state them very briefly.

In the first place the proposed remedy does not cure the disease, nor relieve the situation except in a slight degree. I think we all agree that, in a large measure, the fuel supply is in the hands of very wealthy interests who control the output and also the price of this great commodity. Then again the food supplies, including wheat, grain, meats, poultry, eggs and dairy products, are controlled largely by certain wealthy combinations of capital, well known to all of us, who with their great aggregation of money and credit are able to purchase the great bulk of these products from the farmer or producer, thereby fixing the prices of these things for the entire country.

While it is true that the law of supply and demand in a measure causes the fluctuation in the prices of these necessities, and that the world war has caused a food demand almost greater than the supply, yet it also is true that selfishness and greed have been much in evidence, and that the prices and profits upon these commodities have soared far above a reasonable and just return for the efforts and investments of the business world.

In a conversation with a gentleman who was interested in a large packing-house business of this State, I was told that the firm with which he was connected did $643,000,000 worth of business last year. I do not know what the profit on this business was, but only cite this to show the power of great aggregations of capital.

Now, Mr. President, while this measure before us would permit cities and towns to engage in business, it does not in any way provide a means for the purchase of these commodities from any other source than that which, as I have stated, either directly or indirectly controls the price of these commodities. Hence the remedy does not cure the disease.

In the second place, this legislation would strike a blow at, and oftentimes would put out of business, many small merchants who I believe are having at this time the hardest struggle of their lives to keep themselves from insolvency. The class of merchants who employ labor are met with increased labor costs, including liability and compensation insurance, which is no small item with a man employing many hands. If he has horses to feed I have only to ask you to compare the cost of grain to-day with that of a few years ago to see the added burden here imposed. In fact, everything which enters into the conduct of his business has gone up in the same proportion.

Now, then, with the commodity in which he deals jumping up all the time, as the prices are increased to him by the people who control these products, where is the hope for the small business man? He is like the grain between the millstones, being ground to powder.

In the third place, as some one already has stated, I do not believe a municipality can carry on a business as cheaply as an individual or firm. With the incentive for profit taken away, the management becomes slack and negligent, work is not kept up to a rush standard, and the profit soon becomes a loss, which is made up by an increased tax placed upon the citizens to carry on the business of the municipality.

In the fourth place, it destroys individual rights and takes us a long step toward the goal of socialism, which, whether we believe in it or not, is surely coming unless some means are taken to relieve the burden which all classes, except the very rich, are beginning to feel is more than they can bear. I am not a socialist, and yet I believe at the present time there is no relief for us except by some of the measures which they have been advocating for years.

Some one has said that this measure is a socialistic one, and so it is; but it does not strike at the root of the matter. The only hope of relief so far as the food and fuel situation is concerned lies in the National government.
Now, Mr. President, as I have attempted to show that this measure is not a remedy for existing evils, I should like to express a thought of a constructive nature that has occurred to me in connection with this matter, which possibly might lead to further development by some members of this Convention. Our President and Congress have passed laws by which about two million of our young men have been asked to give their services, and possibly their lives, to our flag and country, in the interest of a world-wide democracy. Congress also has appropriated millions and billions for the support of our army and navy, and for loans to the allies in assisting them to carry on this war.

This money is raised by bond issues and taxes, which either directly or indirectly the people must pay. In the meantime although the farms of our country are yielding the greatest harvests of wheat, grains and food supplies we ever have known, yet our people are burdened with an excessive and oppressive cost of bread, meat and fuel which makes a situation which is almost unbearable.

I ask, Mr. President and delegates, if Congress, with the right and power to take our sons for the army and navy, and the right and power to raise billions by taxation for the support of these institutions, has not also the right to appropriate money raised by taxation for the purchase of the entire wheat and grain crops, together with all other food and fuel supplies of this country, fixing a price upon such goods as will give a fair profit to the producer, and also to sell the same to the people of this country through the regular channels of trade, fixing the prices of such articles in such a way as will insure a fair margin of profit for the handling of these goods for the government, and by this action relieving the already too heavy burden of our country and of the world.

I believe that this Convention, as a representative body of the whole people of Massachusetts, should send a resolution to Congress demanding relief from our burdens through some such measure as this; and if by listening to the voice of Massachusetts, Congress should pass such laws as would cause greed and avarice to hide their heads, and the people of this country to cease their worship of Mammon and turn to the God of our fathers in this hour of the world's greatest calamity, this Convention, even though not a single measure was passed, would not have met in vain.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I should like to ask the gentleman who has just spoken if he has heard that Congress, without the assistance of a Constitutional Convention, has enacted a food bill which has gone beyond the limits of anything ever conceived in any Anglo-Saxon country until the past three years; that the United States is now the largest trading corporation the world ever has seen; and whether he thinks it is consistent for us here in Massachusetts to limit ourselves to wordy appeals to the God of our fathers and to Congress, when Congress already has done that.

Mr. Chase: I do know that Mr. Hoover is doing excellent work along these lines, but I do believe that something further could be done, and I believe that the price of wheat, which was fixed at $2.20, which makes flour $14 or $15 a barrel, could be lowered still more.

Mr. Powers of Newton: The gentleman from Lynn who has just made some remarks states that he is not a socialist. Almost everybody in the last few years has been attempting to side-track that word socialism. You read in the newspapers that some socialist was arrested for talking on the common the other night. So the impression has gone out that there is no distinction between a socialist and an anarchist. Why, the fact is that we are all socialists. The only distinction is in degree. Every Nation in the world has adopted more or less socialism. And every Commonwealth has adopted more or less of socialism. Massachusetts has adopted perhaps quite as much socialism as any State in the Union. You take our great educational system, which provides for the education of the children and provides also for compulsory education during certain years. What is that but socialism? Take our great system of roads or highways by which the people are permitted to mingle with each other, to go back and forth from one end of the State to the other. What is that but socialism? Nearly every city and town in the State is providing its inhabitants to-day with water for domestic purposes. That, of course, is socialism. Many of the cities and towns are providing their inhabitants with gas and electricity for the purpose of lighting and heating and cooking. That, of course, is socialism.

So we are all socialists. The question is, how far shall we carry this principle of socialism? Some gentlemen choose to call it collectivism, in distinction to individualism. That is, all get together as a collective whole and furnish the service which otherwise is furnished by the individuals.

Now, you may take this question, for instance, as contained in this measure allowing cities and towns, and the Commonwealth also, to provide coal and wood for their inhabitants. To-day cities and towns are permitted to furnish gas and electricity for the purpose of lighting, and also for cooking, and to some extent for heating. Now, it is not a long step to say that cities and towns may furnish their inhabitants with coal and wood for the purpose of heating and cooking.

And I want to say one word this morning upon this question of coal. We live in a latitude where we have to heat our houses from eight to nine months every year. Coal is the great fuel used for cooking and heating in most homes in the Commonwealth. This State makes use of about 7,000,000 tons of anthracite coal for domestic purposes a year. With the prevailing price that amounts to about $70,000,000 annually which our people pay. If you divide that up per capita,—that is, I mean, to every man, woman and child in the State,—we contribute for coal which we use in our homes on the average $20 per capita. In a family of six that means a contribution of $120 per year. Now, that is a very large sum of money. Yet if we were permitted as individuals to buy our coal of the miner direct, paying to the miner the same price that the coal operator pays, paying all of the carrying charges and the expense of delivering the coal at the home, we could put coal into our houses at the present time at $6 per ton. And yet we pay $4 more,—$10 per ton. Now, where does that $4 profit go to? If we could save $4 per ton the Commonwealth of Massachusetts would save about $28,000,000 a year.

Now, who gets that profit? No one claims that the retail dealer gets that profit. The retail dealer cannot buy of the miner. Neither can the wholesale dealer buy of the miner. The process by which coal reaches your home is something like this: You go to your retail dealer and you say: "I want ten tons of coal." He goes to what is called a wholesale dealer in Boston, or some center of population, and he orders the coal. That wholesale dealer does not buy of the miner, but he orders the coal of an operator, possibly in Albany. The operator at Albany does not buy of the miner, but he orders the coal of an operator in Philadelphia, and the Philadelphia operator does not buy directly from the miner, but he buys of some operator up in Pennsylvania, and that operator up there has taken the entire output from the mine. So that it passes through each one of those operators, each getting his share of the profit out of it, before it reaches the wholesaler. Therefore you have the three profits that go to the operators, the profit that goes to the wholesaler, and the profit that goes to the retailer.

I want to give you some figures which came to my attention only recently on the cost of coal. It came in the nature of evidence where there was a coal controversy in which the question of the cost of coal had to be determined. I find at the present time that the cost of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania, free-on-board cars, averages $3.20 per ton. The freight rate from the Pennsylvania coal mine to Boston amounts to $2.55 a ton. Pennsylvania exacts what is called a State tax of eight cents a ton, which makes the total cost of the delivery of a ton of coal,—that is a long ton of coal, 2,240 pounds,—in Boston, $5.83. Now, that $5.83 pays the miner, it pays for the tax, it pays the rail rate and is delivered in Boston, 2,240 pounds of coal, for $5.83. You have to take off from that, of course, in order to reduce it to the 2,000 pounds, a trifle over one-tenth, which brings the price of coal in Boston at about $5.20. Now, the cost of delivering coal, as I ascertained, from the railroad station to the house, is about seventy-five cents. That brings your coal,—the actual cost of your coal to the consumer,—in paying all these prices without profit, at $6 a ton at the present time.

I was talking only yesterday with a banker who told me that he saw not long ago a bill-of-lading of a car-load of coal shipped from the mines in Pennsylvania to one of the stations in Massachusetts which had changed ownership five times between the mine and this place to which it was shipped. In other words, it had been traded on from point to point, and of course the bill-of-lading carried with it the title in the car-load of coal.

Now, one of the propositions contained in this resolution which is under discussion here is that cities and towns may go into the business of dealing in coal and wood. I can see no objection to it. The question really for us to decide is what limitation, if any, we shall place upon legislative authority in dealing with this proposition. I fully agree with the suggestion made this morning by the gentleman from Arlington, that there ought to be a provision for just compensation to those who are in the coal business for their yards and for their apparatus, whatever has to be taken over, and I should assume that the Legislature would provide that even if the Constitution did not specify it. I think it should specify it in the resolution.

Now, take this question of wood and you have the same proposition that you have in the coal business. The retail dealer does not buy wood of the man who cuts the wood in the forest; he buys it of what is called a contractor.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: How much does the retail coal dealer pay for his coal from the wholesaler? A man doing a retail coal business who buys the coal from the wholesaler, — how much does he have to pay him for his coal per ton?

Mr. Powers: I do not know how much profit the retail dealer makes, but I am satisfied of this: The retail dealer does not make an unreasonable profit. I am satisfied that the retail dealer's profit is a limited profit and no larger than he should receive. If the retail dealer could deal directly with the miner, then he could make a larger profit than he makes to-day and we could receive our coal for at least three or four dollars less than we are paying at the present time.

I said to a coal dealer the other day: "I should like to buy a car-load of coal and have it shipped to my home town of Newton and I will pay for it in advance if you wish to have me do it; and I should also like to arrange to purchase a certain number of car-loads for my neighbors." "Why," he replied, "you can't do anything of that kind; that isn't the custom." He said: "I can't buy of the miner, although I am a wholesale dealer. You must buy of your retail dealer."

In other words, the system is set up in such a way that we must buy of the retail dealer, the retail dealer must buy of the wholesale dealer and the wholesale dealer must buy of one operator who buys of another operator, who in turn buys of the miner.

Now the result is all those middlemen who take their profits. And that is not the worst feature of it. The operator is always strong enough to hold back coal and create a scarcity and force up the price. I have been amazed that Congress would permit a situation of this kind to exist in all these years. You remember in the old days the railroads owned the mines and they shipped the coal, and somebody said: "It is not right that a company chartered as a transportation company should be permitted to carry on a coal business." And so they stepped in and prohibited the railroads from owning coal mines and bringing it directly to points of consumption. What was the effect of that? The effect of that was that the railroads went out of the business, and then the middlemen came in between the miner and the consumer.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: Is the gentleman quite correct in that last statement? Has he not overlooked or forgotten that there is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States and ordered this past winter for reargument the question of continuous control, indirectly perhaps but nevertheless effectual, by the railroads of substantially the entire anthracite output? Now that I am on my feet I should like to ask him if he will also give to the Convention some data relative to bituminous coal, our sufferings from the high price of which in the whole Commonwealth and in all New England during the past winter probably have been greater because bituminous coal has gone up far more in proportion to old prices than has anthracite.

Mr. Powers: I do not claim to know very much about what the present administration is doing, and I always have to go to my friend from Brookline to find out what we may expect in the way of legislation. I will agree, however, that the present administration is legislating on the question of food, because I am forced every time that I dine at home to take my food according to the direction of the food dictator, and the only time I have any freedom is during the lunch hour when I am in town.

Mr. Cusick of Boston: Is it not true that these facts which you have just detailed here have been placed before the Federal Trade Commission in extenso, that all those details have been gone into by the Federal Trade Commission and that they have made a report?

Mr. Powers: I did not bring out these facts for the sake of criticizing the administration in any way. I brought them out rather in support of the proposition that is now before us, showing that there exists to-day an evil that ought not to exist, and for the purpose also of showing that if the Commonwealth went into this business collectively the Commonwealth probably could bring about Federal legislation, whatever Federal legislation may be required, so that we could get rid of certain evils that exist at the present time.

Mr. Cusick: That is the point that I want to bring out. Will you tell us how the Commonwealth in the coal business can overcome the difficulties which you have described when the Federal Trade Commission, a Federal Commission, has been unable as yet to do it?

Mr. Powers: Why, I assume that if the Commonwealth of Massachusetts went into the coal business its standing, so far as Federal legislation is concerned, would be entirely different than the standing of individuals or a corporation.

Mr. Cusick: I am referring to the Federal Trade Commission and not an individual. They have gone into this matter and have been unable to change the conditions. If that is so I ask you what power would the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have more than they have under the present Federal laws?

Mr. Powers: I hope the gentleman from Boston does not intend that this Convention shall understand that Congress cannot remedy the present situation. It is purely a question of the regulation of interstate commerce, and of course Congress can determine how interstate commerce shall be carried on.

Mr. Anderson: I do not know from what the gentleman said whether he has had occasion to consider with care that exceedingly illuminating report by the Federal Trade Commission; but the Convention ought to know, I think, in the light of what seemed to me the misleading questions of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Cusick), that there is one report and I think two very elaborate reports; and that so far from making against the contention of the gentleman from Newton many of the evils pointed out in our present system of distributing coal are found to be due to local causes, probably beyond the easy, perhaps beyond the possible, reach of interstate law. I wanted to make it clear, having had occasion probably to know more about what has been going on in that field than most of the members of the Convention, that the investigations of the Federal government, instead of making against the contention of the gentleman from Newton, make in favor of our doing in our own local field what we can to remedy the troubles and the difficulties from which we have been suffering so obviously. [Applause.]

Mr. Shea of Dalton: In connection with the statement of the United States Attorney (Mr. Anderson) I would say in my own home town of Dalton last winter coal sold for $8.75 a ton, while in the neighboring city of Pittsfield, but five miles distant, coal sold for $10 and $10.50.

Mr. Powers: The gentleman from Brookline, the chairman of the committee, asked me what I had to say concerning bituminous coal.
Of course we all understand that the price of bituminous coal is very high at the present time. That I take to be due largely to the interference with water navigation. Our shipping has been called largely into the war and taken away. It is impossible to get shipping to-day, and about ninety-eight per cent of all bituminous coal that comes to Massachusetts comes by water.

Now it is almost impossible to bring bituminous coal from the fields of West Virginia by rail; that is, the expense is prohibitive. You see, our bituminous coal comes largely from West Virginia. It is shipped from West Virginia down to Norfolk; from Norfolk it is brought around to these coast ports by what is called coastwise commerce and brought into New York and into New London, into Providence, into Boston, into Portsmouth and into Portland and Bangor on the New England coast. Now the taking away of this shipping has interfered with the shipping of bituminous coal. In the case of the hard or anthracite coal, that is mined largely in the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and that is brought by all rail very largely at the present time. Formerly the most of the hard coal that was brought from Pennsylvania to Massachusetts came by water. That is, it was shipped down to the Jersey coast and brought around by boat from the Jersey coast to Boston and to other ports on the New England coast. But the cost of bituminous coal, which is used for commercial purposes, is to-day made very high by the lack of transportation. That, I assume, will be cured at some time when the war is over and we get back our shipping; you will see bituminous coal then, of course, down at its normal price.

I want to say just a word in the matter of wood. We have in New England large quantities of what may be called firewood; that is, of hard wood which is growing on our hills and mountains. It is commencing to be utilized and it always will be utilized when coal is high. The price of wood to-day is almost prohibitive. It costs to-day, if you buy oak for your fireplace and put it into your house, from $15 to $16 per cord, and very poor wood at that.

Now the actual cost of wood,—and by the way, I know something about this matter of wood, because I own a farm up in New Hampshire and I cut my own wood and I bring it down, and I am looking forward some time, Mr. President, to retiring to that farm, where I never will be worried about tax on excess profits; but I find that it costs to cut wood up in New Hampshire two miles and a half from the railroad station and 140 miles from Boston,—to cut the wood, to ship it to the station, to cut it up for the fireplace, to ship it down to Watertown and from Watertown to put it in my house at Newton, it costs just $8 to a cent. That is the actual cost. Now you have got to add to that the value of the wood standing, and that is about a dollar a cord as the market price goes. That is $9. Now there is a difference of $6 between the actual cost and the market price of $15. Somebody makes $6. Well, who makes it? The retailer does not make it. The contractor makes it, because the contractor buys the wood, he sells it to another contractor, and the other contractor sells it to another, and it finally comes to the retailer, and the retailer sells it to the consumer.

Now you have got this whole question of middlemen in this country, and that is what makes this cost of distribution. The large cost of distribution comes by reason of the middlemen, and the question is, what are you going to do with the middlemen?

Mr. UNDERHILL of Somerville: I do not know as I quite clearly caught the gentleman's statement regarding his farm up in New Hampshire, the fact that he cut his own wood and that it cost him seven or eight dollars a cord to get it down here. I do not understand that the gentleman placed his wood or got his wood through a contractor or two or three contractors, but it cost him six or seven or eight dollars a cord to get it down here. Is that so?

Mr. POWERS: I regret that I did not make my statement clear so that my friend from Somerville could understand it. What I stated was that the cost of cutting wood, preparing it for the fireplace, and putting it into the house and bringing it from New Hampshire, was $8 a cord; that what we have to pay for wood is $16 or $17 a cord. If you add to that the cost of the wood standing, it makes the actual cost $9 a cord against which you pay $16 a cord.

Mr. WASHBURN of Worcester: In order to elucidate further this interesting question,—because I, too, am a farmer,—I should like to know if the gentleman cuts and splits the wood himself after it has arrived at its destination? [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS: Do you think that is material to the question that is now before us?

Mr. WASHBURN: This is the first time that I ever have been charged in debate with asking an immaterial question. I know what high value the gentleman places upon his professional time, and I wish to inquire whether he cut up the wood himself; and I will add the further inquiry whether in so doing, in arriving at this conclusion, he charges that labor at his regular professional rates? [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS: I doubt if the gentleman from Worcester has any knowledge as to what I charge my clients. I will say, Mr. President, that I have not charged them anything since the 5th day of June. [Laughter.] I am living at the present time on the bounty of the Commonwealth. I will say, however, to my friend from Worcester that in the old days when he was living in the lap of luxury as a youth, following the hounds up there in Worcester and doing other things such as Worcester men used to do in those old days, I was in the logging-camp cutting logs and splitting wood, and I suppose that I could do it again if I really had to do it. But I remember very well what pleasure I did get out of it in those old days, when we got up in the morning when the stars were shining, went forth to the wood-lot and did not get home till long after the sun went down. And my recollection of that employment is such that it leads me to believe that I get more pleasure at the present time out of playing golf than I could by splitting wood. [Laughter.]

I want to say just one other word, and then I am through. The question that we have to deal with here is how far or to what extent are we going to limit this resolution? Are you going to allow the Legislature to grant to cities and towns authority to do all kinds of business, or are you going to limit this field of socialism? My belief is that cities and towns ought to be limited so far as the exercise of this power is concerned.

Mr. CARR of Hopkinton: I should like to ask the gentleman in what way he differentiates between ice and fuel?
Mr. Powers: I do not know as there is any differentiation between them. It was not my purpose to say that authority should be limited to coal and wood, I do not mean that, or to ice; possibly not to food-stuffs. But I think when you get into the realm of dealing with food-stuffs, with clothing, with manufacturing and all those things, you are asking a town to exercise a function which is going to be very difficult for it to exercise. Some one has said that you safely can trust this whole matter to the Legislature, and that may be so,—although I am rather surprised to find that my friend from Brookline, after what he has said about the Massachusetts Legislature, is willing to trust anything to the Legislature of Massachusetts. It may be that it can be left there safely, leaving the matter to the aroused public opinion as to how far cities and towns ought to be permitted to go into this business of furnishing their inhabitants with the necessities of life. I certainly am favorable to the general proposition, but the question I had in mind was whether it is not our duty to put some limitation upon the exercise of that authority. [Applause.]

Mr. Thompson of Beverly: I should like to ask the last speaker a question before he takes his seat. He appears to have made a study of this proposition and from his remarks I have drawn the conclusion that he has placed the responsibility somewhat upon the middlemen. I should like to ask him if he does not think that the retailers formed a combination among themselves? I want to say, Mr. President, that in my city, the city of Beverly, where the city itself goes out every year to procure coal for the different departments, we cannot get any two coal dealers to bid on the coal or on the wood and one man will not bid against the other; consequently we have only one bid every year to supply the city with coal, and we cannot go into the neighboring cities and get any coal contractor or retailer in those cities to bid against the dealers in my city. I should like to ask him if he does not think the retailers have formed a combination to keep the prices up?

Mr. Powers: I do not think that is true in the coal business. I do not believe it is true in the ice business. It is claimed that in certain lines of business there are combinations to raise the price. I have no opinion upon it.

I should like to say just one word, as the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) has called my attention to the substitute offered here by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). It seems to me that that substitute fairly covers the case and that we should be entirely justified in recommending a resolution that did not go beyond the provisions contained in that substitute.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I regard this measure now before the Convention as of even greater importance than that of the initiative and referendum. In saying this I apologize to the distinguished gentleman in the third division (Mr. Walker of Brookline), who now honors me with his attention. But this measure, as I conceive it, that we are now considering, is framed with a purpose to minister to the welfare of the people of this Commonwealth. It is a subject that should engage the earnest attention of every member of the Convention, because it vitally concerns the welfare of our fellow-men. There is a large variety of opinion, apparently, in the Convention, as to the scope which this measure should finally take. The gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), a member of the committee, speaking yesterday in opposition to its broader interpretation, seemed to be puzzled somewhat as to what might be deemed the necessities or the necesssaries of life. If I understood him correctly he went so far as to say that a collar and a necktie are necessaries of life. I think the gentleman spoke inadvertently, because I believe it to be true that neither of those adjuncts to civilized apparel is a necessity, and I imagine that if this resolution were to become a law it would be difficult for any municipality to establish a steam laundry under its provisions, and it would be a long day before you would find at any meeting of a board of aldermen any consultation as to the best manner of making neckties.

My friend from Brockton in the second division (Mr. Brown) would so extend the power of municipalities as to enable them to indulge in the highly useful, indeed very essential, occupation of rolling pills.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: As I do not quite know myself where I stand on these details I want to inquire how the gentleman has arrived at a conclusion before I got there myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. Washburn: I understood,—and I do not wish to do the gentleman injustice,—but I understood that among other things he objected to the great consolidation which he alleged had been going on among the pharmacists of the State, and I understood that he wished to leave it to the municipalities to enter into that branch of business. Unwittingly, Mr. President, I apparently have done an injustice to the gentleman in the second division, and I withdraw my allegation. [Laughter.]

Speaking now as I always mean to speak,—excepting when I am interrupted by some member of the Convention,—in my most serious vein, I wish to say that the present conditions under which we are living are of a gravity almost without parallel in our history. I of course refer to the high cost of living, to the high cost of the necessaries of life; a condition, Mr. President, which I judge has precipitated this discussion in the Convention and the report of this committee.

This is a subject, sir, in which I have taken a good deal of interest.
I do not wish to minimize its importance. I do not wish to speak generally upon the subject, but, so far as I may, to deal with demonstrated facts.

What has been this increase in the cost of living? It is not necessary to demonstrate it to any householder, because he feels the condition acutely. I am not speaking now in the interests of the well-to-do, but I am speaking of the condition of that great proportion of our fellow-men who labor with their hands unceasingly for a bare existence. We sometimes speak lightly of what we call "prosperous times." What do we mean by "prosperous times"? We mean times when labor is employed and when the laborer goes home every week with his week's pay in his envelope. Ah, my friends, we may like to solace ourselves with the reflection that those are "prosperous times," but the fact remains that even under those conditions the great majority of our fellow-men find it exceedingly difficult to make both ends meet, and when sickness or temporary misfortune overtakes them they soon fall back into a condition of great distress.

Now what does the present high cost of living mean to people in that position of life? I looked over the figures of the Associated Charities in the city of Worcester the other day to ascertain what actually had been the advance in the cost of living. These figures I believe to be accurate. I hope I shall not weary you with details, but what I say has a direct bearing on the question under discussion. In making these comparisons I shall use a fixed ration made up of different kinds of food most often found upon the tables of laboring men. There is a bag of flour, a peck of potatoes, a pound of salt pork, two quarts of beans, a quart of molasses, two pounds of sugar, two pounds of corn meal, a fixed quantity of condensed milk, two pounds of oatmeal, one-quarter of a pound of tea and a fixed quantity of soap. That ration is made up to relieve a family in distress for the period of a week, and what does it cost?

In 1904, thirteen years ago, $1.80.
In September, 1915, $2.36.
In September, 1916, $3.07.
In May, 1917, — and this was the high water mark, — $5.10.
The waters had receded in July a little to $4.69.
In August, 1917, $4.52; and in this present month of September, $4.29.

Comparing the cost of food in this present month with the cost of food in 1904, it means this in figures: That during this month it cost $35.75 to purchase the same quantity of food that in 1904 cost $15. In other words, if the item of food alone were considered, — and I realize that has advanced out of proportion with everything else, — but if the item of food alone were considered a man should receive in wages $35.75 a week now to be as well off as he was in 1904 on a wage of $15 a week.

I do not suggest that this represents the difference in the entire cost of living, because I know that clothing and rent have not comparably advanced with the advance in the price of food. I am stating this question as strongly as I can in order that against this dark background I may throw in bold relief some suggestions of a conservative tendency.

I differ with some of those who have spoken who have objected to conferring upon the municipality the power to deal in food because it may put the grocer out of business. I do not agree with those who would withhold the power to deal in meat from the municipality because it would put the butcher out of business; because if the welfare of the whole people is to be advanced by putting the grocer out of business and the butcher out of business,—out of business they should go. [Applause.] In my opinion that time has not come yet.

Now, Mr. President, in some of these amendments,—I note particularly in the amendment of my distinguished friend from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury),—these words are used. He says in his proposed amendment:

The Legislature, when and so far as in its judgment a public exigency exists—

Ah, my friends, an exigency exists in thousands and thousands of households in what we like to term times of prosperity. And if this power is to be conferred upon our municipalities it should be with the expectation that the municipalities, through their public administration of the sale and distribution of food and fuel, will exercise a continuing function in times of distress.

Now I want to say a word about normal times. No one would contend that these are normal times. God grant that such a time as this never may occur again in the history of the Republic! [Applause.] But in legislating we should have in mind the conditions that ordinarily obtain from one decade to another. No one here believes that any one in this Commonwealth is going to starve or going to freeze. We shall find some method, as we did in the winter of 1914, to feed and warm and clothe every one.

There have been some suggestions made on this floor which I think should be corrected, because it is highly important that we get a true perspective of this whole situation. There is no greater enemy of society than a man who wittingly or unwittingly misrepresents the facts. There is no greater enemy of society than he who, through misrepresentation, would inflame class hatred. In these questions, if in none other, we should be careful to get at the truth.

Now in normal times and not so very long ago there was a great cry raised against what was called the beef trust. They said that the beef trust was imposing upon the people of the country, exercising extortion, and that to the methods of the beef trust was due the advance in the cost of living. I had occasion to give the matter some consideration at that time and I found then what is true now, that as the number of sheep and hogs and cattle had been decreasing by millions the number of people dependent on those products had been increasing by millions, and the natural result was that the price of beef, the price of mutton and the price of pork had advanced.

I was not content with that general conclusion and I made a personal investigation at first-hand, and this was the result:

I ascertained, and I believe from a reliable source, that a steer weighing 1,360 pounds live weight at seven cents a pound, came to $95.20. Here is the result of the sale,—and I am doing this for a purpose. I want to demonstrate if I can that in normal times we are getting the necessities of life at as low a cost as is consistent with their continued production. There are sporadic cases of abuse, there are sporadic cases of extortion, but I believe what I say to be true. I believe that it can be demonstrated, and if it be true it ought to go far toward leading us in viewing these questions to do so with a sounder judgment and perhaps with less heated feelings.

I have started with my steer and I have bought him, and now I am going to sell him. He cost seven cents a pound live weight, — $95.20, — and this is what he sold for: 816 pounds carcass, at 9 cents, $73.44; 80 pounds hide at 13 cents, $10.40; 1 liver, 50 cents; 75 pounds tail at 8 cents, $6; tongue, heart, tail, etc., $1.10; fertilizer material, $1 (I have accounted for everything but the sentiment); total, $92.44, — an apparent loss to the packer of $2.76.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: As the gentleman has the statistics in his hand I wonder if he can find in there who paid for the hay for raising that steer? I do not ask that as a foolish question, but does he discover in the price of that steer that he has figured there is sufficient to remunerate the farmer and give him a profit?

Mr. Washburn: My investigation, no doubt superficial, did not extend to the point which the gentleman raises. I was on the point of apologizing in behalf of the packers for their losing money on this operation. I of course do not mean to say that the packers always lost money. I only mean to suggest that taking one year with another in normal times the selling price is very close to the cost price, sometimes above and sometimes below. It was of course expected in this particular case that this carcass of beef would bring the packer at least ten cents per pound in this market, and in that case it would have shown a gross profit of $5.36; this to cover packing-house expense, freight to New England and selling cost there.

It is my belief that in normal times this reflects pretty accurately the ebb and flow of this particular industry, and every man in business knows that the manufacturer to-day, whether he is manufacturing beef or cotton cloth or woolen or steel, depends upon a large output at a very small margin. There is one of the fundamental rules governing business to-day, and to me it is reassuring to cultivate that belief.

Why, Mr. President, if you were so disposed and the exigencies of the new tax laws should compel you to do it, you can go downtown here in Boston and purchase a shirt and a very good one, for fifty cents. Two and a half yards goes into that shirt in the form of cotton cloth. If the manufacturer, one year with another, can make half a cent a yard on that cloth, he is prosperous, and some misguided man who watches his progress through the street looks at him with envy, perhaps, as a man who has appropriated the whole fifty cents that the shirt cost. I am not, Mr. President, dealing with these matters for the sake of consuming time, but because I believe there is a fundamental truth here that has been too long overlooked, and that in this great inquest upon the laws of the Commonwealth in which we are seeking to remedy evils, we should seek to get a very correct understanding of what they are.

Continuing his argument after the recess, Mr. Washburn said:

When the Convention recessed I had suggested, at too great length, I realize, but as briefly as I could, the great importance of this pending measure. I had illustrated by figures, which I believe to be correct, the conditions of extreme gravity now facing our people in the high prices of food. I had sought to impress upon the Convention what I believe to be a fact, that in normal times, through the leveling effect of competition, our people are securing at reasonable prices all of the fundamental necessities,—food, heat and clothing. I ventured to suggest that in order to get a correct perspective of this question, a more tolerant and a more just view should be had of the great aggregations of corporate wealth.

I shall have a word or two more to say on that subject in a moment; but before doing so I wish to invite your attention to a few more statistics and these relate to the cost of bread. Ah, my friends, how much that simple word suggests to us! A word that we use a hundred times a day, but a word that suggests human suffering, yes, and revolution, on the part of people who are unable to get bread. Now, as touching the cost of bread here are some figures which I believe to be accurate, taken in normal times, which bear out, I think, my suggestion that in such times the people are not being imposed upon.

I have estimated the cost of three hundred and fifty loaves of bread. They are sold at three cents a loaf,—I am speaking now not of the present, but of normal times,—at an aggregate of $10.50, less estimated shrinkage of 10 per cent, $1.05, leaving the net price realized, $9.45.

Showing a gross gain on the 350 loaves of 59 cents. I shall not multiply these statistics.

Mr. DONOVAN of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester if he will give us the date of those statistics.

Mr. WASHBURN: The other day when I was asked a similar question by the distinguished gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) I was at the moment unable to answer it. I am more happily circumstanced to-day, because I can say to the gentleman that these figures, as nearly as I can ascertain, were gathered in 1910,—in what I call normal times, when the Republican Party [laughter] was in control of both branches of the Congress, and Uncle Joe Cannon was Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOVAN: I was wondering if the gentleman had to go back as far as that to find a normal time. I had an idea that possibly he must have skipped the year of the psychological depression to get back to a time when times were normal.

Mr. WASHBURN: The fact that these figures were selected is due largely to the fact that I happened to have them in my possession. But I should not have shrunk from taking figures of a later date, even in that winter of great depression,—1914.
There are some questions here that I propose to deal with rather frankly. It may arouse some remonstrance on the part of some of my friends, but I want to say that we are all of us more or less objects of charity.

If my friend from Brockton (Mr. Brown) should invite me to go down to his town to address some meeting of labor men on the iniquities of the initiative and the referendum [laughter], I know him well enough to realize that I should be his guest from the time I left this chamber until I returned; and when he took me down into the subway, as no doubt he would [laughter], to give me a ride to the depot, who would pay for it?

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Valuing my reputation, would he be more specific as to which subway? [Laughter.]

Mr. Washburn: Well, Mr. President, I assume that my friend is familiar with the nomenclature of the game of golf, and I want to say to him that the subway to which I referred bears no relation whatever to the nineteenth hole. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, who would pay for our ride on the Elevated road? The gentleman from Brockton would pay for part of it; the other part of it would be paid for by the stockholders of the Boston Elevated Railway Company. And to that extent the gentleman from Brockton and I would be the recipients of charity.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: I should like to have the delegate from Worcester explain to this Convention just how there would be any charity for any part of that expense borne by the Boston Elevated Railway Company. [Laughter.]

Mr. Washburn: The gentleman does not credit me even with that slight measure of intelligence which I hope I possess. I was about to analyze this five-cent fare. This is about all I shall have to say on this branch of the subject, but it is something that ought to be said.

The five cents which the gentleman from Brockton would pay for his fare, and the other five cents that he would pay for mine when we start out on this excursion, is divided up about as follows:

<thead>

and, in view of the great advance in prices and wages, there would now be still less available for dividends.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman if anywhere in the analysis of that five cents he finds what portion was paid to represent the eight per cent dividend paid on West End stock which was valued at $92 by the Public Service Commission of 1899? It placed that valuation on the West End stock and allowed the Boston Elevated Railway Company to issue stock at a hundred dollars in exchange for it where the physical value was only $92 on the $100. The same people who were in the West End Road were in the Boston Elevated Railway Company. Do you call it charity, sir, when I am forced to pay something toward such a steal that was perpetrated by our trustees? [Applause.]

Mr. Washburn: I should like to ask the gentleman a question—(Mr. Brown nodded assent)—and then I will answer his. I think that they are equally difficult. Will the gentleman kindly demonstrate to me that the rectilinear elements of the hyperbolic paraboloid divide the directrices proportionally? [Laughter.]

Mr. Brown: I should rather meet the gentleman on the hypothesis of a right-angled triangle. [Laughter.]

Mr. Washburn: The geometrical figure that the gentleman refers to suggests pons asinorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCarthy of Marlborough: I am interested to know whether or not if the gentleman from Brockton should bring the gentleman from Worcester to Brockton in the gentleman from Brockton's automobile of a certain type,—I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester: In what proportion would Henry Ford be the entertainer? [Laughter.]

The President: The Chair will ask the members to confine themselves to the subject under debate.

Mr. Washburn: I am in doubt whether after the observation of the Chair I shall be in order if I answer the question, but I shall so far trespass upon the forbearance of the Chair as to say that if the gentleman from Brockton coupled his invitation with the suggestion that I go there in a Ford car, I would not go. [Laughter.]

I deplore this interruption to the serious thread of my discourse, because I fear that it serves to divert the mind from a very important consideration which I am trying to demonstrate, which is this: That in dealing with these questions we must not lose sight of the facts. And I notice a disposition in certain quarters to ignore absolutely the conditions that now surround the conduct of our great business affairs.

Why, Mr. President, in further illustration I will not shrink from saying a word, too, about the trusts, and I say without hesitation that the conditions of labor under the trust administration of our great corporations is infinitely better than it was before this industrial condition existed.

Why, sir, if you want to draw a picture of labor shackled to the car of capital, make no reference to trusts, but go back with me for fifty years to the individual mill owner in a New England village, who owned the tenements and owned the store and owned the mill; the operatives of that day were chained to the industry as the serfs in Russia were once bound to the soil, and the individual worker of that day was absolutely unable to deal with his employer on terms of equality. The economists used to tell us that if labor cannot find employment, in response to a great economic law, it should migrate to the place where labor can be found. Migrate! Imagine an operative migrating who gets seven or eight dollars a week and has a family of two or three children dependent on him! His employer said in those days: "If you don't like the conditions, go somewhere else." The man had to stay where he was or starve. That is why it is that I have been, and am, in favor of organized labor, so that those conditions could be improved,—as they have been. I have followed these industries, some of them, from the time when they were in that condition up to the present,—when they are part of a great trust organization. I find now hospitals, I find nurses, I find provision made for pensions, I find every physical need and social aspiration of that man ministered to; and the condition of to-day as compared with the condition of fifty years ago is as light compared with darkness. Why do not some of the people who are declaiming in season and out of season about the rights of labor,—which I respect just as much as anyone,—mention some of these facts when they are discussing this question?

Mr. O'Connell of Salem: Does not the condition prevail to-day that the gentleman is picturing as prevailing fifty years ago, in this Commonwealth?

Mr. Washburn: Well, Mr. President, I have been trying to demonstrate that it does not.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I have been reminded by the remarks of the gentleman from Worcester of the statistics that were quoted in this chamber early in the debate upon the initiative and referendum. According to those statistics,—and I have since verified them by seeking the original source, which was the report of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations,—I find, as was quoted at that time, that two per cent of the people of this Nation own and control sixty per cent of the wealth; that sixty-five per cent of the people control five per cent of the wealth. Is that in line with the statements of the gentleman from Worcester, or is it what he is attempting to prove,—is it in line with what he is attempting to prove,—that the conditions at this time, generally speaking, are better than they were fifty years ago?

Mr. Washburn: I am not discussing the question of the distribution of wealth. When I do discuss that question,—as I have on several occasions, particularly when my son is asking for an increase in his allowance [laughter],—I always tell this story: In England many years ago, in a time of great discontent, one of the great Rothschild family received a letter from a man who complained that wealth was not evenly distributed; and he considered that a gross injustice was done him, because while he lived in penury, Baron Rothschild lived in great luxury. This member of the house of Rothschild wrote this man, and said to him: "My dear Sir, I have been greatly impressed with your suggestion, and I am inclined to think that there may be some substantial foundation for what you say. I enclose herewith that portion of my fortune to which you would be entitled if I were to make an even distribution of it among the people to whom you refer." And he enclosed a shilling. [Laughter.]

I have done with these general observations, made with a purpose of concentrating the attention of the Convention upon the importance of this question, upon the peculiar conditions that surround us, and also upon the industrial conditions,—a proper knowledge of which is essential to an understanding of this whole question.

Now, I hope, Mr. President, to be able to vote for this measure in some form. I cannot possibly go with the distinguished gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) in his suggestion that the Legislature have power to authorize the municipalities to engage in all branches of industry. It seems to me that this is going a great way beyond the bounds of prudence.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: May I ask the honorable gentleman from Worcester whether he thinks that England, France, Germany, and Italy run any great danger, or have incurred very great disasters, by having that power which I suggest, lodged in their corporations or in their towns?

Mr. Washburn: I do not feel competent to answer the question which the gentleman has asked. I am considering this measure from the standpoint of a Massachusetts man, and I am considering a measure designed for application to Massachusetts people.

Mr. Adams: May I ask the gentleman to define what social difference there is between Massachusetts and every other community in the world outside of the United States, which prevents Massachusetts from standing on the same competitive basis that other communities stand on?

Mr. Washburn: I think there is a very great difference, and a difference very much in favor of the United States. I believe that under the impetus of individual initiative our labor and our capital are more effective here than in any Nation of the world. And I prefer to leave our people subject to the spur of individual initiative, with the rewards that may be in store for them, rather than to smother them under a network of legislation from which they now are slowly emerging in Great Britain, or under such autocratic control as prevails in Germany. [Applause.]

In order to make it clear just what I mean, I will read the amendment of the gentleman from Quincy:

And the General Court may further authorize the Commonwealth, acting either in its corporate capacity, or through the agency of such municipal or other corporations as it may select or create for the purpose, to organise, conduct or administer such agricultural, commercial, industrial or trading undertakings or enterprises, as the General Court shall declare to be conducive to the public welfare.

If this amendment were to be adopted the Commonwealth might run a department store, a steel mill,—practically everything now open to the individual. My fundamental proposition is that year in and year out the individual, the partnership, the corporation, can carry on any kind of business at less cost than the government of the State or of a city.

Mr. Adams: May I ask whether the Panama Canal, for instance, was found possible to be carried on at less cost by private individuals than by the government?

Mr. Washburn: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Adams: It is a very important question to answer. It is a very important question to answer, Mr. President, because of the question of construction. And if you cannot answer it,—that is the largest construction attempt that we have ever made; it is a crucial test.

Mr. Washburn: I shall state my belief: That the work of digging the Canal probably could have been done under private contract for less than it cost the United States. But I shall not rest there in my reply. I shall suggest to the distinguished gentleman in the first division (Mr. Adams) that there is a great business conducted in this country by private management, and in Europe by the government, and that is the administration of the railroads — .

Mr. Adams: Is the honorable gentleman prepared to prove that the German railways are inferior in their administration to the American railways?
Mr. Washburn: The gentleman did not give me an opportunity to finish my sentence. What I was starting to say was this, that there is a great business, namely, the administration of a railroad, conducted under private management in the United States and under government control abroad, and that the rate of freight per ton per mile is less in the United States than anywhere in the world.

Mr. Adams: I have passed a large part of my life in approaching these questions, and the distance,—the length of the haul,—is the crucial matter in all these things. Taking that into consideration, to the best of my belief the German railways undersell the American railways, taken as a whole.

Mr. Washburn: Unhappily perhaps for mankind, the railway system of Germany may at no distant date become seriously disarranged. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I wish to point out that in Germany when the railroads were constructed land was very costly, and the cost of construction, therefore, was far larger than it was in this country. In this country when the railroad systems were established the government gave to the railroads millions and millions of acres of land free of all cost, and then through the manipulation and securing of quitclaims from settlers, and in one way or another, by fraud, they secured several million more acres. Of course they can afford to do business somewhat cheaper than is the case in Europe, where the railroad pioneers found an old established country, with high-priced land and many other things that made it hard and expensive to introduce the railroad when that was invented.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I should dislike very much to make a point of order. I suppose there is no one here who takes so much pleasure in listening to the gentleman from Worcester as I do,—unless possibly himself [laughter],—but I do submit to the President and to the gentleman from Worcester that as this particular resolution reported by my committee was put,—not by the motion of myself or of my committee,—at the head of the list for the purpose of having it acted on at once, the discussion ought to be limited reasonably to this measure and the matters necessarily involved therein, and that we ought not to undertake to try out the connection of the Panama Canal and the German railroads and the question of wages in 1910, and all those interesting but almost entirely impertinent ramifications of the economic situation that are interesting to us all.

I make that suggestion in entire good faith, and with great respect to the gentleman who has the floor. But it does seem to me that proper deference to the vote of the Convention which put this resolution in its present place requires us to limit ourselves to a discussion of it and the pertinent amendments thereto. [Applause.]

Mr. Washburn: I agree entirely with what the gentleman has said. It has been somewhat imperative for me to recognize quite a number of gentlemen who have desired to ask questions, and a good deal of my time has been spent in that way. But I have held, Mr. President, a very firm grasp upon the last suggestion relating directly to this measure, upon which I shall now firmly seize in the hope that I may earn the commendation of the gentleman in coming very speedily to an end of my discourse. If I refuse to yield the floor from now on, I trust that any distemper thus aroused may be visited upon the shoulders of the gentleman from Brookline, and not upon me. [Laughter.] I shall very speedily finish. I do not know, Mr. President,—I always have been a person known for brevity of speech,—there must be something about the atmosphere of this hall that makes it impossible for a man who has begun to speak ever to stop. [Laughter.]
Coming back to my proposition, which was this: That I had no doubt but what individual and corporate enterprise would permanently carry on these industries at a lower cost than the State or any municipality. I still am of opinion that in times of emergency or distress the people shall be protected against the possibility of extortionate prices and, above all, shall be assured that they shall not be deprived of the necessities of life. It is for that reason, Mr. President, that if this measure,—which does great credit to the committee,—is properly safeguarded and limited, I shall take great pleasure in voting for it.

Mr. President, I apologize,—more humbly than I otherwise might have done, and because of the suggestion of the gentleman from Brookline,—for having sought to hold your attention so long. I promise you that I shall not for a long time to come so seriously trespass upon your patience. [Applause.]

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: The resolution which is now before this Convention is one that strikes to the hearts and into the stomachs of every citizen of this Commonwealth who works for wages. You men, sir, may not know,—perhaps you know, but you do not realize, —what it is for a man with a family to earn, say, for his labor, $10 or rising $12 a week. I am not going to weary you, but I address you men in this Convention, and particularly those who have stood here and felt peeved because some have said that there might be some fault in the Legislature, and they have urged us to trust that Legislature, and then later opposed this resolution which places the power in the hands of that self-same body. They have told us in the last four months that we all owe them credit for the government of this Commonwealth; and then they rise here and tell us that they do not dare to trust this vital thing in that body.

Now, the advocates of the initiative and referendum realize that the Legislature might not respond to the needs of the people, but we realize with that weapon in our hand that if they do not respond the people themselves could do what they saw fit,—to govern them-seves for their health and their happiness.

I do not want to tire this Convention with any philosophy, but it must appear to you that a great change has come over our industry. You must realize that it is not as it was fifty years ago; that the economic condition has changed, and with that change there has come a concentration of wealth into the hands of the few, and a corresponding decrease in the things of earth with the many. Now, this is absolutely true.

And I want to point out to you another phase. The worthy gentleman from Worcester has sought to argue that the working-class were better off than they ever were before. And they are, to a certain extent. But let me tell you, sir, that it is not the system of great corporations and trusts that have made the people of this Commonwealth prosperous. The only prosperity which they have received is what they have brought to themselves through the power of organization.
[Applause.] The gentleman from Worcester also maintained that there was a decrease in the supply of cattle; but he forgot to carry it beyond that point, to say that the trusts, the beef trust, — and he spoke of them, I thought, quite friendly, — he forgot to tell us that they held in their hands the power so that they were the only purchasing power, and that the farmers had to sell at prices they named. Those men also control the grain. It is unprofitable for men to raise cattle, and therefore there is a decrease in the supply. But carried to its logical conclusion, — the people were multiplying and the supply was decreasing, — let me ask you if it is not then the duty of the people to end those conditions and to supply food for the sustenance of all the people of the Commonwealth. That is the attitude that labor takes. It is the attitude, I believe, that every sensible and reasonable man must take, — that the people have a right to live. And I warn you now, — I stand not here as a prophet, but I warn this Convention, that if you do not submit some system in this State, or one that is allowed to go into effect in this country, that will curb the greed and avarice of men which are crowding down and destroying the lives and the happiness of our people, — I warn you now that of the future no man dare speak.

There are two things in society, there are two things in industry, which are the same. Either a thing must be owned publicly or it must be owned privately; there is no common ground. And I stand here and tell you that the government cannot regulate another man’s business; it cannot be done. We are trying it; but we must go on to something else. And I say to you men that if private industry, if the private ownership of things that are necessary to the health and the happiness and the prosperity of our people, — fail to give them health and happiness, — then the private interests of no man or no clique of men should stand in the way of the welfare of the entire people.

Now, if this be true, — and I challenge any man to deny it, — if this be true, my fellow-delegates, let me urge upon you the passage of some such measure.

I want to say to the gentleman and others who have proposed that it was only in time of dire need, of war, or only for one or two years at a time, that under our present system, whereby men are forced to work at wages, — unless they are organized, and not so many are organized, — they are forced to work to live, they receive for wages the lowest price that the employer will give. On the other side we find that the necessities of life are in the private hands; and I say, if this condition exists, where upon the one hand the man is forced to work at wages that are not in conformity with what he needs for health, and the man for whom he works has the power to say: “You work for me or you don’t work at all,” and then upon the other hand we find a body of men under a system which allows them to fix the price as they see fit for their own selfish aggrandizement, — and I want to say that that condition does exist, — I ask you men in all seriousness if under those conditions dire necessity is not always present with the people of this Commonwealth.

It is true, Mr. President, that in times of war or stress it may be more acute, it is true that some special condition may bring it to the front, but it always is there. And it is a disgrace to the Commonwealth, or to any Commonwealth, that the majority of the working-class who work for wages are only two or three weeks from the poorhouse. Let them cease work, let them be sick, and immediately they go into debt,—and they never get out of it. You men know this as well as I do, and it is idle for me to repeat these things.

I do want to say something here along the line that was suggested by the ex-Congressman from Newton (Mr. Powers) when he was asking about coal and somebody thought that local conditions were not a fact. I want to tell you that I know from personal knowledge of a condition that exists in the coal industry. I know of a city,—and I come from that city,—where last winter, and later than last winter, if you called the dealers on the telephone, they asked you if you were a customer, and if you replied that you had not bought any coal, their reply would be: “We can’t sell you any coal.” Not because they did not have it, necessarily, but that was the excuse. And that same man would sell it to somebody else, and that somebody else would put it in bags and sell it to the working people of New Bedford for a cent a pound or more. And then they tell us that private industry does not need regulation, that only under abnormal conditions perhaps are the people in need!

Is it possible that men will stand here and say that the people of this Commonwealth are poor from choice? Will they say that they are extravagant? No, my friends, the trouble runs closer than this. Private business has almost run its length, and even the men in this Convention who apparently see the light do not dare to say whether or not the people of this Commonwealth shall have enough to eat and enough to keep them warm. The people of this Commonwealth do not want charity; they absolutely abhor it, and they accept it only because they have to. They do not want charity; and I want to say to you that one dollar spent in this Commonwealth for a family for the necessities of life, and for fuel, when that man and his family are willing and able to work, is a crime against modern civilization.

Now, you men may think this is wild,—I have been called wild recently upon this floor,—but I tell you it is absolute truth, and I ask this Convention to pass some such measure as this. It is fair to say to the cities and towns of this Commonwealth that they have a right to do it.

I often have wondered, in my wild way, perhaps, what was the difference between water running through a pipe and frozen water. I never yet could see the difference. I never could see if it was right for the city to control its waterworks why it was not just as well for them to sell ice. I have not seen yet why it was not right for them to control their gas and their electricity. But I know the reason why they do not do it, and so do other gentlemen in this Convention. There is a decision,—and I question not its sincerity, and perhaps its keeping with the Constitution,—there was a decision handed down by the Supreme Judicial Court, handed down twice, at the request of the Legislature, regarding the power of the cities and towns to sell fuel to their inhabitants.

There is one significant sentence in that last decision, which every man should realize, and it strikes at the root of the entire question. The Supreme Judicial Court said that it was reasonable to assume, and it was a fact, that if the cities and towns engaged in this business they could do it cheaper and more economically than do the private industries, and therefore it would hurt those who are engaged in those industries. That is the reason why. And, as the gentleman has said, if private industries, the people who deal for their private gain, stand in the way of the welfare of the Commonwealth, they should be abolished and another system put in vogue.

So I trust, sir, that this resolution, in spirit, will be passed. It may be amended to perfect it. I have no fault to find with friendly amendments. But I tell you, my friends, if we are going to send this to the people, send it to them right. Do not hobble it, and do not tie it up so that even its own father would not recognize it; but be fair and be honest, as you would have men be honest with you. Send it to the people, and let them say whether or not they want it.

If any of you men believe that private interests, and the right to obtain money no matter how you get it, are higher than the peace and prosperity of the people of this Commonwealth, then vote against this resolution, or include in it some amendment that will make it inoperative.

One more thought and I have done. It is proposed to limit it to times of war. This to my mind is but a subterfuge, one that would make such a measure as this inoperative. We look to the future in the hope that war never may come again, but, sir, I am sure that after this war there will be those who will desire to make profit out of food, fuel and other necessities of life and these men must be curbed and if their acts be hostile to the public welfare they should be treated, as they are, as enemies of the public. You do not dare to trust the Legislature which you have told us is so wise; but above all, you do not dare to trust the people of this Commonwealth. And I am commencing to believe, as a common, ordinary citizen of the Commonwealth, that they do not dare to trust anybody with any kind of authority which may interfere with profits and interfere with the system that allows profit to be made out of the labor of human beings.

Let me tell you, my friends, that the working-class in this Commonwealth are thinking, and they are realizing that they have a right to coal, that they have a right to food; and they realize that when their children are sick they cannot call a doctor and have to buy a cheap drug in an endeavor to protect the lives of their children. I appeal to you as I never have appealed before, to give to the people of this Commonwealth an opportunity,—an opportunity to protect themselves against extortion and against the greed of a few men that have made in the past, and will make in the future, as no other force has made, for social unrest in this Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Clark of Brockton: It has been with no small degree of pleasure and satisfaction that I have noticed during this somewhat protracted discussion that the members of this Convention who have made remarks in opposition to this resolution invariably have preceded those remarks with uncontrovertible arguments in favor of the proposition. It goes to demonstrate that I was absolutely correct when at an earlier period of this Convention, when I was a younger man by considerable, I stated that I had the fullest confidence in every member in his honesty of purpose, in his sincerity of mind, and this goes to show to-day that I was absolutely correct, because no man here to-day or even in discussing this question at all has launched out to criticize the resolution or to make,—note I do not say arguments against it, but remarks against it,—but has preceded those remarks with argument in favor of it.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Now, Mr. President, I think from the remarks that have been made here to-day that every member of this Convention regards this proposition as one of the major questions presented to the Convention for its consideration, and I want to say right here that from my contact with my constituents I believe that they consider it one of the major questions. In fact, I am warranted in saying that many of my constituents who perhaps might be opposed, and perhaps are opposed, to the initiative and referendum, are in favor of this proposition. Men who I did not suppose would favor it have been to me and said: "Dr. Clark, I hope you will stand for that proposition that gives the State, the cities and the towns an opportunity to protect their people."

Now, in order to simplify this question as much as possible, permit me to state that I believe the resolution may be considered under two propositions. First, does this Convention deem it prudent and expedient to grant the Legislature authority to empower the Commonwealth and any or all of its political subdivisions to engage in any of the activities included in this resolution? And right here let me say that by some, perchance, this may be considered revolutionary, and in fact it has been intimated by some of the speakers that it was in a measure revolutionary. One member of this Convention, now absent, that eagle-eyed, keen-minded man, with a broad comprehensive vision, who usually sits down in the front part of this division, — I refer to the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), — the other day characterized the initiative and referendum as revolutionary. But, gentlemen of this Convention, he ought to know with his breadth of vision, his keenness of intellect, his ability to apprehend and comprehend, he ought to know and does know, if he would admit it, that we already are passing through a revolution in this country, in this Commonwealth. Yes, sir, we are in the midst of a revolution. It has been largely peaceable thus far, but not altogether. It may not continue always as peaceable unless we provide for the storms that threaten and appear, as I remarked the other day, on the western horizon.

Let me refer, gentlemen of this Convention, to some of the revolutionary methods and practices, some of those that characterize this revolution. The time was in my earlier days when I lived on a farm up in northern Vermont and was struggling to get an education that I might attend this Convention, perchance. [Laughter]. The law of supply and demand was an important factor in determining the prices of commodities; it was a large factor. That day has gone by. To-day it is a factor of insignificance, almost. Vast accumulations of wealth in the hands of a very few people have prevented it. When a company of men, a corporation or a single man here in Boston can go into northern Vermont and buy every potato that is for sale there in three or four different counties, cannot he corner the market, cannot he control it? Is there any such thing as supply and demand? He has the means of storing those potatoes and holding them. He bought them last fall at ninety cents to one dollar a bushel, as I told you here in discussing another question. Before those potatoes were removed from the premises on which they were produced those potatoes were sold at two dollars a bushel. As I said to you, sir, when they reached us we paid a little later three dollars and four dollars a bushel.

Now, if supply and demand is not a factor in determining the prices of a commodity, there is another factor that in earlier days entered into this matter. That was competition,—no longer a factor in regulating the prices in the necessities of life. I need not tell the intelligent members of this Convention that the harvest of wheat in the western country is in the hands of a very few men soon after it is harvested, and much of it before it is harvested. I need not tell you that the potato crop of Maine is now in the hands quite largely of a very few men. I need not tell you that the egg product of this country is in the great cold storage plants that are owned by a very few men. Gentlemen of the Convention, the great warehouses, the immense cold storage plants have come and enable the man with the means, with the wealth, a large part of the wealth of this State, to take the necessities of life and hold them and dole them out by the handful, by the quart, as they have been doing the last twelve months.

Let me refer to a single instance right here. I am not going to detain you with many of the details, but I have been told by a person who I believe was reliable, that at one time during the early part of the past summer a friend of his went into a big warehouse in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, not in the western part, and he saw there in that great warehouse piles of sacks piled to the very rafters. He said to his friend there, "What are in those sacks? What do those sacks contain?" "Beans,"—beans, gentlemen! "How many bushels of beans have you?" "Fifty thousand bushels," and there were no beans to be had, scarcely. Why? Why, because the supply was exhausted, there was a shortage. He was asked by this friend what they were holding those beans there for. "For a price." For a price! That is where the screws were put to us. They had us by the throat. We were powerless. We paid it. We bought them by the pint, by the quart. Many of you men could buy them by the bushel or by the half bushel, but many of us had to buy them by the pint. Sometimes we got a quart when we got our week's salary.

Now, I have said that the people want this proposition, and I am pretty thoroughly convinced by what I have heard here that the majority of the members of this Convention propose to give it to them in some form. It is only a question of form. Now, is there any great danger in giving it to them as it has been given to us? If the former proposition,—that is the one I have just been discussing,—be answered in the affirmative, as I believe it will be most emphatically, then we naturally would proceed to determine how broad the latitude of this authority should be. Now, note, gentlemen, that we are not giving to the Commonwealth, to cities and towns authority. We are authorizing the Legislature in its judgment, in its wisdom, in its discretion after deliberation to proceed to describe a method by which the towns and cities, and perhaps the Commonwealth, may engage in this business.

After the Legislature has given this authority then it devolves upon the cities, upon the towns again, before they enter upon this work, to deliberate either by referendum or by the city government, to again study carefully whether it better be done or not, and if so, by what method it shall be done. So, gentlemen, we are not jumping into this matter. We are safeguarding it. It is coming before a body of men after us who perhaps will be as competent as we are to judge of the necessity of it under the conditions that shall then obtain, and then the cities and towns will deliberate upon it again. I think we need have no great fear in adopting this resolution pretty nearly in its present form. I know something of the Legislature. I have had the honor, — and the great honor, — of serving here eight years, and the Legislature always has been considered pretty conservative. In fact I have been criticized more for my conservatism than I have for my radicalism, and so have a large part of the members of the Legislature each year that I have been a member of it. One of the great facts that we meet is that men are taking advantage of their fellow-men beyond all reason. The man who makes the necessity of his fellow-men his opportunity to gratify his cold-blooded, heartless greed by applying his extortionate schemes to take the last cent that he can squeeze from him, in my humble opinion is not a patriotic citizen. It was remarked by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), who was speaking at the time of adjournment, that we were not going to suffer seriously during these times, that no one starved to death or froze to death during the shortage of coal in 1914. If the gentleman had accompanied the physicians of his own city or the physicians of my city to many a sick room that he might have seen, he hardly would have said that. I do not say that they actually froze to death or actually starved to death, but I do say, — and many another physician would bear me witness to this fact, — that there were children and women who went so low through hunger and the want of fuel in their homes that their chances of life when sickness overtook them, their chances for recovery, I should say, were largely decreased, and I think that I was able to point to two or three instances where the lack of food and the lack of heat in the house was the determining factor in causing the death of these people. It is not necessary that a person actually starve to death to die from famishing.

I am not in favor of displacing all our middlemen, nor any very large percentage of them, perhaps. I do not believe in it. I am not a socialist to that extent. The question has been asked: What are we going to do with these little corner grocers when the city takes the matter over? If the city takes the business over or the town takes it over to any extent, it must have men to handle those things. These men, being acquainted with the work, undoubtedly would be selected so far as they were needed. They would not all be needed. Probably fully 33% per cent, and perhaps more than that, of the middlemen are uncalled for and not needed in the distribution system. These men who are displaced would find ample opportunities in the fields of production and in the larger fields of distribution. They would not be out of employment. The fact of it is large numbers of them are idle much of the time and because, — and here is a point worth noting, gentlemen, — because of the large number of fruit stores and little groceries a large amount of our product goes to waste. I asked one of the fruit dealers in my own city a few days ago what percentage of the fruit he had brought into Brockton probably was wasted because of decay; and he said probably 25 per cent or more, and in many of the stores I have made some investigation, not extensively, and I found that a large amount of our fresh vegetables go to waste and are thrown away. There is a large waste, perhaps on the whole at least twenty-five per cent, in all our fresh vegetables and in our fruits.

If this produce were handled judiciously by the cities and towns
so as to make a much less number of markets in which it was to be sold, there would be much less waste along this line.

Now, gentlemen of the Convention, I insure my buildings for what purpose? Not because I purpose to burn them, not because I expect they will burn, not because I want them to burn, but it is an insurance against something that may happen, something that does happen occasionally. I have a lock on my door, if I do live in Brockton where the people are all honest, I have a lock on my door. What for? Because I expect a burglar would enter that house while my family and I are away to-day? No. I have that lock on my door because of a liability, because of a possibility that a burglar might come there. One instance more. I met a gentleman the other day who told me of an instance connected with his father's life. His father was an official who had the care of the town in his hands so far as law-breakers were concerned, and he enforced the law to a greater extent than some officials do to-day, and the law-breaking crowd got down on him. They determined to frighten him from the work. They wrote him anonymous letters saying to him: "You desist from prosecuting so-and-so or we will poison your heifer, we will burn your house," and this thing and that thing. His reply through the press was: "My cattle are insured, my house is insured. Poison and burn if you wish, but I shall do my sworn duty." Insurance amounts to something, and insurance by the passage of this resolution, gentlemen, will do something. It is an insurance against things that are happening, that are going to continue to happen persistently unless we have the insurance. If we pass this measure and have the insurance, do you not think that the middleman has got sense enough to regulate his conduct, to trim his sails, to plan his business so as not to be caught? Yes, gentlemen, I have no fear of the towns and the cities having to go into this business extensively, if we pass it. I would not say it is a club, — I do not like that term, — it is a reminder of insurance. Someone has said that after the war conditions will be normal, all will be serene and happy. Oh, I wish that I could indulge in that thought myself, but I believe that these middlemen, — I am not referring to all the middlemen, large numbers of them are honest and dislike the unfair competition that they are up against, — I believe that these men to whom I have referred as cold-blooded, greedy individuals, having tasted blood will come back after the war, when the United States Government lets up on its regulations. Massachusetts should prepare itself for the conditions that will obtain at that time. I hope that we shall give this matter and two or three other matters to the voters of Massachusetts to be placed on the ballot for next November. They expect it. They will be satisfied with nothing short of it. If we do not do something along this line, better would it have been for this Convention had a millstone been hung around its neck and it had been drowned in the sea of oblivion.

The debate was continued Friday, September 21.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I am in favor of placing the principle in this resolution on the ballot. I wish to make it clear that we are not concerned with the details of what the Legislature may do under this resolution. If we were here to settle all such details, and to consider what emergencies might arise to be settled under this resolution, I confess that I should not be prepared either to give my vote now or perhaps next Wednesday, because I consider it a momentous question. I agree with the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) that it is greater than the initiative and referendum, because it affects the very fabric and the very foundation of the fabric of our government. The question is, shall we enlarge the power of the Legislature to the extent which is reported by the committee? I favor that without any limitation. That the phraseology may be corrected, the committee has so said; that it should be adopted in its fullness is what I advocate.

The question then that comes before us and should concern us, and does concern us, is this: Is the Legislature to be trusted? Is it safe to delegate this extension of power to the Legislature? We should keep in mind that it has been almost an open question in the Supreme Judicial Court whether or not this power is not already in the Legislature. I should contend that it is. I should stand with the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Holmes. I should find it in the large delegation of power incident to the conserving of the common welfare. But the majority of the court has said otherwise,—that the Legislature does not have this power; therefore if we want the Legislature to exercise that power now is our opportunity. If we do not give it to the people at this time it cannot come before them again for at least three years. Who is there here who cannot feel the immensity of what might happen in the course of three years?

Now as to the wisdom of the Legislature. I think the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) missed, either intentionally or otherwise, the point of the question that was raised by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams). He rose to ask, as I understood it, wherein the Legislature of Massachusetts was inferior in mentality to the Parliament of Great Britain, and coupled with that the question as to whether or not the Parliament of Great Britain had used that power wisely. Now, the only difference between our country and that of Great Britain is that we place limitations on our Legislature by a written Constitution. It is true that to that extent we limit the power of our Legislature, but aside from that I should be inclined to agree with Talleyrand, who said that he could not see much of any difference; that the liberties of the English people, like the liberties of the American people, were based on the Magna Carta and trial by jury; that if you could find in the English Constitution something monarchical you could find also something republican and if you could find something republican in the American Constitution so you could find something monarchical. Is there any doubt of the truth of this observation? Does anybody question the power of the executive of this Nation in its absence of any limitations as compared with the limitation that has been placed on executives in monarchies? Are we not face to face with the fact that the Nation, through its President and Congress, is exercising at this time the power which we propose shall be exercised in Massachusetts by the Legislature? In Great Britain, Lloyd George went to the coal mines because there was a difference of opinion on wages between the men and the masters. He looked at their books and he settled the difference, as he thought. But it did not stay settled. Again the men made a demand. Again the Nation was threatened. Again went Lloyd George to hear both sides. The masters refused to show their books. They refused in any way to assist him to settle the trouble. And then what? The Nation acted. The Nation took over the coal mines, because those labor men said, and it is the heart expression of the labor movement in this country to-day: "We don't object so much to our conditions, we don't object to living from hand to mouth, but we do object to the profits of our sacrifice that go to the few. We will work for any wages if it is to sustain this government, but we will not work to enrich the few." We have to-day, gentlemen of this Convention, these conditions in this country. The Legislature will not rush to place before the people some method of going into every kind of business. Nobody is clamoring that the city of Brockton will ask to go into the drug store business, as the gentleman from Worcester suggests. As well might he say that somebody is clamoring that the whole State should go into the business of wheeling a wheelbarrow. He might as well carry it to an absurdity. No one contends that this power is to be used except when there arises a necessity that it shall be used; and the question is: Shall we place that power in the Legislature?

The gentleman from Norwood (Mr. Willett) asked: "Can legislation in any way affect wages?" Is there any question that legislation can affect conditions? Henry Endicott went to Lynn yesterday, and settled a strike condition that has been there since April. It was in the shoe business. And how did he settle it? By prescribing the same working agreement which is used by the greater shoe organization, the International Boot and Shoe Workers. But how comes Henry Endicott to be recognized by both sides? Henry Endicott's shoe manufacturing firm is not under organized labor; it cannot be organized. Why? Because labor organizations cannot give the men any better conditions than they have got now. That corporation has solved the problem. They are giving living conditions; they are giving benefits in case of accident. An operative of whom I know, had received all the benefit on account of a sprained ankle in that establishment to which she was entitled; but she was given two weeks more. Humanitarianism was there, as it is in every attempt of the establishment to bring about better conditions. An operative can get a generous meal there for fifteen cents. He need not disturb his wife in the morning for the dinner-pail. At the factory he will have a better dinner for fifteen cents from that corporation than he probably would have at home. If one firm can do this and meet competition in selling its product who will say that the State cannot create similar conditions?

The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) said that it was very easy to talk in this Convention; he said there seemed to be a sort of an overshadowing influence. Well, why not? The Scripture says: "Where two or three are gathered in My name there will I be in their midst." Are we not gathered in His name when we are dealing with the problem of better government? Is it not an attempt to reproduce Divine government, which is even and exact justice? We are in a transition state, the world is trying to evolve something better. Why not send to the people something which shall awaken their thought?

The gentleman from Haverhill proposes as an amendment,—"except that the State shall not go into the liquor business." I think it is one that the State should go into. The State should take charge of the liquor just as it does take charge of the use of dangerous weapons. It now licenses the sale of liquor. Why not require a license to drink it? Why not have a license system so that a man cannot buy a drink unless he can show his license card?

Corporations organize a part of the collectivity and exercise functions for their own profit; this resolution gives the Legislature the power to place the whole collectivity where it can benefit itself. There is no desire in the labor movement to put this State into a collectivity. The old Populist party, — a labor party, — was not a socialist party; it was distinctly an individualist party. It came into existence as a protest against monopoly. Kansas threw aside her 40,000 Republican majority, threw Senator Ingalls into the discard, and took Peffer out of the editorial den and pushed him into the senatorship. They were then protesting against monopoly. They prophesied what would be the result of the conditions that then prevailed, and their prophesy is fulfilled but it is too late to destroy the collectivity of ownership embodied in these corporations. They are ready now to take over. But there is a vast difference between such action and the collective ownership of all the means of production and distribution. Eugene Debs in 1896 was in St. Louis. The mild-eyed disciple and apostle of grape juice from the Nebraska flats captured the People's party, with a full belief that the Democratic donkey could digest it; and the Democratic donkey has had a great deal of indigestion ever since from trying to assimilate the new thought which the Populist doctrine carried into it. That is the history of that movement, — the passing of the People's party. Debs at that time said: "Now I will found a party that never can be taken over. I will take the collective ownership of all the means of production and distribution." That is socialism, but the labor movement is not in favor of it. A few years ago it would consume at least one or two days of its Convention debating it from the economic standpoint. It has passed out of labor conventions. The socialist movement has not the strength that it once maintained. The men in that movement who did not ever go the whole length are gradually being absorbed into this half-way proposition of attempting to have the State legislate relief in some way.

If you adopt some of the measures that are before this Convention, — I am not going to distinguish between them, — but if you will adopt measures which will allow in some way the elements which are dissatisfied to organize to obtain redress, we shall get things peacefully. The People's party movement of 1890 to 1900 concerned the farmers mostly, the wage-earners a little, the middle-class not at all. The doctor, no. The lawyer, no. The schoolmaster, no. The man with an income, no. It had not come to that point. The absorption of wealth into the hands of the few had not gone far enough to touch the incomes of the lawyers and the incomes of the doctors. The People's party prophesied that in time it would. Now it has reached them. The middle-class is awake. In 1890 I thought monopolistic trusts should be destroyed; in 1917 I see that they are utilized by public control and may pass into public ownership.

This progress, these revolutionary periods that the gentleman from Quincy has spoken of, can be traced readily by students of history. They can trace waves coming and going, hardly showing where the line of one wave mingles with the lines of other waves, but ever and forever the great ocean of thought is surging around men to carry them up into better conditions than what they possess. You may safely trust the people of Massachusetts, and the Legislature, retaining your representative government. There is no escape from the power of evolution. The unwinding across the ocean is a prelude to the unwinding elsewhere. If autocracy is doomed in one place it is doomed everywhere.

I have tried to-day, as I tried the first day I came into this Convention, and on other days that I have spoken, to unify this Convention.

Mr. Lummus of Lynn: This amendment as reported by the committee is one in which I am very much interested. It has been said upon this floor that in time to come the Supreme Judicial Court may have occasion to refer to these debates and to the reports of chairmen of committees as to the interpretation of words that perhaps may have a somewhat undefined meaning, and therefore I feel that it is important in one aspect of this resolution that the chairman of the committee reporting this resolution should define the meaning of one or two words in the resolution. I refer to the words near the close of the resolution "like means of producing." The word "producing" is a word which conceivably might extend to all kinds of manufacture. I have reason to believe that the word as used in this resolution is not intended to put the Commonwealth or its municipalities into the business of manufacturing in any broad sense, and for the purpose of the record, in order that we may be sure what we are voting on, in order that the Supreme Judicial Court in the future may have the means of knowing what we thought we were doing. I should like to have the chairman of the committee reporting this resolution tell us exactly what is intended to be conveyed by the words "like means of producing."

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I am very glad to state,—or restate,—what I think is the view of the committee, certainly my own view, of the proper construction of the last sentence of this proposed resolution. I am looking now at the redrafted form which is on page 2 of this calendar. I may digress to say that the changes in that form are three only. First, we have changed the form so as to cover a statute duly enacted and to avoid the possible inference that this was intended to be exclusively an additional grant to the Legislature and not to cover a statute enacted by initiative and referendum. Second, we have put in, at the suggestion of some gentlemen who thought that "food-stuffs" was not broad enough to cover the obvious necessity of providing feed for cattle,—cattle, producing milk absolutely essential, of course, for the life of children,—by adding after the word "food-stuffs" the word "feed." Third, we have put in, in deference to the view of certain members of the Convention, particularly to the view of the ex-Governor, the delegate from Arlington (Mr. Brackett), the words "paying reasonable compensation therefor." The rest of the section stands as in the original report.

Coming now to the question of the delegate from Lynn, let me say a word as to the significance of the last sentence of this proposed resolution. The power granted therein is in no proper sense a mere emergency power. The emergency power is intended to be given in the first part of the resolution, and ends with the word "therein."
The rest of the resolution is intended to be an addition to the constitutional power of the Legislature to increase the trading functions of the Commonwealth and of the municipalities thereof.

The last sentence deals with the providing of, broadly speaking, distribution facilities. It reads: "The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation [by the Commonwealth, cities and towns, 'any one or all,'] of markets." They already have that power,—"Docks"; they may now do that. "Fuel and coal yards;" they have not that power. "Elevators," doubtful. "Warehouses," arguable but doubtful. "Canners," doubtful. "Slaughter-houses," undoubtedly the power now exists. In other words, we undertook to put all those new devices of distribution, to wit,—fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses and canneries,—into the same category that markets and docks and slaughter-houses always have occupied; means affected by a public use and therefore within the constitutional power of the Legislature to provide. Then we added "and other like means for producing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life."

I come now to the particular question asked by the delegate from Lynn. It is manifest to any careful observer that the metropolitan district is approaching in the supply and distribution of milk, of ice and of coal, perhaps of wood,—the same kind of problems that we faced years ago with relation to water, to gas, to electricity, to sewerage. The purpose of this resolution is to give to the Legislature undoubted power to deal with those problems. Suppose it is found necessary to provide a metropolitan milk distribution company under public regulation, or under State ownership, operation and control; in order to handle milk economically and efficiently you must do something more than merely bring it in and distribute it. As one of the milk contractors described the situation to me at one time: "There comes a period of hot weather in Boston; everybody wants milk; we have to wire to our producing sections to ship all the milk possible to Boston; it comes here and goes into the restaurants, hotels, and homes, meeting the hot weather demands. But the wind shifts to the east and comes in off the ocean; everybody is chilled; there is no demand for milk. We wire our supply agents to hold back the milk and throw it into the creameries." In other words, the manufacture of milk into butter and cheese is an absolutely necessary business incident of the collection and distribution of milk. If you do not put in "manufacturing" or "producing" or some equivalent word you have prevented the distribution.

So in less degree as to wood. If wood comes here in logs of four foot length there would have to be some provision for changing them into kindling and fire-pace length, etc.

So, after careful consideration, the committee reached the conclusion that it would not recommend to the Convention the submission of a resolution which might put the Commonwealth and the municipalities into general manufacturing business; that it would recommend an increase of legislative power, so that these additional distribution facilities, in some or all of which manufacturing or producing may be a minor incident, should be within the legislative power. Such is the view of the committee,—as I understand it,—as to the significance to be attached to the word "producing." It is used in a very limited and narrow sense. "Like means," I may say also, means such facilities as are "like" markets, or docks, or fuel, or coal yards, or elevators, or canneries.

Canneries I might say something about. Canneries have become a very essential part of the business of marketing and distributing a great many of the most desirable but perishable food products. It is highly desirable that there should be a large number of farmers owning their own land, with small capital, in the business of producing fruits and vegetables which should be canned and used to supplement our food supply. That can be done only by having canneries, in proper places, open on proper terms, to people of small means. There is much reason to believe that, with our teeming and increasing city population and our sparse and inadequate food supply from our agricultural sections, shortly we shall find it desirable to give serious consideration to the question of State canneries.

Canning is plainly not merely the collection of food and the distribution of it; it is in part a manufacturing process, a producing process. Such incidental "production" or manufacture of asparagus, or strawberries, or corn, or beets, and all the rest of the vegetable foods and fruits which now are canned in such large quantities, should plainly be within the power that the Legislature may exercise if it finds it necessary or desirable thus to assist in the production and distribution of food or other products.

Mr. LUMMUS: May I ask whether the gentleman has taken into consideration whether the word "preserving" would not include all that he wishes to accomplish by the word "producing?"

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not sure that we considered the word "preserving" in committee; but I am very clearly of opinion now that it is not broad enough. For instance, if you limited yourselves to pres-serving milk it might be sufficient to put it into cold storage, but I do not think it fairly could be said to cover the manufacture of milk into butter and cheese. I think perhaps "preserving" might be broad enough to cover the process I have just stated as to fruits and vegetables.

Mr. LOWELL of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman whether under the term "producing" he would say that the Commonwealth or the cities and towns could grow vegetables and go into the business of market-gardening.

Mr. ANDERSON: My answer to that is no. I think I said something the other day which was inconsistent with that answer. But I think when you take into account the recital of the words markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses, and then add to those "like means," that you have limited "producing" to enterprises which are in essence and in general scope distribution means and not primarily and fundamentally producing processes.

Mr. LOWELL: I understand the gentleman to say that he wishes the power in the Legislature to allow the Commonwealth or cities and towns to produce milk.

Mr. ANDERSON: I did not so state, Mr. Chairman, to-day. If the gentleman goes back to what I said the first day I spoke he may find I stated the proposed grant too broadly. What I said to-day in substance was that if it be found necessary, as it may within the reasonable contemplation of us all, to have a metropolitan milk distribution station, so that there shall be a monopoly, or if not an entire monopoly, to a large degree a monopoly of the milk distribution in this metropolitan section,—with the milk now coming from as far away as Canada,—then when the milk was here it would be necessary in order to meet your hot and cold weather waves to allow change or manufacture which was in its nature production; and we used the word "producing" as being on the whole the safest single word to cover this obvious need.

Mr. Lowell: I should like to ask the gentleman whether this word "producing" does not do one of two things, either does not add anything at all to the rest of the resolution or adds a great deal too much. It does not strike me that getting together quantities of milk from various parts of the country and keeping them in proper storage is producing, so that it does not seem to me that it meets that part of it. On the other hand, producing it seems to me, certainly would cover market-gardening or keeping cattle, and anything of that kind.

Mr. Anderson: I think I should agree with that definition of the word "producing," if it were not limited by "like means" and did not refer back to a whole category of appliances which essentially are distribution appliances and not growing or primarily producing appliances.

Mr. Lowell: Another criticism, perhaps it is merely a verbal one, is that there is nothing in all of these things which are specified, markets, docks, fuel, coal yards, elevators, canneries, warehouses, slaughter-houses, which is producing at all, so that the word "producing" does not refer to anything which has gone before but adds distinctly a new element to the matter, as it strikes me.

Mr. Anderson: I think the gentleman is in error. I think that in canning there is producing. I think slaughter-houses are engaged in a species of production, taking the raw product and manufacturing it into various things, some of which are food and some of which are incidental. I think therefore that his construction is not sound. If anyone can put within reasonable limits a statement which more accurately and adequately expresses the purpose of the committee, I shall be glad to have it. But I think that reasonable doubts should be resolved in favor of the wider grant of power to the Legislature, which, as you know, I think is a wise and safe body.

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that this manipulation by the State, this distribution by the State, would increase the product. I believe that the serious proposition before this State, in fact in the whole country, is the question of product,—producing. It is not so much the question of distributing milk as it is of producing the milk. Why, Mr. Chairman, the cattle are disappearing from our State by hundreds, thousands. Our lands are becoming unoccupied. We are not producing. What this State needs is a larger product. I think you can trace this out to a danger of famine in this country if it continues. We talk about developing unoccupied lands. Why, gentlemen, it is not necessary to develop unoccupied lands. Lands that have been occupied are being deserted, and the raising of milk and the raising of vegetables and the raising of fruits for canning are being neglected. It is a question of producing food-stuffs and in order to increase the production of necessities you have got to encourage the producer.
Mr. Anderson: I am quite in accord with much that the gentleman from Fitchburg has said. He will see that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman gave serious consideration to that problem if he will look at No. 321, which will be here shortly and will indicate ways in which we thought the Commonwealth possibly might help to increase agricultural production. Nevertheless, it is true that the marked phenomena in our American industry for more than two generations, had been,—excess production, excess cost of distribution, and constantly engorged markets. I quite agree that if we are embarked on a career of persistent militarism, in a struggle perhaps for a hundred years, that the question of agricultural production is a vital question. But it clearly is true (take milk for illustration) that the cost of collecting and distributing the milk, the spread between what the farmer has got and what the consumer has paid, has been increasing for years. The contractors say they have not got rich; I do not know that they have. But it is clear that we ought not merely to consider the problem of increasing the necessaries of life, to production; we ought also to provide power for adequate legislative treatment of the machinery of distribution. That is what we now are undertaking to do by this resolution; that is all we are undertaking to do. I hope and expect the gentleman from Fitchburg will give us his entire support.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: I wish to ask the gentleman if he did not mean collecting and manipulating.

Mr. Anderson: I think "manipulating" has a sinister meaning, which I should dislike to apply to the comparatively innocent job of turning milk into butter and cheese. I object to it. It smacks of high finance; it reminds me some of the recent railroad investigations. I object to it.

Mr. Loring: Is not that really what is meant by your interpretation, that is, collecting the product and turning it into some other form for distribution?

Mr. Anderson: I do not think "manipulating" is a proper word. I think you could make something of an argument for saying collecting and manufacturing, other like means for collecting and manufacturing, but you would get into worse trouble than you are in now. "Producing" is the most fit word we could think of, open to the least number of objections. I quite agree that it does give the Legislature, if it was a wicked or incompetent body, a chance to go, or authorize the Commonwealth or the State to go, somewhat more broadly into business than we intended when we drafted this very, very modest resolution,—which is criticized by the acute and thorough thinking gentleman from Quincy as being in the nature of a compromise.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I desire to ask the gentleman if the committee considered the use of the word "procuring" instead of "producing."

Mr. Anderson: I do not think we did, because I do not think it covers the process, for instance, of manufacturing excess milk into butter and cheese. Procuring milk would be going back into the country for it; it might be open to the possible construction of buying a farm and raising milk. We did not mean that. Procuring is a pretty broad word.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I should like to ask the chairman of this committee to take the question of a provision dealer, for instance, in my ward, who has built up a business, which it has taken him twenty-five years to do, and has created a "good will" in the ward. If the State should step into that ward and wipe out that man's business, is there any provision in this to compensate that provision dealer, fish dealer or grocery man, who has built up a respectably good business and has the respect of the people of the ward?

Mr. Anderson: It seems to me that the answer to the question is that the gentleman has confused constitutional power with the legislative use of that power. There is nothing, and there ought to be nothing, in the Constitution dealing with so minor, improbable a result as that. The gentlemen present,—most of them at any rate,—will remember that when it became necessary to exercise the undoubted constitutional power of the Commonwealth to take additional territory for a metropolitan water supply, a new rule of damages was provided for certain of the towns up in Worcester County; damages were allowed for businesses wiped out, and not merely for the value of the property taken. Now, it is quite possible that the Commonwealth, within the next generation, will face a similar problem and deal with it in a similar way. There is undoubted constitutional power, when it exercises any of these contemplated additional grants, to provide a rule of damages which shall be just. In England I have noticed recently that they even have had in contemplation providing compensation for the public houses, the liquor licenses which are taken over. Take the fish business. That is another food producing industry which I forgot in my previous enumeration. I sat last night in a conference concerning the present status of the fish business. The condition of that industry is becoming a critical question all over this country. It is now under investigation by the Department of Justice inquiring whether certain schemes are obnoxious to the Sherman Act.

Without going into that aspect of the problem, it is enough to say that all these perishable food products, like fish and fruit and milk and ice, are bringing to bear upon our growing communities a set of problems very like the sewerage and the water problems that we have faced hitherto; that there ought to be, plainly, additional power vested in the Legislature to deal with them as they ought to be dealt with. We are undertaking to provide such power.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: Do I understand that if this authority is given it would authorize the taking over of existing plants, etc., by eminent domain, and if the resolution does not cover it ought it not to cover it? Ought there not to be power to take an existing dock as well as to establish a competing dock?

Mr. Anderson: My view is,—I am not sure that we discussed that in committee,—that when in this sentence you provide that fuel and coal yards, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like distribution means, which would include milk distribution, fish, ice, etc., are made public uses, the right of eminent domain accrues by necessary implication. I take it the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) would not have the remotest doubt of the present constitutional power of the Legislature to provide for the taking of the center of Worcester for a public market. The idea of the committee was to put the rest of this category into the same field of power.

Mr. Lowell: I should like to ask the gentleman whether he has considered, instead of the word "producing," the words "preparing and preserving." That suggestion was made to me by some one else, but it seems to me it would cover the ground.

Mr. Anderson: My own offhand impression is that those two words are the least undesirable of the proposed substitutes for the word "producing;" but I still stick to my first love; and think that "producing," limited by "like means" and by the enumeration of devices and appliances, — is safe language; safer than "preparing and preserving."

Mr. Brown of Brockton: In line with the question that was asked by the gentleman from Worcester I would ask the chairman of the committee and the attention of the gentleman from Worcester as to whether or not the policy of Massachusetts is not clearly established.
Has there ever been a case where Massachusetts has voted to go into business in competition with business already existing that she has not made provision that the existing plant must be taken over? I remember in 1891, when we first put in this question of municipal ownership and our bill was going through, that it was the gentleman from Boston, the ex-Mayor of Boston (Mr. Quincy), then a member of the House, who rose to put in that very provision, providing that the existing plant should be bought. At that time we tried to fight it. We thought we would not. We thought it was just. Now, there is a precedent for Massachusetts' policy. I want to ask, has not that established the policy of Massachusetts, that it will not take even the corner grocer out of business unless it does him justice?

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: This discussion has ranged over a fairly wide field, which has seemed at times to be a trifle remote from the subject immediately under discussion. I want to approach this matter from a standpoint somewhat different from that of some of the speakers who previously have dealt with it. This proposed amendment, based upon a large number of propositions for amendment of the Constitution, was brought forth by a situation that has engrossed the attention of both the State and the National Legislature now and previously. Some years ago, when the coal strike was on, this subject was brought up, and, with an exigency of even greater and more far-reaching consequence, it comes up again. Already it has produced legislation, both State and National, and this proposed amendment to the Constitution is more or less in line with those acts of legislation.

In 1915 the Commonwealth provided for the establishment of public markets. Previously to that time it had authorized public markets from time to time whenever a city or town manifested a desire to have one. A general act was passed in 1915, and under that act I think some public markets have been established, not any very large number, it is true, but still public markets have been established. During the last legislative year several propositions were brought up before the Legislature. The first was in response to a request from the Governor for greater facilities to provide for the better defence of the Commonwealth in time of war. That is now contained in the Acts of this year, chapter 342. In the sixth section of that act it is provided that when the Governor believes it necessary and expedient for the purpose of better securing the public safety or defence, or the welfare of the Commonwealth, with the approval of the Council he may take possession "of any cattle, poultry and any provisions for man or beast, and any fuel . . . which may be necessary or convenient” not only for the military and naval forces of the Commonwealth but “for the better protection or welfare of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants.” And it provides that he may employ that property for the service of the Commonwealth and “may in particular, when in his opinion the public exigency so requires, sell or distribute gratuitously to or among any or all of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth anything taken under” that law “and may fix minimum and maximum prices therefor.” That is a power very similar to what is contemplated by this resolution. The constitutionality of the act was questioned seriously in committee, but the Legislature passed it, believing that in times of public exigency a too literal interpretation of the Constitution should not bar salutary action, and that such a public exigency exists at the present time.

They also passed a statute, which is chapter 264 of the Acts of this year, authorizing cities and towns to make certain emergency appropriations in time of war. This act authorized cities and towns, among other things, for the purpose of conserving the food supply “to do such things as they may deem necessary to assist in the raising and distribution of food products.” I call to the attention of this Constitutional Convention the broad and ample language, the broad and ample authority which the Legislature gave to cities and towns for the purpose of meeting this emergency. It did not undertake carefully to define what they should or should not do. Realizing that an emergency existed, it gave them a free hand to go ahead and do what they could to produce and conserve the food in their jurisdiction, and this power I do not think has been seriously abused. Certainly if it has been abused no instances have been called to our attention as yet.

In a time like this it is advisable perhaps for this Convention to weigh seriously the exact limits of the authority which they would grant, but the Legislature I think acted wisely in throwing the doors wide open and giving the cities and towns ample power to do what they saw fit, putting as little restraint on them as possible and leaving to their own good judgment what they should or should not do.

Congress also has had the subject before it, and I think that the precise legislation to which I refer is fresh in everybody’s memory. The act to provide for the National security and defence, the so-called Food Control Bill, was designed to encourage the production, conserve the supply and control the distribution of food products and fuel. I do not intend to read all of this long statute; I do want to read an extract from the first section thereof:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the National security and defence, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the army and navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement, of foods, feeds, fuel, including fuel-oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessary; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

The act then goes on in great detail, providing among other things that the President shall have power from time to time to purchase and store certain food-stuffs and sell them at reasonable rates. It provides for the condemnation of hoarded food-stuffs; it provides for the restraint of monopolization; giving, in other words, very ample power to the President to act for the securing of greater equality of prices and for the more equitable distribution over the country of the necessities of life.

I mention these acts to show that this subject already is engrossing the attention of Legislatures, and that this Constitutional Convention well might take into consideration the expediency of vesting the Legislature with some power to act along these lines along which Congress already has acted and along which the State already has acted.

The article of amendment under consideration received from the committee careful consideration. There was considerable discussion among us as to the proper scope of the resolution. From the tenor of the amendments which have been proposed it would seem that there is some recognition of the advisability of such an amendment, at least so far as it relates to food-stuffs, feeds and fuel.

Some difference of opinion has been expressed as to whether the resolution is not too broad in going on and extending to other necessaries of life. The committee had before it a number of propositions which in effect would allow a city or town to deal in anything it saw fit. The committee thought it was advisable, at present at least, to go no further than there was some prospect of the Legislature acting, and therefore limited it to the necessaries of life. The main legislation at present goes, and perhaps for a good while to come probably will go, no further than the subjects of food and fuel. The necessity of similar legislation in the case of clothing and such necessaries of life at present is a somewhat remote contingency. No such emergency has existed in those lines as has existed in the subjects of food and fuel. Therefore for that reason perhaps little harm would be done in cutting off the other necessaries of life. At the same time, I do not think any harm would be done by leaving them there. The Legislature never is disposed to take extremely radical action except in view of a clear emergency. The Legislature has had power for some years to take land to provide homes for citizens. That power was given by vote of the people, and it has stayed on the statute-books for these several years and no money has been appropriated to carry out that power. There is no more danger now than there was before the passage of that act that the Commonwealth would go into the real estate business. There is the power there; they could use it if an emergency arose. If the emergency was sufficiently great they probably would use it. And yet there has been no tendency on the part of the Legislature to go to the limit of the power provided for them by law. Similarly with regard to this power. The probability of hasty action by the Legislature, the probability of hasty action by cities or towns in this respect, the likelihood of the Commonwealth or of the cities and towns going rashly into the business of dealing with the necessities of life, is very small indeed. The little corner grocer, the dealer in the necessities of life, exists in every Representative district, every Senatorial district and every ward of every city and town. The Legislature or a city or town could not take over that business without affecting a large number of its citizens, and no one ever can cry out so loud as the man who is hurt. So long as your cities and towns and so long as your State are governed by men elected by popular vote they are bound to pay close attention to the rights of persons who consider that their rights are being invaded. I do not think there is any danger of the Legislature or any city or town acting rashly in this respect. We already have had experience in the General Court with relation to State insurance. A proposition was put before the Legislature which in effect would have established an insurance monopoly, and with noteworthy esprit de corps the insurance agents of the State, although this affected only compensation insurance and not the broad general subject, rose in a body and fell upon the Legislature. For days and days they crowded the largest hearing-room in this State House, and voiced their opposition with noteworthy vigor. The result was that the measure died, and it may be assumed fairly that wherever a large number of people are involved, the chances of the Legislature taking such action as will put them out of business is very small indeed. And the same thing applies to every city and town in this Commonwealth. On the other hand, this power may be of considerable value. The present methods of distribution of food and fuel, to go no further than that, are entirely adequate for all ordinary situations. In conditions such as we now have they are exposed to two dangers. The first is that by combinations and by manipulations such as the gentleman from Newton described yesterday in the case of the coal business, an unreasonable toll or profit may be taken upon the product in its transition from the producer to the consumer, and that is a thing that the Commonwealth can and should guard against as far as it may. In the second place, the facilities may not be adequate for providing a sufficient supply. That is more important to us than to almost any other section of the Commonwealth, because the greater part of our food comes from outside the Commonwealth.

There has been one circumstance in the near past that threatened to shut us off from our food supply,—the threatened railroad strike. When that was upon our heads it seemed there was a perfect panic among the householders to secure an adequate supply of food, so that they should have sufficient to tide them over the emergency. If that strike had gone on we probably should have had to face a serious food shortage. Similarly in the present situation, when railroad facilities are overtaxed, we may at any time be brought face to face with a situation which will prevent us from obtaining our normal supply of food and reduce our stocks to the danger point. It is to meet situations like those that this act might be of great benefit. It could very well happen within the near future that the Legislature will be called upon to consider the advisability of the State establishing a reserve stock of food to protect the Commonwealth from starvation in case of an emergency of that sort. That is a proposition that every State has to face at some time or other,—the provision of a suitable supply of food.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I desire to ask the gentleman from Worcester why the very first language of this resolution was changed from the way it read yesterday to the way it reads to-day.

Mr. Hobbs: As I take it, by that he means the change in the amendment moved by Mr. Anderson of Brookline.

Mr. Montague: Yes.

Mr. Hobbs: I think that perhaps the gentleman from Brookline is quite as able to answer that question as I am myself, and as the gentleman is sitting next to him I would suggest that he ascertain from him. I will answer the question later on if he does not obtain a satisfactory reply, and if I can.

This situation, the existence of conditions actually here to-day, which may make it necessary for the Commonwealth to take radical steps to protect itself from the immediate danger of starvation, is ample warrant why there should be constitutional power for it to act, and I think is ample warrant for its being given power to act, and not merely when an emergency actually exists, because that merely is giving it power to lock the barn door after the horse is stolen. The power should exist not only in times of war and of general distress, but in times of peace as well, because it is then that your reserve stock can be laid in, and not when the emergency is upon you and prices are high and food is hard to get at any price. If you limit it to the case of actual emergencies you are compelling the Commonwealth to work under great restrictions.

I think that those considerations afford the general basis of the reason why some action should be taken by this Convention. I do not think that the committee had any particular desire to eliminate a system of private profit. I do not think that the question of whether private dealing in the necessities of life is not after all a crime was particularly presented to our minds. But I do think that we felt that power should be given to governmental agencies whereby they could act in case of emergency if there was prospect that their action might result in any good to the Commonwealth. Now, it might result in good in this way. Of course the Commonwealth is not well fitted, nor is any city or town, to engage in a mercantile business. Their entire organization is unsuited to that purpose. The only advantage which the State has over a private individual is due to its character as a sovereign State, to its ample powers to take by eminent domain, and to its credit, whereby it can purchase in larger quantities than the individual can and store in larger quantities than business considerations would warrant an individual in doing. In those respects it has a real advantage over an individual or over an ordinary combination of individuals, and might act with great benefit to its inhabitants and perhaps relieve the emergencies under which they are struggling at present.

Mr. Cusick of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the resolution he is discussing that warrants any question or consideration of the conservation of food.

Mr. Hobbs: I do not understand the purpose of that question.

Mr. Cusick: The purpose of that question is that I note the gentleman’s argument, going back to antiquity, was based on the fact that food products were becoming so scarce that it was necessary that the State should in some way enter into control of such products. Now I am asking him whether or not in the resolution which he has discussed there is a single word relating to the conservation of food or food products.

Mr. Hobbs: The resolution I am reading, the original resolution?

Mr. Cusick: Well, either of them.

Mr. Hobbs: “The General Court may authorize the Commonwealth to take by purchase or otherwise food-stuffs, fuel, ice, and other necessaries of life." That authorizes it to take. The provision that the General Court may authorize the establishment of elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like means of producing, selling, distributing the necessaries of life, certainly contemplates methods of storing, conserving and preserving food products. I do not see any other interpretation that can be placed upon those words.

Mr. Cusick: The resolution contemplates the treatment of food products after the food products have been produced. Is there anything at all in the resolution which would enable us to increase the production of food products? That is what I consider the greatest conservation of food or food products.

Mr. Hobbs: The committee were more concerned with the mercantile aspect of the question than with the agricultural aspect. No. 321, defining private property title to natural resources, was reported by our committee, and states that the conservation, development and use of agricultural, mineral, forest and water resources of the Commonwealth is a matter of public interest, and, therefore, that the General Court may authorize the taking by purchase or otherwise, and may enact such legislation as may be necessary or expedient for securing and promoting the proper conservation, development and use thereof.

Mr. Cusick: The gentleman says that the committee was most concerned about the mercantile aspect of this matter. Do I understand by that that the resolution simply contemplates the fixing of prices to the consumer at the expense of the general taxpayer?

Mr. Hobbs: I do not quite understand now the purposes of this interrogatory, nor am I entirely certain that I can answer that question. I use the word "mercantile." I do not understand that the subject of price fixing is explicitly treated in this resolution. There are a number of things that the committee could have included in this resolution. The committee endeavored to make it as simple as possible. The gentleman understands, I think, with regard to all the staple necessaries of life, that they are produced outside the Commonwealth, and that the effect that the Commonwealth can make upon their prices is very small indeed. How can the Commonwealth regulate the price of wheat? How can the Commonwealth regulate the price of meat? Not one-tenth of what the Commonwealth uses comes from inside of the Commonwealth. Certainly it cannot regulate the price. I do not think that the subject of price fixing is a matter that concerns this body so much as it does Congress. Congress has made some endeavor to deal with that subject in the act from which I quoted. The act provides for the conservation of food products and fuel. Now, Mr. President, this amendment I think contains a germ of good. Some claim that it does not go far enough. Others claim it goes too far. As between the two the Convention must be the final judge.

I want to refer briefly to some of the amendments that have been offered to this measure.

The first amendment, offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch) and printed in the calendar, attempts to interject the words "in time of war or general distress," and fixes a time limit for the exercise of authority. I must respectfully voice my opposition to the placing of a narrow time limit or to a narrow restriction of the power given. As I have said the time for using this power cannot properly be confined to the actual emergency. If the Commonwealth goes into this business in any considerable degree, it must find itself frequently with a supply on its hands which at the end of the emergency, if it has got to go out of business at that time, it will have to dispose of at a considerable loss. That it seems to me is an unfair and unnecessary handicap to place upon the Commonwealth, which already is sufficiently handicapped in the matter of engaging in what is essentially a private business.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington, that has reference to whether this should extend to other necessaries of life besides food and fuel, and as to that I do not think it would do any harm if put in, because as yet there has been no such emergency in matters of clothing, which I take it is the other main necessary of life, as would seem to call for legislation. At the same time, it is only fair to state that as far as woolen clothing goes a number of our manufacturers have had to go to England and make terms with the government of England in order to get enough wool to keep the factories running, and the situation of an emergency in clothes is not perhaps so remote as we might consider.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arlington, I think that is taken care of by the redraft moved by the gentleman from Brookline. The amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Bigney, is one of not much consequence. I do not think that the amendment would do any harm if inserted, nor do I think that it adds anything appreciably to the proposition.

The amendment moved by the gentleman from Quincy goes so much beyond anything that the committee had any idea of, and is so entirely outside the scope of what we had conceived, that it seems to me that it is going a little further than the committee desired. It is a pretty broad proposition to authorize the General Court to go into any business that it sees fit. As for those who claim that the resolution is altogether too broad, this amendment without further argument will be very much too broad.

As to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Haverhill, I presume this proceeds upon the assumption that spirits or intoxicating liquors are either foods or necessaries. That aspect of the situation had not struck the committee. I do not think that the committee had any desire to authorize the Commonwealth, or the cities and towns thereof, to go into the liquor business. I cannot regard the amendment as at all necessary. I think that it will do no serious harm to the Commonwealth if inserted.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I should like to ask who is going to decide what the necessaries are. I remember very well when I was somewhat younger than I am now attending school up in the upper part of Rockingham County, New Hampshire. We had a very good citizen, one whose lungs were so affected the doctor said he could not live for a great length of time. He was a farmer. From the time when he was twenty-five years of age until he was eighty-two he drank a glass of rye whiskey at ten o'clock every forenoon and at three o'clock every afternoon, and by being moderately occupied on his farm he lived to be eighty-two years old. In that case he thought, and the physicians thought, it was a necessity. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester who is going to decide what the necessities are.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.  711

Mr. Hobbs: I cannot decide that question. I do not regard intoxicating liquor as a necessity myself.

As to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Brookline, I think that has been sufficiently explained by him.

As to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston in the first division, if the words—

Mr. Montague of Boston: I do not understand that the gentleman from Brookline in speaking of his amendment explained the change of the very first word. I should be very glad to have the gentleman from Worcester explain.

Mr. Hobbs: May I ask what word he means? The original draft reads that the “General Court” may authorize the Commonwealth, and the other reads that the “Commonwealth” may by statute duly enacted authorize. Is that what he has reference to? I presume that the gentleman from Brookline had an idea that perhaps the initiative and referendum might be adopted by this body, and therefore the restriction of the power to the General Court was not advisable. I am not sure that the language used in the original draft would have that effect.

Mr. Montague: I understood the gentleman from Brookline to say that his amendment was a committee amendment, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. Hobbs: I did not so understand the gentleman from Brookline. I think that the gentleman from Brookline may have consulted with the committee informally as to some changes made. The number of changes made is very small indeed, and I do not consider that any of them touch the substance of the matter.

Now as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Edwin U. Curtis. As I take it, the provision that sales be made at cost has been stricken out, and also the last clause. If I followed correctly the amendments of the gentleman from Boston who has just been interrogating me I think that was the effect of the amendments,—to strike out the words “at cost,” and to strike out the last clause.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to correct the gentleman. It would strike out in the fourth line from the last: “If a public exigency arises.”

Mr. Hobbs: The words: “when and so far as in its judgment a public exigency exists therefore”; is that what is stricken out?

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis: “If a public exigency arises.” In answer to the gentleman, the words stricken out were as follows: “If a public exigency arises.”

Mr. Hobbs: The objection I have to the amendment is of an entirely different nature. I did intend to object to the presence of the words “at cost,” because that would impose a sensible handicap on the Commonwealth in getting rid of stocks that it had acquired in contemplation of an emergency, and the market price of which had suddenly fallen, so that they could not be sold at all. The objection that I have to the amendment is that it makes the Commonwealth the sole possible agency in the matter of purchase. While that might be desirable, it seems to me the Commonwealth should have a free hand to authorize the city or town to make purchases for itself if it sees fit. It seems to me that it is unnecessary to have all these transactions pass through the State.
Mr. Butler of Brockton: As a member of the committee on Public Affairs, and as a member who is interested in this measure, I should like to say a few words to you. I want to confine my remarks to the words "slaughter-houses, and canneries," and I want to try to prove to you that they will be of advantage to our municipalities, and that they will encourage and increase the production of food. In the first place, I want to take my own city for an example. In my own city we raise every year at our own city farm between 800 and 1,000 hogs. Those are sold in the open market. If the city of Brockton had the right to establish a slaughter-house those hogs could be killed and sold to the inhabitants, which would be of advantage to them. This year the alderman from one of the wards of our city introduced a bill asking that the city hogs be killed, sold and distributed among the people of Brockton. Our city solicitor ruled that it would be unconstitutional. This resolution will give us a constitutional right. Now as far as the canneries are concerned. In the city of Brockton to-day the Plymouth County Farm Bureau is operating a little cannery for domestic purposes, and it is crowded with work. There is more canned goods being put up there than ever before. I hope to see a slaughter-house at our city farm, and a cannery under the same roof, so that the people in that section will be encouraged to raise their stock, so that it can be canned at a small cost, and in that way I believe it will encourage the production of food products. I believe in this resolution, for the reason that our esteemed ex-Governor (Mr. Brackett) in this division was so earnest when he brought the measure before the attention of the committee. He assured the committee that there was a demand for something in this line, and I hope you, gentlemen of this committee, will give it the fullest thought and not put on amendments enough so that it will work to the disadvantage of the people. As far as the milk products are concerned, I believe that that is one great problem, and I think in a few years you will see the milk products of Massachusetts controlled by one concern. If that ever should come, I believe the municipality should have the right either to take over that plant or establish one in competition to it. I think that this year has proved to the people of this Commonwealth that the advice of our President, Mr. Wilson, has been fully carried out, for at no time in the history of this State has there been so much product,—so many vegetables, so many farm gardens, so many fruit gardens and so many spare acres planted,—as there have been this year, and I assure you that one thing that we must consider is the production of food. I was in hopes that the land resolution would precede this one, but when it does come I am going to try to explain to you that Massachusetts should be one of the producing States rather than a State that produces only sixteen per cent of what we to-day use.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I rise to speak to the amendment offered by me and printed on the first page of the calendar for the day. The prime purpose of this amendment of course is to raise, in as plain and simple a way as possible, and as little complicated with secondary questions, the question whether this amendment, if adopted at all, should be for general use or limited to emergency use. At the same time, in drafting this amendment I endeavored to cover another minor point which had been raised originally by Mr. Parker of Lancaster with regard to the possible interpretation of the committee's resolution as extending the power to take under the police power. I notice from the other amendments printed that there seems to be something approaching unanimity in favor of meeting the doubts raised by the gentleman from Lancaster, for there was Mr. Curtis's amendment and an amendment which I think was offered by Mr. Pillsbury, and several others,—I believe one offered by Mr. Brackett,—to cover this same point in varying form. I do not need to say that it is absolutely immaterial to me which amendment, or in what form, is finally adopted to cover that point. I do think that the mere fact that an ex-Attorney General of this Commonwealth and an ex-Governor of this Commonwealth have felt or suggested the doubt, is enough in itself to show that the doubt does exist, and every one has admitted that if a doubt exists it should be removed. Therefore it appears to me that it does not need argument that the point should be covered by the adoption of some amendment on it. As to the form of my own amendment on it, it is long, but perfectly unmistakable. That is the only merit I claim for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the prime purpose of my amendment, namely, the raising of the question whether this great power we propose to confer should be for general use or limited to emergencies. And before taking up that broad question let us first think of one or two points of procedure. Assume for the moment, for the purpose of argument, that the Convention, backed up by vote of the people, should conclude that this was to be merely an emergency measure. Just how would it work out? Who is to decide about the emergency? I say the Legislature. It is perfectly true that such a power easily could be abused. My amendment uses the words "in time of general distress." What is a time of general distress? Mr.
Harriman in his very eloquent speech yesterday would have us believe that all times are times of general distress. I do not traverse his statement at this moment, though I hope to deal with it a little later. I admit it would be open to the Legislature to find that each and every year was a time of general distress. They could do so. But, Mr.
Chairman, I have put in a proviso for the express purpose of making it sure that that question will be reconsidered each year that the Legislature sits. I am perfectly ready for my part to trust a Legislature with the decision as to when an emergency exists, if it can be induced to consider it at all. I am not ready to trust that, if a system were once put in operation, mere inertia, mere pressure of other business, would not prevent its being reconsidered, so that the thing simply would drag along and go on and on, because it was nobody's business in particular to stop it, and because the Legislature each year simply lost sight of it in the pressure of other business. That is the purpose of that clause in the amendment which I have offered, calling on the General Court to reconsider the question each year.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman speaking, if, for instance, an ice plant should be established in the city of New Bedford, he would think that it ever would be established if it depended upon the Legislature to say whether, after it had been established, it would continue for more than one year.

Mr. Balch: May I deal with that a little bit later and a little bit indirectly, instead of trying to answer it specifically?

It has been suggested to me that this provision from year to year assumes annual sessions of the Legislature. That undoubtedly is so. It also has been suggested with considerable force that one year is too short a period anyway, because of the difficulty of starting and stopping a great enterprise like this. For that reason, sir, I should like to amend my own amendment by correcting it, by making it read: "Such authorization shall be for not more than two years at a time, but may be repeated from time to time." I am obliged to confess that I am so ignorant of parliamentary procedure that I do not know how that should be drawn, whether I ought to offer in writing an amendment to my own amendment to do that, or whether unanimous consent can be given me now to do it. May I inquire of you, Mr. President, whether I may amend my own amendment on the spot by unanimous consent in that merely perfecting detail?

The President: As the Chair understands the question of the member, there is no objection to his offering any amendment and it will be entertained providing objection is not made by any member of the Convention.

No objection was made to the change in the amendment.

Mr. Balch: The amendment was intended to meet the objection that one year was too short a time for starting and stopping so great a piece of machinery, also to meet the objection that the one year period provided by me assumed annual sessions of the Legislature, while we might have biennial sessions. Therefore I wish to make the following change. I wish to have it read that "Such authorization shall be for not more than two years at a time, but may be repeated from time to time," etc.

I wish to touch one more point while we are on the matter of procedure. In case the Convention shall think that the measure should be an emergency measure the question remains who shall judge whether or not the emergency conditions exist. A question was made about that. It was suggested that there would have to be endless litigation before the Legislature could act effectively, even though the intention was to make the Legislature the judge. I have attempted to dispose of that difficulty by explicitly making the Legislature the sole judge in such a way that there could be no doubt whatever. I am perfectly willing to do that. I believe the Legislature should be the sole judge. It has been suggested in reply to that, that the Federal Constitution may raise legal questions, and that therefore my attempt to avoid litigation is worthless; but, Mr. Chairman, if that is so, absolutely nothing can be done about it anyway by anything we do. No action that this Convention of the people of Massachusetts takes can alter by one jot the right of any parties under the Federal Constitution. Therefore it is idle to talk about possibilities of litigation and delay founded on the Federal Constitution. Let us do what we can to remove the possibilities of such litigation under the Massachusetts Constitution. I believe that my amendment, like some of the others that have been offered, meets that point fully and fairly.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to the merits.

Mr. Boucher of New Bedford: The gentleman says in his amendment here that the General Court shall be the sole judge of the conditions. Let us assume that the Legislature is not in session; who would be the judge then?
Mr. Balch: I understand that the thing would go on automatically until there was a Legislature in session. I know of no one else who would be the judge, and I presume it would run on until somebody stopped it. That is the usual method.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the very few minutes that remain I shall offer a few thoughts, and only a few, on the very large question raised by the whole subject-matter here. We already have had a very wide-ranging debate, and in parts a very deep-searching debate. Of course we all understand the situation here. We all know that on the one hand in time of famine, in time of war, in time of pestilence or plague, in time perhaps of great general strikes, in time of failure of harvest, a power like this residing somewhere is an emergency power. We also know, gentlemen, that this measure opens the door wide,—not only opens it wide but invites an entrance through it,—to enter the realm of the most complete State socialism on the German model. Some of us frankly and in the most manly way came before this Convention and stated that that was just what they wanted; others of us do not want it. I am one of those who are not afraid of the name socialism. It is not a bugaboo to me. It was most truly said, by Mr. Powers I think, that all States are now socialistic to a certain extent; it has become a question of degree only. But, sir, you have nowhere in the world, so far as I am aware, so complete and thorough-going a system of absolute paternalism and absolute State bureaucratic socialism as you would get if this amendment and the invitation therein contained were both adopted and accepted.

I wonder just how many of us have thought of the way this really would work out in practice. It has been pointed out that, to a considerable extent, it means the annihilation of the smaller dealer, the small middleman. I for one shall not shed too many tears over the small dealer, the small middleman. We are not hesitating to conscript the lives of our young men and the fortunes of our wealthy men. I am ready to conscript the livelihoods of our small middlemen. But there is a class of men who will be more affected by this and of whom very little has been said, and that is the small producers. How many of us realize that after this thing has been in operation a little while the small producer, the man who keeps hens and sells eggs, the man who raises a few cabbages, will have just one person he can sell to, and nobody else? That is the public market that has been set up; because, with the other middlemen, the other dealers, the other purchasers wiped out, he will sell to the State or he will sell to nobody, and he will sell to the State at precisely what price the State sees fit to offer him. If the city of Boston should go into the market business and wipe out the other marketmen and dealers, and the Arlington produce gardeners should bring their product to town to sell to the city at such prices as the city chose to offer them, and none other, I wonder what the city authorities of Boston, looking solely to the Boston vote to elect them, would be willing to pay to the Arlington market-gardeners for their products. I do not think that they would pay them much!

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Does the gentleman assume that so wise a power as a municipality or a State would not know that from the economic standpoint, the producer must be rewarded, otherwise he would not produce? Would it be economically sound for the city of Boston to press that producer to a point where he lost money?
Mr. Balch: It would not. I will answer the gentleman, sir, that it would be economically unsound, but that I utterly lack faith in the wisdom of the city of Boston or any other portion of the Commonwealth to act promptly and fully up to the theoretical, economically sound doctrine. They have not done it in the past, and I see no reason to think that they will do it in the future until they have learned by hard experience, and that will take a generation perhaps.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I have called a meeting of the committee to be held at 9:30 o'clock on Wednesday morning next. The hour set for voting on this is 3:30 in the afternoon. I respectfully ask that the members will give publicity to that fact, as there are very few members present; and that the clerk will ask the members of the committee also to be present. If there are any other amendments or any written communications,—we could not of course open it for a public hearing,—which are desired to be presented, the committee at that time would like them. I hope such amendments and communications may be in the hands of Mr. Hobbs, clerk of the committee, or of myself, seasonably. We shall endeavor then to have the mind of the committee, or at any rate of as many as we can get together, so that we can state to the Convention on Wednesday, before the close of the debate, what the matured judgment of the committee is,—instead of leaving it to the somewhat unsatisfactory method of the chairman's guessing.

The debate was continued Wednesday, September 26.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: It may facilitate the discussion of the day if I take this opportunity to say to the Convention that we had a meeting of the committee this morning, at any rate, six or seven of them, perhaps not technically a quorum, to consider the matters raised by the various proposals of amendment and any possible change in our own views; that the result of that meeting was that in lieu of the amendment moved by me, on page 3, the committee,—meaning by "committee" the meeting to which I have referred,—will ask to substitute the following. If the Convention will give attention I will read and explain the changes. I have had typewritten a considerable number of them, and will get as many more as I can, so that members who desire to give critical attention will have the best possible available facilities therefor.

The proposed substitute amendment reads the same as my amendment on page 3 down to the word "therein."

The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize the taking by purchase or otherwise of food-stuffs, feeds, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reasonable compensation therefor, and the sale of the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein.

I said it read just the same. In reading that over I was of the opinion that after "thereof," "or" should be changed to "and." There is no other change. Then there follows after the semicolon an insertion made in reference to the amendment suggested by Mr. Quincy of Boston, and printed on page 2 of the calendar of to-day, and also embodying some of the ideas contained in the amendment moved by Mr. Williams of Brookline and printed on page 3 of the calendar. Insert after "therein" the following:

The Governor, with the approval of the Council, if he deems that a public exigency exists, may, until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

That is, as the Convention will observe, a pure emergency power, to be exercised by the Governor and Council only until it is provided otherwise by law. Then starts a new sentence:

The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life and to harvest and to manufacture ice;

No change in substance.

and may also in like manner authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth and by cities and towns of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses and other like means for —

Substitute for "producing," etc., the words collecting, converting, selling and distributing the necessaries of life.

In deference to the suggestions made in part in debate last week, and also in response to a suggestion which came to me at the week-end from the chairman of the committee on Form and Phraseology, the delegate from Beverly (Mr. Loring), the committee has decided to substitute for the word "producing," which seemed to some members of the Convention too broad and perhaps carrying us too far into what sometimes is called State socialism, the words "collecting and converting;" so that, for instance, there could be no doubt of the Legislature having power to provide a milk distribution station in Boston, at which station it would be entitled possibly to make the excess milk into butter and cheese, and otherwise dispose of it; also to provide for the ordinary processes in canneries, and the manufacturing which is incident to a slaughter-house, but eliminating from the contemplation of this resolution general production and manufacturing. The rest of the change, the Convention will observe, is necessary to provide that legislation duly enacted, whether it comes by the I. and R. or comes by the Legislature, shall be competent to exercise these powers.

I think I have stated now the view of the committee. I might properly add that I understand that the amendment which we have put in covers the desires of Mr. Quincy, for he was good enough to come before the committee, and will eliminate to that extent, so far as he is concerned, the discussion of his amendment.

Mr. Newton of Everett: Will the gentleman kindly read now the amendment as a whole, as he submits it for his committee?

Mr. Anderson: There are half a dozen more copies here; any member who wants to follow, the matter critically may have those copies, and we will have as many more as possible and as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. President, I comply with the request of the delegate.

The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize the taking by purchase or otherwise of food-stuffs, feeds, —

"Feeds" was inserted in deference to a suggestion which came to us.

fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reasonable compensation therefor — and the sale of the same to the inhabitants thereof and Instead of "or" — to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein; the Governor, with the approval of the Council, if he deems that a public exigency exists, may, until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted. The Commonwealth may, by statute duly enacted, authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life and to harvest and to manufacture ice; and may also in like manner authorize the establishment, maintenance and operation by the Commonwealth and by cities and towns of markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses, and other like means for collecting, converting, selling and distributing the necessaries of life.

Mr. Boucher of New Bedford: May I ask the gentleman a question? I see here it says: "authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants." Should you also say "at cost, — to buy and to sell to their inhabitants at cost?"

Mr. Anderson: I do not think I get the question.

Mr. Boucher: It says: "The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted authorize municipalities to buy and to sell to their inhabitants." Would it be right if you include there "at cost" in that amendment?

Mr. Anderson: We had some discussion of that the other day, and I think that the judgment of the committee was that a limitation of that kind in a constitutional grant was unwise. It hardly is to be contemplated that the Legislature would put itself or its mucipalities into business for the purpose of making any exorbitant profit, and it also is not to be contemplated that if the Commonwealth, either by itself or by a subdivision thereof, goes into business for an emergency, it may not be constrained as a business matter at some time to sell at less than cost. It seemed therefore to those of us who studied it critically that it was not desirable in the Constitution to say anything about cost.

Mr. Anderson withdrew the pending amendment previously moved by him and offered a new draft cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Pillsbury withdrew the pending amendment previously moved by him and offered a new draft cited at the beginning of the chapter. He also moved certain amendments of the amendments offered by Messrs. Anderson of Brookline and Edwin U. Curtis of Boston, also cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I sincerely hope that the Convention will not be betrayed into the adoption of the resolution submitted by the committee, or anything like it. It is undoubtedly the broadest, most radical, most far-reaching scheme of State socialism which has ever been submitted to any body possessing public powers in this Commonwealth, and if adopted it will go far toward committing the State to trade in all the necessaries of life. There is nothing in the existing emergency, or in any emergency which is in sight or likely to be, to call for or justify so radical a scheme as this.

At the same time I recognize, though with great regret, that under the somewhat hysterical conditions which unfortunately accompany the sessions of this Convention, something of this kind is likely to be adopted. The problem is to keep it within reasonable limits, so that we may not do more harm than good. In other words, it should be kept within the limits of an emergency measure and not be made a permanent committal of the State to trade in the necessaries of life.
That is the distinction to which I call attention, and the distinction
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

which I have marked and effected in the amendments which I have offered.

There are two fundamental and radical, and to my mind conclusive, objections to the committee's resolution in its present form. One is that it extends to all the necessaries of life. There is no occasion and no justification for going that length. If we confine ourselves to food and food-stuffs, and feeds which I have now inserted in my amendment in deference to the same reasons that led the committee to insert it in theirs, and fuel, in connection with ice, which belongs here only because under certain conditions it is a necessary preservative of food, we shall go as far as the State can possibly hope to go with any advantage to the public. The other fundamental objection to the committee's resolution in its present form, which also I have eliminated from my amendment, is that by providing for the establishment of plants for this business, not only by the Commonwealth but by cities and towns, we have gone far to permanently commit the State to trade in, and practically the production of, all the necessaries of life. That is entirely unnecessary to the measure as an emergency measure, for the reason brought out in my amendment, that if the emergency arises and it becomes necessary to exercise the power, or any part of it, the Commonwealth can take the use of any buildings, structures, machinery or premises which are necessary to the effective exercise of the power, and so does not need to establish and permanently maintain them at the public cost.

The difference between those two things, Mr. President, is most important. If you go the length of the committee's resolution you have permanently committed the State and the cities and towns to trade in all the necessaries of life. For any emergency purpose that is entirely unnecessary, as we can equip ourselves for the emergency without going to that length, and then when the emergency is over we are free of the equipment.

I wish to call to the attention of the Convention what I believe to be the only advantage to be secured by this scheme in any form whatever, either as an emergency measure or a permanent engagement in trade in the necessaries of life, or first, to what cannot be secured by it. If any member of this Convention expects that any reduction of prices of food or fuel or any other article in which the State undertakes to deal is to be secured by engaging the State in trade in that article, he is bound to be disappointed. There is no such thing for the public in this scheme. The State in trade is a demonstrated failure, always has been, undoubtedly always will be. There is not a member of this Convention but knows as well as I do that the government, State or Federal, cannot carry out the business part of its own legitimate governmental functions except at the wildest waste and extravagance. It is hardly too much to say, as somebody said here the other day, that the government pays 100 per cent more than anybody else for anything it has occasion to use. It pays the highest prices for labor, it pays the highest prices for materials, and always uses both to the least advantage. It cannot need demonstration that nothing is to be saved in prices by engaging the State in trade. It will operate to enhance prices, and whatever we get through the intervention of the State we shall get at an enhanced price. Every consumer will have to pay the enhanced price for every pound of product, whatever it is, or if he does not the taxpayer will have to pay it, for it will fall to him unless it is put upon the product, and if put upon the product it will fall upon the consumer.

There is just one thing which in my opinion we may hope from an emergency measure of this character,—one thing and no more. It is possible to conceive that in some emergency,—though I do not anticipate any such thing,—it is possible to conceive that in some emergency, by the intervention of the State's power of eminent domain, we may be able to get food or fuel at some price which otherwise we could not get at all. It will be at an enhanced price, but rather than not have it we should submit to the enhanced price. There is that possible measure of public benefit in this scheme, and no more. The truth of that proposition is demonstrated by all the experience of the exercise of governmental functions in business enterprises. On the other hand, the adoption of the comprehensive scheme submitted by the committee will instantly cast a shadow and a hazard over all private trade in the necessaries of life, and that additional hazard will have to be paid for, whether the State does or does not engage in business. It will have to be paid for from the time when we have advertised that the State is liable to go into this business, and every pound of the product which we buy from the private dealers we shall buy at an enhanced price in view of the fact that we have made that proclamation.

Furthermore, if the State does avail of this power which the committee's resolution proposes to confer, and goes into the business of producing and collecting and converting or supplying the necessaries of life, the inevitable tendency will be to force private enterprise out of the business, and to force the State into it, until the State becomes the only dealer; for private enterprise, as every man in this Convention knows, cannot compete with the government, having the public treasury and the power of taxation behind it.

I shall not enlarge upon these propositions, Mr. President. They are fundamental and need no further demonstration than our own observation already affords.

Now let me say a word in explanation of my amendments. I have proposed a substitute for the committee's resolution, which keeps all features of it that are desirable or permissible in my view of the matter,—and which differs, I will say by way of explanation, from the committee's resolution only in two important particulars. I have incorporated everything else. One difference is that instead of extending to all necessaries of life it is confined to food or food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice. The other is that it eliminates the plant-establishing feature of the last clause of the committee's resolution, which is by far the most pernicious feature, because if that power is conferred and is exercised, the State and cities and towns are permanently committed to trade in the necessaries of life. The power, for all reasons, should be kept to an emergency power, and exercised, if at all, only as an emergency power.

I need say nothing more in explanation of the amendment which I have proposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston at my left (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), except that I have eliminated from it the plant-purchasing feature which is incorporated in his amendment, and substituted for it a power in the State to take the of, and occupy, any building, machinery or structure which may be necessary to the effective exercise of the emergency power of the State to deal in these articles so long as the emergency exists.

Now, Mr. President; if I need to say anything further by way of explanation I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Hall of North Adams: I should like to ask Mr. Pillsbury two questions. First, if he thinks we are through with emergencies that are likely, — I do not say may, — that are likely to arise. If this war continues as long as it already has been going on there are more emergencies ahead of us than food and fuel and ice. When he has answered that question I shall ask him another.

Mr. Pillsbury: I do not think that emergencies are necessarily limited to war conditions. So far from that, I think that we are in greater danger now, and perhaps permanently, from the operations of what is euphemistically called organized labor than we are from any scarcity of food or fuel or any other necessities of life occasioned by the war. It is only a year ago that the strike of the railroad trainmen threatened to paralyze the whole transportation system of the country, which meant possible starvation, and that danger is permanent until we find the means of curing it. I trust that my vision extends as far into the future as that of my friend who put the question, but let us not commit Massachusetts to State socialism, until we know there is occasion for it.

Mr. Hall: Mr. Pillsbury's answer leads me to say that there are other necessities of life than food and ice. Fifty years' experience in the public schools has led me to feel, — has led me to know, I will change that word, — that there are many children in this Commonwealth, who are obliged to attend school every day, properly clothed and with shoes to wear, and if that is not an emergency in civilized life, what is? So let me ask Mr. Pillsbury this question: Is it not possible, if this war continues year after year, that the emergency of clothing and shoes may arise? If so, I will trust the Legislature, because the Legislature represents the people. When an emergency comes I believe in giving the Legislature the power to meet it, just as they have met the other questions. That is all. [Applause.]

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: As a member of the committee on Public Affairs I may seek an opportunity, before the debate closes, to add a few words to the somewhat extended remarks that I made on the subject the other day. I rise now merely for the sake of asking a question of the delegate from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). He must know from what I said the other day in debate that I am very much in sympathy with the views which he has expressed. All I ask him now is whether the only difference, in substance, between his amendment and that offered by the gentleman on his left, the delegate from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), lies in the fact that Mr. Pillsbury's amendment omits the plant feature of the other amendment? Is that the only difference there is?

Mr. Pillsbury: That is the only change effected by my proposed amendment in the resolution offered by my friend from Boston on the left. I have proposed to strike out from his amendment the plant-establishing feature, and to substitute for it the right to take the temporary use, as I have done also in the resolution proposed by the committee.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I shall be glad to have the opinion of the delegate from Wellesley as to whether there is the slightest need of providing any constitutional power on the part of the Common-wealth to take any plant for any public use. If the powers herein, whether limited to emergency or made general, are made for public uses, does it not necessarily follow that the Commonwealth may take either the fee or the use of any plant? If I am right in that point does it not follow that it is unnecessary to lumber up the Constitution either with the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Boston or with his proposed substitute? I am quite in accord with the view that as an emergency matter the power to take either the use or the fee of a plant ought to accrue, but I do not see any necessity of putting it into the Constitution.

Mr. Pillsbury: I am indebted to my friend for putting the question, because it affords me an opportunity to say what I might and perhaps should have said when I was up before. It is not necessary, in my opinion, to make any change in the Constitution in order to confer upon the Legislature this power to take the use of plants or machinery. I have put that into my amendment only in order that it may not lose any votes from a doubt whether that can be done. I have asked the Convention to strike out from the committee's amendment, and that offered by my friend from Boston on my left, the plant-purchasing and plant-establishing features of the respective amendments. I have given the Convention a clear, definite, certain and better substitute for it, of which the Convention can avail itself if it desires to. I put it there in order that there may be no doubt about it, as I say, and that no member of the Convention need hesitate to vote for my amendment from any doubt whether the Commonwealth, under my amendment, could be properly equipped for emergency business in food or fuel if it has occasion to go into it.

Mr. Balch of Boston: The zeal and ingenuity of the chairman of the committee having this matter in charge has resulted in our having a new official draft of the amendment before us at each session since we have entertained it for consideration. That fact has tended to make some confusion, which now has reached its peak or maximum by reason of the fact that we have not before us in print the last form of the amendment. We have further confusion by reason of the overlapping of various amendments. It does not appear to me how clarity is to be produced out of this somewhat chaotic condition of affairs, but out of it all comes this fact, at least, that the great issue on this question before the Convention is whether or not we wish to introduce a socialistic system as a permanency, or whether we merely wish it to be used in abnormal times.

The purpose of my amendment, which I admit deserves the condemnation Mr. Anderson has given it for verbosity, was solely to raise that question alone, and with the object of making that absolutely clear I sacrificed brevity. I purposely refrained from suggesting any changes whatever in Mr. Anderson's text. I did not wish to complicate the issue I was trying to raise with any secondary issues whatever. I shall address my remarks, regardless of the form of my amendment or of whatever amendment the point comes up under, to the single question of whether or not we want to go into socialism as a permanent thing, as a normal system for the State, or whether we will keep paternalism for abnormal times.
In the course of my remarks yesterday I pointed out that if the State or any part of it, with unlimited capital and credit, buying at cost or less, and selling at cost or less, with no overhead charges, making no profit, once goes into business, the middleman in that business,—the dealer in that case,—is automatically wiped out. He cannot compete. Every day he keeps his shop open he loses more money. He has got to close up. That means a certain number of suicides, a certain number of broken up homes, a certain amount of suffering. Over that I think we ought not to waste too many tears. If we are conscripting the lives of our young men, the fortunes of our rich men, the health of our civilian workers, we need not hesitate too much in conscripting the livelihoods of certain classes in the community, no matter though that class be personally undeserving of the misfortunes thrust upon it.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect of it; that is the aspect of the producer. Every man who sells eggs, every man who sells potatoes, every man who sells shoes, every little dealer,—every little producer, I should say; I am not now talking about the dealer,—every little producer of any necessaries of life, after this system has once been introduced a little while, will have just one man he can sell to, one person he can sell to, and that is the public, the Commonwealth, and none other; and he will receive from the Commonwealth, or any portion of it that has gone into his business, just exactly what it chooses to pay him, and not a cent more. I illustrated that by asking what it was likely that the city of Boston would pay the market-gardeners of Arlington for their market truck, if the city wiped out the marketmen, as it would do if it adopted the proposed system, and made itself the sole possible purchaser. I suggested that the officials of the city of Boston, with an eye on Boston votes, trying to please the Boston populace, would pay just as little as they could. Mr. Brown of Brockton suggested that economic law would make it good business for the city to pay to these marketmen a fair price, so as to keep them in business, and keep some stuff coming into market. My reply was that on the basis of hard experience I had very little faith in the ability of the officials of the city of Boston to see that it was better business for them to follow economic laws in every case than it was for them to seek votes in Boston. I would further reply to him now that even if the government of the city of Boston should seek to follow out sound economic law, that economic law would lead them to pay the market-gardeners the least possible price that would keep body and soul together, and that is the way that economic law would work out in practice throughout the Commonwealth. The small producer, under the proposed system, will receive the lowest conceivable price which will keep him in business, excepting so far as that harsh law is modified by what political pull he may have.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a big question whether we wish to adopt any such system of German paternalism, made in Germany, as that, as the normal system of life in this Commonwealth. Mr. Harriman, the gentleman from New Bedford, made a perfectly fair and most striking argument in favor of adopting that as the normal system. He says, with perfect frankness, that a time of public exigency exists all the time; that it is normal to have so much suffering that we are justified in adopting paternalism as the normal remedy. He says that the lower grades of hand-workers receive only from $12 to $15 a week, they cannot raise their families on that, and the Commonwealth must step in and furnish them with food and clothing. My answer to that is that in so far as the fact is true, and unfortunately I believe it to be true to a considerable extent, that is not the way the Commonwealth should help. It should not peddle out charity to them. It should see to it that they receive sufficient from their labor to be able to support themselves and raise families. Mr. Harriman should raise, not the suggestion of importing the German system of State socialism or paternalism, but of seeing to it that our economic structure throughout is such that the lowest paid worker receives sufficient for his labor to support himself in reasonable comfort.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to hear the gentleman on his theory that the State should see to it that the worker gets a living wage. Just how is the State going to do it? That is what we are after.

Mr. Balch: I think the gentleman knows more than I do about how it should be done. I had supposed that there were means, through the minimum wage commissions, and other means, of working toward that desirable end.

Mr. Brown: I want to say, in all frankness, we do not know how to do it. We do claim that under the Constitution a man has the right to life, and he has the right to happiness, and he has the right to acquire property. He cannot acquire property because other property rights are more powerful. Now, if you can tell us, if you can tell the labor people, how it is possible for the State to act so that a man can get a living wage, you are our Moses to lead us from the wilderness.

Mr. Balch: Unfortunately, I am not Moses, Mr. Chairman. I do, however, still maintain, in spite of not being Moses, that that is the proper aim, the proper end and aim for all, and that the proper way to treat the problem of insufficient wages is not to dole out charity.

Mr. Brown: Permit me just a moment. Would not the State be justified in using power to protect the weak against the extortion of the strong? If it be demonstrated that the strong do have the power to take from the weak, is it the duty of Massachusetts to control the strong?

Mr. Balch: Mr. Brown begs the question, it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, in a most singular manner. He assumes that the farmer is the strong and the textile worker the weak. I am not aware of any such assumption. Why, he wants the State to say: "Here, we will take a dollar out of the farmer's pocket and give it to the textile worker, because the textile worker wants it and the farmer has got it." I see no logic or justice in that whatever.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I do not like to have the impression go out that anything that the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman) has said, — or any other gentleman in this Convention who is a representative of labor, — I do not want the impression to go out that a labor representative has attempted to take anything away from the farmers and to give it to the textile worker or to any other class of organized or unorganized labor; and the statement of the speaker would give that impression to the Convention.
Mr. Balch: What I have said would give that impression because that is the absolute fact. That is the way the measure now proposed will work out in practice. The gentleman may not like to have such an impression go out, but that impression will go out to everybody who reads this measure intelligently.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the debate on this question, and to me it is not a new debate. I have heard it debated in previous Legislatures and to me it is rather refreshing to have this subject listened to with the degree of attention that has been accorded it in this Convention. I can assure the members of this Convention that when this matter ever was attempted to be discussed in the Legislatures of previous years it was the subject of sneers, and it really did me good when I heard the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Powers) go as far as he did in saying that he was an absolute believer in the Commonwealth taking charge of the coal supply.

Now, Mr. President, as I said, it is very refreshing to have attention given to this subject and I am sure the issue is very clearly drawn here in this matter as between the amendment of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) as represented by his committee, and the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), because there are two striking differences. Either we are in favor of this proposition that will let the Commonwealth go a step forward, or we are helping to keep the law as it is at the present time, and the Constitution as it is at the present time. I believe that the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley will not alter the Constitution as it is at the present time in the slightest degree. So the whole question, Mr. President, in my mind is, do we want to take a step forward in this direction?

I will take up some of the things that the Commonwealth is asked to go into, the businesses that it is asked to go into, and see whether or not it is such a terrible proposition as some of its opponents seem to say. Is there any exigency that you can picture greater than conditions in a hot summer when the younger children of the Commonwealth need to have the milk, which is to support their lives, kept so that it will be digestible and fit for use? Does not that exigency occur every summer? Is there any reason in the world why this Commonwealth should not go into the business of selling to its inhabitants, or a subdivision of the Commonwealth selling to its inhabitants, congealed water, when they sell the fluid water? But that proposition, they say, is socialism. We ask that cities and towns be allowed to take the ice from the ponds and the great lakes in their different communities, and establish an ice cutting plant, or an ice storage plant therein so that every child and every family in that city or town can have ice at something like reasonable cost.

Mr. President, it is only a few years ago since we were obliged to pass a law making it a crime if an ice dealer of this Commonwealth refused to sell to the poor people ice in small quantities. There was a time when the ice dealers absolutely refused to sell ice to poor persons who could not afford to buy any more than five cents' worth of ice at a time. They refused to sell in small quantities and this Commonwealth presents the spectacle to the civilized world of making it a crime when an ice dealer refuses to sell five cents' worth of ice to a poor person in Massachusetts. Even that law is hedged around with such provisions that the poor persons must go to the ice cart to get ice. They cannot have five cents' worth of ice delivered at their door, but they must go to the ice dealer's vehicle for it and be refused there before it is a crime. I wonder whether the gentlemen who are putting these other limitations on the committee's proposed amendment are willing to say: "We believe that the Legislature at least ought to be permitted to pass laws so that the cities and towns of the Commonwealth can establish ice-houses, and harvest and sell ice to their people at a reasonable cost." Why, we have been told here this year, and we see it in the public prints, that the ice dealers of this Commonwealth met at some hotel in the springtime, and they told us brazenly that they had fixed the price at which every man who dealt in ice in the Commonwealth must sell it, regardless of whether or not conditions in one town are the same as conditions in another, and they told us what we should pay per hundred pounds for ice.

Let me ask the gentleman from Wellesley, does he feel that his amendment should be so limited that no city or town should be permitted to provide for the keeping or harvesting of ice for its citizens unless there was a war, or does he not really recognize that an emergency exists here every summer, in our climate, when ice is indispensable? I should like to see an amendment come from the gentleman from Newton, who made such an eloquent statement on the coal situation, showing that he was at least not in accord with the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley, and let us decide that in necessary fuel at least the people of this Commonwealth ought to be given the right to buy and sell it at a reasonable price to the inhabitants. But we see nothing of that kind offered. Their whole objection results in this proposition: That under no circumstances can the people of this Commonwealth or its subdivisions do anything toward eliminating the suffering that is brought on the people by unrestrained monopolies and combinations which control the necessaries of life.

Now, let us look at the practical side of this matter, Mr. President. Is it such a heinous thing as they tell us, in permitting this Commonwealth or the cities and towns therein to deal in some of the necessaries of life that are so essential to the health and happiness of the people? Take the little town I come from, the town of Hopkinton. We raise there chiefly farm produce. The working people of the town, in large numbers work in the factories. The men who are running the farms, in the fall, after they have harvested their crops of potatoes and corn, and what not, instead of keeping those things for the use of the people of the town, are obliged to send their produce into the Boston or Worcester markets in order to get their money to prepare for new crops. They cannot wait until the people of the town of Hopkinton are ready to use and ready to buy them as individuals. The farmers want their money quickly, and you cannot blame them. They simply bring their produce in to the Boston market for that purpose. Now, along in December, January or February, then the people of Hopkinton require those things themselves. There is not any supply in the town to meet the demand of the people for the things that these farmers have raised. Everything has been sent out of the town. The grocers or dealers of the town then have to come to Boston, and instead of being able to buy these very things from the farmers of the town, they are compelled to buy the same crops in Boston. In other words they journey to Boston and buy the same identical things that were shipped out of town in September or October and transport them back to Hopkinton.

See the waste there is there. Would it not be very much more economical if the town were allowed, or the people of the towns acting collectively were allowed, to establish storehouses and cold storage plants, whereby the very things that they raised could be conserved and kept for the time when the people of that community must need them? I cannot see for the life of me why this waste that we see every day going on in our town cannot be eliminated. The waste of transporting out of the town the very things we shall want again, and then bringing them right back again, is uneconomical. With this unnecessary double transportation eliminated we could save at least something for the people and not have them obliged to pay high prices partly due to the cost of this uneconomical and unnecessary labor and transportation.

We are not asking this Convention to pass laws. Why, the men who opposed the I. and R. pleaded with us to trust the Legislature. Well, let us trust the Legislature. It is not going to do anything very radical in Massachusetts. The Legislature reflects the opinions of the people of Massachusetts and will not do anything radical. I can vouch for that. From my experience gained by service in two Massachusetts Legislatures, there will not be any radical action taken if you trust the Legislature with this law-making power. There will be lots of time for discussion and deliberation before there will be any progressive action by that body.

All we ask is a simple change in our Constitution now,—now, when we are here assembled for the purpose of revising or changing our Constitution. We ask that a provision be adopted so that when the Legislature of this Commonwealth desires to act on these matters it shall have the power to do so. We are asking the men who have told us so much about confiding in the Legislature to have that same confidence in it, so that we can empower it with this right. You say that it does not abuse power; you say that it gives ample consideration to questions and we agree with you. We ask you to give it that power. We are not going to establish any laws by our act in passing this amendment. We simply are saying to you: Let the Legislature have the power to act when the time comes that it ought to act, and not limit it to the so-called exigency or emergency clause, because, as has been well said on the floor of this Convention, the exigency, God knows, occurs a great many more times than any of us care to see. I do not know who is going to construe this question of the existence of an exigency. Every time that an occasion for action by the Legislature occurs it has to have an affirmative opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court that this particular time of exigency has arrived,—and yet that is what you are going to do if you limit this amendment to exigencies or emergencies.

I am not going to take up much more of the time of this Convention on this question. It is not any new thing to me. It has been well said here, the necessity for this amendment has arisen a great many times, and it is here at the present time. I have been criticized, mocked and jeered in former years, and called a socialist and anarchist, because of my advocacy of a similar measure in the Legislature; and to me it is a very hopeful sign for our Commonwealth when this Convention, composed as it is of men of all shades of opinion, are willing to discuss and consider this question as they have at this time. I do hope that this amendment will go through as recommended by the committee. I think it will redound to the credit of this Commonwealth. Its adoption is not going to affect adversely the credit of the Commonwealth or retard business men from coming here. We are not going to make such a drastic change in our business laws as the gentleman from Wellesley fears. We still are to be protected by that Legislature in which he asks us to have so much confidence.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I desire to make what might be called a change in the figures which I gave here the other day. In discussing the coal situation I gave figures of the cost of bringing coal from the mines in Pennsylvania, without profit to any one, to the home of the consumer. I stated at the time I gave these figures that they were figures which I had secured by an investigation made about two years ago. There is no question but that the figures I gave were applicable two years ago, but are not applicable at present prices. Some of the people engaged in coal production and in dealing in coal have called my attention to it, and said they thought I had misled the Convention by the statistics I gave in my speech last week. I told them I felt sure that I had not in any way misled the Convention by anything I said, because what I then said had all the qualifications, but that I would be more than pleased to give to the Convention those figures, which I have no doubt are correct.

I have taken occasion to go over the invoices of the coal dealers who have brought coal to Boston and delivered it, and I find these to be the present costs of producing coal and also of delivering coal in Boston. I stated the other day that the cost of Lehigh egg coal on board the cars at the mines was $3.20, and that is true, that it was the cost two years ago; but the present price —

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Have you, in connection with those figures, anything to show what the miner gets?

Mr. Powers: I was going to state what the miner did get. The Lehigh Valley Coal Company owns mines and produces coal. That coal they sell to the wholesaler and to the retailer at the present time. Two years ago the coal was sold by the miner at $3.20 for a long ton of 2,240 pounds of coal.

Mr. Brown: The gentleman has not got my question. I mean by the miner the man who breaks down the coal. What does he get a ton for getting the coal ready for the one whom you call the miner to sell? What is the wage cost per ton?

Mr. Powers: I do not know what a worker in the mines gets as wages. I know what the miner, the one who produces the coal, who owns the mine, I know what he sells his coal for on the cars. Two years ago Lehigh egg coal was sold at $3.20 a ton. To-day they are selling the same kind of coal for $4.65 a ton. The railroads are bringing coal to-day at the same cost as they brought it two years ago to Boston, which is $2.55. The State tax in Pennsylvania remains the same at eight cents. That makes the total cost of the coal when it arrives in Boston on board the cars, with freight paid, $7.28.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. James J. Brennan of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Newton if, in his argument, he also is going to talk about the other method of transporting coal to Boston, or any point in New England, by way of water, and the cost of two years ago.

Mr. Powers: The cost of bringing hard coal by water two years ago was slightly less than bringing it by rail.

Mr. Brennan: I should like to ask the gentleman from Newton if he has figured specifically on that, — how much slightly smaller?

Mr. Powers: Why, Mr. President, there is a competing rate between water and rail. Now, for instance, a car-load of coal which is brought through to Boston from the Pennsylvania mines is charged at the rate of $2.55 a ton. The purpose of making that low rate to Boston is to compete with the coal that is brought via tidewater. The cost on that same ton of coal in Newton, where I live, is $3 a ton, that is, the dealer in Newton, the retail dealer, has to pay 45 cents more a ton, although he is eight miles farther to the westward, than the dealer in Boston, who is eight miles to the eastward, pays on the same car-load of coal. Now, there is but a slight difference between the freight rates from the Pennsylvania mines on anthracite coal, whether it comes by water or whether it comes by rail, because the anthracite mines in Pennsylvania are inland, and the coal has to be brought down largely to Perth Amboy in New Jersey and there loaded onto the steamers and taken around to the harbor in Boston. Then it has to be lightered out from the steamers in Boston and brought up to the wharf. So that the cost is practically the same whether it is brought by water or whether it is brought by rail to Boston.

Mr. Brennan: I ask these questions because I think that as far as discharging coal in Boston is concerned the gentleman from Newton, although he has made some study of it, knows very little compared with myself, because that has been my business for fifteen years. When he says that in all cases it is necessary to bring a steamer or barge or a vessel of any sort into the harbor of Boston, or any other harbor in New England, and then lighten the coal, either bituminous or anthracite, I think he is trying to mislead this Convention. One of the efforts on the part of the coal dealer in Boston, or any other port, is to get a vessel of a draft, if possible, to bring it up to his dock and eliminate that cost of lighter ing the coal.

Mr. Powers: But the gentleman overlooks the fact that the coal, after it reaches the dock in Boston, has to be distributed, and it is carried up the rivers or it is carried around by rail; and, in those cases, if it goes up the rivers, as it formerly went up the Charles River and as it to-day goes up the Mystic River, it has to be lightered into smaller barges, so that the expense when it reaches a point, for instance, like Brighton, is substantially the same whether it comes by water or whether it comes by rail.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman from Newton, there being no such raise of wages during the past two years, can he explain why the price jumps? Before we commence to get coal, when it leaves the mines, why does the price jump?

Mr. Powers: That is assuming that wages have not changed in the last two years, and I have assumed that they have changed. I saw in the paper this morning that the miners were insisting upon what they said was a further advance in wages. Now, if it be true that it costs the producer, that is, the miner, no more to get his coal out of the mine now than it did two years ago, then his profit must be very much larger now than it was two years ago.

Mr. Brown: I was about to say to the gentleman, they are now working under an agreement, and the agreement has not expired; I mean the wage-workers. I am trying to discover if there is any justification for the jump in price as you give it.

Mr. Powers: I do not know whether there is any justification or not, but I am satisfied of this: From my investigation within the last three days, that it costs the retail dealer for his coal in Pennsylvania $1.45 more per ton than it did two years ago.

Mr. Brown: I do not doubt it.

Mr. Powers: The cost to the retail dealer for his coal when it reaches Boston to-day on the cars is $7.28 per long ton, which, reduced to a short ton of 2,000 pounds, leaves an actual cost of $6.55. That is a much higher figure than the one I gave last week. Then I am told by the retail dealer that the cost of delivering coal, with the present price of wages, amounts to about $1.50 per ton. I stated the other day that I thought delivery ought to be made for less than a dollar, — 80 cents. Call it $1.50 a ton. That makes the cost to the retail dealer to-day $8.05 per ton, and that allows him no profit upon his capital in the business.

Now there is another explanation that I want to make, and it appears that since the government has undertaken to exercise its influence over the production and distribution of coal the retail dealer to-day can buy direct from the mine. That he could not do two years ago, and that is to his advantage. And I am further informed that within the last three months what is known as the middleman has been largely eliminated.

Now I state these facts believing them to be facts and believing it to be my duty to lay these facts before this Convention while this resolution is under consideration. I said the other day that I did not believe the retail coal dealer, — that is, the man we deal with, — received unreasonable profits from carrying on the business. I am satisfied that the retail dealer to-day is making only a reasonable profit upon his investment in the business of buying and selling coal.
And with these facts before the Convention I have nothing further to say upon the coal situation.

I do want to say before I take my seat just a word upon the general proposition. We are trying to cure what is called an evil. We are trying to do it through what is called collective ownership or socialism. We in New England, however, must remember that what we are suffering from to-day is that we are not getting the production that is necessary to supply our population.

Now my friend from Fitchburg here (Mr. Lowe), who always has been more or less of a philosopher and with whom I always like to talk and get his ideas, says that the trouble is that we have left the farm, that we have come to the centers of population and that the time has come when we have got to return to the land. Well, I returned to the land two years ago. I set an example to the Convention.
I have had a mighty hard time, though, in dealing with the land the past season. I went into the farming business believing that I could produce enough on that farm up in New Hampshire to feed the entire population of the metropolitan district, and I would have accomplished that if I had been properly aided by the Almighty. But the trouble was, we have had the driest spell up in that section that we have had for seventy-five years. We have had no rain since about the first of June and what little was left was frozen up about the first of September. I have a good deal of sympathy with the farmer who lives in that particular region. But let me say to you, Mr. President, and to you gentlemen of the Convention, that the trouble that has come to us in New England is that we are not self-supporting. Now Mr. Theodore N. Vail, who has studied this question as carefully, perhaps, as any man in New England, says that New England could become self-supporting agriculturally if the people saw fit to do it. He firmly believes in that proposition. My memory goes back to the time when the New England farmer produced practically everything that was necessary for the support of his family. Years ago they decided they would go into what was called specialized farming and give up the general farming. In the old days they raised corn and they raised all kinds of grain; they raised all kinds of stock. They supported the family and they had produce that they sent to the centers of population. Then they found that they could not compete with the great west in raising corn and in raising wheat, and they gave it up. And what has been the result? The result is to-day that without grain they cannot feed their stock; they cannot afford to buy grain of the west at present prices. I agree very fully with my friend from Fitchburg that the time has come to return to the land. My belief is that New England, by cultivating the land, by producing for feeding its population in this dense territory, can change absolutely these conditions that we are complaining of to-day and attempting to change by legislation.

Mr. Brown: Knowing that the gentleman has the knowledge, I am going to ask him this question: Does he not think that the economic distance between the west and the east as expressed in transportation figures has increased so largely within a few years that we can economically compete with the west if we improve our opportunities? I am calling his attention now to the economic distance we are from that coal mine because of the charges they put upon us, and it is equally true of grain. I think he gets my question.

Mr. Powers: I think the gentleman from Brockton is quite right. But I have taken more time than I intended to. I simply throw out this idea, as to whether legislation that has in view the promotion of agriculture in Massachusetts is not going to serve us quite as well as any legislation that we are likely to enact or any provision that we are likely to put into the Constitution excepting greater authority to the Legislature. In other words, has not the time come when we ought to look into this question of production? In other words, has not the time come when we ought to see if we cannot increase what may be called the food production of Massachusetts and to study the methods by which that increase may be assured?

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I was very deeply interested in the remarks by the delegate from Newton this morning, and especially in that part of the remarks that refers to the New England farmer. I am in deep sympathy with him on that score. And inasmuch as he seems deeply interested I should like to call to his attention some of the remarks made by the Commissioner of Food and Markets of the State of New York. "There is only one big question to be settled in connection with the high cost of food, and that question should be settled once and for all," said John J. Dillon, State Commissioner of Foods and Markets of the State of New York. I shall not read all that he says, but I shall give a few of the facts that he states. He says that after an extended and careful investigation of the food situation in the State of New York he finds that out of every dollar that the consumer pays, only 35 cents goes to the producer and 65 cents remains in the hands of the middleman.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the honorable gentleman how he will correct and remedy this condition that allows the middleman to retain 15 per cent more than a half of all that the consumers pay? How is the farmer to be induced to increase his production under these conditions? Furthermore, Mr. Dillon said to the Legislature of New York last year: "Give me the funds with which to enter upon this work and I can reduce very materially the cost of living to the consumer." The Legislature, controlled by the big interest, so he says, refused to give him the money. He was powerless. I simply give these facts in addition to statements that I made the other day, because they have come into my possession since that time.

Mr. Donovan of Lawrence: First I wish to call the attention of the Convention to one argument which might be advanced in support of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Brookline. It is contained in chapter 342 of the Acts of 1917: "An Act to provide for the better defence of the Commonwealth in time of war." In section 6 it is provided that —

Whenever the Governor shall believe it necessary or expedient for the purpose of better securing the public safety or the defence or welfare of the Commonwealth, he may with the approval of the Council take possession: (a) Of any land or buildings, machinery or equipment. (b) Of any horses, vehicles, etc. (c) Of any cattle, poultry and any provisions for man and beast, etc.

And then this language is used:

for the better protection or welfare of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants.

Going on:

as he shall deem for the interests of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants, and may in particular, when in his opinion the public exigency so requires, sell or distribute gratuitously to or upon any of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth anything taken under clause (c) of this section, and may fix minimum and maximum prices therefor.

And, gentlemen, that came from the conservative Legislature which we have tossed about in this Convention. But there has been a question raised as to its constitutionality. It is imperatively necessary that that bill be constitutional. And as one argument I advance in support of the resolution of the gentleman from Brookline that if we put this on the ballot it absolutely makes this bill constitutional.

We, I believe, from our standpoint can go a little farther than the Legislature and pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Brookline.

The gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Balch) says he sees no reason existing for this resolution, — no reason existing, — and he talks about a certain emergency that we are in now. Why, that joke of the high cost of living, which has been a serious joke, was on the vaudeville stage before this war began. It is no emergency of to-day; it has been on for ten years and probably back for twenty years. We have talked about the high cost of living and we have seen things soar and rise. He objects because he says it extends to all the necessities of life. If it is good for some of the necessities of life why is it not good for all the necessities of life? He fears that the establishment of plants will commit the State to trade and he doubts the wisdom of doing this, and he says that there is waste when the State goes into trade. There have been failures, probably, in the past. But I call his attention to this: When he says there is no reason to believe that it will lower prices, I say this: There is reason to believe, even if the other is debatable, that it will tend to stop the rise in prices. And I call his attention to the fact that with the institution of the parcels post system by the Federal Government, — I ask him if he has the figures; I have not them available, but I know in a general way that the cost of sending, consigning and delivering express packages dropped in some cases over 50 per cent. The extension of the parcel post meant there that a government business brought down monopoly almost to its knees.

Another thing: This is not giving power directly to the cities to do this thing without the permission of the Legislature. And I am sure from the defence made by the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Balch) and his friends of that Legislature, he should be the last one to fear that they might do something which would be unwise for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I find it hard to make consistent the argument used by the gentleman in the first division who spoke first in favor of this amendment and the gentleman from Boston in the first division on the question of labor. I do not represent organized labor, but when one man says: "The greatest fear is from organized labor," and the other man in opposition says: "Give the laborer more money so he can pay for these things," I fail to find how these two arguments can be consistent in opposition. I do know this, gentlemen, that in my city of Lawrence there has been an unreasonable advance in the price of ice this year. I know that, and I know that there are hundreds of families in this Commonwealth and a great many of them in my city on whose table meat never goes because of the high price. And when I hear in this Convention men talk about abolishing the middleman and of the fear that there may be suicides or other harm come from it, I ask of them: "What of the thousands of people in this State who probably are nearly starved or at least robbed of all they earn to pay for the cost of living?" I have no sympathy for the man who retains 65 cents of every dollar that is spent for food or the necessities of life. I tell you, gentlemen, that this measure for practical and immediate results is the most important resolution that has been before this Convention since we have sat here; that in my mind it is more important than any initiative and referendum, because the initiative and referendum to the general average person is in the abstract until it is instituted and takes some time before it is put into practice. But this measure is of the utmost vital importance and it will raise the estimation of this Convention in the whole Commonwealth of Massachusetts if we get behind the resolution offered by the gentleman from Brookline and pass it. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER of Brockton: I should like to ask the learned gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), if his amendment is accepted, if it would not stop the city of Brockton or any other municipality from erecting a slaughter-house or cannery to be used each and every year as the product is raised for the benefit of the people. I believe the committee on Public Affairs has been very careful. I believe the last measure that they submitted is about as good as it can be and be of benefit to the whole people.

Mr. WELLMAN of Topsfield: We all, I suppose, desire that the necessities of life shall be cheap and abundant. It is proposed to make them so in this resolution by having the Commonwealth and the various cities and towns go into business. It is assumed, apparently, in this debate, that if this is done it will make these necessities of life abundant and reasonable in price. I have listened in vain for anything in the line of proof to meet that proposition. It does not seem to me that we should pass this resolution unless that can be clearly shown. It seems to me that there is the very greatest danger that if this business is entered into by the Commonwealth and the cities and towns it will have precisely the opposite effect from what is proposed. I happen to know something about the matter of production in this Commonwealth. I live in a community which is a farming community in the midst of manufacturing communities. I know something of what has been done this year in regard to food production. I believe without doubt that in Massachusetts we can produce vastly more than we are now producing. I have seen in that community herd after herd destroyed and sold, and milk is high and difficult to obtain. But I believe with all my heart that the passage of such a resolution as this is a blow at the production of milk and other food-stuffs in this Commonwealth, and I think that that should be seriously considered when we pass it. I do not see, Mr. President, how it is reasonable for any man who thinks upon this subject and understands what is going on in Massachusetts to expect that we should do other than decrease the production in Massachusetts by the passage of this resolution.

Is there any reason whatever to believe that the cities and towns in this Commonwealth under the management we now have can do successful business? Is not the reverse absolutely true? Is it not true that we are at our wit's end to make them do well the business they now have, and if we put more burdens on them is it not reasonably certain to increase the expense and prevent production? I cannot see, Mr. President, what the gentleman imagines will happen by the passage of this resolution, with the facts of every day before us.

Now this scheme, I am aware, is worked in Germany, and I know perfectly well what some of the Germans think about it, for I know what they have said about it. They have said that their system would fail absolutely in America so long as we keep in our cities and towns a democratic system of government. They believe that State collectivism can succeed only when there is despotism and autocracy at its head. That is the German system and I hope we shall not adopt it. I ask that the members of this Convention pause before they pass a resolution which in all its tendencies is directly the opposite of what it is proposed to accomplish. [Applause.]
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I am delighted that the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Wellman) has made the statement that he has, because I take it that that is absolutely self-evident, that we have got to change our system of civil service or we have got to give up all idea that we ever can become a cheaply producing community. That I take to be absolutely self-evident.

Continuing after the recess Mr. Adams said:

I apprehend that the moment is approaching when this Convention may reach the parting of the ways. We either can adjourn altogether and go home and mind our own business, when at least we shall not be ridiculous, or we can treat this business by framing a Constitution seriously. We have not so treated it, in my opinion, hitherto. A Constitution is not a thing which you can handle in scraps. A Constitution is a whole. It is based on one or another of two systems of human competition, and you have got to take one or the other of those systems, for government cannot be maintained otherwise. If we propose to leave things as they are then let us go home; and if we do not propose to leave things as they are, let us consider what the present condition of the world is and act accordingly. It would take us some considerable time to get to the bottom of the difficulty we are in if our difficulty is to be measured by the gravity of this war.

As I take it, this war measures our responsibility. It is measured by that, and by nothing else. And this is the reason why: It is measured thus because war is nothing but human competition in its intensest form. It is only a form of conflagration, of fire. No country can go through war and not have its competition changed, its methods of competition changed, because its environment has changed. The crucial question now is: What is the issue before us? The issue before us, to my mind, is perfectly obvious. It is absolutely plain. We have been brought up in one system of competition, that is, the individualistic, in which the individual takes the rake-off and is encouraged in doing so, and that system is founded on waste, and on nothing but waste. Or you can have conversely a system in which the rake-off goes to the community. It is a system commonly called socialistic. You can call it anything you like, collective or anything else, but it is a cheaper system than the other. The other system, the individualistic system, cannot stand against it if the collective system is properly administered. That is certain. It has been proved in this war on a gigantic scale, and if we want any further proof we have only got to go on and try the individualistic system ourselves, in competition. We shall find out very soon. Let us go home ourselves and start in individualistic competition. We can go home and prove it. We shall fight until we have finished, by exhaustion probably, and we shall find out then which is the cheaper, which is the more effective, the collective or the individualistic. Now, then, gentlemen, this is a serious question, and we cannot blink it, and if you want to go home, go home and be honest about it; and if you do not want to go home, do not fuss about it, but take hold of it yourselves at the bottom and consider it seriously. There is no other way out of it.

Here we have got all sorts of opinion. We have taken this thing up by odds and ends, making confusion, and we never can arrive at anything else on that basis. The solution has got to be found in the scientific way or left alone, and as we are situated at the present time the best thing we can do is to leave it alone. I do not think we are prepared to take it up scientifically. I do not think this Convention is in a scientific temper. But if it is in the scientific temper let us be serious about it. And the first thing we have got to consider is the rake-off. Who is going to have the rake-off? Who is going to take the profit? When you have decided on that, then you can decide. Until you have determined that, it is no use.

My friend in the first division just now said that the desirable citizen to care for is the individual,—that is frank, that is his theory,—and there is the issue. I do not believe he is right; but we can try it. In five, ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, forty years we shall know, because this thing is not going to be put down, this convulsion is not going to be stopped quickly. I do not mean to say that the war will be continuous. I do not at all mean to say that it will last without intermission. Take, for instance, the last great war of this kind that happened. It began on a modest scale. It was a seven years' war. They then had peace which lasted awhile and then the natural sequence came in the American Revolution. That consumed six or eight years, and then peace intervened for another six or seven years, and then the French Revolution opened, which ended with Waterloo in 1815. That is sixty years, sixty years of one great catastrophe, which had a perfectly definite beginning and a perfectly definite conclusion and ended at a certain point, before they arrived at an equilibrium. That equilibrium lasted fifty or sixty years and now that same thing is up before us.

I proposed an amendment to this proposition of the committee, not because I expected this Convention to adopt it; I am under no such delusion. I do not think this Convention is going to adopt that proposition. I think it would be wise if it did, on one condition; that is to say, supposing our society has come up to the point where it can administer the country so that the system can be well carried out. But that can be done only if you have a proper civil service, if you have a proper organization, and I would be the last to suggest that we should launch suddenly into collective administration without any foundation for it. That would be suicidal, of course, and every man who knows anything about these questions knows it would be suicidal. You cannot take a great Nation and throw it suddenly into complex collectivism and hope to succeed; it is impossible. We have got to proceed step by step.

My friend from Boston in the second division (Mr. Quincy) has got a series of propositions which he proposes presently to introduce. Part of them relate to the civil service. His success in carrying his propositions would affect very much, of course, my views of the judiciousness of adopting my resolution. It is no use my advocating such a resolution as I have introduced unless the gentleman from Boston has a very considerable success with his propositions for a civil service.

Now, that is an instance of how these questions are collective. They hang together. You cannot have a single alteration injected into an antiquated Constitution. You cannot put new wine into old bottles. That is utterly out of the question; it always has been ever since the time of the Scriptures. You cannot put new wine into old bottles.
We are undertaking to introduce new wine, and we cannot put it into the old bottles. We have got to have a new Constitution to suit new contingencies, or else we had better go home.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I want to ask the gentleman, would he rather take chances with the present system or with the possible danger that he speaks about in this collectivity?

Mr. Adams: Frankly, Mr. President, I would rather take chances as we are, because, there we have something which at least is now comprehended. It is at least solid. It may be 150 years old, may be 200 years old. It may be nonsense under the conditions under which we are now living. All the same, I would rather take my chances under that than get in the condition which Lincoln feared,—that of swapping horses when crossing a stream. If the gentleman is not prepared to go into this issue to the bottom, and consider this thing scientifically and properly, he had better go home, and so had the rest of us. He asked me my opinion. I can give him my opinion only. That is my frank opinion. This condition of things is very serious. It is not a laughing matter. It is not safe for us to say: "Oh, we don't happen to like the German system. We won't have it. We won't have it; we ought not to have it." For it is there.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman if he believes that action taken by this Convention would in any way stay the forces that are at work in the direction to which he refers.

Mr. Adams: I do not believe it would stay the forces in the least. I think it would disorganize us, that is all, and we do not want that. God knows we are disorganized enough; we do not want to be disorganized any more. Stay where you are or move ahead until you get somewhere. Here half this Convention say: "Oh, you must not, you know, let a town have a common cow. You must not let anything be done for the public. If you do you are going to ruin some producer or other." For Heaven's sake, then, let us go home and satisfy the producer, satisfy the individual. Let us take care of him. Let us take care of somebody at least. But if you really are going to do men's work, why, then, you have got to start at the beginning and do something constructive and recognize that it is just as possible for men to administer a great community as a small one. It is just as easy, or at least possible, for us to administer ninety million people as it is a household. Why not? Of course it is. It is only a question of pressure, of the amount of pressure we are subjected to, and we shall find presently we shall administer well when the pressure is hot enough. Till then gentlemen who do not believe there is going to be more pressure on them, that this is only a summer shower, had better put up an umbrella and wait until it is over. It is perfectly easy! We shall all feel well in the end! It may be a severe pull before we get there, but if you like it, do not stop. Adjourn, go to the people and say: "No, all is perfect, we have not anything to suggest." Take your risks. That is the best thing to do. Gentlemen here say: "It is all right, it is perfect, our conditions are those which were created by our fathers, who were very wise men, and we have followed them since, so there is nothing to be suggested. We have no suggestion. On this we are prepared to stand." But we must understand this question. We must meet it. Conditions are not what they were. We are fighting, we are in a great war, and that means change; and if we are going to meet the conditions of the war we have got to consider changes. It is not a thing which is our choice; it is forced upon us; it is inevitable. We cannot say, as a gentleman did: "This is a German thing. We won't have anything to do with the nasty Germans." We have got to have to do with them. It is our misfortune very likely, but we have got to have to do with them. We cannot get away from them. And mind you, gentlemen, it is going to be just as bad if we do not fight as if we do.

I do not care to go into the subject of Germany, because I do not think it relevant; but I do know that you have got to have something that will compare to it or you will perish. Now, you can die if you will. Who cares? Nobody but we. Death is a matter for us. It is nobody else's affair. Who cares? Take your choice. If you are not going to do anything about it, you take your risk of being strangled or starved or having your throat cut, or something similar; if you do not think there is any risk go ahead and take your chance. I personally think it is wiser to take all precautions, if you can; but if other people think differently they must. I am an American citizen. I am going to take my risk with the rest. It is our own affair. It is collective, of course. But there is this that we always must remember and from which we never can escape,—that we are operating with methods that are as to modern methods what the methods of a stone age savage are to ours. Now, that is a fact from which we cannot get away. We are stone age savages in regard to the administration of modern affairs. We have the same chance of prevailing in this competition as they would have, because all competition is raised up by the intense pressure of modern warfare, of modern competition, to a level on which our fathers never dreamed of standing, and their position is to ours what that of the stone age savage is to ours.

I have but one more word to say, and then I have finished. It is in regard to the explanation of this resolution which I have submitted to this Convention. It cannot be injected suddenly into our civilization as our civilization stands. No man admits that more freely than I do. From night to morning we cannot become successfully collective. But it can be a suggestion. It can be something that we can consider seriously and take steps to approach. In my opinion our arrival at that standard is a question of our National safety; we must get there or run very great risk of destruction by and by. We must get there. That is what I consider the first step, and I consider it by far the most important step that can be presented to any Nation. The initiative and referendum is nothing by the side of it, absolutely nothing; it is trivial, it is negligible, because our government, our social system, our institutions, have got to be remodeled if this thing is to be carried out. And, gentlemen, in my humble opinion this war has got to go on until institutions are remodeled or until we perish.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I ask leave to make a word of explanation. At the middle of page 2 of the supplementary calendar which appears on our desks for the first time this afternoon, and which I had not seen until this moment, appears an amendment offered by me to the pending amendment moved by the gentleman from Brookline. That is superseded by the amendment which precedes it on page 2. The only amendments of mine at present pending are the one at the head of page 2 and the one at the foot of page 2 moved as an amendment to the amendment moved by my friend from Boston (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) on the left. If I am responsible for betraying our accomplished secretary into a mistake in the calendar, as very likely I may be, I hereby tender him my most sincere apologies.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I want to say a few words about the amendment printed under my name, the last under consideration to-day. I have been a very constant attendant here since the middle of June. I find myself now, the first of October, to have been greatly instructed. I have learned a great deal. I have learned among other things patience, and that tolerance of the views of others is a good thing. I also have been greatly amused at times. Just now I am greatly amused to hear a distinguished author talking about rake-offs. I never supposed that an Adams of Quincy knew anything about that subject. I agree, however, with the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) in a great many things that he said. He said we had come to the parting of the ways. Gentlemen, we shall be there at three-thirty or thereabouts, and we shall be there many more times on the other resolutions that we have got to decide between now and the time of adjournment. I also agree with him that perhaps we had better go home. I am afraid that some of us will have to go home for want of money or to provide for our families if this continues much longer. Whereas I thought the salary voted at the beginning of the session was large, I now begin to think it was very small.

We are here, gentlemen, to decide upon one of two things. Either we are to pass an emergency measure pure and simple, as Mr. Adams says, to take care of the great emergency of this war,—and there again I agree with him, an emergency does exist and I think we ought to do something,—or we are to give the Commonwealth a right to go into any kind of business practically that it wants to now and forevermore, on every occasion that it desires. We also are giving to every city and town in this State the same right. So that we vote with our eyes wide open, either that the State shall become entirely socialistic or that it shall at times become so and at other times not. That is the principal difference between the amendment that I offer and that of the seven of the committee represented by Mr. Anderson.

Gentlemen, in my amendment I provide for one thing that is not provided for in any other amendment, and that is temporary shelter, and I put those words in there with the intention that if we have a great conflagration somewhere as we have had in the past few years there will be no doubt as to the right of the Legislature to provide temporary shelter for the women and children who have been shut out of their homes. Again, in some of our manufacturing cities the tenements are owned by the mills. There may be a strike. Laborers may be right, mill men may be right; I do not pass on that. But at the same time the mill man may say: "Vacate my premises". It may be in the middle of winter, and the people may be in the condition that they were in one of our western States, and the Commonwealth have no power to overcome it. Therefore I say that the State should be in a position to provide temporary shelter when an emergency exists. Those words I believe appear in no other amendment.

I also have provided for feed for animals, so that there shall be no mistake as to what the word "feed" means. I think in the resolution of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) he uses the word
"feed". Some people might think that was something for human beings only.

Gentlemen, the thing that I think is most vital here next to the emergency proposition is the giving to thirty-seven cities and 317 towns the right to do the purchasing. I believe that the Commonwealth should do all the purchasing, and not have 354 other communities bidding against it and in competition with it. Neither do I believe that some of these small towns are in shape to go into that business of buying. They would have no show at all in the open market against the bigger cities and towns. There are many other reasons why I do not think the cities ought to go into the business, which I will not go into here, but which I think every man knows. If you have one purchasing power, namely, the State, you can expect the State to get as good a figure as it is possible to get, if it builds up a machine by which to do the business, and then resells to the cities and towns and lets the cities and towns resell to their inhabitants. If, in buying coal, the city of Boston is bidding against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the city of Lynn is bidding against the city of Boston, it does not seem to me that anybody here would think that it is a proper way to get the best possible price, because everybody knows that in buying in large quantities one buys cheaper. I have got one more amendment here which was sent to me as a suggestion; that is, that the State should have a right to resell to the inhabitants of other States. That was for the reason, as expressed in a letter to me, that possibly the State might find itself with a lot of goods on hand which it could not dispose of, the market having dropped, and it would give it a field beyond the field in Massachusetts. That I have not included in the amendment, and I do not offer it at the suggestion of the committee or any member here.

I also have left out the word "producing" that is in the committee's report, believing as I do that with the amendment presented by myself all necessary authority is given for an emergency, and when this came up first I never supposed it would apply to any other purpose than an emergency.

In case the Legislature is not in session, I leave the right in the Governor to determine when to do it, and nobody here need have any fear of that. I followed the legislation of last year. I do not recall a single recommendation that the Governor made on account of the war, an emergency recommendation, that was not taken up immediately and passed by the Legislature.

Gentlemen, among other things I have listened to here is talk about the unseen influences over this Convention. I do not believe, gentlemen, there is any improper unseen influence in this Convention at all, and I do not believe anybody else here believes it. I believe that every delegate here is an honest, straightforward, conscientious man, and that he votes as he himself thinks is right. I believe also that he tries as hard as he can to carry out his own purpose, and that I admire and believe in. I think we should make our fights quite as hard as we can, and when we are defeated let us take it cheerfully. I made the statement that the resolution was reported by seven of the committee. I did not mean that, sir. I meant that the gentleman from Brookline stated this morning that his amendment offered to-day has been seen by seven of the committee,—I think that was right,—and that he said at that time that that was all he could get together this morning. I understood that when the original report came in there was one dissenter, and I do not wish to misstate anything.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I want to ask the delegate from Boston if he has contemplated the possibility under his amendment, which I deem in force, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in its sovereign capacity, might come up against Pennsylvania on this very self-same coal question.

Mr. Curtis: I say that I should be almost sure that they would come up against Pennsylvania and every other State in the Union. And, gentlemen, that is exactly why I do not want the 354 cities and towns also to be going up against them. My amendment is good, I believe, from a safe business point of view, and you gentlemen I know will agree with me that ought to be done if nothing else is done in this amendment.

I was just about to finish up, gentlemen, by saying that I believe that every man in this Convention, whether he be conservative or radical, or whether he be socialistic, is here to determine these questions in his own mind after listening properly to other people, and I think we should get along a great deal better here, we should have a great deal less friction, a great deal better feeling, if we stopped talking about these outside influences. I have not seen any of them. I do not believe anybody else has seen any of them. Let us get right down, as my friend says, to business, or let us go home, and let us not be talking about each other any further.

Mr. Willett of Norwood: First let me say that I am heartily in sympathy with the measure as reported by the committee. Although I am identified with the conservative business interests of the State, I am not fearful that this opens the way for socialistic legislation; I believe that it is a conservative amendment in the broadest use of the term. The Commonwealth already is in business. The biggest business in the Commonwealth is the business of the Commonwealth. The fear that my friends seem to have is that if the State undertakes new responsibilities we will give to those new responsibilities no better attention than we now give to the business of the State as it is at present carried on. I for one believe that whenever it is to the advantage of the State as a whole to broaden its present business undertakings, it is justified in doing so and the Legislature should have the power to provide for such action. We can trust ourselves, in my judgment, as to how far we may safely go, and I would deal with the matter from the standpoint of having great faith in the ability of the Commonwealth to deal wisely with these questions.

I think we shall all agree that if anything is to be done along this line it is imperative that it be dealt with in a businesslike way. We learn from the friends of this measure in the committee that they do not ask that anything that shall be considered under it shall be done on a basis of charity. The proposal is that the Commonwealth shall take up only such matters as are for the interests of the community as a whole, and for which it can furnish the machinery better than any other agency, and that it shall undertake these things only in case of public exigency. Now, as I already have stated, it is important that whatever is to be done shall be carried on in a way so that they shall properly serve their purposes, and it seems to me that the amendment which I have submitted will help to insure the conduct of these undertakings on a business basis. I think I am justified in saying that at least it has the approval of the chairman of the committee which reported the resolution. Proper records and accounts will keep these matters before the people just like any business proposition, so that the costs in the different cities and towns can be compared from time to time.

While I do not favor the State going into competition on matters which can be handled properly by private initiative, I think it would be interesting to see the test of actual competition on a business basis between public enterprise and private enterprise. I believe that if this was done our ordinary public enterprise would show up very badly, and as this fact came home to us as citizens of the Commonwealth, it would serve perhaps to awaken us to our responsibilities of citizenship, with the result that the citizens of all classes of the Commonwealth would be influenced to give to the service of the State the best that their abilities afforded, rather than continue their present neglect.

How many men we meet who refer with great satisfaction and pride to the fact that they have voted at the primary and therefore feel that they deserve great credit on that account. We shall not have good government until the average citizen is ready to go further than that. To get results we have got to give to the business of the State and to our communities the best that we have in ability, judgment and service.

In conclusion I again wish to say that I hope this amendment which I have offered will be accepted. It is a safeguard for the measure, and it establishes a principle by which, through good accounting methods, the people of the Commonwealth may know what is going on under any legislation that takes place as a result of the acceptance of this resolution.

When the people know the real facts, then they will find the means and the remedy, and as a result we eventually shall be able to handle the public business in the best possible manner. Any activities attempted under this resolution will be kicked out unless the people can be convinced that they are being carried on in an efficient and businesslike way.

Mr. Waterman of Williamstown: We all have listened as attentively and patiently as possible, but I feel now as though I ought to give utterance to a few thoughts that have occurred to me by the suggestions of speeches and remarks in this Convention, and also by experience in life. I think it is well to consider the past before we leap very much into the future, and if the past is good, hold on to that which is good and then take that which we may decide is better.

First, I should like to make a little statement regarding the coal situation that was talked about so much here last week. I have been in the coal business a great many years, and I think I know some of the evils and have suffered by them; so that I am not now in that business. A great evil comes because certain agents and large dealers accumulate large quantities of coal and then sell only on the highest pressure and price. The remedy lies, I believe, in National law compelling all sales of both anthracite and bituminous coal only from the mines to the individual, retail distributor, the corporation actually consuming the product, in fact, from the actual mine owner to the actual consumer, and to promote this legislation it should be the work of the States with the National government. The States should work for National laws, because coal is a necessity that we have got to have, in New England at least, to say nothing about all the rest of the United States, and I think that that would be a proposition for the National government to control. So far as its paternalism toward the whole people of the Nation is concerned, it is reasonable.

Now in regard to what the coal commission at Washington is trying to do. I understand that they have allowed seventy-five cents extra to the independent coal dealer, above the mining and large dealers. That is where I believe evil comes in. If they had put those independents on the same line as the owners who produce 90 per cent of the coal they would have cured a great deal of the evil, because, in my experience of thirty-five years, with any excuse or any little interference, immediately, if you are buying large stores, your shipments begin to grow less, and finally you are forced to buy independent coal of the men who come around and have only ten per cent of the product of the mines. They have coal to sell, while the owners of 90 per cent have none with which to supply your needs. So that they have been able to load their coal onto these speculators, and, in addition to that, their coal that has been rejected as not up to the standard,—and load it, too, onto the public. I think you all will testify that this coal that is bought when there is an emergency is very poor coal, running from twenty-five to thirty-five or forty per cent slate, and causes constant grumbling. I have gone through that experience time and time again, so that I feel as though there might be something done if they would treat them all absolutely alike. In past years, especially from 1902 to 1912, these independent dealers would go around and offer to sell coal to you for forty to sixty cents a ton less, showing that they could do the business cheaper than the other people did, and sometimes they would sell it to you. It generally was pretty poor coal, but under an emergency, when people in the cold of New England will buy anything that is offered that is black, they have been able to work their trade.

Now in regard to the decision of each member here on the questions we are trying to solve. The honorable gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) last week with mighty voice called to all those he thought were on his side to come out and help him. Why, that is just exactly what I believe every member of this Convention is trying to do so far as his ability will allow, — to solve the question in a reasonable way, not because we have got some idea that we think is a panacea to cure it, but to try to decide by what our experience has been rather than to jump into some theory caught upon it with the midnight oil. I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) is an amendment that would meet the situation. As far as the Legislature is concerned, I think those who have had experience in the Legislature will readily agree that the Legislature will join in any opportunity to help the people. In 1915 they passed emergency legislation appropriating $150,000 at that time when things were getting hard, and then again this last winter the Legislature fairly fell over itself to meet everything suggested by the Governor for the emergency, giving him power that perhaps the Governor of Massachusetts never had had before, and they did it because it seemed as though the case demanded that sort of legislation. I think you can trust yourselves,—and yourselves are the legislators,—to meet the emergencies as they come.

The history of public ownership has not been in Massachusetts anything very creditable. Years ago they bored the Hoosac tunnel at an expense to the State of about $18,000,000 to $20,000,000, and it also had beside the hole some fifty miles of roadway, and they ran it as long as they thought they could afford to run it. As has been the case with other enterprises of the sort they were very glad to sell it to the Fitchburg Railroad corporation for $10,000,000 and take in pay $5,000,000 of preferred stock and $5,000,000 of common stock. The preferred stock paid dividends, but the common stock never did. I can remember very well when the late Hon. Edward Bradford said to me with a great deal of elation: "Since the Governor has sold the Fitchburg Railroad to the Boston and Maine Railroad we already have put on to the credit of the State $5,000,000", and the common stock was inventoried at nothing. Then that even did not seem to work very well.
A little later we were selling that railroad for $10,000,000 again; the Hon. W. Murray Crane in his wisdom as a business man sold the road, with the approval of the Council, etc., to the Boston and Maine Railroad and took in return $5,000,000 of gold bonds, bearing 3 per cent, and $5,000,000 of registered bonds, bearing 3 per cent, and those all paid their dividends up to the time the Boston and Maine Railroad went into receivership. I believe, however, that in time that will be paid in full; that there will be no loss there. But the point that I am trying to make is that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with its experience of the years gone before, was very happy and gloried in the restoration to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of $5,000,000 and congratulated itself that it was out of the railroad business.

Now, as far as trying to work with the State at large is concerned, that has been tried over and over again. Governor Bradford, with his little company down at Plymouth, tried it there, and they succeeded in accomplishing nothing until each one was allotted a portion of land and went to work to produce something to save them from debt and starvation. And it also was true in like manner in the Colony which tried to establish itself in Virginia. They tried several times, but when the individual interests were allowed then the Colony began to grow.
Australia has gone into legislation of this nature proposed to-day under this resolution to such an extent that the farmers there are in distress continually. They have been the ones to suffer all through. There have been certain interests and certain cliques, certain public officials, who have benefited by legislation, but the people as a whole, who have got to bear the burden, are suffering largely.

It is in human nature that if we can get a thing easily and if we can get a good place we do it, and we do not go much beyond that; but when you have got to do a thing there are certain powers that come to you that will accomplish the object desired, and the person is constantly helped. The help that is not of one's own efforts amounts to very little; but he who takes hold of the thing to work out from all his mind will develop, generally is the successful person in this world, as far as I have been able to observe.

Now look at the business of cities. There is legislation continually brought before the Legislature, asking for this, that, and the other remedy for the evils in the city. You all know how that is done in the cities and in the towns,—how they kind of "let out" a public job. Nobody really is responsible. "The public is rich, and it can stand it." All those elements enter into the prosperity, or rather the lack of prosperity, of those communities, hunting for those jobs all the time. Then look at the State commissions. Here you have 127 State commissions, and you wonder when you really are going to stop. You propose to do more and more of that, turn all the cities and towns into a commission and let them go to it. I submit to you, Mr. President, as a business proposition, as you men have found it in your day from boyhood up, that you have got to sacrifice something to get something. There always is a lot of sacrifice in order to accomplish something. The law of compensation works continually in private as well as in public, and I believe we have got to consider that also.

Then another thing, in public ownership who stands the loss? The public, of course. You forget all this expense, this double expense of public management, which I have heard and read time and time again is one-third or one-half or perhaps more than private management, and it is well understood. There is reason enough that private management shall produce the result desired. As far as the evils are concerned, I believe it is in the public power to correct a great many of those evils by proper legislation, not in the way of making worse by giving more of the power that has caused those evils. The public always stands the cost, and that cost is lost in taxation, and so it is forgotten by the individual for the time being, because the public pays in that way. Now look at our State tax,—$10,000,000 a year. Twenty years ago it was about $2,000,000. We have got from all of the improvements some advantages, but more expense has come because of the public management which is entailed in the commission and public control. Competition I believe is one of the very best benefits of society. Not that it is fully the cure for all evils, but that it is one of the cures. To lose that competition would be a loss to the public, but there can be a mixture of competition and a certain kind of supervision by the State. We have seen that in many instances, and it is not necessary to go into the detail of it.

And then another thing. I believe that the least governed is the best governed. The old democratic idea was to have as little government as possible, and I believe in that to-day. Although I am a Republican my ancestors were all Democrats, but they were not for a socialistic government. So that each individual may work out his own salvation, and he can do it in a republic. You cannot do it in a monarchy. You have got to be servants and toadies in a monarchy, but in a democracy you are the judge and the conductor of your own salvation. You become an owner; you are not all the time a servant, but you become an owner, and that very prize is worth striving for even to the end of a long life.

So, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I believe, with private enterprise properly and honestly conducted, that the present state of legislation at which Massachusetts has arrived in its Constitution and in its Legislature really is the last word as far as successful democratic administration is concerned, coming from all the ages back. I know nothing better. There are panaceas that have come, so said, in other States and in other places and in foreign countries. I believe foreign countries are not a parallel to anything that we can do here. They are in a monarchy. We in a democracy should each work under his own hat and be men. And so I believe that the sticking to the old democratic idea of working out one's own salvation, with such proper standards and checks as the mind works out in the body politic will meet the evils that so many are afraid are existing. So, Mr. President, I would favor the Pillsbury amendment with the Montague amendment.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Before I vote on the last substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Brookline I want to ask him a question. He or his committee has amended the word "producing", a somewhat vague and indefinite term, because of course the thing produced may be the product of a farm or of a mine or of the forest, as well as of a mill or a factory. In place of the word "producing" he has substituted the words "collecting", "converting". Bearing this in mind, I want to ask him when he rises to speak whether he conceives any distinction to exist between necessaries of life and the materials entering into the necessaries of life. For example, boots and shoes probably would be regarded as a necessity of life in a civilized community. Now, are the hides of cattle, which are converted into leather, and the leather which is converted into boots and shoes, necessaries of life within the meaning of his amendment? If so, of course we are face to face with the same problem of State socialism, it seems to me, that we had with the retention of the word "producing". Furthermore, Mr. President, I should like to ask him whether it would not be wise to join the words "collecting", "converting", by the conjunction "and", so as to harness them up. That would somewhat limit the scope of the provision and not make it quite as broad as it otherwise, it seems to me, would be.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: Answering the question of the delegate from Middleborough, taking the last first, I accept the suggestion that after the word "collecting" the comma be struck out and the word "and" be inserted. The answer to the other question, as to whether hides could be bought and made into boots and shoes, is No. Without amplifying other reasons, if the gentleman will look at the enumeration of "markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, slaughter-houses, and other like means," etc., it will by inclusion exclude manufactories as we ordinarily understand the word "manufactories". Essentially they are all marketing propositions, — collecting and converting means, as I apprehend, merely those incidental manufacturing processes which already have been explained as necessary in the case of milk.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved to amend the amendment offered by Mr. Anderson of Brookline by inserting after the word "warehouses", in the third from the last line, the words "cold storage plants"; and by inserting after the word "collecting", in the next line, the word "preserving".

Mr. Blackmur: I understand that that amendment is acceptable to the chairman of the committee, and if it be so I shall not offer any extended remarks regarding it. I should like to ask if that is acceptable to the chairman.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I accept the amendment as to cold storage plants. I have had an opportunity to talk with some of my committee and we all agreed that they were intended to be included under "warehouses and other like means." If there is any doubt about it, put in the words. Personally I have no objection to the insertion of "preserving", but I am inclined to think that in the light of the delegate from Middleborough harnessing up "collecting" and "converting", "preserving" ought not to be put in; that it is better without it. But personally I have no objection to it.

Mr. BRACKETT of Arlington: Were I a member of the Legislature and a bill like that contemplated by this resolution were before it, I do not know whether I should support it or not. But what I wish again to call to the attention of the Convention, as others already have done, is the fact that we are not legislating. We simply are giving the Legislature the power to enact certain laws if it should deem it expedient. I believe in giving the Legislature very large powers. I have confidence in it. That is one reason why upon other questions which have been before the Convention I have differed from many of my friends here. I believe that we can reach satisfactory results through the Legislature of Massachusetts, and that one of the reasons why this Convention was called was in order to enlarge the powers of the Legislature, to enable it to do those things which the people want done and which an intelligent and matured public opinion approves of having done.

It might appear from the remarks of some gentlemen that the purpose of this resolution was to enable towns and cities to engage in mercantile business. That is not the object of this proposition at all. I feel authorized to speak of that object inasmuch as document No. 51, which was a resolution upon this subject, was introduced by me and referred to the committee on Public Affairs, and upon that and other resolutions referred to it the committee reported the resolution before us. My idea in presenting that resolution was not to promote doing business by towns and cities, but it was to provide a means of protecting the people of the Commonwealth against extortion. When a few capitalists get control of an article of necessity, wheat or flour or fuel, or some other article, and demand an exorbitant price for it, compelling the people to pay more than they ought to pay, then I believe that the Legislature should have the power to authorize the Governor, with the consent of the Council, to take such article by right of eminent domain, just as a man's land can be taken for a public purpose, take it, pay the owner what it is fairly worth, and then sell it to the towns and cities and to the inhabitants of the Commonwealth. My idea in inserting in the original resolution the clause authorizing towns and cities to buy the necessaries of life was to authorize them to buy, for sale to their inhabitants, the necessaries which the Commonwealth should be authorized to take and sell, as an economical means of enabling their inhabitants to procure the same. That is all this proposition means. It is to empower the Legislature to enact certain laws which in the near future we may find that the welfare of the Commonwealth demands.

Mr. MONTAGUE of Boston: After all that has been said and done it seems to me that this fact remains: That this Commonwealth has been going on in a very successful way for a great many years without having the benefit of either one of these propositions, but I am heartily in favor of the adoption of one of these resolutions as an emergency measure. It does seem to me that it would be well to adopt an emergency measure only, and then if it works well there would be absolutely no trouble in putting through a constitutional amendment in the regular way to extend those powers, and if it proves to be beneficial and desirable I for one would be heartily in favor of extending those powers. But, Mr. President, I desire just a moment on my amendment, which is on the third page of the calendar and very short. You remember that this proposition came in from the committee backed by practically the whole of them. It started off this way: "The General Court may" do so and so. The gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and others told us beautifully and eloquently, speaking as statesmen and with the words of truth and soberness, how much we could trust the Legislature, how wise and conservative the Legislature would be, and I think they told the truth. Now they come in with a substitute resolution. They have changed those words "The General Court", and it is "The Commonwealth", and the gentleman from Brookline tells us this morning that the reason they changed it was so as to allow this thing to be done by the initiative, and that is a mighty sight different matter; a very different matter. What would happen here, in point of fact, as one illustration? Suppose a man comes out as a candidate for mayor on this platform: That he will take over the milk supply of the city of Boston and sell it to-day to the inhabitants at 8 cents a quart. That would not go through the Legislature, but on the initiative it could be put through easily. Those signatures could be obtained, and when it went to the people of the Commonwealth as a whole, what would the people of Springfield, Fall River or any other city say about it? They would say: If Boston wants to do it well and good, just as Boston would say the same thing about Springfield and Fall River. And that thing would be adopted by the votes of the voters of the city of Boston. Do we want this thing done? I am pretty well satisfied that we could leave it to the discretion of the Legislature, but I am not satisfied to see that thing done by the initiative, and if this Convention should decide to adopt the proposition of the committee it seems to me that my amendment is absolutely necessary for the safety of the Commonwealth in that particular. [Applause.]

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: In the few minutes left, Mr. President, I wish briefly to call to the attention of the members of this Convention a singular and very successful piece of municipal activity which very seldom has come to the attention of the people of this part of the country. In the middle part of the last century the city of Cincinnati found that it was fast losing its leadership as the principal metropolis west of the Alleghany Mountains, due to the introduction of steam and the building of railroads which overlooked Cincinnati and reached out into different parts of the country and the far west in other directions. Cincinnati commenced to go into a decay and finally came to a standstill, and it generally was accepted that her days as a large metropolis were ended unless conditions could be changed. Private capital, on account of several financial panics, could not be interested in any extensive railroad building, particularly into that part of the country south of the Ohio River which was the natural feeding-ground for the city of Cincinnati. It then was conceived by some lawyers in Cincinnati that the city itself might be able to get a charter from the State of Ohio to build a railroad which would solve the problem, and although the idea of a city going into railroad building beyond the city limits and into other States of the Union was unheard of, up to that time, nevertheless they succeeded in getting the charter. It authorized the city of Cincinnati to build a railroad 400 miles long, right into the bowels of the south, extending across the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, and as far as the city of Chattanooga. The railroad was financed and built, although a financial panic prevailed in this country during the time it was being constructed. It was known as the Cincinnati Southern Railroad. Subsequently it was leased by the trustees appointed by the city of Cincinnati, and now is known as the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad, and has been a splendid and remarkable success in railroad management and yields a large income to-day to the city of Cincinnati. The immediate result of the railroad upon the commercial interests of Cincinnati was to open up a wide area of new and undeveloped territory, besides providing quicker transportation and better shipping facilities, and placing freight rates on a more acceptable basis. Large sections of the south, from which heretofore Cincinnati had been entirely cut off, were brought thereby within railroad accommodation. In addition, a vast region, rich in lumber and mineral wealth, was directly penetrated. Manufacturing towns and mining settlements sprang up along the line of the road, and Chattanooga quickly grew from a small village to a very important city. In fact, access to all the south by means of railroad transportation was solved, and the present splendid facilities of Cincinnati made possible. The city once again began to grow and has kept on growing and developing. In these days when railroad facilities are notoriously inadequate and when we find our principal railroads unable to move the goods of the Nation or to distribute its products satisfactorily, when it is difficult to interest capital to provide the necessary equipment, and when the Nation finds itself unable to wait, we well may pause and ask ourselves whether the principle invoked by the city of Cincinnati should not be more commonly practiced. Instead of pessimism as to municipal management and governmental ownership of railroads and the necessities, such as has been manifested here in this hall by many members opposed to the present suggestion of the committee, I think we well may draw inspiration for faith in the doctrine that municipal activity properly safeguarded and managed can be practiced with great benefit to the community and with no harm to private enterprise.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: It should be made perfectly plain to you, if it has not been already, that none of these measures, none of these proposals reported by the delegate from Brookline on behalf of the committee on Public Affairs meets the unanimous approval of the members of the committee. I stated that the other day with respect to the form in which No. 318 was reported. Now, the committee has met again to-day, and as a result the chairman has reported the proposal in a modified form. I understand that seven out of the fifteen members attended that meeting. I personally was not among them; I was unable to go. I merely want to say that the revised form of the proposal comes no nearer satisfying me individually than did the original measure. I made it perfectly plain, I think, in what I said to the Convention the other day, that while I am willing to stand for this remedial legislation so far as coal and food-stuffs are concerned, I am unalterably opposed to broadening the scope of it so as to take in other necessaries of life. As has been pointed out, that would include boots and shoes, and shirts, and things of that kind, so that the Legislature might permit cities and towns to enter into the dry-goods and grocery business in competition with private enterprises. To that I am unalterably opposed, and I think it would be a great mistake to remove the constitutional safeguard or limitation which now prevents that sort of thing being done. The amendments which I offered, and which are upon this calendar, do not narrow the scope of the committee's proposal as much as I think it should be narrowed; and I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendments appearing upon the calendar under my name, and I wish to add that personally I shall support first of all the amendment offered by the delegate from Boston sitting in this division, and next the amendment offered by the delegate from Wellesley. I think that either one of those two amendments would result in putting this measure into reasonably satisfactory form and giving it all the breadth that any reasonable man can ask for.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: The amendments that have been offered to the measure and the discussion that has been had indicate pretty fairly the differences between the several gentlemen who are in favor of this proposition. There are two classes of amendments, those which would restrict, and also the amendment which is offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams), which designs to broaden it several degrees beyond the horizon. The main restrictions that are proposed are, first, limiting the proposition to the case of emergencies; second, cutting out the words "other necessaries of life." Those are the main restrictions. The first is exemplified in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Balch, and also in that of the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Curtis. They give the Legislature power to define in each case what an emergency shall be, but the first amendment provides a definite limit of two years during which the operations under this section shall be transacted. That, it seems to me, is very objectionable indeed. The Commonwealth ought not to be under any time limit in this matter. It ought to have the fullest power necessary to perform its transactions during such period as may be necessary. As to the restriction, — the cutting out the words "other necessaries of life," — it seems to me that there is very little danger in leaving this matter to the Legislature. I have been in favor of the broader power mainly because it is very hard for us in this day and generation to foretell just what emergencies lie ahead of us. We have been brought face to face within the last year with the possibilities that face a Commonwealth which does business at a distance from its base of supplies, depending upon the supply of its most ordinary necessaries of life on a system of railroads that may be disrupted by a strike or by a congestion of traffic, depending for its supply also upon a network of buyers and dealers which at any time may combine to exact an unreasonable toll. All of those situations we are facing. It has been claimed in Congress that we actually have been mulcted in large amounts beyond what is necessary for our ordinary supplies of life. Now, the ingress of the Commonwealth into this field may or may not assist. It is a chance, however, that it would pay us well to take. The Commonwealth, with its great credit, with its power of raising revenue beyond what private agencies have, may procure food where private sources could not do so; and we ought to equip it with these powers because the emergencies that face us are not emergencies of any slight nature, but emergencies that may involve our very existence. For those reasons we should view this matter somewhat carefully. The Legislature is not likely to take any radical or ill-advised action in this matter. The great curse of our legislative system is not its proneness to radical action, but the ease, owing to the checks and balances of our Constitution, with which vigorous action, such as an emergency needs, is deferred, postponed or defeated. We do not need to fear radical action half as much as that the Legislature will fail to act radically enough to meet the emergency. From that point of view I think, then, that the less we tie the hands of the Legislature, the less we render it incapable of dealing with this subject in a broad and effective manner, the better off we shall be, and therefore I hope that we shall accept the broader amendment rather than any of the more restricted ones.

Messrs. Clapp of Lexington, Bigney of Boston, Quincy of Boston, Balch of Boston and George of Haverhill severally withdrew the pending amendments previously moved by them; Mr. Williams of Brookline withdrew one of the amendments previously moved by him.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: As I understand the result of the withdrawals there is now nothing before the Convention except the report of the committee, slightly amended, to which I shall refer in a moment, and the amendments offered by the delegate from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) printed this morning for use this afternoon in the middle of page 2, from which should be struck out the middle paragraph, which was a repetition. Perhaps what I stated is not quite accurate, for that at the bottom of page 2 of the reprint is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley to the amendment of the gentleman from Boston sitting next him (Mr. E. U. Curtis), those being, as I understand it, the only matters before the Convention at this time; unless perhaps there is one other exception, and that is the amendment offered by the delegate from Norwood (Mr. Willett) to be added at the end and providing for the use of uniform methods of accounting, and so forth. Without having authority from my full committee I may say that so far as I have had opportunity to consult with them we have no objection to the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Norwood, although we think it is a matter of legislation. It is a matter, however, of sufficiently important legislation, so that we are quite ready to defer to the views of those who think it should be in the fundamental act.

My attention is directed to the fact that the gentleman from Boston who spoke a few minutes ago (Mr. Montague) undertakes to put us back so that we could not get in under the initiative and referendum. I regard that as a part of the initiative and referendum campaign and not properly a part of this debate, and the committee is opposed to it. In whatever way law may be enacted, that law should be applicable to these provisions. I am indebted, however, to the delegate from Worcester sitting somewhere in the back of the hall (Mr. Tatman) for the suggestion that the language “The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted” is not very happy language, and therefore I have made a new draft, taking his suggestion, “Provision may be made by law”. That is purely formal, it adds nothing to the substance of the matter; and I have here in typewriting one which when the matter is put I shall ask the Secretary to read as being to the best of my knowledge and belief the authorized recommendation of the committee, filing the caveat that I have not had opportunity to consult with all my committee; but, drawing fair inferences from their attitude hitherto, I have no doubt they will be content with that. We are content, as I already have said, to accept cold storage.

Now, Mr. President, the debate has divided itself into two general parts; one, wholesome, helpful criticism, and we have profited very much by that; and the other, a fearful, fearsome expression that the Legislature (which, when we are discussing the initiative and referendum, is so wise, so sound, so honest, so intelligent a body) may precipitate us into chaos and destroy the foundations of our liberty. The view of our committee,—and we have on that committee I do not know how many who have served in the Legislature,—is that there should be a broad scope of legislative power in this realm where needs are shown constantly to be arising. We have had during the past year or two more evidence of new needs for which there must be provided new measures than ever before in the history of the world. We submit to you, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley limiting this merely to what he calls emergency legislation should not be enacted; that the provision of the committee provided not only for emergency legislation, which is the substance of the provision in the first part, but also for certain enlargement of power in the Commonwealth and the subdivisions thereof,—if and when the Legislature deems it wise,—is in the line of constructive, progressive statesmanship; that at least such a provision should be submitted to the people of the Commonwealth for their acceptance or their rejection.

All remaining pending amendments were rejected with the exception of the final new draft offered by Mr. George W. Anderson of Brookline, cited at the beginning of the chapter, which was substituted for the resolution reported by the committee (No. 318) and was ordered to a second reading as document No. 358.

Debate was continued Thursday, September 27, when the new draft (No. 358), had been read a second time.

Mr. Charles F. Dutch of Winchester moved certain amendments cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Dutch: First as to what the amendment is. It sounds far more complicated than it is. My intention is to add to the report of the committee as you have it before you this morning merely words which will confine authority there given to a time of public exigency. In order to do that it was necessary to make certain shiftings in the reading, which have thus sounded complicated. The preamble was put on, qualifying words that have been used by others, "when and so far as a public exigency exists therefor and while it continues". Then in order to tie all of the amendment into that qualifying clause it was necessary to transpose the sentence so as to enlarge the power of the General Court. No other change is intended, and so far as I know I have made no other change. In other words, I intend to bring up simply that one issue.

Yesterday we voted on various amendments. Every single amendment involved other changes. There was an amendment, for example, that cut out the operation of the initiative, if we are to have a legislative initiative. I have made no such change. I leave that as it was, so that provision may be made by law in any way in which laws may be passed after the Constitution is amended as the result of this Convention. There was an amendment yesterday which cut out the words "other necessaries", and it may well be that it was defeated because of the fact that it cut out clothing and matters of that sort.
Again, I avoid that issue. I make no change whatsoever in the matters covered by the committee's report. The Curtis amendment yesterday did some of these things and cut out purchasing by cities and towns. Again, that is not involved in this amendment. We leave that matter just as it was put in here by the committee. That amendment also put in the point of temporary shelter. That was not in the committee's report; therefore I have not put it in. That is left as it was. In other words, I have attempted to get before this Convention the straight, simple, clear issue as to whether we are going to adopt this proposition as an emergency proposition, a true emergency police power proposition, or whether we are going to adopt it in its present form as a plank of State socialism.

I made a motion to extend the time for debate because I could not conceive that this Convention had given all the consideration to this important matter which it deserved. I was impressed this morning when an ex-Governor (Mr. Walsh) remarked that this resolution was of far greater importance than the initiative and referendum, and I hope, after all the bickerings that we have had, this Convention can get down to real statecraft and really discuss this fundamental proposition.

Now, what is it? It was stated by another ex-Governor (Mr.
Brackett) in the debate on this matter that we were not legislating; that we simply were giving authority, simply giving permission. But what does it mean? What do we do when we amend the Constitution?
What do we do when we draft a Constitution? As I conceive it from the words of wise men, the Constitution is to set forth the framework of government, the machinery of government, and is to set forth fundamental policies of government. We put into the Constitution declarations of policies. They are considered fundamental policies, matters that are truly organic. Now, I say that in reading into the Constitution this proposal of the committee which has passed to this stage we are putting into the Constitution, if it is accepted, and we are recommending to put into the Constitution, a declaration that some of those who favor it have said flatly is to be the policy of this Commonwealth, that it may be proper for this State to engage as a regular business in State socialistic enterprises. I desire that this Convention go on record on that simple proposition: Shall we put into the Constitution of this old Commonwealth that plank? Shall we put into it that declaration in favor of State socialism, because that is what it is, or shall we so qualify this resolution that it shall become a matter purely of the exercise of the police power and confined to times of real emergency? That is the issue.

Mr. DONOVAN of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman if he will explain what he means by State socialism.

Mr. DUTCH: I would rather the member who asked the question should answer himself. What I mean in part is here: The authorizing of the Commonwealth and its political branches to engage in ordinary business,—not public service enterprises but ordinary business,—as a matter of collective activity, and in place of, in substitution for, or in competition with, business conducted by private initiative.

Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I should like to ask the gentleman what the distinction is between the resolution before the Convention and the resolution as proposed to be amended by him, which makes the former a project of State socialism, and the latter not such.

Mr. Dutch: As I am advised, in addition to my own reading of the amendment as it is before us, it is not confined and is not intended to be confined to times of emergency. It is not intended to be confined to the times in which we now find ourselves. If it goes before the people, and if it is an emergency matter it ought to go before the people this fall, it will go before the people, as they understand it, as an emergency proposition, adapted to the present situation, and it will go before them therefore, as I believe, in a false light, because it is not so confined. The chairman of the committee reporting it expressly said he did not desire so to confine it. Now, I believe there is a very considerable difference, if not in kind most assuredly a tremendous difference in degree, between adopting that as a thoroughgoing, standing proposition of Massachusetts policy and adopting something which will permit taking care of the people in an emergency under the police power, per-chance an emergency such as exists to-day. If it is not technically a difference in kind it certainly is a tremendous difference in degree as to what is granted.

Mr. Donovan of Lawrence: I should like to ask the gentleman in the first division to answer this. Yesterday I believe that most of the members of this Convention voted for the resolution that is now pending on second reading because they wished to put some check upon the rise in prices. I ask him this: Suppose that the ice dealers of the city of Lawrence, of whom there are only three, decide to get together and raise the price of ice in a time when there is no war; admitted that this resolution, if it passed as it is now, might stop that, how would we get that situation before the Legislature as an emergency?

Mr. Dutch: I am glad the question was asked, because it brings me sooner to that branch of my remarks. I am glad to answer it if I may. As I conceive it, as I was saying, the purpose of the chairman of this committee in presenting this thoroughgoing proposition, which will be in operation all the time, was to secure a means of combating possible monopoly, means of combating the very proposition which is suggested by the gentleman from Lawrence. Now, as I understand it, under the Constitution as it exists to-day it is entirely possible to proceed through the criminal law against such monopolies, against such improper combinations in restraint of trade. It certainly is possible under the Federal law, and I believe it can be worked out under our law, because, as I read history, that sort of control has been exercised for many hundreds of years under the Anglo-Saxon common law. There is precedent for attacking the raising of prices, there is precedent for the fixing of prices, and I am sure that the learned United States Attorney for this district can cite the old laws to that effect.

Mr. Donovan: Will the gentleman in the first division please recite for us how many men in this Commonwealth have been sent to jail or confined for raising prices?

Mr. Dutch: I cannot answer that question.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. Donovan: Will the gentleman in the first division tell us how many have been prosecuted for raising prices in Massachusetts?

Mr. Dutch: I cannot answer that question. I do not believe that it is an argument for going into this sort of venture that machinery which we have may not have been applied. It is absolutely essential to have public opinion back of such prosecutions. When they are made properly they accomplish results. As I understand it, in the Federal government those prosecutions have been undertaken with considerable success. I believe the remedy there is entirely adequate. If there is abuse of the present system, that is no argument for kicking the system clear overboard. If there is abuse, because of private greed, of the system of private initiative and private business, it is no excuse for kicking that system overboard and embarking on a program of State distribution and production and conversion and whatever else is included or may be included under this platform.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman a question or questions that would make his amendment clearer to this Convention. I should like to ask if he provides in his amendment for the purchase from those individuals who now are engaged in the production and distribution of the necessaries of life. Does his amendment provide for the payment to them in case the Commonwealth desires to enter into the business during the term of the exigency, and in case it goes into the business temporarily does it mean that at the end of the exigency the Commonwealth shall return the property to those individuals who formerly were the owners of those producing and distributing stations? Does the Commonwealth return to the same persons from whom it buys? Does it resell to them in case it decides that the emergency has passed and that it is well that these former owners should return to business?

Mr. Dutch: I have made no change whatsoever in the operative features of this measure, and purposely, because I desire to bring before you simply this one issue. It was tied up with other issues yesterday. I cannot believe that if this issue is brought clearly before this Convention the result will be as it was yesterday, and that is why I have made no other change. The provisions here for eminent domain are exactly as they were brought in by the committee. The working out of the points that the gentleman has raised here will be entirely within the control of the Legislature or your initiative, as they were under the resolution as proposed.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: May I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the district attorneys of the different counties are confined to their districts,—for instance, on the milk situation, if the district attorney of Suffolk starts proceedings, the minute he gets outside of Suffolk his authority ceases, and the same as to the district attorney of Essex,—and if legislation giving the Attorney-General the power to proceed in these cases was not defeated in the General Court?

Mr. Dutch: As I understand the situation there is nothing at all to interfere with the Attorney-General, as the law-officer of the Commonwealth, proceeding with such correlated prosecutions as he chooses and wherever he chooses.

Mr. Lomasney: I would inform the gentleman that the Attorney-General has ruled that he has not the power, and the Legislature refused to give him that power.
Mr. Dutch: My reply to that will be that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the Legislature from giving him that power, because it is perfectly clear that you can execute through this Commonwealth the criminal law of this Commonwealth as the Legislature or your initiative may desire to provide. Therefore, if that is a difficulty in your present system, remedy that difficulty but do not kick over the system. Do not commit us to something that you do not know anything about. I believe that we do not know anything about the working of State socialism in this democracy. Why, one of the greatest advocates of this proposition, the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams), told you in so many words that we were not ready for this proposition. He knows that we have not built up a civil service, we have not built up a system of experts working for municipalities and for the political divisions of this Commonwealth who can carry out this sort of proposition. Your uniform accounting thing here is all right as far as it goes, but as somebody characterized it, when it was moved, it is only a fly speck; it is only a small part of the machinery, the governmental activity which is involved in this committee's report. So I simply desire to bring before you absolutely clearly, and my intention is without any other qualification, without altering any other thing in the amendment, the straight, flat issue whether you will confine this to a time of public exigency and emergency, a police power proposition, or whether you will put it into the Constitution, recommend it be put into our Constitution as a declaration which will go all over the world, to New Zealand and the rest, that we are prepared to accept State socialism and State business activities as a part of our governmental policy.

Now just one word of explanation of something that occurs to me. Of course it was difficult to phrase this matter of the public exigency and at the same time leave the initiative in here. If you had this law made simply by the General Court it would be a very easy matter to say that the General Court should determine when a public exigency existed. When you put in the initiative I must confess I do not know how to handle it. I do not know a great deal about that animal. I do not know how it will act in harness or hitched up tandem or any other way. If it can be phrased so that when there is a public exigency it can be determined in some ready fashion, I shall be delighted to accept the amendment. But what I think is the practical result is this: That we may rest, if the language is left as I have it, upon the general rules of construction, the general attitude of your Supreme Judicial Court, and that is that the finding of your legislative making body, — that will be either the General Court or the people, — as to the fact of the public exigency will not be disturbed by your court unless it is clearly, — clearly, — wrong, unless in a test it is shown that no reasonable people could come in good faith to that conclusion. Therefore I think this does not lead to litigation and may be left safely in this form; but if that particular can be perfected I shall be glad to accept it, because I wish to raise only a single issue.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I am not afraid of this cry about socialism. In regard to the reference to court decisions, considerable time has been wasted by the last speaker on this proposition, because if he had but pursued his investigations a little further he would have ascertained that, if I remember correctly, about twenty-five years ago the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court decided that it was unconstitutional for the Commonwealth or its subdivisions to go into business enterprises. But they said, in substance: "We are not clear of the ground on which we are basing this decision. We are basing it primarily on the fact that it has not been the custom for Massachusetts, except in the very early days of the Colonies, to go into business enterprises, and not having been the usual custom, why, we think it is unconstitutional to now adopt that custom." They did not say positively that it was unconstitutional primarily, but what they added to that was that in time of great public distress or emergency there absolutely was no doubt whatever that the State had the right, or its subdivisions had the right, to go into business enterprises, and that is all that the member in this division is now asking. In other words, he is asking us to take something which even the Supreme Judicial Court admits we already have. So what is the use of duplicating it? What we want is to give the Legislature power it does not now possess, or else we are wasting time, valuable time. We want to adjourn some time. I hope that without wasting any more time this proposition offered by the member in this division will be voted down and that we shall stand by the resolution as we did yesterday.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I feel that the Convention has lost sight of one or two things relative to this measure. In 1903 we had a condition which very closely resembled this as far as the coal situation is concerned. There was a strike of the coal miners in Pennsylvania, and the price of coal in Massachusetts went up to something like $10 or $12 a ton, and it was impossible to obtain coal even at that price. The Legislature at that time thought the way to control prices was to license coal dealers. It is a very difficult matter when the public mind is inflamed, when the people are cold, when they are hungry, to point out some of the dangers to which they may fly in leaving the dangers which they have. There were a few men in the Legislature who dared to point out the trouble which would come from the licensing of the coal dealers, but there were too few of them, and this was the result which obtained under that licensing bill. At that time, through the north end, the west end and the south end in Boston, in fact in every large city of the Commonwealth where there was a congestion of population, there were hundreds of little stores, grocery stores; or they may have sold newspapers and periodicals; they may have been bootblack stands; they may have been, and were in some places, fruit stands, and where there were sheds or cellars connected, the small merchant also sold coal and delivered it in bags or baskets to the people in the congested localities, and they really were performing a service to the poor people in those communities. Now, when the license bill went through, every large coal dealer in Boston or any other city was able to pay the license fee, and did so, but almost all of these little establishments went out of business; they could not afford to pay the license fee. The consequence was that the coal business was thrown right into the hands of those who easily could monopolize it, and people who wanted coal and had no bins in which to put it were obliged to pay more for small quantities or had to send their children down to the wharf with their little carts or with their sleds and bring up a daily supply. Now, just the very thing the Legislature was attempting to avoid, it established, — a monopoly in the coal business.
There is not a man in this Convention, no matter where he lives, but who may bring to his mind some little store in his community that is doing a great service to that community. It is giving an income, perhaps to some old man beyond the age when he can go out and labor hard, perhaps to some widow, or perhaps to some young man who is trying to start in business. Then there are larger establishments which employ one, two, or three clerks or salesmen. The proprietors pay good wages and have a personal interest in their employees. Now, what are you going to do to them? Those people will be unable to compete with the State in the distribution of merchandise,—absolutely unable to do so. They will have to go out of business. But you will find that the State cannot compete efficiently with the great combinations of capital. I do not care whether it is in the grocery business, the coal business, the ice business, the dry-goods business, the drug business or any other business.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Somerville, in connection with his own argument, if the same person, whether she be a widow or whether he be a man who has reached that age where he cannot labor any longer, starts a little store to-day, and one of the chain stores, so called, comes along and competes with him or her, if to-day she or he has not got to get out of the business, and if this is an argument really against this proposition.

Mr. Underhill: The gentleman is very nearly, if not entirely, correct. I think that the chain stores, so called, have proved that they are able to undersell the smaller stores. They buy in enormous quantities, they give no credit, they substitute goods frequently, they pay the lowest possible wage to their employees,—and I want him to take that into consideration,—and consequently they can undersell the little store. Now, sir, to go back to the coal business. In the coal business at that time, and I know, because I previously had graduated from a coal team, they paid their men from $7 to $9 a week for driving a single or a double team, and they worked ten and twelve hours a day. Now all of the coal teamsters, in Boston at least, are organized and the lowest I think any of them gets is $16 a week, and none of them works over eight hours a day.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I should like to have the gentleman state when they ever paid teamsters $9 and $10 a week for driving a coal team in the city of Somerville, or Charlestown, or Boston.

Mr. Underhill: I drove a coal team for a living for four years. I started in with a light team. I got $5 a week for driving that light team. It was true I was only fourteen years of age. At fifteen I was promoted to a heavy team, and I got $7 a week, and I drove that team for three years. When I was trusted at the age of eighteen with a double team, I was paid $9 a week, and I was paid as much as any of the other men working who were older than I was.

Mr. Mahoney: I should like to ask the gentleman how many years ago that was.

Mr. Underhill: I have some gray hairs (those I have left) but, sir, I do not think I look so old or decrepit that the gentleman might not figure back, and realize that it was not so very long ago, and I am sure it is not so long ago but I still remember the backaches from shoveling coal and the cold winter days driving team.

Mr. Donovan of Lawrence: I should like the member in the fourth division to explain a little further on this monopoly matter. Even admitting that there may have been a monopoly in the coal business, was it not a private monopoly? And if it should come about that there would be a monopoly following this amendment would it not be a public monopoly, which the public would own, regulating and protecting the price of necessities from rising?

Mr. UNDERHILL: I do not believe there is any difference in cost to the people between a public monopoly and a private monopoly. A private monopoly perhaps may be more heartless than a public monopoly, but the public monopoly is more arbitrary and taxes and takes from the pockets of the people capital to compete with those same people and waste money in any line of business in which the public monopoly may choose to experiment.

Just stop to think, gentlemen. Massachusetts has no natural resources. Coal is mined in Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, and Ohio. If Massachusetts had to depend upon the food supply raised within her own borders, all of the inhabitants would starve to death in less than a month. The food supply comes from the outside. I do not believe a hundred pounds of wool are raised on the hills of Massachusetts to-day, and for the clothing that we wear, or the goods which go into the production of the cloth, we have to depend upon outside production. What have we got here in Massachusetts? We have thousands and thousands of industrious people who are working in our mills and factories, in our shops and stores, in our great educational institutions, and, if you please, on our recreational coast-line during the summer. We have thousands of traveling salesmen, and small dealers in every branch of trade. We have thousands of young men who are starting in as clerks and as salesmen and eventually will become the merchants and manufacturers of Massachusetts. Pennsylvania places a tax of ten cents a ton on every ton of anthracite coal mined within its borders, shipped outside the State, and Massachusetts has to pay. It has nothing to do with the legislation of Massachusetts, and Massachusetts cannot pass a law that will take off that tax of ten cents. There is a question now whether the coal miners in Pennsylvania and in other coal districts will strike or not. What has Massachusetts got to do with that strike? Can she stop it? No, she cannot. There are strikes all through the great western States, where they produce food-stuffs. Word has gone out, or did go out, to burn the fields of the harvest. Could Massachusetts stop that? She could not. But Massachusetts can, if she will, establish textile and trade-schools, and by providing further opportunities which she can give her young men she will prevent those young men from being handicapped in going into business for themselves and improving their condition. But if she puts this amendment in the Constitution and becomes a competitor of those young men she says to them: "You shall work for me, you shall work for me in the capacity of a slave." (That is the way some labor men always express it when a man has to work for somebody else.) "You shall work for me and I shall pay you what I please; and if you get power enough later on, and organize and go to the Legislature and get your pay raised, and then get a pension, why, you have a pretty soft job, and you ought to be contented with it." But, sir, there are men in Massachusetts who will not be content with any such situation. They do not want a public job. They want a chance to build for themselves. They want a chance, and I do not believe any man in Massachusetts would refuse a chance to make a Carnegie or a Rockefeller of himself. Now I want you to look at this thing seriously and not be carried away by the exigencies of the present abnormal conditions. I am suffering just as much as any of you. I probably have as large a family as most of you have, to support and to educate. I feel the pinch just as hard as any of you. But I do not forget, if you please, that it is not a usual condition which exists, and do not you forget that if you ever give the city of Boston and other cities,—and I will not except the city of Lawrence,—if you ever give cities a chance to go into the coal or grocery business I want to go back to driving team, because it will be the softest job ever made for a man in Massachusetts. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUSICK of Boston: It is with a good deal of reluctance that I speak upon this measure. The reason, which I admit frankly, is that I am counsel for men who deal in food-stuffs. I want you to consider that. At the same time, I want to get you to consider my point of view on this measure.

Do you know that in this amendment you have given to the General Court of the Commonwealth the most drastic power that is given by any Constitution of any State in this Union? That in itself, if it is a fact, should be a sufficient reason for you to consider carefully the effect of this measure, and not be influenced by conditions which all of us admit are bad but which the purpose of this amendment will never correct. Everyone of us knows the condition that exists not only in Massachusetts, but all over this great country to-day in regard to the high price of food-stuffs. It is not a condition that is local to Massachusetts. No other condition could exist when the United States of America has been for three years trying to feed all the European countries as well as the United States. And when the delegate in the second division (Mr. Anderson of Brookline), the proponent of this measure, very unctuously remarked when he opened this debate that the United States was to-day the greatest corporation of the world, why did he not tell you the whole truth? Why did he not say that that power was simply a war power, and is expressly stated as such in the statute creating the power, and not leave it to be inferred that such was a reason why the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should approve the principles of this amendment?

What does this measure mean? Does it mean municipal ownership? No, it does not. Does it mean that the Commonwealth may take the business of a concern which is dealing in food-stuff, and pay for it? It does not. This measure means, and means nothing more than that, that the Commonwealth shall enter into competition with the private individuals and corporations who to-day are engaged in the production, the sale and distribution of food-stuffs. Now, what does that mean? That means that you destroy the individual initiative of men who have spent perhaps the greater number of their years in building up a business, and you do not pay them for it. You destroy it by indirection.

For instance, let me illustrate. A lot has been said here about the milk business. The proponent of this measure knows the milk business. He has been investigating it for a number of years. He has to-day in his office certain evidence in regard to some of the factors of the milk business. I know, and you know, that if that milk business in Massachusetts had been conducted illegally he would not wait until this time to prosecute it. Now let me tell you about the milk business. One concern has been producing and distributing milk in the towns and cities of greater Boston for sixty years. Up to fifteen years ago its business consisted of bringing milk in from the country and selling it here to peddlers, with no handling whatsoever, the peddler taking it to the consumer and distributing it. The economic condition was such that the peddler could not do it, because the laws of this Commonwealth require the treatment of milk before it is sold. To-day from this concern that supplies perhaps two-fifths or more of all the milk of greater Boston not one single drop of milk goes to any consumer until it is pasteurized and absolutely free from disease of any character, regardless of whether it goes down to the slums of the north or west ends or to the Back Bay of Boston; and, furthermore, when that milk comes in on the cars from the country and goes to the plants, where there are hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of machinery, no human person gets near that milk or comes in contact with it until it is opened in your kitchens for consumption. These people are not middlemen. For sixty years they have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing that business. My friend here in the first division was telling you about the coal business. That is a matter of merchandising. If there are factors between the producer and the consumer that are unnecessary in the coal business it is one thing; but there is no factor between the producer and the consumer in the milk business, and therefore the thing that troubles the member in the first division is one of “merchandising”, an economic proposition, which this amendment does not solve.

Mr. Willett of Norwood: I should like to ask, Mr. President, through you, a question of this gentleman regarding the merchandising of coal. From my knowledge of the coal business,—and we buy considerable amounts of coal for different communities in which our plants are situated,—I find that the greatest factor in the cost of coal as it is handled to-day is the competition that comes from the men who sell coal in different communities, competing with each other for coal. Now, would not the collective buying, which would be possible through the Commonwealth or the cities or towns in the Commonwealth and thereby removing competition with ourselves in buying from the mines, be a very potent factor in the merchandising of coal, and would it not relieve Massachusetts as a whole from profits which are paid to middlemen? The abnormal price as now made is a premium for deliveries over the actual cost at the mine.

Mr. Cusick: The question of merchandising is purely an economic question, and is not a political one. We do not have to go any further than the suburbs of any city. We go out there and we find a butcher's shop here, a grocery store there, a butter store there. They all are dealing in many of the same articles. Now, there is no way to stop that, but there is no question that that is an economic loss. There is no question that the thing some time has got to be met, but it is not going to be met by such an amendment as this, because it is purely and simply an economic question. The point I desire to make is this: In the good-will, trade and custom of the business conducted by the individual or the corporation is a valuable property right. Now, if the Commonwealth wants to go in and do that business, if it took that business and paid a reasonable compensation for it that at least would be honest. On the other hand, you simply provide that the Commonwealth may compete, and nothing in this amendment (please remember this, consider it, examine it and see if I am not stating what is true) nothing in this amendment provides for the taking of any business. Now, are you going to be dishonest with your own citizens? The minute a municipal plant for the selling or distribution of food-stuffs in many lines is set up, even if that plant does not exist but three months, a great property right has been lost to the individual who makes it possible for the municipality or the Commonwealth to engage in this business. It does not require any argument of mine to convince any thoughtful man in this body that private business cannot compete with municipal business or business conducted by the Commonwealth. The factors are entirely different in both cases. In the one case you have the individual initiative supplied by individual capital, and they must make an increment on their capital through their operation; when business is carried on by the State or municipality your capital is obtained by taxation; you have the whole people to fall back on, in order to make up any deficit that is necessary, through taxes, and it is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I want to be sure that I got the gentleman's argument. As I understood him, he argued against the latter part of the proposition,—and let him correct me if I do not state him correctly,—which authorizes the Commonwealth, if the Legislature grants the power, or the cities and towns, to establish and maintain markets, docks, fuel and coal yards, elevators, canneries and other like means of distribution, which I have especially stated might contemplate a milk distribution station, and he has stated frankly that he is counsel for one of the milk distributors. Now, I want to see whether or not the gist of his argument is that there should be a provision in the Constitution,—mind you, not in a statute similar to the present statutory provision,—to the effect that you shall not set up a municipal gas company unless and until you take and pay for the existing gas company. In other words, is his proposition that there shall be no State or municipal cannery or slaughter-house or cold storage plant or milk distribution station or ice distribution station unless and until, under the Constitution, all the existing plants of that kind that want to have themselves taken and paid for are taken and paid for out of the treasury of the Commonwealth or of the municipality which undertakes to extend the facilities for the collection, preservation and distribution of the necessaries of life?

Mr. Cusick: I do not think there is any need for me to answer that. The gentleman knows it very well. If he does not, I will restate it. There is nothing in the resolution which he has proposed here that gives the Legislature the power to take and pay for an existing business dealing in food-stuffs, and he must know that fact. Now, as far as the Legislature is concerned, if the Legislature does not get that power from the amendment to the Constitution it cannot exercise it.

Mr. Anderson: Seriously I ask this question. If it be a constitutional right for the Commonwealth, either as a State or to authorize a municipality, to go into any of these lines of canneries, slaughterhouses, milk distribution, etc., does it not necessarily follow as matter of law, ordinary law, without any express grant in the Constitution, that they may take by eminent domain any existing land or facilities, including all the business of your plants?

Mr. CUSICK: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: Pardon me. And use those facilities? In other words, if the gentleman's proposition is a serious proposition, that the Commonwealth would be without power if it went into the milk distribution business in Boston or in metropolitan Boston to take and pay for, if the Legislature thought that was wise, all or any part of the machinery of his present plant, I am frank to say I should be heartily in favor of granting that constitutional power, and would assent instantly to a proper amendment; for it is perfectly clear that the Legislature ought to be empowered when it goes into any of these businesses to take and pay for any plants that ought to be taken and paid for either to facilitate the public business or in justice to any existing business.

Mr. CUSICK: Nowhere in this resolution is there any description of business or is the word business used. A business consists of more than the actual physical property used in the sale of a commodity. Attached to such property is a good-will, trade and custom, which is a property right and sometimes more valuable than the physical property. My contention is, — I may be wrong, I have tried here to ascertain the fact, but I believe I am right, — my contention is that this power gives the Legislature the right to authorize only the taking by purchase or otherwise of certain food-stuffs, feeds, fuel, ice, etc.; it does not give them the right to take an existing business, and my opinion is that the minute such a proposition appeared in the Legislature that point would be raised by the legislators. In other words, you may destroy a business by indirection and competition. If the gentleman would not do that then why not make it plainer and give the Legislature the right to take the business as well as to buy and sell food-stuffs, fuel, etc.?

Mr. ANDERSON: I will say to the gentleman, and it may shorten the discussion here, that if he will show me any authority or see me outside the Convention and indicate that there is any reasonable doubt under this proposed amendment of the Constitution of the power of the Legislature to authorize the taking and the paying for any existing plant, I will sit down with him and work out such amendment to this resolution, and undertake to get the assent of my committee, as will put it beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. CUSICK: I thank the gentleman for his courtesy in this matter, but now I am referring the matter to the consideration of this Convention. I shall be glad if I can have an opportunity to take it up. The gentleman asked me if I could furnish any authority. No. As I said before, no Legislature in any State of this Union has this power, as far as I have been able to find it, and I have tried to have it verified by the commission that was appointed by the Governor to get out these bulletins, and after conference I think I can say truthfully that you are now embarking on an undertaking and giving a power to the Legislature that is had by no other Legislature in this Union. Therefore of course there cannot be any authority on that specific point. But I do not think there is much doubt that a careful reading of this measure shows definitely what it is, in other words, the right for the Commonwealth, town or municipality to compete with individuals in the line of buying and selling food-stuffs, and to that end they may, if necessary, be authorized to establish, build if you will, then maintain the different plants, whether it be wharves or coal-yards or cold storage plants, that are necessary to do what,—to buy and sell food-stuffs. But this resolution nowhere authorizes the Legislature, by express words, to reimburse the individual for the loss through destruction of his business by competition with the State. And this method would be the only method that would be practical to the State in most cases.

Mr. Broderick of Waltham: The gentleman's opposition to this proposal is based chiefly on the ground that if it is adopted certain property rights of the individual will not be protected. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman what chance or hope the individual has now to protect such property rights as against the power of great combinations of capital, whenever that power may be unscrupulously or unjustly exercised?

Mr. Cusick: I do not think that it would be of any benefit to go into that question at length but I will tell you, sir, you have got a mighty able representative of the United States government here who proposed this resolution and who has been investigating such matters as you referred to for a long time. I believe if he had found that there had been any violation of law he would have prosecuted. I want to call the attention of this Convention to the fact that there is plenty of law on the statute-books to-day in this Commonwealth that gives every opportunity to prevent a monopoly in the necessaries of life. Apart from the common law there have been passed in 1908, 1912, 1913 and in other years, statutes which cover points in regard to monopolies, restraints of trade, unlawful competition, and combinations of trade intrastate. As far as interstate matters are concerned it is within the knowledge of you all that the United States government, certainly under some administrations, has made some successful prosecutions under the Sherman Act.

Now, Mr. President and fellow-delegates, let me state what I think would be right, and I do not think there is a great difference between us as to a proper remedy. I believe a law of this character, limited to times of war or public emergency, would meet the situation; but, I will go still further and say to you that I would define times of public emergency to include such a condition of distress as might be brought about in consequence of the control of the production, sale or distribution of food-stuffs by any individual or corporation which results in a detriment to the public, and, therefore, against public welfare. In other words, I would limit the principles of this resolution to times of war, public emergencies, or when necessary for the public welfare. That would give to every person in this Commonwealth the protection which is necessary under the law; would meet the approval of every honest man and would put an end to the socialistic dogma which seeks to have the Commonwealth engaged in business which in itself will destroy individual initiative in business affairs.

Mr. Josiah Quincy of Boston offered certain amendments to the new draft (No. 358) cited at the beginning of the chapter.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. Quincy: It has seemed to me that the wording of the first two lines of this amendment left it in grave doubt whether the intention of the committee was carried out. I have no doubt that the committee intends to give full power to the Commonwealth to contract for or to purchase outside the State any of the articles here enumerated, but I am afraid, and I find that other members upon this floor are afraid, that the use of the words "take by purchase or otherwise" leaves it in doubt, as those words apply peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth itself, the Commonwealth having no power to take by eminent domain outside of its own limits. Of course that raises at least a serious doubt whether it is the intention of this amendment to give the full power to the Commonwealth to go outside the State, where it has no power to "take" in the legal sense, and to arrange for the purchase by contract or otherwise of coal and other articles of necessity. I take it the chairman of the committee will be prepared to say that that is a proper amendment to clear up that vitally important matter.

The next change is purely a verbal one, to correspond with the new construction of the sentence which is made necessary.

The addition of the words "preserving and storing" after the word "converting", in line 19, seems to be necessary to provide for carrying out fully the plain intent of the powers proposed to be given.

Now, as I am on my feet, I should like to say just a word about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch). In the first place, he stated to us that his amendment made no change whatever, as he understood it, except to make this authority subject to the new clause "when and so far as a public exigency exists, and so long as it continues"; but in the necessary change in the construction of the resolution he has made, perhaps inadvertently, what seems to me an important change in respect to the powers of the Governor and Council. As the resolution stands those powers could be exercised until otherwise provided by legislation, and these words were purposely used, whereas under the gentleman's amendment the powers of the Governor and Council would cease automatically the moment the Legislature assembled. Under the resolution as it stands they would continue until the Legislature acts, and the months of January and February quite conceivably may be important months for the exercise of powers under this proposed amendment.

But it seems to me, Mr. President, that the important question which is suggested by the resolution of the gentleman from Winchester is this: Are we, in voting upon this amendment, committing ourselves, any one of us, upon the policy or expediency of passing legislation exercising any of these powers? I want to say for myself that I do not consider that in voting for this amendment I am voting in favor of the exercise by the Legislature of any one of those powers. I am not voting upon the question of policy, except to the extent of saying that it is sound policy for this Convention to unite the hands of the Legislature, to remove the restrictions which now prevent the Legislature from passing legislation of this character. I do not understand that I or the other gentlemen who vote for this resolution are saying how we would vote as members of the Legislature upon any proposal to exercise all or any of the powers that are included in this amendment.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: Yesterday when my amendment was rejected, I thought some gentlemen present did not understand it. Now, I see that the gentleman from Boston has used words that were in my amendment, namely, the provision for temporary shelter. I hope he will go home to-night and think over carefully two or three other matters I suggested. That resolution is now confined to the necessaries of life. Now, gentlemen, who is to decide what are the necessaries of life? If you want to do business here, and wish to allow the State to do business, do not use doubtful language that later must be interpreted by the Supreme Judicial Court.

The gentleman who has just filed these amendments has been mayor of Boston. He knows the great city. He knows that some of us are unfortunate enough to hold real estate here. Not large holdings, perhaps, but a lot of small holdings. Mechanics and workmen have their little houses with mortgages on them. When we adopt this socialistic idea of having the State go into a business which it cannot run at a profit and go into competition with private concerns, the man who owns a little real estate is going to suffer, because he must pay the taxes. He cannot take up his real estate and run down to Providence or some other place. Those who have invested in stocks or bonds can leave when they wish, but they must stay and pay the bills. I think you should consider the matter seriously before you make this State purely socialistic, as this resolution provides. We should give this authority for the existing emergency,—the war,—and there we should stop.

Here is another thing for the gentleman from Boston to think over to-night. If the State finds itself loaded down with goods which it cannot sell to its citizens because the goods cost too much, authority to sell to citizens of other States should be granted.

Again, I say, you should pause before you plunge this State for all time into purely socialistic undertakings. The committee says: "Come in at any time and stay forever." I say: "Come in when it becomes necessary and stay as long as is necessary."

If the student from Boston in the second division will consider what I have said, I believe he will offer more perfecting amendments and eventually will have my amendment which was defeated yesterday.

Mr. James P. Richardson of Newton moved certain amendments to the new draft (No. 358) cited at the beginning of the chapter. Debate was resumed Friday, September 28.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: The amendment which I have offered this morning is a simple one and would provide only for the application of the principles of the civil service system to any positions which may be created if the provisions of this suggested amendment to the Constitution shall be adopted. In other words, it is to take this experimental work of the Commonwealth, if we are to go into it, out of politics so far as that can be done.

I do not propose to spend any time in arguing the merits of that proposition, because I believe it will appeal to the members of this Convention and because I venture to think that the proponents of the resolution will accept it and approve of it.

I now wish to say a few words, Mr. President, upon the amendment which I offered yesterday and which is printed under my name in this calendar. The purpose of that amendment is simple and plain and easily understood. It presents a definite point which never yet has been considered by itself and separately. The whole purpose of that amendment is to limit the operation of the proposed measure to dealing by the Commonwealth and its municipalities in such articles as are comprised under the head of food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice, and to take out of the proposed article the words "other necessaries of life."

Now there are three reasons which I want to give why I think that that amendment ought to be adopted, and the first is this: I think that the field to be occupied by the Commonwealth in taking up this experimental method of State coöperation or State socialism or whatever you may be pleased to call it, should be limited and definite. Now if you will confine the operation of the amendment to food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice, you embrace a field which is logical, comprehensive, definite and at the same time reasonably limited. There is a field within which the amendment can operate with some certainty as to what matters are to be affected and what matters are not to be affected. If you gentlemen who are business men are going to adopt a new system in your business of any sort,—if you gentlemen who are school-men are going to adopt a new principle or method of instruction in the departments of your school,—you do not put it in at the first blush all over the plant; you try it out here and there and see how it works.

Everybody in the Convention admits that this is an important parting of the ways; that it is a new thing in this Commonwealth which is proposed. If we are to try it, let us try it in a businesslike and common-sense way, and let us not spread it all over the possible field of business enterprise until we know how it works with reference to some things upon which you can put your finger. That is the first reason why I urge the limitation of this measure to the dealing in food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice.

The second reason is because I believe the language of the amendment as it stands at present is open to the indictment of looseness, vagueness and obscurity. In other words, what is a necessity or a necessary of life? That definition has been changing constantly in the last fifty years. Many things are considered necessaries of life to-day which were not in that category a half century ago or even a less space of time. Many things are considered necessaries of life in the metropolitan communities to-day which are not in that category back in the hills or in the country. Moreover, every lawyer knows how many times the words "necessaries of life" come before the courts for construction and interpretation. I need to mention only such matters as the liability of minors for necessaries of life and the operation of what is known as the Dubuque law to show you how uncertain the definition of the phrase "necessaries of life" is and how much opportunity exists for litigation under the language of the amendment as it now stands. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the committee in charge really does not have in mind the extension of the field of this measure beyond the words which I would leave in it, because the sentence at the end of the resolution, which defines the instrumentalities which the Commonwealth may take and operate, relates only to such instrumentalities as would be useful in dealing with food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice, to wit, "markets, docks, fuel and coal-yards, etc." (not to weary you with reading it), all relating to food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice. And therefore it seems to me that the purpose of the proponents of this resolution will be carried out as fully as it ought to be carried out if the words "and other necessaries of life", which are indefinite and vague, and no one knows what they mean or can know until the Supreme Judicial Court takes the last guess at them, should be stricken out of that resolution.

But the third reason perhaps may be said to embrace a little of the other reasons and, it seems to me, is the most important of all. If you limit the operation of the amendment to food-stuffs, feeds, fuel and ice, you cover only a field in which are embraced none of the basic industries of this Commonwealth. Now who shall say, Mr. President, that the lumber industry, the cotton and woolen goods industry and the leather industry in all its various forms may not be considered (or ought to be considered) as necessaries of life? And if the operation of this amendment is to be extended to cover those great industries, which are the basic industries of Massachusetts, and on which her industrial prosperity absolutely depends, you will have established or at least authorized State competition with your own basic industries; whereas if the operation of the amendment is limited to these definite things to which I keep referring, you will have limited it to matters which are produced principally outside the boundaries of this State and in respect to which it is at least conceivable that the argument yesterday of the gentleman from Norwood (Mr. Willett) with regard to the power of collective buying may apply, and that the amendment may be of benefit to the inhabitants of this Commonwealth. But I cannot conceive that it is good government to empower the State as an instrument of government to go into business in competition with the basic industries of the State. That is going further than public ownership, because it is creating not a constructive but a destructive force, and I never have heard that principle seriously urged before. I really do not believe that that is what is in the minds of the committee now.

For those three reasons, then, gentlemen, I urge the serious consideration of this amendment by the Convention. It certainly is true that unless we do so limit it there will be both a continual and a continuous strain, in the halls of the Legislature and by the operation of the initiative petition, if that is to apply to these matters, to bring within the purview of this amendment matters which ought not to belong there; in other words, to stretch it constantly and make it occupy a larger field than that which it ought to occupy and that which will be occupied if the language is at once definite, comprehensive and logical, as I believe would be the case if the words "other necessaries of life" were stricken out wherever they appear.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: In approaching the matter set forth by Mr. Anderson of Brookline as chairman of his committee I at first approached it from the standpoint of a retail merchant, as I am a fairly successful retail merchant, and I was absolutely opposed to the proposition as being one that interfered too seriously with private business privileges. But as I looked at the matter from a community standpoint and analyzed it in every far-reaching way that I could, my opinions changed so that instead of being opposed to it they were absolutely in favor of it. I regard the proposed amendments as being unfriendly amendments to the very fundamentals of the original propositions as reported by the committee, because they are restrictive amendments. They are meant to be restrictive amendments. The movers of those amendments utterly fail to see and to appreciate the fact that our Constitution, whatever it may be, eventually will have to be broad enough to permit the Legislature of this State to do anything that speaks for the economics and the contentment of our whole people, without restrictions and without qualifications. There is no doubt about that fact to my mind. That is what we are coming to and that is what we ought to come to. Business operation and business systems after this international war, in my judgment, will be on an entirely different plane from anything we have known before. I believe the people will not be satisfied to let the United States government relinquish its control of the coal supply or the operation of our National railroads. I believe they will be satisfied with nothing less than absolute government ownership of those two great factors in our every-day life. And I believe, Mr. President, that if we are to do anything in the way of improving our Constitution we should improve it along lines that will permit, as I have just said, our Legislature to do those things that speak for the economics and contentment of our whole people, no matter whose tree they may bark.

It has been said by some of the advocates of these amendments that there would be no remuneration for the private loss sustained if the State or any of its political factors should go into this business of dealing in public necessities. I wish to call to their attention the fact that when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts first chartered our railroads and made that great progress possible in the transportation field, there was no consideration for the hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in stage-coaches and private toll roads that had to be thrown on the scrap-heap because of the march of progress; and there is no reason in my mind why there should be any consideration for a moment of the individual injuries when weighed in the balance against an entire community benefit.

The gentleman in the fourth division, Mr. Underhill of Somerville, said yesterday that there was very little difference between public owned monopoly and private owned monopoly. It is a statement that could not be made by a man who has any understanding at all of either of those factors. Private owned monopoly, as everyone here knows, is run for the primary purpose of paying a profit to its stockholders, while public owned monopoly, as everyone knows, is run for the primary purpose of giving a service back to the whole people as economically as possible. They cannot be debated on the same lines, they are so opposed to each other. To illustrate: It was only a few years ago that Newton D. Baker, then mayor of Cleveland, Ohio, had a situation confronting him very much such as exists in the city of Boston to-day. The electric light company in his city had a monopoly of the entire public electricity producing business in Cleveland, the same as the Edison Electric Illuminating Company has a monopoly of the entire business here; and he made up his mind that he would establish a publicly owned electric plant for the production of light and power in that city. And so they went to the Legislature and got permission to issue $1,250,000 in bonds, to be retired in 20 years, to build such a plant. At that time the rate to the householder in Cleveland was ten cents a kilowatt hour, the same as it is in Boston for household electricity. They built the plant and, after setting aside a sum equal to the taxes on the plant as if it had been privately owned, setting aside a sum to retire its bonds, to take care of its maintenance, to take care of its depreciation; they were able to sell electricity to every household in Cleveland at three cents per kilowatt hour with a minimum charge of fifty cents a month. Many of the households there do not even use the minimum charge because the rate is so low. The city was able to produce electricity for the electric railway companies so much cheaper than the electric railway companies could produce it for themselves that the railway companies have abandoned all electrical plants of their own and take electricity from the municipal plant.

That shows, Mr. President, that government control of public necessities is not an expensive matter; it speaks for the economies of the whole people. It removes absolutely from the consumer the necessity of paying to the company large annual amounts that are spent every year by our public service corporations for the sake of shaping up Legislatures, shaping up city governments, shaping up town governments, in order that the corporations may be benefited. There is spent in this Commonwealth every year $500,000 of the funds of public utilities, that are paid for ultimately by the consumer, for the immoral political practices that prevail in this State as exemplified through the office of "Jake" Wardwell and "Charlie" Innes. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Adams of Concord, the Boston Consolidated Gas and the Bay State Street Railway Company?

Mr. Bauer: Absolutely, yes.

Mr. Adams: Then I rise to a question of privilege.

The President: Mr. Adams of Concord has the floor.

Mr. Adams: I am a director in those three companies, the Bay State Street Railway Company, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston and the Boston Consolidated Gas Company; and I know as far as one can know what goes on in those companies, and I want to say that not one cent is spent by those companies in any way to influence the election of any State officer or any member of the Legislature, in any way improper or contrary to the laws of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Bauer: In answer to that I wish to refer the gentleman who has just spoken to the testimony of "Jake" Wardwell before our Board of Gas and Electric Light Commissioners this winter, where he testified that the Boston Edison Company had paid him a retainer of $50,000 a year to use as he well knows how, and testified under oath.

Mr. Adams: Mr. Wardwell is paid a salary by the Edison Company, but not with any direct or indirect intention that the salary shall be paid for any improper purpose or for anything except his own uses.

Mr. Bauer: And, Mr. President, in continuing along that line I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the "yellow dog" secret payroll of the Bay State Street Railway Company of $120,000 a year which was uncovered before the tribunal that was passing on the arbitration of the wages of their employees some years ago, of which Mr. Pelleter, a delegate here, was one of the arbitrators. Why, Mr. President, the matter is so notorious that no one can successfully defend it. I was astounded the other day to go into the telephone booths that are used by the members of the Legislature and only by them, and I found scribbled on the walls of those booths, almost on the very walls of this State House, the telephone numbers of "Jake" Wardwell and "Charlie" Innes in almost every booth. [Laughter.] So I say, Mr. President, that the public control of all of this matter will wipe out the necessity of the consumer paying for any of this immoral political and immoral professional expense, besides rendering back to the people only service and not profits.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I desire to ask the gentleman if he understood that railroads or street railways were covered by this proposition. I desire to ask if he understood that railroads or street railways were covered by the matter under consideration.

Mr. Bauer: I think the gentleman who has just spoken has a very conscious knowledge of the fact that they are.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: I wish to suggest one point of view in this discussion which I think has not been developed and seems to me to be important. This resolution is one of five or six resolutions reported to the Convention which extend the field of public endeavor and to some degree at least, if anything ever is done under them, enter the field of what we are wont to consider private enterprise. I refer to one resolution coming from this same committee relative to the use of agricultural lands and forest and water resources; to another resolution which extends the power of cities to purchase and sell land for homes for citizens and similar purposes; to the provision for State insurance of all kinds and to some extent of social insurance. The question under any one of those resolutions is not whether the Legislature or the people shall act under them, and the argument which has been addressed to the Convention with reference to the pending resolution, that the Legislature or the people never will do anything harmful under it, is an argument not entitled to any weight. The question is whether, in reviewing our system, our theory of government, we shall change that theory in any degree by removing the barriers set up by the construction of the court and by the common understanding of the people from time to time between what is proper public endeavor and what is proper private endeavor.

Let us imagine the Constitution with these new powers, the five or six that have been reported, written into it, and compare such a document, and what is likely to arise or what may arise under it, with the document we have now.

Suppose that with the power to deal in land for homes, with the power to go into all sorts of insurance, with the power, even as closely regulated as it is under this pending resolution, to establish all sorts of business, as they do in Australia, where, notwithstanding the assertion of my friend from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) that a clean collar is not a necessity of life, they have public laundries run by the State,—imagine these various powers written in. We find, then, that there have been taken down little by little the several barriers or distinctions between public and private endeavor, so that if, after these amendments have been included, it should seem desirable, for example, to take over the Gloucester fishermen, and if this might not quite come under the development and use of our water resources, or quite come under the distribution or conservation of food-stuffs, but possibly does come somewhat near a public need, of which the Legislature now and hereafter is the sole judge, and it is put up to the court to determine whether or not the taking over of the Gloucester fishermen is a public use, will not the court say, will it not almost be bound to say that these new provisions written into our Constitution by this Convention express, in the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, "the preponderant public opinion" that such a matter and kindred matters, if the Legislature thinks wise, are matters of public use and therefore to be undertaken by public authority? It seems to me that the risk of the pending resolution is not so much in itself as in its implication and the extension of that domain of public use which it foreshadows.

Now is any extension necessary? Of course it is not useful or necessary to spend a moment of time upon a review of the constant pace-keeping of the Legislature and of the courts, whenever the courts have been asked to construe legislative acts, with the needs of our advancing civilization. Fifty years ago, perhaps, nobody thought that a public water supply was of public interest. Nobody thinks to-day that a public water supply is not absolutely a public purpose. There are innumerable similar instances. Every advance in our whole civilization has affected or extended public control, and under our Constitution there has been no retardation of governmental usefulness as opinion from time to time desired it.

Now a word as to the pending resolution. It has two aspects, unfortunately, unduly and to my mind unwisely commingled. It has the aspect of the protection of public health and public safety in times of need. I believe that so far as the providing of fuel, so far as the providing of foods, so far as the providing or distribution of flour, so far as any of the things that we all agree to be the absolute essentials of life are concerned, this State to-day has power to do what is necessary to be done to protect the health and the safety of its people. If our streets are to be lighted, coal may be necessary to do it. If our hospitals are to be heated, coal is necessary. If any of our works is to go on, if our people are to exist, the taking, distribution and control of those things are necessarily a matter of public control and public interest. That I believe can be done now. The old opinions of the court had to deal not with the emergency or the need but with a question of whether coal could be bought cheaper or not, which is a very different question. If it can be done now, then this resolution, so far as the emergency or the need is concerned, is unnecessary. Nobody knows absolutely whether that can be done or not, because after all our court must determine finally whether it is a public use. And therefore we are agreed, I take it, the great majority of us, that the primary function of government being the protection of the health and the safety of its people, if there is any doubt about the power under the Constitution now, we should see that such power is given.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I thought the gentleman misstated the interpretation put by the Supreme Judicial Court in the public need question which has been before the court twice. I wish he would restate that. If I am correct in my view of the decisions, only two of the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court held that even in time of need was there power in the Legislature under the existing Constitution to authorize a municipal government to deal in coal, fuel and any other necessaries. That is one thing that I wanted to ask the gentleman.

Mr. Dresser: I have not looked at those opinions for some time, but I think that the gentleman has stated them accurately. I do not care. In the first place, those are advisory opinions, not the decisions of the court. They are given as the advisory opinions are given, not after argument, not after long deliberation, but in an advisory capacity, and are not binding upon the court in any later decision. In the next place, conditions change from time to time. I do not know what may have been the situation then, but it is inconceivable,—inconceivable that there is not power in this State, and power which the courts will recognize. To provide the essentials for the health and the safety of our people,—that is the first duty of government.

Mr. Anderson: I ask another question, for I am very anxious to get the gentleman's view in which I always am interested, and I am particularly interested now, for he said, greatly to my surprise, that the times have changed,—and we must change with them, I suppose was the inference. He said a moment ago, and I wonder if he seriously means it, that the question of what was a public use ultimately must be determined by the court, whatever there was in the Constitution. Those were not his exact words, but that was the import as I understood it. Now does he mean by that the people of the Commonwealth cannot adopt a Constitution which shall create a new category of public uses binding upon the courts of the Commonwealth?

Mr. Dresser: Of course I said nothing of the sort and I think the gentleman must have misunderstood me. The question of what is a public use must be determined finally by the court; must be determined, under the Constitution as it stands at this moment, simply by what the court believes, finds to be, as I like the phrase, "the preponderant public opinion,"—which this court never has yet violated and which the Supreme Court of the United States does not violate.

Now take the other suggestion of the gentleman. Of course we can write into the Constitution whatever we choose. And when we write it in it is binding on the courts. And my point is that when we have written into our Constitution these five or six extensions and definitions of public use where there is now no definition,—except, I think, the homestead taking, practically no definition of it,—when we write these in we then have asserted in this Convention a new conception of the duties of the State, and a conception which the court must follow. I fear I do not make myself clear about it, but it is my intention to compare our present theory of leaving the Legislature free and the court free to translate into legislation whatever is necessary to meet the changing conditions of our civilization.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester if it is not better to have our Constitution written by the people through this Convention and their action afterwards on what we do, than to have our Constitution written by the courts.

Mr. Dresser: The Constitution is written by the people if we leave the phrases flexible to meet their desires. The phrases of our Constitution are flexible now and do meet the changing desires.

Mr. Creamer: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester if it is desirable to have our Constitution and our laws so flexible that different judges may pass different opinions upon them?

Mr. Dresser: I suppose that is inherent in any human institution,—that different executives, different commissions, different judges, different delegates approach a question from a different point of view.
Mr. Creamer: I simply asked him,—he has not answered my question,—if he thought it was desirable to have our Constitution so flexible, or if it was not more desirable to have our Constitution state absolutely what we mean and what we want.

Mr. Dresser: I think it is better to have a flexible Constitution than a rigid one which may last but three or four years and then have to be revamped. [Applause.]

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman to explain a little further his statement that our Constitution was founded upon a theory of government. My object is to find out if we must hold to the theory regardless of the facts of our present industrial and social life.

Mr. Dresser: There is no theory expressed in our Constitution anywhere that prevents our Legislatures, our people, our courts, from meeting, as they have met, the changing conditions of social life.

Mr. Donovan: The last statement of the speaker begets another question. In his reference to the fact that public opinion will manifest itself in changed legislation, he held that it never has been known that the courts have not succumbed to this public opinion. Now, is it not possible, and has it not been the history of our State and Nation, that there have been times where that public opinion had to manifest itself in terms of threatened violence before those forms of legislation and the judgment of the courts began to reflect the changing opinion of the people?

Mr. Dresser: My statement was confined to our Massachusetts Legislature and our Massachusetts courts, and I prefer confining it there. So far as making use of violence, I am aware of but one instance, which was the Shays's Rebellion referred to the other day. I should say that the present resolution is supported by those of us, who are the great majority, who believe that if there is any doubt that the public, the government, has no power to provide in times of need these necessities,—and I do not mean times of war, I mean the ordinary times of need as need develops from time to time,—that it is entirely right and wise probably that that power be granted. The other aspect of the resolution, which calls to its support other people, whom I believe to be the minority of this Convention, is that power should be given to the State to compete or to go into business for the sake of diminishing prices. Now, there is a difference. If coal is a necessity of life, whether we shall have coal and get it, get it at any price, get it so far as we can, as we get water, as we get air, is one question; but whether we shall pay $8 a ton or $8.10 a ton, is another. They are two distinct propositions. One has to do with public duty, the other has to do with the ordinary conditions of trade. Now, those ordinary conditions of trade may be taken up—

Mr. Willett of Norwood: May I ask the gentleman from Worcester if under ordinary conditions, if correctly defined, we can save fifty cents a ton or a dollar a ton by purchase of coal for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, would he consider that a desirable and proper activity for the Commonwealth to engage in?

Mr. Dresser: If I understand the gentleman's question it is that if the Commonwealth could by buying coal save money and then sell at a less price than is now charged, whether that would be desirable. I do not know whether that would be desirable or not. I do know, I think I know, that that is a change of governmental theory. The desirability of doing it may be a question for discussion by the Legislature. The question whether that theory shall be a part of our fundamental law is a question for us here, and a much more far-reaching one.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: The gentleman from Worcester has just said that it is a change of governmental function. Has not the government for a long while been tending to supply water to the inhabitants of the cities and towns and districts on the ground of health, and while that may be a health measure is it not equally a health measure to prevent people from freezing to death?

Mr. Dresser: I have covered that point. I agree that it is a health measure to keep people from freezing to death. I deny that it is a health measure whether the price of coal is $8.10 or $8.05, if that is the only reason for the legislation. There is a distinction between the supplying and the getting of the things necessary to our existence and the mere question of price. Now, the question of price is cared for in other forms and corrected in other ways. It is corrected by supply and demand, by economy. It is corrected by our mass of legislation, affecting not only business as conducted in Massachusetts through State statutes but through the Federal statutes. That question is not without its remedy, but to attempt to regulate it through this resolution is a departure from our theory of leaving to the government what is purely governmental and leaving to the individual what may be made the subject of reasonable and legal competition.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I would ask the gentleman for his opinion on this question: Has this resolution any merit from the standpoint of affording an opportunity to educate the people perhaps to the false economic theories which he now thinks they hold? Has it any merit from the standpoint of Legislature deliberation and possible education therefrom?

Mr. Dresser: I cannot say anything about economic theories, false or sound, because I know nothing about them. As to the other suggestion, I do not think this measure ought to be limited to war or war conditions. There may come a time in Massachusetts when, as the delegate from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) suggested, we shall have to do like Pharaoh, and in the seven fat years save our corn for the seven lean years. The minute it appears that in Massachusetts we cannot get the essentials of life, or that we are at the will of transportation or other things, it then very probably is as much a duty of the State to see that those essentials of life are gathered and provided as it is to provide water or to provide light. The question comes solely upon where the line is to be drawn, and it is a changing line, which under our present Constitution does change and may change from year to year, but, if our Constitution is written, as has been suggested, specifically and definitely, so that the man who runs may read, the precise words may be outgrown in a month.

Mr. Willett of Norwood: I wish the gentleman from Worcester would clear up one point to which he referred. Take, for example, the question of theory of government. I am asking for information. The town of Norwood runs a municipal light plant as a business proposition. It makes, perhaps, twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year. It sells stoves and other like fixtures. It does everything incidental to business, and it appears to be to the advantage of everyone in the community, so far as I am able to judge. I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester whether, under the statutes which are provided for the Legislature to take possession in connection with other like matters; there is a change of theory of government? Take, for example, in the question of the distribution of coal, or the distribution of ice or any like necessities, is there introduced any change from the existing situation, or any change as regards the theory of government?

Mr. DRESSER: Do I understand the gentleman to have reference to this specific resolution, the phrasing of it? I do not think I quite got his question.

Mr. WILLETT: I understood the gentleman from Worcester to say that under this resolution we were launching out upon a new theory of government; that if the Constitution was changed so that we had the right to do these things that are provided for under it we in fact were introducing a new theory of government, a different theory from what we now have. I asked—whether there is any real distinction between these activities which already are permissible under the Constitution as it now stands, such as relate to providing electricity and gas, and those which this resolution would permit,—such as the distribution of coal and ice and other like necessities.

Mr. DRESSER: The justification for the municipal light plant is not getting cheaper light, it is making safe highways, it is bringing to the people facilities through taxation which possibly no private company might give. The water company, for example, might never find it profitable to enlarge its reservoirs to provide for the future, because it could get no adequate return, but because water is a health and a safety necessity the municipality may take it over and may build for the future. The basis, the justification for the light, the water, is found in our present Constitution, because of the general welfare and the police power and the right and the duty of the State to look after the health and the safety of the public. Now, I cannot distinguish every case that may be brought up. There may be a public need for shoes, as there is, but the making of shoes may not be a public purpose. There may be a need for cheaper meat, but the killing of cattle may not be a public purpose. That distinction always can be drawn now, and the public purpose grows as our need for it grows and as we all come to believe it to exist. Here there is no distinction based on that ground. Anything that possibly can be imagined to be done becomes, under this regulation, a public purpose, irrespective of its immediate connection with public needs.

Mr. WILLETT: I want to ask further, if there is no difference, and I cannot conceive that there is any difference between the distribution of water and the distribution, we will say, of ice or of electricity or gas or any of these public necessities, how are we to meet these changing conditions to which the gentleman refers unless we give the Legislature full authority and power and leave it for them to deal with the need as the need arises? Is it possible for us to deal with matters in any better way than to give great freedom to the Legislature and leave it for them to determine, in the interest of the people of the Commonwealth as a whole, when the time has come for different action?

Mr. DRESSER: Precisely my point. We do leave the Legislature as free as it is possible to leave it. Every single bit of legislation that has been enacted has been enacted as the State, as the people, recognized new uses, new demands and new needs. That will be for the future to determine. We cannot tell now what will happen a year from now or twenty years from now in our public sentiment.

Mr. Willett: May I ask the gentleman from Worcester, then, what his objection is, if he has any, to this present measure before this Constitutional Convention?

Mr. Dresser: May I restate my objection? There is no objection that I can conceive of to giving, if it is necessary,—I do not think it is, but if it is necessary,—to giving to the Legislature the power to meet the public need as to these matters of absolute necessity. There is every objection, and I think most of us agree to that, to giving to the Legislature a power to deal in matters, necessities, fuel, food, coal, anything where the reason for doing it is not protection of the public but a desire to lower the price. I want to make that point clear, if I can. It is not the public business, as a governmental concern, to see whether boots are sold at one price or another, or hay is sold at one price or another, or coal at one price or another, until the fixing of the price violates some commercial law or some monopoly law or something of that sort; it is not a public business to get everything we need as cheaply as possible; it is private business to do that. It is the public business to see that we have the necessities; at a price, or at no price.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester if he does not consider the prevention of private extortion a proper public purpose under any and all conditions.

Mr. Dresser: I do. It is so considered by every Legislature that has acted upon it. There is no constitutional requirement necessary.

Mr. Creamer: I think that the contention of those of us who are in favor of the Anderson resolution is that the Legislature has not the proper power to prevent that private extortion under present circumstances.

Mr. Dresser: With that contention I do not agree.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Is it not, then, your fear that the Legislature may at some time become more radical than it seems to be at present?

Mr. Dresser: I have no fear either of the Legislature or the people on this question. It is purely the basic question of what sort of a government you want. I do not care whether the Legislature shall act or shall not act under this or under the other resolutions that are based on the same principle. It is a question whether we shall change our theory,—because these things all fit in to a change in theory. Shall we lose the distinction now, in this year of 1917, between what really is a governmental purpose and what anybody at any time may think it is desirable for the State to undertake?

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I should like to ask the member from Worcester if this resolution gives any authority to the Legislature to grant subsidies or pay bounties to increase the necessities of life. Now, I am more anxious about the quantity of the necessity than I am about getting the necessity to the people.

Mr. Dresser: I do not understand that there would be any power under this resolution to do what the gentleman suggests. There would be power under another resolution, reported by this same committee, on resources. I have not examined it enough with that in mind to have a very definite opinion, but it is referred to by the chairman of the committee as a supplemental resolution to this, and perhaps there is the power there. So that if they both were passed there would be the possibility of the State, if it were desirable, going into the farming business and raising milk and distributing it. Now, the doubt as to the two aspects of this resolution, Mr. President, may be removed, it seems, very simply. I wish that it were possible, — I am not familiar with what procedure might be necessary, but I wish it were possible, — for the chairman of this committee to bring in a resolution, based on the various suggestions of the members that have been made, which shall remove any doubt there may be as to the power to deal in any times of public emergency with these necessities of life, so that we might have before us the possibility of determining now, as we shall have to determine on the succeeding resolution, whether or not we shall change the theories of our government.

Mr. LEONARD of Boston: I have listened with some attention to the remarks of the last speaker, especially what he has said relative to the court passing upon the matter of public uses and public purposes. It occurs to me that if we were to adopt the amendments offered by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) there is another question that we might call the court to pass upon from time to time. Upon a matter of what are public purposes, the court has passed upon many times and upon a variety of issues. It has declared that the allowing of the city of Boston to sell bonds for the purpose of loaning money to rebuild after the great fire was not a public purpose, yet, on the other hand, the allowing of the balance of that year's salary to the widow of a deceased judge has been declared to be a public purpose, because the court said that the Legislature by doing that might aid in the procuring of valuable service to the State from citizens who might serve in the capacity of judges. Well, now, it seems to me that if we are going to pass any amendment to the Constitution here at all there is danger of having a too restrictive amendment. The gentleman has moved an amendment when and so far as a public exigency exists. Now, who is going to determine what is an exigency? In the first place, of course the Legislature will determine that question. In a certain combination of circumstances legislation is asked for, and the Legislature says that that is an exigency and therefore this legislation is justified; but supposing that the legislation enacted is contested, and supposing there are litigants who say that there is no exigency, is it not reasonable to say, gentlemen, that at times we shall have at least what we might call mixed questions of law and fact that will go to the Supreme Judicial Court, and that the Supreme Judicial Court will be obliged to determine whether or not at the time that this particular act was enacted by the Legislature, there was or was not an exigency? Now, I submit that if that is so, — if that is so, — however well qualified the Supreme Judicial Court is to pass upon matters of law, that there is no rule of the common law and there is no statute law whereby our courts can tell us whether or not exigencies in certain cases exist, because by the very form and interpretation of our Constitution our judges are given an independent salary and a secure tenure of office, and they do not feel that economic strain that must come from time to time to the people, and, moreover, men who could pass upon such a question as an exigency are men who must be specialists and qualified by particular economic study upon that question. Now, I submit that however well qualified our courts are to pass upon questions of law the courts are not formed or constituted or capable of passing upon the question of an exigency, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) includes that, and means that, that question sometimes will come to the courts; so I say it is very important of consideration from that point of view before we adopt it.

It seems to be the opinion of some that if we should adopt a resolution like this, immediately the State is committed to a wide policy of going into every kind of business or commercial enterprise. That does not appear to me to be the fact at all. We simply are submitting a permissive amendment to the Constitution, and there are many countries and States where there is no Constitution at all and no restriction upon the legislative power, where the States or countries have not gone to any such extent into business as has been suggested.

There is one other thing I should like to call to the attention of the delegates which seems to me to be a governing principle that we might consider in a matter of this kind, and that is the general rule that has been followed in the interpretation of our constitutional law. I refer particularly to the Federal Constitution, where it has been held that wherever a power has been granted to the Federal government that power can be exercised in every particular, and I think here, when we are framing an amendment, that if we are going to adopt an amendment it should not be a restrictive one, but it should be one that shall give to the Legislature all the power that will be ample authority to meet any given case. And in that connection I just want to quote very briefly from an elementary work, namely, Mr. Bryce in his "American Commonwealth" (Part 1, chapter 33), when he refers to Chief Justice Marshall in the early decisions on the Constitution. He says:

The people . . . when they confer a power, must be deemed to confer a wide discretion as to the means whereby it is to be used in their service. For their main object is that it should be used vigorously and wisely, which it cannot be if the choice of methods is narrowly restricted; and while the people may well be chary in delegating powers to their agents, they must be presumed, when they do grant these powers, to grant them with confidence in the agents’ judgment, allowing all that freedom in using one means or another to attain the desired end which is needed to ensure success.

I submit that in handling this question here a small amendment, which is very limited in the number of lines and sentences, but yet which probably would be a matter of very wide construction and wide interpretation, will be very important in future decisions. It seems to me that the best thing for us to do, and the wisest thing, is not to be frightened by what may happen, but to delegate this power freely and fully.

It seems to me that the two amendments that are offered by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) and the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Richardson) are suggestive of an incident that I once heard of a gentleman who had been to a horse fair and had completed a horse transaction, and he described it in somewhat these terms. He says to his friend: "I was at the fair, and as I was coming back I met another man, and he says to me, 'Were you at the fair at Gros?"
'I was', says I. 'Did you trade?' says he. 'I did not', says I. And so with that we traded, and he took my horse, that is, the other horse, and I took his horse, that is, this horse. When we were going he says, says he, 'There never was a man from Gros', says he, 'but could stick his finger in the eye of a man from Kilnagros', says he, 'and that horse you have', says he, 'is blind in one of his eyes', says he. 'Hello!' says I. 'Hello!', says he. 'There never was a man from Kilnagros', says I, 'but could stick his finger in the two eyes of a man from Gros', says I, 'and that horse you have is blind in both his eyes', says I.' Now, gentlemen, it seems to me that the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchester puts one eye out of a fairly decent nag that the committee have offered us, and the other amendment, which still further limits the operation of the measure and strikes out the dealing in the various necessities of life, puts out the other eye and really gives the people a blind horse, and I do not think that the Convention want to submit that sort of an amendment if they are going to submit anything to the people to be voted upon at the election either this year or next. [Applause.]

Consideration of the resolution was resumed Tuesday, October 2.

Mr. Martin M. Lomasney of Boston offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: This is a very important question, and it seems to me that before we go too far in these extraordinary times we should pause. Any man who knows anything about existing conditions will admit that real estate pays more than its just share of taxes. Real estate is visible; it cannot escape taxation. It may be valued more than it is worth, it may be valued less than it is worth, but it pays taxes. It is easy enough for some people who have bonds and stocks, and also that class of people who invest their money in life insurance that is to be paid when they die,—it is easy for those people to talk about shifting the burden upon some one else; but the taxation of personal property is almost a farce. We do not get one-third of it. Now, that is my opinion. Down-town property in the heart of this city is not paying more than two and one-half or three per cent. Many of the big office buildings are let on leases; in many cases those leases were made when times were normal. Times are not normal now; we have a war on; all kinds of taxes have got to be raised. How is it going to be raised? Most of it from real estate.

The district I, in part, represent pays pretty nearly one-half of the taxes of the entire city of Boston. The richest class of people own property there, and the poorest class of people own property there. Down here on the slope of the hill you will find poor men and women who work from sunrise until dark, and far into the night; they put their little savings into an equity in a piece of real estate, so that they may have something to hand down to their children. You will find that all over the Commonwealth,—men and women working and saving nearly all the time, night and day, so as to buy a little home, that they may leave something to their families.

Now, I suggest, Mr. President, before we go too far, we should recognize that these people have vested rights which should be protected. I desire to stop no person from getting proper relief at the proper time, but I believe that the present proposition before the Convention goes too far; particularly in these times. No one can tell where we are going to stand if this war taxation keeps up. I say, sir, real estate can stand so much, and no more. Consequently, Mr. President, I offer this amendment because it deals with this matter in the proper way. It seems to me that the other resolution goes too much into details.

The Convention, it seems to me, has got away from the fact that we are a Constitutional Convention. We are declaring principles of government, we are not declaring for details of government. It seems to me that is wrong. If we keep on in this way, instead of having a short, concise Constitution, we shall have one as large as our Blue Book. We are going too much into details. The propositions submitted to the Convention by the gentleman from Boston and the gentleman from Brookline, it seems to me, are open to these objections.

I suggest the amendment I offer, because it declares what shall be the principle of the State, and leaves to the Legislature the duty of working out the details. No. 358, it seems to me, is socialistic; it goes too far; it is too sweeping. See the words it uses. It allows the taking of markets, docks, fuel, and coal-yards, cold storage plants, elevators, warehouses, slaughter-houses, tanneries, etc. Why cannot we leave all that to the Legislature? Where are you going to be if you try to put through a constitutional amendment like that? You will have every business interest in the State aroused. You will have the cry raised that it means increased taxation. Why not realize this at the start, and declare for a short, concise article of amendment, so plain that no one can misunderstand it, and so broad that the Legislature can act in times of emergency? What do I mean by "emergency"? Flood, fire, famine,—a thousand other things; or if the milk Trust, or the ice Trust, or the coal Trust, or any other Trust is trying to crowd and rob the people, we then will have a law passed by the Legislature that will stop them. It seems to me, sir, that in these times to pass an amendment like the one submitted will expose to the objection that the times are not normal; that the cost will be prohibitive; and it will result in a great deal of injustice if it is passed and ratified by the voters.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: Does the gentleman include in "emergencies" times of strikes?

Mr. Lomasney: Yes, sir. I provide for shelter. What does that mean? In case the mill owners put their employees on the street, put them out of their houses, I want authority to feed them, clothe and house them, if necessary, so as to protect them in times of emergency or distress. And what is more of an emergency than distress in times of labor strikes? Why commit the State to paternalism and to socialism at the start? Why not try my proposition? Why not try it and see what it will do? Why argue because this or that thing has happened somewhere else that it applies here? It does not apply here. We try to take care of our people here. We can trust our Legislature to take care of our people if we will declare for a sound, comprehensive article of amendment that will permit it and not for a socialistic statute law. Because, Mr. President, if we mention in this Constitution all these things, the very thing that might save us might be prohibited because we have not specifically mentioned it.
I trust, sir, that the amendment I have the honor of presenting will be adopted.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: I should like once more to make clear the issue which is presented by my amendment, and to explain in effect what I take it the debate has developed.

I think the last speaker has shown very clearly that we ought to confine this resolution to times of emergency,—the operation of it to times of emergency and distress; we ought not to go further in declaring in the Constitution the policy of this Commonwealth.

The other day we had amendments which, like his, accomplished not only that purpose but restricted the proposition in many other ways, and they were defeated. I doubt if they would be defeated again to-day. But I ask this: I ask that we take, in the first place, a test vote on this one question of confining this resolution to the emergency proposition. That is all that my amendment carries out, absolutely all that it tackles,—confining the proposed resolution to times of emergency, times of public exigency. No other change is made or intended by that resolution.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: Permit me to inquire of the gentleman from Winchester whether he would be content with the language which is suggested to me by the delegate from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), reading "whenever the public exigencies require," which I am told by the learned delegate from Fall River is language which has been construed and apparently covers exactly what some of my friends seem to me to have needlessly in mind. But I am not disposed to haggle about it.

Mr. John W. Cummings of Fall River moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Dutch of Winchester be amended by striking out the words proposed to be inserted at the beginning of the article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the words "Whenever the public exigencies require".

Mr. Cummings: I have adopted the phrase that is used in Article X of the Declaration of Rights; and that phrase has been construed, and the scope of the authority, legislative or judicial, has been passed upon. I am going to ask the attention of the Convention a moment while I read the last clause of Article X of the Declaration of Rights: "And whenever the public exigencies require"—which is the language in my amendment—"that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor."

It is obvious that there are two significant phrases in that sentence. One is "whenever the public exigencies require"; the other is "property should be appropriated to public uses." Our Supreme Judicial Court has held, in at least four cases, that the question of what is a public use is a judicial question, but the question of what is a public exigency is a legislative question. Therefore if the amendment of the gentleman from Winchester is adopted, or my amendment, which is the same thing, using the words of the tenth article, is adopted, it will be for the Legislature to decide whether a condition of things exists which creates a public exigency. Now, as to public use. The use here is expressly stated in the amendment, in the resolution; and no other use can be made of the property commandeered than the use which is expressly stated. So that the fears of delegates that if this limitation is imposed which was suggested by the gentleman from Winchester,—that the power of the Legislature will be strictly limited,—are groundless. The power of the Legislature will be exactly the same as if these words were not there. They are not in the nature of legal limitations; they are not constitutional limitations. They are in the nature of moral restraints. They declare a policy which the Legislature is expected to follow, but the Legislature decides the question for itself.

If someone says therefore if this amendment is adopted the Legislature will be restricted to public exigencies as you or I may understand them, I take leave to say that that is a mistaken view. The Legislature decides whether by reason of a strike, a flood, a famine, war, or any other cause, a monopoly, an exigency exists, and that decision is final.

But it undoubtedly is true that the moral restraint should be put in this amendment, unless we want to turn this State over into a trading corporation,—and I, for one, do not want to do it.

Further, there is reason for this. The only justification that the State has for taking private property is that a public exigency exists and it is to be taken for public uses. It should not be taken unless a public exigency does exist.

Now, it was said by the gentleman from Worcester last Friday,—and I think stated accurately,—that this is something more than an economic proposition; it is a fundamental change in the policy of this Commonwealth, which will permit,—unless this amendment that we offer is adopted,—which will permit the taking of private property whenever the Legislature sees fit, whether an exigency exists or not. That is wrong. The justification for taking your property is a public exigency. That should be expressed. That is the counsel, that is the advice, that is the moral restraint that the people of this Commonwealth want to impose upon their Legislature.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Brookline: In the hope I may abbreviate somewhat the discussion, and not merely abbreviate, but get the judgment of the members on points on which there are real differences, I beg to state that we have had a meeting of a part of our committee this morning but I am not able to make a new committee report. The most I can say is that I have been in consultation with several members. I think, however, I state it accurately if I state that the weight of the opinion, as far as I have been able to get it, is that the committee would be content to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), which in our view I think signifies the same as the first amendment of the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch); so that you would begin by reading: "Whenever the public exigencies require, provision may be made by law to authorize". Then we would accept the substance of the amendment of the gentleman from Boston,—and there being so many of them I will name him, Mr. Quincy,—slightly changed. Insert after the word "the", at the end of line 1, the words "Commonwealth to contract for or to take by purchase or otherwise"; then strike out the words "by the Commonwealth of". It then would read "food-stuffs, feeds, fuel, ice and other necessaries of life, paying reasonable compensation therefor”. Strike out the words “the sale of”, and insert the words “to sell the same to the inhabitants thereof and to any county, city, town or other municipal corporation therein”; adding after that, in order that there may be no doubt that in times of emergency the Commonwealth may use its political divisions as distribution means: “for resale to the inhabitants thereof”; adding also, in deference to the amendment of Mr. Quincy, the words “also to provide temporary shelter”. That would bring you down then to line 8, at the end of “therein.” Then go on: “the Governor, with the approval of the Council”; strike out after “if he deems that a public exigency exists,” — and, in deference to the fears that some gentlemen have as to what wrongdoing the Governor and Council might be guilty of, insert the words “if the Legislature is not in session,” — then the Governor and Council “may, unless otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted.”

Let all that I have now stated be section 1. Then, in deference again to a suggestion which came to me from the gentleman from Beverly, we would make the rest of the provision section 2; indicating that section 1 was an emergency power, and that section 2 is a permanent addition to the “business functions,” if you choose to use that phrase, of the Commonwealth and of the subdivisions thereof.

Section 2 would begin with line 12; and the amendments which I personally suggest to that are that in line 14 you strike out after the word “harvest”, and insert after “manufacture” the words “and sell”; so that it shall read that the municipalities may be authorized to harvest, to manufacture and to sell ice”. I think that is a pure matter of form, perhaps necessary. Then, in line 18, add after the word “plants”, at the end, the words “preserving and storing”. The gentleman from Quincy, I think, wanted those words in. I am glad to have them in. At the end of line 23, in deference to the views of the gentleman from Norwood (Mr. Willett), we have accepted the provision for uniform accounting; but the word “article” should be struck out, and the word “section” substituted; for emergency power ought not to be hampered by elaborate provisions of law as to accounting. If the Legislature deals with an emergency, it must deal with it with such officials and such methods of accounting as it can provide for, and not with the elaborate methods which might be entirely proper for a permanent use of the power. Insert then “section” instead of “article.” Then add a semicolon, and say: “; and all offices and positions created in connection with any undertakings under this section shall be filled in accordance with the laws and regulations governing the classified civil service of the Commonwealth and its municipalities.”

We accept thus as applicable to section 2, the permanent power, the substance of the civil service provision contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Richardson).

Now I shall move that, again stating that I have not the whole committee with me—I was not able to get them together,—but as embodying, in, I think, convenient form, the most of the amendments which have been suggested.

Mr. George W. Anderson of Brookline offered a substitute for the new draft cited at the beginning of the chapter.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. MONTAGUE of Boston: I desire, Mr. President, to ask the gentleman from Brookline this question: Does not the second section as he proposes it do just exactly what the gentleman from Fall River says ought not to be done? That is, does it not authorize the permanent establishment, in times of peace and quiet, by the Commonwealth, of all kinds of businesses?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not think it is as broad as that. I was interrupted, and did not hear every word that the gentleman from Fall River said. I had conferred with him previously, and thought I had the substance of his idea and was in general accord. But I did not understand that the gentleman from Fall River took a position in opposition to the extension of municipal powers which the Legislature might grant under section 2 of the resolution as I now have it; that is, the latter part of the whole. I thought I was in accord with the gentleman from Fall River.

Mr. CUMMINGS: The gentleman from Brookline who has just taken his seat states my position accurately. The words "whenever a public exigency exists," or "whenever public exigencies exist", — which is the phrase taken from the tenth article of the Declaration of Rights, — were intended to qualify and limit the first part of the report, and not the whole of it; because the first part contains the provision to take by eminent domain. The first part cannot be justified, — the taking of private property by eminent domain cannot be justified, — unless public exigency exists. But the direct authority of the Legislature to empower a city or town to sell the necessaries of life, if you please, does not depend upon any public exigency; it is wholly a matter of discretion.

Let me say, Mr. President, that I am not so much opposed to the suggestion of the gentleman from Boston as my limiting the application of that phrase to the first section would appear; because, again, if it is put into the second section, — as I understand now it is to be split into two sections, — it still would be discretionary with the Legislature to do the thing, simply acting under the moral restraint or advice of the people.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: May I ask the gentleman if that is not part of the Constitution now; or part of Article X, I mean? That is in the Constitution now, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINGS: Yes. The question that the gentleman has asked is answered by referring to Article X; it is the last clause in Article X. And that clause has been construed since, Taft v. Hudson, 16 Gray, to mean that the Legislature's decision is final. It belongs in that group of questions that are never judicial, they are political questions; the decision of the political tribunal is final. If we added it to the second section I do not think it would impair the usefulness of the second section, but it still would have the value that it has in the first, — that is, merely moral restraint. But it is needed in the first, because we commandeer or take somebody else's property.

Mr. LOMASNEY: The amendment that I have the honor to submit, may I state, — I will read the whole amendment:

The maintenance, at reasonable rates, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress, is a public function and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein, whenever the public exigencies require, to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

If we pass this amendment, has not the Legislature with the present Constitution, with that amendment, the right to take food and those other necessaries of life, — milk, and ice, and those things, — if this amendment goes through as I have suggested it?

Mr. CUMMINGS: I am not sure that I fully comprehend the scope of the question asked by the gentleman from Boston; but I am sure it is my fault if I do not.

Mr. LOMASNEY: I beg to repeat it, Mr. President. I shall try to be brief. I have not had a chance to have printed the amendment offered by me this morning, — wherein I state it is a public function — and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein, whenever the public exigencies require, to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants. . . .

If that amendment passes, with the present Constitution are we not in position to do the very thing he says we should do?

Mr. CUMMINGS: May I trespass a moment on the patience of the Convention to look at the amendment and examine it? (After a pause.) Mr. President, I am not prepared to deny that the words in the concluding clause of Article X of the Bill of Rights do not cover the amendment of the gentleman from Boston; but I should like a moment's reflection. And I think, if I may say it in deference to the better judgment of the delegates of this Convention, this measure is of so much importance that all of us require a moment's reflection before it is passed to be submitted to the people. It is not as simple as it appears. It involves so many things that are foreign to what we have been doing that we ought to go with great care toward the adoption of them.

One thing in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston that bothers me more than anything else, — I will withdraw that, — that bothers me, is the provision to authorize cities and towns to take by eminent domain. The report of the committee limited the authority to commandeer, requisition, to act under the power of eminent domain and take property, — to the Commonwealth. I do not think it is advisable, — speaking now without much preparation, — I doubt if it is advisable to give that power to cities and towns so that they may take by eminent domain; although I recognize the fact that under this same provision of the Constitution cities and towns have been given by the Legislature authority to take for public purposes.

Mr. LOMASNEY: Does not the Legislature under this amendment have to pass on the matter? Does not that give everyone an opportunity to come forward to state his reason for, or to object, — giving everyone a chance to be heard? Does not the amendment offered by me do that?

Mr. CUMMINGS: The statement is so that the Legislature will have the power, and will give to the people every opportunity to be heard. But one of the principles that was urged here the other day as of economic value was the power of collective buying, or the power of taking by the one without having too many in competition. If the Commonwealth alone can take, the competition is not quite so keen as if 317 towns and 37 cities could take. And I could not see, if they are given the right to buy and sell necessaries of life, why they should have this very extraordinary power to take private property.
Mr. Lomasney: It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by me safeguards every man. It says here, clearly "in case of war, emergency, or distress". Now, what does that mean? Some emergency! Take the Chelsea Fire; take the Salem Fire; take an instance where a dam may break, with water coming into the community,—would not the gentleman allow cities and towns then to move and to provide shelter, food, clothing, medicine,—all such matters? Of course he would. That is what I am trying to accomplish, Mr. President.

Mr. Cummings: Under the resolution as amended, the thing which the gentleman from Boston asks could be done. The reason why it is better, in my humble judgment, to adopt the phrase "whenever public exigencies require" than the particular things,—war, famine, flood, or fire,—is because that phrase has been construed; we know what it means, there can be no dispute about it. The authority is in the Legislature, if we adopt the report of the committee as amended, to do all the things that the gentleman from Boston asks, excepting giving the town or the city the power to take. The Commonwealth must reserve that power to itself.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: We have had a good many changes offered since the debate started this morning. We have had a most interesting suggestion from the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), which I believe needs most careful study. We have had ten or twelve changes of varying importance from the chairman of the committee which reported this matter. We have had an amendment made by the gentleman from Fall River, which I am inclined to accept. I now desire to ask him one question, which I should like to have him consider, and perhaps answer now. In the tenth amendment it says: "and whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive reasonable compensation therefor". Now, what do those words include? I take it that those words include the public taking of land for a highway, for a park or a playground, or other public use. Now, if that is the interpretation of these words "public exigencies", if that is their scope, then I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) that we have got to use other words. I am inclined to think that perhaps the words which I adopted from the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), and the gentleman from Boston who sits next to me (Mr. Curtis), are not happy words.

Now, it seems to me that we have indicated clearly this morning that we have got to have more time; that we have got to consider these matters when we can have them before us in writing. And it seems to me that on a matter of this importance we ought to lay them over for one day, until we can have all these matters in writing. We have something come in here this morning which is a supposed suggestion of the committee, which since has been changed. There may be other matters that may come to light.

I therefore move that the matter lie over until to-morrow, so that these amendments may be printed.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: It seems to me that this debate is very illuminating. I think this matter probably will have to go back to the committee; but at the present time I think the members, including myself, are learning something about the various phases of it. I hope we shall keep the main issue in mind; and the real issue is this: Do we mean to limit this activity to an emergency, or do we mean to throw it open to any time when the Legislature thinks proper? If we mean to limit it to an emergency, the amendment of the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) does so limit it.

But I hope that no member here will vote for the phrase "public exigency" under the impression that "public exigency" means "emergency." Because it does not, Mr. President. "Public exigency" has been construed a great many times, and it means any condition of things under which the Legislature thinks proper to do a certain act. The Legislature may take land by eminent domain whenever it chooses or thinks it proper for the State, irrespective of whether or not an emergency exists. The committee in accepting the words "public exigency" in my opinion do not limit the scope of their amendment at all. They leave it just exactly where it was before they accepted those words, because of course it goes without saying that the Legislature will not act except when there is some public exigency,—at least as much exigency as is required to take land for a road out in the western part of the State.

"Exigency,"—although in common parlance it does have some idea of compulsion and unusual condition of things,—"exigency" in this connection does not mean "emergency"; and the committee's resolution if amended by putting in the words "public exigency" will not limit the operation of their amendment to an emergency. The amendment of the gentleman from Boston would so limit it; but not the amendment of the committee.

I hope the main question will be distinctly understood here, so that when we come to vote we shall not vote for the word "exigency" under any impression that it enables the Legislature to act only in "emergency." We do know what the word "exigency" means, as it is used by the gentleman from Fall River.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: I have no objection to postponement, if the committee which has charge of this affair will consider all these amendments and suggestions and have their report printed so that we shall have it at to-morrow's session to be acted upon.

I have a request to make to the delegates in this Convention. It is October second, and the people whom I have associated with all my life are much interested in this subject; we are looking to the delegates in this Convention to take some action which shall be referred to the people at the coming election. We are not here to stop the success of any invested money in this Commonwealth, or compete with it. We are here to bring about something in the interests of the people. We had an experience a few years ago during a great miners' strike, and I believe it was stated by the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth, by a vote of four to three, that it was unconstitutional for the cities and towns in this Commonwealth to start the coal business and sell to the people at cost prices.

Mr. Dutch: I think perhaps I can meet what the gentleman has in mind. It has been suggested to me that the Secretary can have these amendments printed and ready at two o'clock, and I have been asked therefore to change my motion that this matter be specially assigned to two o'clock, at which time we shall have these amendments in print and that will save time.

Objection was made to a change in the assignment of the subject-matter.

Mr. ANDERSON of Brookline: The suggestion has been made to me by my friend from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) that if we could have it printed and have it before us this afternoon, so that members genuinely interested in the difficulties here could have the afternoon to consider it, meanwhile the Convention itself taking up something else for debate, we really would save time, and then take it up to-morrow morning. I accept that suggestion. My own desire would have been to get at it this afternoon; but in view of the obviously reasonable quality of the suggestion, and its origin, I hope that that disposition may be made.

While I have the floor let me make one other suggestion that I hope may clarify. I am not going to make a speech. Do not be frightened. Now that we have divided this into two sections, one an emergency power and the other a continuous power, let me direct the attention of the members who are more conservative to the fact that in not a single amendment have the words to which they really object been stricken out, for they are found in lines 13 and 14, in the words "to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life." If I were a conservative, and as much afraid of the Legislature as some of you are, and wanted to limit increased government functions to the extension of our distribution system, — and anybody who knows anything about our economic condition knows that we are in a serious economic condition because of the utter breakdown of our distribution system, — I would move to strike out the words "to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life", leaving the Commonwealth in its discretion to authorize municipalities to go into the ice business, — which they ought to be allowed to go into, — to have canneries and elevators, milk distribution stations, and those things in which manufacturing and production are only minor, negligible incidents, but the providing of which is absolutely essential unless you are going to see all food producing wiped out in this Commonwealth. Now, I say that in order that the members who do not hold our view may see the exact point upon which I think we really differ.

I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) to postpone and assign first to-morrow will prevail, and I shall ask that the Secretary, if he can, have the amendments printed and before all the members at two o'clock this afternoon. I hope that that will meet the approval of the Convention.

Amendments were moved by Messrs. Kneil of Westfield, Clapp of Lexington, Balch of Boston, Loring of Beverly, Coolidge of Milton, Lowe of Fitchburg, Montague of Boston and Luce of Waltham, — all of which are cited at the beginning of the chapter.

The consideration of the resolution was then postponed until Wednesday, October 3, being specially assigned for 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. ANDERSON of Brookline: Yesterday at half-past one we had a meeting of the committee in the hope that we might lessen somewhat the labors of the Convention. We considered at that meeting all the amendments suggested, including the substitute resolution which is printed at the bottom of page 3 and the top of page 4 under my name. Mr. Clapp of Lexington brought in another amendment, which is printed in the middle of page 4. After consideration of all the suggestions made in debate and by amendments proposed, it was the unanimous vote of the committee, ten members being present, that, in deference to the views expressed here, as well as in general accord with our own judgment, we should report the so-called Clapp substitute on page 4,—as being the most accurate embodiment of the views of the members of the Convention who have given expression to views, matured and obviously highly patriotic and thoughtful. I hope,—I have some reason to believe,—that all or substantially all the other propositions and amendments will be withdrawn, and that that proposition will command nearly, if not quite, unanimous assent in the Convention.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman who gave him assurance that my amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. ANDERSON: No one. I stated that I had hopes and assurances that all or substantially all the amendments might be withdrawn. I stated that, knowing how dangerous that kind of prophecy is, and having learned by experience of the danger of indulging in any kind of prophecy. But I did have assurance that some of the other gentlemen, who thought that the other propositions were too broad or otherwise undesirable, were content to take Mr. Clapp's draft, and that therefore we might shorten the discussion and get,—where I suppose we all want to get,—to an immediate vote on something which will command the general support of the Convention. I move that the vote be taken on the Clapp amendment, on page 4, as the first vote.

Mr. HORGAN of Boston: I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what the limitation and definition, as he understands it, under court construction, of the words "public exigency" is.

Mr. ANDERSON: I adopt as being accurate, and from a good authority, the explanation made by the delegate from Fall River the other day. "Public exigencies" do not, in my opinion, limit the discretionary power of the Legislature. It is admonitory. It is a statement to the effect that this power is not to be exercised for trifling needs. The learned delegate from Fall River (Mr. Cummings),—perhaps the delegate who asked the question was not present at the time,—directed the Convention's attention to the tenth article of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution, in which similar language is used, which has been judicially construed in Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417. If the gentleman who asked the question will look at that article and that decision and also will look at page 107 of the Manual of the Constitutional Convention, he will find the words "public exigencies" in quotation marks, and this statement: "The Legislature are the sole and exclusive judges whether the exigency exists which calls upon them to exercise their authority to take private property."

Mr. HORGAN: I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the Supreme Judicial Court has not stated, in at least one opinion, that ultimately the question of the limitation of the political authority of the Legislature must be declared, determined, by the judicial authority of the State, and if, in the case of Talbot v. Hudson, Chief Justice Bigelow did not give expression to the same opinion.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have no doubt that in that opinion, which I have not read for some time,—certainly in hundreds of opinions,—is the statement that the question as to whether a proposed or enacted statute was constitutional is a judicial question. But I do not understand that the gentleman’s question on analysis comes to anything more than the question as to whether the judiciary has not always in Massachusetts claimed that the extent of legislative power was a judicial question. To that question I answer Yes. But there can be no doubt that public exigencies have been construed as indicated in the cases cited on page 107 of the Manual.

Mr. McLAUD of Greenfield: I believe that in Talbot v. Hudson, as the gentleman from Fall River said yesterday, the court stated that there were two questions to be decided: One whether or not the facts in that case brought the case within the statute relative to public purposes, and they decided that that was a judicial question; but, once the question of purposes was decided, then the question of public discretion or necessity was exclusively within the power of the Legislature and was not a judicial question. Last Saturday I ran these cases down, from Talbot v. Hudson, and it was last cited as late as Boston v. Talbot in 206 Mass., page 82; and on page 90 is a collection of cases which the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court cites as authority for that very question, that as a matter of discretion or necessity the Legislature is the sole judge. Furthermore, in case any “doubting Thomas,” if I may use that term, thinks that the matter might be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, that it might be in conflict with the Federal Constitution, I will state that on page 90 of Volume 206 the Massachusetts court cites two Federal cases, namely, Shoemaker v. United States, in 147 U. S., and United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway, in 160 U. S. In both cases the United States Supreme Court held that the question of discretion was solely a question for the Legislature, was not a judicial question, and was not reviewable by the courts.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: I desire to call your attention to the fact that the amendment offered by me, and printed under my name in the calendar, contains the following words: “whenever the public exigencies require.” That is a mistake. I did not put those words in the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I would move, — I hope the Convention will pardon me for being so urgent, but we have to move in a parliamentary way, — I would move that the amendment offered under my name, on page 3 of the calendar, be voted for first, as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Brookline.

Mr. GEORGE of Haverhill: Since this question has come before the Convention the learned chairman from Brookline has brought in at least six or seven new measures, and the more the lawyers discuss it the less we know and the less they know. Now, I hope this Convention, bearing in mind that we have 150 attorneys here, who are somewhat divided upon all these questions, especially when we come to the socialistic doctrine that was derided here a few days ago, and which seems to have been withdrawn in the last few days, — I hope this Convention will adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). This is the only emergency proposition that has been brought in here. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) I think would be a very cumbersome proposition. It says that whenever public exigencies require, the Legislature may authorize the Commonwealth to provide shelter and do certain other things.

Now, in the first place, we have got to have the exigency. We have got to wait till something turns up, and then the Legislature is going to authorize the Commonwealth to do something. I believe that the people want a resolution here that will allow the Legislature to provide for these things. It seems to me that when we state here that "The maintenance, at reasonable rates, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress, is a public function, and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine,"—it seems to me that that goes as far as we ought to go. I am rather doubtful about authorizing towns and cities to go into business along the lines that were suggested first by the gentleman from Brookline. He said yesterday that he could trust the Legislature, but he does not meet the real objection. We have got to trust municipal government, and municipal government in Massachusetts is just as near a failure as it ever was in any Commonwealth in the United States. It cannot perform the duties that it performs now without robbing the public, and we do not want it to have any more to do with going into business except the kind of business that is limited to such an extent that it would protect the taxpayer. When I say "taxpayer" I do not mean the man who owns property; I mean the man who pays rent. The man who pay rent are the real taxpayers. It used to be the rule that one month's rent should be equal to one week's pay; in other words, only one-quarter of a man's earnings should pay for rent. But taxes have increased, valuations have increased, and the result to-day is that he is paying from one-third to one-half.

Now, we do not want to do anything here that will allow the city government to branch out into various kinds of business. It seems to me that we should adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). That would be regarded as an emergency measure. It could go onto the ballot this fall and be accepted by the people, and then the cities and towns of the Commonwealth could get after these Shylockers who take advantage of the public in times of distress.

Mr. Lomasney: I offer this amendment for the purpose of meeting the present situation. We must realize that every interest in the Commonwealth has to be protected. The laboring man is the backbone of the Commonwealth. Capital and labor should pull together. We want no constitutional amendment that would put class against class; we want something that is fair and square. It seems to me the trouble with some of the other gentlemen here is that they have not had experience in law-making. They may be good lawyers in construing statutes but not in preparing them. That is an entirely different proposition. Any man who has had legislative experience knows that many of the best lawyers cannot draw up a statute. It requires experts to draw statutes, and they do it, and receive, and are entitled to receive, a large amount of money for doing that line of special legal work. When you see a lawyer like the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) presenting a constitutional amendment like the one he has submitted here, we must defeat it or we shall have a Constitution that will fill pages and volumes with immaterial matters and details that should be left to the Legislature.

What does the amendment do that I have the honor to present? It reads as follows:

The maintenance, at reasonable rates, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress, is a public function, and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine.

The Chair will note that I have had those words that were put in there unintentionally, taken out.

Now, Mr. President, the labor people will be satisfied with this amendment. The laborers of this Commonwealth are more interested than the capitalists. Why? Because they want their rights protected. They cannot leave the State; they are located here. They are satisfied with this amendment. I venture the assertion that most of them will vote for it. Why? Because it provides that the Legislature shall be the one that finally shall pass on all the details.

All the talk by these lawyers, reading these different articles now in the Constitution,—that are as old as the book,—is only confusing us. If we act under this amendment, or if the Legislature acts, it must proceed under the provisions of Article X of the Constitution. We do not repeal that article. What does that say?

Whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor.

This amendment cannot take away property rights. Then look at Article XV, and you will find that it says:

In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, etc.,—

You have a jury trial and all your rights are protected. Why bring these articles and words in here to befog the issue? Pass this amendment; it will be ratified by the people. Why? Because they will not be alarmed at the cost of taking warehouses, canneries, beaneries, docks and all these other matters that you are now trying to put into our Constitution. Everybody in business will ask: "What does this mean?" Why, they will be aroused and say: "My business is liable to go to pieces." The amendment favored by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) permits the worst kind of paternalism. Who can compete against the State? If we are going to adopt socialism, let it start in the National law. I submit that the amendment I have the honor to offer here is one that leaves it to the Legislature; and every fair-minded man, notwithstanding what the people have been saying here, will trust the Legislature in times of emergency, war or distress, to see that every citizen, no matter how humble, is protected.

Mr. President, our laws now provide for the giving of charity. There are thousands of men in this State, decent mechanics, poor people, who do not want charity. They will not ask it until they give up the last cent. This simply allows the Legislature to provide that in times like the present men can come forward and get, at a fair market rate, the necessaries of life. That is all. Instead of getting it for charity, they purchase at the fair market value; not some extreme price to the ice trust, the coal trust, the milk trust or some other trust. That seems to me to be the entire proposition, and that is the reason I move to have it voted on first, so that we may have a clean-cut issue between that and the committee's report.

In other words, I object to allowing the committee to come in and steer this matter, so they can vote first on the amendment they favor. I think this Convention should vote for the best proposition and should give every man a chance to have his say. Now, sir, I understand from what the gentleman says that his committee heard a great many people yesterday. I am finding no fault. They went into session without me. I wonder why I was not invited to their conference.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) is in error in thinking that the committee invited any one. It considered whether it would be possible, without encroaching upon the functions of the Convention, to ask members of the Convention to come before the committee, and no one was asked. To the best of my recollection, no member outside the committee itself appeared there.

Mr. Lomasney: Then, Mr. President, it seems to me the committee did not do its duty. [Laughter.] I should like to know how you ever expect to get anywhere, if you call in two or three men who think your way, and leave out the people who have some ideas and are not afraid of expressing them. What did the gentleman say the first thing this morning? That he was assured, practically assured, that, with the motion he was about to make, everything in the way of opposition would be swept away, if he would support Mr. Clapp's amendment. Did not the gentleman say that? Now, who assured him? I corrected him at the time. I said: "The gentleman certainly is not speaking for me."

Now, this is a very serious matter. We must realize, as I said yesterday, that property and labor should go hand in hand. Property has its rights; so has labor. The real estate of this city is visible. It cannot be carried away to safety deposit boxes. Its owners are not like men who put their money in big life insurance policies or stocks or bonds. Property in this city now pays only 2½ to 3 per cent. We have times of war here. We do not know how high taxes are going. We have leases made on some of our largest buildings. They were made in normal times, and now the owners find their taxes are increasing by leaps and bounds. Why should we commit the Commonwealth to a thousand and one of these schemes without realizing that we do not know just where we are? Why not proceed cautiously? I have talked longer than I intended, and I hope the motion I have the honor to offer will prevail.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: We are about to pass this proposal to another reading without any apparent further debate. I made the motion which I did, as I explained at that time, because I desired to present a clear-cut issue as to whether this proposition should be confined to an emergency proposition or whether it should remain as the committee proposed, a standing declaration in favor of State and municipal socialism and trading. Since that time the Convention has taken a sober second thought, with the result, most gratifying naturally to me, that the committee now come in with a proposal which is tied up to an emergency state of affairs, and the proposal of the gentleman from Boston who has just spoken (Mr. Lomasney) is also one for times of distress and emergency.

As I intimated yesterday, it seemed to me that the discussion had pointed out that there might be danger in accepting the phrase "public exigencies" as sufficiently confining this matter to an emergency. For that reason I am inclined to believe this morning that the best form in which this proposition has been put is the form of the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), and that I shall vote for that form. But as each of these propositions now entirely incorporates the purpose of my amendment, and if either one is passed, that simple purpose which is all I dared hope for at that time will be accomplished, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw all the amendments under my name in the calendar.

Mr. Kneil of Westfield: I have offered an amendment, printed in the Orders of the Day, providing for what in the law is called consequential damages, whereby, in case this provision becomes a constitutional law, if the State should set up a rival establishment, it should pay for the real absolute damage done to a man whose business was crushed out, but that it should be left to the Legislature in each case to say whether there was damage and to provide for it. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) which we have under discussion meets that proposition; it absolutely satisfies me in that respect; that is, it allows the Legislature to provide in any case for just damage, actual damage or real damage. I had other objections to the resolution as reported from the committee. They are all satisfied in my mind by the proposal introduced by the gentleman from Boston. It seems to me an inspiration, if the Convention will pardon the word,—a carefully drafted resolution, and a happy and swift surcease of all our troubles.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: I introduced an amendment, but in view of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Boston in the third division I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it. I think his is better drawn and a more effective measure than mine.

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I introduced an amendment yesterday, which I should like unanimous consent to have withdrawn.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: I should like to ask a question through the Chair, more especially with relation to a statement made by one of these well educated attorneys, as to whether the working people are more especially affiliated with organized labor. We are here representing no political party; we are here as delegates to this Convention and in the best interests of amending this Constitution, so that the judiciary in the future may make a decision like the Supreme Judicial Court made during the coal strike, when we wanted the city to buy coal and sell to the people. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, or the gentleman who signed that report (Mr. Clapp), whether his amendment, if adopted, would allow the taking of clothes, underwear and shoes, as I believe the amendment of the delegate from Boston allows that, whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman on my left (Mr. Clapp) does not. We are strongly in favor of the amendment offered by the delegate from Boston as a solution of the problem in the interest of the people.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: In response to the inquiry of the gentleman, I have to say that the other necessaries of life, like clothing, shoes, etc., are not included in the Clapp amendment; but I also, now that I am on my feet, desire to direct the attention of the Convention to the radical difference between the two propositions, that is, the committee's proposition and that of the delegate from Boston (Mr. Lomasney). Instead of taking the well interpreted language "whenever the public exigencies require," we have "during times of war, emergency or distress." Instead of having power, as provided in the Clapp amendment, to provide needed distribution facilities, for preserving, storing, collecting, converting, etc., the necessaries of life, food and fuel, we have in the so-called Lomasney amendment a broad, absolutely unlimited power in the Legislature, and in cities and towns, limited, however, to the times of war, emergency or distress. This Convention is about to vote, when it votes on that amendment, on a proposition of a constitutional grant to cities and towns to provide food and other common necessaries of life, shelter, and so on, in any such manner as the Legislature may provide in times of "emergency,"—whatever an emergency may be.

If you are going to pass that amendment simply because it is shorter but not narrower than the other, strike it out and take the amendment of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), which provides that "The General Court may determine what is a public use." Otherwise you have thwarted entirely the purpose of enlarging distribution facilities as the public exigencies require. You have given to the Commonwealth, and to the cities and towns, a power without limit, whenever there is war, emergency or distress, whatever "emergency" may mean, a power impossible of any accurate interpretation, unlimited under one interpretation, so narrow as to be quite useless under another possible interpretation. Now, if that is to be the result of two weeks of debate and of careful and conscientious work of the committee, from which we have endeavored to bring out a composite and a compromise judgment,—it offers very little incentive to that kind of effort by any other committee.

Mr. PARKER of Lancaster: The interesting and incisive debate upon the several amendments proposed to the original report of the committee has proceeded now so far that the expressions and opinions from various delegates to the Convention have disclosed what I think is now manifest,—that either the compromise report submitted by the committee and presented under the leadership of its able chairman, or the amendment proposed by the honorable delegate from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), will be accepted. I think, therefore, the question for the Convention to decide is which of these two alternatives shall be accepted; one or the other is inevitable.

A few brief words of further analysis as to the difference between these two measures may aid in the judgment of the Convention. Each of these two measures provides that these new powers to be conferred upon the Legislature, if this constitutional amendment is adopted, are to be exercised only in the event of a public exigency, and only when legislative discretion so decrees. Yet there is a difference between these two amendments which I think significant. The control by admonitory words,—for I think either provision can operate only as an admonition to the Legislature, they being entirely and exclusively the judges as to whether such an emergency exists as to warrant the exercise of the proposed power. Under the provisions embodied in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, I think, as the chairman of the committee has pointed out, there may be confusion with respect to the power of the Legislature that will not obtain if the committee's compromise report be adopted, because the committee report adopts the phrase "public exigency" heretofore appearing in our Constitution repeatedly, the subject of judicial adjudication, its definition and significance being already well and indisputably determined. The limiting phrase upon which legislative power is to depend as presented in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston is that the power shall be exercised during times of war. In my opinion a time of war should not be the only condition upon which these new powers may be exercised. War unhappily already is upon us. There are, however, other conditions, financial, social or industrial, those of transportation, or of trade control, now imminent or which may arise in the future, creating public distress wholly apart from the dreaded results of war; such conditions might be due to unlawful acts or to combinations or conspiracies, or to conditions due to mere force of circumstances without the intervention of unlawful acts. In such events the Legislature should be empowered to take necessaries of life by right of eminent domain and provide for their distribution, as the urgent necessities of the people might demand.

The phrase of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston is, "emergency or distress." It is to be noted that "emergency" is not further qualified by the addition of the term "public emergency"—only in case of a public emergency should the peremptory powers proposed be exercised. Further the amendment of the gentleman from Boston might be construed to apply to a purely local emergency, not of such commanding or portentous significance as to require consideration by the Legislature as a public emergency affecting all communities.

Mr. Lomasney: Does not this amendment allow the Legislature to pass upon that question?

Mr. Parker: Yes, sir.

Mr. Lomasney: Does the gentleman think the Legislature would act on a private matter?

Mr. Parker: The test of conditions upon which the Legislature should be authorized to act, in my opinion, should be limited plainly to the requirements of a public emergency. It might well happen that the Legislature would either be confused as to the significance of this amendment or be overborne by suggestions of a local emergency, which they might be persuaded to think to be within the somewhat confused phrase of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston. The emergency should be a public emergency, and the Legislature should not, in my opinion, be permitted to act, to grant or delegate these new and possibly dangerous powers, except under a condition of public distress so universal, so menacing, so insistent as to make it clear that the Legislature is justified in making its final declaration that a public emergency does exist.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the phrase "distress" is one of very far-reaching significance, subject to many constructions and to difficulties and confusion in interpretation; while the use of the phrase "public emergency", which already has been interpreted by the court with definite, plain and indisputable significance, will be a restraint and guide to the Legislature with respect to the exercise of their powers, behind which limitations they would find protection for their action against the appeals of local communities confronted by difficulties which might be very disturbing locally, but still not presenting the menacing portent of a public exigency.

Now, sir, I believe that the phrase "public exigency" alone is broad enough in application, wide enough in its interpretation, to permit the exercise of these proposed powers where, but only where, there is a distress rising to such a degree of import or significance as to fall within the plain interpretation or significance of the words "public exigency." In other words, I believe, sir, that all that my honorable friend, the delegate from Boston, seeks to secure by his phraseology is safeguarded and provided for in the compromise measure presented by the committee. Yet the adoption of his particular phraseology I believe to menace, by possible confusion of interpretation, the very end that he seeks.

I therefore hope, sir, that the compromise report of the committee may be adopted, it being an instructive example of the benefits to this Convention, derived from the exact and searching analysis which comes from the consideration and review of amendments to a fundamental or a radical measure like this. And I think, sir, that instead of being subject to the remotest criticism, the action of the gentlemen of this committee who now have reported to us the compromise or amended measure should be highly commended, for it shows that they have considered this subject deeply, studying it far more profoundly than we have. They now come before their colleagues in this Convention, without arrogance or any pride of opinion, without the prejudices born of their own more or less exclusive study of this proposition, but, enlightened by the suggestions which have been made in argument upon the floor, they have adopted and have reported a measure which I believe eliminates all the fundamental objections to the original report and provides a measure which will operate under every condition or every circumstance now about us or that we can foresee, and which will afford a safe protection to the people of this Commonwealth in future days when they may be confronted with problems not yet within our vision. I hope the committee report will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Quincy of Boston: I desire to ask leave to withdraw the amendments printed under my name in the calendar, the substance of which is incorporated in the substitutes.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment printed under my name in the calendar.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I wish to ask unanimous consent to withdraw all of the amendments printed under my name in the calendar. In so doing I wish to echo the remarks of the delegate from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), and to say that it seems to me that the substitute Clapp amendment, if it may be so designated, is a businesslike and sensible way of approaching this subject, and that it covers the ground safely and at the same time more comprehensively than does the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney). Believing that the Clapp amendment is stated in rather a better way than anything that has been presented, I shall vote for the Clapp amendment in preference. If the Clapp amendment is defeated, I shall vote for the Lomasney amendment. But, Mr. President, it does seem to me that the work of this committee ought at least to be given the recognition of the first test vote on this matter, and I hope that that view may prevail.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. In the first place, I desire to call his attention to the fact that in the amendment offered by the gentleman from the third division (Mr. Lomasney) there is no language providing for compensation or payment. And I call his attention also to the fact that the word "take" is inserted in the next to the last line. Now, I desire to ask him what import the language as used in that proposed amendment would have, and particularly I call his attention to the police power,—the interpretation which might be given under the police power,—and ask him for his opinion regarding it.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I should not dare to be dogmatic as to the interpretation that might be put on those words by the court. But I do say that there would be serious danger that if, in time of war or distress, the Commonwealth, or a city or town, went out and seized property to meet "distress" or "emergency" it would be held to be an exercise of the police power and that therefore no payment would be required. I say that with the more assurance in view of the fact that when I had used in the draft which I had prepared originally the stereotyped words "take by purchase or otherwise" (which I thought plainly signified eminent domain and the resulting obligation to pay reasonable compensation therefor) the delegate from Arlington was not quite content and asked us to insert, so that there should be no shadow of doubt, the words "paying reasonable compensation therefor". And those words were put in there in order to make it certain that when the Commonwealth or any political division thereof took something for the public needs it was taking it by eminent domain and paying for it; not "taking" it, as the government may dynamite our houses to stop a conflagration when there is no obligation to pay for them. Such taking is under the police power.

So, then, I say again that the question of the gentleman from Quincy indicates ground for doubt,—although I have no hesitation in paying great tribute to the inspired utterances and the sudden exhibition of statesmanship of the gentleman of the third division, who knows a great deal more in five minutes than all of us lawyers who have worked over this thing two months,—whether four lines of inspired statesmanship are as safe as the results worked out by the arduous efforts of lawyers after two months' debate with the help of the books.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: I should like to ask the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) to explain why the civil service provision has been dropped from this amendment. That is, why the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington containing the provision that "All offices and positions created in connection with any undertakings under this section shall be filled in accordance with the laws and regulations governing the classified civil service" has been dropped.

Mr. Anderson: I am very glad to answer that question. It was dropped in order to get a unanimous report and in deference to the objections to its insertion on the part of a member of that wise body of which the gentleman from Amherst is also a member,—the Senate of the Commonwealth. More seriously, the reason it was omitted was that we thought that was a matter proper for legislation and not for the Constitution; there was doubt also as to whether the civil service is now sufficiently well established so that we wanted to recognize it in the Constitution. Personally I was in favor of it. But this measure as we reported it is a compromise measure. We have shown, I think, some reasonable deference to the views of others, and neither dogmatism nor egotism on the part of any one of us on the committee.

Mr. French of Randolph: I should like to ask the chairman of the committee with regard to the amendment of the delegate from Lexington,—whether or not he thinks the words "whenever public exigency requires, the Legislature", etc., mean anything more than the equivalent of "whenever the Legislature sees fit, it may require"? In other words, whether those words do not entirely remove from the measure every element of emergency? It seems to me clearly that they do.

Mr. Anderson: I assume that the member from Randolph was not present when I stated my views this morning. I adopt the views expressed by the delegate from Fall River. I adopt also the views expressed a few moments ago by the ex-Attorney-General, the delegate from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), that these words are admonitory only; but they are valuable as an admonition, and therefore are desired by a great many of the representatives in this Convention; but they are not prohibitory. That is my view of them.

Mr. Thessler of New Bedford: In the measure proposed by the committee, section two, the phrase "Whenever the public exigencies require" is not included in the compromise amendment. The phrase "Whenever the public exigencies require", I understand, covers paragraph three, so that it is only when public exigencies require that the city, town or State may establish, maintain and operate. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not the committee has taken into consideration that this does not provide for any foresight. That is, in times of emergency it will be necessary for the State or for the city to at once establish, maintain and operate. And in those words I do not think the implication lies that the State can take over at that time. It must build, establish, maintain and operate suddenly. Now, it seems to me that the experience of the war, in other countries at least, has demonstrated that in times of emergency it is almost impossible to do this constructive work suddenly. I want to ask if this was taken into consideration and whether or not in the compromise amendment we do not immediately throw the city or the State into private enterprise when we might provide, as in the original proposition of the committee, that the city or town or State might by foresight anticipate a crisis and establish and operate these agencies.

Mr. Anderson: I am not quite sure that I get the exact significance of the gentleman's question. But answering it as I understand it, it is true that in the compromise amendment appearing under the name of the gentleman from Lexington, the words "Whenever the public exigencies require" condition and limit grammatically all that follows. It is true that in section two of the one given under my name, at the top of page 4, those words were omitted. It was thought by a majority of the committee that it was just as well to have those words apply to the entire list of powers proposed to be given; I yielded my own preference for my own draft in deference to the views of others.

But answering further the question, I do not believe that the words "public exigencies" can be construed so narrowly as to prevent the Commonwealth from exercising reasonable foresight if it anticipates trouble. I do not believe you must wait,—as was pointed out by the delegate from Lancaster who has just come into the hall (Mr. Parker),—until there is actual war or distress; otherwise I should not have agreed to the compromise proposition. I think that the compromise proposition is defective in that it ought to provide for "other necessaries." But I yielded my personal judgment on that point. I do not think it is necessary to put in the words "Whenever the public exigencies require", conditioning thus the powers given under section two of the draft I made. But I yielded my views on that point also. I yielded these points because I think the substance of the absolutely necessary powers is granted under Mr. Clapp's amendment and because his draft commanded the support of other people in whose judgment I have confidence.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I think that the issue between these resolutions ought to be perfectly clear to the Convention, but I am not sure that it is. There may be minor defects in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, though I have not noticed any myself. But the real issue between his amendment and the proposed amendment of the committee is: Do you want an emergency provision or do you want a general provision that can be acted upon by the Legislature at any time whether or not an emergency exists?

I must take issue with the learned gentlemen of the law who have tried to tell the Convention that the phrase "Whenever the public exigencies require" is the same as the phrase in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston where he says "during times of war, emergency or distress". They are not the same. And I would not take issue with these gentlemen if I did not have behind me a superior authority, to wit, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. It often has been stated here that the word "exigency" has been defined by our Supreme Judicial Court. And so it has been defined. And I shall read you the definition. Among other numerous cases it is in Revere Water Co. v. Winthrop, 192 Mass. 455, 460, and the definition is this: The phrase is equivalent to "whether the public interest would be served." That is what "public exigency" means,—whether the public interest would be served.

Now, read the amendment of the committee in the light of those words and see how the amendment reads. It will read this way: "Whenever the public interest would be served, the Legislature may authorize the Commonwealth to provide shelter", etc.; or, "The Governor, whenever the public interest would be served." If that is the kind of a socialistic proposition that you want to put before the people, do it; but know that it is not an emergency provision, it is a socialistic provision pure and simple.

Now, we have heard a great deal about the great learning of the committee. Once in a while a man who has not studied for months, who has not filled his mind full of different contingencies, who has not gone around from one amending delegate to another to try to get together some kind of a composite hash that everybody will like,— sometimes an inspiration strikes a member of this Convention, and I congratulate the member from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) for seizing the spirit of the times and embodying it in these five lines that lie before us, and I hope his amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask this question of the attorney who is in favor, as I understand it, of the amendment offered by Mr. Lomasney. I want to discover if, under that amendment, the Commonwealth may exercise this power: May the Commonwealth, because it discovers that the price, for instance, of food in the shape of cattle is too high, recognize that the price is either because of the money volume related to the demand for and supply of cattle or because the supply of either cattle or money is controlled by a monopoly? Recognizing that the supply of cattle is controlled by a monopoly, may the Commonwealth, under the pending amendment, contract with the farmer so that he may go into the business, as an individual, of raising cattle at a guaranteed price that will insure a profit, so that the cattle may be furnished to us at the proper price because the supply is increased? You have thus broken down the monopoly price which controls the supply because the guarantee has increased the supply which monopoly does not control.

Now, I want that power to increase supply to be somewhere; I want to find if it is in the resolution of the chairman of the committee. For I think the Commonwealth has got to recognize as a necessity that it must increase the supply in order to break down the price. And the price to-day is the result of setting aside the natural law of supply and demand; taking away the food from the middleman to sell over again eliminates only the middleman's profit; but the Commonwealth cannot fix a reasonable price unless the Commonwealth goes into the business of raising by guarantee of cost and profit. Now, can we do that under your amendment?

Mr. Bryant: I am not sure that I entirely understand the question of the gentleman from Brockton. But under the power to maintain a sufficient supply of food in the event of war, emergency or distress, I should suppose it was very clear that the Legislature could take means of having the food supply increased by one method or another. What the detail would be, would be matter for the Legislature to determine.

Mr. Brown: Then we will come to that word "distress." Is that word broad enough from the legal standpoint so that the Legislature of Massachusetts may at any time feel that the inhabitants are in distress by not obtaining their food at a price at which they could obtain it if the farmers here went into the business of raising cattle at cost, — to supply the people at what I call reasonable cost?

Mr. Bryant: Of course I offer my opinion with hesitation. It is only my personal opinion, and I have not thought of it, perhaps, exactly along the lines that the gentleman asks. But I should assume that "distress" meant some kind of a public distress, not a private distress; and I should assume without hesitation that whether or not the distress existed, whether the emergency existed, would be a matter to be determined by the Legislature. There is no absolute prohibition in this amendment, — I agree to that. The matter comes up to the Legislature to determine whether the distress or whether the emer-emergency exists. But they have that moral restraint on them,—that they ought not to pass laws except in the exercise of this emergency power,—and if they very clearly and absolutely went outside of it the court would stop them. But as a general proposition, any law to-day for public exigency is a matter to be determined by the Legislature, so that whether the condition of emergency exists would be a matter to be determined also by the Legislature.

And if I may refer to this for a moment, we have the word "emergency" in another matter that is now pending before us—I mean the initiative and referendum. We are using that word "emergency". And that, I suppose, is in the discretion of the Legislature; but nobody yet has criticized the word in that connection, and the use of the word in this connection would be very similar to it, in my opinion.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I hope that the Convention will vote for the measure, the resolution introduced by the gentleman who sits behind me in this Convention (Mr. Lomasney), and I want to point out what seems to me the difference between the two.

In the first place, the gentleman from Boston has included, in the things which may be provided, articles of clothing. Now, if we limit the measure to times of emergency and distress, I think those should be included; therefore I think that is one advantage his resolution has over the other.

But the great difference is this: You will see he uses the words "During times of war, emergency or distress." That brings clearly to the mind that the times during which this thing may be done are limited. It appears clearly from this that you are to be allowed to go into this kind of business only at limited times, showing on the face of it that you are not permitting the Commonwealth to purchase food or go into the business for all time.

There is nothing of that in the amendment which has now been agreed upon by the committee. It has been very well pointed out by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) that the words "Whenever the public exigencies require" mean merely that the Legislature may say when they think it is for the benefit of the Commonwealth that the Commonwealth should go into the milk business, for instance. There is nothing in this committee amendment, as I see it, which could prevent the Commonwealth going into the milk business. Personally I do not believe in that. I think we should limit it, as it clearly is limited in the resolution of the gentleman who sits behind me, to times of war or distress, and we should say clearly, as he says clearly in his resolution, that the thing is not going to be started and kept going but is to be used only during the limited time.

The further proposition is this: In my judgment the people of this Commonwealth never would adopt the amendment offered by the committee if they thought, as I do, that it would allow the Commonwealth to go into these socialistic schemes. So that I say that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Boston is much safer and also much more likely to be adopted by the people.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I want to say one word in answer to the chairman of this committee. He stated that the resolution of the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) allows cities and towns to take by right of eminent domain. I want to call his attention to the fact —
Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I will correct the gentleman. I stated nothing of the kind. I stated that there was in the proposition of the gentleman from the third division a constitutional recognition of a duty in municipalities to take and to provide for these things, and that it was open to grave doubt whether it was eminent domain or was the exercise of the police power. But I stated expressly that it was a constitutional recognition of a municipal power that never before has been contemplated either in the existing Constitution or in anything that has been proposed in this Convention.

Mr. Curtis: What I desired to say was this: That the gentleman knows just as well as I know that if the Constitution allows the Commonwealth to take by right of eminent domain that the Legislature can delegate that power to any city or town. And I believe they have no more power under this resolution than they have now.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the question of the police power of which he speaks. The police power is a power for regulation, and in the exercise of that power the property of an individual occasionally is injured; for which he gets no compensation. But you cannot take by right of eminent domain through the method provided for here unless you pay for the taking. All you have to read are the last words in the tenth article of the Constitution, quoted yesterday by the gentleman from Fall River: “And whenever the public exigencies require that the property of an individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor.” So that there is no danger of anybody’s property being taken without its being paid for. And, gentlemen, if there was that danger, I do not believe that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts ever would take advantage of, or ever would take, anybody’s property without paying for it.

Now, I want to say just one more word. I have an amendment in here under my name which I ask unanimous consent to withdraw. And I withdraw it because I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from ward 5 is the best before us, and is the one I hope this Convention will adopt. I think it is better than the one offered by my friend on the left.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: The committee seems to have been so fortunate or unfortunate as to have arrayed against it not only the ultra-conservatives but the ultra-radicals. We have not only the labor men whom the gentleman from Boston has so confidently promised, but also every one of the gentlemen who have denounced the proposition of the committee as a socialistic proposition. In other words, we have so successfully steered the middle course that we have come between the radicals and the conservatives, and both of them seem to have united on a fairly simple proposition. That is an extraordinary result. It hardly can be that the two sides take the same view of the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney), or this most delightful harmony would not long continue. I cannot think that the radical element would vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston if they adopted the reasoning of some of the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of it. That is to say, if they consider that the language of the gentleman from Boston makes it a strict emergency measure, so that except in time of actual need no action can be taken by the State, no action contemplating the future existence of an emergency, and no action after the actual expiration of the emergency, then I hardly can think that they would view that amendment with quite so much complacency. On the other hand, if the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of it and who have been so insistent that the State should not engage in any business looking toward State socialism, had contemplated those words as meaning, as I think they do, that in any condition where the Legislature can say that distress exists,—and distress is a fairly broad word,—then it not only may but must go into business, they in their turn would hardly look upon it with so much complacency. And yet that is just exactly what the resolution of the gentleman from Boston says. It is not only the right of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns to engage in business under that, but it is their actual duty, and there is no reason why the Legislature, if such be its desire, cannot say at any time that distress exists. For the last seven years the Legislature has heard very little except about the high cost of living, and I am fully prepared to agree that there has been considerable reason in that complaint. I do not think that the Legislature could say fairly that at any time during those seven years there was not distress in the Commonwealth, and if so, under this resolution it is not only the privilege of the Legislature but it is its actual duty to set this scheme into operation. That is the language used by the gentleman from Boston:

It shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns thereof to take and provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine.

Now as to the question of eminent domain. It is fairly obvious, I think, that the resolution of the gentleman from Boston distinctly contemplates that cities and towns shall have the power to take food-stuffs and such other necessaries of life as may be necessary. That matter was considered pretty carefully by the committee and the reasons why the power of taking was defined in our resolution to be in the Commonwealth rested on considerations of that nature. There were propositions before us which desired to give cities and towns the fullest power to go into business, to take, to seize property, in fact, to do everything that they might consider necessary at any time they pleased.

Now consider the situation if a city like Boston, vested by the Legislature or vested by the Constitutional amendment with power to seize property, should at once seize all the food-stuffs within its limits. Would not that create a most disastrous condition in the communities around it that rely upon Boston for their supplies of food? The same thing would be true of other places in the Commonwealth around which there are a number of communities which depend upon them as centers of supply of every sort; so that if you give cities and towns this power or if you give the Legislature the right to give to cities and towns this power, you are running the risk of giving a city or town that happens to occupy a favorable strategical position the right not only to provide for its own inhabitants but to starve all its neighbors. And I think if the amendment of the gentleman from Boston is adopted some limitation certainly ought to be inserted defining the right of seizing property to be vested in the Commonwealth rather than in cities and towns; and in that respect at least I think the committee amendment is the preferable one.
Doubtless what the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Quincy) says is true, that the Legislature could delegate its functions. But if we, in drafting this amendment, make an expression of opinion to the effect that the right to take property should be vested in the Commonwealth, then the cities and towns cannot take the property, except by express legislative delegation, and the difference, I think, between the two resolutions lies in this, — that in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston you have recognized the duty of cities and towns to take property, and in the other you have recognized that duty as resting in the Commonwealth and not in the cities and towns.

Now both of these amendments look toward the same direction. They are framed to meet the same condition and the distance they are apart is not so very great. I have attempted to designate some of the differences and some of the reasons for the committee's adopting carefully framed language to cover what we have desired to cover. The language in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston is of a very broad general nature and of a nature that I think meets the views of many who desire to see the Constitution of the Commonwealth succinct and general in its language rather than specific and detailed. But it is with some surprise that I find so many gentlemen who have complained of the committee for bringing in a socialistic proposition who are prepared to stand for a resolution which vests in the Legislature, according to their own statement, power to declare at any time that emergency or distress exists, and in addition the specific duty to vest not only the Commonwealth but the cities and towns with the right to go into business and imposes the explicit duty on the Commonwealth and the cities and towns to take advantage of that power.

Mr. Tatman of Worcester: It seems to me that a very large majority of the delegates here are very much impressed with one of the features of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston. That is this very specific restriction of the power conferred to times of emergency. I am sure we have been impressed by the arguments of the gentleman from Milton who felt that the language employed by the committee in its advocacy of Mr. Clapp's amendment simply confers upon the Legislature the power to do these things whenever it shall see fit, and that the word "exigency" is not the equivalent of "emergency" by any means. I do not think that the temper of this Convention is such as to agree to the whole amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston. Nor do I think that the Convention wishes to commit itself to the support of this resolution except that it be restricted to times of emergency. To be sure, any language which is used will be only admonitory. The language used in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston, so far as it confers any powers, is precisely the same as that in the resolution now being supported by the committee, because that says in the same language, — "Whenever the public exigencies require." The language which goes before that is only admonitory. But I think that is important, and I therefore move an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) to insert after the word "whenever," in line 1, the words "during times of war, emergency or distress."

Mr. Balch of Boston: The gentleman has anticipated a motion which I have here. I wish to ask him, however, why the same amendment is not equally necessary in the first section.

Mr. Tatman: I do not understand that there is more than one section to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington.

Mr. Balch: I understood, Mr. President, that Mr. Anderson had accepted in substitution the Clapp amendment for the second section of his amendment, so that what we had before us was section 1 by Mr. Anderson plus section 2 by Mr. Clapp.

Mr. Tatman: I think there is no doubt that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington is in substitution for the two sections as proposed by the committee. Now, what my amendment does is to adopt the language of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) and make this whole resolution apply only during times of war, emergency or distress. Those words are only admonitory and it is always for the Legislature to determine when it shall exercise this power. But those specific words admonish them not to exercise that power except during such times.

Mr. Lomasney: It is with some gratification that I find the former Attorney-General, whose ability we recognize, has to admit that only one word was necessary to perfect the amendment, his suggestion being to put the word "public" before the word "emergency." I gladly will insert that in the amendment because that puts in the same words that are in the Constitution, — "public exigency; public emergency." I am willing to accept that change in the amendment I have offered because I have no desire to have it apply to private schemes or private purposes or private individuals. We are working here for the public interest.

The gentleman from Brookline in charge of the measure (Mr. Anderson) when he made a statement to the Convention spoke about my egotism. The gentlemen of this body who have served with us know who is the turkey-cock that goes swinging through the chamber. I do not think there is any of that in me. I have no swelled head. Any allusion to "inspired statesmanship" was entirely unnecessary. My record in the Legislature is public property. It has been my privilege, sir, to contribute something constructive to the city where I was born, not like the gentleman who almost always has been connected with destructive legislation. I want the gentleman to understand that I do not consider him or any one else when I believe I am doing what is right. This amendment was not drawn by me alone; I talked with several men around this building, — the gentlemen who have been a part of the Legislature for years drawing up these amendments. We got this one in shape, and in my opinion it is a good amendment. I would not like to say that except that somebody else had a hand in drawing it, but I believe we have an amendment here which anybody who is fair will support, notwithstanding the criticism of these lawyers and Attorneys-General. "Put in the word 'public,'" says a former Attorney-General. Of course, I am perfectly willing to do that. My answer to him indicated that I did not think it was necessary; but if you think it is necessary, put it in.

Now, Mr. President, what else can be said about this matter? It all comes down to what? Certain things can be done. The amendment reads: "As the Legislature shall determine." Now, Mr. President, if we put this amendment through and it is accepted by the people, the Legislature coming in next year will proceed to do something of a constructive character for the people of Massachusetts; to bring labor and capital together, and show the laboring man that, in times of emergency, distress or war, the great government he is living with is part and parcel of himself and that it wants to help him. That is the point here, because a good many whom I know do not want to become paupers or ask for public charity.

I hope, sir, the amendment that I have offered will be put forward and be voted on first, and I shall be glad to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Lancaster, the former Attorney-General (Mr. Parker), by adding the word "public." And then we shall have an amendment that, in my opinion, will be acceptable to the people.

Now, about this question of taking men's property. Why, I am surprised that anybody argues in this Commonwealth that property can be seized without paying for it. The Constitution says that whenever the public necessity requires that private property be taken the owner shall receive compensation therefor. Article X of the Bill of Rights says: "And whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor." We are operating under that article. And Article XV guarantees the right to trial by jury. Where is there any question about that? Have we been going on for years seizing property and doing these things without right?
Of course we have not. We do not repeal these articles. I am suspicious of some of these other amendments,—I do not know just what they mean. But he who runs may read this amendment. It is frank, open, square and fair; it puts down the time and the manner in which these things can be done. And when the Legislature meets, let the laboring man and his employer come up here and present their views.
We know that the Massachusetts Legislature will meet all of the diff erent elements and do what is right. I trust the amendment will prevail. I thank the gentleman for giving way.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: It is only necessary to amend the Clapp amendment by taking out the word "said" in the second section to make the amendment sufficiently broad to include clothing and those other necessities of life which the so-called labor element, and other elements in the community, desire to have included in any amendment which we may pass. It has been my intention to move to amend by striking out that word "said", and if that were done and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Worcester were adopted the Clapp amendment, in my judgment, would then be far preferable to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney).

And in that connection, sir, I should like to have some one,—either the gentleman from Boston himself or some other person who is interested in the proposed amendment,—explain just what his amendment means down to and including the word "function", in the 4th line. As I understand it, sir, a constitutional provision is either a grant of power or a prohibition of the exercise of power. As I understand the amendment as offered by the gentleman in the third division, it is an assertion of a duty on the part of the cities and towns of the Commonwealth to maintain and keep a supply of commodities. Now,
Mr. President, that to me is a far more socialistic proposition than any proposition in the so-called Clapp amendment if it should be corrected by the pending amendments suggested by the gentleman from Worcester and myself.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I do not ask this Convention to support the Clapp amendment simply because it is a committee report; but I do suggest to this Convention that when a committee toils as we have toiled for two months, and discusses day in and day out not merely their own views but all the amendments which have been suggested in Convention,—taking the books and the authorities and carefully checking up their own judgment in every practicable way,—that the Convention ought not to cast a compromise, composite judgment of that kind to the winds without real reason. We have had suggested here yesterday and this morning by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) a new proposition, extraordinarily brief in statement and drastic and unusual in the extent of the power given,—something that nobody can understand the exact limits of; and so far as I can understand it I am opposed to a large part of it.

Mr. George of Haverhill: In view of the fact that this committee on Public Affairs has brought in a resolution in the first instance to adopt Socialism by ballot, the very kind that they are trying to adopt by revolution in Russia, and trying to put it across this Convention, and, further, that it now comes in with an amendment and finally has presented a new draft, and has surrendered all right and title to everything it has presented and has accepted an amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), does he think that we are bound to follow the lead of a committee with that record?

Mr. Anderson: Practically all of the recital of facts, or alleged facts in the gentleman's statement having no relation to real facts, I do not think I shall waste any of the short time I have left in a discussion with him of the balance of his slur on the work of the committee. [Applause.] We have not abandoned the work of the committee. There were differences of opinion between my friend from Lexington and myself that we fought out in part in the committee and in part here. Each of us has conceded something. We have had help from other members, we have had something from every member of the committee; the result is, as I have stated, a composite judgment of the committee after lengthy and elaborate discussion in the Convention. Now, if that is not the way for a deliberative assembly to work, I do not know how a deliberative assembly ought to work. I submit, therefore, as matter of sound procedure, that after my committee has tried to bring its specialized knowledge into play for the entire Convention (which is the proper function of the committee) you want to give some consideration to its report before you cast its work all overboard.

Now, what is the essential difference? I cannot now make any elaborate analysis, but the "maintenance at reasonable rates" is certainly a catch phrase. If anything socialistic ever was proposed in this Convention it is found in those words,—"maintenance at reasonable rates". When I find some of my friends,—whom I know to be as thoroughbred Tories as any to be found in eastern Prussia,—enthusiastic for the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, which starts out with the words "the maintenance at reasonable rates", I fear the Greeks bearing gifts,—gifts from the gentleman from Ward 5.
Look twice before you approve a combination between those who would destroy any grant of legislative power to assist the common people and the gentleman from Ward 5.

"The maintenance at reasonable rates"! What are "reasonable rates" "of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress"? What is an "emergency"? I am having them all the time. "Is a public function,"—what does that mean?—also "and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein" "to take,"—whether you do or do not pay; whether it is like taking your house in time of a conflagration and you get no compensation,—"and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine."

Well, now, I am not a socialist, although I am not afraid of that or any other epithet. But if there is anybody here who claims to be a conservative and wants sound legislation and not legislation which would precipitate a war in the courts as to the extent of the constitutional power whenever he tries to do anything constructive, he could find no better foundation for such a war than that language.

Now, what have we on the other side? We have the proposition worked out in the manner I have stated. Analyzed by the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), an ex-Attorney-General, adopting the language which has been in our Constitution and the subject-matter of consideration by our courts, it has an established meaning so that any sound lawyer may go to the books and ascertain what is meant. We have cut out "the other necessaries of life." I should like them in. I could not get the unanimous support of my committee to put into the Clapp amendment language as broad as I wanted. But it is sound, it is constructive, it is drawn in the light of the existing standards of interpretation in this Commonwealth, it commands the support of those who are not inspired suddenly to statesmanship, who recognize that statesmanship is the result of hard work and the careful study of what other people have done,—is a composite judgment which generally involves the giving way of some part of what you yourself desire; that it involves reasonable deference to the opinions of others,—that is the Clapp amendment. And I ask this Convention to adopt that amendment.

You will observe also that when the Legislature is not in session, "the Governor, with the approval of the Council, may, until otherwise provided by law, exercise the powers hereby granted." There you have an explicit grant of power to the Governor and Council to provide for an unforeseen emergency, so as to avoid the necessity of summoning the Legislature in special session,—a situation which might easily arise if we had some great emergency coming upon us in summer or fall,—putting the Commonwealth to an entirely unnecessary expense. Yet, the Legislature keeps entire control, because at the next session of the Legislature they may "otherwise provide by law." If you put into the Clapp amendment "the other necessaries of life" it would cover my views almost exactly.

As I stated to the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), I myself should have preferred to have retained the provision for the civil service. But that did not command support. We kept in, in deference to the views of the gentleman from Norwood (Mr. Willett) and others, the provision of uniform accounting, although some objected to that. So that I say there has been a concession here, a concession there, an agreement here and an agreement there, until we have a measure which I say is sound. I ask, therefore, this Convention to reject the amendments, including the amendment of the gentleman from Ward 5, and to adopt as the judgment of the Convention the Clapp amendment printed on page 4 of the calendar of to-day.

The Convention, by a vote of 142 to 85, adopted the following amendment, moved by Mr. Martin M. Lomasney of Boston: Strike out the article of amendment and insert in place thereof the following:

The maintenance, at reasonable rates, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and of shelter, during times of war, emergency or distress, is a public function and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein to take and to provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the Legislature shall determine.

The above new draft, accordingly, was substituted for the resolution reported by the committee and was ordered to a third reading Wednesday, October 3.

A motion to reconsider called forth considerable discussion of the merits of the measure on the following day.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I voted yesterday for what we might term the Lomasney amendment. I voted for it because it seemed to me to be the best emergency measure, because I thought it would be adopted or accepted by the people, — I wanted to see something accepted by the people on this matter, — and because it avoided to a certain extent the troublesome question of municipal trading. Although I voted for it, I recognized that it did not meet some of the suggestions I should like to see in a measure of this kind. It was not sufficiently clear that it enabled the State in the seven fat years to provide against the seven lean years, and it did not sufficiently touch upon the aid which the State must give in the near future to the question of distribution as a permanent measure.

After the measure was adopted I talked with some of the gentlemen interested in the matter, and they gave me the intimation that possibly there might be some modification of the proposed Clapp amendment which would give to us, or the great part of us, all the things that we wanted. Again, I had the feeling that perhaps those of us who voted for the Lomasney amendment did not treat with as much consideration as we should the careful and patient work of the committee on Public Affairs and the work of the able chairman of that committee. Again, as I thought the matter over, it seemed to me that possibly we did not all of us realize deeply enough the situation which confronts Massachusetts. We are a manufacturing State, in one corner of this big country. We cannot compete in many things with the States of the middle west and with New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. If we do compete we must be able to provide reasonable shelter, food and clothing at reasonable prices to the people who man our mills and our industries. We are about to submit a resolution on absentee voting, to which we all practically agree. We passed an anti-aid amendment, on the form of which practically the Convention all agreed. It seemed to me that it was worth while on as important a matter as this to reconsider the action we had taken, to see if we could not make one more effort to get a measure to which the greater part of this Convention would agree. With those thoughts in mind I made the motion to reconsider, and with that spirit I present the matter to this Convention.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: In the reconsideration of the so-called Lomasney amendment adopted by this Convention yesterday, I want the members of the Convention to fully realize that this amendment provides no direct means of preventing extortion by private monopolies in normal times; it provides for relief only in times of war, emergency or distress,—all abnormal conditions.

I want to say to the members of the Convention who wish to secure relief from the extortion of private monopolies in normal times, that they should vote for the reconsideration of this amendment. The meaning of the word "exigency" in the Clapp amendment has been determined by our Supreme Judicial Court. The meaning of the words "war, emergency and distress", as used in this resolution, has yet to be determined. In my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, the Lomasney amendment will provide no relief even in abnormal times until after the courts have had time to pass upon what those words mean.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: This Convention yesterday, after a good deal of deliberation, took a certain stand. There was of course no real meeting of all the minds, but what did we do? We substituted a new draft. Now, that new draft takes its place in the calendar and every man has a chance to read it, go over it, prepare his amendment, suggest it, and talk it out. But why reconsider it now? Why interfere with our regular order of procedure? A great many of us were busy yesterday with the regular Convention work, we did not have time to confer. Some men came to me yesterday and wanted to talk about amendments. I said: "I will see you later." We were here until half-past four yesterday discussing another measure. I have not had a chance to confer with them this morning. I submit, Mr. President, we should not reconsider the matter. Let it go into the calendar. Then let everybody get together, talk, confer, make amendments, and arrive at some conclusion.

Mr. Creamer: I should like to ask the delegate from Ward 5 if, when it comes to the next stage, he will consent to the insertion of the words "public exigency" in place of the word "emergency."

Mr. Lomasney: The gentleman from Boston never makes any promises. [Laughter.] When he makes promises he keeps them; he does not say "Yes" and then afterwards change.

Mr. Creamer: The fact that the gentleman from Ward 5 always keeps his promise,—I think he does,—is why I want him to make it.

Mr. Lomasney: The gentleman, with all his shrewdness, cannot get me to make a promise now, because I want to see and hear what every fair-minded man in this Convention has to say. The Convention is full of that class of men. Let every man do with this amendment what he did with the other amendment,—put his best thought into it. Let all amendments go on the calendar, let us look them over; then at the next reading we can have a chance to see what is the best thing to do. If we want to expedite matters we should not reconsider. Let this draft take its place in the calendar; prepare your amendments; then let us see if we can get together. I am willing to get together on any measure that will help Massachusetts, its industries and its people, and I hope the motion to reconsider will not prevail.
Mr. Begley of Holyoke: I rise to indorse the motion made by my colleague from Holyoke, and my reasons for indorsing the motion are based upon a comparison which I have made of an opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court in the 182nd Massachusetts Reports with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston. My comparison has constrained me to the conclusion that the so-called Lomasney amendment is nothing more than a codification of the virtual law of Massachusetts to-day. At the time of the coal strike the Legislature petitioned the Supreme Judicial Court for a ruling concerning the powers of municipalities to deal in fuel. There were four questions in that petition, the first three dealing with the question I have stated. The fourth question was: “If the answer to any of the foregoing questions be in the negative, does the power so declared as non-existent exist in the case of an extraordinary emergency, and may the different cities and towns be constituted judges of said emergency?”

In regard to the powers of cities and towns to deal in fuel, the court is of the opinion they did not have the power. With regard to the fourth question, they said it presents greater difficulties:

The only condition referred to in the question is “extraordinary emergency,” and the conditions referred to in the accompanying bill are “a scarcity of fuel and a pressing need thereof,” and “a reasonable ground of belief that such a condition will occur in the near future.”

The court said:

As to that, we are of opinion that if the supposed conditions exist in any city or town, it may be authorized, under proper legislation, to sell fuel with the limitations above stated.

That decision of course was made with reference to fuel, but it does not change the principle. The other day when the original Anderson resolution was passed to its first reading I sat back in my seat satisfied in the thought that if this Convention did not pass another amendment they had done something to justify their existence; and yesterday I was very much surprised at the attitude,—if I may call it, the will-of-the-wisp attitude,—of the chairman of the committee, in coming in and stating that he felt that concessions ought to be made. If I remember correctly, he said he had made some concessions. If my memory serves me correctly, I think he conceded everything, because he includes the words “Whenever public exigencies require.” That is just what the opponents of this proposition have been fighting for; they want to include the words “public exigencies”; and, Mr. President, that is nothing more than a codification of the virtual law of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to-day.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I am fearful that this Convention has been talked to so much it is losing the power to vote. I can hardly believe that there is not some serious defect in the statements of those of us who have discussed this proposition, when men for whose judgment and absolute sincerity I have so great respect as I have for the great majority,—indeed for almost the entire body, of this Convention,—should vote as they did yesterday. We have passed nothing, you know, to final vote. Perhaps we have got so in the habit of talking that by a species of revulsion of mental processes we have made ourselves unable to vote.
Now, the gentleman from Holyoke who spoke a few moments ago voiced a criticism of the course of the chairman which I have heard outside. There must be some foundation for it, — in my failure to make myself clear, — otherwise the criticism would not be made. But I want to say now, with such emphasis as I am able to state, that there has been in no essential or important particular any change in the attitude of myself or of my colleagues on the committee from the beginning to the end of this entire debate. There was debate as to whether we should include other necessaries than food, food-stuffs, fuel, coal and ice. “Other necessaries” would have included clothing and boots and shoes. It seemed to those of us charged with the primary responsibility that, in order to meet the more conservative view of some of the members of the Convention, and, as we thought, perhaps command unanimous support, if we could get the essence we might make that concession. The gentleman from Holyoke suggests that the words “Whenever public exigencies require” cut down our amendment. If he had listened carefully to the learned gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) and the ex-Attorney-General, the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), he would have concluded that those words are admonitory only, that they leave the power in full force.

Now, gentlemen, let me call your attention to the gist of this proposition. If you look at page 4 of yesterday's calendar you will find in section 2 of what is called the “Anderson amendment” an enumeration of the powers of increased distribution facilities as I wanted it stated, — providing for the establishment of “markets, docks, fuel and coal yards,” etc., “slaughter-houses, cold storage plants, and other like means for collecting and converting, preserving, storing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life.” That is the gist of the whole thing, except the emergency power, which is given, if at all, in very ambiguous and inadequate shape in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney).

In the Clapp amendment exactly the same powers are given as are given in my draft. It is a mere change in the form of expression, in that he says: “may authorize the Commonwealth and cities and towns to establish, maintain and operate all necessary means for collecting, converting, preserving, storing and distributing said necessaries of life.” The two forms mean precisely the same thing. If you want to do anything at all constructive beyond removing the constitutional doubt as to whether the Commonwealth might do what it did do in the case of the Chelsea and the Salem fires (when they probably exceeded their constitutional powers, as determined in the case of Lowell v. Boston) note that that is the most that the amendment of the gentleman from Boston does. If you want to go beyond that, then you may adopt the Clapp amendment, as furnishing in proper shape, carefully worked out, adequate constitutional power for the Legislature to deal with the distribution problem.

One other thing. The gentleman from Boston, who yesterday announced that he had worked out a perfect thing, and in four or five lines had formulated something that had taken the place of all the good-for-nothing work of this committee extended over a period of three months, now says that it should stand over; that everybody should bring in a series of amendments; that by and by, starting de from his basis, we may build up something worth while. It is an encouraging process for our committee and for this Convention, to start de novo with the resolution of the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. Willett of Norwood: I believe this is one of the most important matters before this Convention affecting the industrial prosperity of Massachusetts. At the cry of socialism raised yesterday we were driven to accept a temporary expedient of which some day I believe that we shall be ashamed. We are not in ordinary times, and those of us who are identified with the industrial life of the Commonwealth have cause to look into the future with great anxiety. The nations of the world have gone into flux, and we do not know on what economic basis we are coming out. This measure gives us a chance to help the industrial conditions of our State. They are not socialistic propositions, but are good straightforward business propositions. I do not believe we are giving this matter the consideration it deserves. I should like to see this motion prevail, and have the matter referred back to the committee. The matter can be dealt with then in an orderly and decent way, and not by some member writing down three or four lines on a piece of paper and saying: "Take this as sent from heaven." I hope this motion will prevail, so that we shall have every possible chance to consider this most important matter.

The Convention refused, by a vote of 82 to 145, to reconsider its action in ordering the Lomasney amendment to a third reading.

The committee on Form and Phraseology reported a new draft (No. 363), which was assigned for debate at 2 o'clock Wednesday, October 10.

Messrs. Ezra W. Clark of Brockton and Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley offered amendments cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I am usually so unfortunate as not to be able to follow the leader of the Convention who sits for ward 5 in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). I voted the other day to substitute his proposal, not because I should be willing to see it adopted in the form in which it was offered, but because I regarded it as the least objectionable of all the propositions which at that time were before the Convention, and as furnishing the best basis for further amendment, which I think it needs. I will not repeat the reasons which I gave the Convention the other day for my attitude toward this measure. I am satisfied, and all experience confirms the view, that there is absolutely nothing for the public in this scheme or any similar scheme, except that it is possible that in some emergency, which it would take a very active imagination to compass, the intervention of the State's power of eminent domain might enable us to get food or fuel or some necessary article at some price, though it would be at an enhanced price, which otherwise we could not get at all. That, in my view of the matter, is the only justification for this or any similar scheme. It should in my opinion be confined within narrower bounds, and I wish now to make clear, as I think I can in a moment, the precise effect and the only effect of the substitute which I have offered.

First I have taken out the general and sweeping "necessaries of life" and confined the operation of it to food for man and animals, fuel and ice. The other change, and there are but two, is a change which ought to be made, in any view of the matter, as I think the Convention will agree, by taking out the words: "It shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and of the cities and towns therein" to go into this business. In its present form it is made the duty of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns, to go into trading in the necessaries of life during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress, whatever the situation or the other conditions. The question when it is the duty of the Commonwealth to interfere, assuming that it has the power, is clearly a legislative question, and it ought to be left to the Legislature to determine. The resolution in its present form is practically a standing mandate to the Legislature to go into trade at any time when either of these conditions arises, — war, public exigency, emergency or distress. Now it is plain, and it must be evident to every member of the Convention, that the existence of one or more of these conditions might not furnish any occasion or any justification whatever for putting the State into trade. The existence of war, merely, clearly would not, and it must be remembered that we are not legislating for this war, but for any and all wars. In other words, it is by no means to be assumed that the mere existence of a state of war would offer any inducement whatever for the Commonwealth to go into trade in the necessaries of life. They might be abundantly supplied, and at reasonable prices, notwithstanding a state of war. The question when the duty arises, therefore, is, as I say, a legislative question, and it ought to be left to the Legislature to determine. And I call particular attention to the fact that my amended form does not impair the power in the slightest degree. The power exists as completely under my form as under that of the pending resolution, the question when the necessity arises for the exercise of the power being left to the Legislature, as it ought to be.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: The other day it was my privilege to suggest an amendment. Since that time the committee on Form and Phraseology have been over the amendment and have suggested this form. I have talked with the men representing the labor movement, and they feel that the word "exigency" should be inserted in this amendment. The attention of the Convention was called to this word by the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings), who is not here to-day, but you will find that the word "exigency" is in the present Constitution. The other day we were on the verge of plunging the State into all kinds of schemes, putting into our Constitution authority to take slaughter-houses, warehouses, canneries, cold storage plants, docks and many similar matters, and everything of that kind you did put a cloud on taxable property, because real estate is visible taxable property. Any man who knows anything about business knows what burdens real estate has to bear to-day.

When the labor men talked with me they said: "If you will put into the amendment the word 'exigency' and the words 'and distribution', we shall be absolutely satisfied with it. They had some other amendments, but I said to them frankly: "No. We have got to go slow here. You must all yield something to have a meeting of minds, so that we can get to a point where we shall do what is the right thing for the laboring people, do what is the right thing for the capitalist, and do what is the right thing for the poor people of the State at the same time." On the other propositions they offered, I suggested to them to go slow, not to ask too much. But, Mr. President, with the word "exigency" in here now, as defined by the Supreme Judicial Court and by the dictionary, they would be satisfied. I would not take out "emergency" for the word "exigency", so we compromised, and we allowed two words to go in, "public exigency". The honorable gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker) suggested the word "public" at the last meeting, and we have accepted it. It now reads: "public exigency, emergency," etc. Now they are satisfied to support the measure. That is quite a different proposition from the one you had here the other day,—the one that United States Attorney Anderson was trying to push through the Convention. And mark you, Mr. President, nothing can be done under this amendment until the General Court goes into the matter, gives all sides a hearing, and enacts into law what the Constitution allows.

Now what does the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) want to do? He frankly tells you he wants to strike out the words "necessaries of life". That is one of the most essential parts of the measure. Suppose, Mr. President, we have a strike in a mill town in the middle of winter, and the children of the operatives are freezing,—freezing for want of coal and of clothing. Under the Pillsbury amendment the cities and towns could not sell coal or clothing to them. He admits that. What is more essential than that? "Other necessaries of life". What are the necessaries of life? Everybody knows. They are liberal words, but the law must be administered by men of common sense, and we do not do anything until we get the Legislature to define and determine these matters. He tells you frankly the present proposition is too narrow, that we ought to make it as broad as we can. He does not stop and say he will take the word "exigency". He goes farther and he specifically puts in food,—not clothing. Food and clothing are synonymous. You cannot get away from it. No matter how well filled a man's stomach is, if he has not clothes of what use is he? He must have clothes. That is one of the necessaries of life. And you see he says: "for man and animals, fuel and ice." Now Mr. President, it is a great thing to have free ice or cheap ice or plenty of ice in the summer, but it is not half as essential to have it as it is to have warm clothing on cold winter days and nights, it is not half as essential to have ice to put to your head in summer as it is to have fuel and clothing to keep you warm in winter. That is common sense. The gentleman never has been in want. He does not know how the poor people feel on this matter. You never need be afraid the Legislature will go too far in extending justice. You can trust them on this matter to be fair and to do right. I submit, Mr. President, that when you have the laboring people willing to meet the people here who represent capital from all parts of the State, it is a good time to start getting together and see if we do not want to understand one another better, so that we can be closer and pull together rather than divide on these essential things.

Now, he also puts in these words, Mr. President. I find no fault, and I make no unfair criticism of the gentleman; he states it frankly; but I am not willing to vote for them. His amendment reads "under terms and conditions." That is one of the dangers of every contract. Why, we had those words in the old street railway law of the State, when they used to have street railways. It provided that the Metropolitan or the Middlesex roads should get their location upon "such terms and conditions" as the board of aldermen should specify. Under that phrase, "terms and conditions," they could make the roads pay for the roadbed, they could make them do all kinds of things. But when they came to get practical legislation they struck out "terms and conditions" and said "regulations and restrictions." I am afraid of putting "terms and conditions" into the Constitution on this matter, especially when the gentleman favors them.

Read the article of amendment as presented the first day, with the additions, the "maintenance and distribution" that have been added at the suggestion of the labor people. I fought the word "production." They said they wanted it in; but it is left out. "The maintenance and distribution at reasonable rates, during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress, of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life." That goes far enough. The amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) says "food for man and animals, fuel and ice." My amendment reads "necessaries of life," and the providing of shelter, — are public functions. "And it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein to take and supply the same in such manner as the General Court shall determine." To what better cause could we commit the Commonwealth than to do these things for the decent deserving people of the State? You are not giving it to them for nothing. You are not dealing with people who seek charity. And this is to do what? To give to the men who do not desire charity, — and thousands of people do not like to seek it; thousands of people starve almost before they ask charity. Nobody knows what a poor decent person will do before he looks for charity.

Mr. Lowe of Fitchburg: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the resolution as drawn would permit the State to produce. It seems to me that that is the most important part of that resolution. We may fall again, Mr. President, into the halcyon days of the New Freedom of Mr. Wilson as we did in 1912 and 1913. It seems to me that if we are going into this proposition at all we ought to permit the State to take some of the uncultivated lands, either by lease or purchase, and produce. The State ought to take some of the men out of the bread lines when they exist, and let them go into the fields and produce. It seems to me that the word "produce" should be in this resolution.

Mr. Lomasney: The resolution is the property of the Convention. Any member who has views should state them. I simply was explaining the amendment and what occurred in my connection with it.

I think the very thing the gentleman is after can be brought about under this measure. "Other common necessaries of life" is a broad proposition. It leaves it to the Legislature. And anything to get those things, as it says here, is broad, and to my mind, although I am no lawyer, I think it is strong enough. The best evidence that it is pretty broad and workable is the effort the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) is making to restrict it. He says so frankly. He says it is too broad. I say: "Don't restrict it." There can be no question what this means. It allows large power to the Legislature. But what does that mean, Mr. President? You know, and every member in this body knows, — and there are a great many men here who have sat in the Legislature, — that if this amendment is adopted by the people there will be a petition presented, that a pile of evidence will be presented before the committee. They will protect every one in the community. And in my opinion, Mr. President, it has just been called to my attention by the gentleman from South Boston (Mr. Fahey) that Convention document No. 116 contains the very thing the gentleman from Fitchburg is after. Document No. 116; that allows them to do what he wants. Why not let that matter stand by itself? Go into that proposition when it comes up, and talk about it then, and pass it or not just as you please. Why not let this matter, which is an emergency matter, which is necessary in times designated here, stand on its own merits? I have had pointed out to me that there is another one, No. 321, on the subject of production. Now when there are filed so many measures on the matter of production, let us confine this one to just what we have specified.

Mr. Creame of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) if there is not a very grave possibility that those other questions will not be reached by this Convention.

Mr. Lomasney: Those questions are before the same committee that brought out the other proposition. They are before the same committee. Of course I cannot tell what is possible. It is a pretty hard thing to say anything is not possible. Nearly everything is possible. But "probable" is another thing. I am not going to talk on possibilities.

The gentleman on my left (Mr. Creamer) the other day asked me about this word "exigency," and I told him frankly I did not desire to make any promises. I had talked to some of the labor men in this Convention, and how could I stand up before the Convention after talking with those men, trying to get their viewpoint, so as to put it into law, how could I, without talking with them first, stand up and say that I would take out the word "exigency," if I wanted to be honorable toward them? I could not do it. But the laboring men themselves suggested the word to me. The three words they suggested are in there. They did not get all they thought they ought to have, but they are reasonable, they are practical men, they recognize the conditions, they want to cooperate with capital in everything that is proper. Why not get together some time on these things and recognize that the Legislature represents all the people, and if we give them the right to go forward in this matter we can trust them to draw an amendment surrounded with all the safeguards necessary to have an economical and at the same time a fair, liberal distribution of these things when it is necessary to have it done.

I am opposed absolutely to the proposition of putting our citizens in competition, at all times, with State aid or with city aid, or with our other industries. How could you allow a man to go over to the Commonwealth docks and take a piece of the State's land for a nominal sum of money and do the same business as men on Atlantic Avenue who were paying three or four times the rent? You cannot do it. Who could compete successfully under those conditions?

These are times that are hard in many ways. The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) showed you clearly a short time ago how the purchasing power of a dollar has decreased. It is the purchasing power of the dollar that counts,—the law of supply and demand. There may be harder times coming, because while wages are up materials, articles, necessaries, have jumped enormously, too, so that a man cannot save to-day nearly as much as he could with less wages a few years ago.

I trust, Mr. President, that the Convention will take the report of the committee on Form and Phraseology, because I believe they have made it in good faith and they have put it in better form and have incorporated the essential things we need under the present conditions in this Commonwealth to do what is right.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: It would appear from the explanation of the gentleman from Boston in the third division that the report of the committee on Form and Phraseology changes the sense and legal effect of the resolution from what it was as referred to them. That being so,—and I am inclined to think this is the correct view,—I submit that the report is in violation of rule 29, which provides that when any change in the sense or legal effect of an amendment has been made by that committee it shall be reported in the form of an amendment.

Mr. French of Randolph: I was about to make the same point as that suggested by the gentleman from Middleborough. It seemed to me that the committee on Form and Phraseology, if this was an attempt to report back to the Convention a measure which went to them, had exceeded their authority, inasmuch as the change here is clearly one of substance, and of vital substance, particularly in the insertion of the words "public exigency." When the amendment went to the committee it was an emergency measure pure and simple, and I voted for it upon that ground. It has come back to us a socialistic measure pure and simple, because of the fact that it contains the words "public exigency". Now, a "public exigency", as has been suggested over and over again on the floor of this Convention, has been construed to mean, in effect, "public convenience" in the opinion of the Legislature. In other words, there has been taken out of this amendment absolutely everything in it in the nature of an emergency measure, and it has become, under the broad construction repeatedly given to those words by the court, purely a socialistic measure.

Mr. John F. Cusick of Boston offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Cusick: I do not want to take up the time of this Convention by apologizing for my activity in respect to this matter. I simply want to say to you this: That although in a sense I, as counsel, have been conversant with certain merchandising results of certain large distributors in this city and greater Boston, and although I am counsel for some of them, nevertheless I trust you will believe me that when I say I am sincerely interested in this matter simply for the good of the Commonwealth it will be sufficient and I shall not have to repeat it again. Now, I have considered this matter in connection with some other gentlemen very carefully. This amendment is nothing more nor less than putting in different and more concise language the principles involved in the amendment made by the gentleman from Boston and passed by this Convention at its last sitting. The measure is intended to be entirely an emergency measure. This amendment provides only for contingencies which may arise during the time of war, public emergency or public distress. If you delegates will remember, the member from Boston amended his original resolution by adding the word "public", before "emergency", and I assume "distress", so that so far it is exactly the same as the measure moved by the honorable gentleman from Boston. It gives to the Commonwealth and the cities and towns the power first to take by the power of eminent domain. In his resolution it gives the power to take. I simply have extended that and used the words "power of eminent domain", because that is well understood by decisions of our court. Then it gives the right to purchase. That is the same as in the original. It does add the word "distribute". I think it would be implied in the original resolution, but nevertheless the word "distribute" is in this amendment, so that it gives to the Commonwealth, cities and towns, only during time of war, public emergency or public distress, the right first to take by eminent domain, if necessary; secondly, the right to purchase and to sell, and that implies the right to distribute, — what? Food and the necessaries of life. I sincerely agree with the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) that if this resolution is to mean anything it ought to include the necessaries of life. I do not think there is a single thoughtful man in this Convention who will deny the proposition that the Commonwealth, the city or town, should, under conditions determined by the Legislature, have the right at such times to go and take food or necessaries of life wherever they may be, and distribute them for the public good. I do not believe there is a representative of a corporation or anybody else within the hearing of my voice who would deny that primary principle of government.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Boston if chapter 342, section 6, of the legislative Acts of 1917, does not give precisely the same powers that he thinks we ought to have in this constitutional amendment. It gives those powers during times of war. The Governor has that power under that chapter, and, as I understand it, can now exercise that power, as I suppose he can in times of emergency and distress. Times of war are always times of emergency and distress. Therefore the point I wish to make is that the delegate from Boston simply is advocating that we give a constitutional power that is now being exercised.

Mr. Cusick: Times of emergency and distress may include times which are not times of war. I believe this does give to the Commonwealth and the city or town a power which it does not now possess under the Constitution. It makes no difference, however. If it has the power now I am glad of it, and we exercise it. The purpose, however, is to limit the power given to a Legislature or to the Commonwealth or to the city or town to go into trading propositions. That is objectionable, and I believe it is objectionable to a large majority of the delegates to this Convention. And, Mr. President, I want to direct the attention of members of this Convention to this fact: Have we been treated quite frankly in the presentation of this matter by the chairman of the committee on Public Affairs? If you remember, when this matter was first discussed the record will demonstrate that it was the intention of the committee on Public Affairs to give to the Legislature unlimited power to go into these market propositions in normal or abnormal times. He was asked: "Was that the sense of your committee?" and he answered: "It was." I have learned since that it was not the sense of that committee. I do not believe that when thoroughly explained there would be a baker's dozen of the delegates to this Convention who would support a proposition that should give the power to the Legislature to put any such proposition up to the people of this Commonwealth. I believe that the first reading of the original amendment was given under a misapprehension of the meaning of that measure, and I believe the facts will corroborate me.

This amendment is the same thought as was embraced in the resolution passed by this body, stripped of some of its unnecessary verbiage. It is now made so plain that no delegates can feel otherwise than that when voting for this amendment they are voting for something which they all understand, both as to its scope and as to its purpose. This amendment means only one thing. It is not socialistic. The socialists will not support it. It is purely and simply an emergency measure. But it does do one thing, and that is this: An emergency condition may be more than a war condition. When I first spoke about this matter I told you that I felt the Commonwealth should have the power, even if a combination was legal that controlled the price of a food-stuff to the detriment of the public welfare,—I believed the Commonwealth should have some power to check it, and I believe that principle is going so far that every man will feel that this proposition is honest to the people and not for the purpose of furthering socialistic views or political views or any other views. It is an honest measure in the interest of the people, unselfish, and not a subject of any log-rolling or selfish consideration.

Mr. Edward Carr of Hopkinton offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Carr: It was with some astonishment that I heard and observed the complete,—the apparently complete,—change of mind of this Convention, after two readings, of this document,—the resolution recommended by the committee on Public Affairs in this present proposition that is before the Convention. I admit that it was a surprise to me, and it must have been a great surprise to a great part of the 140 members of this Convention who voted to sustain the committee's report up to the second reading. When the gentleman from this division from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) offered his amendment, I not only was surprised but I was very much astonished, because I thought I knew the gentleman from this division better. I supposed at the time of the prior readings he understood the Public Affairs Committee's report and that he was in harmony with their position, and that there were not the limits to the proposition that he has advanced this time. Now, Mr. President, I want to read what this proposition is with my amendment striking out this line, because I am sure every member of this Convention believes that this Commonwealth is under some obligation to look after its inhabitants, even outside of times of war and public exigency, and that is what my amendment means with the objectionable part stricken out. It says:

The maintenance and distribution at reasonable rates of a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and the providing of shelter, are public functions, and it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein to take and provide the same for their inhabitants in such manner as the General Court shall determine.

Is there any member of this Convention who will say that that is not the duty of the Commonwealth? That duty is not confined to the question of whether there is a public exigency or a state of war or a great emergency. Is it not the duty of this Commonwealth to provide for its inhabitants when any group or combination of men get together and attempt, as we have seen done time after time, to impose on the people an exorbitant price for the necessaries of life? And that is all we are asked to say. I am very much surprised at my friends who have changed and taken the other position. I cannot understand it, because every one of the 142 delegates in this Convention who voted for the committee's report must have known the difference between that report and this proposition now. What has taken place in our minds? Does not the same condition exist now that existed when we voted twice on that proposition? Does it not look just as necessary now that we should vote the same way again on that same proposition as we did twice?

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: Is the delegate aware that the committee itself changed its report, on a second report by the same committee, by a vote of ten of the members of the committee?
Why did they change the first report they submitted to this Convention?

Mr. CARR: I cannot understand why the committee made any change, but the change of the committee was not so radical. The chairman of the committee came into this Convention and tried to have document No. 358 sent to a third reading, and it was then that the document of the gentleman from Boston in this division was offered, cutting out the broad powers of cities and towns and turning back completely on the original proposition that the Commonwealth, at all times, should have the power to go into the job of taking care of its inhabitants and providing them with the necessaries of life. I cannot understand, Mr. President, and I should like to have it made clear to me, and I know a number of the delegates in this Convention who would like to have it made clear to them, why it became necessary that this change should be made. Was not everybody in this Convention aware of the difference between the propositions of the men who were opposed to the committee's report and the committee's report itself? We knew then the argument against the committee's report, that it was broader than the proposed amendment, which took care only of emergencies and times of distress. We knew it at that time and voted for it, and it did not matter whether we be called socialists, or anarchists, or what not. The 140 men who voted at that time knew what they were voting for. Is it any more socialistic now than it was at those two times that we voted for it? I cannot see anything that is so terribly socialistic in this proposition that I offer now, namely, that it is the duty of the Commonwealth to provide a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life for its inhabitants. Is this Convention going to put itself on record that that is not the duty of this Commonwealth, and that that duty is limited to times of distress and public exigencies and times of war?

In the State Legislature this year, as the gentleman from Lynn (Mr.
Creamer) has said, we passed a law, evidently intended at that time to be in conformity with the present Constitution, that provides for, exactly the thing that this amendment to the committee's report is attempting to provide for now. In other words, the Legislature of this year thought that there was in the present Constitution sufficient authority to pass this law without any amendment of the Constitution. Now it seems to me we are not making any advance at all. If the 140 men who voted for that proposition realized what they were voting for then, and I think they are entitled to a better explanation than simply to be told that there has been a change of mind in some of the members of the committee, — ten members of the committee, — and their change of mind has not been so complete as the change of mind that has taken place in the gentleman in this division (Mr. Lomasney). I am willing to go the distance and vote for document No. 358. I believe every one of the 140 members who voted for the first proposition is willing to vote for document No. 358. There is a radical difference between document No. 358 and document No. 363. There are not the limitations in No. 358 that there are in No. 363. I have introduced this amendment so that the proposition will be put fairly before this Convention. The people of the Commonwealth will have a right to know whether or not the delegates to this Convention were serious enough in the consideration of their interests to declare that it is the duty of the Commonwealth to take care of its people in all times in regard to supplying them with food-stuffs and the necessaries of life. I hope, Mr. President, that there will be a roll-call on this proposition, and I hope that the 140 men who voted will stick where they voted in the first instance, unless they show some better ground than I have heard for changing their opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Dutch of Winchester offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Dutch: With reference to the remarks of the previous speaker, I do not know whether he has been in attendance or not, but it so happened that on motions to amend which were offered by me the issue was presented to this Convention which he now says he desires to present, and there was a test vote, which most decidedly and overwhelmingly substituted a strictly emergency proposition. Now, the difficulty that we have in this Convention is this: Somehow, through the committee on Form and Phraseology, we have a draft here which leaves some of us in doubt as to whether we now have the emergency proposition which was sent to that committee, and that doubt exists because the word “exigency” has been injected into this resolution. I take it that the change by adding the word “distribution” is not a change of substance, because those of us who favored this emergency proposition contemplated distribution as part of the work. That is not a change. The difficulty has arisen, and it has grown steadily since this word “exigency” was first brought into this matter, as to what it means.

Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman will pardon me, so that there will be no question, I desire to say frankly that I told the labor men that I did not believe the word “exigency” was needed in there. I told them I thought it would raise trouble in the Convention. I pointed out the word “emergency.” But they wanted “exigency” in, and I said I would vote for it, and do what I could for it. Frankly, Mr. President, I do not want any of you to believe that I was trying to put anything over anybody in an underhanded way, because I told the gentlemen representing labor the dangers of the word, just as the gentleman is now telling the Convention.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. Dutch: I am very much obliged to the last speaker for that explanation. It is entirely frank and makes it entirely clear. But I do think we ought to call the attention of the delegates once more to the difficulty with this word which has been brought in here. It was first used as equivalent to “emergency”. The first doubt came when the distinguished delegate in the second division from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) called our attention to the use of the word in Article X of the Constitution, which has been read previously: “Whenever the public exigencies require, that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses”. It was clear from the time that was pointed out, and up to the time that the delegate from Milton (Mr. Bryant) cited a decision of the court actually construing those words “public exigency”, that those words mean nothing more than public convenience. Public convenience! That is what they have been construed to mean. Now, we have got to face that fact. I had no idea of it. I have to confess it. I used them when I first made my motion, following the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). When they pointed out the tenth article I said immediately that there was doubt, and I threw what weight I had for the resolution of the gentleman from ward 5, because he did not have those words in, and the report of the committee under the name of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) did have those words in. The resolution of the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) was adopted overwhelmingly, because it was an emergency proposition.

Now, we have had that test vote, and I believe we want to keep it an emergency proposition. Therefore I have offered this amendment, which changes just that one word. I make no other change whatsoever in this report as agreed upon by the committee on Form and Phraseology and as agreed upon, as it is stated, by the labor men, except to strike out this one word “exigency”, because, so far as we have any idea what it does mean, it does not mean what we want it to mean. It means simply public convenience, and it does not mean emergency. If you put it in and also have the word “emergency” there, you absolutely compel your court to find a different meaning for it, because the court assumes that you put it in there for a purpose. Having the word “emergency” in there, the court must find that you mean something else by the word “exigency”. Therefore I think we ought to put this back where it was, to what the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) said he intended originally, and leave it as otherwise reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. Robert Luce of Waltham offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Luce: When this amendment was printed in the calendar at a previous stage, a gentleman informed me it was the most radical amendment that had yet been offered in this Convention. I was honored with epithets indicating my extreme radicalism, which do not disturb me greatly, and I admit, sir, that this is the most radical form in which this measure can be put. I also charge that in the present form this amendment is not worth our votes. It greatly embarrasses me to be asked to vote for an amendment that, as far as earnest and long study can show me, is not worth the paper upon which it is written, for in my judgment the first half of it does not change existing law and the second half of it is wholly superfluous. When I am asked to send out to the people of this Commonwealth a thing that savors so much of political persiflage, savors so much of an attempt to deceive the people, when they ask for bread and we give them a stone, certainly my position is most embarrassing.

Sir, fourteen years ago I was a member of the Legislature at the time of a great period of emergency and distress, and as a member of that Legislature I joined in asking the Supreme Judicial Court what were its powers. We were told by the court distinctly what were our powers, and the court on that occasion undertook to decide what is an emergency. And there is the meat in this cocoanut. There is the weakness of this draft. There is the futility of it. If you pass this amendment you still leave it for the Supreme Judicial Court to say what is the emergency. There is no question about time of war. We are proceeding already under legislation enacted this last spring, passed in spite of the lack of any such amendment as this. The whole problem is: Who shall at other times say what is an emergency?

About fifty years ago, — to be accurate, in 1860, — the court took the position that while it was its function to declare what is a public use, it was the province of the Legislature to say what is an exigency, — notice the use of the word "exigency", — and so the court for several decades permitted the Legislature to exercise its normal and proper functions. But in 1903 the court usurped, — and I use the word without the slightest disrespect to the court, for I honor its members and I value very highly its opinions, — the court usurped the legislative power. The court said "We will decide when an emergency exists." You may look in its opinion given to the Legislature to which I have referred, and you may find how some of the Justices said an emergency was this sort of a thing, another Justice said an emergency was that sort of a thing, and the court legislated.

Now you are asking me here to share with you in saying what is an emergency. That is a legislative function. It is not the business of a Constitutional Convention. It is not the business of a Supreme Judicial Court. It is the business of the people of this State, acting through their representatives, to say what is an emergency. It is the business of the people of this State, acting through their representatives, to say what is a public use, and the fact that the courts of the land have taken this legislative function, that they have asserted to themselves the right and privilege of sharing with the Legislature in passing laws for the people, has caused much of the trouble through which we have gone in these last few years.

Sir, in spite of all that has been said within these walls against the Legislature, I am proud of the Legislature of Massachusetts. I have the greatest confidence in the uprightness of purpose of its members. I have admiration for the wisdom that has given to us a magnificent code of laws, the model for all the States of the land, and I remember it has come to us under the complete authority John Adams gave when he wrote our Constitution, barring from legislative power only the natural rights of man, barring only the Declaration of Rights we have been discussing. He said, and the Constitutional Convention of 1780 approved his words, and the people of Massachusetts approved his words: "The General Court shall have full power to make all manner of reasonable laws". I do not give all the wording, but the permission was absolute. He trusted the people. The Parliament in all these years has been trusted by the people of England, without limitations. Go to your Blackstone. See how he exhausted language in trying to show the illimitable character of the Parliament of England. That was what John Adams meant to give us, and that was what we lived under until another branch of the government asserted its right to share in legislation.

Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I understand the gentleman to say that, while the Supreme Judicial Court for a number of years has decided that the Legislature might determine when a public exigency existed, in a response to the Legislature fourteen years ago it denied that right. Assuming that the answer of the court warrants the construction which the gentleman puts upon it, which I do not admit, I should like to ask him if he contends that the answer of the court to the Legislature, which is not res adjudicata, overrules the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court in a long line of cases.

Mr. Luce: The history of judicial legislation in this country in the last thirty or forty years would indicate that it was no careless oversight under which the court acted in 1903 when it attempted to tell us what was and what was not an emergency. I recognize that its opinion has not the deliberate character of the decisions to which he refers, but I recognize also that the Legislature, acting under the permission of the proposed amendment, would be under the constant menace of litigation, would never know where it could proceed. Sir, asked by the citizens of my own city, I was a member this last spring of a food production committee, and from the very first day we ran up against uncertainty as to our powers. The city solicitor, the mayor, this and that one, conservative men, who wanted nothing done, said: "That is not constitutional. That is not constitutional. You cannot do it." So we found ourselves constantly hampered because we did not know our powers. I do not want the General Court to authorize the State to go into the hat business. I do not want it to engage in the manufacture of shoes. I do not want it to fix prices. I do not want any one of the hundred other things you may name. I want the Legislature to be able to decide what is best for the common welfare. I do not want the Supreme Judicial Court to decide what is best for the common welfare, and, as was said many years ago, if that be treason make the most of it. [Applause.]

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Waltham what distinction he draws between the phrases "public use" and "public exigency."

Mr. Luce: The courts have had frequent occasion to pass judgment upon the phrase "public use", sometimes changed into "public service." In the case of Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417, the case in 1860 to which I have referred, the Supreme Judicial Court held that the determination of the Legislature is not conclusive that the purpose for which it directs property to be taken is a public use, and by reason of the court's phraseology we are accustomed so to refer to it. In this opinion the court went on to say that if the use is public the opinion of the Legislature is conclusive on the point that a necessity exists which requires the property to be taken. It is because the courts departed from this position in 1903 that it strikes me, sir, that this amendment before you is worthless.
Mr. Creamer: Is it not a fact, Mr. President, that some gentleman read here the other day,—I think it was the delegate from Milton (Mr. Bryant),—that the courts had considered the phrase "in the public exigency" to mean "in the public interest"? Now if that is true does not that leave it this way, that the phrase "in the public exigency," "wherever the public exigency requires," is a legislative question, and the phrase "a public use" is a court question?

Mr. Luce: If the courts had adhered to the position of 1860 my argument would fall to the ground. It is because in 1903 the court undertook to say what sort of an emergency would constitute a public use that I am calling this matter to your attention.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: The gentleman's last statement is extremely important. I wish that he would give to the Convention the advisory opinion to which he has referred. If the members will look at 170 of the manual they will find there in the third paragraph from the end the quotation:

The Legislature are sole and exclusive judges whether the exigency exists which calls on them to exercise their authority to take private property citing the case to which the gentleman has referred and half a dozen others. If those decisions have been shaken it is essential that we know it, and I had not believed that they had. Can the citation be given?

Mr. Luce: Through the courtesy of a fellow-member I am able to give the volume and number. Volume 182, the opinion in the supplement. There you may find that six members of the court classified emergencies into four classes, the possible emergencies under which the State might be authorized to engage in the supply of fuel. They disposed of three of these emergencies by saying that these three did not constitute a public use; that is, the nature of the emergency was examined in order to determine if it was a public use. The fourth one, six of these honorable Justices construed as a kind of emergency which would create a public use, whereupon the seventh member of the court, in a dissenting opinion, said that in his judgment even the fourth line of emergencies did not constitute a public use.

Mr. Dresser: Does not that question fall where, as in this amendment, it states that these things are public uses, public functions, and thus leaves it solely for the Legislature to decide the existence of the emergency or exigency?

Mr. Luce: According to the opinion in this volume to which I referred you, if it were assumed this coming winter by the Legislature that a public emergency or exigency existed calling for the purchase of coal in order to supply the freezing people of this State, it would be open, under this opinion, for the Supreme Judicial Court to say such a state of affairs did not constitute an emergency. Therefore it would be possible for the man who objected to such use of the public funds to go to the court at any time and, citing that opinion as a precedent, to secure a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court that a state of affairs did not exist warranting the application of the amendment in question.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: Will the gentleman read the kind of emergency which the Supreme Judicial Court said might be a public use, and then I will ask him if the amendment appearing in doc. No.
363 is passed would not that meet the objection of the Supreme Judicial Court, and could not they make the measure applicable to the decision?

Mr. Luce: The gentleman, I think, fails to get my point. No. 363 does not define what is an exigency or what is an emergency. The definition of what is an exigency or what is an emergency would be undertaken by the Supreme Judicial Court as was done in 1903 in the matter of which the gentleman inquires. Now I would suggest one of these problems. The Supreme Judicial Court undertook to say whether if the people were freezing the State or the city or town might furnish fuel, and some of the Justices thought that if perchance the scarcity of coal made it more expensive to maintain the paupers of the State, then the furnishing of fuel might be construed as a public function.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: May I make a short statement with the consent of the gentleman speaking? I think we are getting rather confused here between two legal terms that have received definition by our Supreme Judicial Court; I mean the term "public exigency" and the term "public use". They are entirely different terms, they are not synonymous in any way and they are treated by our court entirely differently. The term "public use" can be expressed in a very few words. It means simply that the Legislature cannot take A's money and give it to B. The Legislature cannot take money from the State and give it out for what is not a public purpose but for what is simply a private purpose. That is obvious, it seems to me. You ought not to be able to take A's money and give it to B. You ought not to be able, except in case of emergency or some such situation, to tax the whole people of the State for my benefit or that of some other individual. You ought to be able to use the public money collected by taxation for public purposes only. That is one of the foundations of our whole Constitution. Now take the phrase "public exigency." Once having established that the general purpose in mind is a public purpose, that you are appropriating taxation money for what would be considered to be a public purpose, — for instance, for a State police or for anything that properly affects the public and does not affect any particular group of the public or any individual, — once having established that, then it is for the Legislature to say whether it is for the benefit of the public so to spend the money; and that is the distinction between the words "public use" and "public exigency." That is why the court decides whether the use is public and the Legislature decides whether, assuming that the use is public, the exigency exists by which the public would be benefited. I submit that is a statement of our present law and ask the gentleman whether his amendment which he now presents, to make the Legislature determine what is a public use, would not go far beyond the present amendment and allow the Legislature to appropriate public funds for private purposes.

Mr. Luce: Undoubtedly it would; and that is the reason why I have no overweening confidence that it will win a unanimous vote from this body. Undoubtedly it would, but it seemed to me that before we gave to the people an amendment which strikes me as of so little value, this Convention ought to know and the records ought to show we realized that we still were leaving it to the Supreme Judicial Court to legislate for the people of Massachusetts by determining when an emergency exists.
Mr. James J. Brennan of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham in the first division if, according to his own argument and answering the gentleman from Milton, who has just taken his seat, he will agree to strike out, in Convention document 363, line 4 entirely, and the last part of the word “distress” in line five, so as to leave out the fourth line of that resolution entirely, including the whole of the word “distress”.

Mr. Luce: I do not think that even then the resolution would be a fitting one for me to pass judgment upon. I do not conceive it to be my duty here to decide whether dealing in foods or dealing in hay or dealing in boots and shoes or vessels or anything else is a wise thing. What I tried to point out is that from my personal conception, perhaps I am alone in that opinion, — it is the duty of the Legislature to decide those things, and not the duty of the Constitutional Convention; that the duty of the Constitutional Convention is to say how much power the Legislature shall have. Build the framework of Government on broad lines, and not by minute details undertake here to anticipate the action of the gentlemen who ordinarily sit within the walls of this chamber.

Mr. French of Randolph: I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not tolerably clear from the language of the court which he has read that it was not the word “emergency” that the court was undertaking to construe, but the words “public use”.

Mr. Luce: My reading of this opinion is quite to the contrary, — that throughout the emphasis is laid upon the question whether an emergency did exist.

Mr. French: It seemed to me rather that it was whether it was such an emergency with respect to a public use.

Mr. Luce: The opinion in effect says the court cannot tell whether it is a public use or not until the court has ascertained whether that emergency exists which would create the public use. The nature of the emergency is a condition precedent to the determination of the other question. The court held it in this opinion to be within its power to determine what sort of an emergency there was.

Mr. French: As I understood, the court admitted the emergency but declined to say that it was for a public use.

Mr. Luce: The court said that three kinds of emergency were not such as to create a public use. Six of them said that a fourth kind of emergency was such that it might create a public use. The seventh man said in effect that no kind of emergency in the matter of coal would create a public use.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: Suppose, sir, this proposed amendment had been part of the Constitution when the question was put up to the Supreme Judicial Court, have you any doubt whatever that the court’s decision would have been the opposite of what it was and they would have said that the proposed legislation would be valid?

Mr. Luce: The courts continually look back into past centuries to determine what is the law for to-day. They try to measure the Massachusetts of to-day by the conditions of Massachusetts a hundred years ago. They say that what was then customary and useful and a public use, is the yardstick we should use to-day to determine what is customary and for the public welfare. And my criticism, sir, is aimed at the point that the courts have their eyes looking backward and not forward.
NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

Mr. Clapp: The gentleman started his argument by saying he objected to the proposed amendment because the first portion of it did not change substantially or change at all the existing law. Now he has to admit that had that been a part of the Constitution in 1903 when the Legislature sought to enact this legislation which labor wanted, the law would have been valid,—that the legislation would have been possible. I say, therefore, that this shows that the first part of this resolution does amount to something.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I ask pardon; I did not catch the point. I did not want to interrupt; I wanted to ask what were the four points? Will he enumerate the matters specifically? What were they?

Mr. Luce: The court said the first of them did not call for legislation. The general subject of this decision is the power of the General Court to permit the Commonwealth or its municipalities to establish and maintain fuel and coal yards for the purpose of selling coal, wood or other fuel generally. Now the first question they dismissed as requiring no reply, virtually; the second, much to the same effect. The third question is what I think will meet the gentleman's contention.

Mr. MancoVitz of Boston: May I ask the gentleman if, in line 10, were inserted the words "the General Court shall be the sole judge of what a public emergency" etc., "is"—would he then contend that the Supreme Judicial Court had the power to declare what is and what is not an emergency?

Mr. Luce: The purpose of the words suggested by the gentleman is entirely within my approval. Whether they would meet the object or not would be too much for any man offhand to undertake to say. What I am seeking is that such purpose shall not be restricted here to a measure requiring us to determine what is for the public welfare, but shall be so phrased that the Legislature shall determine what is for the public welfare.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham, simply for the purpose of clearing up this very complicated but extremely interesting situation, whether this is not the case: That the brief but very broad and inclusive language of his proposed amendment would enable the General Court to do everything which the original report of the committee on Public Affairs proposed to authorize it to do, everything which the amendment now reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology authorizes the Legislature to do, and also a great deal more?

Mr. Luce: The gentleman from Boston states the case accurately.

Mr. Arthur H. Lowe of Fitchburg offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Lowe: I do not think it is necessary for me to take any time to argue the reasonableness of this amendment. Every one will see readily that it would be necessary to have the necessaries of life in order to distribute them and sell them. Consequently it seems to me that it is necessary only that the State should have the authority to produce.

Mr. Collins of Amesbury: I do not propose at this time or any other time to discuss the merits or demerits of this resolution. My purpose, sir, in securing the floor at this time, is to try to gather some information which will enable me to vote in an understanding manner at least upon this proposition. I would be thankful if any member of this Convention, — and I am going to assume that an unfortunate condition exists, — if any member of this Convention can show me how any resolution, either like this or any measure unlike it, how anything that the Legislature of Massachusetts may enact into law with a permit of this Constitutional Convention, if you please, to allow it, — anything which they may pass — will benefit the conditions which we assume are now in Massachusetts or soon may exist. Or in other words, what can the Commonwealth of Massachusetts do toward controlling the production of coal in Pennsylvania or the raising of potatoes in Maine or the gathering of wool in Ohio or the raising of beef in the western States? We have nothing to do with them. The proposition as I understand it here to-day is that this will reduce the price. Sir, Massachusetts long since has ceased to be, if ever it was, an agricultural proposition. Agriculture has been practically eliminated from Massachusetts. We have seen a great deal of those who could tell the farmer something about his business, something about how he could produce this, that and the other, but eventually they have been put into the discard. Your milk production in Massachusetts to-day, which is one of the vital factors, one of our absolutely essential factors necessary for the propagation of human life, has been eliminated to the extent that only 30 per cent of your milk consumed in Massachusetts to-day is produced in Massachusetts. What has become of the rest of it? Too many men who know more about other people’s business than they do about their own have undertaken to lead the procession, and where the blind lead the blind, sir, the whole outfit is headed for the ditch, and that is where they landed.

Now I am an earnest seeker after knowledge and I want some man to tell me why, if this goes through, it is not a club, if you please. Some people call it a deterrent, but if it is not a club held over the innocent middlemen, what is it? I am not a middleman and I have no friend who is in the retail business, but I know, sir, the innocent man upon whom this thing will fall is the man who has hard work to keep his credit at the local bank. Is that the man you are after?

What I want to know is how this proposition is anything else than a sop; how it is worth the paper that it is printed on. Why, we have to-day upon the statute-books absolutely this same proposition. Now let us be fair about it. If you want to put the Commonwealth of Massachusetts into a wide-open socialist proposition, so that everybody can do everybody else’s business and make a job for practically every man who has not one, let us be fair and say so. But if you want to do something to benefit the proposition, then take heed to what Mr. Hoover says. He says we cannot touch the beef proposition. Mr. James J. Storrow says we cannot touch the fuel proposition. You are lucky if you get coal at any price. Mr. Garfield says we cannot touch the flour proposition. Well, Mr. President, what proposition can we touch? Is it anything but a political subterfuge? Is there any man here who believes that this resolution means anything but something to go out to fool and to befuddle the dear people who pay half a million dollars for five months’ service, — if it is service, — of this select Convention; not the ordinary Legislature, — Oh, no! Oh, no! — but a Convention, sir, of which a quarter part, provided by this incompetent Legislature, should be good, bright, brainy, brilliant men, and they are. Now what have we accomplished and what are we seeking to accomplish here? I shall be thankful if any man in this Convention will tell me honestly and earnestly and squarely what there is in this resolution or anything that looks like it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Lawrence: I do not rise to answer the question of the gentleman from Amesbury. If he had been in his seat listening instead of out in the lobby talking during many of the days past when this matter has been under discussion, he would be able to see at least some merit in the resolution that is now before us. Let me add that we are all glad that the gentleman has transferred the scene of his discussions from the smoking-room to the floor of the Convention.

What I purpose to discuss is the rather startling statement that has been made by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce). It has been our usual experience that whenever he contributes toward a matter under discussion, he clears the air. But this afternoon he has contended for an interpretation of a decision, or rather of an advisory opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court, which, in my opinion, is not justified. The tenth article of the Bill of Rights provides that "whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor." Under this article there have been two distinct lines of decisions, one with reference to the words "public exigencies," and the other concerning the words "public uses." As has been pointed out by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), the Supreme Judicial Court in many cases has decided that the Legislature is the supreme and only judge of whether a public exigency exists. On the other hand, the court frequently has undertaken to define what is and what is not a public use. In the remarks supporting his amendment the gentleman from Waltham says that in its answer to the Legislature which appears in volume 182 of our reports, the Supreme Judicial Court has substantially overruled its decisions in the prior cases, and has taken upon itself the right to say in each case whether the Legislature is justified in its determination that a public exigency exists. If the contention of the gentleman were supported by the facts, we would have here a gross case of what is called judicial legislation and the castigation which the gentleman has given the court perhaps would be deserved. But let us see what the facts are.

The court was asked to answer four specific questions. The first was: "Is it within the constitutional power of the Legislature to enact a law conferring upon a city or town within this Commonwealth the power to purchase coal and wood as fuel, in excess of its ordinary requirements, for the purpose of selling such excess, so purchased, generally to its inhabitants or others (1) at cost, (2) at less than cost or (3) at a profit?"

The second was whether the Legislature might authorize a city or town "to purchase for the purpose of sale generally and to sell generally to its inhabitants or others . . . coal and wood as fuel."

In the third the court was asked whether the Legislature might authorize cities and towns to establish and maintain coal and wood yards for the above purposes. The fourth question was: "If the answer to any of the foregoing questions be in the negative, does the power so declared as non-existent exist in the case of an extraordinary emergency, and may the different cities and towns be constituted judges of said emergency?"

The Supreme Judicial Court answered the first three questions in the negative. Their answer to the fourth question was also in the negative, with the slight qualification that in case of an anticipated possible famine the power suggested might be given.

An examination of the opinion shows that the court was not concerned with the interpretation of the words “public exigencies.” Let me quote:

It is established that under our Constitution private property cannot be taken from its owner except for a public use. This is equally true whether the property is a dwelling-house taken by right of eminent domain, or money demanded by the tax collector. The establishment of a business like the buying and selling of fuel requires the expenditure of money. If this is done by an agency of the government there is no way to obtain the money except by taxation. Money cannot be raised by taxation except for a public use.

This opinion is in complete harmony with the previous decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court, the doctrine of which is summed up in Miller v. Fitchburg, 180 Mass. 32, at p. 37, as follows:

It cannot be questioned that it is for the Legislature to decide whether a public exigency or necessity exists, . . . although it is for the court to determine whether the use is or is not a public one.

We have then an opinion from the Supreme Judicial Court that the Legislature cannot authorize cities and towns to sell coal and wood or to establish coal and wood yards, because that is not a public use. For that reason,—because of that want of power in the Legislature,—the demand has sprung up for a constitutional amendment such as that before us, providing that the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein, during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress, may take and provide a sufficient supply of food and other common necessaries of life, and to furnish shelter. It is suggested by the gentleman from Waltham that, instead of adopting that amendment, we should adopt an amendment providing that the Legislature should determine what is a public use. He says this amendment is futile. Whether or not this is futile, his is dangerous. It leaves matters in the control of the Legislature which are not contemplated by this Convention. This resolution refers to the providing of fuel and food and shelter and other necessaries of life. It says so in unmistakable terms. If, as he suggests, the Legislature be authorized to declare in any case what is a public use, the power thus acquired may sometime be used to justify an authority in the Legislature which is not contemplated by this Convention. No man could feel secure in the possession of private property. If we increase the power of the Legislature, let us restrict it to the objects we have in view. Let us not by too wide a grant give opportunity for oppression and tyranny.

Mr. George F. Willett of Norwood offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. WILLETT: My reason for offering this amendment is that the policy of the Commonwealth may be clearly defined as against the policy of socialism. It is possible that we may be deterred from taking action here which we otherwise would take, unless a conservative policy in this connection is clearly defined, and I hope that this declaration may be accepted to precede the amendment as drawn and offered in this reso-lation No. 363.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware moved the previous question.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I hope the gentleman will not press his motion at this particular time. I have sent an amendment to the Secretary's desk which I hope may overcome the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from Waltham. I for one do not wish to see our Supreme Judicial Court legislating on matters of this kind, and if this Convention, by a short delay, can obviate and overcome the difficulties suggested, then I think it is our duty to clear the situation and I hope the previous question will not prevail.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I believe that the amendment which has been introduced by the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Luce) is by all means, by all odds, the most important measure which has been in-trouced in this Convention. I submit that to close the debate now would be an absolute wrong to our constituents, and I trust that no such effort will be made until the whole subject has been examined.
There has been only a very small part of it touched upon as yet.

The discussion of the resolution was resumed Thursday, October 11.

Mr. Merriam of Framingham: On this proposition, as I understand it, a motion has been made for the previous question. I sincerely hope that this motion will not prevail. In the discussion yesterday certain matters were mentioned which seemed to me of such vital importance as to require further argument before the vote is taken upon them. I refer particularly to the remarks made by the delegate from Waltham (Mr. Luce) relating to the power of the courts and seeking to restrict the power of the courts in determining what is a public use. This question has hardly been scratched beneath the surface. It is fundamental in its character and should receive the serious consideration not only of the lawyers of this Convention but of every delegate. I believe, much as I respect his ability and his motive, his purpose in this matter, that the delegate from Waltham has utterly misstated the power of the court in this important particular. As I read the decisions of our court there is in this case simply the perfectly logical effort to discriminate and distinguish between what are essentially questions of fact and what are and must be questions of law. In this particular it is the function of the courts to determine matters that are matters of law and to permit the Legislature or the town-meeting or the city council, as the case may be, to determine questions of fact. If my construction is true, this power of the courts should be maintained. I particularly regretted to hear the gentleman from Waltham refer to the courts as bodies sitting looking backward. That, Mr. President, is an unfair criticism of the position of the courts of Massachusetts. In certain particulars, where the courts deal with vested rights and seek to determine definitions of words and phrases, they must of necessity look backward. But there is one important particular, and no one knows it better than the gentleman from Waltham himself, where the courts distinctly look forward. I refer to the power of the courts in the construction of statutes. It was the purpose of the gentleman from Waltham early in this Convention to ask that the debates of this Convention be taken NECESSARIES OF LIFE.

verbatim so that the courts in construing our work could see what was in mind, what the Convention had in mind, in passing this or that amendment.

Mr. CREED of Boston: I sincerely trust that the previous question will not be ordered. Thinking over the speech of the gentleman from Waltham which already has been alluded to by the gentleman from Framingham, I, like every other member of the Convention who gives great weight and respect to his opinions, marvel, at what he said, that this amendment which was offered by my friend from ward 5 of Boston (Mr. Lomasney) is valueless, that the first part is of no value and the last part is superfluous; that the resolution regarding which we changed our position is in fact as if it were not. Now I should like to have that debated in the Convention and clear my mind as to whether or not it is of any value, because my own position on the matter, Mr. President, is this: I am opposed to the Commonwealth becoming a socialistic State; I am opposed to the Commonwealth becoming a trading corporation. Any man who is interested in a banking institution or knows anything about the methods of a bank knows that no director of a bank, who holds that fiduciary relationship to the depositors in the bank, will vote money to any retailer or middleman if he knows that the Legislature has the power to wipe out his business. He can borrow money now on unsecured notes if he has the good-will of a going concern, a good location, is honest and industrious and the bank directors have confidence in his integrity. But if this amendment went through to make the State a trading corporation, the result would be that they would want collateral or other security or endorsers with strong financial responsibility. So I am opposed to going to that extreme.

On the other hand, Mr. President, it seems to me that we should consider carefully the question raised by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Theller), who unfortunately is away this week on a leave of absence by order of the Convention, that we should not wait until an abrupt, sudden emergency is aroused by something that occurs in this Commonwealth, — that when we see the storm coming on the horizon we should be prepared to anticipate anything that would hurt the entire people of the Commonwealth. And so, Mr. President, as I am here trying to legislate for the best interests of the Commonwealth, I hope that the previous question will not be ordered and we will have this matter cleared up and we shall find if the weighty opinion of the gentleman from Waltham is correct and that the amendment which we voted for is defective, or whether my friend from ward 5 can answer the gentleman from Waltham and show that it is of value.

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I rise to express my entire concurrence with what has been said by the gentleman last up (Mr. Creed) and my earnest hope that the previous question will not be ordered at this stage on this most important measure, nor until the Convention can act upon it knowing what it is about. At the present time that would be impossible.

Mr. SAWYER of Ware: I should like to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that a vote for the previous question now is a vote whether or not we shall put on the ballot this fall the amendment relating to the food question. If you vote down the previous question the matter goes over; it probably cannot go on the ballot. If you sustain the previous question it is possible that the matter will be engrossed to-day, come back to us this afternoon and be ordered on the ballot this fall. When we first entered the war Governor McCall sent a message to the Legislature showing the urgency of some dealing with the food situation. The Legislature found that, under the present situation, it could not deal satisfactorily with the situation. It was hoped sincerely by the friends of labor and by others who were interested in patriotic motives for our State that this Convention would pass to a ballot this fall some amendments to the Constitution that would enable the next Legislature to deal with the food situation.

On a rising vote the motion for the previous question was negatived, 73 voting in the affirmative and 100 in the negative.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I am very much interested in the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Sawyer of Ware) who says that the Legislature was not sufficient to deal with this momentous question. We were told the other day by our friend from Newton (Mr. Anderson) that he should feel that it was criminal neglect if we should fail to put this proposition on the ballot. I have before me an extract from an address delivered by one of the distinguished lawyers of Massachusetts and a man who represents the people, and that is Frederick W. Mansfield, at Hudson last evening, and I want to quote for the relief of the gentleman from Newton and also the gentleman from Ware his remarks:

Since May 25, 1917, the Governor has had more power to keep down the high cost of living and regulate the prices of food, clothing, shelter and other necessaries of life than any emperor or ruler ever had. On that day chapter 342 of the Acts and Resolves was approved by himself, and it gives him the power to investigate the holding of food in cold storage warehouses, the supplying of coal, food, clothing and materials for shelter. It gives him power to seize any and all of these articles if he deems it necessary, to seize railroad cars, locomotives, motor trucks, trolley-cars, steamboats, railroad lines and wharf property for the purpose of distributing such necessaries of life to the people. It gives him power to regulate prices and fix the maximum charges for which the necessaries of life shall be sold. It gives him more power than Mr. Hoover or Mr. Garfield have at the present time.

Now that act passed the Legislature last year and I presume the gentleman from Ware, who represents the people, voted for it; and yet he stands up here and says that the Legislature of Massachusetts cannot deal with these emergency situations.

Mr. Sawyer: Stating my position as a member of the Legislature, we in the Legislature were guided by the opinion of the Attorney-General of the State, which is directly contrary to the statement that the gentleman from Haverhill has just been reading. The question as to who is the better interpreter of the Constitution, Mr. Mansfield or Mr. Attwill, is a matter for the people themselves to judge.

Mr. George: I called up the Attorney-General this morning and I asked him if he saw chapter 342, entitled: "An Act to provide for the better defence of the Commonwealth in time of war," and he told me he had seen it, and that while he had not given a written opinion he had given an offhand opinion that he thought it was constitutional and perfectly proper in time of war. Now, then, inasmuch as we are in war and probably will be for some time to come, there is no difficulty about the situation of to-day, not the slightest. So that if anybody thinks or has been lying awake nights thinking that he has got to get this amendment through at this moment and put it on the ballot at this election rather than to wait till April or some other time, why, he has been losing his sleep for nothing.

Mr. Sawyer: When the Attorney-General gave his opinion to the legislative committee last winter he entered into it a little more fully than he evidently did on the phone this morning. He did state in substance, as the gentleman has said, that the Governor, as a war power, could do this, but he said that it would be the next thing to martial law, and he did not think he could do it except under occasion of great emergency. The thing that the Legislature desired was that there might be something for relief without going to this extreme.

Mr. George: The subject-matter referred to by the gentleman from Ware is another proposition. He has got the babies mixed. That was a political measure that was discussed at that time. When you come to discuss a political question and a question relating to the war, of course it has an entirely different bearing. Now this is a war measure and the Attorney-General, while I was not authorized to say this, said over the phone that the Governor and Council could do almost anything in the time of war for the defence of the Commonwealth or for the benefit of the people resulting from the war. Now that is what we are dealing with,—this time of war. Now section 6 of this Act that Mr. Mansfield, the gentleman's leader, refers to, is very interesting:

Section 6. Whenever the Governor shall believe it necessary or expedient for the purpose of better securing the public safety or the defence or welfare of the Commonwealth, he may with the approval of the Council take possession: (a) Of any land or buildings, machinery or equipment. (b) Of any horses, vehicles, motor vehicles, aëroplanes, ships, boats, or any other means of conveyance, rolling-stock of steam or electric railways or of street railways. (c) Of any cattle, poultry and any provisions for man or beast, and any fuel, gasoline or other means of propulsion which may be necessary or convenient for the use of the military or naval forces of the Commonwealth or of the United States, or for the better protection or welfare of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants. He may use and employ all property so taken possession of for the service of the Commonwealth or of the United States, for such times and in such manner as he shall deem for the interests of the Commonwealth or its inhabitants, and may in particular, when in his opinion public exigency requires, sell or distribute gratuitously to or among any or all of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth anything taken under clause (c) of this section and may fix minimum and maximum prices therefor. He shall, with the approval of the Council, award reasonable compensation to the owners of any property of which he may take possession under the provisions of this section and for its use, and for any injury thereto or destruction thereof caused by such use.

Now, Mr. President, I am in favor of the proposition that was introduced as an amendment by the gentleman from Boston the other day. I am not in favor of the Dutch amendment to strike out the word "exigency", because I believe that the Governor and Council, in times of emergency and distress, should have the same right to do things that they can do now in time of war. Now that is all that anybody wants except the Socialists; because we understand the first proposition to come in here was to inject the Socialist program, that is, that the government, the Commonwealth, the cities and towns, could go into business promiscuously wherever and whenever they could get a city council to vote so to do.

By a vote of 147 to 82, on a call of the yeas and nays, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until the next matter in the Orders of the Day had been disposed of.
Subsequently, at the same session of the Convention, debate was resumed.

Mr. Clarence W. Hobbs, Jr., of Worcester offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Hobbs: It is with some diffidence that I call the attention of the Convention away from our dearly loved struggle with the anti-sectarian amendment to the consideration of this amendment relative to food. This proposal to amend the Constitution has had a very stormy passage in this Convention. At the last stage the Convention took an extremely pronounced action, adopting a proposition that in many respects was entirely different from the one which the committee had reported. That that proposition must have had some merit is unquestionable if we consider only the fact of the many and varied bedfellows that it succeeded in bringing under the same counter-pane. When a proposition commands at the same time the support of the radicals and of the conservatives, then that proposition must possess some extraordinary virtue. I am driven to believe that the two sides did not support it for the same reason. The conservatives unquestionably supported it because they knew that it meant little or nothing; the radicals supported it because they thought it meant a good deal. Both of those propositions cannot of course be true. From the best information that I have been able to gather, and I have consulted a number of the eminent legal minds of this Convention, the resolution which the Convention adopted at its last session accomplished little or nothing more than a restatement of the present law. One lawyer—even gave it as his opinion that it might go so far as to narrow the present law.

The opinions of the Justices never have gone to the extent that in a time of great emergency the Legislature could not take such action as would replace the breaking down of the ordinary methods of supplying the necessities of life. Therefore the amendment which the Convention adopted at its last session does this much: It modifies to some extent the rule laid down in the case of Lowell vs. Boston, at the time of the Boston fire, that the Commonwealth could not authorize cities and towns to borrow money which was to be repaid by funds raised by taxation to provide shelter for persons who had been burned out by some great conflagration. That rule the amendment probably, in some sort, would modify. It doubtless would furnish constitutional warrant for the emergency relief measures that were undertaken in the Salem and Chelsea fires; it doubtless would furnish constitutional warrant for the emergency war legislation, and in both those cases it is very doubtful if constitutional warrant is needed. That is all it would do. Therefore the support that this proposition at once received from those who really do not desire anything at all of any consequence to be done is not surprising. Nor is it surprising that the other side at once have set about trying to open it up further.

This proposition has been amended, and has been the subject of a number of amendments which have been moved. I think perhaps it might be as well to start with a consideration of those amendments and see what they accomplish. Of course the proposition is in the hands of the Convention. They can build upon the foundation of the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney), or they can go to one of the substitute resolutions that have been offered.
I was of the opinion at one time, and some members of the committee were of the opinion, that something drafted along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Boston might be the proper solution of this question. The committee decided ultimately on a different proposition, and it is in order that something along the original lines which the committee suggested should be before the Convention as an alternative, and also at the desire of the chairman of the committee, that I have moved the amendment which has just been read and which I shall discuss a little later.

Amendments have been offered to the resolution as moved by the committee on Form and Phraseology. The first one, moved by the gentleman from Norwood (Mr. Willett), is a preamble which adds nothing and I think takes away nothing from the report. As to whether the Convention is prepared to endorse so broad a general statement as that the material welfare of the people depends upon fostering all the industries and enterprises of the people, is something of a question, but I presume that what he would have said should have been all proper industries and enterprises of the people. At all events the preamble will add nothing and take away nothing from the substance of the resolution. The only objection I have to it is that it probably is superfluous.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Fitchburg (Mr. Lowe), to insert the word "production," I should object to that on the ground on which I objected to similar language being inserted in the committee's report, namely, on the ground that the committee have endeavored to deal with that matter in another resolution, and that to spread the scope of the resolution too broad tends needlessly to diffuse the issue.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur), to insert after the word "maintenance," the word "preservation," that probably is not an objectionable change. Inasmuch, however, as the resolution offered by the committee on Form and Phraseology is pretty broad in its language, using the words "to provide," it probably, by implication, is broad enough to cover that amendment.

The amendment moved by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) and the amendment moved by the gentleman from Hopkinton (Mr. Carr) are amendments that illustrate diametrically opposite views. The former seeks to keep it in the form in which the gentleman from Boston originally moved it, that is to say, a proposition that means little or nothing. The amendment of the gentleman from Hopkinton seeks to open it wide, so that in effect it authorizes the Legislature to do anything and everything. The scope that the Convention desires to give it will be indicated amply by its votes on these amendments. If it is desired to keep it little, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchester is the one to adopt. If it desires to open it a little further, the present form of the resolution is the one to adopt, and if it desires to open it so that it is as broad as the heavens, the amendment of the gentleman from Hopkinton is the one to adopt.

As to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Balch), I think they have really the same tendency, except that they give the Legislature specific authority to declare that war or public emergency exists, but by striking out the word "exigency," it retains the scope to the same extent practically as it was when it left the hands of the gentleman from Boston.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in this division (Mr. Quincy), the purport of that is the same as the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the first division, that is, to give the Legislature the power to determine what are public functions and what are public emergencies. That again opens the proposition out.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Greenfield (Mr. McClaud), I understand that he is to speak on this matter and I think that he probably will explain his own amendment.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Clark), — adding at the end: "The Legislature may, during times of war, emergency, distress or public exigency, provide for control and regulation of the distribution, storage and sale of food and other common necessaries of life", — probably is unnecessary, because I think all of that is covered by the words "to provide", contained in the amendment as presented by the committee on Form and Phraseology and in the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney).

Now as to the substitute amendments of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) and the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Cusick) which are printed in the calendar. The one offered by the gentleman from Wellesley is in large measure a restatement of the same proposition as that offered by the committee on Form and Phraseology. It omits the declaration of a legislative duty, and it substitutes for it an enabling provision. The two propositions are probably not greatly different except in psychological effect upon the Legislature. A legislative duty means very little. The constitutional declaration that it is the duty of all men to worship the Creator at stated periods is not a proposition that the Legislature ever has undertaken religiously to enforce. And in the same way I do not think that a great difference is made by stating this as a power or by stating it as a duty, except as that may influence the Legislature to action.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Cusick), the result of that amendment is very like that of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch), that is, to strike out the words "public exigency".

Now I come to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), which is to replace the amendment by this language: "The General Court may determine what is a public use". That proposition is so much wider than anything the committee considered that it is with great difficulty that I can explain to the Convention its precise relation, except that its scope is so magnificent that it covers nearly the entire area of State government, and, as compared with the resolution offered by the committee, the relative dimensions are as those of a drop of water to the Atlantic Ocean. It gives the Legislature power to define what is a public use. Thereby the Legislature is invested with complete power to use its discretion in all acts coming under the great power of eminent domain and the great police power. It removes absolutely all restraint of the courts, and leaves in the Constitution, as limits on legislative activity, merely such limitations as are provided expressly in the Bill of Rights elsewhere and in the limits that are provided for the exercise of the power of taxation. It is a far broader power than I had conceived this Convention was apt to extend, and when I survey the magnificent scope of this amendment and the time that this Convention has spent in debating the difference between "emergency" and "public exigency" it is very hard for me to believe that the Convention is prepared to go to that extent. If that is adopted there can be no question as to the State's power to do everything that the amendment as reported by the committee or the committee on Form and Phraseology contemplates, there is no question as to the power of the Legislature to do everything that should be done under the amendment as reported by the committee,—and a great deal more besides. If socialism possibly can be established by a constitutional grant of power you need nothing more than is contained in that article to allow the Legislature to set up a socialistic State, because it can take every piece of property in the State, paying compensation therefor, and nobody could challenge the right of the State to take it; it can raise money by taxation, if it wishes, for the State to go into any sort of business that it chooses, not the few businesses that are contemplated by the article which we have introduced, and with that magnificent power it hardly can be thought that any further amendments dealing with the power of the Legislature really would be needed. If I heard aright the argument of the gentleman from Waltham, his idea is to establish in this Commonwealth a government founded upon the government of England, that is to say, a legislative government founded upon the parliamentary government of England. It is questionable whether that is an experiment that is apt to meet with the approval of this Convention. I still am of the opinion that our system of a written Constitution, of limitation of powers and of checks and balances, is after all a proposition that has some merit, and not a thing that should be discarded with such rashness as this article of amendment would accomplish.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: I merely desire to ask the gentleman at this point, in order to have the whole truth laid before the Convention, whether it is not also the fact, speaking generally, that all of the governments of the countries of continental Europe to-day enjoy and can exercise, at their discretion, the same powers which the amendment of the gentleman from Waltham would give to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. Hobbs: I do not feel competent to speak for all of the governments of Europe. Some of them have established governments very much on the English model, but I think that many of them have restrictions and are not at liberty to amend their Constitution without authority from the sovereign. I am speaking now in very general terms, because Europe is a fairly large place and comprehends many governments; but there are a number of the governments of Europe that have Constitutions framed on the English model, the theory of the English model being the preeminence of the legislative power and a combination of the legislative with the executive power.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I wanted to be quite sure whether I understood the gentleman correctly, stating that the adoption of the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Waltham now in the Chair (Mr. Luce) would operate as an extension of the police power. Undoubtedly it would operate as an extension of the power of eminent domain to any field that the Legislature determined to be a public use, but how would it affect the extent and nature of the police power?

Mr. Hobbs: I had supposed that the police power as granted in the Constitution was already quite sufficiently broad. I do not remember the exact language in which it is framed, but if I mistake not the only limitation on the police power is that it may be exercised in a reasonable manner.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: Will the gentleman be so kind as to point out to me where in the Constitution the police power is granted to anybody?

Mr. Hobbs: I have not a copy of the Constitution.

Mr. Cusick of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not consider that the police power is a common law doctrine.

Mr. Hobbs: It always is somewhat doubtful in speaking of constitutional questions as to how far we have a common law Constitution. Unquestionably some of the powers of government were recognized at common law, and undoubtedly the common law contained some cases bearing on the extent of the police power before the adoption of a written Constitution. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Quincy, part 2, chapter 1, section 1, article 44 of the Constitution I think is the section which generally is regarded as being the grant of the police power:

And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time, to make, ordain, and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defence of the government thereof.

I think that is the grant of the police power, so called, that is contained in the Constitution.

Mr. Adams: Was not referring the police power to that section an afterthought? As I remember it, the whole principle of the police power was originated in New York,—in the case of the Brick Presbyterian Church, if I remember right, versus The Mayor of New York,—was it not? I think so; decided in 1826.

Mr. Hobbs: I fear that I am unable to give the gentleman the information he desires, because he is quoting from circumstances beyond my knowledge.

Mr. Adams: It is a very interesting question, and I believe has been very maturely discussed, and I think it came up in the Dartmouth College decision and more especially in the Charles River bridge case. My impression is that the opinion therein is long and exhaustive, and the Chief Justice then settled the whole thing for all time.

Mr. Hobbs: I think that it has been usual to refer to the police power as one of the great powers of government, and that section is the section under which the Commonwealth exercises what is commonly known as the police power. The gentleman from Quincy has taken me into fields where my feeble wing is unable to flutter, and therefore I think perhaps I might leave that question, with an attitude of due humility, I might add, and go on to a discussion of the proposition which I have introduced myself.

The proposition that I have moved is that which is found in the calendar under the name of Mr. Theller of New Bedford, with two changes. In the first place, there has been stricken out, in section 2, the words "to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life and". The effect of that change is that buying will be done entirely under the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth, and it will leave to the municipality the power to sell to its inhabitants merely, and not to do trading on its own account. That was suggested by the chairman of our committee, and I am inclined to think that it is perhaps a wise suggestion.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester moved the previous question.

Mr. Hobbs: The only thing that I have further to say is that I regard this as somewhat of a strain of parliamentary courtesy.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: Speaking to the motion for the previous question, which I very much regret is urged at this particular moment, I should like to call the Convention's attention to an amendment that I have offered and which will be found on page 4 of the calendar. I rather think it will meet the objections raised by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) yesterday. At any rate, it is advanced solely for the purpose of overcoming the difficulty presented in the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court referred to by the gentleman from Waltham wherein they reserve to themselves the right really to legislate in matters of this kind. My amendment simply fills out and completes the work of the committee on Form and Phraseology, as the Convention will note. It inserts, in line 5, the words "to be determined by the Legislature", and then strikes out, in the 6th and 7th lines, the words "are public functions", and inserts in place thereof the words "may be considered to be public functions when so determined by the Legislature." In other words, my amendment gives full supreme power to the Legislature and takes away from the court any possibility of undoing what the Legislature, in its wisdom, may see fit to do. I believe it is a fair amendment, and one that the committee can very well accept, and I should like to urge upon the members of this Convention, who are anxious to have a resolution that will accomplish that which we intend and one that will not be frustrated by any hostile court, the adoption of this amendment. I regret that the rules allow me only these few moments to discuss this very important feature.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: This matter as it has been presented, whether it be in Mr. Theller's amendment or in the original resolution, refers almost exclusively to the buying and selling of the necessities of life, but I wish to call attention to another phase of the conditions that exist and will continue to exist. When this conflict in which the entire world almost is engaged to-day shall be terminated, undoubtedly the United States of America will be the wealthiest Nation on the face of the globe, but unfortunately, gentlemen, that vast wealth very largely will be in the hands of comparatively few people. This great concentration of wealth, combined with the greed that naturally will be associated with it, will lead to great abuses unless provision is made to prevent it. So I believe in addition to providing for the purchase and sale of the necessities of life by the State and its subdivisions we should provide also for the regulation and control of the transportation, the storage and the sale of these necessities. I have an amendment on the top of page 5, I think it is, and I wish to ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to that, which simply designates the authority of the Legislature to carry out the provisions of the Theller amendment as well as my own, if they are adopted.

As I remarked a few minutes ago, all the matter included in the amendment practically and in the original article itself pertained to the purchase and sale of the necessaries of life. I am in accord with those features, but I believe that nearly every member in this Convention desires to avoid the necessity of the State and its subdivisions engaging in these commercial transactions when it can be done, and it appears to me that by the adoption of this amendment, whereby the Commonwealth may control and regulate the transportation, the storage and the sale of the necessities of life, you will obviate that very thing.

Mr. Butler of Brockton: I want to say as a member of the committee on Public Affairs that I am deeply interested in this measure, and I am as interested to have the report from the committee on Public Affairs accepted as my learned layman here probably would be to have the Convention accept his report on the sectarian question. We listened attentively in the hearing to the men who came before us, and they were men who represented, as they said, thousands of workmen of our State. They were men who said that an exigency existed even then, and that there should be something in the Constitution of Massachusetts that would relieve that situation at any time. The committee carefully prepared this resolution, and I believe, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that if the members accept it, it will be fair and just to the laboring people and to everyone through the Commonwealth. There is no city nor town in my mind that wants to go into the trading business. They simply want to have a chance to do that work when there is an exigency.

Mr. Hobbs: The amendment I have moved, as I was about to say, was in substance that printed in the calendar under the name of Mr. Theller of New Bedford. There have been two changes, one of which I had explained when the interruption came. The other was the cutting off of the addition of the Civil Service Commission at the end. That I think is advisable for several reasons. The first is that the Civil Service Commission has as yet no constitutional standing. The second is that if you give them this constitutional recognition it in a way creates a condition that might be extremely onerous on the Commonwealth in the exercise of what is in some aspects at least an emergency power. An emergency power where first you have to hold a civil service examination to qualify agents, is not a power that can be exercised with extreme expedition. For those reasons I think that that tag might well be dropped off, and for the additional reason also that it is a purely legislative matter, and I think the Legislature ought not to be handicapped. I have gone into the reasons on other occasions why I think the main proposition ought to be adopted; I shall not attempt to go into them again at this late date. The difference between this proposition and that which the committee on Form and Phraseology has reported as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Boston is the difference between one which is couched in broad general language and which, according as to whether or not you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Winchester, means either a great deal or else nothing at all, and one in which the powers are set forth with considerable detail. I think, too, that the proposed substitute contains some things that might well have been contained in that of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney), for instance the provision allowing the Governor to exercise the powers in an emergency and the provision which gives explicit authority to the Commonwealth to engage in certain specific lines of activity, looking toward the preservation and conservation of food products. For those reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the amendment which I have offered will be substituted for the amended draft of the resolution of the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: At the outset I desire to pay a tribute to the committee of which I have had the honor to be chairman, and to say that in all my experience, longer than I should like to describe, I never have worked with a dozen men who showed more conscientious regard for their duty, more willingness to listen to the arguments of their colleagues, more desire to subordinate minor differences of opinion to reach a general result, than that committee. I ask this Convention now, those of you who are here, to give due weight to the results reached by a committee that so worked. I desire particularly to pay my tribute to the gentleman who last spoke, who was clerk of the committee, and who, when I was necessarily drafted into other work, assumed burdens which perhaps did not fairly belong to him, only to be treated as he was treated a moment ago.

Coming now to the matters which are before the Convention, I desire to say, and I think in that that I voice the feeling of most and perhaps all of the committee, that it would be far better for the Convention and far better for the Commonwealth to have nothing go on the ballot at the coming election, indeed to have nothing reported from this Convention at all, than to have this resolution No. 363, which is the amended form of the proposition of the gentleman from Boston. It is true that in that resolution, as originally submitted, there has been put by the committee on Form and Phraseology the words "public exigency". Either public exigency means nothing more than something which is analogous to "war emergency or distress," or it means practically everything. If nothing, it means neither more nor less than the "exigency" which the Legislature faces when it authorizes the taking of land for any public purpose. It is therefore either too broad or too narrow. I therefore repeat when I say: Vote the whole proposition down, let us have nothing which would make us ridiculous, or else report something which is thoroughly digested, something which is significant, something which grants a legislative power to deal with demonstrated evils.

Coming now to page 2 of to-day's calendar and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) who just spoke, let me say that that amendment which is printed under the name of Mr. Theller of New Bedford is the original draft which I presented and is exactly in the form in which I personally should like it. Section 1 presents in an unimpeachable form the emergency legislation. It is as good as, and I do not think it is any better than, the form of emergency legislation presented by the gentleman from Wellesley. It is as good as, and probably no better than, that presented in the emergency form by the chairman of the committee on Form and Phraseology. It is sufficient.
I like it better perhaps because I drew it; and as it is before you I ask you to vote for it. It is moved by the gentleman from Worcester.

Section 2 contains a provision for increasing distribution facilities, coupled, as printed, with a provision for broad municipal trading. The gentleman from Worcester, who would not go quite as far, as the gentleman from Quincy who sits in front of me (Mr. Adams) and as I should be willing to go, has struck out the words "to buy and to sell to their inhabitants the necessaries of life and". I would rather have them in. But I did suggest to him, as he accurately stated, that I thought there were members of the Convention who would prefer to have them out, thus limiting section 2 absolutely to the provision of additional distribution facilities, plus the power to harvest, manufacture and sell ice. You will observe, if you look at the top of page 3, that there is no power given there for municipal or State trading, but that there is a broad power under which the Commonwealth may put "fuel and coal yards, elevators, warehouses, canneries, cold storage plants and other like means for collecting and converting, preserving, storing, selling and distributing the necessaries of life" into the same category that markets, docks and slaughter-houses always have been.

I ask the Convention therefore to adopt, as the amendment to be submitted to the people, the amendment moved by the gentleman from Worcester, sections 1 and 2, which he has explained, and which I also have just now tried to explain. If you adopt that, you have provided adequate emergency power, plus increased power of furnishing distribution facilities, without authorizing either the Commonwealth or any political subdivision thereof to go into general production or into general trading. How far, if at all, we ought to go into general production or general trading may arise somewhat later, particularly in production, when another amendment comes up, but it is perfectly clear that if it ought to be adopted at all it ought not to be adopted as a part of this resolution. I therefore ask every member of this Convention who believes that this committee is entitled to any respect and consideration for what it has done, and who believes in the substance of a constructive, progressive, and at the same time reasonably conservative measure to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Worcester who just spoke.

The various pending amendments were severally rejected and the resolution as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology was passed to be engrossed. An extra session of the Convention was held immediately to consider submitting the resolution to the people.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: There is one phase in the engrossed resolution which, before it goes from this Convention, ought to be changed. I understand that an amendment is not in order, but by consent I should like to suggest this which I think I am right in stating has the approval of the chairman of the Form and Phraseology Committee:

To strike out, in line 7, the words "it shall be the duty of"; to strike out, in line 8, the words "of" and "to" and "to", and insert in line 8, before the word "take", the word "may", and before the word "provide", the word "may", so that it shall read: "and the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein may take and may provide the same for their inhabitants", etc.
The point is simply this: When this resolution is adopted, as it is now written we are in fact in "a time of war" and by this resolution we impose an imperative duty upon the Commonwealth and upon every city and town therein to take and to provide these supplies. That duty, when the Legislature meets may not be wise to perform or may be, and therefore there ought not to be the imperative duty, but there ought to be granted the full power which is expressed in "may take" and "may provide". In my opinion the resolution is not changed in substance in the slightest by this amendment, but is more exactly and more properly expressed. I trust the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: I do not think the legal effect of the resolution is changed in any way by the amendment. Stating that it is the "duty" or stating that the Commonwealth "may" do it is practically the same thing. The mere fact that the Constitution says it is their duty to do it does not oblige them to do it if they do not feel like doing it, any more than where it states in the preamble of the Constitution that it is our duty to attend divine worship, it does not necessarily compel us to go to church.

Mr. Clapp: I should like to ask the member who last spoke if, in his opinion, the proposed change does not make it much better draftsman-ship,— put it in better form?

Mr. Loring: It seems to me it does.

The amendments moved by Mr. Dresser of Worcester were adopted, by a vote of 104 to 28.

Before the Convention had voted to submit the resolution to the people Mr. Francis N. Balch of Boston asked permission to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Convention that the article of amendment authorizing the enactment of laws governing the acquirement, sale and distribution of the necessaries of life, was intended for emergency use only, to wit, in abnormal times or circumstances; and that it was intended the Legislature should be the sole judge of the existence of such times or circumstances.

Mr. Balch of Boston: It is my very strong impression that what with the necessity for haste here and some confusion as to legal subtleties, this Convention is about to put into irrevocable form a measure which does not express its true will. At the same time I am satisfied that the Convention is in no mood to consider particular amendments at this point. I am satisfied that what the Convention intended to do was to make this an emergency measure, at the same time giving the Legislature power to determine the emergency. My question is: Would it be in order for me at this time, in order to find out if that is what the Convention wants,—and if that is what the Convention wants it is a very simple matter to make it plain,—would it be in order for me to offer a resolution that it is the intention of the Convention that this shall be an emergency measure only and that the Legislature shall have power to determine the emergency?

The President: The Chair does not think the matter will be in order at the present time.

Mr. Shanahan of Somerville: I am somewhat confused. I desire to vote right on the final question and I would move reconsideration if I am right. I should like to state what my confusion is if it is in order at the present time: Under the amendment as already accepted does not the effect of that make the final arbitrary power in the matter of boards of aldermen and selectmen of our cities and towns in this sense, as far as cities and towns are concerned? The resolution or article of amendment as submitted by the committee, after action by the Legislature, makes it mandatory upon the Commonwealth as such, or upon cities and towns, to do the things provided for in the amendment. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser), if the Legislature determines an emergency to exist or a public exigency to exist, it is then not mandatory upon the part of cities and towns to do the things provided by the amendment or contemplated by this Convention; and I should like to know whether or not I am right in my interpretation of the effect of the amendment.

The Convention voted to submit the article of amendment to the people.

The amendment was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 6, 1917, by a vote of 261,119 to 51,828.

Mr. BALCH of Boston: I rise to ask if the resolution which I stated I wished to offer be now in order?

The PRESIDENT: Will the member state his question?

Mr. BALCH: I should like to offer a resolution that it is the sense of the Convention that the measure we have just passed was an emergency measure and that the Legislature has power to determine the emergency.

The PRESIDENT: The Chair sees no parliamentary objection to offering such a resolution.

Mr. BALCH: In that case I should like to offer such a resolution, Mr. President, and I will point this out: For the sake of aiding the courts hereafter in case of litigation which is sure to arise under the vague wording we have just adopted, such a resolution will be of the greatest value.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: Is not that the same motion that was defeated in the form of an amendment to-day, almost word for word? Is it in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT: The Chair does not understand this is offered as an amendment, but merely as an expression of the sentiment of the Convention.

Mr. CREAMER of Lynn: As I understand it, the delegate from Boston wishes to offer a resolution which would announce to all concerned that this measure which we have just passed is only an emergency measure. I should like to ask him if he means by that that it is the sense of this Convention that these powers should be used only in abnormal times and not used in normal times to prevent private extortion? If that is the intent of the delegate from Boston I am satisfied it is not the intent of this Convention, because I believe that there may be comparatively normal times when it will be necessary that the General Court should have power to prevent private extortion.

Mr. BALCH of Boston: The gentleman from Lynn states precisely the attitude that I supposed would be taken by those who had certain words inserted in the resolution as it now stands, and I for one have believed and do now believe that it was the intention of the Convention to do precisely what he thinks it was not its intention to do. My understanding is that it was the intention of the Convention to say that we should adopt State socialism for emergency uses, meaning in abnormal times.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat if the attitude which he takes now was not the same attitude which he took when he submitted his amendments and they were defeated by this Convention, and in their defeat was not the answer to his question made by the Convention at that time?

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I am opposed to the resolution passing at this time. There are many members absent and, as there was a change made in the amendment at the suggestion of the member from Worcester in this division with the consent of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Driscoll) representing on this floor organized labor, it seems to me that to come in now, after permission to amend has been given, and bring in a resolution declaring what is the sense of this Convention, with such a small attendance, is wrong. Let us pass the resolution as we have amended it if we want to; let the gentleman refrain from pressing his resolution until we have a full membership present the first of the week. It seems to me that it is unfair to pass such a resolution now, because we have not seen it in print, nobody knows how it will be construed, and I think the gentleman in decency should withdraw it. Personally I believe it is one of those resolutions that ought not to be put through if a single delegate objects to it. I move that the matter lie on the table; then, Mr. President, we can proceed and do the other business and come in next week and discuss it.

The motion to lay on the table prevailed.

The resolution was taken from the table Wednesday, November 14, 1917, and was withdrawn.
Mr. Brooks Adams of Quincy presented the following resolution (No. 3):

Resolved, That the bearing of the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts upon the constitutional doctrine of the so-called police power, be referred to the Judiciary Committee to consider the same, and thereafter to report to this Convention on the applicability of these decisions to such an administrative system as is likely to be necessitated by the stress of modern warfare.

The committee on the Executive reported the resolution back to the Convention without recommendation, and that report was accepted by the Convention Friday, June 14, 1918.

At the session of Tuesday, June 25, Mr. Harriman of New Bedford asked unanimous consent that he might move that the report be restored to its place on the calendar.

THE DEBATE.

MR. HARRIMAN of New Bedford: I respectfully ask that No. 119 be restored to its place in the calendar.

The PRESIDENT: Mr. Harriman of New Bedford asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee upon No. 119 may be restored to its place in the calendar. Is there any objection?

MR. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: It seems to me that there should be some explanation made of this request.

MR. HARRIMAN: No. 119 is a resolution relative to extending the application of the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court as to the police power, so called. This was a resolution which was reported by the committee on the Executive, and the committee had no recommendation to make. I myself, and I think Mr. Adams, wished to discuss it. The matter was gone over and the report has been accepted by this Convention, but the matter still appeared on the calendar. I, for one, was waiting for its turn, and one morning it disappeared from the calendar. The explanation given was that the report had been accepted by the Convention. For that reason I have made the request.

MR. PILLSBURY: As at present advised I must object. I do not think the explanation is adequate. Neither the subject nor the character of the proposed resolution is disclosed and I have no idea what it is.

The PRESIDENT: Objection is raised. The motion cannot be entertained.

On the following day, Wednesday, June 26, Mr. Brooks Adams of Quincy made the same request.

MR. ADAMS of Quincy: On the first day of the session, by a curious mistake, Resolution No. 119 was dropped from the calendar. The error occurred because of a misunderstanding between the chairman of the committee on the Executive and myself. He understood, — or at least the committee understood, as I understand now, — that they thought that I ought to be responsible for the care of that particular resolution. I did not understand that any such thing was incumbent on me, and the result was that I happened to be a few minutes late that day for the calling of the calendar, and when I got in the mischief was done. Mr. Harriman moved yesterday that the resolution should be restored to its place on the calendar, but there was an objection by my friend Mr. Pillsbury. Mr. Pillsbury has signified to me that he has no objection, and therefore I renew the motion.

Objection was made by Mr. Horgan of Boston.

Mr. Sawyer offered the same resolution and moved a suspension of the rule in order that it might be admitted. The matter was referred to the committee on Rules and Procedure. That committee reported Friday, June 28, recommending that the rule be suspended.

Mr. Creed of Boston: I should like to ask if that is being done because the circumstances justify it, or as a courtesy to one or more members of this Convention.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: Perhaps it ought to be stated, in justice to the member from Quincy (Mr. Adams), who originated the present order and had it referred to the committee on Rules, that this merely reinstates before the Convention a subject which, properly or otherwise, was before the committee on the Executive at the beginning of the last session. That committee reported the measure without recommendation, and it so stood on the calendar. The gentleman from Quincy assumed that the chairman of the committee on the Executive would see that the matter was passed over when the calendar was called, so that it would continue before this body for discussion. The chairman of the committee on the Executive assumed that the gentleman from Quincy would look after the matter, as he had originated it. Owing to that misunderstanding, the matter, which was printed in the calendar once, lost its place; and all this order will do in effect will be to reinstate the subject-matter which was originated by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams).

Mr. Horgan of Boston: I desire to ask the member of the committee on Rules who has just taken his seat (Mr. Quincy) if this is not the same subject-matter which was in the calendar the week before this, on which request was twice made for unanimous consent in order that the matter might be restored to the calendar, and if there is any other reason than that of courtesy to a member why, ample opportunity having been afforded the members to discuss the matter when reached in the calendar, this matter should be presented now under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: When this matter was reached on the calendar a gentleman in this division called "Pass." Apparently he was not heard, but he supposed that he was heard and that the matter had been passed, and I also supposed the matter had been passed. So there have been two or three misapprehensions in regard to the situation. Under these circumstances it would seem as if it was not an unreasonable thing to correct what was in fact a misunderstanding or an inadvertence, and to allow the matter to take its place where some of us supposed it was.
THE POLICE POWER. 853

Mr. UNDERHILL of Somerville: As I appear as a dissenter to the report of the committee on Rules, the Convention may be interested in my reasons. Previous to this matter being removed from the calendar the gentleman from Newburyport, Mr. Bartlett, who was unable through delay in his train service to reach the Convention on time, had asked the Convention to restore to the calendar a matter which had been passed, and the Convention almost unanimously refused that request, showing thereby a determination on the part of the Convention that every man should attend to his own particular pet and that no excuses should prevail for postponement for reconsideration, or any delay in the Convention business.

Following out what I believe to be the desire and the will of the Convention, I opposed in the committee on Rules any courtesy to any other member, in spite of the fact that I have as much veneration for his gray hairs and his ancestry as anybody in the Convention. And so, sir, I opposed the proposition in the committee on Rules, and I oppose it on the floor of the Convention.

Mr. WASHBURN of Middleborough: I understand the status of the matter to be something like this: It was reported originally without recommendation, as the gentleman says, by the committee on the Executive, and the question was: "Shall the report be accepted?" It was accepted. It was the assumption of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams), I think, and a good many other members of this Convention, that this action advanced the matter to its second reading. But the subject of the committee's report was not an amendment, it was a resolution; and it was the opinion, I believe, of those in charge of the calendar of the Convention that the acceptance of the report technically had the effect of a final disposition of the matter. Now, clearly there has been some misapprehension, and because of this situation, I, for one, shall vote to sustain the pending committee recommendation, in order that those who want to be heard on this very important subject may have an opportunity.

Mr. SAWTER of Ware: This is a rather vexed question for us to take up offhand, and we have another matter on which the previous question has been ordered. It seems to me the wisest thing for us to do is to let it go over to the next session, and let us think it over, and then we shall come prepared. I move that the report of the committee be laid over until the next session.

Mr. LUCE of Waltham: No reason convinces me that we should postpone consideration of this matter. It is a very simple proposition. Here, through no neglect of any member, through no absence, but purely through a misapprehension, the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) who desires to lay before this Convention considerations of a most important nature, on a most important proposition, was precluded from that opportunity. There was further misapprehension through the failure of another member of the Convention to secure a "Pass" on the measure when he called it. If there had been neglect, if there had been the circumstances of some other cases that have been advanced, I should not take my present view of this matter.

Mr. COX of Boston: I understood the member in the first division (Mr. Luce) to say that there had been no neglect and no absence. I wish to ask him if the member who is interested to have this restored did not state on the floor of the Convention that he was absent when the matter came up, and when he thought that it would be passed in his absence. I understood that statement to be upon the floor of this Convention when the member asked unanimous consent to have it restored.

The motion to postpone was negatived, and the Convention refused to suspend the rule in order that the resolution might be readmitted.

Authority of the General Court.

The committee on The General Court having recommended that a resolution (No. 82) presented by Mr. Samuel W. George of Haverhill ought nor to be adopted, the resolution was considered Wednesday, July 10, 1918, and Mr. Brooks Adams of Quincy moved that it be amended by striking out lines 3 to 251, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time, to make, ordain and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances, directions and instructions, including the determination of the scope of the police power, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defence of the government thereof.

The debate, with the exception of the remarks of the last speaker, was addressed wholly to this proposed substitute.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: Mr. Harriman has entered a notice of a motion to amend. I believe Mr. Harriman is not in the Convention. In his absence I should like to make the motion myself, if it is in order.

I am extremely reluctant to address the Convention on this resolution, because the resolution is Mr. Harriman's. However, in his absence I will venture to speak, as I feel much interest in the subject. May I ask if the Clerk will read the resolution.

The amendment, cited at the beginning of the chapter, was read.

Mr. Adams: I do not wish to waste the time of the Convention upon debating a proposition on which I conceive that the Convention has strong opinions already; but as I believe also that this is perhaps the most important question which is to come before this Convention, it appears to me to be a matter of duty on my part as well as I can to bring it to the attention of the members.

The substance of the amendment to the resolution is this: That it transfers from the courts to the Legislature the function of defining the police power, the scope of the police power. The resolution is substantially in the words of Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of St. Paul Railroad v. Minnesota. The question is: Are the courts or the Legislature the proper persons or the proper authority to define the scope of the police power? The other day this question came up pretty much in this form, only it was relative to the tenure of the judiciary, and my friend in the first division, the former Attorney-General (Mr.
Pillsbury of Wellesley), for whose opinion both in law and in matters of legislation I have the greatest respect, did me the honor of suggesting not only that I did not know what I was talking about,—to which suggestion I am perfectly willing to agree that it is true,—but also went on to argue that I was in bad faith toward this Convention when I said that the courts had constituted themselves a third branch of the Legislature for the purpose of legislation.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: No, no, I did not charge you with bad faith,—no such thing.

Mr. Adams: The honorable member suggests that he did not make any such insinuation. I dare say,—I am bound to take his word that he did not, but it sounded very much that way. I wish to say also that I am not in the least sensitive in the matter. I should very much regret if the majority of this Convention thought that I had intended to delude them on such a question, but I should be much more sorry if I thought that they thought it was possible that I should succeed in such an attempt. But when it comes to the honorable gentleman's impugning my law, I confess that I am much more sensitive. He intimated that my assertion that the courts had made themselves a third Legislature body was not good law. Now I wish to submit to you that I suppose for six or eight hundred years, at least, that has been the common acceptation of the law. Our entire system is based on English precedents, and the English precedents since,—I do not know; since parliamentary government grew up at first, I suppose somewhere in the Fourteenth Century,—were to the effect that King, Lords and Commons constituted Parliament. And I understand that since that time it always has been accepted that where there were various bodies constituting a legislative assembly, one body of which had a negative on legislation, anybody who succeeded in getting a negative on legislation constituted a part of the Legislature. That I always have understood to be the constitutional law of England. I believe that we inherited it and I fancy it still is constitutional law with us. But that is not where,—and this is what I want to dwell on, what I want to point out,—that is not where this system arises particularly. The courts not only hold the negative on legislation, which is a very important function, but they hold something beside which the negative, the mere negative when legislation is passed, sinks into absolute insignificance. That is to say, they hold the power of repealing the statutes of this country at any distance of time, which is a power only similar to the old dispensing power which was claimed by the Crown in England in the Seventeenth Century. That is to say, our courts can hold a statute unlawful, that is, null,—they can absolutely annul legislation, which has been accepted as lawful for a generation or for a century. That is something which our courts themselves admit. I only refer you to the dissenting opinion of the present Chief Justice, Chief Justice White, in Pollock v. Marine Insurance Company, a very able opinion, in which he declares that one of his main reasons for dissenting from the opinion of the majority was that it overturned a power which he believed was inherent in government, which had lasted and had been exercised since the beginning of this government; that is to say, the power of levying an income tax. That power of annulment is substantially incompatible with administration,—with effective administration. I wish to point out and to force on this Convention that the one principle which has saved our country, which has saved our government, the one principle which has been of vital importance, is that the moment an exigency arises, we throw the courts overboard. That is the fact, and always has been so, the moment pressure has been put upon the country. It was so in the civil war.
The so-called police power was invented in order to get rid of the courts. In other words, in order to carry on any very great — any very great — what shall I say? — war, for instance, any matter of very pressing moment, we have to establish what is tantamount to a dictatorship, — exactly as the Romans did. That is what it amounts to. All our court decisions, all the laws that we are passing now, so far as the courts are concerned, are null and void and can be rejected a hundred years from now if the courts see fit. That is perfectly plain to any of you gentlemen who will take the trouble to read the decisions of the courts themselves. That is so in the case In re Milligan, in which they held that under the war power it was unconstitutional for the Congress of the United States to transcend their ordinary functions except in case of rebellion or invasion. Those were the two excuses by which such legislation as the Congress was undertaking or now is undertaking, at the date of In re Milligan, to carry on could or can be justified. None of the legislation which, as I understand it, has been passed under Mr. Wilson and which is legislation which I conceive all of you gentlemen, as I do myself, consider to be necessary to the salvation of this country, — there is not one single statute among them but transcends in every line the recognized limits of constitutional government because of the war power; but the war power, according to the decision of the United States Courts in In re Milligan, does not exist at this moment, because there is neither rebellion nor invasion in this whole land.

I submit to this Convention that we have been debating here for the larger part of the session upon questions relating to the police power. But questions relating to the police power are not legal; they are political questions almost without exception. You go back to the beginning of our government and trace our police power in our National Congress, and it is easier to trace it there because it is more noticeable than in State Legislatures. It began with the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the Dartmouth College case. The Dartmouth College case, of course, as you all know, was a case which is practically monstrous. It enables one Legislature to bind forever its successors to anybody to whom it pleases to make a grant; that is to say, if that grant happens to be in such a form as the Supreme Court then held to be a contract, and this particular contract chanced to be a charter of incorporation.

Now laying aside the legal theory of the case, which I do not think justifies in any event the interpretation of Chief Justice Marshall as to the matter of law, we come to the way in which that decision was put through. I beg that you and the gentlemen in this Convention who are interested in this great, this all-important question, will take the trouble to read Henry Cabot Lodge's Life of Daniel Webster, and you will find there the arguments by which the decision in the Dartmouth College case was put through and how the court was brought to concur in it. It was not put through as a matter of law; it was put through as a matter of politics. Henry Cabot Lodge is a man whom I know very well, I have great respect for his knowledge of history and I have great respect for his knowledge of politics, and Henry Cabot Lodge would be the last man, the last man living, to undertake to impeach the credit of John Marshall. I for my part have the very greatest respect for John Marshall, but there was one weakness in Marshall's character: he did unreasonably hate Thomas Jefferson. [Laughter.] That is not matter of law. That Marshall should have hated Thomas Jefferson is not a legal issue; that is a political issue. Marshall hated Jefferson because Marshall hated the politics Jefferson professed, and he did his very best always to upset Jefferson and all his work. And that is not law. I cannot too strongly impress upon you that that is not a legal issue and that that is not an issue which can be argued properly before the courts. That the Chief Justice of the United States should hate the President of the United States is not a matter to properly come before the Supreme Court of the United States for judicial decision. But that was, as Henry Cabot Lodge has proved conclusively, the issue on which the Dartmouth College case turned, and it did not turn on any other. For months after that case was argued the entire strength of the old Federalist Party was turned to backing up Marshall for the purpose of bringing over to his side two judges who constituted, when they were brought over, the majority of the court.

Now, gentlemen, that is not the way in which a country safely or properly regulates its judicial matters. Wherever you turn in our history, from the Dartmouth College case until now, that same question has arisen in the question of our constitutional law. Take, for instance, the next great decision that came about. I take it that the next great decision was the Dred Scott decision. You know what the Dred Scott decision was. The Supreme Court of the United States, a whole generation after the fact, undertook to set aside the Missouri Compromise, which was a statute passed by Congress in the most solemn manner in the world, with the idea that by so doing they should save the country from a civil war. The legality of that statute was brought up on a collusive action before the Supreme Court of the United States for a judicial decision. I need not tell you, gentlemen, I need not tell you, Mr. President, that the issue which was argued before the Supreme Court was no more matter of law in the Dred Scott case than was the hatred of Chief Justice Marshall for the President of the United States in the Dartmouth College case. It was debated before the Supreme Court as a political issue, as purely a political issue, and it was decided as a political issue by judges who were put on the bench because they were politicians. That is the reason, and everybody who sits here and has read the history of the time knows that I am not exaggerating. That was the way the thing was done, and the effect was to precipitate the civil war. That is the effect of introducing this sort of political controversy into the law, — into our constitutional system. And you see it now. Every day these questions come up, these burning questions, — questions of labor, social questions, which have nothing whatever to do with the law. They are questions as to whether or not you shall have a minimum rate of wages, questions of that kind which are social questions, social issues.
They are brought up before the courts for adjudication, and the same passions permeate the courts and permeate the judiciary and permeate the law as permeate the community at large.

You cannot get away from that great fact. It is impossible. And we are the only country that tolerates that system. We are the only country which permits our judiciary to mix themselves up with politics, which is the ruin of the judiciary. It makes them at once a political issue. And that is why we have in so many States an elective judiciary, which I believe, if I may be excused for using such language, I believe to be a damnable principle. The judiciary, I believe, ought to be appointed; they ought to be appointed, and they ought to be appointed for a fixed tenure. But the moment that you give them power to debate and decide political questions, that moment they become political candidates, and it follows as a logical necessity that they must be elected if you have a republic. They will be elected whether or no. The people must and will insist on mingling themselves with such political appointments. They have done so in every country where the experiment has been tried, and it always must be so. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. As long as the people are the country and claim that they are the fountain of power, so long must they be in substance the power which appoints; and if they do not themselves actually appoint, the appointments must be made by men whom they choose to make appointments, and the men whom they choose to make appointments will appoint politicians who represent their opinions, exactly as John Adams appointed John Marshall, because he represented John Adams' opinions and because he hated Jefferson. That is the truth,—that is the truth. John Marshall was one of the greatest lawyers, I believe, who ever lived, and he was one of the most successful Chief Justices who ever sat on the bench of the United States. Perhaps I may go further and say he was the most successful. But why? Because he supported the power of Congress to pass statutes. He supported the tendency toward consolidation of this country and he entirely disapproved and tried to break down and did break down Thomas Jefferson, who denied that the country was consolidated or was anything but s,—what shall I say,—a league of States, that was all. Well, we fought the civil war on that issue: Is the United States a league of States, or is it a consolidated country? It hinges on this great question which we are considering to-day. If it is a league of States, that is exactly what the Constitution as construed by the courts means it should not be. The Constitution was made for the purpose of creating a league of States under that system of Thomas Jefferson. That was the doctrine of the Kentucky resolutions and that was the doctrine which Chief Justice Marshall always combated, and that is the doctrine which all of the Federalist Party combated, and it is the doctrine, as I understand it, which we are combating now. This government is not a league of States. This country is going on a regular predestined path which has led it and is leading it, is leading it to-day, from the wretched condition which it was in when it was a confederation of Colonies, absolutely powerless, with its Congress absolutely futile as a legislative body, to be a consolidated country such as we can protect, such as we can defend in case of necessity, because we can set aside that accursed doctrine of constitutional government which calls this country a league of States. That is the only reason why we today can fight, let us say, the whole of Europe, because we have a single executive and because in case of necessity we have not got to stop while a lot of judges meddle with a great political question and finally say: "You can't do it." That is what I have seen a thousand times pointed out in the English papers. They say: "Why haven't we got a government like the United States, where power is vested in a single individual and not in a committee of the House of Commons?
We have a government which is vested in a committee of the House of Commons, and that is our curse and that is why we have had the disasters of this war. It is because the powers of this country are not concentrated in a single mind. It is because there are continual quarrels in our cabinet, as we call it," — that is, in that committee of the House of Commons which is trying to fight this war. And with us, if you let loose the judges on these questions, we should have a system which would be the English system confounded. Just imagine submitting these questions to a bench of judges, as to whether or not we will have the President do what he is doing every day about us! We never would come to a conclusion. It would be a matter which would be debated for months and finally be denied.

And it is so in our States. If you ever are going to have a government which will be administratively strong, if you are ever going to have a government in Massachusetts which will be worthy of the name, you must have a government which will have a policy and can go on and will not always be obstructed by a debating club. That is the very substance of the whole matter in hand. We have got to have a government which can administer as cheaply, as directly and as effectively as the other governments of the world; and if we cannot have that, we have got to take a back seat. We have got to give it up, because all modern government means administration, and that is all it does mean. And that is the question on which this subject we have to-day before us hinges. Its importance cannot be overestimated. It cannot be even measured. You must have authority somewhere. It is folly to say you cannot trust it; it is absurd to say you cannot trust it.
You must trust it. You have got to trust it. If you are going to have a government in your democracy you must believe in your democracy. You cannot do otherwise. You cannot do otherwise, because you cannot deny the ability of your democracy or the powers of your democracy without overthrowing your democracy. That is the substance of all this war and that is the substance of all the questions which have arisen before us, which are of any importance, since we began our sittings a year ago. And I beg of you, — I beg of you to consider it seriously. You have got to face these questions sooner or later; sooner or later you have got to come to it, — by disaster if in no other way. Our people have got to learn by experience that if they are going to have a democracy they must believe in their democracy, and must trust it, and give it power and must do so with no unwilling hand. You have got to have centralized power somewhere or you cannot compete. You have got to have a government which can administer these questions for you, which can administer the questions which now are pressing upon us, by evolving its conception within a single mind; and it is only in such a way that these questions can be solved. It is only in such a way that the questions on which the whole world is struggling ever can be solved. One nation or the other, one community or the other, must be able to solve these questions of competition more cheaply than the others simply because they administer them better. You have got to bring your coal from over the desert to New England. You have got to bring it here or you have got to give up manufacturing, and you have got to have an administrative system which will bring it here and is competent to bring it here. You have got to have your farming, and you have got to have your farming done in the way in which it can be done most cheaply; and if it can be done most cheaply by the community, then it has got to be done by the community. This is not any laughing matter; it is not anything to be put off or thrust to one side because we say we like our old system better, because we say we always have been accustomed to another way of thinking. But that will not go down any longer. The supreme arbitrament of these questions is war. Before a man can have a government that he loves he has got to live. He can live only by having a government that is effective.

We may debate this, we may shrink from it, we may run away from it forever, but we are brought up to it by the supreme arbitrament of war, and from that we cannot flinch. Now, I believe, it is to be involved in this very issue and brought up by this very resolution which I am trying to expound now, and no more important question can be brought before you for consideration. It cannot be put down. It is our irrepressible conflict. I beg to thank you for your patience, but that is all I have to say. [Applause.]

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I am liable to be imperatively called away in a moment, and as I cannot allow what has been said by my friend from Quincy to pass without notice, I must avail myself of the opportunity at this time. And first let me assure him,—though it ought not to be necessary,—that I have never charged him with not knowing what he is talking about. So far as his theories rest in historical information and a wide and profound range of historical study, as very largely they do, I hope it will not be taken as invidious if I say that I think he probably knows what he is talking about better than any other member of this Convention,—at any rate vastly better than myself. Neither have I ever charged him with misstating the law. I did say the other day, and I regret being obliged to repeat, that I think he misstates the position and attitude of the judiciary in our government and the effect of the necessary discharge of the judicial duty. That is because we take different views of that political question, and mine may be wrong. As to the idea that I charged him with bad faith, no man who ever knew me knows better than my friend from Quincy that I should never lightly charge that against any man, and he cannot believe that I ever dreamed of making any such imputation against him. The substance of the whole matter is that my friend entertains political theories original and picturesque always, as he has set them out in literature, but to my mind radically unsound. That may be the worse for him or the worse for me, no matter which. I said the other day, and I repeat it only that my view of his view may be entirely clear,—that I think he is entirely wrong in saying that the judiciary has assumed or exercised the power to repeal statutes. To my mind that is not an accurate but a misleading statement. It is a theory which my friend has done much to promulgate by the power of his brilliant pen, and I fear that in the process he has done an infinite amount of political mischief, if he will pardon me for saying so.

Mr. Adams: Certainly; you flatter me.

Mr. Pillsbury: The Constitution imposes certain restraints upon the power of the government, the power of individuals, the power of the people themselves, and differences of opinion are bound to arise as to the meaning and effect of the constitutional restraints, and the Constitution must be construed by somebody. That is a judicial duty, which devolves necessarily upon the courts, and nobody has ever suggested or proposed that it ought to be anywhere else.

Mr. Adams: I hate to interrupt my friend, but as I understand it, that was the exact issue between Thomas Jefferson and Marshall, and that was why Marshall hated Jefferson so badly. [Laughter.] It was the Kentucky resolution which, if I remember right, brought matters to a crisis between them. Jefferson's theory was that it was the States themselves which by their conventions should declare legislation unconstitutional if they thought it was unconstitutional.

Mr. Pillsbury: I cannot be diverted into a historical discussion because I cannot take time for it. I will except Jefferson and Jackson. What I was about to say was that, it being the necessary and unavoidable duty of the courts to construe the Constitution and the laws, questions occasionally come before them of a quasi-political character, questions sometimes having a far-reaching influence upon the political policy and the destiny of the government and the country.
They are not arbiters at large of constitutional questions. There is no power anywhere under our government to go to the Supreme Court to tell us what a particular clause means. They can deal with such questions only as they come before them in suits between parties, and they can go no farther than the case requires, and with the single exception of the Dred Scott case, to which my friend has referred, so far as I know they have never attempted to go farther, — in any case of great importance, — than a determination of the rights of the parties as they are in the case before the court.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to ask the gentleman: Is there ever a case between private parties that does not involve some fundamental principle upon which the court bases its decision?

Mr. Pillsbury: Perhaps not; but it is only in an insignificant minority of cases that the question between the parties has such a political bearing as to make it of any great political consequence. The number of those cases is very small, but such a question is there occasionally and the court has to deal with it.

Now, the court must determine the questions which arise in cases according to its views of the proper construction of the Constitution.
It is an unavoidable duty, from which it cannot shrink, — could not if it would; and in the process, which is a very difficult and complicated process, there is bound to result a certain amount of what is popularly called "judge-made law." But when the court finds a statute in conflict with a constitutional provision, the court is bound to say so and to give effect to the Constitution as the paramount law of the land, and everybody who is dissatisfied with the decision feels more or less dissatisfied with the judges who made it. And so all the complaints against the judiciary, against its usurpation of power, the charge that it has arrogated to itself the power to repeal statutes, and all that sort of thing, has grown from time to time out of the dissatisfaction of people with the decisions of the court, which nobody pretends to deny are honestly made, however imperfect. It is a defect inseparable from the system. It is due to the infirmity of the human mind and the imperfection of human institutions; and the most wonderful thing perhaps in connection with our government, with constitutional government in the Nation and the States, is that the system has been carried on for so many generations with so little ground for complaint. The unfortunate thing is that the complaints are fomented and made too much of, and are made the occasion of popular clamor against the judiciary, which is unjust to the judges, and, what is of more consequence, is dangerous to the government itself.

The question presented by this resolution, while one of the most delicate questions in constitutional law, is one of the most interesting. I should like to lecture the Convention upon it, but if I began I have no idea where I should stop, for there is a great deal that might be said about it. But the whole significance of the issue before the Convention can be put in a single word, and for that purpose I invite gentlemen to look at the resolution proposed by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman) and moved by my friend from Quincy (Mr. Adams), on page 3 of the calendar.

He proposes to write into what we call the "welfare clause" of the Constitution these words: "Including the determination of the scope of the police power." This is all there is to it. This is the only change; all the rest is repetition.

He proposes to authorize the Legislature to determine the scope of the police power. What is the police power? My friend from Quincy said it was "invented" at some time or other, for some purpose or other. The police power was never invented except as government was invented. It is an inherent power of all governments, of whatever character, wheresoever and whenssoever existing; and it is the general power of regulating the affairs of the government and the people, a power so broad as to be almost without limitation, a power the unchecked exercise of which is absolutely inconsistent with liberty, and which therefore must be and is restrained in a free government. For that very purpose the constitutional restraints have been imposed; and they say to the Legislature, having this vast power to deal with life, liberty and property, involving all that concerns the interests and the welfare of the people: "In certain directions you shall not go beyond this line; you shall not take or impair life, liberty or property without due process of law," which means without due inquiry and the judgment of a competent tribunal. Among all the constitutional restraints, this is the most important safeguard of what we call our liberties.

Now what is the meaning and effect of this clause which my friend proposes to write into the Constitution? It is, to be sure, qualified by the context of the clause into which it is written, but the meaning and effect are left doubtful. It is, to my mind, a long step toward abolition of the constitutional restraints. Write that clause into the Constitution unchecked, and you would have put into the hands of the Legislature, a popular body, always under popular control and more or less under the controlling influence of popular prejudice and popular clamor, the power to deal according to the impulses and caprices of the moment with the life, liberty and property of the citizen, —and that proposition would be, to my mind, so offensive that I would not take time to discuss it. [Applause.]

Mr. Adams of Quincy: My learned friend has made certain remarks about its being an insult to discuss these matters, but I should like to ask him whether the Supreme Court has not repeatedly, and its ablest judges very emphatically, taken the position that it was a legis-latively and not a judicial function, exactly as has been defined in the amendment to this resolution; whether that resolution, for instance, was not practically or absolutely the ground taken in the decision in Munn v. Illinois, and is not practically in the very words of Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of St. Paul v. Minnesota; and whether Mr.
Justice Bradley was not, on the whole, the ablest and, on the whole, the most satisfactory judge whom we had on the Supreme Court in the last half of the last century?

Mr. Pillsbury: The question who is the greatest judge in the Supreme Court in the last half of the last century is not very important, and does not seem to me to have any material bearing on the present question. There is no question but what Judge Bradley was a very able judge; but to say he was greater than Miller or others would be going a long way, and I am not sure that I am prepared to follow my friend so far as that.

To answer my friend's question so far as it bears upon the present situation, and so far as I understood it, it is a perfectly familiar doctrine that it is for the legislative body, the Congress in the National government and the Legislatures in the States, to say how and when and how far the police power ought to be exercised for any purpose.
The necessity or expediency of exercising the power is a legislative question, which belongs to the Legislature; and nothing is left to the court but to say whether the Legislature has gone so far as to invade the restraints of the Constitution. That is a judicial question, and when the court finds that to be the case it is bound to say so, and the result is that the law becomes inoperative to that extent. But the court has not “repealed the statute” or assumed or exercised any power to “repeal” statutes or to make law, and it is inaccurate and misleading to say so.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: May I humbly ask, as a layman in this matter, whether these words in the resolution, “so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution,” will not limit the determination of the scope of the police power given to the Legislature, and whether that limitation would not become a subject of judicial determination?

Mr. Pillsbury: Let me humbly answer, out of the depths of my ignorance, that I do not know whether or how far those words would be taken as limiting the very direct language which the gentleman proposes to introduce into that clause. I agree that my friend has ground for his question and that it is a reasonable question; and if I knew how the courts, — our own Supreme Judicial Court in the first place, and the Supreme Court of the United States finally, — would construe the conjunction of those two clauses, I might not have said what I have said or I might have said something quite different. I do not know. I can see the possible danger and I am not sure that I see the safeguard.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I wish this question had come up in the beginning of the session. We are making great progress in this Convention, because the most learned people among us are commencing to plead their ignorance, and it is said that the beginning of wisdom is just when a man begins to think he knows nothing.

I am glad that the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) has stated the question concisely. It is to transfer from the courts to the Legislature the determination of what is police power and what is its extent. Now, so far as labor might be heard on this question it would be divided, and for precisely the reason given by the gentleman from Wellesley—that it is the transferring of power, and that the power might be misused, because the Legislature would not be under popular clamor, as the gentleman claims, but would be under the clamor of wealth. That is why they would divide. I suppose I violate no confidence in saying they are divided. But might it not be true that if the court is composed of only a few people, while the Legislature is composed of many, that the question is safer in the hands of the many than in the hands of the few?

When we speak of politics let us understand that all action in the nature of government is politics. Politics is policy. Policy is a matter of keeping house together,—State or Nation. Government deals with it. The Legislature, under the government, deals with keeping house in the State. And for us to say that the lawyers were influenced or the judges were influenced or that other people are influenced by politics is nothing more than to say at the present time the Legislature is influenced. Unquestionably it is.

Let us recognize that we are under different conditions than when this government was founded. I almost thought the old Federalist doctrine was being preached here, and to a certain extent it was, by my friend Adams, and I well can imagine how very much up in arms Elbridge Gerry would have been against some of the ideas. So far as I am concerned personally, in anything I ever have said in this Convention, or any opinions I may hold, I stand with Abraham Lincoln, who said he never had a political opinion which he did not take from Thomas Jefferson, and unquestionably you can go to Jefferson as the expounder of the principles under which people should be virtuous and happy,—for that is the condition he sought.

Now, when the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) pronounced the dictum that he did I felt almost as if I was sentenced, not only to silence, but to imprisonment; because if it be as he says, why, of course it would be a dangerous power. But if it be as the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) says, who rose to ask a question of him, that the Constitution in its limitations is still superior, that if you granted to the Legislature the police power they could not take away from a man life and liberty any more than they can at the present time, why, then of course I reverse my opinion.

The gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) has spoken about coming conditions. Let us not lose sight of that important consideration. Let us recognize that at the time this government was founded the people knew nothing of monopolistic corporations, they knew nothing of aggregations of labor, and the consequent control by one man over the fortunes and destinies of many other men, such as we have to-day. The nearest criticism or recognition of anything of this nature which you can find was what Jefferson said when he looked at the Constitution and said he thought they had made a great mistake that they had not provided to restrict monopoly. Nearly all of the objectionable conditions that are prevalent may be traced directly to the opportunities for monopoly which have come into our economic system. Some of the original States did recognize possibilities and made provision against monopoly, declaring it to be dangerous and against the public policy. Now, the system having passed from the influence of competition to the control of monopoly, the natural laws of supply and demand are set one side; for it must be an axiom that whoever controls the supply may control its price. Therefore the employer of labor may control the price if he can control the supply. But if labor controls the supply then labor controls the price.

You are going to come up against this vital question of control unless you wish to see the whole structure back to the day of the individual employer, with only a few hands employed under him. The indications are that we shall continue on the theory that the largest efficiency is to be found in these aggregations of dollars on the one side, and the aggregations of men working under the aggregation of dollars, on the other side. This changes the relations of the individual to the State, as I see it. One of the most important pieces of news which could interest the Convention at the present moment is in the declaration found in this morning's papers that the trades-unionists of London have the question of getting together before or immediately after the war closes, representatives of the trades-unionists of the world to determine what is going to be their attitude on the great question of the relations of business and the employers of labor.

I again ask: Are we to leave this question to be legislated upon wholly by a part of the people on the outside,—two parts of the people? Because on the one side we have labor legislating by the unions, and we have property legislating on the other side by the representatives of organized capital. The two bodies are in conflict, and naturally will continue in conflict more or less direct or severe. The system of distribution inevitably transfers a portion of the products of labor to the distributors. I want to make clear, if I have not made clear, to this Convention, that I am not making and have no war upon capital; I have no criticism against any person who has wealth; but I object to using wealth to corrupt the electorate. I hold in abhorrence the preaching of classes. Whoever has got any wealth, let him keep it. I urge no inequitable redistribution. That is an injustice, and you never can commit an injustice in the State unless it reacts. But the whole theory of labor as organized, and of myself as an expounder of it, is this: That there is an annual wealth production; we are keeping house all together, and annually our production amounts to a certain sum. Out of that total sum must be taken overhead charges,—first, in the way of interest on bonds, dividends on stock and fixed charges of that nature; secondly, a sum sufficient to feed, clothe and house the producers. Then what is left is a surplus that is added as new wealth to the wealth already in existence. My contention is that in this annual production and distribution the laws of distribution are so inequitable that wealth accumulates in a few hands, whereas, under a distribution that was naturally or morally honest, each man would have according to his needs, for there are some people who want very little in this world to be happy and having that little have no concern in what others have. Under such distribution each would have what naturally and honestly belongs to him; then there would be none of this clamor of want, there would be none of this crying out against wealth. The clamor,—using the word used by the gentleman from Wellesley, as I understand it,—the clamor is well founded; it is against the misuse of wealth after it has been obtained. It is the attempt, too often successful, to have wealth exert an undue pressure against honest merit. There is a growing belief that merit does not have the recognition it deserves because of the power of wealth. If that be true, then surely we are on the shifting sands. Now to give power to the Legislature, to determine the conditions of labor and the distribution of the products of labor, is it wise? I say again there is a difference of opinion in the trades-union movement. We find some who would rather fight it out on the outside. I ground myself in my faith in eternal justice; that if a proposition is deliberated upon in the Legislature, out of the minds of the many will come an honest solution of the problem. The Constitution declares that the whole government is built on the theory that every man has a right to the proceeds of his toil. It means that he should receive out of his toil a proper enjoyment of life and a surplus, that he may acquire property to which the declaration refers.

The contention is that your system of distribution is so arranged that an undue portion of labor's wealth is taken from labor without equivalent, and flows to the property side of the few, where wealth already is aggregated. Is it true or is it false? I state it as a proposition. Legislation should be for the greatest good of the greatest number. Now, if we are a representative government these differences should find expression and adjudication in laws made by the representatives of the people chosen for that purpose. Why, I grant my friend from Quincy (Mr. Adams) what he says about Marshall. But Marshall would not have been the man he was if he had not the individuality which is criticized. Our government has been built up by these strong individualities. They have Americanized our people. We are proud of such men. I am, even if they do not belong to my political party.

I am not in accord with those who fear that labor had better rest its case with its organization; that it is organized strong enough to control the Legislature now and to control elections. So far as the organization is acting for the uplift of humanity, for the common good, for the good of all, I am glad that they are in existence; but I am not afraid to say that in a well governed republic there should be no necessity for an organization of labor for such a purpose and there would be none if it was not forced into existence by the encroachments on the rights of labor. Aggregations of capital forced the aggregation of labor. Thus labor is justified.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Brockton the same question that I asked the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). I want to know how he construes that clause.

Mr. Brown: Even in the absence of those words there I should hold that the police power, being an incident to government, would be controlled by the larger structure, which itself created the police power. That is the way that I would reason it.

Mr. Anderson: Would the gentleman say that that was subject to judicial construction?

Mr. Brown: If I understand the gentleman, would I say that the action of the Legislature in taking away a man’s liberty would be subject to the limitations in the Constitution? Yes; sure. In all the natural rights, in all the fundamental principles, which in the Constitution are defined clearly, they dominate; and every power, to my mind, which has been exercised in violation of that principle finds its justification as incidental to the exercise of executive power. That is the centralization which the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) talks about.

We are discussing an important question, as the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) says, and it does go to the very root. He speaks about the courts. Why, delegate Sherman Whipple, if I remember correctly his lecture in Virginia, is an authority that the courts have done that which the gentleman from Wellesley says they have not.

We have certain principles laid down in the Bible, and then we have certain commentators, certain interpreters. But does any one say because a commentator or an interpreter says a certain thing that “Thus saith the Bible”? The Constitution says certain things. The people in the Legislature think that the Constitution warrants them in passing a certain law. Up to that time it is the honest expression of the representatives of the people, who knowingly would not violate their oath to support the Constitution. So they pass a law. Then a few men, — the judges, — say it is unconstitutional. This popular clamor against it that the gentleman from Wellesley talks about is an incident to any democratic government, — the right of the majority to rule.

Mr. Anderson: I wish to ask the gentleman from Brockton if the exercise of the police power by the Legislature, according to his reply to my first question, is subject to judicial construction, what good does this proposition do, from his point of view?

Mr. Brown: I would answer the gentleman’s question by saying that it limits the power of the courts to go so far as they now go in determining that certain legislative details are a violation of the Constitution. But it does not take away entirely from the court the power to determine that some very plain controlling principle had been violated, and possibly violated by an oversight. That is my differentiation that I would make.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I feel a good deal of trepidation in permitting any poor, dull words of mine to be measured with the utterances of the distinguished gentlemen to whom we have listened this morning, but there are one or two assertions made by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) which I, for one, cannot allow to pass unchallenged.

It has been asserted repeatedly on the floor of this Convention that the judicial power, as we construe it, is peculiar to American institutions, and that its exercise is an act of judicial usurpation, — sheer usurpation. The forefathers in establishing judicial competency did nothing revolutionary or unprecedented. The idea did not originate with John Marshall, as we have been told here this morning. Judicial review was the natural outgrowth of beliefs that were common property at the time the different Constitutions were being framed.

It is quite true that in most modern States parliaments are supreme, but the reason for this is simple enough when you come to trace it historically. It was not always so. The time was when the courts were appealed to in order to protect the kingly prerogative against the encroachment of the Parliament, but as parliaments grew stronger the judicial power began to wane. It is true that after the Revolution in England in 1688, and after Louis went to the guillotine, no court in England or France would undertake to construe ordinary legislation. But even in England, as I understand it, the courts would intervene to-day to declare an act void which was impossible of performance or which was inconsistent with natural justice. I suppose an act depriving an Englishman of his right to trial by jury would be a case of that sort. Very broadly speaking, as I understand the fact, in civil law countries the courts may be said to be comparatively weak, whereas in common law countries they are comparatively strong. But it is a mistake to say that our fathers were not acquainted with the theory of legislative sovereignty. They were. That is just the thing they wanted to curb.

There is no case which shows this better, in my judgment, than the case of Bayard v. Singleton, — and it may be worth while to take just a moment to review it, — which arose in North Carolina shortly before the Federal Convention met in Philadelphia. This case, which may be found in Martin's Reports, was an action of ejectment to recover a lot of ground with a house and a wharf. The defendant held under a deed given by the State commissioner of confiscated estates. The plaintiffs claimed under the deed of one Cornell, the father of Mrs. Bayard, who lived and died an English subject. The contention was that Mrs. Bayard was deprived of her property without due process of law, and this contention was upheld by the North Carolina court. The leading counsel in the case was Iredell, who was afterwards Supreme Court Justice in Washington, and he wrote some very interesting letters about that time. I want to take a moment to read one or two extracts, because they throw a flood of light upon this question. Iredell wrote a letter, printed at Newbern on August 17, 1786, in which he said:

We had not only been sickened and disgusted for years with the high and almost impious language of Great Britain, of the omnipotent power of the British Parliament, but had severely smarted under its effects. . . . Theories were nothing to us, opposed to our own severe experience. We were not ignorant of the theory of the necessity of the Legislature being absolute in all cases, because it was the great ground of the British pretensions. But this was a mere speculative principle, which men at ease and leisure thought proper to assume. When we were at liberty to form a government as we thought best, without regard to that or any theoretical principle we did not approve of, we decisively gave our sentiments against it, being willing to run all the risks of a government to be conducted on the principles then laid as the basis of it. . . . No people had ever before deliberately met for so great a purpose. Other governments have been established by chance, caprice, or mere brutal force. Ours, thank God, spring from the deliberate voice of the people. We provided, or meant to provide. — God grant our purpose may not be defeated. — for the security of every individual, as well as a fluctuating majority of the people. We know the value of liberty too well to suffer it to depend on the capricious voice of popular favor, easily led astray by designing men, and courted for insidious purposes.
And again, on August 26, 1787, he wrote Richard Dobbs Spaight, a delegate to the Philadelphia Convention:

In a republican government, as I conceive, individual liberty is a matter of the utmost moment, as, if there be no check upon the public passions, it is in the greatest danger. The majority, having the rule in their own hands, may take care of themselves; but in what condition are the minority, if the power of the other is without limit? These considerations, I suppose, or similar ones, occasioned such express provisions for the personal liberty of each citizen, which the citizens, when they formed the Constitution, chose to reserve as an unalienated right, and not to leave, at the mercy of any assembly whatever.

This case does not stand alone. Others could be cited. Just one further reference. The Continental Congress passed a resolution, after the treaty of peace with England, in which it implored the different States to enact a resolution declaring all statutes inconsistent with the treaty to be void and of no effect, and in an address Congress said:

By repealing in general terms all acts and clauses repugnant to the treaty, the business will be turned over to its proper department, viz., the judicial; and the courts of law will find no difficulty in deciding whether any particular act or clause is or is not contrary to the treaty.

So I say it is absurd to argue that the idea of judicial competency was not thoroughly well understood at the time the Federal Constitution was being framed, and at the time the different State Constitutions also were being framed.

The gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) said some few days ago that if "we are to be hampered by written restrictions made 150 years ago, then we must consent that we are ready to be wiped out." I deny that we are so hampered. We never have been. The fact that we have adopted as many amendments as we have since 1820 shows that our constitutional system is flexible. This Convention itself is a refutation of any such theory. If I understand the gentleman himself, he does not deny that a judicial tribunal is the best tribunal that can be devised by the wit of man to construe a written instrument if we are to have a written instrument. He said this morning that we have got to have a democracy. Very well. What kind of a democracy? A constitutional democracy, which means a written Constitution? If so, where lies the power which is to construe it?

In his book on "The Theory of Social Revolutions" the distinguished gentleman from Quincy (and I may refer to him as Brooks Adams, the author) says: (I quote from page 78.)

In theory it may be true, as Hamilton contended, that given the fact that a written Constitution is inevitable, a bench of judges is the best tribunal to interpret its meaning, since the duty of the judge has ever been, and is now, to interpret the meaning of written instruments.

He says on another page that:

A Legislature is nearly the antithesis of a court. It is designed to reflect the passions of the voters.

There you have the two opposing theories very fairly stated. Of course a Legislature is governed by expediency. On the other hand, as a constitutional writer of some note has said recently, a court is governed by logic, it is governed by precedent, by the sensible meaning of words and the perception of their moral consequences. If we are to have a written Constitution, the superiority of a system of judicial review cannot be disputed. Those who would deny to the courts the power of review must in effect be contending for a system under which constitutional guarantees will be honored or dishonored according to the whim of the voting majority of the moment.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: A member of this Convention (Mr. Bennett) yesterday paid his compliments to persons who "let themselves loose." We all delight in that member. Our sessions would be arid indeed without Old Personal Privilege. But I believe in men who let themselves loose, men who have some personal feeling about what goes on in this Convention, and the questions before it.

I desire to say three things with regard to the immediate topic brought up by the motion of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams), which raises a question of the power of the judiciary as compared with that of the Legislature. Did time allow I should be happy to cross swords with the gentleman who has just spoken so eloquently with regard to the origin of this principle. There is this to be said, however: Undoubtedly the Federal Convention understood the principle of judicial review, because they intended it should be applied by the Federal courts to State legislation; but the Supreme Court of the United States never found out until 1857 that it had the power to set aside acts of Congress. I leave out of account the decision in the Marbury case of 1803 and the Fereira decision of 1853, for reasons which I have not here the time to state. If ever there was a political decision it was the Marbury decision, which by pretense set aside an act of Congress, but actually was intended to set aside action of the President of the United States, and as a rebuke to both the other departments, which had become Democratic, while the Supreme Court remained Federalist.

The main thing for which I wished to speak is simply to ask the question: By what right does a court in any of our States or in the Union assume to set aside the acts of coordinate departments? Of course the power of the courts is precisely the same with regard to acts of the executive which they may be called upon to traverse. Our courts are constantly overruling the decisions of executive authorities less than the Governor, and by mandamus compelling them to perform acts which they have failed to perform. Now, I ask again, what is the bottom principle of politics or government upon which the courts have the right to veto the legislative and the executive, while neither of those departments has any constitutional right to pass upon the judiciary? Where do you look for it? In the Constitution of Massachusetts there is no clause to that effect. In the Constitution of the United States there is no clause to that effect, except certain provisions which certainly intended that State legislation should be reviewed by Federal courts. No, the whole power is based upon custom and usage, accepted by the people of the United States. True, that is a mighty basis.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: Along the line that the gentleman is arguing, will he kindly answer these two questions?

First, as to whether or not in the Federal Constitution there are not at least two clauses,—that the judicial power shall be vested in the Supreme Judicial Court, and that the judicial power shall extend to questions arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and Second, whether or not those two clauses taken together do not vest in the Supreme Judicial Court the power to make these decisions as to the constitutionality of statutes?

Mr. Hart: There is no time to answer those questions adequately; and in order to relieve the pressure I will withdraw that statement with regard to this Commonwealth, though I do not admit that there is an express constitutional right given to the court in this State. In almost all the Commonwealths of the United States in their Constitutions there is no express constitutional right. The one point that I want to make is simply this, then: We have this power by custom, by usage. In this Commonwealth it is very deeply seated, and therefore I am not in favor of disturbing it. The constituency in Massachusetts are accustomed to the system. They have confidence in their courts. The only thing which this Convention seems at all inclined to modify with regard to the judiciary is the life tenure of the judges. Therefore I am not speaking with the view to bring about in the minds of my fellow-members a temper which would lead to a discontinuance of this procedure in Massachusetts. What I want to bring out clearly is exactly in the line of what has been said by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) and the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), in their two eloquent speeches pendent of each other,—namely, the fact that we are confronted here by a usage and that a future usage may spring up which will undo it. It took a very long time for the people of Massachusetts to recognize fully the power of judicial review in their State. It took a much longer time for the Federal Supreme Court to arrive at that conclusion. The first clear case of significant legislation then in force which was set aside by that Court was the Legal Tender case of 1870, and the very next year the Supreme Court reversed itself upon that decision. The truth is that we are addicted to a system of self-confined government.

Mr. William S. Kinney: The debate on this subject has been very exhaustive and has covered the entire question. There are just two issues presented by this amendment, and those issues are of far-reaching effect. They involve, as has been stated, the transfer of the power to define the police powers of the Legislature from the Supreme Judicial Court to the Legislature itself. If we write into the Constitution that language, as has been stated by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), we practically are nullifying the powers of the court; and as has been stated by the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn), we start out on a course of action that ultimately will destroy the value of written Constitutions in this country. With those two great issues before us, issues which have been debated in the Federal Congress since the formation of the country, issues which played a prominent part in plunging the great Republic into the civil war, I do not believe that in this critical hour of affairs this Convention is going to recommend to the voters of Massachusetts an amendment with those far-reaching and perilous effects.

Mr. Glazier of Hudson: Before voting on this resolution I wish to have my mind cleared a little, and I trust that some of the lawyers in the Convention will give me the information, so that we may take a vote understandably. I find in this resolution as offered by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. George) that any enactment of the Legislature shall take effect at once. I recall that we already have voted also on a resolution which has become a proposed amendment to the Constitution, that any enactment of the Legislature shall not become effective for at least 90 days, and my question is: In voting for this am I conflicting with that proposed constitutional amendment which we already have voted upon? In other words, at the top of page 7 we find "shall not be repugnant or contrary to the Constitution", which is in our Constitution as at the present time, but by this vote, as I understand, we simply are reiterating that Constitution, and, this being a later vote, I want to know what the effect will be with the ruling of the Supreme Judicial Court or any other authority.

The amendment moved by Mr. Adams of Quincy was rejected.

The resolution (No. 82) was rejected, as had been recommended by the committee on The General Court.

Rights of the People.

Mr. E. Gerry Brown of Brockton presented the following resolution (No. 147):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The enumeration herein of certain rights shall not impair nor deny others retained by the people.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted; and it was considered by the Committee of the Whole Tuesday, August 7, 1917, and was rejected by the Convention the next day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to give an opportunity to the member in charge of this measure, or any other member of the committee on Bill of Rights, so that it may appear in the record, to say what was the reason for rejecting this; what would be the effect of it if it were there, or, in other words, what is the effect if it is not there.

I desire to say, sir, that I consider this matter somewhat important. It is my resolution; I know that there have been times when, if those words were in the Constitution, legal questions might not have been decided as they were decided. I know also until a provision of that nature was adopted by various States that they would not accept the Constitution of the United States. I know that at the time when we in Massachusetts were considering the very question of whether or not to adopt the Constitution of the United States, that was one of the provisions which was enumerated by the President of the Convention, Governor Bowdoin, as being the safeguard that the States had against the usurpation by the Congress of the United States. Furthermore, that Adams, whose support was very much needed, said that this safeguard was the one thing that enabled him to support it, and even at that the vote was very close under which that was passed. It provides practically that the power that is not delegated by the people remains in the hands of the people and that any rights that may be enumerated do not impair other rights which they have not delegated. Therefore I wanted to have the committee state as to why it was rejected. But if the committee proposes to dispose of it, trusting to the fact that the majority of the Convention will stand with them, it seems to be safe in assuming such a position.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

XIV.

ELECTION AND TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

Electio of Judges.

Mr. James E. Maguire of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 197):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The judges of the Supreme Court, the Superior Court, and the Land Court shall be elected by the people of the Commonwealth; the judges of probate and insolvency, and of police, district, municipal and juvenile courts by the people of their several judicial districts at the annual State elections in the year one thousand nine hundred and eighteen for a term of six years.

If a vacancy occurs in the office of judge of any of the said courts the Governor shall appoint, by and with the consent of the Council, a person to fill such vacancy until the election and qualification of a judge to hold said office, which election shall take place at the next succeeding general election and the person so elected shall hold office for a full term of six years.

No person shall be eligible for the office of judge of the Supreme Court unless he shall be learned in the law, at least thirty-five years of age and a member of the bar for at least ten years.

No person shall be eligible for the office of judge of the Superior Court and of the Land Court unless he shall be learned in the law, at least thirty years of age and a member of the bar for at least five years.

No person shall be eligible for the office of judge of probate and insolvency, police, district and municipal and juvenile courts unless he shall have been a member of the bar for five years next preceding his election.

The names of all candidates for the office of judge of the several courts aforesaid shall be placed on the regular ballot in alphabetical order without partisan or other designation except the title of the office.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted, Mr. Maguire dissenting. It was first considered by the Committee of the Whole Thursday, August 2, 1917, and that committee reported to the Convention recommending that the resolution ought not to be adopted. Subsequently, it was recommitted to the Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was rejected Friday, June 14, 1918, by a vote of 125 to 2.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Boston: This resolution, No. 197, provides for the election of judges by the people by a non-partisan method. The purpose of the resolution is to take the judiciary out of politics; to place it beyond party control or consideration; to make it really an independent branch of the government; incidentally, but of vital importance, to restore to the legal profession its former well deserved prestige, for in the operation of the amendment the selection of the judiciary, in my opinion, will rest with an active, vigilant, honest bar upon whom the people may confidently rely for assistance in making their choice of judges. A judge who receives his commission from the people has higher credentials than one who receives his appointment from executive authority. Certainly in a free Commonwealth this is not open to argument.

Under the present system of appointing judges, when a vacancy oc-
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

There are no differences between the parties in the methods of making judicial appointments. In one case a Republican is appointed; in the other a Democrat invariably is selected for the vacancy. About five years ago the Democratic party emerged from a long "Egyptian night." It then elected Governor Foss, and he was succeeded by Governor Walsh. The party had five years of opportunity to make judicial appointments. When making appointments, invariably, — and I speak as a Democrat, — the main consideration was political. The first question was: "What has he done for the party?" The Republican members of the bar remained quiet. They were not active candidates for the vacancies. They knew it would be useless, that the Democrats would follow the example of their party and appoint partisans to the positions. It is only fair to say that when the number of appointments became so many that it looked a little strong, a little selfish to give them all to the Democratic members of the bar, a few of them were given to Republicans.

Now, I submit that the appointment of judges under party government is generally political. It can hardly be otherwise. Also, the system tends to minimize, if, indeed, it does not humiliate, the legal profession by practically forcing its members to curry the favor of political leaders and party organizations, if they would have their very necessary influence for a judicial appointment. Of the legal profession I need only say that Bryce regards it as the one educated class in the country, and that it has done much for the Republic from the beginning. There is no reason why its members should not take a vital, active, commanding interest in the selection of the judiciary. Under the present appointing system they do not, — they cannot. The party in power appoints the members of that party, — for services rendered. I say that regardless of whether it is the Democratic party or the Republican party. The minority party for the time being has little or no consideration in the matter of making the appointments. They are just as political as they can be, — just as political as the selection of a member of the Public Service Commission, or the Gas and Electric Light Commission, or any of the commissions that are under appointment by the Governor.

The article of amendment which I have presented is a non-partisan proposition. It provides that the candidates shall have certain qualifications and that their names shall be placed upon the regular ballot.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

in alphabetical order without partisan or other designation except the title of the office. It takes the judiciary entirely out of the game of politics and puts it before the bar and the people where it belongs. I contend that if the bar will be active and vigilant in the selection of the members of the judiciary, that if in any campaign it endorses A for judge because of his superior qualifications over B, the people will elect A. It is preposterous to think that if the bar supports a candidate in a given campaign, for a given judicial office, the people will not second them and approve their choice. The arrangement is almost ideal. A profession jealous of the standing and reputation of its judiciary deliberates on the qualifications of the candidates and submits its opinion to the people who act finally upon them. The tenure of office is for a term of years and mistakes, if any are made, can be corrected in a relatively short time. Contrast that with the present appointing system. There is nothing more humiliating, in my opinion, than to see a member of the bar trailing into a political headquarters, — Democratic or Republican makes no difference, — nothing more humiliating than holding the coat or the hat of a political leader, so that some time he may be able to get his support for a judicial appointment. And that is what happens under the appointing system. Think of a man who can bring himself to do such things being made a judge for life! In the Legislature, if a member of the House or the Senate is very active in railroad matters or helping the Governor to get a particular piece of legislation through, and a vacancy in the judiciary occurs, there is a strong probability that he will be appointed. Such cases have occurred. Surely there ought not to be any hesitancy in preferring the non-partisan method of selecting judges to the present political arrangement. And now is an opportune time for the change if the Republican party, for instance, is about to start on a long period of control of the State. It is unfair to eliminate the minority from consideration in the matter of judicial appointments and yet, by the custom of politics, that is just what will continue to happen unless the change is made.

The first objection that we meet when we propose an elective judiciary in Massachusetts is the fact that John Adams, in the framing of the original Constitution, in the Bill of Rights, — in the good old Bill of Rights, — Section 29, says:

It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial and independent as the lot of humanity will admit. It is therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court should hold their offices as long as they behave themselves well; and that they should have honorable salaries ascertained and established by standing laws.

That is very well written, and in a very lofty tone. But twenty years later, when John Adams was President of the United States and about to retire, there were sixteen judges to appoint on the Circuit bench of the United States court. What did John do? I am reading from Bryce's "American Commonwealth." Mr. Bryce's advantage in treating all our governmental matters is that he views them objectively. Mr. Bryce says:

Congress having in 1801, pursuant to a power contained in the Constitution, established sixteen Circuit courts, President Adams, immediately before he quitte office, appointed members of his own party to the justiceships thus created.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

Who succeeded John Adams? He was succeeded by Thomas Jefferson, the man who wrote the Declaration of Independence, probably the greatest man among all the early leaders, certainly the man who did more to make this a democratic government, a democratic republic, than any of the others. When Adams acted that way had he in mind his earlier philosophy of 1780 as written in the Bill of Rights, and had he changed his mind? If not, what was his point of view? In the light of his conduct as President of these United States, appointing political followers or political workers, or what not, as judges of the Circuit Court, we are justified in rejecting his advice in the Bill of Rights because when clothed with high executive functions he discredited his own sentiments. It is perfectly fair to say that when he wrote the Bill of Rights he thought Massachusetts was going to be a Federalist State, and that members of his own party, and only members of his own party, were going to be selected for the judicial offices. It is also fair to say that he had no intention of keeping the judiciary out of politics. And as a plain matter of fact he put the judiciary very much in politics. He did not make it independent of the other branches of the government; he made it subordinate to the executive department for he placed the appointment of judges under its control.

Having touched on the Federal judiciary,—and the Federal judiciary invariably is cited as a fine example of the appointive system,—I shall call attention to what Bryce says of the Legal Tender cases, when the court was packed by no less a man than President Grant:

In 1866, when Congress was in fierce antagonism to President Johnson, and desired to prevent him from appointing any judges, it reduced the number, which was then ten, by a statute providing that no vacancy should be filled up until the number was reduced to seven. In 1869, when Johnson had been succeeded by Grant, the number was raised to nine, and presently the altered court allowed the question of the validity of the Legal Tender act, just before determined, to be reopened. This method is plainly susceptible of further and possibly dangerous application. Suppose a Congress and President bent on doing something which the Supreme Court deems contrary to the Constitution. They pass a statute. A case arises under it. The court on the hearing of the case unanimously declares the statute to be null, as being beyond the powers of Congress. Congress forthwith passes and the President signs another statute more than doubling the number of the justices. The President appoints to the new justiceships men who are pledged to hold the former statute constitutional. The Senate confirms his appointments. Another case raising the validity of the disputed statute is brought up to the court. The new justices outvote the old ones; the statute is held valid; the security provided for the protection of the Constitution is gone like a morning mist.

That the appointed Federal judiciary is not entitled to any halo is further shown in the Tilden vs. Hayes contest when a number of them were appointed on the electoral commission. They voted on who should be President according to their political bias rather than in a judicial manner. Since then we have been mortified to see the income tax declared unconstitutional by one of the Justices changing his vote from yes to no.

Another argument, or shall I say obstacle, we have to meet when we propose an elective judiciary is what Rufus Choate had to say in the Convention of 1853 in favor of the appointive method. Inasmuch as Mr. Choate will be quoted here, and what he had to say urged as a reason for the continuance of the appointive system I think it well to read what some of his colleagues had to say in favor of the election of judges by the people. Their position seems sounder than his. They have more faith in the people. They answer him sufficiently. I read from them:

Mr. Wood of Middleborough:

Now, if it is proper for the people to keep the power in their own hands, then the only way in which that can be done is to provide for the election of these officers by the people, as we provide for the election of all other officers. If it is not proper that the people should retain this power, it must be on account of one of two reasons — either, first, that the people at some time may not be desirous of electing proper officers; or else, secondly, because they have not sufficient intelligence to make a proper selection.

In regard to the first of these reasons which may be adduced, namely, that the people may at some time become so corrupt, or take so little interest in the matter, that they will not care whether proper persons shall be elected or not, no one, I presume, will undertake to sustain such a position for a moment. They are interested in this matter above all others. They are the only parties who are interested, for any one of us may be under the necessity of falling back upon the judiciary for the protection of our interests and our liberty. The whole people, then, are interested; and it cannot be otherwise than that they must always be anxious to keep the bench filled with honest and upright and learned and independent judges.

Mr. Hooper of Fall River:

It is admitted, — because it has been demonstrated in other States, — that the people of other States are fully competent to perform this duty, and surely no one will place the people of Massachusetts in an inferior position to the people of any State in the Union, in regard to intelligence and capability of self-government. Why, then, should they be denied the exercise of this right?

Mr. Holder of Lynn:

It has been said that the election of the judges by the people would destroy their independence, and make them subservient to political parties. I beg leave to differ from gentlemen who take that view of the subject. I believe it will clothe them with a true and god-like independence, based upon the popular will of the people. That, sir, is always true and unerring, and should always be regarded by all men who are in authority. I would ask gentlemen of this Convention if they wish to give the judge a salary and continue to guarantee it to any class of individuals who shall not be chosen by the people, and who are not popular with the people?

Mr. French of Beverly:

I do not see why a judge appointed by the Governor would not be as liable to be led astray by political prepossessions as a judge elected by the people. I am for retaining in the hands of the people all the power that belongs to them. Power, it is said, is always stealing from the many to the few; and that power which belongs to the people, I want them to hold.

Mr. Keyes of Dedham:

They tell us that the people cannot be trusted with the powers necessary for their own safety and their own salvation, and we shall virtually acknowledge it if we refuse to adopt the amendment. I believe, if there are any officers whose election can be safely intrusted to the people, they are the judges. I regard it to be so on the ground that the office of judge is one in which all the people are interested, and the integrity and respectability of those who are to occupy that office is near and dear to the hearts of all the people. Because the people are liable, in some degree, to feel their power and to be affected by their decisions, they will exercise a criticism and judgment in their selection that are not exercised in regard to any other class of public men.

Mr. Butler of Lowell:

The whole argument which was put by my friend from Manchester (Mr. Dana) appeared to me to proceed upon an entirely wrong basis, — upon a distrust of the people. And that was the case with the ingenious argument of the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Greenleaf) who, with the tact of an old lawyer, and the artistic finish of the profession, says: "Why, why do you wish to make the judges elective?
The people elect them now. They elect the Governor and the Governor elects the judges, and what more would you do?"

I say I think both the gentlemen have proceeded upon a wrong assumption. One fairly puts the argument that he distrusts the people, that he distrusts popular influence, an argument which proceeds upon the ground that every bad influence comes from the people, and every good influence from conservatism; it seems to put the argument upon the ground that the judges are only to be influenced by corporate wealth and power. If they can be rendered independent of the people, they say, it is well enough; but if you bring them within the influence of the people, they will be wrong.

The citations I have read answer, I think, Rufus Choate. They are from men, as we look back, who seemed earnest and red-blooded, men who had confidence in the people. Notwithstanding all the glittering and appealing generalities of Mr. Choate in his remarks, I submit that the confidence of these men, these old leaders, in the people, the feeling that the people can be trusted, is a much better argument, a much safer position and more to their glory than the sentiments and the attitude taken by Dana and Greenleaf and Choate and some of the others.

When this matter was discussed before the committee on Judiciary a number of the members of the Convention appeared in favor of the different resolutions. Conspicuous among those who opposed an elective judiciary was an attorney who very frankly and very bravely said that he represented the Boston Elevated Railway Company, and who also said that he spoke for himself. I asked him why his corporation, above all the corporations in the Commonwealth, felt it necessary to appear before the Judiciary Committee in opposition to these measures. He answered that his corporation at one time was a party to about sixty per cent of the cases in Suffolk County; the figure later fell down to fifty and now he thinks it is forty per cent. That appeared to him sufficient reason why he should come before the committee in opposition to the elective system over the appointive method.

My next question was: "Does your corporation under the present system take any active interest in the selection of judges?" He said that as a corporation there was no active interest in the selection of judges. I asked: "Do you as individuals take any active part in the selection of judges?" He hesitated, but finally admitted that he had signed a petition of endorsement of candidates for judicial appointments, but he did not like the practice. Now, I know of my own knowledge that at least one other member of his legal firm has endorsed candidates for judgeships, and I know that in the case of a district judge the man who had his endorsement was successful. I do not say that he is a poor judge, or that he is an indifferent judge, or that he is unfaithful; I simply assert the influence that secured his appointment.

The point that I wish to establish and to drive home is that the corporations are taking an active interest under the present system of selecting the judiciary. They do not expect a given judge to decide a given case, perhaps, in their favor; all they hope for is that a judge shall have a certain mental attitude on property and individual and other rights, — and brought up in a particular environment he is very apt to have a corresponding mental list; given that, they are perfectly satisfied to rest there. So naturally they object to the elective system, for under it the people will have more to say about the judiciary; those selected to be judges will be certain to have a freer mental attitude on the questions that come before them.

I may say here that the attorney I have mentioned had no effect on, or influence with, the committee. I simply am bringing in the fact that the corporation was represented, to give the Committee of the Whole an opportunity to know its attitude on this question. No other corporation felt it was necessary to come before the committee and argue the matter. However, the attorney was not very happy in some of his arguments. At one time he would find fault with the jury system; at another time he would complain of the judges, their failure to set aside cases that he felt ought to be set aside. Again, he did not think the bar could be relied upon to take an active, vigilant interest in the selection of judges if this non-partisan elective method were adopted. His arguments were so inconsistent that I am obliged to say that he must have thought we were a different jury every time he spoke before us. When I noted his different attitudes to him, he was a little embarrassed.

I now ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the other great States of the Union. In thirty-seven of them the judges are elected by the people, in four by the Legislature, in three by the Governor and Council,—Massachusetts is one of the three,—and in three by the Governor and the Senate. All those States were organized and adopted Constitutions after our Constitution was adopted. They had the benefit of the philosophy of our Constitution, but in all the States with an elective judiciary the people rejected that philosophy, they insisted on keeping the right to select the judiciary in themselves. They believed the judiciary is most independent when elected by the people.

At my request the committee on Judiciary asked the Commission on the Compilation of Information for the Convention to send letters to the different States for the purpose of getting their point of view on the operation or the effectiveness of the elective system. The following letter was sent to the Governor, Attorney-General and President of the State Bar Association of the following States: Alabama, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin, Vermont, Maryland, and Nebraska:

DEAR Sir: — The committee on the Judiciary of the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts, which is now in session, is investigating the subject of an elective judiciary. As your State has had such a system for many years, it would be of great assistance to the committee if you would send us a statement of your observation of the working of the system. You will, no doubt, understand better than I can tell you the sort of information that a Constitutional Convention sitting in a State which has never had an elective judiciary would like to have. From conversations that I have had with many of the delegates, I am sure, however, that they would like to be informed how far partisan considerations mitigate against the selection of competent judges. If you are willing to make a statement upon the point, it would be of interest to know whether, if the question were now an open one in your State, you would prefer an elective or an appointive judiciary.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) LAWRENCE B. EVANS.

The following are the pertinent portions of the replies thus far received. I am reading them all, whether favorable or unfavorable to the position I am trying to maintain.

The Attorney-General of Alabama:
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

I have your favor of the 12th instant, asking for my statement whether the elective or appointed judiciary would be more beneficial to the public service. In reply thereto, I beg to say that the conclusion on this question would be reached only after the consideration of many questions. In Alabama, for instance, at the present time the elective system is better than one in which the members of the Supreme Court were appointed by the chief executive. I rather think that probably the best system that could be devised would be one in which a limited number of names, not exceeding five, should be submitted to the Legislature by the Governor, and one elected from such number; providing for additional submissions in the event the ones submitted are disapproved.

The foregoing remarks are suggested by thought of the Supreme Court. I really think they might also apply to the selection of trial judges. In a great many instances the bench is not inviting to a lawyer who is studious and with judicial ability, for he would be pitted against one who is more politician than judge. If the candidates did not have to seek the individual vote, the campaign would be less expensive and it would result in a general consideration of the leading members of the bar for such offices.

My views are expressed without the result of mature consideration. They are merely impressions which to-day occur to me.

Partisan considerations in this State militate for or against the selection of judges. The prohibition question has become one of the leading public issues, which is now regarded in the selection of judges. Other questions will arise, of course, and it is natural that when the people elect men to office they will inquire what may be the views of each candidate.

These letters, as you will note, are read whether they are for or against the purpose of my resolution. Let the chips fall whichever way they may. As you no doubt have noted the letter sent out by the commission is absolutely fair, and its purpose is simply to gather information on the subject. The next letter is from the President of the Bar Association of Illinois:

At various times at our State bar meetings the question of elective or appointive judiciary has been discussed and the practice in your State has always been cited.

In Illinois we elect in each county a county judge, who has certain jurisdiction and also probate jurisdiction except in counties where the population is 70,000 or more in which counties probate judges are elected, city judges in some cities, depending upon the vote of the people, municipal judges in Cook County, circuit judges throughout the State and Superior judges in Cook County of the same jurisdiction as circuit judges, and Supreme Court judges. We have another court called the Appellate Court, the judges of which are selected from the circuit by the Supreme judges. The term of the county judge is four years, of the circuit six years and of the Supreme nine years. Partisanship to a greater or less extent enters into the selection of judges. The Illinois State Bar Association has urged non-partisan judiciary.

In this circuit is now a vacancy caused by decease. The lawyers of the circuit, comprising four counties, have selected a successor to be elected. The circuit is strongly one party and no member of any other party was considered. However, as our circuit was constituted some years ago we elected one of the three judges from the minority party especially because of learning.

In Chicago the lawyers very often endeavor to have a bi-partisan ticket and Mr. Tolman will write you more fully the method there followed.

It is a fact throughout the State the endeavor is to have on the bench the best men and if left to the lawyers I think very many would prefer a non-partisan ticket.

You have asked me directly "how far partisan considerations militate against the selection of competent judges." In my judgment, outside of Cook County, the competency of our circuit and Supreme judges is not affected injuriously by party considerations. On the contrary those considerations might make conventions more careful in their selection.

The Attorney-General of Illinois:

Our judges are elected in this State. What are known as our circuit judges are elected every six years, and our Supreme judges every nine years. Our county judges every four years.

Since it is the only system we have had in this State, we know nothing of any other system. So far, the reputation of our judiciary has been good. We take pride in the fact that our Supreme Court has been considered an able court since the admission of our State, and we have always had good circuit courts throughout the State.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

The election of our circuit judges and Supreme judges is held in the month of June. No other election is held on the day of the judicial election. This was intended to remove the election of judges from politics. However, we find that it does not do so, because our leading parties always have candidates for these positions. As I have said before, our judges have usually been capable and deserving men, and political lines have not usually militated against this. However, it may be that in a few cases the best men have not been selected. That would occur occasionally in an appointment. There are a number of lawyers in this State who take the position that in our next Constitutional Convention provision should be made for the appointment of judges.

I have no means of knowing whether that will be a better plan than to elect.

The Attorney-General of Iowa:

Personally I am in favor of an elective judiciary. I am also in favor of a partisan judiciary. I am in favor of their nomination by convention and not by the system of a primary.

In this State we have always had an elective judiciary, both to our Supreme and inferior courts. I think I may say our bar is universally pleased with this method. We have on the whole had a very able and very satisfactory bench until the adoption of the non-partisan judiciary. Since the adoption of the non-partisan judiciary, we have found that there are thousands of voters who do not express their views upon the selection of the candidates for the judiciary and who fail to express any choice at a general election.

I think I may safely say that it is the consensus of opinion among the members of the bar of this State that the old partisan method of selection of our judges through the party convention was very much more satisfactory than our present method.

The appointment of judges by our Governors has been far from satisfactory. We have found in connection with these appointments greater objection to the men who have been selected through the appointment than the men who have been chosen at the election, and instead of the selection by election militating against the standard of the bench, we have found the standard of judges selected by that method superior.

If the question were an open one in this State, I would prefer an elective to an appointive judiciary.

On the question of a non-partisan selection of judges the trouble in those States where it has been apparently ineffective has been due to the fact that there have been no qualification requirements; that is, not enough restrictions as to the age of candidates and the length of time they have been members of the bar. All that is provided for in my resolution.

The Governor of Kansas:

I will say that we have, during our State history, operated under the elective system, the district judges holding four years and the Justices of the Supreme Court six years. While now and then some partisan elements enter in, the general result has been the selection of competent and conscientious men and the judicial history of the State has been remarkably free from any taint or scandal. Various plans have been discussed for judiciary selection in some other way, but nothing definite has come therefrom. I feel sure that if the people were again asked to vote on the proposition they would strongly favor the elective system.

Assistant Attorney-General of Kansas:

In this State all judges are elected. The judges of the Supreme Court by the electors of the entire State, judges of district courts by the voters of the various districts, probate judges by the voters in their respective counties. I have been practicing in Kansas about thirty years. Prior to that time my school days were spent in New Haven, Connecticut. I have occasionally noticed that judges have been elected apparently on account of the fact that the voters believed that they represented a policy of government being at the time widely agitated and receiving the approval of the general public. Some of those policies have been considered by many unreasonable and have been abandoned, and the judges who advocated them have been retired with the change in the sentiment of the public. According to my observation in normal times party policies do not have nearly so much to do with the selection of judges as does the personality of the candidate. In those districts where a candidate is able to become personally acquainted with large numbers in different classes amongst the voters and where such acquaintance leads to his being favorably known, the candidate who becomes well acquainted generally receives a large support irrespective of party lines, but in the State at large where the average voter knows but little of the personality of the candidate for Supreme bench the candidates of the dominant party are generally elected.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

The greatest difficulty in this State seems to be due to the fact that there is very little opportunity for candidates for judicial office to become generally known by the voters at large. A few years ago this State tried an experiment by having the judges of the different courts selected by a non-partisan primary. At that primary as many were to become candidates as chose to do so and at the primary twice as many candidates were selected as there were positions to be filled. That year there were three judges of the Supreme Court to be elected. The six who received the highest number of votes at the primary were therefore selected as candidates. The plan resulted in the defeat of two of the members of the Supreme bench who were candidates for renomination and re-election. One was defeated at the primary and another at the election, and one or two persons who were totally unfit for such office received surprisingly large votes. It seemed to be generally believed that that plan threatened to very seriously jeopardize the standing of the Supreme Court and the law was promptly repealed. Personally, I do not think that partisan considerations in general have much more to do with the selection of judges in Kansas than would be the case if judges were appointed by the Governor or any other individual.

The Governor of Maryland:

In this State our judiciary are elected. The Governor has power to fill a vacancy only until the next general election. It is true that frequently nominations are made by the respective parties, but it is likewise true that unless such nominees are the best men they cannot depend upon the party vote, and it very frequently happens that a man of either party may be so strong that the opposing party will not make a nomination, and, while politics may have something to do with their nomination, if the judges make good they are very seldom opposed for party reasons. In our State, in my opinion, the strongest available men are nominated and elected judges. I have never heard our bench itself accused of being influenced by partisan considerations. I think our plan works very well in this State.

The Attorney-General of Maryland:

A good many people think that the judiciary in this State ought to be appointive, because lawyers often feel disinclined to subject themselves to political campaigns for election. At the same time my observation is that the people usually re-elect a judge who has served satisfactorily, regardless of his politics, and very frequently elect a judge who has simply been appointed to fill a vacancy, if he has served satisfactorily.

I am inclined to think that the Maryland judiciary is of as high a grade under the elective system as it would be under the appointive system. What really ought to be done is to provide increased salaries, because the existing salaries are such that successful lawyers at least in Baltimore city, very often cannot afford to become judges.

The President of the Bar Association of Michigan:

Receipt of your letter of July 12th is acknowledged. The elective judiciary has been productive of reasonably satisfactory results in this State. It is open to the criticism that qualifications as a politician as well as judicial qualifications are necessary to secure election to the bench. A judge who has obtained his nomination through political shrewdness is peculiarly open to the charge of playing politics on the bench. This situation has developed a well defined belief quite largely entertained throughout this State (but by no means unanimous or even controlling) that judges should be either appointed, or be elected upon a non-partisan ballot. This question was before our Legislature this year, but died in committee. It will be before our Legislature again in 1919.

From these facts it may be gathered that the election of judges on partisan ballots is not wholly satisfactory. I believe that few lawyers in this State look upon the appointment of judges as a solution of the difficulty. The election of judges upon non-partisan ballots (and by this I mean both a primary election ballot and a general election ballot devoid of indications of the party affiliations, if any, of the candidate) is believed by many to be a more available solution of the difficulty.

The Governor of Minnesota:

Prior to 1912 the candidates for the Supreme Bench were nominated by party conventions and the party designations appeared on the ballot at the general election in November. The district judges were nominated and elected in the same manner until 1903 when they were nominated at partisan primary elections and their names appeared on the general election ballot with the party designation.

Beginning in 1912 candidates for the Supreme District Bench have been nominated at non-partisan primaries and their names have appeared on the general election ballot without partisan designation. Nomination by petition is also possible in certain cases.

When the candidates were nominated at party conventions, able men were usually obtained, but the system had the effect of practically barring members of the minority party from the bench. This has been done away with by the non-partisan system, but it has made it possible for unexperienced or unworthy men to get on the ballot and often be nominated. Fortunately, the voters have been sufficiently interested so that it has been impossible for any of these persons to be elected, and the men elected to our district benches have been men of a high standing.

There are, of course, a number of people who find fault with our system, and at our last session a bill providing for non-partisan conventions to nominate candidates for judgeships passed one body of the Legislature but did not become law.

While we have the elective system in practice, many of the judges begin their service on the bench through appointment. Under our Constitution, vacancies are filled by appointment by the Governor until the next general election. In a large majority of the cases, the men appointed by the Governor are very frequently re-elected until they voluntarily retire.

The Assistant Attorney-General of Minnesota:

Your letter of July 12, addressed to Lyndon A. Smith, Attorney-General, has been referred to me for acknowledgment and reply, owing to the circumstance that the official duties of the Attorney-General at the present time occupy his entire time and attention.

I have lived in the State for a little over thirty years and during that period I have been quite in touch with public affairs, including the election of judges. I came to this State from New York where, as you know, the method of nominating the judges of the various courts is by separate party conventions. When I came here I found that the judges were selected at the general party conventions and such selection, on too many occasions, was along the line of barter and fray usually incident to party conventions.

The Legislature a few years ago abolished party conventions and nomination for all State, county and city officers is by primary election. Partisan nominations for judges, members of the Legislature and city and county officers have been abolished. Under the present practice, any member of the bar in good standing as such may become a candidate for nomination for judicial office.

If but one vacancy exists, the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes at the primary election become the candidates to be voted for at the general election and this irrespective of party affiliation. If two vacancies are to be filled, then the four candidates at the primary having the highest number of votes go upon the election ballot, and so on in case of more than two vacancies.

I am not prepared to say that the present arrangement has been tried out to such an extent that it could be said to be entirely satisfactory but my own observation does not predispose me in favor of an appointive judiciary in preference to an elective one. Both systems have their faults which may be ameliorated and reduced by the disinterested activity of the best element of the bar.

The Secretary to the Governor of Missouri:

I am quite sure the people of our State would not seriously consider changing from an elective judiciary to an appointive one. While no system is perfect and does not at all times secure satisfactory results, officials responsible to the people are as a rule more satisfactory than those only responsible to the appointive power. The great body of the people are as free from control by the spirit of partisanship as an official in whom the appointive power might be vested. In the history of this State the instances in which partisan considerations have resulted in the selection of incompetent judges are very rare.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

The Attorney-General of Missouri:

Replying to your inquiry of the 12th instant with reference to the subject of an elective judiciary, I beg to say that the elective system in this State has been reasonably satisfactory. From observations of the judiciary of other States, I think the men elected to judicial positions in Missouri are as capable, honest and fair as those selected in other States by appointment. The people very generally have great respect for, and confidence in, their judicial officers. There is very little criticism of the judiciary in this State.

I am inclined to believe that the recent primary system of nomination of all candidates for office, including candidates for judicial offices, is developing an unfavorable effect upon the judiciary.

I think I would oppose the nomination of the candidates for judicial offices by direct primary election but there would be no thought in this State of changing the method of selecting judicial officers from the elective to an appointive system.

The President of the Missouri Bar Association:

I desire to say that in our State the election of judges has been by popular vote ever since our State was admitted to the Union. We were fairly well satisfied with the selection of judges by vote of the people until recent years when we adopted what was known as the primary nominating law. Since that system has come into vogue lawyers of the State and our State Bar Association have urgently and persistently condemned this system as it resulted in placing upon the tickets the names of parties for candidates to our judgeship positions who are wholly unfit and largely because they happened to be good politicians. This system has only existed for the last four years and as it now exists we are strongly opposed to it. Prior to this time and when we had the system of nominations by delegates selected to nominative conventions we had very little complaint for, as a rule, in these conventions the leading lawyers of the counties, cities, and State were prominent in nominations which resulted in good men being placed upon the tickets both for the civil and appellate courts.

Now as to the question of appointive judiciary: This I think, and our bar generally I think, entertain the opinion that this is bad if left in the hands of the Governor or any particular officer, for the reason that the appointments are usually made to pay some political debt and has resulted in our State much to our chagrin, where Governors appointing men to vacancies upon the bench have made very grave mistakes, and in some cases ridiculous appointments. If the judges are to be appointed I think they should be appointed by the Supreme Court of your State, or in some other body that will look to the obligations. Therefore, in my opinion, if you could put it in the hands of the Supreme Court of the State or some other like independent body I would be in favor of the appointive system. If not, I believe the better system would be to have your judges nominated by the people by delegate conventions where the advice of the lawyers will receive attention.

This is my honest view of it after many years of experience in this State. Missouri for many years has had a very high class Supreme Bench. As it is at present I think it could be much improved. As I have said before the system of having the people vote by primaries has resulted in some cases and locally in many cases putting inferior men on the bench and have elevated them to the position simply because they were better politicians.

The Deputy Attorney-General of Nebraska:

The State of Nebraska has had an elective judiciary from its organization with which the people have been reasonably well satisfied, and there is no question but that a proposition now to change to an appointive judiciary would be very repugnant to the people of this State.

Nominations are made here by means of a primary applying to State as well as local offices. It is quite generally believed that this system does not result in as efficient men for State offices, including the State Supreme Court, as under the convention system. However, our whole judiciary is elected under a non-partisan system.

President of the Nebraska Bar Association:

Thirty-five years of experience and observation as an attorney, practicing before elective courts, have for many years led me to entertain the belief that an appointive judiciary has many advantages over the elective system, and I have often had many.

lawyers from your State point to your appointive system with gratitude and pride.

Of course it depends somewhat upon the appointive power but I am satisfied that an honest, intelligent man, or two or three of them could make wiser selections than the general public as the qualifications of a judge are such that the general public knows very little about them and does not have the information to make a wise selection.

We have in this State, a part of the time, a commission for the purpose of assisting

ELECTION OF JUDGES.

I am quite sure that the Pennsylvania bar, with its knowledge of the situation, would regret exceedingly to go from an appointive to an elective system. On the other hand, a large majority of the bar, I believe, would prefer to go from the present system in Pennsylvania to an appointive one.

The lawyers in Pennsylvania almost without exception criticize our present system of electing judges upon a non-partisan ballot. We adopted this system in 1911. Many curious situations resulted.

First, it hurl a candidate for judge into the maelstrom of politics, and makes him run his own campaign, or have a self-appointed committee run it for him, instead of having a political party back of him.

Second, it requires a sitting judge, who is a candidate for reelection, to get into the hurly-burly of politics and tends largely to reduce the respect which the people have for the courts.

Third, it requires the candidate individually to raise funds for his election.

Fourth, it has several times almost elected thoroughly incompetent men, because their names began with one of the first letters of the alphabet, as the names are put upon the ballots in alphabetical order. Our experience is that the great mass of people know nothing about, and do not even know the names of, judges of the appellate courts elected by the State at large.

When I speak of an appointive system, I am referring to an appointive system for life. An appointive system for a term of years has the same vices that an elective system has, and under such a system the judge seeking reappointment is prone to curry favors, or keep his ear to the ground.

That is a rather bitter arraignment of the non-partisan method of electing judges. However, I looked up the law he says was passed in 1911 and found it was enacted in 1913 instead. The act is entitled:

An Act to regulate nominations and elections for all elective offices of cities of the second class and all offices of judge of a court of record; providing for non-partisan nomination and election for said offices, abolishing certain existing methods of nominations in such cases and the use of party or political names or appellations.

I submit to the Committee of the Whole that the purpose of the measure is hopeful, lofty; designed, I presume, to improve certain phases of the government of Pennsylvania. The difficulty with the operation of the act with reference to the nomination and election of candidates for the judiciary is due in my opinion to the fact that there are no special qualifications required of the candidates, and anybody who is a member of the bar can be a candidate for judge. Let me read the nomination requirements of the act:

Nomination petitions of candidates shall be signed: (a) If for the office of judge to be filled by a vote of the electors of the State at large, by at least 100 qualified electors in each of at least five counties in the State. (b) If for the office of judge of any court of record other than a court whose judges are elected by a vote of the electors of the State at large, by at least 200 qualified electors of the county or judicial district as the case may be.

The only proper complaint that can be made against that act is that it does not provide specific qualifications for candidates for the judiciary. Evidently all the youngsters who had just been admitted to the bar became candidates for judge. The act as a whole is a very salutary one,—I wish we had one like it in Massachusetts. Under the provisions of the resolution I am discussing, I may say again, candidates for the Supreme Judicial Court must be at least thirty-five years of age and a member of the bar for at least ten years; for the Superior Court and the Land Court they must be at least thirty years of age and a member of the bar for at least five years; for the other courts they must have been a member of the bar for at least five years.

The following letters are in disagreement with the Deputy Attorney-General as to Pennsylvania:
Former President of the Pennsylvania Bar Association:

I sent a copy of your letter to my successor in the presidency of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, Hon. Wm. H. Staake. I do not think, however, that I should place the burden of answering your important question entirely upon Judge Staake. We have in Pennsylvania the following classes of judges—all elected with the following differences:

Appellate Courts: Supreme Court judges, seven in number, elected for 21 years and not eligible for re-election.

Superior Court: Judges seven in number. This is an intermediate Appellate court; jurisdiction limited to controversies involving $1,500 and under; criminal case, etc. Its judges are elected for ten years and are eligible for re-election; also Local Courts: Judges of the Common Pleas and Orphans’ Court, elected by the voters of the counties or districts respectively for a term of ten years and eligible to re-election.

The arguments for and against the elective system are familiar to lawyers. The whole matter is well summed up in the question which concludes your letter:—

“If the question were now an open one in your State, would you prefer an elective or an appointive judiciary.”

When there is a vacancy in a judgeship, whether in the Appellate or in the lower courts, the Governor appoints one until the place is filled by the people at the next election. With judges appointed by the Governor, as above set forth, a Pennsylvania lawyer practicing in the United States Courts has a taste of both systems which means: That he is not unfamiliar with the appointive system.

If I had the power of making the Pennsylvania judges appointive or leaving them elective, I feel that I would not be willing to take the responsibility of making the Pennsylvania judges appointive. On the other hand, I would not were it in my power be willing to take the responsibility of making the Federal judges elective.

The President of the Pennsylvania Bar Association:

My predecessor, the Hon. Cyrus G. Derr, late president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, has sent to me a copy of his letter to you concerning the preference for “an elective or an appointive judiciary.” I fully concur in the position taken by Ex-President Derr, namely, “If I had the power of making the Pennsylvania judges appointive or leaving them elective, I feel that I would not be willing to take the responsibility for making the Pennsylvania judges appointive. On the other hand, I would not were it in my power be willing to take the responsibility of making the Federal judges elective.”

Personally, in May, 1906, I was appointed a judge in the Court of Common Pleas No. 5 of the First Judicial District of Pennsylvania. The following November I was elected without any opposition at all, except from the Socialist Party, which at that time polled but a very few votes in this city. I was fortunate in being upon seven tickets, namely, the Republican (my own party), the Democratic, the Union (a reform party then polling a large vote), the Prohibition, the National Labor and Jefferson Labor parties. Since then, we have a non-partisan judicial primary law, and I will, under its provisions, come before the people on the 19th of September to determine if I shall or shall not be a candidate at the election in November next for the period of ten years from January 1st, 1913.

With us, there has been considerable dissatisfaction with some of the provisions of the non-partisan judicial primary ballot. Our law provides that a candidate at the primary who receives more than fifty per cent of the whole vote cast at the primary election becomes elected without reference to the November election. There is some complaint also about the arrangement of the names on the ballot alphabetically, it being averred that those whose surnames begin with the A, B, C, D, E, of the alphabet have the greater chances of election than those whose surnames begin with letters nearer the end of the alphabet. In the judicial primary for judges of our new county or city court, called the municipal court, there were more than 100 names, and it was claimed that those having the names beginning with A, B, C, etc., had a great advantage in the election.

The Governor of Vermont:

In reply to your letter of July 12 written in behalf of the Judiciary Committee of your Constitutional Convention, inquiring about the subject of an elective judiciary: As you of course know, our Supreme and Superior courts are elected by the Legislature at each biennial session. With us, this system has worked very well. All things
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

Considered our present system at this time is the best adapted to our wants. It amounts with us to a life tenure, as the judges once on the bench, are reflected biennially.

The Governor of Indiana:

I have your letter of July 12th. I have not time to enter into a discussion of the question of an appointive or an elective judiciary, but from what I have seen of the judiciary system working in Indiana, I am very certain that our method here is unsatisfactory and I would be inclined to favor an appointive judiciary as against an elective one.

I would hold the same opinion as to prosecuting attorneys and those charged with the enforcement of the law. I think we would get equally as good men and a better administration of the law under the appointive judiciary.

The Attorney-General of Indiana holds a contrary view:

In reply to your inquiry concerning our elective judiciary, will say, we are not ready to give it up. We elect for six years, and on the Supreme bench there are five members, — the terms beginning at different times. Under our Constitution legislative officers cannot be elected for more than four years.

Our Supreme Court was overworked and an Appellate Court was created with six members, three members in each of two divisions. It is the universal opinion of lawyers here that our court should consist of about eleven members and abolish the Appellate Court. It is generally thought that it would be better for our Supreme Court judges to be elected for a longer term and make their salary about $7,500 per year.

My idea is to have a court of eleven members, — each elected for a term of ten years, and a new man to take the bench each year except, of course, when there are two vacancies, then two new ones would take the places. I think too that they should be limited to one term, possibly it would do no harm for the term to be twelve years and the salary more than $7,500.

We have no trouble about politics on the bench or at least would not have if the terms were extended and the salary increased. Our Supreme judges now receive $6,000.

Personally I very much prefer the elective judiciary. The elective judge would probably be elected as a non-partisan, but if the Governor had the appointing of them, it would not only be partisan but would be from the particular party which he represents.

The President of the Wisconsin Bar Association:

In Wisconsin all attempts throughout the whole history of the State to give judicial elections a political cast, as the term "political" is ordinarily used, have received stern rebuke at the polls. It is true, however, that in the majority of cases the voters here simply ratified appointments made by the Governor to fill vacancies occasioned by death or resignation. Such appointments have been uniformly good and rarely of a political character. Reflections, with rare exceptions, occur as a matter of course. The result is that we have uniformly had a great, independent and able court, generally so recognized throughout the country and are practically unanimous in favor of the elective system in this State, even where there are misgivings as to its advisability as general propositions.

Early in the history of this State it became a well-founded rule of our code of political morality that judicial elections should be entirely free from political considerations, and this rule, with rare exceptions, has been adhered to.

We here in this State are, however, conscious of the fact that in some of our neighboring States they have not been so fortunate in keeping their judicial elections out of politics, and the results in said States are said to be far less fortunate than in this State. You are probably aware that in our last Supreme judicial election a sitting judge was defeated for reflection. This, I believe, was largely due to a secret campaign by organized labor. However, I do not think that the successful candidate was a party to that method of campaigning. I can say that all the more freely since personally I was in favor of the sitting judge. If this same method of campaigning should be employed in the future, the present sentiment in Wisconsin in favor of an elective judiciary may in time not be so strong as at present.

The Attorney-General of Wisconsin:

I think I am safe in saying that the unanimous sentiment of this Commonwealth thoroughly and unreservedly endorses our elective judiciary system. We feel that we have, — and always have had, — an able and honest judiciary. The Supreme Court Reports of this State will testify to the ability of that court, and no suspicion has indugled of the absolute rectitude and honesty of the men holding judicial positions, whether it be upon the Supreme or circuit bench. You will observe that our judges are not elected at the general election. Our Constitution wisely provided that they should be elected at a special election held in the spring. The purpose of this provision was to divorce the judiciary from politics. This provision, coupled with the unanimous sentiment of the State, has enabled us to keep our judiciary absolutely free from political trammel. Perhaps I can cite you no more convincing proof of this than to refer you to the case of State ex rel. Hustig v. Board of State Canvassers, reported in 159 Wis. 216. At that time the court was composed of five Republicans and two Democrats. The five Republican judges sided with Mr. Hustig, the Democratic candidate for United States Senator, while the two Democratic judges favored the contention of Francis E. McGovern, the Republican candidate for United States Senator. From this you will see that party considerations did not in the least influence the court in passing upon the controversy raised by the opposing candidates for United States Senator.

While our judiciary is elected under our Constitution, an election really means a life tenure, as there is a settled policy prevailing in this State to reflect sitting judges. It is a rare, rare thing for sitting judges to have opposition for re-election, and it is a still rarer thing for them to be defeated.

It is just possible that an elective system would not work so well that did not have back of it a public sentiment divorcing the judiciary from politics, and dictating the reelection of sitting judges, but the system in this State is, indeed, most satisfactory in its results.

The President of the Minnesota Bar Association:

Our judiciary in this State, both for district court and Supreme Court, are elected by the people, all for a term of six years. We believe this has worked very well in this State. When we had the State Convention system, and judges were nominated at party conventions, politics entered somewhat of course into the election, as, the State being Republican, the judges elected where the parties did not nominate were the same judges.

We have now, however, the non-partisan system and there is no nomination, the names of candidates being placed upon the ballot without any party designation. The two candidates receiving the highest number of votes in the primary are the candidates placed upon the general election ballot, and the one receiving the highest number of votes of course is declared elected.

In this judicial district, — that is, the district of St. Louis, Carlton, Lake and Cook Counties (Duluth being in St. Louis County), — we have six judges. Two of these are Democrats and four are Republicans. The Democrats were each first appointed by the Governor when there was an increase of judges, and have been re-elected by the people, no fight being made on them on account of their political faith. One of the Democratic judges was appointed by a Republican Governor. We believe that our judiciary in this country are as able as any appointive judiciary would be, and the same we think is true of our Supreme Court. The fact that no move has ever been made in this State to change the system, is fair evidence that it is working satisfactorily.

If the question were now an open one here, I should prefer an elective judiciary.

The President of Virginia Bar Association:

If by an elective judiciary, you mean a judiciary elected by popular vote, we have never had the elective system in Virginia, except for a brief period from 1860 to 1863. The judges in Virginia, except during this brief period, have always been elected by the Legislature, the Governor having the power to appoint judges to fill vacancies until the next regular session of the Legislature.

In West Virginia, judges are elected by popular vote, and I am somewhat familiar with the workings of the system in West Virginia.

I would not be in favor of electing the judges by popular vote, and I do not think that in the nature of things the system could work well anywhere. The ordinary voter cannot determine the difference in the qualifications of men for judicial positions, and in most, if not all, popular elections the ordinary voter is influenced by other considerations than the peculiar fitness of the man for the position.

The appointive system, in my judgment, is the best system for the selection of judges. The system we have of electing judges by the Legislature had, from partisan considerations, resulted in placing on the bench some men who are entirely unfit. The appointive system, I think, removes further from partisan politics the selection of judges than either of the other systems, and the responsibility for the appointment is placed on one man. For these reasons, I think it is the best system of the three.

The Governor of Tennessee:

In reply beg to say that we know, as a matter of history only, that in the early days of Tennessee, judges were appointed to office or elected thereto by the General Assembly, but the memory of the present generation does not reach back to that time, so that we have no standard in Tennessee of comparison, by which we can know the merits of the different systems. I believe that I may say with all confidence, however, that the people of Tennessee would not change this system if a Constitutional Convention were called,—and the question of calling a Convention will be voted upon by our people the 28th inst.

It is a rare exception when an unworthy citizen is selected to a judicial position in Tennessee. For the most part, they are chosen from our ablest attorneys. The system in this State, in my judgment, works as successfully, if not more so, than any appointive system.

The former President of the Vermont Bar Association:

The judges of our county courts and justices of our Supreme courts are elected biennially by the Legislature. There has never, so far as I know, been any popular demand for the election of judges by the people. There has been some opinion that the Governor should appoint justices and judges, but this opinion has never been very general. The commission appointed by our Legislature of 1908 to frame proposals of amendments to our Constitution did not recommend any such change. During the vacancy of the Legislature the Governor can appoint to vacancies. Our general practice has been to reflect his appointees. Nearly half of our judges of the last few decades have received their commissions in the first instance through the appointment of the Governor; but in 1913 our Governor made some appointments that were not confirmed by the Legislature. When we revised our Constitution by the adoption of amendments proposed by the Legislatures of 1910 and 1912, we changed the time of election and did not provide that the Justices and judges should continue in office until the Legislature met in January instead of October. Under the old Constitution the commission of judges expired December first, and they were elected in October biennially. Our Governor in 1917 proceeded to reorganize the court by leaving off some of the old judges and appointing new men. The Legislature, however, which met in January, installed the old judges in their offices. With a few exceptions, the judges have been first appointed by the Governor, and then has followed the election of these judges until they resigned or died. I believe it was Judge Poland of our State who once said to Senator Hoar that the Vermont judges who were elected biennially had a longer tenure of office than Massachusetts judges who were elected during good behavior. While there is more or less fault found with certain elections by the Legislature, yet the practice has worked so satisfactorily that I believe there is no general sentiment for any change in our present system of electing judges.

I will close reading with a letter from the Governor of New York. Governor Whitman, as you know, was for many years district attorney in the city of New York, and he has been Governor for several years. He has been very active in public affairs. What he has to say is of special value to this discussion.

The Governor of New York:

Taking it by and at large throughout the State, I think the elective system in this State has worked very well. Of course in New York city some men have been elected as Justices of the Supreme Court who might not have succeeded in obtaining appointments to that office. We have in fact at the present time upon the Supreme Court in this State quite a number of very satisfactory judges elected under our elective system who probably never would have been appointed.

Our Court of Appeals, as you know, is the highest court of appellate jurisdiction and has no original jurisdiction. Members as a rule have been of exceptional ability and character. These judges are elective, but it has frequently happened that both parties have united in selecting an individual of conspicuous ability and have avoided a contest at the polls.

I think that I can fairly say that outside of New York city partizan considerations have not operated against the selection of competent judges, and to a very large extent this is true in the city of New York.

I think that I can also say that if the question were an open one in this State at the present time, the people would in my opinion declare for an elective rather than an appointive judiciary. While there is much to be said on both sides, I think on the whole that I should prefer the elective system rather than the appointive.

There is hardly anything that I can add to what has been said in those letters. They cover the whole question pro and con. I have read them regardless of how the chips fall, whether for or against the purpose of my resolution. Most of them, however, are in favor of an elective judiciary. Many of them point out that the non-partisan method is best. Where there is complaint of the non-partisan the cause rests upon the number of candidates, which can be eliminated, in my opinion, by qualification requisites for the candidates for the different judicial offices similar to those set forth in the pending resolution. The non-partisan method, I verily believe, will take the judiciary entirely out of politics. It will make the judiciary as independent as the executive and legislative departments of the government, for like them the judiciary will receive their commissions from the people. I may add even more independent, for the people will act, not along party lines, but as a collective body of citizens seeking the best men to administer justice.

As Bryce has well said: "To the people we come sooner or later. It is upon their wisdom and willing restraint that the stability of the most cunningly devised scheme of government will in the last resort depend." On that philosophy is my resolution based,—the philosophy of trusting the people. I am attempting to put the power over the judiciary in the hands of the people where it belongs. I am trying to remove the possibility of the sinister influence of corporations or special interests of any kind in the appointment of the judiciary. I am trying to take away from the Republican party, the Democratic party and any other party the temptation to use judicial appointments as a matter of politics. I am in effect making the bar free from party influence and party leaders, and placing upon it the responsibility of assisting the people in selecting the best qualified of its members for the judiciary. In short, I am striving for an independent profession, and an independent judiciary serving the common good. I trust it is not too much to hope for success. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Salem: As the member of the committee on Judiciary in charge of our adverse report on this resolution (No. 197), I wish to say it is not the desire of the Judiciary Committee to tire members of the Convention with any long debate on this question, especially in view of the extremely hot weather. We made a special assignment and gave special days for hearings on this matter of the election of judges, contained in this and kindred measures. They were perhaps the largest attended of any of our hearings. After going over them at great length in executive session we arrived at the conclusion, Mr. Maguire alone dissenting, that the resolutions ought not to pass. Unless there is further objection made to the report of the committee by some of the delegates present, the committee on the Judiciary are willing to rest their case with the Committee of the Whole and the Convention.

The Committee of the Whole voted to recommend that the resolution ought not to be adopted and it was so reported to the Convention which, at a subsequent date, recommitted the subject-matter to the Committee of the Whole.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

The Convention, having adopted an order at the beginning of the session of 1918 suspending the operation of the rule providing for the consideration of subjects as a Committee of the Whole, resumed the discussion Thursday, June 13, after defeating a proposition to postpone the debate until a later date.

Mr. JAMES H. BRENNAN of Boston: I had hoped that postponement of this measure, or these amendments, would prevail at the request of the venerable member of the Convention from Fall River (Mr. Morton), to whom I believe common courtesy should accord the privilege of a postponement; because, while we are in a mood whereby we desire to hasten progress here and to hasten action on these amendments let us not forget that we are assembled here as a deliberative assembly. This is a question of great importance, and at the request of the gentleman from Boston who has been spoken of in the debate (Mr. O'Connell) the venerable ex-judge of our Supreme Judicial Court asked for a postponement, which was denied him and which, in my humble opinion, should have been granted. Haste sometimes, Mr. President, makes waste.

But now that the will of the majority here has decided that this question shall be settled, or that the discussion shall be started, at this time, I believe we should not pass over lightly this great big question. Nowadays there is a widespread movement all over the civilized world to give greater control of public functions to the people wherein the right of government should vest. The attitude of this Convention toward this measure has not been of a serious description. It may be due to the fact that in this body almost fifty per cent of the total membership are of the legal profession. Those gentlemen who look at legislation not from a material or an economic standpoint but from the viewpoint of the legal and judicial mind oftentimes get a wrong viewpoint of public affairs, because the legal viewpoint is not always the correct viewpoint on matters of this sort. Let us remember that we were not elected to this Convention as lawyers, or doctors, or bankers, or farmers, or businessmen; we were elected here as citizens of the Commonwealth, as delegates to a Constitutional Convention; and when we enter the chamber here we leave outside our profession, or our trade, or our business, or our occupation, and we should consider these matters not from a selfish, personal, individual viewpoint, but from the standpoint of what is best for the people of the entire Commonwealth.

This is a tremendously important question. In the Convention of 1853 it occupied the attention of the delegates to that Convention for a considerable time, and many of the great minds of that Convention were of the opinion that this amendment should be adopted. Many of the ablest and brainiest men who were delegates at that time gave their serious thought and speech to this measure. And yet when this matter was considered last summer it was brushed aside as if it was a mere joke. I want to say to the delegates in this Convention that there is a widespread sentiment throughout the entire United States for a further spread of public control of public officials through the medium of the ballot-box. We have seen it right here in our own Commonwealth. There were those, Mr. President, who thought that the very Commonwealth itself would fall when first the subject of direct election of United States Senators was proposed, and yet that was adopted as one of the basic principles of our government, and now our United States Senators are being elected by direct vote of the people. One of the most important offices in the gift of the American people, outside of the Presidency, is a United States Senatorship, and that office is now under direct control of the people of the Commonwealth through the vote. Our United States Senate has not suffered, it has not deteriorated, and the standard of public officials and of United States Senators has not been lowered in any way. A few years ago, when the matter of direct election of State officers was suggested, there were those timid souls in this State who thought that our entire fabric of government was threatened with a downfall; and yet in the Legislature just adjourned, when an attempt was made to go back to the old Convention system,—the corporation controlled and boss-ridden Convention to nominate State officers,—those measures were overwhelmingly defeated by the representatives of the people of Massachusetts in the House of Representatives. And so on down the line the tendency has been to give greater control to the people of this Commonwealth over the affairs of their own government. I believe that in keeping with forty-two other States of this Union which now elect their judiciary and which have a splendid judiciary system, we in Massachusetts, who pride ourselves on our learning, and on our education, and on our patriotism, and on our progress, are no more capable in any of those lines, and are not superior in any of those lines to many of the Commonwealths that now are electing their State officers.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

Massachusetts is a proud old State. We have much to be proud of. But a few weeks ago I had the honor of participating as a campaign manager in a district on the Liberty loan, and it was my humiliation to read reports from the treasury of the United States that in three days the city of Detroit, Mich., which is about half the age of the city of Boston, had subscribed $30,000,000 to the Liberty loan. I read that Wisconsin had "gone over the top" three weeks before Massachusetts. I read that dozens and scores of other cities and States were far in advance of my old Commonwealth. I stopped to reflect as to why that condition should exist, and I have come to the conclusion that we in Massachusetts are standing too much on precedent, that we are standing too much on the reputation established by the fathers of this Commonwealth, and that we are living a great deal in the past. We should set our eyes to the future. Therefore I say that we must be up and doing if we are to compete with the live, active, progressive communities and States of the middle west, which are leading Massachusetts to-day in a great many undertakings.

Let us look at the State of New York, where an elective judiciary system prevails. Has New York suffered from an elective judiciary? Has New York gone back? Why, the port of New York in ordinary times exports thirty times as much in one day as Boston does, or, in other words, New York city, which is about the same relative age as a municipality as Boston, exports in one day what Boston exports in one month. New York is the metropolis of America, the greatest city in the world to-day, and contributes in every public movement from one-third to one-half of the total subscription, and it is a magnificent credit to the American Nation. They have an elective judiciary system in New York. Has New York suffered? Have her judges been weak? Have her judges retrograded? Of course they have not. I say to you, Mr. President, that we should give this matter our very earnest consideration from the standpoint of what the people of Massachusetts desire, and not what we as individuals here desire.

The greatest argument that has been advanced against this amendment by its opponents has been that you will contaminate the courts with politics, that you will subject judges to the influence of politics, and that the wicked contact of partizan politics will cause them to lean partizanward in their decisions. As a young man, as one of the younger delegates in this Convention, in an assemblage no doubt the great majority of whom are my peers intellectually and otherwise, I wish to state humbly that, in my opinion, it is the most cowardly and the meanest opposition that could be put forward by educated, intelligent men. Politics will weaken the judiciary! What is politics? Politics is the function of operating a government under a republican form of government. Politics runs our Nation. While to some politics may be considered as an undesirable word, yet look up the definition of politics and you will find that in the fundamental basis of the meaning of the word it means the function of civil government. Politics elects the President of the United States, who holds in his hands the destinies, not alone of the judiciary and of meaningless decisions on small matters or big matters, but who holds in his hands to-day the balance of the future of this world; and yet, with his ponderous responsibilities and with his tremendous cares on his shoulders he must come before the American people again, if he desires to, as he did a year ago last fall, and say to the sovereign power of this great republic: "I am your President; I am commander-in-chief of your army and your navy; I have the responsibilities, not of all nations on my shoulders, but I have the cares and responsibilities of civilization on my hands, and I place my case in the hands of the great American jury." By their verdict they decided that he was a faithful servant, and they returned him to the greatest office in the world to-day, — to the Presidency of the United States of America.

These men who sit in their majesty over the courts of our Commonwealth say: "We are immune from politics," but our great President, who is one of the greatest men in the history of the world, must come before the people and submit his case to the political consideration of the people of the entire United States of America. And these judges, — and I do not want anybody here to misunderstand me, I have no personal reference to anybody or to any honorable judge who sits in this chamber, — many of them, have been politicians. Many of them have served in the House of Representatives. Many of them have served as members of the State Senate. They went before their people and begged votes and pleaded for votes and asked for votes to elect them to those offices. And then the solemnity and the sanctity and the halo of a judgeship loomed up in the horizon and they immediately became greater than any political consideration, and they forgot the fact that at one time they were politicians in every sense of the word, and that when they went on the bench they no longer were affected by political considerations. Further than that, many of these judges never would have occupied their positions on the bench to-day if it were not for political indorsements, going to a chief executive of their Commonwealth elected by the votes of the people and sending to him every political Tom, Dick and Harry who could be reached, to secure their appointment. And yet they must be preserved from the taint of politics!

I wish to contradict the statement that it will drive the judges into politics. I want to say, Mr. President, I think it will drive a great many judges out of politics. I know of numerous instances where judges do not hesitate to exert the influence of their office to favor or disfavor certain political candidates. I know of instances where judges do not hesitate to solicit votes openly for or against certain candidates. And I say to you that while it may be true that it might drive a very few judges into politics it would drive others out of politics. So that argument works both ways.

Further than that, can you imagine the childishness of an argument which says that a judge, if he were surrounded by political influences, would decide favorably or unfavorably as the influence might lean to a defendant at the bar of justice? I believe that our judges are honorable men, I believe that they have the courage of their convictions, and it is a charge of cowardice for anybody to advance that a judge on the bench of Massachusetts would so far forget the law of the Commonwealth and the evidence of the case upon which he was sitting that he would let political considerations influence him in his opinion. I am not a lawyer, and I am not thoroughly familiar with the law, but I do know that the only consideration upon which any judge of our Commonwealth ought to decide any case should be the evidence and the facts presented to him and the law surrounding that particular case, and the statute, and to impute any other intention to any honorable judge of this Commonwealth is not helping their cause; it is hurting it. I believe that it is a very petty argument to advance in opposition to this great measure.

Let us look to the future. Let us practice what we preach. We are not here to-day enacting amendments or constitutional legislation for the year 1918 alone; we are enacting it probably for fifty, seventy-five or a hundred years. What we do here will be noted in the future, and we shall be passed upon either as men of wisdom or men who lacked wisdom. Let me say to you that there is an underlying sentiment all over this great world to-day, a spirit of unrest among the masses of the people, that the time for autocratic rule by the few has passed, the time for the rule of the people has come, and the spirit of democracy is now being fought in one of the most volcanic upheavals that the world ever has known. Let us start here and instill democracy in our own Commonwealth. Let us place the three branches of our State government on a democratic basis,—by democratic I mean not political, but on a basis of civil government.

Of our three branches of government two, the legislative and the executive, to-day are under a democratic form of government, and they are responsible directly to the people of Massachusetts. The Legislature of Massachusetts creates these legislative offices. It regulates the salaries of the judges, and it regulates their pensions. It enacts all the statutes which the judges and courts interpret, and it is the Great and General Court, the highest court in the Commonwealth. Yet the Great and General Court must go before the people to secure their positions as public officers. The executive department, working in coordination with the legislative department, appoints the judges on the bench. The executive department creates the judgeship and fills the position by nominating the candidate who is selected for the position. The executive must go back to the people. The Governor of the Commonwealth must go back to the people and submit his record to them for their scrutiny. And yet while the department that creates and the department that appoints, namely, the legislative and the executive, are responsible to the people, the creature that they create is greater than both departments and greater than the people themselves. Should that exist, Mr. President? Ask yourselves if we should have two branches of our government directly responsible to the people and one branch of the government responsible to nobody but themselves, whose authority is more autocratic than that of any other government official in the United States of America, who are above the reach of the Legislature, above the reach of the Governor and above the reach of the people who pay the bills, who create them and who are supposed to be the sovereign power of our Commonwealth.

We are living under a system that was handed down to us from the early days of the old Massachusetts Bay Colony, when the judges were appointed for a life tenure of office as a reward for their fidelity to the King of England. In England the practice always prevailed that the King appointed his own councilors, his own judges, who held their offices for life or during the life of the reigning king or queen. When that sovereign died, or when his term of sovereignty ended, those judges, unless reappointed by the incoming sovereign, were removed from office, but they maintained their tenure during the service of the king or queen who appointed them. You all know Massachusetts history. We were a Colony of the English government, and the English customs and the English laws prevailed in Massachusetts, and our judges were appointed then and are appointed to-day under the English monarchical form of judiciary system. We have inherited, I might say, a great deal of our common law and a great deal of our law from the old English common law, and this is one of the practices that we have adopted from England and that we failed to throw off when we established a democracy here in the United States of America. In my humble opinion the time long since has passed when we should imitate any foreign country, any country which is a constitutional monarchy, and when we should imitate any other foreign nation in any of their customs; and yet we are doing it to-day in our judiciary system, Mr. President, and I think it is time for a change.

We have seen the progress of the times. We have seen kings and czars and emperors deposed from their thrones. At one time the divine right of kings was a recognized principle in some countries. In this country, up to the time of the Revolution, when we repudiated that policy, it was a recognized policy here by the Tory element of our population. But the divine right of kings is a relic of the dim past, and the divine right of any man, no matter who he may be, to occupy any public office without the consent of the governed also is a relic of the ancient past. I believe that in order that we may have a truly democratic government, all of our public officers, regardless of the department in which they may be engaged, should be compelled to go back to the people, who are the fundamental Governors of this American government, and to receive anew their commissions of office if they so deserve. [Applause.]
We have just witnessed during our last session an act further protecting the judiciary of the Commonwealth from the control of the people of this Commonwealth. We passed an amendment here providing for the initiative and referendum, which I voted for and believed in. But in that measure as it stands to-day is an exemption clause exempting the judiciary of our Commonwealth from the provisions of the I. and R. I voted against that exemption because, in my opinion, it makes the I. and R. class legislation to-day. The entire masses of the people are going to benefit by the I. and R., the entire Commonwealth is going to benefit by the I. and R.; and yet one small coterie of men in this Commonwealth have a constitutional exemption which should not exist. Why should any set of our citizens, whether they are superior or inferior, whether they are better equipped mentally or not so well equipped mentally, — why should any class of our citizens be excluded from the operation of any amendment offered or adopted in this Convention? I believe that that was one of the biggest mistakes made by the lawyers of this Convention when they insisted that the judges of our Commonwealth be given greater privileges and greater sanctuary from the operation of our own Constitution than the people themselves who are the owners of the Constitution. If I had my way that exemption would be stricken out of the I. and R. amendment. And the time will come when, by constitutional amendment, it will be stricken out of that amendment by action of the Legislature, because, as I have said, we are creating a constitutional oligarchy; we are creating a set of men who are so far above, who are so far secure from constitutional and legislative interference that, to-day, they are governing the governed instead of the governed governing them. Our Commonwealth, in the constitutional provisions laid down by the fathers of this State, wisely decided that the people should govern and that they should not be governed without their consent and that they should be paramount and supreme in all matters affecting political questions. And yet, my friends, we have overturned that principle and the people are not supreme. The people now are being dominated by one branch of the government which is far above all other branches and all other parts of the political divisions of this Commonwealth. And therefore I say, in my opinion, it was a mistake that will be rectified, I believe, before many years have passed, to exempt any class of our citizens from the workings of the I. and R. amendment.

We should allow the people of Massachusetts to decide for themselves on this great question. It is not a question for us to decide. The Constitution of Massachusetts is not our property. As citizens of the Commonwealth it is our property; as delegates we simply are the custodians of that Constitution. We are here to alter, revise and amend, — not to take possession. We simply are in temporary custody of that important and sacred document, and let us not, in our possible selfish desires or selfish opinions, say to the people of the Commonwealth: "We say to you that this should not prevail." Why should the servants of the people dictate to the people who are hiring them to come here and amend this Constitution? We are not here to dictate, we are here to serve, and we are amending the property of the people of the entire Commonwealth.

We adopted three amendments at the last session. They did not become part of our Constitution because we voted on them; of course not. We had to submit them to the people for their approval or their rejection, and they decided that our course was a wise one, that our amendments were beneficial and that they were to the advantage of the people of the Commonwealth; and they were adopted. If they had been rejected they would not have become a part of our great Constitution. Therefore I say it is not our duty to say to the people: "We don't want this; in our judgment this is unwise; our Constitution should not be altered so that we may appoint judges for a limited term." We should not take that attitude, my friends. We should say to the people of the Commonwealth: "We are your representatives; you sent us here as your delegates. We submit this matter to you for your approval or your rejection." That is the attitude we should take on this matter.

At the present time we have in the service of the United States government over two and a half million of young men, — young men who have gone out in the full vigor of their manhood to fight for the United States of America. Almost three-quarters of a million of them are now on foreign soil. Those boys are offering up everything that they possess to the United States of America; and when the Massachusetts boys come back to America after fighting the battle of democracy and when they realize that in Massachusetts we have only a two-thirds democracy and a one-third autocracy, they are going to say to themselves: "We might have started house cleaning at home. Our Constitutional Convention might have given our people an opportunity to vote on this great question. We have fought for the principles of the control of the government by the people and we believe that it should be adopted in all of its branches. If we are sincere in our desire for democracy abroad we should practice it here at home."

We are sincere in our desire for democracy and we are going to accomplish it; but let us be consistent here in Massachusetts and fall in line with the forty-two other Commonwealths of America which have this system in vogue.

Our Constitution very wisely provides that this government shall be "a government of laws and not of men," and that is why we are here. We are here to amend the basic law of our Commonwealth which will endure forever, which will stand for centuries as it has stood for several centuries already. We shall pass to the great beyond as did our predecessors of 1853. Men are like "ships that pass in the night." They come and go and pass by, but good law and good doctrine and a sound Constitution endure forever. Two of our governmental branches are branches based on that doctrine, — government of law. We should extend that policy to the third branch of the government. Make it a government of laws and not of men. Fifty years from now there will be an entirely new set of judges sitting on the bench of Massachusetts, but the basic law of the Commonwealth will be practically the same. And let us adhere to that old doctrine that we should insist that this be a government of laws and not of men. Those men who sit on our bench are simply the instruments through which the law is interpreted, and the people of Massachusetts are the ones to be finally considered in all of those interpretations. It makes no difference who interprets those laws as long as they are interpreted fairly, honestly and impartially, and I say that the people should have control of that department as well as of all others.
In 1853 a member of the Convention stood up and in reply to the encomiums of praise that were being heaped on the judiciary,—and which no doubt were deserved as they would be to-day,—said: "I want to remind the gentleman who has just spoken that these judges are, first of all, human. They are men, and, naturally, being human, are fallible." I want to remind you that they are, secondly, lawyers, and, thirdly, they are judges, and our Constitution says that we shall have a government of laws and not of men. Judges are human, judges are fallible, judges can make mistakes as well as any other men. And let me point out to you two recent decisions of our great United States Supreme Court. They were asked for an opinion as to the constitutionality of the draft law passed by Congress, which takes the bodies and souls of our young men to defend the Nation. They very rightly decided that that law was constitutional, as it is, because the men were going to fight and give up their liberties and their lives for the benefit of the great people of the United States of America. We all acquiesced in that decision. But a few days ago, when the child labor law came up for decision, these wise men sitting in their judgment decided, five to four, that that law was unconstitutional; and why? Because it interfered with commerce; it interfered with some or with many men making money; because it interfered, as they said, with States' rights; it interfered with industry; it interfered with the industrial relations of the different Commonwealths. They did not stop to consider that human lives and human rights should be paramount to any other consideration of this great United States of America. If that law was constitutional which took the lives and the souls of our young men to fight in the war, how in the name of decency and common sense could they decide that the labor of poor children could not be regulated without an interference with the Constitutional rights of the States and with the rights of individuals? And yet these men are supreme in their wisdom, supreme in their judgment, and they must not be contaminated by the control of the people who really created them and who are supposed to control our government.

I say that we should give this matter our serious attention; that we should pause and give this our great attention. Do not hurry over this great problem. The people of the Commonwealth will believe that we are derelict in our task if we do not devote considerable attention and deliberation to this great question.

Let me quote further. On page 23 of to-day's calendar there is a petition filed by the American Federation of Labor trying to bring out what should be a fundamental principle of our Commonwealth and which I believe our fathers intended should be in the Constitution but which a judge or judges of our Supreme Judicial Court have contradicted; and that is that labor, the toil of the hands of an honest working-man, is not a personal right, but as they say, it is a property right. Child labor is a property right. The labor of the working-man is a property right, in the courts' opinion, but not in mine, nor in the mind of any intelligent man in this Convention. And yet with decisions such as, those facing the intelligent electorate of our Commonwealth and of our Nation, men have the temerity to rise in this Convention and to say that these men are sacred, that they are infallible, that they are of a superior mentality and must not be brought into contact with the wicked people who play politics.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

In conclusion I simply want to say that the people of this Commonwealth are supreme. It was intended they always should be supreme. It was intended that the people should dominate the government and not the government dominate the people. It was understood that right and justice always should be the principles of this grand old Commonwealth of Massachusetts. And I say in my closing words that if the legislative department can trust the people, that if the executive department can trust the people, then I say to you that the judicial department should and must trust the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Maguire of Boston: I am sorry that the request of the chairman of the committee on the Judiciary (Mr. Morton) for a postponement until Tuesday was not granted. I felt, when the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) objected so strenuously, that he was particularly interested in the matter for debate. I regret very much that he is not present during it. I miss also some familiar figures, men who are leaders of the bar,—the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker), the gentleman from Southborough (Mr. Choate), and the gentleman from Brookline who sits in the fourth division (Mr. Whipple). These judiciary matters are probably the most important that are before the Convention. They certainly ought to have the full attendance of the members of the bar at least, and particularly members who arise and object to postponement for the reason that they wish the Convention to finish their business. It seems to me that they ought not to leave the chamber except for some very important reason. [Applause.]

The resolution under debate is No. 197. I offered this resolution because it seems to me that it will take the judiciary out of politics. I will not read the whole of the resolution, but only the last paragraph, which provides that

The names of all candidates for the office of judge of the several courts aforesaid shall be placed on the regular ballot in alphabetical order without partizan or other designation except the title of the office.

Now I hope that some of the members of the Convention who oppose this measure will set forth their reasons, will establish, or try to establish, the philosophy which prompts them to object to the proposed amendment. The delegates to this Convention were elected on a non-partizan basis and we may take some credit in the fact that perhaps it is a very able assembly, perhaps the ablest, some experts say, that ever has gathered together in the Commonwealth. That being so, to my mind it follows that the judiciary elected on some such plan as provided in the resolution which I have submitted will be taken out of politics.

Mr. Maguire continued his argument Friday, June 14.

In my opening remarks yesterday afternoon I called the attention of the Convention to the fact that the proposed amendment provides for the election of judicial officers by a non-partizan method. A provision is made in the resolution for certain qualifications for the candidates for the several courts,—for instance, the Supreme Judicial Court, that they shall have been members of the bar for a certain number of years and also shall have attained a certain age.

In offering this resolution I am actuated by the feeling that since the adoption of the Constitution the judiciary has been in politics,
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

because of the fact that judges are appointed by the executive branch of the government. To show how much they have been in politics I shall read the record of appointments of judges to the Supreme Judicial Court and the Superior Court. The record for the minor courts is not available, because of the difficulty in getting the statistics, but the record in the lower courts is even more partisan than the record of the higher courts which I am about to read. The record begins at Governor Wolcott's period, and comes down to date.

In reading this record I am not actuated by anything but fair play. Whatever the record shows I am willing to abide by it.

Roger Wolcott, Republican, Governor during the years 1897, 1898 and 1899:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: Oliver Wendell Holmes, Republican; John W. Hammond, Republican; William Caleb Loring, Republican.

Appointments to Superior Court: William P. Stevens, Republican; Charles U. Bell, Republican; John A. Aiken, Democrat.

Five Republicans and one Democrat.

W. Murray Crane, Republican, Governor during the years 1900, 1901 and 1902:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: Marcus P. Knowlton, Republican; Henry K. Braley, Democrat.

Appointments to Superior Court: Frederick Lawton, Republican; Edward P. Pierce, Republican; James Fox, Democrat; Charles A. DeCourcy, Democrat; Robert O. Harris, Republican; Lemuel LeBaron Holmes, Republican; William Cushing Wait, Republican; William Schofield, Republican.

Seven Republicans and three Democrats.

John L. Bates, Republican, Governor during the years 1903 and 1904:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: None.

Appointments to Superior Court: Lloyd E. White, Republican; Loranus E. Hitecock, Republican.

Two Republicans and no Democrats.

William L. Douglas, Democrat, Governor during the year 1905:

Appointment to Supreme Judicial Court: Henry N. Sheldon, Republican.

Appointments to Superior Court: John A. Aiken, Democrat; John C. Crosby, Democrat; John J. Flaherty, Democrat.

One Republican and three Democrats.

Curtis Guild, Jr., Republican, Governor during the years 1906, 1907 and 1908:

Appointment to Supreme Judicial Court: Arthur P. Rugg, Republican.

Appointments to Superior Court: William F. Dana, Republican; John F. Brown, Republican; Henry A. King, Republican; George A. Sanderson, Republican; Robert F. Raymond, Republican.

Six Republicans and no Democrats.

Eben S. Draper, Republican, Governor during the years 1909 and 1910:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: None.

Appointments to Superior Court: Marcus Morton, Democrat; Charles F. Jenney, Republican.

One Republican and one Democrat.

Eugene N. Foss, elected as a Democrat [laughter], Governor during the years 1911, 1912 and 1913:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: Arthur P. Rugg, Republican, appointed Chief Justice; Charles A. DeCourcy, Democrat; John C. Crosby, Democrat.

Appointments to Superior Court: Joseph F. Quinn, Democrat; John D. McLaughlin, Democrat; Walter P. Hall, Republican; Hugo A. Dubuque, Republican; John B. Ratigan, Democrat; Patrick M. Keating, Democrat; Nathan D. Pratt, Republican; Frederic H. Chase, Democrat; Richard W. Irwin, Republican.

Five Republicans and seven Democrats.

The "Old Boy" evidently was rather fair, I should presume, because part of the time he was a Republican and part of the time he was a Democrat. [Laughter.]

David I. Walsh, Democrat, Governor during the years 1914 and 1915:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: Edward P. Pierce, Republican; James B. Carroll, Democrat.
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

Appointments to Superior Court: William Hamilton, Republican; Christopher T. Callahan, Democrat; James B. Carroll, Democrat [Carroll was promoted, but I am counting him twice]; James H. Sisk, Democrat; Philip J. O'Connell, Democrat.

Two Republicans and five Democrats.

Samuel W. McCall, Republican, Governor during the years 1916, 1917 and 1918:

Appointments to Supreme Judicial Court: None.

Appointments to Superior Court: Webster Thayer, Republican; Franklin T. Hammond, Republican; Nelson T. Brown, Republican; Louis S. Cox, Republican; Charles E. Shattuck, Republican.

Five Republicans and no Democrats. [Applause.]

The whole case with reference to the judiciary in this State is contained in the record that I have just read. It shows that whoever is Governor, whichever party is in power, judicial appointments are viewed just the same as any other political patronage.

Where does this lead? The Republicans have shown unfortunately a narrow, petty, selfish attitude in the appointment of the judiciary. It is idle to say that they do not consider politics or political friendship. I venture to say that very few men ever are appointed to the judiciary, either in the higher courts or in the lower courts, without political backing. If the judges are not politicians they are the friends of politicians. We see how this example of selfishness controls in the government of cities.

The complaint is made sometimes that here in the city of Boston offices go entirely to Democrats. All too true, and solely because they have a big majority of the votes in the city. If they have been selfish, and if they continue to act in a selfish manner in the matter of filling appointments in the city, it is because those who controlled the city before they did acted that way, controlled everything, appointed nobody but party workers, nobody but members of the machine, nobody but those who were indorsed for active party work.

It is to provide against this that I have introduced this resolution which, in my opinion, takes the judiciary as far as possible out of politics, and puts it up to the members of the bar, puts the burden on them to be alert and vigilant in the selection of the judges for the several courts. If the bar will be active and vigilant, if the bar will indorse A over B as being more competent, more intellectual than B, the people, in my opinion, will take A over B. We shall have a better judiciary. In other words, the judiciary will be much more independent if selected by the people than if appointed on the indorsement of some political machine.

We sometimes hear the United States Supreme Court cited as an example of the fine operation of an appointed judiciary. Within our own generation we have seen that court pass on the income tax amendment, a judge changing from yes to no and deciding the matter by his vote. Latterly we see them defending and protecting, perhaps rightly, the Shoe Machinery Trust. But only the other day they had no mental processes that would permit them to protect the little child, the little child who is more important to the country at this time in our crowded history than ever before, no humanity, no mental processes, no sentiment, no imagination that would permit them to protect the little children of the country.

Now, my friends, some members of this Convention hesitate to talk about the judges, they are a sanctified body. Let me tell you that they are very, very human. Any old member of the Legislature will tell you that they come stalking through these halls lobbying for increases of salary, lobbying in a manner that would bring a blush to corporation lobbyists. And members of the bar, active in Suffolk County, will tell you that they importune the sheriff, importune the clerks of the courts, to appoint relatives to jobs. Imagine a judge upon the bench coming down and asking the sheriff to give a relative a job!

I am asking the members of the bar in this Convention, — a hundred and fifty strong, — I am asking them to take the judiciary out of politics. I am asking them to take the profession away from the dark abodes of politics. Let us go back to the ivory towers where the intellectuals dwell and from there send forth judges who will administer justice with an even hand. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE of Waltham: I am informed that yesterday my remarks about the gentleman from Boston who was absent (Mr. O'Connell) might be interpreted as impugning his veracity. Such was not my intention and I regret that my words could warrant the inference. Had the gentleman mentioned to me the fact that he was engaged in court I might have reminded him that the courts have given the work of the Convention the right of way. However, in the hope that if my words yesterday stirred up at all the spirit of controversy, the night may have allayed that spirit, I would suggest to those who are advocating these resolutions relating to the change in the judiciary that perhaps as practical men we may save the Convention delay and ourselves much inconvenience if we will take notice of the fact that the gentleman from Boston to whom I have referred has contemplated making his contest upon the second measure below this in the calendar, No. 115. If it is the case that a large body of opinion in this Convention favors a change in the method of the selection of the judiciary or their tenure of office, I should be the last to discourage debate upon the subject. But if, on the other hand, it is the case that no large body of sentiment favors that change, then perhaps the determination of the fact may facilitate our handling of the question. If we should at once reach what may be in effect a test vote upon this particular proposal, construing it as without prejudice to those that are to follow and thus in no way checking debate upon the main subject, we perhaps can all get illumination. And for that reason, let me repeat, without any prejudice to the matters that are to follow, but simply to ascertain whether the body of sentiment in favor of this proposal calls for further long discussion, I shall make presently the suitable motion.

Permit me first, however, to express a personal opinion that a great value of a Constitutional Convention is its educational value. We are all familiar with the fact that none of the proposals of the Convention of 1853 met immediate acceptance, but that many of them educated the people to the point of approving changes later on. And when I advocated the holding of this Convention it was with the hope that the discussion of public questions upon a high plane might contribute to the welfare of the Commonwealth. But circumstances have changed so wonderfully since then, so terribly changed, that now we find it necessary to forego discussion which is meant only for effect outside of these walls. Therefore it should be borne in mind that debate meant purely for the purpose of propaganda may not deserve or
ELECTION OF JUDGES.

Demand now the time that otherwise we would with great profit give to it. There are measures later on in this calendar to which I would be glad to address myself in order that my arguments might go beyond these walls and might help perhaps to a clearer understanding of our problems. But under the circumstances may I not appeal to the common sense of the gentlemen to grant that we may not take the time now to advocate propositions which are certain not to receive the approval of the Convention, simply for the sake of educating opinion? Would we not better confine our time and effort to those proposals where we are nearly evenly balanced or where there is a decided preponderance of opinion in favor of action? In order, then, to ascertain whether a large majority of the Convention has decided what it desires in this matter of the tenure of the judges and to avoid if possible a prolonged debate, and without prejudice to the matters later on, purely in a spirit of amity, entirely for the purpose of aiding the Convention if possible, I move the previous question.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I have listened to what the gentleman from Waltham has just said and I have talked with the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) this morning. He called me up at my office and I reported what transpired yesterday, although he already had been informed, and I do not understand from what the gentleman from Waltham has said that it coincides with what the gentleman from Boston told me this morning. I understand the gentleman from Waltham as saying that the gentleman from Boston was concerned only about No. 115 on the calendar. I do not know who his authority is for that statement, but the gentleman from Boston has told me that he wished to be heard upon the Maguire proposal, or this No. 112 on the calendar. I do not want to cause delay in this Convention. I want to reach a conclusion just as quickly as any member of the Convention does, but I feel that the way this matter has been handled is not fair to the members of this Convention. There was a fair proposition for a postponement of these matters until next Tuesday. It could have gone over very well till next Tuesday. Then there would not have been any excuse for anybody not being here. But the attendance has not been any greater at the consideration of the question that preceded this, that we considered yesterday, in which the gentleman from Waltham says there might be more interest than there appears to be in this resolution. This question, I think, is probably as vital a question to a great many members of this Convention as any resolution in the calendar, and it very well might have happened then that this matter could have been postponed. Now there is not a quorum here this morning and I am going to raise the question of no quorum because I feel that the gentleman from Boston ought to be given an opportunity to be heard. It is not a question of the court's excusing him if he is engaged in the Convention. We know that the judges have been very considerate of the lawyer delegates who have had cases, but here is a delegate whose jury had been impaneled and he is obliged to go forward with his case. I do not know whether he is for the plaintiff or for the defendant. If he was for the defendant it would not have been fair to abandon him at that time. If he was for the plaintiff he had only about three or four or more days before the adjournment of the court and it might be possible that his client was crowding him for a trial. It seems to me only fair that the member from Boston ought to have an opportunity to be heard on this particular resolution, which, in his opinion, may be the most important resolution on the judiciary or the only resolution on that question that he would stand for.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I am sorry to hear the gentleman from Waltham move to restrict debate after the very good work on the part of the committee on Rules. It seems to me the committee on Rules have limited debate fairly. Now there is considerable discussion to be had on this question of the judiciary. My brother from Waltham said that the Convention of 1853 was really a campaign of education, and this Convention by discussion can provoke good thought if politics and log-rolling are laid aside; but the gentleman from Waltham in his artful way of getting rid of all judicial measures is using this subterfuge to side-track this debate. Therefore I trust that this Convention will not stifle speech by adopting the recommendation of the gentleman from Waltham.

Mr. Atwillard of Cambridge: I sincerely trust that the previous question will not be ordered. I do not think that any of the reasons urged by the gentleman from Waltham will expedite progress on this matter, or the contention that the arguments that may be addressed to all similar measures may well be discussed during the consideration of this measure; and if this one is put out of the way now, as the gentleman assumes, because there is not much interest in it, it will not save any time. I do not know how much interest there is in this particular measure in this assembly, but I do know that there is great interest in it throughout the Commonwealth, and I think it would be a mistake to put it so that, by any snap vote or by any effort made on the part of those who believe there will be a smaller vote in favor of this than of some other measure, there would not be a free discussion.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I do not possess the diplomacy of the gentleman from Waltham, but I should like to bring to the attention of the delegates one or two facts regarding this matter. It was debated at length before, three whole days practically being given to a discussion of the question. The gentleman from Charlestown (Mr. James H. Brennan) had the matter recommitted in order that he might have an opportunity to express his opinions, which he did yesterday very ably, as he always does. The gentleman from Boston to whom reference has been made (Mr. O'Connell) has spread through the Convention, by mail, his remarks upon this feature of our work. Now, sir, if we are going to be courteous and kind and friendly and considerate of every man who would like to get into print, — and this is where I lack diplomacy, — who would like to get into print, you are going to sit here until Christmas again. If you had adopted my proposition not to print remarks verbatim, as I urged the Convention last year, you would have been out of here last winter. [Applause.] The time has come when the delegates should decide once and for all whether we are here in the public interest or whether we are here on our private political business. And I think that we might just as well drop the question of courtesy and kindness and all of that sort of thing and get right down to practical business. I trust that the previous question will prevail.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: I am somewhat amazed at the action of this intended deliberative assembly in shutting off debate on a momentous question before one word has been said in opposition to the enactment of this amendment. With this great assembly comprising 150 members of the bar, not one single, solitary, legal light has stood upon the floor of this Convention to give a sound, intelligent reason why this matter should not be enacted into our Constitution. We have heard imputations here that speeches have been made for the purpose of propaganda,—the statement made by the gentleman from Waltham. I do not know just what he means by propaganda, and possibly his own attitude may be also that of a gentleman speaking from the standpoint of propaganda, because, as I understand, he is a candidate for higher honors and those who are “in glass houses should not throw stones.” The gentleman from Somerville, who impugns the intentions of those who favor this amendment, says that this matter had been debated for three days. I beg to differ with the gentleman. It was debated for thirty minutes. It was reconsidered after being rejected without debate, and I wish to correct the record so far as his assertion goes that this matter was debated for three days at the last session. I want to say to him that it is very unfair, that it is not legislative courtesy, to doubt the motives of any speaker on any matter in this chamber. And let me remind him and the gentleman from Waltham that all the purity and civic righteousness of Massachusetts' politics does not come from Waltham or from Somerville. [Applause.] And I deny their right to impugn the statements of any man on the floor of this Convention. I want only to ask that the layman statesman on the committee on Judiciary in charge of this report (Mr. Sullivan of Salem), who, by his splendid ability and talents, although a layman, occupies a position on the committee on the Judiciary, that he stand on his feet and defend the report of his committee and give to this intelligent body two reasons why this matter should not be enacted into our Constitution instead of putting on a gag rule to stop intelligent discussion. I come from one of the largest congressional districts in the United States and one of the most historic, and I say to you as a delegate from the 10th Congressional District of Boston that there is a sentiment in this Commonwealth for the direct election of all of our public officers.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: I did not intend to say anything about this resolution, but I have been approached by members of the Convention and requested to state the position of the Judiciary Committee. That I will not do, because I shall leave that to the member of the Judiciary Committee in charge of this measure. But I do want to say this, that if for one moment I believed that in a Massachusetts Constitutional Convention with a membership of 155 lawyers the judiciary of this Commonwealth needed any man to rise in its defense, I would consider that fact alone sufficient to make one reflect and consider whether or not there was not something wrong, something which called for a change in the method of selecting the members of our judiciary. But it stands as a fact on the record of this Convention that not a man who has spoken here has made any attack upon our judiciary. Have you noticed that? Not one attack has been made upon the judiciary of this Commonwealth! The attack has been made upon the method by which they are selected. Am I not correct in my analysis of the arguments in support of this resolution? If, then, the attack is merely upon the method by which they are selected, and no attack has been made,—because no man dares to make an attack,—upon the judiciary itself, because its record would refute it, is there not, then, in that fact a confession that our judiciary is above criticism and above attack? Can it be said of a method of creating a judiciary which has been in force for over a hundred years and where the men appointed to office under it have been above attack, that such a method of creating the judiciary ought to be changed?

Reference has been made here to other States. Let me give you as a complete summary of this question the conclusion arrived at in 1915 by an able committee of the New York City Bar Association. I will read to you just one sentence from the report, prepared by the committee, a committee consisting of some of the ablest lawyers in a State having an elective judiciary:

Your committee is of opinion that the best and most practical method of securing learned, experienced, upright and impartial judges and of maintaining independence is by appointment and not by election.

Mr. CARR of Hopkinton: I hesitate to speak on this question in the five minutes that is allotted to me, as I did hope that the matter might be given opportunity to be more fully discussed. It may be that we shall have an opportunity of discussing this subject more fully on the resolutions that follow this one if the same policy is not adopted and the previous question moved before members are permitted to debate the resolutions that come up at that time. I am not going to attempt to pick out any member of the judiciary and say: “Here is a glaring example of inefficiency caused by partisan appointment, and for that reason we are advocating a change in the system.” No man or set of men advocating this proposed change in our system is advocating it on any concrete instance of political appointment, as the last speaker might try to have you infer. That is not the motive that is prompting us to seek this change. We are prompted to do this because we wish to bring our judiciary nearer democracy,—to get nearer to our democratic ideals in the selection of our judges than we have been getting by the system that prevails in this Commonwealth and has prevailed so long. We are practically the only Commonwealth in the Nation that has an appointive system. I think there is only one other. The majority of the other States have the elective system of judges, and surely the decisions in those States which elect judges are fair examples of justice, and human rights have been protected equally as well as they have been in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I shall not attempt to criticize any individual judge for any decision he has given. But all you have to do is to review the appointments and examine the method that has been employed before the appointments have been made. I will give you in the form of a little fable a picture of the process of appointing judges in Massachusetts. There was once upon a time a man who had engaged in the practice of law, who had tried cases in the various courts of the Commonwealth and who had been appointed to positions of confidence and gained a reputation as a successful attorney, and was independent in politics. There came in his lifetime a vacancy in the office of judge in his judicial district; and this man, believing that possibly politics would not enter into the question, and aspiring to the office, became a candidate for judge in that district. He went among his fellow-townsmen who knew him best and circulated a petition certifying that he was a competent man. He went among the attorneys who knew him and they indorsed his petition, and he went before the Governor of the State asking the appointment. After this gentleman's petition had been considered he was informed by the Governor of this Commonwealth whose name I shall not mention, or by the secretary of the Governor of this Commonwealth, that it would be necessary for him to remove the opposition of the leader of the party of which the Governor was a member. The applicant, who formerly had had belief in the Legislature, once had dared to oppose the Speaker of the House of Representatives on labor legislation, and he thus aroused the animosity of that Speaker. The message was conveyed to this aspirant to the office of judge and who had those indorsements of his fitness, that if he would see this man who was opposing him and get him to withdraw his hostility he would be appointed judge.

Now is not that a beautiful situation? Is not that a beautiful situation? I do not know whether other candidates for the office of judge are put on the grill as this poor fellow was, but those are facts, and those are the methods that are employed now in the appointment of judges. I ask you if it is not far better for this Commonwealth to follow the proposition laid down in the resolution offered by the gentleman from East Boston (Mr. Maguire) wherein he puts the election of our judges on a non-partisan basis. The candidate has to have certain qualifications by the amendment proposed in the resolution. He has to be of a certain age, a man learned in the law, and must go before the people as non-partisan.

Mr. AYLWARD: I well could have wished that this matter had been attended to in the last session of this Convention when the I. and R. was before us. I am satisfied that the people of this Commonwealth are interested vitally in this question as to whether or not judges shall be elected or appointed for a term of years, and I am satisfied whenever this question is put before the people that the present method will be repudiated by the people. It is not so much what some individual may or may not do; the difficulty is that it is almost impossible to remove judges. This is the only State in the Union in which that state of affairs exists. We have had occasions in the Commonwealth,—one I can remember within my time at the bar,—of a man occupying a position on the bench in this county, unfitted for years, who would not resign, who begged for a pension, and who was allowed to stay there because of the difficulty of removing him, because of that sympathy which would go out to an old man even though they could prove their case. This showed at that time that the system was an improper one. The gentleman from Quincy on my right (Mr. McAnarney) wants to know, and is surprised that members of this Convention have not made allegations against judges. What does he think the lawyers of this Convention are,—suicides?—to stand up here and make a personal allegation against judges, so that they may be "soaked" by those judges or their friends the next time they go into court? I do not think the lawyers of this Convention who oppose the present method are so unselfish as that.

I am not particularly interested in this proposed amendment, but I shall vote for it as a protest against the present method. I am more particularly interested in a later measure, namely, the proposal for appointment by the Governor for a term of years, which I believe is a method that this State will come to finally. And if something is not put in or sent to the people from this Convention regarding the selection of judges I am satisfied, because of their inability to act under the I. and R., that there will be another Convention much sooner than this one was called. I am sorry that there is not further time to discuss this question. I am afraid that in view of the success of the opposition here in getting this previous question put through, a very short time may be permitted on the other proposals, because I can well understand that the conservative element in this Convention have lobbied pretty well and found out how many votes are for and against these measures. And if we are to judge by the experience of this measure I am afraid that debate may be cut off on the others, and I believe there are several members of this Convention representing large constituencies who wish to discuss them more fully than they have had the opportunity while this measure has been under discussion.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: I want to ask the attention of this Convention but for a few minutes. For several seasons I have passed the winter months in Miami, Florida. I am well acquainted there and I desire to relate a little incident that occurred, which bears upon this question.

There was a policeman in Miami who presented me a card on the street, asking me to vote for him as a judge of the municipal court. He had had no experience as a lawyer, and I was not entitled to vote there, but he did not know it; he thought I might be a resident. He was elected a judge, and I went to his court frequently, just as a place of amusement, and a good many other tourists would do the same. None of Gilbert and Sullivan’s plays compared in amusement with the way that man administered justice. I simply say this as regards one case of the election of judges by the people.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I am sorry that I cannot see my way clear to gratify the desire of the gentleman from Charlestown (Mr. James H. Brennah) to hear me make a “regular speech,” as he calls it. I have it all prepared here, and in writing, and if I thought it was necessary, or that it would change any votes, I would give it. I agree with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) and am not anxious to see any speech of mine printed and circulated for posterity to read or for political effect. I think most of the men in this Convention have their minds made up as to how they shall vote on this measure. They have expressed themselves on this subject in many ways during the debate at the last session on the judiciary questions and the I. and R., and our Judiciary Committee are not going to try to make any defence of the Massachusetts judiciary as attacked in the debate on this measure, because it does not need any. In my opinion the best defence that the Massachusetts judiciary can have as regards the attacks made upon it during the present debate on this measure and the most eloquent and decisive speech that will be made in behalf of the judiciary of the Commonwealth will be the simple announcement of the presiding officer of what I know will be a large majority vote in favor of sustaining the report of the Judiciary Committee for the rejection of the measure. With that statement I am willing, as the member of the Judiciary Committee in charge of the adverse report, to have the measure go to a vote at this time.

The resolution was rejected, Friday, June 14, 1918, by a vote of 125 to 32.
Tenure of Judicial Officers.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 194):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In order that the people may not suffer from the long continuance in place of any judicial officer, other than a justice of the peace, who shall fail of discharging the important duties of his office with ability or fidelity, all commissions of judicial officers, other than justices of the peace shall expire and become void, in the term of ten years from their respective dates; and, upon the expiration of any commission, the same may, if necessary, be renewed, or another person appointed, as shall most conduce to the well-being of the Commonwealth: provided, nevertheless, the Governor, with consent of the Council, may remove them upon the address of both Houses of the Legislature.

The committee on the Judiciary reported at the 1917 session that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention June 14, 1918.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston moved that resolution No. 345 be substituted. This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 53 to 79.

The resolution (No. 194) was rejected June 14, as had been recommended by the committee on Judiciary.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I certainly believe in the views of my friend and co-worker, Mr. Maguire of East Boston. I feel that my brother from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) will have to seriously apologize to the people of Quincy when he gets back, for his conduct here. It seems to me that my brother from Quincy has joined the Conservative Club that runs this Convention, and the "high-brows" have got him. No more serious subject bothered the minds of the Convention of 1853 than this present subject of the tenure and the election of judges. When the Union of States was formed by the adoption of the Federal Constitution the principle of popular election was applied to government more than ever before in human history. It was applied to the legislative department; it was applied to the executive department; but it was withheld from the judicial department because of the fears of Alexander Hamilton, who felt that imperialism already had conceded to democracy too much and could concede no more.

His influence made the judges of the Federal government independent of the people by giving to the chief executive the right to appoint them, a system analogous to that advocated by our opponents who would give to the chief executive of the State the right to appoint the judges of the State.

Of the Federal system as now practiced in this State, we say that it was obnoxious to Thomas Jefferson, whose theory of government has found favor with the succeeding generations while the imperialism of Hamilton has been discountenanced. And it has proven very obnoxious to the people at large, as a summary of the judicial systems now employed by the various States will show plainly. For in spite of the many excellencies in the Federal system and in spite of the fact that it commonly is held up as a model in all things governmental, forty-two of the States of the Union have seen fit to depart from the Federal usage of selecting their judges.

The doctrine of Jefferson is fast getting control. Jefferson regularly expressed the fear that the courts of the United States were attempting to break down the constitutional barriers between the coordinate powers of the State and the Union.

The first ground on which we oppose this system is its inconsistency. We live under a democratic form of government. We elect Legislatures and delegate to them the making of laws, and why shall we not elect the judges to whom is delegated the business of interpreting those laws?

If it is right to apply the principle of popular election to the executive department and the legislative department, on what ground do we discriminate against the coordinate department of justice? It is only when we look deeper into the nature and powers of this department that we can explain this inconsistency. What relation does the judicial department bear to the legislative and the executive departments? The three are coordinate in name and in fact, they cannot destroy each other, but in some respects the judicial department is supreme.

The executive department exercises a limited control over the legislative by reason of the Governor's power of vetoing legislation, but that veto may be overridden by sufficient majority of the Legislature.

But the Supreme Judicial Court exercises a final and unquestionable authority over legislation; the Supreme Judicial Court can annul an act, not only on the ground that it violates the express provision and clear implication of the Constitution, but even on the ground that it is not in harmony with the spirit of the Constitution.

Another argument in favor of the existing system is that the people are not as well qualified to elect their judges as are the Governor and the Council to appoint them. There is not the slightest evidence tending to prove the truth of this assertion, and it is a direct insult to the intelligence of the citizens of the Commonwealth. There is no reason for thinking that they are not as able to choose the judges as they are to choose the other officers of the government.

It is an insult to any judge to intimate that he can be deterred from the proper performance of his official duties in the manner suggested; and it is also a serious reflection upon the character of the people to say that they ever will be guilty of thus interfering with the administration of justice. If there is any force in the argument it can be applied with the same reason to the other officers of the government, such as the district attorney.

The doctrine of the independence of the judiciary assumes that just in proportion as judges are rendered independent of the people will they become impartial and just in their decisions. So far from this being true, eminent publicists contend that this independence has precisely the opposite effect upon them. Such is human nature that the possession of unlimited power, like that which is exercised by our courts in certain matters, coupled with the absence of responsibility to the people for its proper exercise, tends to render the judges arbitrary and unjust in their rulings and decisions. They know full well that their positions are secured to them for life,—the provisions of the Constitution in regard to their impeachment and removal from office by address being wholly inoperative. For however much the people may suffer from the unjust acts of the judges there is little prospect of success in any effort which may be made to remove them from office so long as their conduct is not positively criminal.

The sins of the Judiciary Committee are not sins of commission but omission. Governor McCall in his opening words to this Convention said the fact that it was war time would give us a keener perception. Have we used it? Has the shadow of war thrown over our deliberations dispelled the ordinary legislative atmosphere? Is not every measure fitted to the Procrustean bed of the Legislature? For what purpose was this Convention called if it were not to satisfy the social unrest so apparent, to ameliorate, if not cure, the hardships and defects of our social fabric? Are we giving the thought to this epoch-making Convention that we should? Is not sound more popular than sense? Are we dealing with questions in the cold academic analysis which reason dictates, or do our personal and business relations unconsciously enter into our judgments?

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by substituting a new draft (No. 345).

Mr. SULLIVAN: After a career of over a quarter of a century in the courts, and a very pleasant experience, I am not here to criticize the judges, who in the main have been very kind to me; and if I were inclined to criticize the judiciary, the recent appointment of one of our members, the gentleman from Lancaster, to the lowest court, and the appointment of a very human district attorney in Essex County, a brother of another member, to the Superior Court, would deter me from any very harsh criticism. But feeling that perhaps twenty-five years' active practice in the courts might qualify me as an expert, I am encouraged to discuss this question somewhat briefly, and to appeal to you hopefully to submit to the people this amendment to permit the appointment of judges for a term of years.

Were it not for the fact that this first debate has terminated so disastrously for the friends of the people, there would be greater reason to believe that some of our more exclusive members would listen seriously to a discussion of the limited tenure of judges. I talked with one of the greatest admirers of our judiciary, and he said that if he had not taken such a firm position in the committee on the Judiciary he would be in favor of limited tenure of judges.

What purpose does the judge serve? The judge is appointed to dispense justice, courteously, impartially and wisely, to guarantee the security of the life and liberty, the reputation and property, of the people; and yet this man, who is appointed to render such service to the people, is beyond the reach of the people.

How is the judge appointed? After carefully considering him geographically, socially and politically. What is the history of the recent or up-to-date appointments? Serving on the Judiciary Committee of the Legislature, one beholds the secretary of the Bar Association (who has been in constant attendance at this Convention) leading by the hand some prospective candidate for a judicial appointment; and this candidate becomes effusive over everything the Bar Association desires. Ergo he is in line for an appointment. Now, our friend from East Boston gave a list of the recent judicial appointees by the present Governor, seven judges,—all Republicans,—two of said judges being appointed to the Suffolk Probate Court, where Arthur Dolan, Register of Probate for years, entitled to the promotion as established by custom and especially fitted for the appointment, was not appointed because he was a Democrat. Twice was this judicial appointment withheld from the man best fitted for it that a Republican Governor might strengthen his political fences by means of a partisan appointment to the judiciary. That is your politics.

As to the geographical consideration: Suppose that there is a vacancy in the Superior Court; it is the turn of Plymouth County to have a judge; and so some lawyers, practicing in the lower court, who, every one of them, are anxious to become a successor to the judge of that court, peddle about a petition to promote the present incumbent in order that they may succeed him. What eminent fitness! That, briefly, is the history of the appointment.

After the judge is appointed he becomes free and independent, according to our self-appointed spokesmen. "Free and independent, and let us keep him so," they say. How free is he? The poor judge cannot talk with an exclusive lawyer for the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company but we, less fortunate, conclude that he is being "contaminated," or that he is unduly friendly with this legal aristocrat. On the other hand, if he is a man from the plain people, appointed by Governor Foss, then the legal aristocrat suspects that the judge is too close to the plain people when he listens to a funny story from me. The poor judge cannot eat at a public restaurant, although of late he is seen there; he must eat at the University Club, where there is a sanctified atmosphere, and where he comes in contact with our legal aristocrats who mainly represent corporations.

Free and independent! I wonder if they appreciate, these legal aristocrats, what that utterance means when they defend the judges. I am not going to attack the judges, only to say this, that, if all the judges were to seek reappointment, Judges King and Raymond are the only incumbents of the Superior Court who would not be considered for reappointment.

Free and independent judges,—and their friends and defenders say: "Let us keep them free and independent and not make them subject to the whim of reappointment." What does that mean? What would tend to make a judge free and independent? Does a judge become free and independent when he is assured that he cannot lose his salary, that he cannot lose his pension, that he cannot lose his position? The defenders of the judges say: "Consider the personality of the different judges and do not affect their independence, do not render them less free and independent, because if they are not assured of their salaries and pensions and positions, they will be susceptible to unworthy considerations and will not be so good nor will they remain honest." I think that such an argument is an insult to the judges. I know if I was a judge,—and I know it is true of the judges with whom I am intimate,—I gladly would go before the people. I remember attending a banquet to Judge Keating, an ideal judge, a man for whom I have great admiration and respect, and that is the reason I attended the banquet. It was attended also by our legal luminaries, the professional orators of the Bar Association. I generally refrain from attending these functions because I must listen to the drivel of this mutual admiration society when I go; but because of my warm friendship for Judge Keating I went. Judge Hammond of the Supreme Judicial Court stood before us and pathetically asked the lawyers present to express honestly their opinion of the judges, and he said: "We are aloof from the people," and he was a pathetic and tragic figure. I sympathized with him then, I sympathize with him now, and it is because of my sympathy for a real judge that I am advocating this limited tenure.

Judge Hammond said: "Please tell us what you think about us; we are aloof from you, we cannot mix with the people as we would like to, we would be misunderstood." And the friendly Bar Association orators told what they thought of him, while the only friend of the plain people present was restrained from disturbing the harmony of the occasion. [Laughter.]

Now, the judges want to know what the people think of them, and the more human and better a judge is the more he wishes to know it. Judge Aiken is the Chief Justice of the Superior Court. I question if he is the best lawyer on that bench, but he fills that position better than any man who ever held that position. Judge Aiken and Governor Foss have done more to inspire confidence in the judiciary among plainer members of the bar and the plain people than Chief Justice Shaw and all the other great jurists who ever lived in this Commonwealth. Judge Aiken is essentially human,—a courteous, merciful judge, to whom anybody and everybody can go and be assured of fair treatment. Judges approaching this standard were appointed by Governor Foss, and perhaps the only purpose my address will serve is to pay a little tribute to Governor Foss. Politicians may laugh at him as they will, they may say he is here to-day and there tomorrow politically; but Governor Foss appointed to the judiciary men of the Catholic faith when it required great courage, physical and moral, to do it, and gave representation on the bench to a large portion of our people. Governor Foss, whatever his political future may be, always will live in loving remembrance in the hearts of many people who appreciate what physical and moral courage mean in public life. So if my remarks serve no other purpose, I am enabled thereby to give expression to the gratitude, affection and admiration I feel for the Governor, who no longer can render us a service, who no longer can appoint anybody to office, a realization of which makes my words entirely disinterested.

Are the judges free and independent and beyond the reach of sordid temptations? Serve in the Legislature and you will be disillusioned speedily. Every year a raise in salary or an increase in pension is pressed, pushed and lobbied for. I presented a resolution to this Convention which provided that when a judge takes the office his salary shall not be increased during his tenure. Is not that a fair proposition? A judge makes a contract with the Commonwealth to serve for the salary paid at the beginning of his term and should not be encouraged to seek a larger compensation, for it leads to unfortunate complications. Come to the Legislature and vote against this salary increase, as I did, and your experience may be similar to mine. The judge had been advised from day to day as to the progress of the bill to increase his salary and had been given the names of its opponents; he recognized me so readily every time I appeared before him that I never had a chance to win, and was compelled to refuse all cases coming before him.

Free and independent! Serve in the Legislature here and have the judges, or their representatives, come lobbying to you and asking you to vote for an increase in pension or an increase in salary, when you would like to save the Commonwealth the expenditure, and see what treatment you will get from some of them!

The judges are not the aggressors. Some astute friend and lobbyist suggests to the judge that if his salary is increased a thousand dollars a year he (the lobbyist) will take the first year's increase. That is the way in which salaries sometimes are increased for the free and independent judges. I now state emphatically that this criticism of salary increases does not apply or refer to the judges of the Supreme Judicial or Superior Courts.

Listen to the argument of the defenders of the judges as they present it to you. They say: "Let us not shatter or impair the legal efficiency and ability and honesty of the judges by making them solicitous for their salary or their position; some are weak and infirm, some are susceptible to peculiar and sordid influences, so do not let us tempt them. We know they are human and fallible; let us not tempt them."

How can you make a good judge any better by offering him money or security of position? How can you make a bad man good enough for a judge by these material inducements? As I have said, there are only the two men whom I have mentioned, judges in the Superior Court, who would not receive indorsement from every thoughtful and conscientious lawyer for reappointment.

Here are the two pictures. Under the present system of life tenure, a man of whom our estimate is that he is most ordinary in his legal attainments is selected, and because some Governor, who is himself only human and sometimes very ordinary, selects him from a number of candidates, he becomes deified and lifted far above the people. Here is the picture under the life tenure, — a judge deified by the Governor, beyond the reach of the people. Our government is founded upon the public will as exemplified by the election of the executive and the legislative branches for a year, but the judge is selected for life, free and independent of the people.

I am attacking the system. It is undemocratic to have any man appointed for life. Go with me to the court, try a case for days for some poor man or woman who has waited for two or three years for his day in court, and then some smooth, slick and well-groomed attorney for the corporation asks that a verdict be directed for the defendant; you look into the face of that judge, who is known to be unfriendly to the plain people, who you feel is going to direct a verdict for the defendant, because the corporation is powerful, and financially able to take the case to the Supreme Judicial Court. The judge reflects: "The corporation will appeal from my ruling to the Supreme Judicial Court, this plaintiff is too poor to do so," therefore he directs a verdict for the defendant, — and it is the judge especially who should be vigilant to do justice to the poor man. The law of exceptions favors the corporation. The corporation takes the case to the Supreme Judicial Court, the Supreme Judicial Court sustains the exceptions, and directs a verdict for the defendant. In the other view, if the plaintiff's exceptions are sustained, he must go back and try over again in the Superior Court, after years of waiting. If such a judge had to come before a Governor for reappointment, and specific instances of unfairness and incompetency could be argued against him, it would afford some satisfaction and be somewhat of a deterrent even if the Governor reappointed him.

Now, you have this deified official, floating in this rarified atmosphere of falsehood and flattery, lifted above the people by the æsthetic potency of the powerful friends of the corporations and the cultured habitues of the University Club; and he floats in this rarified atmosphere, looking down condescendingly upon the people, one eye cast lovingly upon his makers, the other eye on the pay-roll or pension roll in the hands of those who are all powerful. That is a picture of your judge to-day.

But to me, under the new system, we would have a different picture. We would have a real man, not the inflated figure of a man floating in an unhealthy atmosphere. You would have a real man, with his feet on the ground, walking among his people, looking them fearlessly in the face, actually free and independent. Why? Because he knows his position is founded upon the good will and the confidence of the people. And I care not how good or how able a judge is, if he have not the confidence of the people then he is useless to the judiciary and to the Commonwealth.

So let the new system prevail, let this real man walk about among his people. Let him know that his position is founded upon public confidence, not upon individual favoritism; and such a man will dissipate this present-day discontent with our judges, will inspire confidence in the courts, and will engender in the people a loyal affection and an abiding faith in the judiciary of Massachusetts.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: If I heard the gentleman from Waltham
(Mr. Luce) right in the early part of the day, he said there was some measure he was going to ask the Convention to delay action upon until the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) was able to be here to be heard upon it, and I understood that it was this particular measure that the gentleman from Waltham said that the gentleman from Boston had in some way intimated to him he wished to be heard upon. If that is the fact I should like to have the gentleman from Waltham state to the Convention what particular measure, what particular one of these resolutions, he has in mind to ask the Convention to delay action upon, or whether it is this one.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The gentleman from Hopkinton misunderstood me in the matter. I did inform the Convention that the gentleman from Boston in question (Mr. O'Connell) had told me that it was his intention to center debate on No. 115 on the calendar. I called the attention of the Convention to the fact that if there de-developed a considerable body of support for the proposition that the tenure or method of appointment of the judges should be changed, then it might very well seem wise to the Convention to prolong the debate, but I gave no intimation at all of my own intention to make any further motion in the matter.

Mr. Carr: I might call the attention of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), as to this particular resolution that we are now discussing, that the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division (Mr.
W. H. Sullivan had moved to substitute No. 115, or document No. 345, for the question under consideration now; so that No. 115, or document No. 345, really is under discussion at the present time, although I suppose that finally No. 115 will come in the usual course if the calendar is not rushed through this afternoon and those matters disposed of.

Now, in all fairness I do feel that these matters ought not to be disposed of this afternoon, especially with the slim attendance that we are having here, and that the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) should be given the opportunity to be heard that he so ardently has desired and such a large number of members here wish to give him.

Mr. McLaud of Greenfield: I dislike very much to see this disposed of in this way. I consistently voted against any change whatsoever in the judiciary, both last year and this year, and the probabilities are that I shall continue so to vote; but I do believe that this particular measure which is now under discussion for substitution has above all others some merit. I do think that it should be discussed properly. I do think that the most able exponent of any change is the ex-Congressman, the gentleman from Boston, and I think it is absolutely unfair to take any such advantage of him at this time. I hope that by some method this matter can be postponed until he can be present and speak upon it. It is through no fault of his own that he is not here.

Mr. Mancowitz of Boston: I regret very much that the gentleman who offered the substitute is not present in the chamber to discuss it. No doubt there is a feeling in the Commonwealth, and there is a feeling among many of the delegates in the Convention, that a change in our present judicial system ought to take place. Some of the delegates believe that the most democratic change should take place, to wit, the election of judges. Others believe that the tenure of the judges should be limited, while others believe that the present system should continue and ought not to be disturbed. Thus we are confronted with three propositions. I believe that a common level can be arrived at whereby the present judges will be allowed to hold their commissions and yet bring about a wholesome change in the present system.

I have had the honor of being a member of the General Court of the Commonwealth for four years, and have practiced law in this Commonwealth for eighteen years. During my services in the Legislature, a Chief Justice of one of our courts appealed to me to assist him in riding his bench of two of his associates. The reason of his desire to obtain the retirement of the two associates was that both men were physically unfit to perform their duties to the public. One of these judges was so deaf that he could not hear the parties and the witnesses who appeared before him, and the other judge was so old that he could not keep awake while sitting on the bench. Thus the people of the great city of Boston who resorted to the courts for justice were obliged to suffer that condition for a number of years, as there was no way under the present Constitution to retire these two judges except by impeachment or an address by the General Court, and no one desired to remove these two judges by the method provided by the Constitution, and thus we were obliged to resort to a subterfuge by retiring these two judges on a pension.

Another striking example occurred in our Probate Court for Suffolk County, where the judge, who was in his second childhood, would not retire, although he had passed his eightieth birthday, until he received first an increase in salary and then a pension of three-fourths of the salary as increased.

Is it fair to the people of this Commonwealth to keep men on the bench until they go to their graves, regardless of whether they can perform their duties properly or not? It is my firm opinion that this Convention ought to do something to permit the people of the Commonwealth to say whether or not the present system should be changed.

The resolution offered as a substitute leaves the Supreme Judicial Court as it is to-day, allowing the Justices to hold their offices during good behavior, for the reason that the Supreme Judicial Court does not come in contact with the people as much as the Superior Court and other inferior courts. But the trial judges, who come in close touch with the people, should be obliged to account to the people at certain reasonable periods for their conduct and the people should be in a position to retire the trial judge when he proves to be unsatisfactory either through incompetency or old age.

It was regrettable to hear the distinguished gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnerney) take the floor in the Convention and wave the red flag in the faces of members of this Convention who are members of the bar and who have the courage to take the floor and present the true facts concerning our present judiciary system. I want to say to him that if he insists upon his charges I shall name judges of our Superior Court who, to my mind, are unfit to occupy a seat upon the bench by lack of judicial temperament, training, ability or experience. I shall ask him if he ever heard of at least one judge in our great Superior Court who had acquired the reputation of holding one of the sessions of that court which was named the Plaintiff's Graveyard, and if he believes a judge who brings about that condition in our courts is wholesome.

It became necessary for the General Court to take action, and legislation was introduced tending to prohibit by law a judge from holding a session in one county for the entire year. The Chief Justice of that court came forward and promised to correct the system, and the General Court abandoned its proposed legislation.

Further, I should like to ask him if a judge is competent to do justice who, while sitting on the bench, will ask a witness before him what his religious views are. Judges of that type exist nowhere except under the Massachusetts system. This is the only State that has such a system in this great country of ours. Yet he asks: "Has any one said a word against the personnel of the judiciary?"

I will tell the gentleman of an experience I had in one of our courts not very long ago, when the judge on the bench, in the trial of a criminal cause, said in open court that he was not concerned or interested in or cared for the rights of the defendant, that he was going to do what he could to keep the city clean and pure; if people wanted their rights, his court was not the place where they could invoke their constitutional rights of appeal. Do the people of this Commonwealth want men of that type on their bench? I believe they do not.

The trouble with the judges under the Massachusetts system is this: When a judge receives his commission and takes his seat on the bench, he begins to crawl into his shell and stays there for the rest of his natural life. He does not mingle with the common people, he gets away from the live subjects of the day. The man who leads a narrow life acquires a narrow viewpoint and cannot judge character and human nature, neither can he judge where the truth lies. I believe the time has come in this Commonwealth when a change ought to take place and I believe the amendment contained in document No. 345 is a fair and proper solution of the cause.

In answer to the contention that in appointing a judge for a definite term of years, it will prevent the ablest of the legal profession from accepting the appointment, for the reason that having accepted the commission he will lose his practice and at the end of his term will be thrown out of office and obliged to start anew, and therefore will be at a disadvantage, I believe that objection can be taken care of and should not be considered.

I believe in giving judges a salary of $15,000 to $20,000 a year, so that the best of the profession can be drawn and attracted to the bench. I do not believe you can get a $20,000 man for $8,000, and therefore urge that the Convention permit the substitution of the resolution offered in document No. 345.

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: Before this vote is taken may I make a suggestion? It seems to me a great pity that this matter should go on without adequate debate on both sides. As one whose mind is somewhat open on the question, I desire to hear a more adequate presentation of at least the other side of the matter than has been made. My hope is that such a presentation may come to us if this substitution is refused and thereby the way laid open for a renewal of the proposition under No. 115. Am I right, Mr. President, in my judgment of the procedure that is possible?

The Presiding Officer: The Chair will state that if the Convention votes to substitute it does not close debate. The question of rejection is still before the Convention and the debate may proceed.

The amendment moved by Mr. William H. Sullivan was rejected, by a vote of 53 to 79.

The resolution (No. 194) was rejected June 14, 1918.

Mr. David Mancovitz of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 193):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following

 ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court shall, with the advice and consent of the Council, be appointed by the Governor for a term of ten years, and the Justices of such inferior courts as are or may be established by law, for a term of seven years, said Justices to be eligible to reappointment, but in no case to continue in office after attaining sixty-five years of age.

The committee on the Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Friday, June 14, 1918.

Mr. Mancovitz moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft (No. 345):
Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by inserting the following:

All judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, of the Superior Court, Land Court, or courts hereafter created in their stead, shall hold their offices for the term of ten years, and all other judicial officers of any inferior court now or hereafter existing, shall hold their offices for the term of seven years. And upon the expiration of such term they may be reappointed. They should have honorable salaries established by standing laws, which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which the judicial officer is chosen. The present judicial officers shall hold their offices according to their respective commissions; but hereafter when any vacancy shall occur excepting in the Supreme Judicial Court it shall be filled by appointment for a term as herein provided, but in no event to continue in office after attaining sixty-five years of age, excepting judges of the Supreme Judicial Courts, who shall not continue after attaining seventy years of age. No person shall be appointed a judge who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and have been ten years a citizen of this Commonwealth, and been admitted as an attorney for ten years.

No person shall be appointed a judge in any of said inferior courts unless at the time of his appointment he is a resident and qualified voter within the venue of said court, and his commission shall expire upon his removal from the venue of said court.

Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved that the above proposed substitute draft (No. 345) be amended by striking out lines 3 to 28, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

The Legislature shall have the power to establish an age for the compulsory retirement of judges.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the proposed substitute draft (No. 345) be amended by striking out lines 3 to 28, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

The Governor, by and with the consent of the Council, may retire any judicial officer because of advanced age, mental or physical incapacity.

This amendment was modified, on motion of Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston, by adding at the end thereof the words "and, and the General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired."

The amendment as thus modified was adopted, by a vote of 107 to 69.

The new draft proposed by Mr. Mancovitz as thus amended was adopted. The resolution as amended was ordered to a second reading as follows (see No. 380):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by inserting the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The Governor, by and with the consent of the Council,
4 may retire any judicial officer because of advanced age,
5 mental or physical incapacity, and the General Court
6 may provide pensions for judges so retired.

This resolution was read a second time Thursday, July 25, 1918.

Mr. David Mancovitz of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 380) be amended by inserting after the word "Council," in line 3, the words "shall appoint all justices of the police, district and municipal courts, or such other courts as the Legislature may establish in their place, for a term of seven years, and ."

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 42 to 99.

Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 380) be amended by inserting after the word "age", in line 4, the word "unfitness;" and by striking out lines 3 to 6, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following: "All judicial officers shall be nominated and appointed by the Governor, by or with the consent of the Council, for a term of ten years; and they may be reappointed at the expiration of such term."

The amendment in line 4 was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 94 to 96.

The other amendment moved by Mr. O'Connell was rejected, by a vote of 38 to 104.

Mr. Fred H. Williams of Brookline moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "may", in line 4, the words "on due notice and hearing."

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment.

Article I of chapter III of part II of the Constitution is hereby amended by the addition of the following words: and provided also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may after due notice and hearing retire them because of advanced age or mental or physical disability. The General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired.

Mr. Samuel W. George of Haverhill moved that the new draft be amended by striking out, at the end thereof, the words "The General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired.", and inserting in place thereof the words "upon the terms and conditions that may be provided by law for the voluntary retirement of judicial officers."

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 71 to 58.

The amendment moved by Mr. Blackmur, as thus amended, was adopted and, accordingly, the new draft, as amended, was substituted; and it was ordered to a third reading Thursday, July 25.

The resolution, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology, was read a third time Tuesday, August 6, as follows (No. 413):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

4 Article I of Chapter III of Part II of the Constitution is hereby amended by the addition of the following words: and provided also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may after due notice and hearing retire them because of advanced age or mental or physical disability. Such retirement shall be subject to any provisions made by law as to pensions or allowances payable to such officers upon their voluntary retirement.

Mr. James E. Maguire of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words:

And provided further that the Governor by and with the consent of the Council may remove any judge for incompetence in the discharge of his official duties after giving him an opportunity of being heard and of being represented by counsel in his own defense.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 26 to 103.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

The judges of the Supreme Court and the Superior Court and the probate courts and the land courts and the district courts and the police courts shall be elected by the people for a term of seven years. The names of the candidates for judges of the aforesaid courts shall be placed upon the ballot at the regular State elections in alphabetical order without party or other designations except the title of the office. The General Court shall determine the qualifications of said candidates as to age, experience and length of membership at the bar.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "age", in line 8, the word "or, unfitness".

This amendment was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 80 to 119.

The resolution (No. 413) was passed to be engrossed Tuesday, August 6.

The Convention voted Thursday, August 15, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 158,796 to 86,023.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Mancovitz of Boston: I have been informed by a number of delegates to the Convention that there is considerable sentiment in the Convention for document No. 345, or for the principles stated in that resolution. A number of men since the morning session have expressed a feeling and desire to make some change in our present system, but they were a little timid in substituting that for the other resolution because that affected the Supreme Judicial Court. Document No. 345 does not affect the Supreme Judicial Court in any way. I will ask the members to turn to document No. 345 and read it for themselves. It provides that —

All judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, of the Superior Court, Land Court, or courts hereafter created in their stead, shall hold their offices for the term of ten years, and all other judicial officers of any inferior court now or hereafter existing, shall hold their offices for the term of seven years. And upon the expiration of such term they may be reappointed.

A further provision in the resolution provides that their salaries may be neither reduced nor increased during their term. There is a further provision that the several Justices of the various courts are to continue in office until they either retire voluntarily, retire upon a pension or retire from natural causes. It seems to me with those safeguards for our highest courts and with the protection of the present incumbents that there ought to be serious consideration given to a question which, at the present time or in the near future, is going to confront the people of this Commonwealth. We have heard this afternoon a gentleman who is a member of this Convention in this division, who represents the labor element (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston), and he told you how the labor element of our great Commonwealth feel upon the question of the judiciary. Men of liberal thought cannot conceive of one branch of our government holding office for a lifetime. Continuancy in office for a lifetime tends to arrogancy, and we want to avoid that especially in the courts that come in contact with the people daily.

We further restrict and safeguard the bench by providing that no man shall be appointed to the bench unless he is of mature years, the age of thirty-five, and that he has practiced as a member of the legal profession for at least ten years and has been a citizen of the Commonwealth for at least ten years. The men who believe that a change-
ought to take place in our system are willing to go a great way to assure the people of the Commonwealth that they shall get proper and capable men to fill those positions. The laymen cannot conceive or understand the condition of our courts and they cannot understand perhaps why there is such a divergency of opinion among the lawyers. But the legal profession, as well as the laymen, have their various circles or strata of society. The men who are more fortunate and more familiar with members of the bench no doubt have a friendly feeling toward them, while the men in other social standing, in the lower strata of life, have different views, and we never can get a large number of members of the bar to agree, because that is not their business. They are trained to disagree, and you should disregard their opinion, in this discussion, but let the laymen come in here and discuss this question. I believe their judgment on this question will be far more important to the people of the Commonwealth than that of the lawyers, of which profession I am a member. There is a serious unrest in this Commonwealth at the present time in regard to continuing or permitting one branch of our government to hold office for a lifetime. I have heard gentlemen in the Convention tell me there ought to be some restriction put upon the tenure, at least as to retirement; that when men reach the age of seventy or sixty-five, they ought to be compelled to retire. There is no proposition before the body at the present time to bring that question up; but if you substitute this resolution No. 345 for the report of the committee, we can then so amend it as to meet all the objections or all the things desired to be accomplished. I hope this Convention will give this a serious and fair discussion with a view to improving upon our present system. I do not say that the present system is an unjust system; I do not attack the personnel of the various benches. I believe the majority, the greater number of men, are honest, able and capable men. But, gentlemen, we are here for the purpose of improving our form of government and we ought to attempt to improve this particular branch of the government. It is over a hundred years since the system was adopted and there has not been a single change. Who of us here to-day would consider appointing our other officers, — district attorneys, clerks of the courts, county commissioners or other semi-judicial bodies, — to a life tenure? No one. No doubt it will be argued that the system has worked well and we ought to continue to hold it. I want to call to the attention of the Convention that in recent years we have established a quasi-judicial body known as the Industrial Accident Board, which has upon its membership seven men, two lawyers and five laymen. The litigants who appear before that board, that is, the insurance companies and the employees, would not permit a change in that body to a life tenure, because the men who appear before the board are treated fairly. The men who serve upon that board are taken from every walk of life and the term of a member is three years; they do justice to all parties, and when the term of any member of the board expires you will find both the insurance company attorneys and the attorneys for the labor element coming before the Governor and urging the member's reappointment because that man has proven worthy and honorable in his position. Keeping that in mind is it not fair to presume that if a change is made in our Superior Court and in our inferior courts a similar condition will exist? A judge who knows that at some time in his career he must give an account to the people or to the source from which he derives his power will be more cautious in treating parties before him. There are some judges in our courts to-day who disregard the rights of litigants. It is unfortunate, but human nature is not infallible. Men who hold office securely for life become arrogant and disregard the rights of litigants. We want to remedy that and prevent it, and we want to consider that phase of the question when we vote upon this resolution. I hope substitution will prevail.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I shall not attempt at this time to occupy the time of this Convention at length upon this subject. It affects the welfare of the Commonwealth, it is inseparably linked with injunctions and the power which the courts have taken unto themselves to annul acts of legislation passed by the representatives of the people. To the lawyers in this Convention, to you men who believe that the law as it is administered is right, that there can be no improvement in it, let me say that you do not mix with, and you do not know,—if you did you would not hold that opinion,—the thoughts and the opinions of the thousands of men and women who are affected by the rules and judicial decisions of our courts. We have no fault to find with the courts as they act between man and man; but when they enter into the fundamental life of the community we are interested and it is vital to the welfare of the working-class of this Commonwealth. To you men who do not dare to go the whole distance, to you men who shut your eyes and verily stand upon the wall, as Nero did, and fiddle while the city burns, let me say to you, the best thing you can do to-day is at least to pass this resolution and allow the people to act upon it; for if you still continue to disregard the welfare of the masses at the expense of a few men through and by a system which allows judges to be appointed and to be untouched by the public will, let me tell you, my friends, that you will but reap the harvest such as all oppression and nullification of the people's will always produces. Men said this at the time of the Dred Scott decision and men say it now when it has been decreed by the highest court in the land that it is perfectly proper to nullify the will of the people and once more condemn children to factory labor. For child labor is slavery.

Mr. Swig of Taunton: I have the happy privilege of being a beneficiary of the present system, being associate justice of the First District Court of Bristol; but notwithstanding that, I rise here to favor the substitution of this resolution because I believe that the judicial system will be better protected by the substitution of this resolution than to have the present system go on. And when I say that I believe that the judicial system will be better protected, I have in mind something that only recently was enacted in the Congress of the United States,—the Sedition Bill. It was there urged that in order that the people might not take the law in their own hands it was necessary to pass a Sedition Bill so that the people might have a respect for the law and not undertake to make laws for themselves. And so I say that it is necessary for us to have a tenure of years for judges so that the people may have respect for the judicial system and not, through a lack of respect for the judges, throw down the entire system because there may be in it men who are not fit to wear the ermine.
I was provoked to rise to make this statement because of the challenge that was made by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) this morning, when he said that no one had arisen to attack the judiciary in Massachusetts. To be sure, no one has arisen to attack the judges as a whole, but the gentleman from Quincy knows as well as we all know that there are men sitting on the bench in Massachusetts who are not fit,—some of them by reason of their lack of knowledge of the law, others by reason of their lack of judicial poise, and others because they lack the way and means of getting along with people or of conducting themselves other than as boors. We have some such men on the bench and the quicker the authority is given to the appointing power to get rid of such men, just so soon will the people of Massachusetts have a stronger regard for the judiciary than they now have.

What is asked here? It is asked merely that the Governor, the same appointing power, the same individual who now appoints the judges for life, shall continue to hold the same power, but that the tenure be for only ten years, so that in the meantime the Governor and the people of the Commonwealth may learn what the talents of that man may be. Many a man, who everybody thought would make a good judge, has been appointed to the bench, but after he was tried displayed defects, and the members of the bar as well as the general public have waited only for the day when it was possible to see a successor. Now by placing it within the hands of the Governor at the expiration of ten years to appoint a new judge, if a judge has been found wanting, you then create a condition that will bring about confidence on the part of all, because no Governor of this Commonwealth will turn down a worthy judge who comes up for reappointment, and an unworthy one certainly will not deserve reappointment. And that is why I rise here to-day to urge and to advocate the substitution of this measure, so that we may continue to have the respect for the judicial system to which we have been brought up in this Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I should like to say a word in favor of the substitution of this resolution, although I feel that some of its provisions might need to be amended, particularly that which provides that no person shall be a judge unless he has attained the age of thirty-five and shall have been at least ten years a resident of the Commonwealth and practicing law for ten years, and that no person shall remain a judge after he has removed from the district of his court. I think all those qualifications are unnecessary. But if an effort is made to unite the opinion of many of the members of the Convention, I think we can agree generally upon a measure that will provide for an appointive tenure of judicial terms.

I do not think that this is an issue of conservatism or of radicalism. I think it is the most conservative way of administering justice to have a limited tenure for our judicial appointments. I myself was not in favor of the election of judges, and yet I think it is largely because of this system that has historically developed in Massachusetts that we are so wedded to the present appointive system. For as the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) pointed out in his remarks that he made to us, in the State of New York, where they elect the judges, the people are wedded to that system. And still again you will find in New Jersey, where the Chancellor appoints the judges instead of the Governor, the people of that State stand for that system; and I believe in Massachusetts that the appointive system has the merit of being approved of by the great bulk of the people. But when it comes to the question of an appointment for a definite term I think we are considering something very different, because our provisions for the removal of judges are very cumbersome, and we have gone so far at times, I believe, in the history of the Commonwealth as to abolish a court in order to get rid of a judge. Now it sometimes does happen that men on the bench develop infirmities of body or of mind, and there the existing processes of removal hardly can be resorted to. I do not believe for a moment that the having of an appointive term is going to cure all evils on the bench. I think we shall need other methods of removal when a man unfortunately becomes unfit to longer serve in that capacity. But I do believe this, that there is not going to be the politics in the reappointment of judges that some delegates seem to apprehend. There has been a great deal said about politics in appointments. Of course there is politics in appointments, just the same as there would be politics in the election of judges. But I do not believe that a judge who gives honest service is going to be refused a reappointment to office on political grounds. That may happen, it may happen once or twice, but it is going to be a very rare occurrence. And on the other hand, it does not overbalance the value that the people will have of having men who have become unfit removed from the bench. We do not want to have a situation as sometimes has developed, — perhaps not in this State, — where the judge has called to the court officer to stop the noise in the court-room because four or five defendants had been convicted without the court’s hearing any of the evidence. I believe that this resolution could be substituted and later it could be amended, and for that reason I favor the passage of the resolution.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I am unalterably opposed to the election of judges and in general I agree with the conservative side of the Convention on this whole question. I do not believe that a majority of the gentlemen here really have read this resolution No. 345, and I wish that they would read it. I was opposed to it myself until I read it. I call the attention of the Convention to the remarks of the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Kilbon) this morning, in which he stated that he thought there ought to be a larger debate on this very matter, that he had an open mind with reference to it, and I understood him to say that he was surprised that there was not really any exposure of the grounds of opposition to this particular proposal. Now this proposal is not for the election of judges at all; it is a proposal for the appointment of the judges of the lower courts, not of the Supreme Judicial Court of this State, for a term of seven years. The judges of the Supreme Judicial Court are to be appointed for life, except that a time of retirement is fixed for them at seventy years of age and a time of retirement for the other judges at sixty-five years of age. As the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Leonard of Boston) has said, we could amend some of the infelicities of this measure, — I think there are some, — on the next stage, but on the whole the measure looks to me pretty good and I should like to know why conservative members of this Convention are opposed to it.

Mr. Finn of Chelsea: It so happens that I am the author of the resolution No. 345. I carefully read every measure that was filed in this Convention last year in one manner or another affecting the appointment or tenure of judges of this Commonwealth. I have read carefully the statutes that have been passed in this Commonwealth taking away from the judges rights which they formerly had and placing certain new responsibilities upon those very judges. I have read carefully the history of the judicial system of this country and I believe it is the outgrowth of the English system, a system that has an entirely different principle from ours. In England, originally, judges were appointed during the pleasure of the King, and because of the tyranny of the King, because of the royal mandates that the King's desires should be carried out by the judges, because the salaries of the English judges were at the mercy of the King, the judges were absolutely subordinate to him, to his whims and his will. A time came when the system was changed so that judges had life tenure. They were appointed by a man who ruled for life and they themselves held office for life. That system was brought over here, and with the principles of democracy as we believe them, with the principles of democracy as we have seen them carried out in this Commonwealth, we have no Governors, rulers or executives who hold office for life. The judiciary is absolutely independent from any branch of the government, but we do find the judiciary appointed here for life without any accountability, without any responsibility, without any one to answer to from the time the judge takes his robe of office to the day he departs this life. I am more particularly addressing my remarks to the lawyers than I am to the laymen of this Convention. I believe the laymen will feel as I do,—that a change of the system in this Commonwealth is necessary; and while the lawyers deep down in their hearts also believe that to be true, they never have had the courage, the moral courage, to come out of their shells, to keep away from whatever the bench may think of them, and tell you what they honestly believe to be the facts for a man who tries a case before a judge in this Commonwealth.

I have practiced in this Commonwealth over a dozen years and it may be proper to say that I myself am of foreign birth. As a foreigner I came to these shores as a child, and as I have grown older, as I have discussed with my brother members of the bar the judicial system of this Commonwealth, I have paused and I have given this matter a great deal of thought. I am sorry that this matter has come up in such a hurry. I have been detained in court all the morning, and I had not even looked at the notes which I prepared last year on this measure until a moment ago, when I received notice that this measure was being argued.

The first thing a foreigner coming into our courts is impressed with is the solemnity and dignity of the situation up to and until the time that the judge renders his decision, and in ninety per cent of the cases the testimony of the foreign-speaking person never is given the same weight as that of the man who speaks the language of the judge. In ninety cases out of a hundred justice has not been done. There are judges of our courts who are members of this Convention. I should like to ask every judge: When you sit on a case do you give a foreigner's testimony the same weight that you would give a man who spoke your language and who appeared to be as Americanized as you are? I ask you: Why haven't you?

And there is not a judge in this Commonwealth who will say that he never has decided cases along those lines.

Mr. Lynch of Milford: I should like to ask the gentleman if he would like an answer to his proposition.

Mr. Finn: My answer is "No" [laughter], not at this time. The reason I gave my colleague such a very curt answer is because when I went to law school I was told under the subject of evidence that when you coach your witnesses as to how they shall behave themselves in court you should instruct them that they should answer the question in as few words as possible and if possible by yes or no. I do not at all mean to be discourteous to the learned brother who himself is a member of the bench of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: A learned judge.

Mr. Finn: Yes, he is a learned judge. I hope this discussion will assist him and other judges who are members of this Convention so that they will be able to deal out justice as it was intended originally to be dealt out. I remember that about four or five years ago I tried a case before a judge and jury in the Superior Court in Suffolk County and the judge was what commonly is known as a plaintiff's judge, and it was very unfortunate for my client that he was defendant. After the judge had given a very lengthy and careful charge to the jury on the issues of law involved, I stepped up to the bench, as is the custom, with my opposing counsel and whispered to the judge that he had failed in his charge to give my sixteenth, seventeenth and thirty-first requests, or something like that. The judge looked them over and said: "Well, don't you think I have given those substantially, Mr. Finn?" I said: "Your Honor, I don't think so." "Well," he said, "in order that there shall be no misunderstanding I will now give these requests to the jury." He then took my requests and when he came to the sixteenth he said to the jury while he was still sitting, — not rising, as is the custom, — and while I may not use the language that was then used I will try to tell you what he did. He said: "Gentlemen of the jury, I have forgotten to tell you that when you come to the question of the . . . if you believe . . . of course you will find for the defendant, otherwise you will find for the plaintiff."

[The language used by the speaker in the portions of the above remark omitted were uttered in a rapid and unintelligible tone, such as he claimed to have been used by the judge.]

Did any of you gentlemen hear what I said? Well, the stenographer sat close enough to the judge so that the stenographer had in his or her records exactly what the judge said. The judge had covered my request for rulings by reading them word for word; the jury heard them as you gentlemen just heard what I said, and the Supreme Judicial Court has once ruled that there can be no exception to the voice in which a judge charges a jury, so that even if I had wanted to I could not except to the manner in which he delivered those requests to the jury. And still I tried to make my client believe that his rights were protected and that he was receiving justice at the hands of the proper authorities of this Commonwealth.

I was very glad that the gentleman from Newton who preceded me (Mr. Anderson) said a few words in favor of this measure. I take the same position that he does. I am opposed absolutely and unalterably to the election of judges; I do not believe in that system. I do not believe in it until we try this proposition, which is a half-way proposition. I believe the manner of selection of judges is now ideal. I am finding fault only with the tenure of the judge. I say that the man who is able, the man who has been honorable, the man who has dispensed justice while on the bench during his seven or ten-year term, — that man will be reappointed, no matter who the Governor of this Commonwealth may be. But there are times when it is necessary to remove even honest judges and able judges for other and more pertinent reasons.

Several years ago there were two judges, one of whom was disabled by age, — he had a habit of sleeping through the entire trial of a case, — a judge of the municipal court of the city of Boston; and another of his colleagues, who, while not so old, had become very, very hard of hearing. Neither of those two men chose to retire. And yet you who are not in favor of this measure would say that those judges were able to give you justice when you appeared before them. The condition brought about by the infirmities of these two judges was such that the justices of the court appeared before a committee of the Legislature and asked them to pass a bill enabling these two judges to retire on a pension. After a great deal of persuasion and seeing the necessity of helping the cause of justice the Legislature finally enacted a measure which could be applied only to these two judges. They had been in office something like twenty-five years or more and had reached the age of seventy or thereabouts, and one of them retired immediately upon the passage of this pension bill and the other one waited for some time.

A great many members of the Legislature within a dozen years or more will remember that a certain learned judge in this Commonwealth who had passed the age when he could properly and ably dispense justice refused to resign until he had dictated to the committee of the Legislature an increase of the salary which he then was receiving, and had them pass a bill enabling him to get either two-thirds or three-fourths of that new salary, so that he could retire on a proportionably larger pension.

When, a few years ago, the judges of the Superior Court were to be increased in number upon a recommendation of the then Governor, it may be news to you that a committee of the Superior Court judges waited upon His Excellency the Governor to prevent him from affixing his signature of approval to that bill, they claiming that they had now found a rule that would give a man a quicker trial than he was then receiving. Although for years before that time the dockets in Suffolk County had been three years behind, these judges, fearing that there might be some disturbance created by putting in six new judges at one time, immediately tried to prevent the signing of that bill by the Governor.
JUDGES are not in politics; that is what they tell us and that is what they would have us believe. I believe on the whole that the judicial system of this Commonwealth needs some change. I do not believe in a radical change; I think that since the 1853 Convention this idea of appointing judges for a term has spread. It may be news to some of you that that Convention passed an amendment similar to this whereby all judges would be given a ten-year tenure. That was passed and recommended by the Convention to be adopted by the people. But strange as it may seem, their procedure was different from ours, and instead of that individual proposition being submitted to the people it was incorporated in a bill which I think was something like two pages long, changing the number of Senators and Representatives and altering the entire apportionment, and among those things they had the change in the tenure of the judges, and it was defeated by the people, if I remember right, by a vote of about 4,000.

There is one weakness in the judicial system of this Commonwealth which this resolution does not attempt to help, and that is the fact that all the judges are grossly underpaid. The Supreme Judicial Court Justice should get $15,000 or $18,000 a year, and the Superior Court judge should have his salary raised to $12,000 a year or more. In New York city a judge occupying a similar position to that of a Superior Court judge here receives a salary of $14,000 and it has been increased lately to $17,500. Now I say that a man who will be appointed to the Superior Court for a term of ten years as my resolution provides, — and I am assuming all the time that he will be paid a proper and adequate salary commensurate with the duties that devolve upon him, — should not be mixed up in the Probate Court or any other court or any kind of proceedings and should not have to shovel any one's dirt to show whom he favors and who the crowd is that he travels with. If that could be done and you had the tenure of ten years for a Superior Court judge, you would know that that judge, if he responded to a request for ruling in the way he did to mine, would not dare to think he had a right to reappointment or that he was doing his duty honestly and faithfully. Remember, the weak are the ones I am pleading for. The strong need absolutely no one to help them out, because if one judge does not help them out they will travel higher until they get a judge who will decide in their favor if possible. But remember the weak, the man who appears before a judge in a police court, the man who appears there possibly without counsel, the man who cannot afford to hire counsel, — remember that he appears before a man who has absolutely no interest in humanity; remember that he is absolutely removed from you and from me at all times. Judges do not travel with the rest of us, they do not live the same life that we do, and they do not do it because you have placed them on a pedestal. You have done for them what you would not do for your executive; you would not do for the President of the United States what you have done for them. You let them stay there and rule forever as they please and how they please. Remember the unfortunate. Remember that he needs your protection; he needs justice; he needs that tempered with mercy. Where do you to-day hear that in the courts? Remember that when a man appears before a judge, if the judge feels good, if he had a perfect night's sleep, if his digestion is not affected that morning, everything is pleasant; he is pleasant to counsel; he is pleasant to the clerk; he is pleasant to the jury. But you have gone into court some morning when you have seen the judge grouchy in a motion or the case ahead of yours, and you have decided that you would wait till the next morning or the next week before the judge heard you, hoping that he would then be in better humor.

Now those things, minor as they may be, become gross and they afterwards amount to injustice rather than justice.

The system of the Commonwealth needs revising. This is a measure that I believe the people will accept. I believe that this measure, if carried out in its entirety, will help solve the judicial situation. Gentlemen, I want to read you for your attention one part of this proposed amendment:

No person shall be appointed a judge who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and have been ten years a citizen of this Commonwealth and been admitted as an attorney for ten years.

I remember not very long ago the appointment not of a special Justice but of the Justice of one of the district courts of this Commonwealth, of a man who had not been a member of the bar a year, —I think it was less than six months, — who in all that time never had tried a case in the Commonwealth, and still that man was appointed a judge of that court and it was expected that he would have the ability to dispense justice without any experience at all.

Then in the last paragraph this resolution provides that —

No person shall be appointed as judge in any of said inferior courts unless at the time of his appointment he is a resident and qualified voter within the venue of said court, and his commission shall expire upon his removal from the venue of said court.

Some of the Governors of this Commonwealth have chosen as judges for courts in the city of Boston non-residents of the district. I suppose that it would mean one of two things: Either that the city of Boston did not have a competent man to fill that position, or if it did the Governor owed that particular person nothing and therefore could not appoint him.

Gentlemen, a lot of politics is played in the appointment of a judge. Do not erase that from your minds. In very, very few cases is there no politics. But after he is appointed what does he know about the office of judge? He knows as much about it as the law student who has taken his degree in the law school and has passed his bar examination successfully, —as much as that man who has been admitted to practice law knows about the practice of law. He knows only the theory of law. That is all the man knows who is admitted to practice on the day that he is sworn in. It is the experience that he acquires in his office or in the courts that broadens him as a lawyer, that makes him more able, that makes him eventually the most sought lawyer in his district; and the same is true with the judge. No one knows who is going to be an able judge until he has been a judge, until you have seen him under all sorts of situations, where you can judge the man, where you can see whether he is able, whether he does measure up to that position which he holds. Every man in any profession, in any business, is required first to become experienced and make good, and as he makes good rises and success goes with him. But the contrary principle is applied in this Commonwealth when it comes to the selection of a judge. Take a lawyer, experienced or inexperienced, and because the Governor says that he shall be the judge in that court and because no one happens to have either the courage or the knowledge of the man so as to object to his appointment or the confirmation by the Governor's Council, that man seven days later becomes a judge. How do you know what he is going to do? How do you know how he is going to carry out the obligation which he took when he was sworn in as a judge of that court? Occasionally a judge of a district or a police court is appointed a Superior Court judge, occasionally a Superior Court judge is appointed to the Supreme Judicial Court, but those are exceptions and not the rule. A great many members of this Convention believe that the Supreme Judicial Court should not be touched, that this resolution should not affect the appointment or tenure of members of the Supreme Judicial Court. And while I have been listening to their reasons and while I agree with them, I never have told them why that was so.

The reason I have not included the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court in this measure is because I thought they ought to have from twelve to fourteen years' tenure, to be consistent with the rest of the provisions. As it provides that the police court judges shall be appointed for seven years, and the Superior Court judges for ten years, I thought the other should be twelve or fourteen. I then examined the figures showing the term that the average Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court has held office, and I have found that there have been very few young men appointed to it, and properly so. But I also found that the average tenure was about thirteen years, that they either resigned or passed away, and that was the average. Now, if the average of the Supreme Judicial Court judges is thirteen years by actual figures, then there is no need of trying to limit it by a Constitutional amendment, because if those figures have been true for a hundred years most likely they will continue that way.

I just want to make one forecast. The time is coming when there is gonna be a great demand for the election of judges in this Commonwealth. Labor has agitated it for years and it has been successful in a great many of the States. It is now the system in more than a majority. I venture to say that in this Commonwealth that agitation will continue to grow until finally you will have it in our Constitution. I do not want to see that day come. I want to see judges appointed who are picked by a man who knows the men he wants.
I want that man tried out, as it were, for a probationary term of seven or ten years, as the case may be, and then if he makes good I want to see that executive, then in office, reappoint that man; and if for any reason, from infirmities of age or otherwise, due to any accident, or if because the judge has not measured up to the situation, then I say this Constitutional amendment will protect the rights of the people. It will give them an opportunity to put a man there who will make good.

I hope, gentlemen, that you will think of this situation a little more carefully than you have. There is a whole lot more to it than I have discussed with you. Some one has made a quotation and I want to conclude with that quotation:

Massachusetts should

    Be not the first by whom the new is tried,
    Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

[Applause.]
Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Mr. Shea of Dalton, who had this resolution in charge for the Judiciary Committee, is not here this afternoon, and the chairman of the committee has asked me to take charge of the matter in his absence.

I wish to discuss the resolution, if possible, in a practical manner, because it is a practical question; for any matter that has to do with our property,—our liberty, property and our very lives,—in the last analysis is to each and every one of us a very practical one.

First let me clear up what apparently is a misunderstanding as to the scope of the measure it is proposed to substitute. A gentleman in this division has said it related only to inferior courts. That is not so,—unless he and I differ as to the meaning of the word “inferior.” Is the great trial court of this Commonwealth, the Superior Court, before which practically all questions of property rights and liberty are tried,—is that court an inferior court? If so, it will be news to those of us who are familiar with our courts. The term “inferior courts,” in the common acceptance of that term, with no disrespect to them, usually refers to the lower courts, the district and the police courts. This resolution, however, applies to the Superior Court as well as to the municipal, district and police courts. It has to do with the manner of selecting the men who shall preside over those courts. Is it wise, or necessary, to make any change in the manner in which they shall be selected? If so, then the change should be made without any fear or hesitation. But it is elementary that he who advances a proposition shall show reason why it should be adopted before he can expect its acceptance.

Now, what are the arguments that have been advanced? I take them from the lips of the last speaker, and from his lips I hope to carry condemnation to his own proposition. Who are the judges he is pleading for? The weak judges, he says. Who are the men who are faltering and need the supporting and sustaining strength of this proposed change? The many great judges who have adorned and are to-day an honor to our judiciary? No. Such men do not need this change, do not need any change in our appointive system. He says, it is the weak judges whom this change would affect. Yes; and it is on account of the weak judge that I pray in the name of God this proposed change may not be made.

When you go into court, sir, and your rights are put on trial what do you want the judge to have in his mind as he sits there to administer the law governing those rights? What do you want the judge to be thinking of? Do you want him to know only that his fellow-citizens are standing at the bar of his court seeking justice, seeking only that, and to that end asking the law shall be impartially and fairly administered by him? Do you want the judge to be thinking only of the duty he owes to such or do you want him to be thinking of something else? Of what do you want him to be thinking?

The gentleman in this division who has just spoken (Mr. Finn) wants him to be thinking of his reappointment. Is not that where, in the last analysis, his argument leads? Do you want, sir, if a case is on trial, the judge to have in his mind,—the weak judge,—this thought: “What will be the effect of my decision in this cause on my reappointment? Justice may be with this party, but I know public sentiment stands back of the other. If I decide with the side public sentiment is on it may have a vital, a controlling bearing upon the matter of my reappointment."

Do you want that weak judge to be swayed by such thoughts, or do you want him to be above all that, with his eye fixed only on justice? Do you want him, with his ear to the ground, using a slang phrase, to be thinking of the effect his decisions may have upon his future? How are you going to strengthen a weak judge by telling him: "Go on the bench, but when you do so, remember that the question of whether or not you are going to be reappointed will depend upon how you decide causes; how popular your decision may be; whether you bend before the public will, or resist it." If he is weak, and that is said to him, God pity the suppliants for justice who come before his tribunal, because he may decide their causes having in mind his own selfish interest. The weak judge, for whom he pleads, is the man from whom we want to keep such thoughts away. That man does not need the change. If he needs anything, he needs something to strengthen him, to give him courage; courage to do his duty irrespective of the stress of temporary public clamor, politicians or self-interest.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman whether this legislation would not eliminate the weak judge; whether that is not the purpose of it; whether to a large extent it would not have that effect; whether, as a matter of fact, the Governor's reappointment of a man whom the people thought capable would not come to a judge as a reward of merit.

Mr. McAnarney: What does the learned gentleman mean by the term "weak judge?" Does he mean what I mean?

Mr. Anderson: The gentleman has asked me the question what I mean by a "weak judge." I mean by a weak judge a man who is not deeply learned in the law, a man who for various reasons is incapable of doing the duties of his public position in such a way as to grant justice to those who come before him, a man who on account of defects of character loses his reputation with the bar, or a man who on account of lack of real integrity loses his reputation with everybody.

Mr. McAnarney: The gentleman has but partly defined the word "weak." He has not gone far enough in applying that term to a judge. Taking the definition he has given us, is it argued here, has it been argued here, has any delegate dared arise and say that any Governor of this Commonwealth has appointed men to the bench of our Superior Court who are not learned? I have not heard such an argument.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: When the gentleman stands here boldly in this Convention and asks if any Governor did it, I say, "Yes, sir," and I will name him. Judge Hitchcock of the Superior Court was not qualified to be a judge of the Superior Court. [Applause.] The gentleman challenged this Convention, as a lawyer. I could not sit silent, knowing that the honorable gentleman whom I named was but a Justice of a police court, an inferior court, as he stated, in the city where he lived when he was selected, and that James E. Cotter once in court protested against the way he was treated, and told him there that such decisions might do for a police court but not for the Superior Court of Suffolk County. I want to warn the gentleman hereafter that when he desires to challenge the Convention he wants to realize it is a dangerous thing to do, because we all come from Massachusetts, we all respect the State, we do not want to say anything against the State; but representing people who know these things, we cannot be challenged when we know the facts. And I can tell the gentleman something about some judges, too, if he insists on trying his case on that line. We need not try them on that line.
Keep the judiciary up. But realize that they are human beings and that they make mistakes. Do not ask men of common sense, who suffer by these mistakes, to sit silent and allow such opinions to go forth unchallenged. [Applause.]

Mr. McAnarney: The decisions that Judge Hitchcock has made have been a matter of record, either by accepted verdicts in the courts in which they were returned, or they have traveled on to the last tribunal in this State, the Supreme Judicial Court; and I defy him, and I defy any other man in this Convention, to examine the reports of the Supreme Judicial Court since Mr. Justice Hitchcock has been upon the bench, and then come back here and say that Mr. Justice Hitch-ocock has been overruled by that Court more times than other judges who are on that bench to-day. The gentleman has brought Mr. Justice Hitchcock into this case. I hold no brief for that honorable judge. His long and honorable career upon the bench needs no de-defender, — it is its own defence. I do not know the man off the bench.
I have tried some causes before him. Who was Judge Hitchcock before he became justice of our Superior Court? For years he sat upon a tribunal in Chicopee, as justice of the lower court. For years members of the bar of this Commonwealth practiced before him while he sat as judge of that court. Why was it then that this man who had been tried and tested was selected after his years of experience and put upon the bench of the Superior Court, if he was unfit? If he had not demonstrated his judicial qualities and worth by his conduct upon the lower court, why was it there was not some voice raised in protest against him when his nomination came up for confirmation before the Governor's Council? Not one word of protest was raised.
The appointment was accepted by the bar and people to whom he was not unknown. It was made after he had rendered just service, honorable service, to this Commonwealth.

Mr. Lomasney: Does the gentleman give way?

Mr. McAnarney: I do not give way. I am answering the challenge. I am speaking now in defence of a man whose lips are sealed and cannot speak here in his own defence. It was not necessary,— and I repeat it,—it was not necessary for the gentleman in my rear
(Mr. Lomasney) to name a man in this debate. And I cannot stand here as an officer of the courts of this Commonwealth, and permit such an attack on an honorable and venerable member of our judiciary to go unanswered, although it comes from a man who is my close personal friend. Mr. Justice Hitchcock does not need any defence from me. I have given my challenge to the honorable member who has named him. It will be open for acceptance, as the debate in this matter will be continued next Tuesday, and my learned friend will have Saturday, Sunday and Monday to go through the reports of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth and see whether I am in error.

Now I come back again to argument on the real question before the
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

Convention. Does one need to more than state it to have it answer itself? Lay aside the heat of debate, throw away all these arguments of personalities, come to the question as a virgin proposition, and I trust to the honest judgment and common sense of my friend from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) to give a convincing answer to the question which I am going to propound.

If you were starting a new Commonwealth, if you were trying to follow out the provisions of the Constitution of Massachusetts, and were endeavoring to have your causes tried before a tribunal as free and impartial as the lot of man will admit, what kind of tribunal would you suggest? Turn to your Constitution, drink in the full significance of these words:

It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit.

Free from what? They are citizens as you and I. They have their political rights, but that does not mean political freedom. Free from what? Free from any bias, free from any possibility of corruption,—and that is a weakness which transcends in its importance any weakness named by the reverend gentleman from Newton in this division (Mr. Anderson). There is more danger from one corruptible judge than from a hundred merely weak judges, and it is to the glory and credit of the judiciary of Massachusetts that we never have had such a judge on our Superior Court. Weakness does not mean merely a man who may have dyspepsia to-day and be calm and cool to-morrow. Free from what? Free from every motive and influence which might turn them from doing their duty according to their conscience and oath of office.

Pass on to the next word in the quotation, "impartial." What does the word "impartial" mean? How is a man going to be made impartial? If a judge were trying a case, and a near relation, or one having some power or influence over him, were the plaintiff or defendant, would he be impartial? Consciously or unconsciously there might be a bias or influence operating on his mind. If he is to be made and kept "impartial" he ought to be placed so that no influence,—social, political, financial or personal,—would bear either consciously or unconsciously upon his mind. How can you secure a man in a position where no personal, social, political or financial interest can have a hold, consciously or unconsciously, upon his will? How can you do it better than by saying: "Go upon the bench. We will make you free from all influences but the desire to do right, to render justice. We will put you in a position where you will have no reason for being other than impartial, because your position will be yours so long as you behave yourself, even if that spells the term of your natural life."

Now we come to the last qualification named in the Constitution, "independent." Independent of what? And here we come to the nub of the whole thing. Independent of every kind of improper bias, influence or control. Do you want your judges to be independent or do you want them to be dependent? How are you going to make a man independent? Are you going to make a man independent by saying to him: "Go upon the bench for five years, or ten years, and if your record as a judge does not suit the dominant party of the Commonwealth, or a considerable number of the voters, at the time your renomination comes up you will fail of renomination." Is that making him independent, or is it more likely to make him independent if you say to him: "Go upon the bench, do your duty fearlessly without favor to any man, and you will stay there as long as your health and strength permit, even if it means for your life."

Let me give you an illustration — an illustration outside the limits of the Commonwealth. A learned member of this Convention last night called my attention to a State where a judge in interpreting the law of that State, quite recently, gave a decision which offended a number of voters of that State. He knew it would offend them, but it was his duty to declare it. It was the pronouncement of the law of that State as declared by its court of last resort. He came up for reelection or reappointment a short time after he gave the decision. What happened? The people who were offended by his decision organized against him, and put up an opposition candidate. The State lost the benefit of his services, the opposing candidate became judge in his stead.

Which of these two men would be more likely to be independent? Which of these two men would be more likely to administer the law as you and I would want it administered? Which of them would be more likely to administer the law as you and I would want it administered if we were parties before that tribunal? Can there be any question about it?

The gentleman in my rear (Mr. Finn) put a question to the judges of this Convention. A delegate asked him if he wanted an answer. Why did he put the question if he did not want an answer? What was the question? He asked the judges of this Convention, — think of it, let it sink into your mind and your sense of fair play, — asked the judges sitting in this Convention if they gave the same measure of justice to men who appeared before them who happened to be foreigners as they did to men speaking the English language.

Gentlemen, have we reached such a state at this day in this Commonwealth of Massachusetts that a man will dare to address such an argument to you? Think of it! The very question itself was an insult, not only to the judges, but to every person who heard it. It is hard to control one's self when one finds a measure urged by a man who would put a question like that, as an argument in its favor. Do you think a judge who would do as that question implies would render justice in any court, whether he was on the bench for ten years or for life? What do you think? What do these men want? Do they want to make our courts of justice temples of justice, the refuge of the people against wrong, injustice, public clamor and temporary public passion? Do they want to make those courts the football, the plaything of politics, a place to which men will rush every few years for appointment, and seek to be carried into office on the crest of some popular issue of the day, or by some political party or powerful interest?

What kind of a man will you get upon the bench if you say to him: "Go upon the bench, leave your practice, leave your profession, put yourself upon that bench for ten years, and then step down and out. If you want to go back fight for a reappointment"? Ah, there is danger the weak man or the selfish one may shape his course so as to make sure of his going back again for another ten years, and that is what we do not want.

Do you want able men upon your bench? Do you want fearless and independent men? Who are the able men? As a rule they are the men who before they go upon the bench have been enjoying a lucrative practice. Will you be able to get the best lawyers to go upon the bench if you say to them: "Give up your lucrative practice, go upon the bench for ten years with the uncertainty of a reappointment"?

Take the argument they themselves advance. Politics, they say, dominates the appointments to the bench to-day in this Commonwealth.

Let us accept the standard of appointment they themselves assert. Politics has to do with the appointment of the judges. All right. A ten-year limitation to a term of office will not remove politics, will it? If a ten-year term does not remove politics then what do you get? Do you get less politics or more politics?

Mr. Creame of Lynn: I should like to ask the member from Quincy if he will just tell me and the other members of this Convention what he would do with a weak judge.

Mr. McAnarney: I would do this, if you will first let me say it would depend upon the nature of his weakness. If he was a corrupt judge the Constitution furnishes a remedy. If he was weak in the sense that he was not a profound lawyer, then I would consider whether or not there were other qualities that outweighed his lack of profound knowledge of the law, because, after all, remember this resolution is not dealing with the Supreme Judicial Court. If a judge makes an error of law in the Superior Court there is a Supreme Judicial Court before which the cause can be taken and the error of law can be righted. I would prefer to take the chance of occasionally having a judge upon the bench who was not a great lawyer, if he was honest and just, than take the risks of a ten-year appointment. What I do protest against, and what the Judiciary Committee protests against, is this: Making the matter of judicial appointments the possible subject of political reward every ten years. And is not that what you are likely to get if there is any force in the argument which has been advanced, that the judicial appointments to-day are subject to political influence?

This question is not a new question; it is old.

Debate was resumed Tuesday, June 18.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: In the debate on this resolution last Friday several gentlemen referred to the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the so-called child labor law. Personally I fail to see any application that decision has to the subject-matter which we are now considering. The question before the Convention is whether or not we shall change the Constitution so as to permit the Governor to appoint our judges for a limited term of years. There is nothing in the proposed resolution affecting the jurisdiction of the court or the power of the courts to declare a law unconstitutional; therefore it seems to me that the arguments of the gentlemen, so far as their arguments are based upon the child labor law, are far afield from the question under consideration. It makes no difference whether a judge is appointed for a limited term of years or for life. Under our Constitution as it is to-day, as it may exist notwithstanding the adoption of this resolution, if it should be recommended by us and adopted by the people, the Supreme Judicial Court still would be charged with the responsibility of passing upon the constitutionality of laws. What would you have our Supreme Judicial Court do if the Constitution required it to pass upon the constitutionality of a given piece of legislation? Although every member of that court believed the legislation to be wise and proper if it were not for the fact that it ran against some provision of our Constitution, and they under their oath were charged with the duty of passing upon the constitutionality of that act, what would you have them do? Would you have them ignore their oath of office and refuse to declare unconstitutional a law which they knew to be unconstitutional, be false to their oath? Of course you would not, you would seek the true remedy. If the law is unconstitutional because it has not been passed in proper form you would seek new legislation. If it was not within the power of the Legislature to deal with such an act under the Constitution as it exists, then you would seek to change the Constitution.

I do not intend to trespass upon the time of the Convention this morning even for the full time extended to me. I want briefly to state some of the arguments against the proposed change. What kind of a man is it we want to be appointed a judge? We want a man who has proven himself to possess those qualifications which commend themselves to all of us and should do so to the appointing power. Those qualifications are kindness, ability, experience, knowledge of the law and a capacity to administer it fearlessly, without regard to the parties before his court. Who would be willing, if such a change as proposed were adopted, to take a position upon our courts? Would the young man starting out in the prime of life be willing to give up his whole career as a member of the bar to go upon the bench for a limited term of years? Would he be willing to take a position on the bench and say: "I will throw aside everything else and devote my whole thought, my life during these years to proving that the appointment the Governor made in putting me on this bench was a worthy appointment"? He might not. He might be compelled by force of circumstances to say: "I will accept this position as a temporary affair for the period allotted to me." Those of us who have had experience at the bar know that when the man goes upon the bench he has to lay aside those qualities that make so much for success at the bar. Success at the bar in part comes from partizanship, strong partizanship, the power and the capacity to earnestly impress your views upon those to whom you are addressing yourself. It takes training, it takes experience to enable a man to become a successful advocate. Take that man and put him on the bench; he has to lay aside all those qualifications, and has to study how to overcome them, — to make himself anew. And when he has succeeded, — which usually takes a considerable period of time, — in laying aside the qualities which made him a successful member of the bar, and has made himself a successful judge, do you, when that time has arrived, want to say to him: "Now go back into the ranks of the bar once more and take up the work of the advocate"? He would be thoroughly unfit for it. It seems to me that if we are to have our judges con-continue to exercise the responsible authority the Constitution to-day vests in them, then by all means we ought to say to the men who go upon the bench: "Take this position, give up your practice, give up the future at the bar that you had a right to look forward to, devote all your time, your thought and your energy to perfecting yourself, making yourself a strong member of the bench; it is your life work; it is ahead of you so long as you are capable of rendering service to the Commonwealth." When we say that to a man we open to him an inviting field, an honorable future.

An objection against the election of judges is this: That it would tend to make politicians out of candidates for judgeships. An objection against an appointment for a limited term of years is the same, practically, with this distinction, that you make a politician out of a man after he has become a judge. Under the election of judges the man becomes a politician of necessity before he can become a judge. If you limit his term of service to ten years, of necessity you make that man a politician after he becomes a judge, the very time you do not want to have his mind dwelling upon the political effect of his actions.

A strong argument, it seems to me, in favor of our present system is the fact that it makes the man independent in the exercise of the functions of his office. I cannot impress too strongly upon the Convention the necessity of keeping our judges independent of all popular clamor, prejudice and passion. It has been said that after this great war is over we are going to have social, political and economic upheavals in this State and throughout this country. Is the hour coming when those upheavals are to occur? Does it not commend itself to you that then will be the time we shall want our judges independent of all such upheavals and disturbing influences? We want one tribunal, one place in this Commonwealth, where our rights will be secure. On Saturday I was talking with a gentleman holding a high official position in this Commonwealth. He cited to me the case of two judges in one of our western States whose term of office expired during an economic upheaval. One was a Republican, the other a Democrat. Both men had served the State well for the limited term of years they had been upon the bench. They had been compelled, in the discharge of their public duty, to declare unconstitutional certain laws and to render certain decisions that offended certain I. W. W. interests in that State. What was the outcome? When those men came up for reélection they failed of their réélection because the powers that be were under the control for the time being of the influence they had offended, and those men went down into private life and the State lost the benefit of two able judges. We do not want that in Massachusetts. Our Governors are but human; and do you believe that if we were in the midst of an upheaval involving labor questions, social questions or any other disturbing questions that might come up, and the matter of a judge's reappointment was before a Governor, and the man had proven himself a wise, just and able independent judge in declaring the law, and had offended some strong or loud and clamorous political party or influence, that there would not be grave danger, if sufficient political pressure were brought to bear upon the Governor, he might not reappoint that man? Is it not wiser and better to avoid any such danger? Are not our property rights, are not our personal rights and our liberties, more secure when we go before a court that is above any influence, any possibility of influence of that kind or of an improper character?

Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston: Does the gentleman mean to say that life and property are more sacred here in Massachusetts than they are in the forty-three States in this Union that have an elective judiciary? Are not life and property just as valuable and just as well protected in the other States of this Union as they are here?

Mr. McAnarney: Life and property are equally valuable everywhere. But I do say this, that it is my opinion, born of personal experience in seven or eight different States of this Union in which they do not have an appointed judiciary for life or good behavior,—it is my experience that nowhere in this Union are the laws as well administered as they are here in Massachusetts. Nowhere do the decisions of the courts command the respect of the people they do here. That is my experience and it is a practical experience, because my practice for many years has carried me outside the confines of Massachusetts. Turn to the record of other men, able lawyers, who have had to do with causes in other States of the Union, part of these forty-one or forty-two my friend refers to, and ask those men their judgment, and they will tell you that it is their honest judgment that Massachusetts has a better system than they have in those other States.

Take the argument of the learned gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Cummings) when the I. and R. was under discussion. Do you remember how he called attention of the labor men in this Convention to this striking fact, that in Massachusetts labor laws had been interpreted more liberally and our Supreme Judicial Court was in advance of the courts of last resort of many of those States where they had an elective judiciary? I doubt if the gentleman was speaking from his imagination; rather I believe he was speaking from study and careful investigation.

The difference between an elective judiciary and a judiciary appointed for a limited term of years is not a very great one, each having inherent weaknesses. If our present system has endured all these years and has rendered good service, what is the objection to it? Only one serious objection has been mentioned, and that is, it is said that we sometimes have weak men appointed to the bench.

Mr. Finn of Chelsea: I should like to have the gentleman answer me whether he understands that the Supreme Judicial Court is not included in this proposal No. 345; that it is entirely eliminated from its provisions.

Mr. McAnarney: There is no question about that. But I submit that the gentleman as a member of the bar knows that whenever any cause goes before our Superior Court the trial court has to pass upon the rights of property as well also, at times, as to the personal rights of the litigants who come before it. There is no distinction in principle; it is merely a difference in the extent to which the rule is carried.

It is said that we sometimes have weak men upon our bench, and therefore because they are weak we ought to change our whole system. Is that a sound argument to advance? Shall we destroy a good system, a system which has rendered us such valuable service and kept our courts on the high plane on which they now are, merely because some few men say that we have had men upon our bench whom they regard as weak men? I regret very much indeed that in our debate last Friday the names of any of our judiciary were brought into the debate. I think it was unwise and unfortunate. I can say, from an experience of twenty-nine years at the bar of this Commonwealth, it is my firm belief that in those years there never has been upon the bench of any court of this Commonwealth before which I have appeared a man who was not conscientiously honest, just and doing his best according to his light to render justice between party and party before his court. And when you can say that and say it truthfully of a court you are saying a great deal in favor of the system that creates such a court. Men may have had their personal differences with judges; we all have had our personal differences with some judge; but after all, after those differences have passed away and calm reflection has taken possession of us, do we not know that in ninety-nine out of a hundred cases the court was doing only its duty, and perhaps was nearer right than we were? Let us remember judges are but human. Let us not forget the worth of the judge, in watching the weakness of the man. Is there not danger that if we abandon our present system merely because it is said that we get weak men upon the bench, we ourselves are doing what John Boyle O'Reilly, in that famous poem of his delivered at the dedication of the Pilgrim monument, said of the Pilgrim Fathers? In describing those early fathers he said in effect: So intent were they in watching the frown of the Lord that they missed his smile. Is there not great danger at this hour, if we take out our magnifying glasses and try to find defects in our system, that we shall lose sight of the overwhelming benefit that comes from the system? [Applause.]

Mr. Kneil of Westfield: I presume there has been no question before this Convention which presents to the lawyers of the Convention, against whom some pleasant cavil has been made, so deep and vital an interest as this. I speak, I think, for many lawyers in the Convention. I am prone to sympathize, prone almost to believe not in the election of judges but in their limited tenure of office. There has been a search, a quandary in my mind, and, I dare say, in the minds of other lawyers in this Convention upon the general subject of this debate. Perhaps I may be pardoned a reference which is outside the main lines of the discussion. I think the lawyers here, — most of you know them, — bring here a sincere, honest thought, intent and purpose, oh, so entirely apart from any personal interest or advantage, to do the things which ought to be done. The whole history of our profession is that way. There are some things which incline me most seriously and earnestly to believe in a limited tenure of office. Not ignorance on the part of some judges, as has been suggested in the debate, unless it may be in the inferior courts, — the police, district and municipal courts. I never have seen it in our upper courts. It would be preposterous in me to assume ignorance in our Supreme Judicial Court or our Superior Court. It may occur in the lower courts but, if so, it is trivial in its effects. We have got to expect that in the operation of any system. But I have seen this, and it has caused me serious thought. I have seen this, not in the Supreme Judicial Court, whose judges “bear their dignities so meekly and are so clear in their great office”, whose embodiment and expression stands and sits in this Convention in the gentleman from Fall River (Mr. Morton), one who does us honor by his presence, — never in that august body; but in the Superior Court I have seen this, nor is it a complaint of petulance, nor is it personal or querulous. I have seen a certain arrogance in some, — a very few, but some, — of the judges of the Superior Court; an offensive assumption of importance, by reason of their permanent elevation to office, which is a most insufferable and obnoxious thing in a democracy.

It goes so far as to rebuke and affront court officers, attorneys, witnesses and jurors. It is a part of human nature, I suppose, but it seems to many members of the bar, as I hear them express it, a behavior which is detestable. It seems that this could be modified or prevented by a return of such people, — not at the end of seven years but fourteen years, perhaps, following the New York practice, — to private life. What says our old Bill of Rights? Rotation in office, sending public officers back to the people from whence they came, is declared to be the right of the people in order to prevent those vested with authority from becoming oppressors. So says our splendid Declaration of Rights. I should like to see this condition of which I have spoken done away with. It is not a small matter. I do not think there is a lawyer in this Convention who has not suffered from it. I do not complain of the Superior Court for any ignorance. I never have seen it there. I have practiced for thirty years and I think I have practiced before all the judges. But there is sometimes that spirit, the attitude of cUFFing the ears of witnesses and counsel, of setting down people in their seats and the assumption of petty authority which ought to be rebuked, which is an affront against the rights of the private individual and which would be prevented by sending the judges back to the earth, the common earth which we all tread, to start again.

That first. Second, another thing has been in my mind. There comes a time when perhaps age, — this has been taken care of in the proposed resolution for a limited tenure of office, — a time when age or physical condition produces an unfitness or incompetency which is unknown to the incumbent. It is a beautiful provision of nature that we do not know always when we are getting old and feeble and deaf and the mind does not spark. There sometimes comes a case where a judge, for these reasons, should get off the bench. And how do we handle it? What are the remedies? Impeachment? No, preposterous. Address of the two Houses to the Governor? No, unless in case of wilful and outrageous misconduct. How do we handle the situation? Is there a satisfactory method? I was in the Legislature many years ago, in 1893 and 1894, when a county court was in trouble here in Suffolk. A man who ought to have got off would not get off. He wanted a pension, he wanted this, that and the other thing; he thought he was as good as he ever was. The Legislature had to appoint another judge who practically crowded him out of his place. What also have we done? What happened, if I am told aright, to the Court of Common Pleas, the predecessor of our present Superior Court? The Legislature abolished the whole court to get rid of some of the judges and substituted another court. That is done in the case of some of the inferior courts; we abolish the court and create another court with a little different district, something a little different than the old, to get some particular judge off the bench. These things have appealed to me and appealed strongly, as needing action. I say again that I do not speak of them in any querulous spirit, but that is the situation. One of the most unpleasant and obnoxious things the bar has to do is to tell a judge, through its committee or his friends, that he ought to resign; but sometimes he clings on and resort must be had to dodging and subterfuge to accomplish the result. A remedy would be found in a limited tenure of office or an age limit of sixty-five years. I would not put it at seventy years. What are we going to do about it? I know the situation; there is hardly a lawyer here who does not know it.

However, I should not seek a remedy in the election of judges. Of the three branches of governmental office the executive and the legislative are responsible directly to the people. These two are responsible to the people, but the judiciary never is. The executive and the legislator may listen to the passing whim of the moment and regard the voice of the prevailing majority. They may decide as current things go. As the tide turns they may shift and vary; and rightly so, because the executive and legislative departments are expression of the people. But the judiciary never, gentlemen. Eternal, strong, permanent, they are the ones that ride out the prevailing storm and settle back on the old, ancient principles, the old common law of English-speaking peoples, which is the embodiment of the experience, and the result of all the mistakes, of all the determination of truths by trial and error and final discovery of right for a thousand years,—the common law which Massachusetts judges administer. And how widely we administer it, gentlemen. It goes to Washington, it goes to far-off Canada. Ask of them to whom they look for the determination and utterance of the common law and it is to Massachusetts,—to Shaw and Bigelow. Pardon me if I say that our courts to-day are adjusting themselves like a basket to its load; not breaking like a rigid bucket, but yielding, accommodating and adapting itself to things as they are instead of things as they might be or are hoped to be. Massachusetts finds in our present Supreme Judicial Court, Rugg being Chief Justice, the best expression there is to-day of, not the statute law, for that is incidental, but that great body of law which is the real thing. Nobody can define it; it is the experience of centuries, and the authoritative statement of it to-day is in our own Supreme Judicial Court, never better than at this moment. What is the course to follow? Shall we after all change our system and cut the judges down to a limited term of office? I sometimes think that we might well do this; but the stern question is what action we should take at present. We are now engaged in an awful war, when the foundations of the great deep are broken up, when all of our woned and ancient landmarks may be afloat. I cannot lift the veil. I should hate to lift the veil from what will happen after the war is ended. In the words of Scripture, all the foundations of the world are out of course. The great seas are roaring. The great bases of social order, wisely or unwisely, may be removed. What shall we do? Back of it all is the general belief and confidence in that common law which the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts represents, which the Massachusetts Judiciary represents, a belief in those eternal things based upon the experience of mankind, based upon a thousand years of study, of experiments this way and that way, many of them errors but most of them right. We are the only one of the States that represents to-day the common law,—the great common law which adjusts itself to needs. What shall we do in view of that thing which overwhelms us, the prospect of the conditions after the war? This I have decided finally for myself. The Massachusetts judiciary is the rock, all else is shifting sand; it is the ship, all else is open sea. [Applause.]

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Although I had come to a decision against the election of judges before entering this Convention, I approached the matter of their appointment with an open mind, and ventured on Friday to suggest a real discussion on the question for the information of those of us who had not made the topic a special subject of study. The passion, the extreme statements, and especially the naming of judges in the ensuing debate, certainly were regrettable; yet no judicially minded delegate would allow them to influence him an instant for or against the proposition of document No. 345, which, of course, must be judged on its merits and on its value to the well-being of the State.

Doubtless all the delegates take a just and solid pride in our Massachusetts judiciary. Of course, there may be incompetent judges here or there; possibly occasionally a corrupt judge; and this hardly can be avoided in a fallible world. But the high reputation of our bench should not blind us to real faults in our judicial system, and one of those faults is that there is no practicable way of getting rid of incompetent, impossible and, especially, aged judges, who, through childishness or obstinacy, refuse to retire after they have outlived their usefulness. It is practically and morally impossible to proceed to the impeachment of men of high character, some of whom have rendered years of good service, because they now no longer are fit. So nothing can be done and unworthy expedients become almost necessary to meet an almost impossible and sometimes sordid situation. The question is: What can be done to remedy this patent evil?

The proposition which is before us, No. 345, solves the problem, first, by proposing that the judges of the lower courts shall be appointed for a term of seven years, so that at the close of each term judges who have ceased to be useful may be dropped; and, second, by prescribing an age of compulsory retirement for all judges.

There is no doubt in my mind that these provisions would meet the situation and remedy the evil; but the question arises whether they would not create other and worse evils, whether the cure is not worse than the disease. The first argument against the proposition which has weight with me is that it is hard enough now to get first-class men for judgeships on life tenure, and that making a judgeship less desirable surely would give us an inferior set of men on the bench. But to this it should be replied that a good judge almost undoubtedly would be reappointed. No Governor in this State would care to create the precedent of cutting off the services of a talented and faithful judge. Even in New York State, where judges are elected, the Bar Association often has been able to secure the reëlection of the best judges, and indeed their renomination on a non-partisan ticket. Surely the Bar Association of Massachusetts would be equally successful with a reappointment by the Governor.
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

With this prospect, and with a proper raise of judicial salaries and a proper system of pensions, it might not be impossible to secure as good a class of men as now. Even if not reappointed, the prestige of having been a judge would open many a door to the middle-aged man who was stepping down from the bench. This is the common experience in States which have limited judicial terms.

But, it may be said, admitting the evil, why not let well enough alone? This is the old conservative cry, with which I have little sympathy. If a probably safe and effective remedy can be found, let us try it. This is the soundly progressive attitude.

But a far more serious objection was raised by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) Friday afternoon. He took the case of the corrupt, — he meant the corruptible, — judge, and told us that the selfish desire for reappointment would mingle as a motive in all his decisions. He might have added that a judge often is called upon to render unpopular decisions, decisions demanded by a state of the law with which he personally has no sympathy, but which he has no right to alter or publicly condemn. Serving in a quasi-judicial capacity last winter, I was in exactly that situation, and I cannot deny that for a moment I was tempted to do the popular rather than the right thing, especially as I could not explain. When we consider that on this supposed decision might hang not only the career but the livelihood of the judge, we can see easily that a man morally weak might succumb to the temptation to side with the crowd in the hope of reappointment, rather than to do his sworn duty.

I have gazed upon almost all of the most noted works of the sculptor, but none ever impressed me as did the masterpiece in the Palace of Justice in Brussels, now significantly made a barracks for German soldiers. It is a group representing in an entirely original manner the idea of Justice. In the center, in modern robes of office, sits the judge, a modern man. The figure is spare, the face thin, the features intellectual, refined, sensitive, firm, strong. On one side there stands, looking down at the judge, a Greek female figure, the law. In one hand she holds the statute-book. The finger of the other hand points to a sentence written on its page. Her face is calm, sure, majestic. On the other side stands a poor woman, in shabby clothes, clasping a sickly babe to her bosom, imploring the judge’s attention to her plea. The face of the judge is the center of interest. He looks neither to one nor to the other, although he hears both. Lost in thought, he gazes far away into the distance. In him struggle for mastery the woman and the Law, Mercy and Justice, the right of the one and the rights of the many. No wonder the face is grave, for he must balance heart with brain, favoring neither one nor the other, striving for that synthesis which alone can be justice and yet in the end giving a concrete decision. This is the eternal antinomy, the despair of philosophers, the deepest mystery of the cross, and yet the reality which all men confront, and which the judge must decide practically in each particular case. That face of the judge in Brussels seems to me the finest human face into which I ever gazed. It combines the tenderness of the woman and the strength of the man, gloriously intellectual and appealingly human, and without a thought of self.

Shall we put the thought of self into the judge’s heart and the judge’s face? For one, I cannot bear to do it. But that is not all.
How shall we keep the look of sensitive sympathy with the poor in the judge’s face, or put it there if it is not already his? And that question is just as important as the other. What the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division (Mr. W. H. Sullivan) said Friday morning has in it too much of truth. The judge too often associates with only one class in the community. Of all men, he cannot afford to do that. He, of all men, should have the broadest knowledge of how other men live and think, and the deepest sympathy with them. Let him associate with the poor man, the ignorant man, the common, decent citizen of slender means, the man who works in the factory and on the railroad, and let him know their outlook and their interests as well and as sympathetically as he knows the intricacies of our great financial and commercial world. Then will he be a judge indeed, the man to whom all, rich and poor alike, can look, not only for justice but for understanding.

Would reappointment by the Governor or election by the people make this sort of judge? I sadly answer that I fear not. Experience in other States seems to confirm my fears. And that means that it appears to me, on mature reflection, that we shall find no complete salvation, and more danger than safety, in a limited term for judges. The Convention often reconsiders its action, and I beg the indulgence of my fellows if I reconsider my purely tentative opinion of Friday.

What, then, is the remedy? Retain the clauses in the proposition which provide for compulsory retirement at a certain age. This will clear up two-thirds of the difficulty. And as for the rest of it, the only solution is good Governors,—Governors who belong to themselves and no one else, who carry their sovereignty under their own hats; men of sense, wisdom, insight and sympathy, who can be frightened neither by the interests nor by the professional labor leaders nor any other group, who want nothing except the good of the Commonwealth and justice for all. Such Governors will appoint the right kind of judges, and that is all that can be said, it seems to me.

Consequently, I move to amend No. 345, the substitute before the House, so as to read:

The Legislature shall have the power to establish an age for the compulsory retirement of judges.

I realize that by that we should lose a great deal. Suppose the compulsory age was seventy. A great many men of seventy-five or eighty are doing their very best work. And yet, on the whole, we should gain by it. That has been proved by the experience of the colleges of this country. A great many of them now have this compulsory age limit. They know that they lose a good deal, but they have come to the conclusion that they gain more than they lose. At least, we should not have the difficult and sordid situations which now arise occasionally in our State and which really are more or less of a scandal to it.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that the proposed substitute draft (No. 345) be amended by striking out all after line 2, and inserting in place thereof the following: “The Governor, by and with the consent of the Council, may retire any judicial officer because of advanced age, mental or physical incapacity.”

Mr. BLACKMUR: The resolution will then read:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by inserting the follow-
The Governor, by and with the consent of the Council, may retire any judicial officer because of advanced age, mental or physical incapacity.

I have listened with the utmost attention and with a great deal of sympathy to much that has been said by the proponents of these measures; but, sir, I am convinced after due deliberation that the only real grievance that has made an impression upon my mind is that portion of the debate which has dealt with the question of the retirement of judges mentally and physically incapacitated. The present method is very cumbersome and very difficult, and the instances which have been pointed out here well illustrate that difficulty. The bargaining with two judges, as we have been told, to secure their retirement, certainly should not occur again for want of a simple method of retirement.

Now, this is a very simple and efficacious manner in which to deal with the whole question. Do not forget, gentlemen, that the Governor, elected as he is here in Massachusetts, the servant and agent of the people, is the most responsive and responsible agent that you could have to make the retirement, a man whose every act is constantly under observance and examination. He would not remove arbitrarily under this provision a judge who was sound mentally and physically. He is elected every year by the people, he gets his mandate from the people, and he is in a position to deal fairly and squarely on the question of whether or not a man should or should not be removed for advanced age, mental or physical incapacity. It may be that it is desirable to further amend the resolution by making some provision as to pensions, or possibly as to a hearing; but I am perfectly satisfied that all those matters can be dealt properly with by the Legislature or at a later stage. However, this initiates a broad general principle, which is this: That if a judge becomes incapacitated by age, mental infirmities or physical infirmities, some one, — and who better than the Governor, with the consent and advice of the Council? — should and can remove him.

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: The words of the amendment introduced by the gentleman in the second division from Quincy I believe give more power to the Governor and the Governor's Council, where all the trouble exists on this political propaganda, and which is at the bottom of all the criticism that comes on the judiciary of this Commonwealth. I believe if the delegates of this Convention will go back only for two years, and perhaps one year, they will recall where the Governor's Council may have held up the Governor to have a certain lawyer appointed to a certain part of our judiciary in this Commonwealth, and perhaps Suffolk County. While from my experience in life I have the highest confidence in the judiciary of this Commonwealth, I am a strong believer in the election of judges. The political propaganda interferes with the judiciary of this Commonwealth, and the appointments are the cause of its trouble; perhaps with the action of some judges in their decisions on the question of labor versus capital, and, through that, on the great injunction proposition. I am one of the few laymen who believe that the Legislature will be the place to straighten out the whole subject.

I have had some dealings with the courts, more especially in Suffolk County, and I find that the poor man gets a good square deal in a trial, although some men on the bench may make a mistake. Will the question of appointing judges for seven years or ten years stop the women with short hair and the political propaganda of the Back Bay and the political machinery of this Commonwealth from interfering with the Governor and the Governor's Council on the appointment of the judiciary, which brings about the trouble and the criticism from the people in this Commonwealth? I am not going to name any judges. I put in fifteen years around the State House representing organized labor in the interest of legislation, and I have seen some actions of the Senate in the past. In my younger years they used to talk about gravel trains that ran through the State House without an engineer or fireman. But when men vote against the interest of the people we sometimes charge or criticize on the public platform that their reward was an appointment to the courts of this Commonwealth.

If you will go back you will see a few remarks I made on the initiative and referendum with reference to that same thing. The working people of the Commonwealth feel that way yet. We want all that kept away from the court. It is true we men who represent labor talk on the public platform about the power of the corporations, which is not so strong perhaps as the power or political weight of the interference with the judiciary in this Commonwealth. I believe we should take all that away from the Governor and the Governor's Council. Let the people of this Commonwealth elect a commission on the judiciary and let the Governor make appointments to that commission, and it would not be controlled by any one political party by law, and let the commission report back to the Governor, recommending as to the ability of the men who have been mentioned for that position. That will kill the political machinery that interferes with the judiciary of this Commonwealth.

While it may be true,—you men claim to know it, you have told me so in my years of life,—about the ability of many men placed on the courts of this Commonwealth, and about the interference of the appointee, I do not know, but I do know that two years ago a man in Boston, a great attorney, who had had much experience in handling finance, led us to believe that one of the leading political office-seekers of this Commonwealth, backed up by the Governor's Council, interfered with the appointment of that judge; and whether it be a juvenile court or Superior Court it brings about the criticism of the laymen on the appointees of the courts of this Commonwealth.

I say to the delegates of this Convention, the appointment of the judges would not prevent the trouble that exists to-day. The political propaganda will go on with the appointees. The election of the judges is a question which the people will have something to say about. Now, gentlemen, lawyers and delegates of this Convention, who are so afraid of the people, why not change the Constitution and have a commission on the judiciary who shall be elected by the people, and it will be only a majority on the commission of five who shall have power to recommend as to the ability, etc., of the appointees made by the Governor. Take that authority away from the Governor's Council, and you prevent interference with the Governor's appointments. And with all these men on the judiciary in this Commonwealth, I want to say to the delegates of this Convention in my years of life I have had much to do with the judiciary. I am proud of the action of the judges of the municipal court, and I believe in advancement and promotion in life; and after that experience, when they have ability to sit there, they could be promoted to the office of the Superior Court. If they are not fit to sit in the municipal court they should not sit in the Superior Court.

As I say, we know there is criticism, the criticism of the working people, and there is interfering. I am opposed to any man who sits on the Supreme Judicial Court, or the Superior Court, practicing law outside of his work in court. I am in favor of giving him a higher salary. I am opposed to any judge ever saying: "I cannot sit on a case to hear a man, no matter whether he is a working-man or a wealthy man or a poor man, because I am attorney for the side of the plaintiff." We want them free from everything. The salary should be the highest. I am a little bit nervous about the proposition of the seven-year term. It would not prevent the political propaganda of the people; it would not interfere so much with the appointment of the judiciary as of the other commissions of this Commonwealth.

I know what I am talking about when I make this statement, but that is a step in the right direction. I am one of the men who can be converted to the short term appointment of the judiciary, but as yet I am strongly in favor of election. I am not going to criticize any individual. I want to say this, and I want to say it for the public as a delegate: In my dealings with the courts of Boston, the poor man gets a good square trial and a fair deal, and the judges are human and have hearts. While we may disagree with one of them personally we have got to give them credit for their good justice and law.

By that appointment for seven years the political machinery would be just as bad. I am willing to plead guilty with the lawyers. On the convention floors and in our meetings,—perhaps a judge may have decided against you, and we must admit the truth,—we would be against reappointment for that action. And that is true of every organization and any people who are interested in these propositions. I am not ashamed to say it. That would be the action on the appointment of the judges. It would be the same with the lawyers. It would be the same with the Republican party and the Democratic party or any other political party, where that position is about to be filled.

I hope the amendment presented by the delegate from Quincy will be defeated. If there are any changes made besides the one on the appointment of the judges for seven years, if the attorneys will consider that question of having a judiciary commission elected and honored by the Constitution of this Commonwealth, where every candidate’s name will be presented to them for their consideration and returned with a favorable report of a majority of five of the commission before he shall be appointed on the bench, that method would be some improvement on the method of appointment of the judiciary that now exists in Massachusetts.

Mr. Aylward of Cambridge: I think the amendment of the gentleman from Quincy is good as far as it goes. It cures one point in the matter, but I believe that there is a great deal more in this matter than some men will admit here. It is unfortunate that all the courts are under the same rule. We have heard some criticism of certain courts, but one court of which there is the greatest criticism has not been mentioned at all, and that is the lower court. If the lower courts of our Commonwealth did not come under this same rule, I doubt very much if there would be the support of this measure that there is among the people of the Commonwealth.

Fifteen years ago, when I was in the Legislature, there was a bill presented to prevent associate justices of the lower courts from practicing before their own courts. That was a measure that I was vitally interested in. For years I had seen in my own local court a man who had practically no practice before he was appointed an associate justice, and who succeeded, through practicing in that court of which he was a justice, in amassing a considerable amount of money. And how was it done? The presiding justice had not given him any special favors, but the people of the district, particularly the foreign element, felt because he was a judge of that court that thereby he might have a greater influence than some other lawyers.

The committee on the Judiciary, of which I was a member, the gentleman from Everett at that time being chairman of that committee, heard that bill, and with considerable interest; but finally it was found that in some cities and towns of the Commonwealth, or rather in some towns, of the Commonwealth, the associate justice was the only lawyer in the town, and if he could not practice before that court he would have to go out of business; and such was the sentiment here in the Legislature that the bill was rejected.

That is a crying evil throughout the Commonwealth. Another evil is that there is no head to the lower courts. The Supreme Judicial Court has a Chief Justice, the Superior Court has a Chief Justice, and he determines in connection with his confreres what the rules of the court shall be, and also determines where they shall sit, and such other determinations as he is permitted by law to make.

But there is no head to those Justices of the lower court. In my city of Cambridge the court opens promptly at nine o'clock, and every case is taken up in its order. But go out to some of these towns here, be called in the night, perhaps in the middle of the night, to go out and defend somebody, and with great trouble and with change of cars you get out there at nine o'clock. No judge. Half-past nine; no judge. Ten o'clock; nobody. He comes in when he pleases. What is going to remedy that? He is absolutely independent of the people of this Commonwealth. He cares nothing for the lawyers' time, he cares nothing for the business man's time, he cares nothing for the doctor's time, who appears in some little case that is of no great advantage for him, and prevents all of these people for hours from attending to their professional duties or business.

I speak of those things because there are many lawyers here who know them, but for some reason they do not see fit to state them. There are grievances. I do not know as any of these measures will remedy them, unless it is the election of judges, to which I am not altogether opposed, but I believe that proposition has no chance, as was proven by the vote in this body. I believe the next best thing is the appointment of judges, and I think No. 345 goes a considerable distance in that direction. I know the conservative element say that they will not interfere with the Supreme Judicial Court and the Superior Court, but that those Justices will hold their present offices for the term of ten years from this time, and thereafter be appointed.

Politics! The gentleman from East Boston (Mr. Maguire) showed, it seemed to me, how much politics there was in the present situation. Politics and politicians! Who is not a politician who has any interest in the affairs of life, in public questions? How many judges who have been appointed to the bench were not politicians? How many of them were not district attorneys, and sought election from their constituents? How many of them were not city solicitors? Politicians! It seems to be the cry of every conservative who wants to oppose some radical measure or some progressive measure to attack it with the word "politics" or "politicians," and so throw it out of court.

There is as much politics in seeking an appointment as judge as there would be under a system of the election of judges. I think it was unfortunate the other day, very unfortunate, that any of the judges' names were mentioned here. With regard to one of the judges whose name was mentioned here, I desire to say that I had observed nothing to deserve any such criticism, and I have observed, too, that he was one of those men whom my friend from Westfield (Mr. Kneil) could not have referred to when he spoke about it. It was unfortunate because, if there was any reason for criticism of that particular judge, I am satisfied there were others who were not mentioned who were just as deserving of it; so it was unfair to the man who was criticized. There are lawyers in this Convention who could stand up here, if they chose, and name other individual judges,—not of that court, possibly, but of the lower courts,—and this criticism of the lower courts will continue until this system is changed.

It has been stated, too, on the question of the election of judges, that it is almost impossible to remove a judge. I guess none of us can remember when a judge was removed in Massachusetts,—not because there were not many who ought to be, but because of the difficulty of removing them. In my own city, before I was admitted to the bar, there was a judge of the lower court of whom everybody was sick and tired. There was nobody to defend him. There was no reason why he should stay there; and as has been indicated, the only way to get rid of him was to abolish his court. There was a judge in another city not far from mine, attached to mine. Why, he was a standing joke among all the lawyers of the Commonwealth, but he was in a strong Republican city and nobody ever interfered with him, and he died; and if he had not died, as far as I could observe, he would be there yet; unfit, absolutely, both in his personality and in his lack of knowledge of the law.

Those are some of the abuses. I should be glad to vote for a measure that would apply only to the lower courts, but I shall vote for this one because it embraces some of my views. It does not go any farther than I want; it might well go farther, and I still would vote for it.

I am not one of those, although I have the greatest appreciation for the courts of the Commonwealth, who believe that they are the only fit courts in this great Nation of ours. I believe the courts of other States, both with the limited appointment and with elections, stand just as high in interpreting the laws of their Commonwealths and the laws of the land as our courts do. I am very proud to be a citizen of Massachusetts, and proud of our courts; still I do not think that this measure, the measure under discussion, will interfere in any way with the high character of our courts or with the administration of justice. I believe the people of the Commonwealth know of those abuses of which I speak, some in some courts and some in others, and I think they are ready for a change.

As I said before, and as has been said by others, I think the best manner would have been not to have stricken from the I. and R. amendment that language which referred to the courts, but to have permitted it to remain there, and, as the people adopted it, to have provided that the Legislature then, in their wisdom, should draft a modern law, a law somewhat similar to some of the other States; and not assume because our law was drafted a hundred and some odd years ago, and because there had been no change, that thereby there should be no change.

I am satisfied that the people want this. I myself am satisfied that there are grievances, serious grievances, and unless something is done here,—and now there is no opportunity so far as we can see ahead to change the present method,—unless the present method is changed, dissatisfaction will continue, and there will be no hope for those who believe there should be a change; and the more of those things that are piled one upon the other, the greater will exist the dissatisfaction in the people's minds and that unrest which is the danger of all governments. [Applause.]

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston moved to amend the amendment moved by Mr. Blackmur of Quincy by adding at the end thereof the words: "and the General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired."

Mr. CURTIS: I understand the amendment which I have offered meets the approval of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur). I am opposed to the original resolution, and to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston, but I long have been of the opinion that there is not a practical method of relieving the State from a judge who, through incapacity, is unable to properly perform the duties of his office. There are two ways; first, by impeachment. Of course every gentleman in this Convention knows, from the history of this Commonwealth, that in order to impeach a judge you must have an almost absolute case. Impeachment very seldom has succeeded anywhere. The other method provided in the Constitution is for an address to the Legislature, which means that with a majority vote of the Legislature the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, may remove the judge.

I am not so much concerned with the removal of judges because they are unfair or improper men, but I am interested in retiring those judges who, from mental or physical incapacity, are not fit men to sit upon the bench. And without using any names, we all know of such cases.

But I do not believe that where a man has been a good judge, has served fifteen or twenty years and has a family dependent upon him, that we want to pass any amendment giving the right to the Governor and Council to remove him without giving him something in the way of a pension if he needs it; and as you all know, many of them do need it, and will need it in the future. That is why I have offered the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Quincy.

Now, it may be said that it is not safe to leave it to the Governor and Council. Well, in every business, in every walk of life, you come to the point where somebody has to decide something; and if you cannot leave these things to the Governor of the Commonwealth, elected by a majority vote of the Commonwealth, with the approval of the Council, elected from the different districts, then I say that there is no way to get rid of a judge who mentally and physically is incapacitated.

It may be said, too, that if the Governor is of one political party and the Council is of the same political party, that in order to make a place for a friend they might remove a judge. But public opinion counts in this State, and I do not believe any Governor who ever sat in the Executive Chair would dare to remove a man who ought not to be removed, and I do not believe that any Council elected ever would dare to approve such removal. I still have faith that the people of this Commonwealth would not elect a man to that position who would exercise that function improperly; and if he did, Mr. President, the people would get rid of him at the very next election; there would be no question whatever about that.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: May I ask consent to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. E. U. Curtis)?

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Cox of Boston): Mr. Blackmur of Quincy accepts the amendment offered by Mr. Curtis of Boston. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I wish to call attention to the fact that the amendment offered by the member from Quincy (Mr. Black-mur) and my amendment are not antagonistic to each other, and that I hope that both will be carried.

The Presiding Officer: Does the Chair understand Mr. Anderson of Newton withdraws his amendment?

Mr. Anderson: What is that?

The Presiding Officer: Does the Chair understand that Mr.
Anderson of Newton withdraws his amendment?

Mr. Anderson: I do not wish to withdraw my amendment. I wish to say that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) and my amendment are not antagonistic to each other; they simply supplement each other. I am in favor of both and I hope the Convention will be in favor of them both.

The Presiding Officer: The Chair will state that the amendment accepted by Mr. Blackmur of Quincy is antagonistic to the amendment offered by Mr. Anderson of Newton, and that if the amendment offered by Mr. Anderson of Newton prevails it will shut out the amendments offered by Mr. Blackmur and Mr. Curtis of Boston at this stage.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) if these words "judicial officers" do not go too far. The amendment says "judicial officers". What is a judicial officer? Is a master in chancery a judicial officer?

Mr. Blackmur: In answer to the gentleman, I would say that I used the language of the Constitution as it was, as is found in chapter 3, article 1, which reads:

The tenure, that all commission officers shall by law have in their offices, shall be expressed in their respective commissions. All judicial officers, duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting, etc.
Therefore I used the same language as is found in article 1 of chapter 3.

Mr. Lomasney: My point was to ascertain if you wanted to give the power to the Legislature to give salaries and pensions, as I believe they could, under that resolution, to masters in chancery.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I desire to offer what might be called a few observations on the subject of the judiciary which are the result of more than forty years of practice at the bar. I assume that we all seek to accomplish the same purpose, and that is to secure and retain the best judges on the bench; and any system that accomplishes that will accomplish the desire of this Convention.

There are three systems that have been under discussion while this proposition has been under consideration. One is what is known as the life or the good behavior system, through appointment. One is the election of judges by the people for a limited term. The other is the one which we are considering now, and that is the appointment by the executive for a limited term. Each of these systems, to my way of thinking, has its advantages, and each its disadvantages. There is no one that is perfect. There is no one that is absolutely imperfect.

I noticed the other day that some one said that the election of judges had been a failure, but that is not true. Go to those States where judges of the higher courts have been elected by the people, and nine lawyers out of ten who practice before those courts will say that the system has been a success. Go down into Maine, where they have the appointment for a limited term of years, and nine lawyers out of ten will tell you that the system in Maine has been an eminent success, and that no lawyers, or very few lawyers, desire to have a change in it. Come to Massachusetts, and I think it is fair to say that three-fourths at least of the lawyers will say to you that our system of appointing judges during good behavior, which is equivalent to life, has been an eminent success. In other words, my experience shows that where a system has been used for a long period of time and has been reasonably satisfactory there is not a desire for a change. Of course this system of election of judges has not any considerable support in Massachusetts, in my opinion. No one desires that the selection of judges should have the element of politics in it beyond what is necessary. Any one of these systems that we may select will have more or less of the element of politics in it. It is true that an appointment such as we have in Massachusetts has more or less the element of politics in it. Of course, when you get to the question of election, that has the element of politics in it, as well as the selection of judges for a limited term of years.

The proposition which comes before us at this time is the proposition of changing the system which we have in Massachusetts and adopting a system similar to that which they have in the State of Maine. I notice that this proposal which is under discussion provides that none shall be appointed who has not arrived at the age of thirty-five years,—I am rather surprised that that language should have been used,—and that none shall be appointed who has not practiced law for at least ten years. Are you aware, Mr. President, that if that language had been in the Federal and the State Constitutions of this country Joseph Story could not have been appointed to the Supreme bench, or that Judge Colt, who served with so much distinction for many years upon our circuit bench, would not have been appointed, or that William H. Taft, who served with distinction upon the circuit bench in the district which included Ohio, could not have been appointed? I believe in the appointment of young men upon the bench. I believe in allowing a young man to develop upon the bench. Some years ago I went to the Governor with a suggestion that an attempt should be made to establish a policy in this Commonwealth of selecting young men who gave promise, and build up in that way a strong judiciary in the Commonwealth; and I was very much pleased when I noticed that in these recent appointments which have been made this year and last year by the Governor of the Commonwealth, he has selected comparatively young men, and I think it is but fair to say that in these selections there has been less politics than in the selection of any judges in Massachusetts during the last fifty years. I happen to know that of two who were appointed neither one sought the place, and his name had not been suggested to the Governor, and in those two cases they asked to be excused from serving upon the bench and finally reluctantly consented to give up what promised to be a successful and brilliant career at the bar for the purpose of serving the public. And so it seems to me that we are having less politics in the selection of judges to-day than we have had for many years past.

But that is not the question that is before us, gentlemen. Will it improve the system in Massachusetts if we select judges for limited terms? Of course the advantage that you have in the selection for a limited term is that you can get rid of judges who are not satisfactory to the public and the bar. Down in Maine they claim that that system has had many advantages, in three ways at least. First, it keeps the judge on his mettle to do good work in order that his reappointment may be made; in the second place, the lawyers say that it makes him more courteous to the bar and more courteous to the public; and in the third place, if it turns out that he is disqualified mentally or physically for the proper performance of the duties, he can be displaced.

It does not follow, as every lawyer in this Convention knows, that because an attorney has been successful at the bar he will become successful on the bench. Nor does it follow that a lawyer who has not been particularly successful at the bar may not develop into a very strong judge upon the bench. I have in mind two judges who were on the bench when I came to the bar in this State who had been very eminent as practitioners, and neither one was a success upon the bench. One was partizan, growing out of his habit of taking one side or the other of a case during the years of his practice; so much so that within ten minutes after the case opened he had to take one side or the other. He was a dominating character, a man of great strength and a man of great power, and he could unduly influence the jury. And so we used to say when we went before this judge: “Whether I win or lose this case will all depend whether the judge takes to my side or not.” The other judge to whom I refer was a man who was exceedingly discourteous to lawyers. He was dominating. Now, my belief is that if you had a system by which these judges would come up for reappointment at the end of certain terms of years you would find that it would have a most salutary effect upon the bench.
And yet we are bound to say here in Massachusetts that under the system which we have to-day we have developed the strongest court of any State in the Union,—I mean our court of last resort,—and I agree with what my friend from Westfield (Mr. Kneil) said this morning, that no one wants to change the system of the appointment for good behavior of the members of the court of last resort. What we seek to do is to change what may be called the system of appointing nisi prius judges, and I am inclined to believe that there is a strong argument in limiting the tenure. I believe that a limitation of the tenure would result in this: That any judge who was qualified entirely for the position would receive a reappointment as long as he desired to sit on that bench. That has been true in Maine, I am told, and there has been only one case in that long history in Maine where politics has prevented the reappointment of good judges. Those of you who recall some of the eminent names that have been on the Maine bench will recall names of strong men, and you also will agree with me that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Maine rank well with the decisions of any court in the Union. And in no case, with the exception of one, I am told, has a good judge failed of a reappointment by the Governor when his term expired. In several cases where the judges showed that by temperament they were not fitted for the bench, and where the lawyers have gone to the Governor and said: "That man can never develop into a good judge," the Governor has refused the reappointment,—that is, the renewal of the commission.

Now, I confess that I am seriously in doubt as to whether our present system is as good a system as the system of limited tenure for what may be called the inferior courts, and at this present moment I have not decided whether I shall vote for this proposition or whether I shall vote against it. I throw out these suggestions at this time in order that you may consider whether the appointment for a limited term is not better than the appointment for life. Of course when you come to the question of election of judges, while it has worked pretty well in other States for the higher courts, it has worked very poorly in the lower courts. The Court of Appeals in the State of New York in its decisions ranks well with the courts of the other States. The same is true of Pennsylvania, and of Ohio, and of Wisconsin. In Pennsylvania they held their Constitutional Convention in 1851, if I remember correctly, and decided to adopt the elective system for ten judges of the Supreme Court, and the two parties agreed that each should nominate five to constitute that court, and out of that election grew the strongest court that Pennsylvania ever had, with Jeremiah Black as the Chief Justice of that court. But when you get into the cities of Pennsylvania, where they elect their inferior judges, or into the large cities of the State of New York, you find an entirely different class of men. And if we were to have here in Massachusetts, in Boston, for instance, the election of judges for your municipal court, instead of having a strong court such as we have to-day, you would have a most inferior court; you would have politics in it of all kinds and descriptions.

Mr. Blackmun: I should like to ask the gentleman if he includes the Superior Court in that designation of inferior courts, as does this resolution now under discussion.
Mr. Powers: I do include all courts except the court of last resort. The court in which the lawyers are most interested is the Superior Court, which has become a great trial court, with numerous judges, before whom we have to try our cases and where we have to save our law. I am not going to undertake to criticize members of that court. I have had my share of troubles with judges, but I say that on the whole our system has given good judges to the Superior Court of Massachusetts. There have been exceptions, but those exceptions have been due to selections not mentally or temperamentally qualified for the position. I have seen some great men upon the Superior Court in my day, and I want to bring forward one man who stands out in my mind as the ideal nisi prius judge. I refer to Chief Justice Brigham. There was a judge who could try a case and you never could find out whether his sympathies ran toward the plaintiff or the defendant. But I have heard another judge after a case was finished say that the only disappointment he had was that he could not decide against both the plaintiff and the defendant. [Laughter.] And I remember once hearing a judge upon the Superior bench, and he is one of those to whom I already have made reference to-day, give this charge to the jury after a case had been tried in which undoubtedly there had been more or less perjury upon both sides. It was a unique trial and it was a unique charge, and this was the charge. He said: "Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen of the Jury: If you believe the plaintiff or any of his witnesses you will find for the plaintiff, and if you believe the defendant or any of his witnesses you will find for the defendant; if you don't believe the plaintiff and any of his witnesses, or the defendant and any of his witnesses, you will find for the defendant, the burden being on the plaintiff." [Laughter.]

I think that we have every reason to be proud of the judiciary of Massachusetts. No State has given to the Union decisions on great constitutional questions in the way that Massachusetts has done. Our court of last resort has stood as perhaps the first and ranks to-day as the first among the States of the Union. If I remember correctly, the judges of New Jersey are appointed; and every one will agree, at least all the lawyers will agree with me, that the decisions of the court of last resort in New Jersey rank with the best. There is one advantage, of course, in the appointment during good behavior, and that is it gives to the people an independent judiciary, independent and fearless, and that is exactly what the people demand.

I do not believe that there is any strong demand in Massachusetts for a change in our judicial system. I am frank to say that. I believe that the people generally are satisfied with our judicial system of appointment. However, if this Convention believes that there is a better system than the one which we have, and believes that it should be applied to certain courts, then of course it becomes our duty to recommend that system; but I will say now, as I have said before, that Massachusetts is well satisfied with her present system of judicial appointment; she is well satisfied with her courts, and there is no strong reason why we should recommend to the people a change in our system unless we are satisfied that the change will improve the selection and the retention of better judges than we have now. [Applause.]
Mr. Bennett of Saugus: There may have been portions of this debate that I have not heard, but so far as I have heard it the proposition seems to have been made, and uncontradicted, that there were only two methods of getting rid of a judge who ought to be got rid of. Now, there is a third method, which, although somewhat cumbersome, has been resorted to several times in this Commonwealth, and that is to abolish the court, or to create a new court having about the same powers as the old and simply to abolish the old court for the purpose of getting rid of the judge. A recent instance which occurs to me I think was in Gloucester. There was a judge there who was unsatisfactory, and the police court of Gloucester was abolished, as far as I remember, and a certain district court of Essex County was created in its place, and a new judge was appointed. I think we owe our Superior Court to something very similar to that. In a general way I think I am right, although I may not be precise in regard to the legal particulars. We had in this State a Court of Common Pleas; we had no Superior Court. The Superior Court is merely a name. We could have a court of second instance, or another court of Common Pleas, or what not; it is simply a name. The Court of Common Pleas for some reason or other had made itself very unsatisfactory, and so it was abolished and the Superior Court was established in its place, in order to get rid of those judges.

The only instance, the only other convincing instance that I remember in my life, of inability to get rid of an apparently unsatisfactory judge, I think was in regard to a probate judge. It was to get rid of a probate judge who,— I know nothing about it,— was said to have become mentally incapacitated. That is the only well-authenticated instance within my memory of inability to get rid of a judge in Massachusetts.

Though the method of abolishing the court is clumsy, if there were a crying need of changing the judge, the people of this Commonwealth would not hesitate an instant to resort to that method. In the arguments I have heard in the corridor in regard to this matter the incident which has been brought up as causing some change of sentiment on this subject is the recent child labor decision in Washington. Well, I have not heard anybody argue that this proposition is to tend to abolishing the Supreme Court of the United States or changing the method of tenure of the judges. We all feel that our government never could have been made stable, as it is, had it not been for the Supreme Court of the Federal government. We never could have had the Constitution we have, we never could have made it effective, we never could have endowed the people with a deep popular love of the American Constitution, without the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore, if your argument is that the child labor decision was somewhat absurd, it seems to me it was. It seems to me it is reactionary as a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. But I do not think people are disposed to argue in favor of abolishing the Supreme Court of the United States, and therefore that argument in regard to the child labor decision falls to the ground.

I am a very strong believer in the initiative and referendum. I am a strong believer in the people. I am a strong believer in the closest possible touch of the people with the executive and legislative departments. But I feel that since we are tending so strongly in that direction we should do nothing to lower the standard of the judiciary, and I am in favor of letting it alone precisely as it is; and if there is a position so irritating and so unsatisfactory that we need some remedy to get rid of a judge besides the present unsatisfactory methods or inefficient methods of address and impeachment, you can abolish the court and create a new one in its place. My impression is that the case of the court of Gloucester covers precisely the same ground. The police court of Gloucester was abolished and a certain district court of Essex County was created. It seems to me it is totally wrong to put this in the hands of the Governor, to give the Governor the right of appointment and the right of removal. It is wholly reactionary and wholly contrary to the methods we have been pursuing, and I hope the report of the committee will be accepted and the whole matter will be killed and the tenure of judges will remain as at present.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I desire, before taking up the subject under discussion, to thank the venerable Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court (Mr. Morton) and the members of the Judiciary Committee for the courtesy which they extended to me last Thursday when they endeavored to have this subject put over until to-day, because I had been unexpectedly but unavoidably obliged to absent myself from this Convention to try a jury case which had been suddenly reached for trial, the urgency of which required my presence. I had full confidence that any motion made by the former Justice, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in a matter of this kind would be honored quickly and willingly by the members of this Convention, and I was surprised to learn that his request was denied. May I at this time also say that any inferences which have been drawn which would intimate that I had been taken intentionally before the Court and detained there when this subject was up, because of any ulterior motive, are entirely wrong, because I feel that of all the judges of this Commonwealth, none would be quicker to relieve me from the necessity of trying than Judge Perley Hall, who was presiding in the session where the case was being heard which I was representing, and who offered to excuse me on Friday when he heard that this subject had been reached for discussion. My client's interests, however, would have been sadly jeopardized if the case had been continued, as it would have gone over until next fall, and my duty to him compelled me to finish the case. I simply make this explanation in order that my position before this Convention may be understood clearly.

I regret very much that I was not here, because I am not familiar with the manner in which the subject has been discussed, and further, because I believe that had I been here, an arrangement could have been made by which all the various measures relating to the judiciary might well have been grouped into two classes on which votes might have been taken which would indicate clearly the attitude of the members of this Convention, viz.: First, those that related to the elective system, and, second, those which advocated the appointive system. This, of course, is impossible now, but I wish to put before the Convention my views on these two systems and the reasons why I have a sincere conviction that a change is necessary from the present system under which our judiciary is operated.
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

As a member of this Convention, and as a practicing member of our bar, I am not the least afraid of the elective system. I have no quarrel with our courts, and I address myself to the subject with no rancor or ill will. My highest desire concerning our courts is that they shall be held in reverence by our people at large, and this can be done only by commanding the respect of lawyer and layman. I believe that many of our judges now endeavor to merit such a reverence, although I believe that many of the best lawyers in this Commonwealth join with the great body of our citizens in not having the very highest respect which always should surround our courts, and that this want of respect is due entirely to the imperfection of the present system. As a member of this Convention and as an attorney in this Commonwealth, I am not blind to these imperfections; and being sworn to bring forth the best for the people of this Commonwealth at this time, I address myself to this subject.

Now let us see what confronts us as to the history of the judiciary in Massachusetts, as to whether or not there ever has been any disposition to have a system other than an appointive system for life, such as we now have. Members say: "Oh, there never has been any sentiment for an elective system in Massachusetts, and the lawyers won't have it." Well, of course, it is a well-known fact that lawyers do not desire to fight the courts. Most of them decline to do so. Many members of this Convention who are members of the bar have indicated to me their caliber when they have said: "Why, O'Connell, I believe you are right, but I would not dare follow you on that subject, because I know that the judges in some way would get back at me." Now, I have no such fear of the judges or the courts. I am not flying in their face, nor am I insulting them, nor do I intend to reflect upon any of them personally. I simply am addressing myself to this subject from the broad, clear principle that the people have a right to choose their judges. I will put aside for the time being all questions of the many imperfections of individual judges that could be pointed out to this Convention. I feel, however, that the subject is worthy of a higher consideration than that of the failure and imperfections of particular examples now sitting on our various benches in this State.

How did Massachusetts come to make this great exception to the principle on which this great Republic is founded? The Declaration of Independence, that declared our freedom and announced the doctrine on which we separated from Great Britain, never should be forgotten, particularly in a Constitutional Convention in Massachusetts. Let me read it to you:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Practically every State in this Union has repeated this fundamental doctrine, and our own annunciation of it as a principle of Democracy is found in our Constitution in Article 4:
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign and independent State; and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

And in the fifth section:

All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of the government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them.

I do not believe that the courts of this Commonwealth are sovereign. I believe in the fundamental principles announced in the Declaration of Independence and in our Constitution, that the people of this Commonwealth are the sovereign power; and the people of this Commonwealth, being the sovereign power, have at all times a right to say who their judges shall be, and those judges in turn shall be accountable at all times to the sovereign power of this Commonwealth as it is laid down in our own Constitution.

It may well be in order at this time to inquire as to how the anomaly of an appointive system for life for our judges, which prevails in this State, was brought about, and I desire to call to the attention of the members of this Convention the various features in the journal of the Convention of 1780. Members will bear in mind that the first Constitution submitted in 1778 was refused by the people of the Colony because it did not have a Declaration of Rights, and the town of Boston then presented one of the most remarkable expressions of opposition when the whole town voted unanimously against accepting the proposed Constitution. At the next Convention, in which the Constitution of 1780, that under which we now operate, was adopted, let me call attention to a few things that did happen in connection with the adoption of a life tenure for our judges, which may be very helpful in guiding us and future generations as to whether or not it was understood clearly at that time just what was being done and what the result would be and how it was accomplished. Much misunderstanding will be cleared up if the facts are borne clearly in mind and if members could but take the time to carefully go into the whole subject.

According to the journal of the Constitutional Convention of 1779–1780, there were present on November 6, 1779, but 113 members out of a total membership of close on to 400. I am uncertain as to the exact number of members to which the Convention was entitled, but I judge from the writings of John Adams that it was close on to 400. On that same day, namely, November 6, there began the debate on the question of the judges, and with this very small number, by a majority vote, with less than a third of the Convention present, there was passed the vote giving the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth tenure during good behavior. To be exact, the vote was 78 out of 113.

On November 8 the debate was renewed and the question taken up in reference to the classes of judges inferior to the Supreme Judicial Court, such as our Superior Court of to-day, which in those days was known as the Court of Common Pleas, and the question "whether it is the opinion of this Convention that the judges of the Courts of Common Pleas in this Commonwealth ought to be appointed to hold their offices during good behavior" was put accordingly and passed in the negative, by 57 out of 119.

So the gentlemen of this Convention will realize that the first expression of the opinion of the Convention of 1780 was that judges inferior to the Supreme Judicial Court should not hold for life.

I have been reading from pages 42 and 43 of the journal of that Convention. It is very evident from these two votes passed with substantially the same number of members present, there was a wide difference of opinion as to the doctrine of a life tenure for the judges of the different classes, the pronounced opinion being that the Supreme Judicial Court should hold for life and that all inferior judges should not have that tenure. The question subsequently was reconsidered, and on February 11, when there were only 59 members present, the Convention discussed the motion. It is found on page 103 of the journal, the question of the tenure of the Superior Court judges or, as it was known then, the Court of Common Pleas. The exact motion then was that these judges were to be "appointed by the Governor out of a nomination list to be exhibited by the judicial offices of the county, namely, the Justices of the Common Pleas, and should pass subject to a negative of the Governor and Council." Gentlemen will notice the significance of this motion concerning the tenure of our Superior Court judges, and students and advocates of the life tenure well may pause and ask why it was that in those days this suggestion was made seriously, if there was any pronounced feeling about a life tenure for all holders of judicial office. In my mind, it is probably one of the most scientific suggestions that ever has been made which would insure fitness in an appointive judge, because the men who would be called upon to make his nomination certainly would be the best qualified, because of their own knowledge and observation, to decide as to the ability, knowledge of the law and the essential qualifications necessary to make a good nisi prius judge, while the provision of a veto by the Governor and Council guaranteed to the people that the judges would not establish an oligarchy among themselves distasteful to the people.

The journal goes on to say on February 12 that this question was "largely debated" and was passed. Similar motions were passed on the same day to the same effect, concerning tenure of judges of the maritime courts, judges of the probate court and the trial justices, then known as justices of the peace. This question was reconsidered again and on Wednesday, February 16, it was decided finally that the judges of the inferior courts should hold their commissions during good behavior, with only 56 members of the Convention present, 62 members voting in the affirmative.

It is evident from what I have shown you that there was a decided difference of opinion as to the tenure of these judges; and if we are to apply our knowledge of what has gone on in this Convention to what was likely to have taken place in that Convention, we must conclude that advantage was taken of the absence of the great majority of the members of the Convention, and the presence of only a small fraction who took advantage of the situation to invoke this doctrine.

Think of it! Sixty-two members out of a possible 400 decided this.
momentous question. Are we bound by any tremendous tradition to stand forever unalterably by the opinion of those 62 gentlemen? There certainly was no general consensus of opinion among the people of the Commonwealth that justifies us in believing that it was their general belief in the doctrine that impelled this vote.

I called attention in my argument last fall before this body, when we were discussing the question of the judiciary, as affected by the initiative and referendum, that there were in that Convention a great many lawyers, and that the Convention was held at a time when many of the leading, active spirits who brought about American independence were in the field with Washington helping to drive the British out of this country. Remember, the Convention of 1780 was held right in the very middle of that great revolution when it was on its fourth year, and I for one do not believe that that very small fraction of that Convention, — much less than one-half of a majority, — ever voiced the opinion of Massachusetts as she really would have it expressed.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: Would it be a fair inference if the entire Convention had been assembled that the same proportion would have held good? The gentleman says that 62 members voted in favor of this proposition out of 86. I ask him if it would be a fair inference if the entire membership had been there that the same proportion would have held good.

Mr. O'Connell: Of course I can give simply my own opinion on this subject, but I am glad to give it because I think the Convention will agree with me that it is justified from the figures and from the facts. My honest judgment is this: That the Convention was dominated in great part by the then Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, then known as the Superior Court of the Judicature, all of whom were members of the Convention and all of whom took a prominent part in the proceedings of the Convention, as is evident from their prominence and activities on the committees. I believe these men had influence enough with the small number of members who attended the Convention to determine the result which was achieved, viz., that of recommending an appointive judiciary for life; but if the members of the Convention who were absent, either because they were in the army or attending to their fisheries or their farms, or if the representatives of these classes of men could have been heard and had had the opportunity of voting, it is my firm conclusion that they never would have sanctioned this practical life tenure. Unquestionably advantage was taken of a situation of a small number in attendance, to carry through a vote on this doctrine, whereas if the whole membership had voted, life tenure would have been denied.

The work of the Convention of 1780 has been far-reaching, bringing forth as it did the first written Constitution in this Republic, and that under which we are operating to-day, with its forty-five amendments; but whether or not it was the expression of two-thirds of the people of Massachusetts, as was contemplated at the time when the Constitution was submitted, of course is open to very serious question; and I believe those who are familiar with the manner in which its final adoption was brought about will agree with me that advantage was taken of manipulating and adding the votes on the various subjects, thereby making a total of two-thirds altogether of the total vote, and then announcing that the work of the Convention had the official sanction of two-thirds of the people of the Commonwealth.

Probably the most striking example of the real opinion of the people of this Commonwealth concerning the judges happened not many years later, when, on account of the disagreement of the people and the judges, there occurred the rising of the people against the work of the judges, which has been known in history as "Shays's Rebellion". It is not necessary for me to dwell on that incident other than to say that as a result the judges changed their attitude toward the people very decidedly and acted more in accordance with reason than they had been accustomed to.

We next come down to the Convention of 1820. That Convention debated the question concerning the judiciary, and there was a serious attempt made on the part of several favorites of the court to enlarge the powers of the judges to give them a power that never before had been contemplated, nor seriously thought of since. It proposed to change the Constitution whereby a majority of the House and Senate could address the Governor and Council if the majority of the Legislature considered that a judge should be removed for any good cause. The plan contemplated changing the word "majority" and substituting therefor a two-thirds vote of both the House and the Senate, and the reason urged was that the judges would be safer if it would take a two-thirds vote to bring about a removal vote. Think of it, gentlemen. Removal does not mean impeachment; removal usually is invoked where a judge has become useless or sick or incapacitated or perhaps intemperate, or a change has come over him, weakening his powers or ability, but for which he could not become criminally liable nor impeachable. And yet many of the lawyers of that Convention were working in harmony with the judiciary to build up another oligarchy, bringing forth as they did a proposition that a judge could not be removed for any cause except on a two-thirds vote of the House and the Senate. This was a most unfair proposition because it meant that for all practical purposes it would be absolutely impossible to remove a judge for any cause short of an impeachable offence. But the members of that Convention spoke decisively on that subject and it was defeated by a vote of two to one, or to be exact, 210 against 105, — a very big vote which showed the real attitude and temper of the delegates of that Convention, as to how they felt about the judiciary and its desire to secure greater powers for itself.

Let us come hurriedly now to the Convention of 1853. That Convention had a membership of real intellectual giants; its personnel was one of the most remarkable of any constitutional gathering that ever met in this country. The Convention had been preceded by a general discussion of constitutional questions for some three years prior to the time that it met, and all of its members were prepared to discuss constitutional questions. It certainly was composed of men who represented the real thought of Massachusetts in those days. It is unnecessary for me to recall to you the personnel of that great body. Some of you are familiar with its work, but I may be permitted to say that it certainly debated the questions of the organic law of Massachusetts in a manner that has won the admiration of every student and lover of this Commonwealth, whether he agrees with the work of that body or not. After lengthy discussion and a most thorough debate, the Convention decided that they would change the system of appointing judges for life, and they offered to the people as their best judgment that it was better that Massachusetts should have the appointive system limited to a tenure of ten years.

I believe there is a big demand to-day for the change from the system under which we now live to that of an elective system or at least for a limited tenure. It is with the firmest conviction in the certainty of my opinion that I say to you gentlemen of this Convention that if you put before the people of Massachusetts the proposition as to whether or not they want an elective judiciary in place of that which we now have, they will say by an overwhelming vote, as they did in every other State in this Union, that they wish an elective judiciary in Massachusetts.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Does the gentleman carry in his mind the fact that when Massachusetts had an opportunity to be heard on this identical question of a ten-year limitation for the term of its judges, Massachusetts spoke and repudiated the idea and said it would have nothing to do with it?

Mr. O'Connell: I will be very glad indeed to answer that question. If my friend Mr. McAnarney will recall what took place in the Convention of 1853 he must admit that the omnibus proposition of acceptance or rejection on which the people were obliged to vote at that time brought about the defeat of all the admirable suggestions and propositions of the Convention; that it brought about the defeat of six amendments that, subsequently and immediately in the years following, were submitted to the people, each and every one of which was adopted; and if the people had had a chance to vote on this question separately, they would have adopted that in exactly the same way as they adopted the six questions which they had defeated when they defeated all the work of the Convention.

Mr. McAnarney: Does not the gentleman know that it is part of the recorded history of Massachusetts that one of the reasons why the work of the Convention of 1853 was rejected was the very fact that in its work it incorporated this provision as to a change in the tenure of office of the judiciary? Does he not know, also, that the other and the desirable amendments were submitted to the people later on and accepted? The question was considered as dead after the people voted upon the work of that Convention and it never has been submitted to them from that day to this.

Mr. O'Connell: I cannot agree with the deductions and conclusions of my eloquent brother, because they are not at all in accordance with the facts. The real reason why the work of the Convention of 1853 was defeated is very well known to every student of history of those times. It was due to the proposed change in representation, whereby the little towns upon the hills and down on the Cape were going to lose the representation that they had in the Legislature, and it was the expression of resentment of the voters in those communities against a change that would lessen their representation that brought about the defeat of the work of the Convention of 1853. All students and critics of the Convention's history admit that that was the great contributing and overwhelming cause why their work was defeated.
Continuing his argument after the recess, Mr. O'Connell said:

At the hour of taking the recess the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) had referred to the action of the people concerning the election of judges after the work of the Convention in 1853. Answering his question right at that point, I want to call the Convention's attention to this feature: The strong point made in the Convention of 1853 by the men who fought the proposed elective judiciary, such as Dana and Greenleaf, and particularly the well-known effort of Rufus Choate (that is known and has been read by every lawyer in Massachusetts, and that has been supposed to be the Gospel of our present life system), the one strong point that they made was that it had not been tried, — the elective system was not known, and they pleaded to hold fast to those things that they already possessed and not venture at that time into the other fields, although the other fields might hold out promise of the fruits which were expected.

At that time some of the western States were just starting their careers. New York had changed just shortly before, and Pennsylvania, but two years prior, had abandoned the life tenure for an elective form, and the consequence was that the argument had tremendous weight with the Convention and necessarily with the people. But all the value of that argument has gone, and the necessity of waiting for proven results has passed, because forty-three States in this Union to-day elect judges, and those forty-three States are perfectly satisfied with the elective system, while the other States have the limited tenure.

I referred to the Convention of 1820. The Convention of 1820 was called principally because of the separation of the great district, now the State of Maine, from Massachusetts.

Mr. McAnarney: The gentleman says he thinks the objection Rufus Choate had to the limited tenure was because it was untried. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to Vol. 2, page 808 of the published reports of debates on that question, and to the following language by Rufus Choate:

This ten-years judge of yours is placed in a situation where he is in extreme danger of feeling, and of being suspected of feeling, so anxious a desire to secure his reappointment as to detract, justly or unjustly, somewhat from that confidence in him without which there is no judge.

Mr. O'Connell: All that is part of Rufus Choate's speech, but the part I referred to is this, — and I will call attention to that same speech, on page 807, vol. 2 of the same book from which my distinguished brother reads. Summing up, Mr. Choate said:

In the first place, then, it seems to me most clear that the weight of sound general opinion and of the evidence of a trustworthy experience vastly preponderates in favor of it. How the system of popular elections, or of short terms, is actually working now in any one of the States which have recently introduced it; how, still more, it is likely to work there after the influences of the earlier system, the judges which it bred, the habits which it formed, the bars which it trained, have passed away, there is no proof before this Convention deserving one moment's notice. We do not know that they cannot yet possibly pronounce on the matter, however close or sagacious their observation. What they have not yet seen, they cannot yet tell.

That was his first, strongest, and most potent argument; it was the argument that was used by all those who resisted the tendency of the day to elect judges, in 1853. Rufus Choate invoked this, — at that time powerful,—argument, and invoked it as only he knew how. And it was the great and deserved popularity of Rufus Choate in those days that gave added strength to his argument,—his bewitching oratory, and his clear, wonderful method of expressing himself in that Convention as in all kinds of assemblies.

Now, I started to say, when the gentleman from Quincy interrupted me, that our Convention of 1820 was called for one principal reason, namely, the separation of the great district now the State of Maine. Maine, then a part of Massachusetts, was a substantial part of our State. And what was the first thing that the people of the new State of Maine did in their Constitution? My distinguished friend, the former member of Congress, Mr. Powers from Newton, called attention this morning to the fact that Maine has a very satisfactory system of limited tenure for her judges and that Maine has a splendid judiciary. The first thing that the new State of Maine did in adopting a Constitution was to change from the life tenure which prevailed when she was part of Massachusetts and adopt the limited tenure of appointment by the Governor for a term of seven years. That system has worked out eminently satisfactorily in the State of Maine. I have here a letter from Mr. Pattangall, who was Attorney-General of Maine for several years and one of Maine's leading lawyers. This was addressed to me last August, in reply to a letter in which I asked him how the system was working in Maine. He goes on to state:

Judges in Maine are appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Council. They are not confirmed by the Legislature. Judges of the Supreme Court and Superior Courts are appointed for seven years; judges of municipal courts are appointed for four years. The only remaining judges in Maine are our probate judges, who are elected by the voters of each county, the term being four years.

All of our judges are subject to removal by impeachment or by address to the Governor by a majority of the Legislature requesting their removal. By a provision of our statutes after a judge of the Supreme or Superior Court reaches the age of seventy, provided he has served at least ten years, he may retire and receive half salary for the remainder of his life if he likes. Retirement is not compulsory, but unless he exercises his option of retiring at some time after he reaches the age of seventy and before he reaches the age of seventy-one, he waives the retirement provision.

All of these provisions relating to the appointment of judges and their tenure of office are embodied in our Constitution and were a part of the original Constitution adopted by Maine in 1820, with the exception of the retirement provision, which first became law in 1909, the statute being amended in 1911.

Under our system the appointment has been practically a life appointment. In the history of Maine there have not been a half-dozen judges who have been refused a reappointment. I have practiced at the Maine bar for twenty-five years and every judge who would accept a reappointment during that time has been reappointed, with two exceptions, and in both of those cases there were reasons for the failure to reappoint which appealed to the Governor. Politics had nothing to do with one of these failures to reappoint and had all to do with the other.

I am satisfied that our system of appointing judges for seven years and then reappointing them in the absence of any reason for not-doing so, is a good deal saner and better system than the one under which you live. It, to a certain extent, does away with the clamor for recall of judges, and it also appears, at least once in seven years, to tend to bring to our judges a realizing sense of the fact that they are human beings.

Yours very truly,

W. R. Pattangall.

That is the experience of Maine, and every lawyer of Massachusetts who has traveled to Maine and practiced law there knows that the people of Maine are perfectly satisfied with that system. They have a splendid judiciary and they stand up well in the light of all hostile criticism, and compare favorably with other States, including Massachusetts.

Now, take the next instance that comes along. When West Virginia was separated from Virginia at the time of the civil war, Virginia had a system of appointment by the Legislature. Virginia was a good deal like Massachusetts in the temper of her people and in her early constitutional history. West Virginia adopted election by the people in 1863 and is satisfied.

Take the great west that has been developed, with full knowledge of the history of Massachusetts. No State has adopted the Massachusetts system. Not a single State of all the great Union has followed us except in the very beginning, and of those that did so what is left?
Every State that followed Massachusetts in adopting a life tenure for judges has abandoned it, and has changed either to an elective system or to an appointive system for a limited number of years. Not a single instance is before the American people where States that have the elective system ever even thought of turning back to the appointive system for life. No instance can be advanced of a single State, where they have a limited tenure for a term of years, where they have suggested a return to the tenure for life.

Law and order do not cease in any of those States that adopted the elective system. All of you gentlemen of this Convention who have traveled, and I assume that most of you at least have traveled into many States of this Union, will agree with me that while we may find a different character of people in New England or in Massachusetts from that which is found in Illinois or California or any other of the far distant States, still the basic elements of morality and public sentiment are about the same everywhere in this great Republic. Everywhere we find that the people of the different localities act along the same identical principles of humanity and justice when it comes to upholding the majesty of the law. Great interests and momentous questions often are submitted to the courts of those States. The greatest cases the world knows,—involving the consideration and application of law of very far-reaching effect,—are tried more frequently before the elected judges of the State of New York than any other tribunal of this country. Next to New York comes the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, with its great cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburg, its rich mines of anthracite and bituminous coal, its great farms, its multitudinous manufacturing interests,—a common law State like Massachusetts, where the Declaration of Independence was first thought out and announced to a wondering world,—Pennsylvania, that still is proud of her wonderful history that was brought forth in the First and Second Continental Congresses and which at Gettysburg had the honor of throwing back the insurgent Confederacy at a time when it threatened the welfare of the Union. And closely following Pennsylvania with her elective judiciary comes the great States of Ohio, Illinois and California. I need not name the rest, but may I not ask in all earnestness of you gentlemen, if you do not agree with me that the people in those communities know full well just what they are doing or that they would be satisfied with anything less than the very best judiciary system in their judgment? Would the great corporations that have their homes and places of business in New York city be willing to intrust their property interests and their rights to the mercy of a corrupt or indifferent or inefficient judiciary?

I have too much respect for the business judgment and good common sense of the business men and property owners of the great States that now have the elective judiciary to think that they would submit their cases into the hands of men who could not do the very best for them. The world knows that the imperial State of New York is administered successfully. Under an elective judiciary responsive to the people, the city of New York has become the money center of the world. My friend from Newton (Mr. Powers) called attention to the New York Court of Appeals. Every lawyer who knows anything about American judicature knows that the New York Court of Appeals is known as the very strongest, the very best court in this land, and challenges any court in this country for respect and authority of its decisions. It may be that possibly in times past we have measured up with the highest; but it is the consensus of opinion I believe among the lawyers of this land that the New York Court of Appeals, elected by the people for a limited tenure of years, has given the people of this country the best kind of service that can come from any judges in this country. [Applause.]

I hold no brief for the lawyers or for the judges of other States, but I can speak from my own experience and personal observation. I have been at the Massachusetts bar for twenty busy years and I have tried cases in seven or eight of the other States of the Union. I have met the judges in those States, and I know many lawyers in those States, because I have participated in trials with them. I may be pardoned for claiming to know the judiciary of this State practically as well as any man in this Convention, for I have practiced before most of the courts in the eastern part of this State. I have practiced in every one of our courts, from the Supreme Judicial Court to the lowest court. As a member of Congress, I have sat in close intimacy with judges of other States, and most of them were men of distinction and deep learning on the law, from States aside from New England. They were an honor and credit to the elective system of their various States. And I want to say to you gentlemen here that the people of the other States of the Union cannot get the Massachusetts' point of view that would put the rights of life and property into the hands of one man, and leave him there without accountability for life. They cannot get our angle of view, and I do not wonder, because, as I pointed out in the beginning, it is absolutely undemocratic. The people are sovereign, and the people are denied the right to rule if the judges are without responsibility to the people.

As a member of the Commission on Uniform Laws, having been officially designated by the Governor of our State, it is my distinction to meet in conference every year with many judges who are delegates from the other forty-seven States in this Union, and I find them men of great distinction, — men whose ideals are just as high as ours. I have learned to respect them, and to honor them. I know that they come from communities that are law abiding and where the lives and property of their people are jealously safeguarded. I know that they represent the ideals of their people of the very highest standard. Our effort in our meetings is to bring about a uniformity of laws among the States of the Union that will bring to the American people the very best execution and service of the law that is possible. These men come from States where the people are convinced that an elective judiciary is the best that can be had.

Sometimes it is fashionable, among those who cannot tolerate the suggestion of any other system than that which we have here in Massachusetts, to ridicule and belittle some of the courts in other States for their alleged shortcomings, although many of those who so criticize never have had any actual experience in the courts which they attempt to ridicule. Let me say that I have watched and observed things in some of our lower courts and in some of the upper courts in this Commonwealth, and I challenge any member of this Convention to draw a comparison between the lower courts of some of the other States and the lower courts of this Commonwealth which would leave with any unbiased member any opinion that would favor some of the judges and the courts that we have and some of their work. Judge-made law has not been an uncommon thing in this Commonwealth. Who can say that the promulgation by Chief Justice Shaw in 1842 of the opinion of our Supreme Judicial Court, speaking without any consent from the Legislature, announcing that unjust "fellow-servant rule of law," to the effect that an employee could not recover damages for injuries received while in the service of his employer if the injury occurred through the negligence of a fellow-employee ever voiced the will of this Commonwealth? My fellow-delegate from Boston, Mr. Herbert A. Kenny, discussing this subject last summer, justly denounced Chief Justice Shaw for the expression of this law, which in future generations will be looked upon in abhorrence. Think, gentlemen, of the thousands of innocent women and children who have been made to suffer during over half a century, as a result of such a heartless law! It seems incomprehensible that any intelligent community would submit to such a condition. Thousands of innocent employees have lost their health and the means of a living, and they and their families have been cast into poverty and into the almshouses and hospitals as a result of this cruel, inhuman law that never really expressed the will of the people of Massachusetts. It was invoked by that court with the unquestioned purpose of protecting the captains of industry in this Commonwealth. The court felt that new industrial conditions ought to be protected by the court. But it was no business of the court to protect capital; that was the duty of the Legislature, and legislation easily could have been secured which would have protected adequately capital and labor without injuring or in any way handicapping either. So great was the respect and reverence inculcated into the people of this State for the opinions of the court, that it has taken over seventy-five years for the people to rouse themselves and redress this unmeasured wrong and to pass through its Legislature recently the Workmen's Compensation Act. Judge-made law in my opinion is a crime against this Republic, and yet it is so insidious that it is next to impossible to escape it until grave injuries have resulted. But it is not necessary for me to dwell on such instances. Take another feature of the situation. Go into the lower courts of this Commonwealth, particularly into some of those in and around Boston, and you will find exhibitions of judicial inefficiency, tyranny and favoritism that cry to Heaven for shame because of the manner in which those courts are conducted. I am not going to mention names of such judges, but I have seen a young man come into a lower court charged with drunkenness for the first time, and I have been horrified to see a judge sentence that young man to a year in the House of Correction for his first offence,—an offence the most enlightened men would have considered a pure accident or possibly an evidence of a disease. I have seen that same judge and other judges sentence a child of 8, 9 or 10 years of age, accused of truancy, whenever that child would not have an attorney and because his folks were not present,—in the days when there was no requirement that parents be summoned to defend their child,—I have seen a child of those tender years sentenced to the Reform School for an indefinite sentence, and that indefinite sentence invariably meant that the child had to stay imprisoned until he was twenty-one years of age; and I want to assure you gentlemen that nearly every boy so sentenced became a confirmed criminal and an avowed enemy of society. Surely, gentlemen, these are things that ought to be changed and would be if the people had but the power to do so. Will any of the 160 lawyers in this Convention deny that favoritism exists in certain of our courts? Can any man arise in this Convention and assure us that our courts are administered in a manner that shows no distinction between the parties before it, nor makes no distinction? I know that when you hold up to me examples in other States in the Union and tell me that we are better than they are, I am convinced that you gentlemen do not know the exact facts about which you are talking, because I myself have seen them. [Applause.]

But, they say, you would bring politics into it! Well, let us take the judges of all our courts,—have they not all been appointed through politics? And look at the kind of politics! What is it? Is it the kind of politics with which the American people are familiar and which is typically American and in the main satisfactory, even though filled with shortcomings? Oh no! It is secret politics; and is there a man in this Convention rash enough to rise and tell me or announce to the world that he believes in secret politics in the matter of appointments in this Republic? Secret politics is the most reprehensible form of corrupt influence that annoys and bothers this Republic to-day. You members should not forget that we are a Republic and the people are supposed to rule; and yet it is a notorious fact that appointments to our bench are brought about in secrecy,—secrecy of the fraternal chamber, secrecy of the political boss's office and secrecy by the leaders of the party that is in power and by the friends of the candidate for the judgship, whoever they may be.

This is not what the people of Massachusetts wish. It is not what Sam Adams expected, nor what John Adams dreamt of. If John Adams ever thought that appointments would be brought about as they have been during the last fifty years in this Commonwealth, he would turn in his grave. He wanted only the best. He hoped and expected that Massachusetts never would have any but the very best men obtainable sitting on her bench and that judges would be selected because of their preëminent ability and exceptional fitness for the office. Can Massachusetts ever expect to have the best when a little group or coterie control the appointment of judges as they do with us to-day, when they meet and say: "Now here, Governor, this is the man; we want him"? Who are they, that they should be permitted to impose a judge for life upon the people of this State, who under those circumstances know nothing about the qualifications of that man proposed for that high office? How are we going to get rid of that man if he turns out to be unfit, as so many judges have in the past? He is there for life. He may become intemperate; a disease may overcome him; he may lose his reason or he may become incapacitated for one reason or another, either because of advanced years or some malady which has overtaken him. But under our laws it is impossible to remove that man from the bench without causing great shame and grief to himself and to all those who are near and dear to him. None of us likes to do anything that is distasteful to another. Most men have a certain innate courtesy about them and a desire to refrain from doing anything that will hurt another person's feelings. We are accustomed to hope against hope that the person whom we would see corrected or a condition that we might hope to be bettered may change in the future. Impeachment is a most serious thing and is not to be thought of except in cases where men really have become criminals on the bench, — and many a time impeachment cannot be invoked because the wrongs that would be redressed are just short of impeachment. Removal by the Legislature is a public scandal and as such brings disgrace upon any man removed, even though the cause might be one for which the judge might not be to blame, — such as sickness or advanced age.

But give our judges a limited tenure and none of them would dare to become intemperate. Give us a limited tenure, and if a judge's mind fails him or bodily infirmities overcome him, if he becomes unfit for the office by his mental temperament or tyrannical tendency or grouchy disposition, he and his friends will know that when the time arrives for reappointment or reelection, he will not have any right to ask the people or the Governor to either reelect or to reappoint. The burden of responsibility to act in the very highest and best way of which a judge is capable always should be impressed upon the judge. When he is conscious that he is accountable to the people for the fullest measure of judicial capacity, he will conduct himself in an effort to respond to the ideals of the people so that he always may win their confidence and respect. "Oh," but some say, "you know politics will creep in and the court will get into politics." Well, will it any more than it does under our appointive system? Let me call to your attention two or three very prominent and illuminating examples of this fear. The question of the presidential election in 1876 between Samuel J. Tilden and Rutherford B. Hayes was submitted to a tribunal composed of fifteen members known as the Electoral Commission. It was composed of five distinguished members of the United States Supreme Court, five leading members of the United States Senate and five leading members of the National House, and that Commission, including among its members those five judges appointed from that august body and representing them, were found voting according to their previous political predilections and political beliefs. And no question could have been more important; no question ever was submitted to any judges in this country in which more was at stake. The very welfare of this Union was in the balance; and yet those appointive judges, who were holding a tenure for life; were found voting according to their political beliefs and the three Republican judges voted for the Republican candidate and their votes seated the Republican candidate against what the most of the people of this country believed was the righteous claims of the Democratic candidate, Mr. Tilden.

In contradistinction to this example of what an appointive judiciary might do when a political question came before them, let me summon your attention to another example where another very important question of far-reaching effect was considered, but in this case by an elected judiciary. The committee appointed to secure information for this Convention secured the opinion of the Governors and Attorneys-General and presidents of bar associations as to the manner in which the various judicial systems were working in the various States. From the Attorney-General of Wisconsin they received this very striking report which I commend to the very earnest attention of every man here, but particularly to those who are accustomed to deride and impugn the elective system because of its alleged weakness toward those to whom it may feel indebted because of having been elected to the bench. The Attorney-General of Wisconsin wrote as follows:

I think I am safe in saying that the unanimous sentiment of this Commonwealth thoroughly and unreservedly endorses our elective judiciary system. We feel that we have, and always have had, an able and honest judiciary. The Supreme Court Reports of this State will testify to the ability of that court, and no suspicion is ever indulged of the absolute rectitude and honesty of the men holding judicial positions, whether it be upon the Supreme or Circuit Bench. You will observe that our judges are not elected at the general election. Our Constitution wisely provided that they should be elected at a special election held in the spring.

Right at that point I want to call to your attention the fact that many of the States where the elective system prevails take it away from the ordinary election and make it an election by itself, of a purely non-partisan character.

The purpose of this provision was to divorce the judiciary from politics. This provision, coupled with the unanimous sentiment of the State, has enabled us to keep our judiciary absolutely free from political trammel. Perhaps I can cite you no more convincing proof of this than to refer you to the case of State ex rel. Husting vs. Board of State Canvassers, reported in 159 Wis. 216. At that time the court was composed of five Republicans and two Democrats. The five Republican judges sided with Mr. Husting, the Democratic candidate for United States Senator, while the two Democratic judges favored the contention of Francis E. McGovern, the Republican candidate for United States Senator. From this you will see that party considerations did not in the least influence the court in passing upon the controversy raised by the opposing candidates for United States Senator.

In clear contradistinction to this Wisconsin case, let me call up the Legal Tender cases in the United States Supreme Court wherein through the instrumentality of politics, that court was made the instrument of a political, partisan purpose which was achieved through the channels of the appointive system. Advocates and champions of the appointive system for life may endeavor to excuse and explain away the reversal of opinion in that celebrated case, but the American people and those who have followed closely National affairs always will be convinced that the Legal Tender law was declared constitutional through the most reprehensible methods. To relieve the financial difficulties surrounding the financing of the civil war and the enormous expenses imposed upon the country, the so-called Legal Tender Act was passed. This measure in a few words authorized the issue of non-interest bearing treasury notes making them legal tender in payment of all debts. The plan was opposed by Secretary Chase of President Lincoln's Cabinet and by all the great bankers of the great commercial cities. Doubts were raised as to whether Congress had the power to provide for the coinage of money, other than the coinage of gold and silver into money. The act, however, was passed and went into effect and its constitutionality was not questioned until 1869 when Secretary Chase had been appointed Chief Justice. The question came before the Supreme Court in the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, and Chief Justice Chase delivered the opinion of the Court, which reflected his own original opposition and the act was declared unconstitutional. The court consisted at that time of eight Justices and the opinion as given was that of the majority, namely, the Chief Justice and Justices Nelson, Clifford, Grier and Field. This decision upset the administration and caused a very pronounced feeling among the people and in fact was the forerunner of the financial panic which followed not long after. Congress the following year added another Justice to the Supreme Court and Justice Grier resigned. This afforded the President an opportunity of appointing two men, and it generally was accepted that the two men, Messrs. Strong and Bradley, whom he did appoint, were in favor of the constitutionality of declaring the Legal Tender Act constitutional, which thus would insure a reversal of the adverse decision. That the administration was not destined to disappointment was quickly evident, because, almost immediately after the appointment of these men, the court convened, and the previous decision was reversed with the majority then holding that the act was constitutional, leaving the prior majority of the Chief Justice with Messrs. Nelson, Clifford and Field still dissenting but bereft of the power of the majority on account of the manner in which the court had been added to and the attitude of the new appointees. Probably there never was such an example and I trust there never will be any such display of change in attitude by any court in our land. Could there be a stronger indictment against the politics which is inevitable in the system of an appointive judiciary for life than that which the Legal Tender cases, so called, displayed and proved?

Such instances make me wonder whether we possibly can be safe under our system and whether it is not better to change. These arguments appeal to me not only from the historian's standpoint, but they convince me as a member of this Convention that it is my duty to urge upon you to change or modify our system so that we may avoid all possibilities of permitting wrong to be done in our courts.

Some may argue that we should not touch the judiciary and say: "Oh, we should hold on to this because it is old and therefore sacred. An ancient institution should not be touched and the hand that suggests progress profanes the temple." Such an attitude is unworthy of any man who holds membership in this Convention, because the mere fact that the Convention is meeting is the all-sufficient answer that the people have decided that changes are necessary in our organic laws and they indicated no desire to except the judiciary. When we were ordered to meet and consider organic changes and modifications, we should not be unmindful of the changed condition in the world around and about us. We take just pride in the fact that most of the States in the Union have followed us whenever we have done well. They have paid us the high compliment of adopting our systems whenever they have been convinced that they have been wise; but the one thing that stands out as an exception is this attitude of ours concerning the judiciary. Every other State in the Union says: "No, no, Massachusetts, you have done exceedingly well in many things and we have been very glad indeed to follow your leadership. But when it comes down to the judiciary you are violating one of the fundamental principles on which the American Republic was built and you are invoking an undemocratic system in doing so, and we will not follow you, because you are undemocratic in this respect."

Fellow-delegates, we all love this country of ours. We know that a world struggle is going on and that its only purpose is to protect Democracy. We are sending millions of our best blood across the ocean to fight on the plains of Europe. For what? We are giving millions and billions of our wealth and property and we will give every dollar that we have in order to win this titanic struggle. No sacrifice is too great for us. We will mortgage all our future in order to insure success. Many of us would go to-day if the government would accept us. All of us will give all that we have in order to win. And for what? Simply to keep that vital spark of human liberty as expressed here in our Constitution alive, untrammeled and with its foundations untouched and unshaken. Yet here men to-day rise and say in this Commonwealth: "We will grant you that Democracy is essential in everything pertaining to government and that it should be protected from all danger, but we want a little oligarchy running the judiciary. It may be all right for the people to elect Presidents and Governors and Senators and to fight the battles of Democracy, lay down their lives willingly for their fellow-men, but it is not right for them to elect the judges." Why this great exception? What can be given to the people to do that is more important than what they already have done? Which is more important, the passing of a law by the Legislature and its enunciation and execution by the courts or the sitting in judgment upon an organic law before it becomes such? Are we not doing here to-day one of the most vital and important things that possibly can be done, and must it not be submitted to the people for their judgment? The people of this Commonwealth were called upon to say whether they desired a Constitutional Convention and they answered it in the affirmative. Then they were called upon to say who their delegates should be and they sent you gentlemen, my fellow-delegates. But while this is important on their part, our work has yet to be submitted to them and they must either approve or disapprove of it. Surely when they pass judgment on an organic law by their votes, they do something more far reaching and important and permanent than the election of any judge of any court, because that organic law will bind us all after the people have expressed their satisfaction of it. If they can express their will and good judgment upon an organic law is there a man here who can gainsay the fact that the same judgment and intellect cannot bring forth also a good judge?

It comes with very poor grace for any member of this Convention who has been elected by the discernment and by the favor of the people to rise here and say: "The people are good enough to elect me to suggest an organic law, but they cannot be trusted to elect a judge of any court." Gentlemen, let us realize what our present situation means. Let us be mindful that the rest of this great Republic does not approve of our system and that we ourselves really are not justified in what has been done. It is true that we may have had some great men on our bench in times past, but it has been a matter of chance that we secured men of signal integrity to sit on that bench. There should be a way of testing and finding out what the future judge is to be, and the people should have a chance of passing their judgment on him instead of having it confined to the secrecy of the executive office and the Council chamber.

Distinctions have been drawn and some have been heard to say that we have not a life system, — that it is only a tenure during good behavior and that is a test. Yet I think that the acceptance of the office by nearly every man who has been appointed has been with the idea that he had a life tenure. This attitude of mind was exhibited strongly in the case of Judge Bradbury of our Supreme Judicial Court. He became palsied and could not do his work and the people stood it as long as patience could be considered a virtue, but finally his case was submitted to the Legislature and both Houses voted to petition the Governor to remove him. What did Judge Bradbury do? He addressed the Governor and Council and maintained that the Legislature had no right to remove him because he had not misbehaved himself and he claimed that he had a life estate in the office. The question was considered seriously as to whether or not his construction of his term of office was not the right one. Just imagine, gentlemen, a judge of our court of final resort maintained that, by virtue of his appointment, he had a life estate in his office! And there are many on the bench to-day throughout this Commonwealth who have so conducted themselves that there can be no conclusion other than that they also feel that they have a life estate in their office. They, too, believe that as long as things are not done scandalously, as long as they do not violate any specific law and as long as they do not commit an impeachable crime, that they will not be disturbed and cannot be removed. I do not want a tyrant on the bench in this Commonwealth. I hate tyranny in any shape or form and I gladly would help vote to break down the domination of any class of men who would seek by open or secret means to perpetuate or cultivate a tyrannous disposition in such a sacred place of trust as a court in Massachusetts. Neither do I want an irritable man on the bench nor a man who is the victim of dyspepsia or any other malady that interferes with an even temper and train of thought. The bench is no place for petty autocrats who keep within the exact letter of the law, but nevertheless abuse it against some particular man or party whom they may not like. There are a million ways of torturing and punishing without bringing the perpetuator within the pale of the law.

I want judges on our bench, gentlemen, of the most upright character, — men learned in the law and rich in experience, who never will forget the great trust that is imposed upon them, whether they hold a position in our Supreme Judicial Court or as Justice of our most humble district court; judges who can give the people of this Commonwealth the very best that Massachusetts is capable of producing. No one is more proud of this old Bay State than I am, and I want her to go onward and upward and never take a backward step. I want her to do the best that possibly can be done, and in my understanding of this great division of our government, I believe that an elective system will best insure that result. That question having been disposed of in my absence last Friday, I must take the next best guarantee that will insure the best judiciary for the Commonwealth, so I will support the measure for a limited tenure of office for our judges. This I think is necessary in the case of our Supreme Judicial Court, where many of the questions that are passed upon are really questions involving the basic principles of legislation. I wish that the question could be divided, as it was when the Constitution was adopted, and that we might be able to vote upon the tenure of the various courts. This I would like to see because, while important questions go to the Supreme Judicial Court, they are few in number in comparison with the multitude of questions that are presented to the lower courts that daily are dealing with the liberties and property rights of the great masses of the State, and our attention should not be diverted from the importance of these lower courts. Let me urge you in conclusion not to quickly pass this by. Do not invoke the legislative machinery that would close debate and choke off consideration. Let it not be said that in this year adequate thought was not devoted to this all-important branch of our government; and if you members can agree with me that there should be some change in the tenure of judges in our court, let it be done only after mature consideration. Above all let our result be based particularly on the one overwhelming, supreme thought,—that nothing is more important to the people of Massachusetts than the very best judicial system that is possible from our deliberations. [Applause.]

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I have listened for the last three days to various eloquent speeches here on this judicial question. I believe that the time has come for a vote, and I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. O'Connell: I should like to ask the gentleman to withdraw that at the present time, because I saw two or three members get on their feet who were anxious to discuss this rather important question. I should like to ask him to withhold that motion for at least another half-hour. There is no sense in rushing it through this minute when men want to discuss it, and I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Chandler: I would withdraw it if it could be put in half an hour from now.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I call the attention of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) in the second division to the fact that the committee on Rules recommended and the Convention adopted a procedure to meet precisely this situation, that we have interpolated twenty minutes for debate before the conclusion of debate. This is a novelty in parliamentary practice, and possibly the gentleman has not been informed of it, but the rule now reads that if the previous question is ordered twenty minutes shall be allowed for general debate.

Mr. O'Connell: I quite recognize that this is a novelty in the line of parliamentary practice. It practically has vitiates the whole principle of the Committee of the Whole, and in fact it is a misnomer now to call it Committee of the Whole. This question of enlarging debate after the main question has been ordered is certainly another violation of the principles of the previous debate. What I was going to say is this: I do not believe that anything is gained in a matter of this kind by rushing a subject that ought to be discussed, and I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Now, before I take my seat, may I ask the Chair whether or not, if the previous question under our present rule is ordered now, amendments may be made or substitutes offered for the motions now before the house.

The Presiding Officer: For the information of the member from Boston, amendments cannot be made after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. O'Connell: That makes it very difficult, gentlemen, because I should like to offer a perfecting amendment to one of those measures, and I think other members have in mind other perfecting amendments. It would seem as though an opportunity ought to be given to offer at least amendments to the measure now before the Convention, and I hope that the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: I rise simply to make an explanation and answer the question put to me by the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) when I offered my amendment, and which I feel was not answered satisfactorily or perhaps clearly, and that was as to whether or not the language which I used in my amendment might not be too broad. As it is only seven lines long I am going to ask your indulgence while I read it.

The Governor by and with the consent of the Council may retire any judicial officer because of advanced age, mental or physical incapacity.

And the amendment suggested by Mr. Curtis in the first division and accepted by me was:

And the General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired.

The question was, as I understood it, might "any judicial officer" include officers such as masters in chancery. At the recess I discovered that masters in chancery in the first place are appointed only for a limited tenure, seven years, and in addition the provision as to pensions relates only to judges and nobody else; and therefore the broad language used, and there can be not the slightest objection in making it broad, was that the Governor could retire any judicial officer for the reasons of advanced age, mental or physical incapacity, but that the provision for pensions related only to judges.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I do not design to take much of the time of this Convention upon the question now pending, and I wish first of all to assure the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) that the farthest from my thoughts was to interrupt a speech which I supposed and apparently the Chair supposed had been concluded when I arose previously. The lawyers in this Convention and the jurists are all agreed that the judicial system of Massachusetts needs no substantial amendment, — the proof of which is, of course, that the committee on Judiciary saw fit to recommend no change whatever in the procedure or in the organization of the Massachusetts courts. It is perfectly clear that the bar of Massachusetts and the bench are satisfied with things as they are; and there is no doubt that the people of the Commonwealth have complained little either of the organization of the courts or of their procedure, and still less of the character of the judges who have come to the front under our present system of appointment. That it is a good system is shown further by the agreement of most laymen, as well as those who have had occasion to practice before the courts of the Commonwealth, that in general the judges are upright and able men, and that they are as little disposed as the judges of any Commonwealth to act in a manner which corresponds to a gone-by state of public opinion.

Nevertheless there are other successful methods of choosing the judiciary in other parts of the Union. This Commonwealth has a very unusual method, unusual when it was first adopted, inasmuch as in many cases at that time most State judges were chosen by the Legislatures. Subsequently the choice in other States passed from the Legislatures to the popular vote, while in Massachusetts it remained vested in the Governor. It is true that our system upon the whole has worked well. When the waves of corruption swept over the State of New York fifty years ago, when Barnards and Cordusals were selling their decisions to the highest bidder, or were making midnight chamber decisions in order to enable people to steal the property of others, Massachusetts had no such experience.

There are undeniable difficulties about an elective judiciary. It is not many years ago, for instance, that Roger A. Pryor, born in Virginia but for long a distinguished and leading member of the New York Bar and then a judge, complained with justice that it was a great hardship for a man whose salary was about $10,000 a year to have to plunk down $10,000 in cash before he could get a renomination in his own district though nobody opposed him. The fact was that at that time apparently no candidate was put upon a party ballot who did not contribute to the party funds a sum about equal to one year's salary. We have been free from such evils. But are we free because of the life tenure of the judges or because in this Commonwealth the method of appointment has worked better than the method of popular election elsewhere?

The number of persons in the United States possessing tenures of office for life always has been extremely small. It used to be stated that there were none in the whole country that had any such tenure except the officers of the United States army and navy, the judges of the United States courts, the judges of the Massachusetts courts and of a few other States, and the professors in certain large universities. Even upon that point the security is not perfect, inasmuch as the President Emeritus of Harvard University (Mr. Eliot) used on occasions to announce the great principle that the professors of that institution held their places "during good behavior and efficiency," and the body that determines when efficiency ceases is the body which previously appointed the professor, a practice which is exactly in line with one of the proposals now before us.

To my mind the great merit of the Massachusetts system is the appointment of judges by a Governor, a single person who takes all the responsibility, who is known, to whom the arguments for or against the appointment of a particular person can be brought. It does not in the least depend, however, upon life appointments, any more than the virtue of choice by popular election depends upon election for life. We would have all the good features of our present system, if the appointments by the Governor were made for briefer periods than life.

I wish to add here the experience of a layman to the testimony of several members of the bar, as to the fact that there are some very weak spots in the judiciary of Massachusetts. That fact came home to me a few years ago through a long protracted contest in which I was a silent partner for the recovery of the value of a small estate which had gone into the hands of a member of the Massachusetts bar. It took nine years, — nine years! — of determined and persistent effort, to secure from that man an accounting for his trust. Nine years he held in his hands small sums due to the heirs, and nothing dislodged him except a prosecution which cost more than five times what those who put down the money received from the enterprise. Now, what was the difficulty? The difficulty was that the judge of probate declined to exercise his administrative power, by pressure or influence, to compel that lawyer to do his duty; and nothing but a direct prosecution, brought to the judge's notice in such a manner that it could not escape him, forced him to the point where he even would consider the rights of the heirs to their own money. The probate judge, till forced to take ground, would do nothing that was inconvenient to him. The administrator had received the money, but apparently it was not in cash in the bank. There seems to exist no system in this State by which trustees under such circumstances are compelled to deposit funds belonging to other people. This judicial weakness is widespread. It is said that in the city of New York about one-half of the small estates that are put into the hands of executors without bonds are total losses; that is, those who are entitled to the money never get it.

If a person who had at least the means to push a prosecution, who was determined that he would not be cheated out of his eye teeth and was willing to pay the necessary sum to save those eye teeth, found it a task of nine years to collect a few hundred dollars, what must be the situation of those who are without the means or the influence to enter and prosecute a suit against the delinquent! I had the honor of presenting this case to the Judiciary Committee of this Convention, suggesting that there ought to be some State official whose official business should be to compel accounting in such cases. The committee politely laughed me to scorn, and asked me why I did not get a good lawyer. Well, if I had not finally got a good lawyer, a member of this Convention, who could be ugly and in the end was uglier than the other fellow, I never should have got my money. Even with that vigorous lawyer it took about two years to drive the administrator out of his corner.

My point is simply this: The real difficulty with the Massachusetts judiciary is not character. It is a learned judiciary. It is a fairly impartial judiciary. The real difficulty is the lack of sufficient positive administrative responsibility in the courts of this State which they will exercise without being jogged by an expensive suit. I do not know whether these difficulties, which I happened to discover in my own experience in probate proceedings, extend also to cases of a somewhat similar nature, such as the appointment of masters, where the funds of other people are for the time being in the hands of persons appointed by the court. I do know, however, that the judicial system of this Commonwealth in certain courts is deficient, is weak, is preposterous; and since the Convention is taking no direct steps to remedy that evil, the pending proposition is our one chance to galvanize the judiciary. The pending measure is the very smallest, mildest possible change in the organization of the judiciary that there is any possibility now of securing: First of all, by providing that there may be a removal by the Governor under such circumstances that removal ought not to be necessary, circumstances where the judge himself ought to realize that his usefulness has gone. If he will not realize it, then it should be realized for him. The remedy here proposed is properly an administrative remedy; an administrative officer is authorized to remove or suggest for removal a person who no longer is capable of doing his duty. I vote, therefore, for that proposition. In addition, if I have the opportunity, as I hope to have, I shall vote for the proposition that judges in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts be appointed for terms of years instead of for life.

Mr. Merriam of Framingham: I hesitate to speak on this important question, which is to me the all-important question before this Convention. There is no more important function of government than the administration of justice, and we must pause and consider seriously whatever is done in this matter before we disturb the system so well administered during these hundred and more years.

The gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) in his argument cited as an example of the abuse of the appointive system the Legal Tender cases, in the United States Supreme Court. The charge, as I understand it, is this: That that court at one time decided a law to be unconstitutional, that a vacancy then existed, that a further judge was to be appointed; and in order to reverse the action of the court two appointments were made and the decision rendered the other way, a charge in effect that the President of the United States deliberately packed that court for the purpose of bringing about a political decision. We have evidence as to what was done at that time which I think the people of Massachusetts should listen to. That charge affected the honor of Judge Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, at that time Attorney-General in the Cabinet of President Grant. His brother, Senator George F. Hoar, almost as a dying declaration put in his autobiography a clear statement of just what happened in that event, and from that statement it appears that these appointments made by President Grant were made in advance of the announcement of the decision, made by the President when he did not know what the court would decide or that the court would decide anything. Senator Hoar has left this statement in these words, and I invite the attention of the gentleman from Boston and the members of the Convention to this simple statement:

This decision gave rise to an attack upon the administration of President Grant, and especially upon Judge Hoar, then Attorney-General, which, although it has no foundation whatever in fact, is occasionally revived in later years, that the court was packed by appointing two new judges to reverse the decision. The decision in Hepburn vs. Griswold was announced in the Supreme Court February 7, 1870. The court met at 12 o'clock. The decision was read by the Chief Justice after several opinions had been read by other judges, so that the afternoon must have advanced considerably before it was promulgated. It had not been made known to the public in advance by the press, and President Grant and Attorney-General Hoar both affirm that they had no knowledge of the decision and had no expectation of what it would be before it was announced. I myself had a conversation with Attorney-General Hoar in the afternoon of that day. He had just heard the decision from the Chief Justice with great astonishment and surprise. Four judges concurred in the decision. There were two vacancies in the court, one occasioned by the withdrawal of Mr. Justice Greer and one by the Act of Congress at the previous session providing for an additional judge. At 12 o'clock in the morning of that day, before the decision in Hepburn vs. Griswold was made known, President Grant had sent to the Senate, and the Senate had received, the communication nominating Messrs. Strong and Bradley to these vacancies.

This is not the only inaccurate statement that it seems to me has been made in this debate with reference to the decisions of our courts. One of the speakers, my friend upon my right, referred to a recent decision in which it was declared by the court, as he said, that labor was property. After his conclusion I asked him, as he will remember, if he had read the case of Bogni vs. Perotti. To my surprise he said he had not, and asked me what it was. That is the case in which Judge Rugg, speaking for the court, held that the right of a man, the ability of a man to labor, was property, but that it was his own property. That decision was announced by our Chief Justice in an opinion which it seems to me is absolutely sane and sound and should be regarded as one of the bed-rock decisions of the labor world. It was not only the decision of Judge Rugg, it was the decision of the undivided court, and two of the judges in that court were Judge Carroll and Judge DeCourcy; and no man will arise in his seat to declare that these judges or any of our judges would hold the interests of the laboring man in light regard. That decision held that a man's right to labor was his own property, not the property of his employer, but that it was his own property, that he could do with it as he wished, that it was entitled to the protection of the law, that no one could take it from him, and that whatever else it might be, intimidating possibly that it was something else, it had the qualities of property in the sense that it was entitled to the protection of the law.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like the learned gentleman's opinion upon this question. If it be that the labor of a man is property, whose property is it when the man sells his labor to an employer?

Mr. Merriam: If a laborer in handling his right to labor and in his own interest makes a contract concerning his right to labor and demands his equivalent, then he has received his equivalent by virtue of the contract that he himself has made, and the law will protect him, as I understand it, in that decision, in the exercise of that right.

Now, another reference was made to a decision of our court in the matter of child labor. We all believe in the matter of home rule. Is there a man here who does not sympathize with the right of the people of Ireland in the great cause that they have advocated in the matter of home rule?

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I am interested in what the gentleman from Framingham has said, and in his defence of the courts of Massachusetts. He has said that labor is a personal right. I wish to ask him if he remembers the case of Worthington vs. Waring in 1892, where the court declared that personal rights are distinguished from the rights of property, and the case was then dismissed. In the Haverhill case the court said the right to labor is a common law right. The recent decision of our Supreme Court now says that labor is property. I ask him how he can reconcile these decisions of the court upon this great question.

Mr. Merriam: We shall have later, when this subject is reached in the matters dealing more specifically with it, an opportunity to carry this debate further. At the present time I merely wish to call attention to the fact of the decision in this court in Bogni v. Perotti, that it was a decision in the interest of the man's own right to labor, a decision by our united court, and a decision in which Judge DeCourcy and Judge Carroll participated.

It is too bad, it seems to me, to bring in these questions with these distorted ideas of, the effect of the decisions in the effort to attack the method of appointing our judges. Our system has worked well. Justice has been administered well in Massachusetts. There may be exceptions, but I claim that they are only such exceptions as inevitably would be connected with such long administration as we now have in the history of Massachusetts. Let that system alone. Let it continue just as it is, realizing the worth of our judiciary, realizing the importance of preserving for our people an impartial, independent, fearless judiciary. Do not touch it, but leave it as it is.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: At this late moment of the debate I hesitate very much to address the Convention, except that I should like to point out very briefly a condition which I think should require and should be given a long, — a long, — debate, but I throw it out now only in order to suggest that I do not think that this question of the tenure of the judiciary has been treated in its fundamental character. Under our system of written Constitutions the habit has come in, by our judiciary at least, of deciding that it is their prerogative to constitute themselves a third chamber, with the right of imposing a veto on legislation which has been approved by the Houses of Congress. The result has been perfectly logical, since the same rules have been applied to the Legislature and the courts, for the courts have constituted themselves a non-elective legislative assembly; that is to say, a third body, and the same rules have been applied to them as to the other legislative chambers. That is the rule of election, — that if the judges are to exercise a veto on legislation they ought to be elected by the people. That has been the logical progression, and it gradually has swept over the whole United States, and it has ended only with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which is the last. Now, I conceive that as long as the system endures by which judges have constituted themselves a third chamber of legislation, who have the power of vetoing any political movement which takes place in the other two chambers of the Legislature, they logically must become sooner or later elective, like those. That our system stands alone in the world of admitting the judiciary to exercise this power has nothing whatever to do with this matter. We claim that it is a great advance in civilization to have the judiciary exercising this power. I am not going into that question, which is an enormous question, I agree, but I wish to point out that the reason why we have elective judiciary is, I conceive, simply because we have our judges acting as legislators. That is the upshot of it. I am not personally in favor of an elective judiciary. I do not believe that the process of justice is improved by having the judges elected. But I do believe that as long as our judges exercise the power of vetoing legislation there will be no peace in our community until the judges become elective or anyway are removable by some power or other outside of themselves.

That, Mr. President, is all I have to say at present on this subject.
Mr. George of Haverhill: I should like to raise this question. I should like to know why it is necessary to bring in the pension question. For the first time in the history of Massachusetts the pension system is to be recognized in our Constitution by this proposal and the amendment of the delegate from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur). It seems to me it is entirely out of place. Now, the Legislature has a perfect right to pension the judges, because they have been doing it for the last forty years. I beg to call your attention to an act that was passed in 1899, which provides that "any Justice of either of said courts who, after having attained the age of sixty years and after having served in either or both of said courts at least fifteen consecutive years, shall have become incapacitated from the full discharge of his duties as such Justice by reason of sickness or otherwise, may, with the approval of the Governor and Council, resign his office under the provisions of this section and shall thereupon during the remainder of his natural life receive an amount equal to three-fourths of the salary which was by law payable to him at the time of his resignation, to be paid from the treasury of the Commonwealth in the same manner as the salaries of acting Justices are paid." Now, the Governor and Council, under the act as proposed by the delegate from Quincy, if they find that a judge is incapacitated, simply can suggest to him that he had better resign, and if he resigns he can receive three-fourths of his salary during his natural life. If any judge who becomes incapacitated is so obstinate that he will not resign when he is told to, and they remove him, he ought not to get any pension.

It seems to me that it is wrong; we ought not to bring the pension system in here. Nowhere in the Constitution of Massachusetts is the question of pensions referred to. And why should we provide a pension for a judge who refuses to get off of the bench when he is told by the Governor and Council that he is incapacitated, and probably he knows it as well as anybody else? I am not saying this in criticism of the judiciary. I am not in sympathy with this movement. I am fully aware that the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court and the Superior Court and all other courts are human, and I cannot see where we are going to gain anything by making these appointments more numerous than they are now. I hope that,—I shall not express any hope because that will not do any good. I might add that there is no legislation necessary. They ought to leave the question just where they find it. Of course if they wanted to pass that part of the proposal offered by the delegate from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) giving the Governor and Council the right to retire a judge when he becomes so old that he does not know enough to retire when he can get three-fourths of his salary for his natural life, we can make that amendment; but we certainly ought not to adopt the last half of that amendment, and when the time comes I shall ask to have the question divided on that amendment.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I should like to read to the Convention two quotations. The first is from the autobiography of George S. Boutwell, who, after being Governor of the Commonwealth, was perhaps the most prominent figure in the Convention of 1853 and certainly spoke with authority as to the attitude of the people toward the work of that Convention. It is as follows:
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

After an amendment had been agreed to extending the term to ten years [precisely the proposition now before us] the proposition was adopted. With some misgivings I assented to the compromise. The attempt to change the tenure of the judges was a grave mistake, and it was the efficient cause of the defeat of the work of the Convention.

All the work of the Convention of 1853 went by the board, was re-excepted by the people, and the efficient cause, according to the leading man in that Convention, was its ratification of the proposal now before this Convention.

Mr. Creame of Lynn: I would ask the gentleman whether or not the voters were permitted to vote separately upon each article that was submitted by the Convention that he refers to, or whether they were compelled to accept or reject everything in toto.

Mr. Luce: Both methods were used. There were separate prosopositions presented, and also a revision of the Constitution.

Mr. Creame: I would ask if the voters were permitted at that time to vote upon this question of the tenure of judges separately from any other proposition.

Mr. Luce: I do not know. I have laid before the Convention the opinion of its leading member, allowing this Convention to attach what weight it may choose to the judgment of the leading member of the Convention of 1853.

Mr. Hart: May I through you, Mr. President, ask the gentleman from Waltham whether in his judgment if this proposition now pending were adopted by the Convention it would cause the loss of all the other propositions submitted by the Convention to the people?

Mr. Luce: I think it altogether probable, or at least certainly possible, for it is a peculiarity to be noticed in the decision of the people upon a group of questions that their attitude toward one strangely affects their attitude toward others. Men go into the booths prepared to vote Yes or No upon some critical question; and having reached there with Yes or No in their minds it is a characteristic observed many, many times, that they follow in the affirmative or the negative on all the propositions before them, precisely as happened in 1853.

The other sentence I would read is from Joseph H. Choate. Pres-sumably all would agree that he was the ablest lawyer of his time in the State of New York, and these words were spoken to the people of Massachusetts:

Cling to your ancient system, which has made your reports models of jurisprudence to all the world until this hour. Cling to it, and freedom shall reign here until the sunlight shall melt this bronze and justice shall be done in Massachusetts though the skies fall.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: Inasmuch as the delegate from Waltham (Mr.
Luce) has seen fit to bring the name of Joseph H. Choate into this discussion, I desire the privilege of reading an editorial from the New York "Sun" concerning the attitude of Mr. Choate on this same subject. This is from the New York "Sun" of May 18, 1917, and is as follows:

Mr. Choate as a Lawmaker.

The presidency of a Constitutional Convention has always been regarded as one of the highest honors in American politics. Mr. Choate was President of the Convention which formulated the present Constitution of the State of New York in the year 1894; yet this notable event in his life has hardly been mentioned in the numerous sketches of his career published since his death.
Indeed, so far as constructive work is concerned, Mr. Choate's labors in that Convention probably constitute his greatest achievement. To give form to the fundamental law of a great State is a task worthy of the highest legal attainments. These he devoted to the service of the people in the fullest measure. He was the leader of the Convention not only in name but in fact. His influence was paramount throughout its deliberations. The vast improvement in our judicial system effected by the Constitution of 1894 was largely due to his zealous support of the action of the Judiciary Committee under the chairmanship of Elihu Root. Mr. Choate could remember a time when the New York judiciary had not been all it should be; and it is interesting to note that he lived to acknowledge and assert that in ability, integrity and industry the judges of this State were equal to any like number of judges in the world. This he did in an address delivered a few years ago, at one of the lawyers' banquets in this city.

The Constitution of 1894, of which Mr. Choate may be regarded as the father, established in the fundamental law the principles of civil service reform and further guaranteed the right of home rule in cities. Take it all in all, it has proved so satisfactory to the people that they flatly refused to change it when asked to do so two years ago.

Joseph H. Choate was as successful as a lawmaker as he was in everything else he undertook — and that is saying a great deal.

The Convention will note that Mr. Choate maintained that the judges in New York were equal to any like number of judges in the world. I quote this and call it to the attention of the members of this Convention because it is a direct refutation of what the gentleman from Waltham and others have been trying to impress upon this Convention; namely, that Joseph H. Choate put the seal of his approval only on the system which we have in Massachusetts. It is the most satisfying answer to those who regard the elective judiciary as of a low caliber, and that the elective judiciary cannot be up to the standard of that in Massachusetts.

Mr. Choate's attitude, if I am any judge, is this: That in speaking at the unveiling of the monument to his distinguished ancestor, Rufus Choate, here in Massachusetts, he was complimentary enough to refer in laudatory terms to the system that existed at that time. Although he was a Massachusetts man he preferred to practice under the elective system of New York.

As the editorial notes, he presided at the Constitutional Convention of 1894 in New York, and was a member of the latter Convention two years ago, and he made no effort to change the New York system to that now prevailing in Massachusetts. He was a man of tremendous influence, both at the bar and in the political life of New York State, and Joseph H. Choate would have been able to have brought about a change if a change had been necessary or if a change would have helped the situation in New York in any way. He knew, however, that he was practicing under the very best possible system in this Democratic form of government, and that every day he was meeting the ablest members of the American bar who were practicing under the elective system with their whole approval. If an elective system was good enough for Joseph H. Choate in New York, I believe it is good enough for the members of this Convention, and that if adopted here in Massachusetts we possibly may be able to develop some more lawyers here in this State of the same caliber as Joseph H. Choate, and in my judgment we certainly need them.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I am reluctant to prolong this debate even for a moment, as I am satisfied that the arguments which have now and heretofore been presented by the able members of the committee on the Judiciary and others against any of these radical and subversive changes in our judicial system are unanswerable, and I have had and still have confidence that the sober sense of the Convention will accept them as conclusive. But highly as I respect and esteem my friend from Quincy (Mr. Adams), I cannot allow the statement which he made here a moment ago to pass unchallenged, for it contains to my mind the seed of most of the popular errors upon this subject. He says in substance that the judges have erected themselves into a third legislative chamber and assumed to themselves the power of vetoing legislation. Conceding his motives to be the best, and his beliefs to be what I know they are, in my view a more misleading statement could hardly be made. We live under constitutional government. The Constitution imposes certain restraints upon the power of all the governmental departments and upon the exercise of the power of the people themselves. In the application and enforcement of those restraints questions are bound to arise as to what they mean, and when, how, and how far they are to operate. Now somebody must decide these questions, and by universal consent the judiciary has been made the arbiter, as it must be. It is not an assumption of legislative power. The judges are there to settle all the doubts as to the meaning of the language of the Constitution and the laws, a strictly judicial duty. The quarrel of my friend from Quincy is not with the judges but with the constitutional system itself, and his attack is upon the constitutional system, and it ought not to be directed against the judges. If we are prepared to abolish the constitutional restraints very well, though I trust that day will not arrive in my time. Until we are prepared to abandon constitutional government, somebody must interpret the terms of the Constitution, and all men have hitherto universally agreed that there can be no better interpreter than the judiciary. It exists for that very purpose. Nobody else can do it in cases between parties, and there cannot be one construction of the Constitution for the people and another for the government. The only man in our history who ever thought that there could be, or should be, when the judges stood in his way, was Andrew Jackson, and this heresy disappeared with him some fourscore years ago. In the discharge of this duty the judges are of course subject to human infirmity, and it unavoidably results that they sometimes decide a question one way which other men or judges might decide another way. But this is not the ground of complaint against them. The ground is that they have not decided my way. The people who complain are the people who do not like the decision. Do they think that a decision by popular clamor or popular influence would be better? No man would submit his personal rights to that tribunal if he could help it, and it would be as vicious, as objectionable, as impossible for public rights as for private rights. To the proper performance of the judicial duty absolute independence is the first qualification. The judges should be as independent of all the people as of any of the people, and nothing in the history of Massachusetts is more to her credit than that she has kept her head above this submerging flood of popular attack upon the judges and resolutely refused to undermine and pull down the temple of justice as the wisdom of the fathers built it.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: We all desire an honest and competent judiciary. Nothing can be more important to all the people. The question before us now is a very simple one. Will it make the judiciary of Massachusetts more honest, more competent, if we have them appointed for a term of years rather than for life? Most of the argument that has been advanced against the present system to my mind has little value. It always is true, it always will be true, that the judiciary are not perfect. No system can give us a perfect judiciary. The question is whether there is any evidence that to change the system to appointment for a term of years really will give us a better judiciary. No evidence has been produced here which indicates that any other system than that we now use has given in any other State a better judiciary than we have in Massachusetts, and certainly in many States most of us know by experience that the judiciary is not equal to that in Massachusetts.

There are three clear effects that would be likely to follow from the adoption of the term system: First, the appointing power would have it put up to him that he is appointing for a brief period only, and therefore he need not be so careful as he would be if it was for life, because it will be corrected in a few years if he makes a mistake. In the next place, if you ask a man to go onto the bench for a period of years, many of the men most competent will refuse absolutely to consider the position; and in the next place, as he is human, every man who goes onto the bench, knowing that in a few years his term will expire, will have to consider in every decision that he makes the fact,—it will be in the back of his mind, I do not care how fair or how honest he is,—"If I make that decision I shall have to meet something as to my reappointment." The inevitable result will be, as has been the case in other States, that you will have a weaker and a less competent judiciary, which is the very thing Massachusetts cannot afford to have. Whatever mistakes we have made, and we have made some mistakes, whatever our judges do that is wrong, and they have done some things that are wrong, the States all over the Union look back to Massachusetts and say: "She has on the whole through all the years the best and the most competent judiciary of any State in the Union;" and until somebody is able to prove that the new scheme would help us we are making progress backwards if we change.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I should like to ask the member if he realizes that in the Empire State of New York on only four occasions have they ever tried to oust a judge who has given satisfactory service, and that in each instance the people of that State have turned down both leading parties whenever they tried to do so, and that that State gives to the country the clearest proof that a good judge always is approved by the people and always is reelected?

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I hesitate quite a little to take part in this debate. I am not used to public speaking and this is an important matter and I do not feel that I can do the justice to it that ought to be done.

These various matters relating to the tenure of the judiciary, I think, without exception were all referred to the committee on the Judiciary. Notice was given by them in accordance, I think, with the rules of the Convention,—if not, on their own initiative,—of hearings to be held with regard to these various matters. The committee heard, heard patiently, heard fully, any one and every one who wished to be heard, and I think it is a fair inference from what took place before that committee that so far as it furnished evidence of any popular demand for a change of this kind in the Constitution of Massachusetts, there was none. The committee, taking that into account, as well as taking their own view of the questions themselves into account, reported with one of them dissenting in two or three matters against any change in the Constitution of Massachusetts in this regard. In regard to three of the resolutions submitted to them the gentleman who ordinarily sits behind me (Mr. Maguire of Boston) dissented. One of those was disposed of at the last sitting of the Convention; all of the others are now before the Convention. There are, if I have counted right, some seven or eight of these resolutions relating to the tenure of the judiciary in Massachusetts now before the Convention. In only two of them, so far as the record shows, has there been any dissent on the part of any member of the committee from the report of the committee. As to the other five or six, so far as the record of the Convention shows, the report of the committee is unanimous. That, so far as the committee is concerned, is the situation of these matters now before the Convention. I speak of them collectively.

Now, what is the reason why a judge should not be elected? Why should not he be elected just as you elect a Governor, just as you elect the Representatives who sit in this hall, just as you elect the Representatives you send down to Washington? Why should not you elect a judge of your highest court? Why should not you elect a judge of your great trial court? Why should not you elect a judge of the Probate Court, through whose hands passes soon or late the property of every citizen in Massachusetts who owns property? Why should not you elect the judge of your Land Court, who tries the title to your farm, to your home, to the soil that is beneath your feet? Why should not you elect him as well as your Governor and your Representatives?

Well, Mr. President, the answer seems to me to be a simple one: Because the office of a judge is wholly different from the office of a Governor or a Representative to the General Court or to Washington or from any elective office. You elect your Governor to carry out certain lines of policy. You send your Representative down to Washington because you think there he will carry out certain lines of policy. You have this one or that one elected to this office or that office because he represents, according to your view, some line of policy which it would be better for the Commonwealth or for the country to pursue. So far as the judges of your courts are concerned they stand on an entirely different footing. The judge may have his political views, he may have his socialist views, he may have his views as to this matter or that matter; but the moment he takes his seat upon the bench he ceases to be a politician, he ceases to be a socialist, he ceases to be a labor man, if he was one, and his only concern is to do justice between man and man. That is the difference, in a word, between your judges and your Governors and your Representatives and your Senators. And being there for the purpose of doing justice and nothing else between this man and that man and the other man, he should be, as our own Declaration of Rights says, "as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit." So it seems to me, without dwelling on the matter, that that is of itself a sufficient answer to any claim that has been put forward here that the judiciary of Massachusetts should be elected.

There is another reason. For nearly one hundred and forty years, — it has been alluded to and I refer to it again, — the judiciary of Massachusetts by common consent has been, — I hesitate for the word, — but certainly its situation, its position, its standing has been acknowledged by everybody in the Convention and is acknowledged by everybody outside of the State. I hesitate to go farther because I myself have been a member of it and I do not like to dwell too much on a matter of which I have been in times past a part.

Now what are the reasons, what are the reasons that are given for a change in the tenure of the office of the judiciary in Massachusetts? They boil down, it seems to me, to two. One is that you sometimes get an arrogant judge on the bench. Another is that sometimes a man stays on the court longer than he ought. Well, it is possible that a limited term may serve as a corrective in regard to those two things. But I wonder if my brethren of the bar stop to think for a moment of the situation of the judge before whom they are trying their case. He is one man, they are a hundred, a thousand, two thousand, all with causes before the court. Is it to be wondered at that now and then he loses his patience? Is it to be wondered at that he sometimes speaks to counsel or to a party or to anybody else in a manner which one gentleman perhaps should not use to another? Is it any wonder that once in a while a judge does not speak in the way in which he ought to? Are you going to change your system for a thing like that, a system that everybody agrees has worked well for nearly one hundred and forty years? He is arrogant, he is puffed up, you say, with pride of place. Does anybody make that charge seriously against the judiciary of Massachusetts? He may stay there too long, but is not that a thing that you can leave safely to the individual judge himself? Take the list of judges as shown in the Manual for the General Court; run it over. I begin with the Chief Justices in 1775: "Resigned," "Resigned," "Resigned." A judge on the bench realizes when he has reached the limit of his usefulness; and you will find if you will go over the record which the Manual of the General Court gives you, how few of the judges have died while they have been on the bench and how many of them have ceased to hold the office because they have resigned it. They did not wait until they had become incompetent to continue the duties of their office. Once in a while, I agree, a man has stayed there longer than he ought; but compared with the whole number of judges of Massachusetts, of whom there are, if I count right, somewhere from 270 to 300, counting the Justices of the lower courts and the special Justices, — take them as a whole, when they ought to get off they get off, and I think the record confirms that statement.

Then, do you know how long is the average term of the judges of courts of this Commonwealth? I took the Manual of the General Court in 1917 and I went through, according to that, the term for which the judges of Massachusetts had sat. I began with the Court of Common Pleas, existing from 1820 to 1859, when the Superior Court was established, and the average duration of the term of service of those judges was four years. What the reasons were which made that the average term for the Court of Common Pleas I do not know, I have not investigated; but if I have figured right that was the average length of their term.

Take the Superior Court, the great trial court of our Commonwealth, which was established in 1859. I computed the average down to 1917. There are members, of course, upon it now; I did not include those. The average of the others was eleven and three-fifths years. Leaving things to the course of nature, leaving the judiciary of Massachusetts just as it is and letting nature take its course, you will get only an average term of a little over ten years for the judges of that court. That is from 1859 up to the present time; and as I told you, I have gone back to 1820 with the Court of Common Pleas. I have taken the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court and have computed their service from 1775, when John Adams was appointed, down to 1917, and the average of service there was ten years. What is to be gained by limiting the tenure, as you propose to do, to ten years or five years or seven years, or in the case of the Supreme Judicial Court not at all?

There is a good deal more that can be said about this matter. But it does not seem to me, in the first place, that any necessity has been shown for this change. In the second place, it does not seem to me that it has been made to appear that it is going to result in an improvement of the judiciary of Massachusetts. And in the third place, which perhaps is included in the reasons that I already have given, it does not seem to me that the chances that you will get better men for the courts of the Commonwealth, if it is understood that a young lawyer at the end of five or seven or ten years, if he goes upon the bench and throws, as he must, his practice one side, may then be obliged to take it up again,—that you will stand the chance that you do now of getting good men upon the bench.

It is not in any one of these cases an appointment for life. It has been erroneously stated, inadvertently stated, that the judges hold for life. They do not, Mr. President; they hold during good behavior. And why should they not hold during good behavior? How can you make a judge so free, so impartial, so independent, as you can by saying to him when he puts on the judicial ermine: "Stay there, do your duty, deal justly so far as in you lies between the parties that come before you, and you need fear neither the politician nor any other power within the limits of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

[Applause.]

The amendment moved by Mr. Anderson of Newton was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Blackmur of Quincy,—to substitute a new draft as modified by Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston,—was adopted, by a vote of 107 to 69.

By a vote of 66 to 128, the Convention refused to reject the resolution as amended Tuesday, June 18, and it was ordered to a second reading (see No. 380).

The resolution was read a second time Thursday, July 25, 1918.

Mr. Paul R. Blackmur of Quincy moved that it be amended by substituting the following new draft:
Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

Article I of chapter III of part II of the Constitution is hereby amended by the addition of the following words: and provided also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may after due notice and hearing retire them because of advanced age or mental or physical disability. The General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired.

Mr. Blackmur: This substitute resolution which I now offer is in the nature of a perfected amendment with some slight changes in its provisions which I have adopted upon suggestion and after conference with the learned chairman of the committee on the Judiciary, Judge Morton of Fall River.

To begin with, the title of the resolution upon which we are acting, namely, "Resolution providing for the appointment of judges for specific terms," is, as you see, a misnomer. That was in fact the title of document No. 193 for which my resolution, document No. 380, was substituted, and therefore in the resolution now proposed I have described more accurately what follows as a "Resolution relative to the retirement of judicial officers."

Again, my resolution did not seek to take away any of the constitutional remedies for the retirement of judicial officers now in force, but to add a provision simple in its method and reasonably expeditious in its workings, which would permit the retirement of judicial officers incapacitated by advanced age, mental or physical disability; and so this resolution adds to the present provisions of the Constitution five lines:

and providing also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may after due notice and hearing retire them — meaning judicial officers before referred to in this article — because of advanced age or mental or physical disability.

And then follows the sentence:

The General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired.

It may be claimed that judicial officers may be retired now by the Governor with the consent of the Council upon an address to both Houses of the Legislature, and then a petition by the Legislature to the Governor and Council.

The Senate also, under Chapter I of Section II, Article VIII, upon impeachment may remove a judge from his office. Judge Prescott in 1821 was tried by the Senate as a court of impeachment and removed from the office of judge of probate for the county of Middlesex. Judge Loring, judge of the probate court for the county of Suffolk, and Joseph M. Day, judge of probate and insolvency for the county of Barnstable, were removed from office by the Governor and Council on address by the Legislature. Mr. Justice Bradbury, a judge of the Supreme Judicial Court, was removed in 1803 on account of disability. It appears that he was insane and the Governor and Council acted on an address by the Legislature.

It took over two years in both the cases of Judge Loring and Judge Day before their removal was effected, and in the case of Judge Bradbury, to be sure, not so long a period.

Judge Bradbury's case well illustrated what may happen in a case where it is perfectly obvious that the judge should not hold office longer. Mr. Justice Bradbury was insane. Should a similar case arise at the present time we would have to wait until the Legislature was in session, namely, some time next January, before a petition could be introduced. It would take months, probably, before the matter could be dealt with properly and an address sent to the Governor. Even after that the Governor and Council would have to take some time to act upon the matter properly and intelligently before it could be returned to the Legislature.

Under the proposed method the Governor and Council always would be available, although no one would expect them to act with undue haste. A case such as Judge Bradbury's arising at the present time might be determined so that a removal could be effected and an appointment made to fill the vacancy in time for the appointee to take up his judicial duties before the beginning of the court year in October. This would be impossible under the present methods.

In the proposed resolution you will observe that there has been inserted a provision suggested by my friend from Brookline in the second division (Mr. Williams), who offers an amendment printed in the calendar, namely, that as a prerequisite to action by the Governor and Council due notice and hearing must be given. The provision, which I have accepted, is placed there for two purposes: First, to prevent any judge being railroaded out of office without an opportunity of knowing in advance and having a hearing accorded him; and, further, to prevent the Governor and the Council from acting hastily or in possible collusion with any judge without notice and hearing of which the public should have some knowledge.

As to the other amendments printed in the calendar, I deal now with the amendment printed under the name of Mr. Swig of Taunton, the purpose of which is to strike out the words "advanced age, mental and physical disability" and to insert "mental, physical or judicial inability." I certainly do not advise that the Governor and Council should be the sole arbiters of the judicial capacity of our judicial officers after they have been appointed and have served in that capacity.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I appreciate the delegate's learned thesis on the judiciary, but he asked a question as to how we could tell whether a man was unfit temperamentally. Now I think we can answer it in this way: A judge who comes in Monday morning feeling cross and crabbed and railroaded everybody to jail on general principle, and the next morning comes in feeling good natured and lets all the guilty go scot free,—I think that is an indication that he temperamentally and judicially is unfit to perform the duties of his office.

Mr. Blackmur: The remarks which the gentleman offered in the guise of a question perhaps were not intended to be answered by me.

As to the amendment printed in the calendar under Mr. Bodfish's name, adding the words:

but no judge so retired shall receive out of any fund to which he has not contributed a pension exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum —

I cannot accept that personally, because I believe, in the first place, that it should be left entirely to the Legislature for action. It seems to me highly injudicious to adopt any yardstick to measure in all cases and for all times the proper or adequate compensation to be given all judges retired under this article at the present time and in the future. We all know that the purchasing power of a dollar yesterday looks like fifty cents to-day, and to-morrow or next day it more nearly may resemble the nimble quarter. I do not believe that we should lay down in the Constitution any proposition that $1,000 is the full measure of the compensation or pension of any judge, no matter what great service he may have rendered the Commonwealth.

Mr. Monroe of Fall River: The gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) has stated correctly my own attitude in regard to this matter. I think I may say also that, so far as I am informed, he has stated correctly the attitude of the committee on the Judiciary. The resolution which has been offered, and which he has read, meets my own approval. It meets a situation which, as the Constitution now stands, is not met as fully as it seems to me it should be. Therefore I venture to hope that it will be adopted in the shape in which the gentleman from Quincy has presented it, free from any of the amendments that have been offered.

Mr. David Mancovitz of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "Council," in line 3, the words "shall appoint all Justices of the police, district and municipal courts, or such other courts as the Legislature may establish in their place, for a term of seven years, and"

Mr. Mancovitz: Since the debate on this proposition some time ago, some delegates to the Convention have expressed the desire for opportunity to vote upon this question. A great many delegates believe in a change, but do not want to go so far as to change the entire system, affecting the Supreme Judicial Court and the Superior Court, but they do believe there ought to be a change in the present method of our inferior courts, as the municipal, the police and the district courts.

In examining the Constitution you will find nowhere a reference to municipal, police or district courts as a judicial office. The nearest to it we find in our Constitution is a reference made to the justices of the peace, who performed the functions of the present police, district and municipal courts. You will find the original Constitution provided that those officials, while they acted as judges, should be appointed for the term of seven years. There is no reason why the lower court judge, who deals with the great mass of the people, should not be appointed for a short term, so as to be kept in close touch with the people. I believe the amendment I offer at the present time meets the approval of a great many of the delegates. I do not seek to disturb the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur), in retiring the judges who become incompetent by reason of old age or mental incapacity or even judicial incapacity, as he well knows, and I well know, of men on the bench judicially unfit to hold the office, by temperament or otherwise. As is well said by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George), one may come into court and find a judge suffering from dyspepsia, and he will hang you, while after dinner he will regret it and give the next fellow the benefit of his doubt. I hope, therefore, that you will adopt this amendment.

Mr. Shea of Dalton: The gentleman who has just spoken on his amendment (Mr. Mancovitz) appeared before the committee on the Judiciary in favor of a resolution which was similar in many respects to the amendment which he now advocates. That committee gave him and a few others with like proposals all the time they wished and carefully considered the whole matter at great length. It is significant, and you doubtless will be interested to know, that there were very few who appeared before that committee urging the viewpoint of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancovitz). He told us, as he now tells you, that the reason the judges of district or lower courts ought to hold office for a term of years, instead of for life, is because these courts are very close to the people and, as far as I have observed, he never has advanced any other reason.

He is right in his premise that the lower courts are very close to the people, and it equally is true that for this reason alone they should assume just as much importance in our judiciary system as the higher courts,— and I believe more importance. It is self-evident that the fact that the lower courts are closer cannot be urged as a sound reason for shortening their tenure.

Your committee disapproved of the original proposition. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) meets with their favor,— nothing more and nothing less. They do not urge it, though they are willing to accept it if it is the sense of the Convention. I say we do not urge it, because there does not seem to be any need of such an amendment. As far as we could ascertain, our judges have retired at that time when they begin to feel themselves unable to perform their very arduous duties.

As to the question of unfitness, we think the amendment is vicious, because it cuts into the groundwork of the whole judiciary system. Who is going to say that a judge is unfit? You will bear in mind that before one can be appointed to the bench a Governor and Council must say he is fit. Would you permit the next Governor to say the same man is unfit? We believe this is a dangerous policy, because it affects the independence of the judiciary. It places each and every judge within the power of every Governor. We all are agreed it would be an excellent act to remove an unfit judge, but we fear the danger in the threat held over the heads of the judges. It may be real or fanciful in the minds of the judges, but in either case it might interfere with a just decision. It was for these reasons, with others given at stages of the debates on other judiciary resolutions, that your committee is opposed to these amendments affecting the short terms of the judges of the lower courts and the amendment directed toward the fitness of all judges.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: It seems to be necessary to jump up quickly in order to be able to prevent the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Chandler) from being recognized to move his customary previous question. I regret that the gentleman from Somerville feels it necessary so often to move the previous question, particularly on subjects that have not been debated thoroughly. It seems to me particularly unfortunate that on a question so important and far-reaching as that concerning the judiciary, there should be any display of impatience or any desire to have it gotten out of the way without an adequate and complete discussion; and members of this Convention, even though they disagree with me, must admit that there has been an effort on the part of those who are opposed to any change in the judiciary to shut off and prevent the question from being properly presented. It does not seem to be the right thing to do.

The whole history in this Commonwealth of questions that have affected the judiciary seems to be mixed up and disposed of through some legislative chicanery as though men were afraid, for some mysterious reason, to discuss the question. All I ask is that ample time be given to every one to present his views on this subject.

I have talked twice before, and I am not going to tire this Convention by rehearsing what I already have said on the prior occasions. Two amendments have been offered by me, and at the present time I move them both. The first one that I wish to discuss is as follows: It will amend the proposed amendment to the Constitution by striking out lines 3 to 6 inclusive, and by inserting in place thereof the following:

All judicial officers shall be nominated and appointed by the Governor by or with the consent of the Council for a term of ten years, and they may be reappointed at the expiration of such term.

This subject has not been voted on in this form before, owing to the legislative practice that has prevailed in this Convention, and it would seem as though gentlemen who may have honest doubts as to the desirability of an appointed judiciary should be able to have the subject adequately presented to them that they may be given an opportunity of expressing themselves upon it by a vote. I discussed the question of an appointive judiciary last summer during the debate on the initiative and referendum, and my views are well known to you and are incorporated in Volume 2 of the debates of this Convention, and may be found on page 970, so that it is unnecessary for me to repeat them now.

Permit me, however, to call your attention to a few salient facts. Forty-three States in this Union elect all their judges and the balance use the appointive system; and to repeat again, Massachusetts is the only State that has a system of life tenure. No one wants an unfit judge and none of us desires a judge who is incapable of performing the great, honorable and important work that is imposed upon him when he receives a commission as a judge. As I pointed out in the first reading of this resolution, at first it was decided by the Convention of 1780 to recommend to the people that the judges holding commissions below that of the Supreme Judicial Court should hold their commissions for a limited tenure. Subsequently, this provision was reconsidered and by the small vote of 62 out of 86 members, although the whole membership was 400, as is disclosed on page 116 of the journal of the Convention of 1780, when it was voted that they should hold their commissions for life. I am calling this to your attention in this manner in demonstration that there was not a dominant feeling that judges of lower courts should hold their commissions for life. The system did not work satisfactorily and in 1853 the Convention of that year passed a resolution identical with the one which I have just offered. However, it was contained in proposition No. 1 which was submitted to the people and which contained the entire form of government that was submitted to the people so that the people never had an opportunity of voting on the concrete proposition as to what they desired in reference to the judiciary. Proposition No. 1 on which they voted contained 13 pages of closely printed matter and the vote on the question was 63,222 in favor, as against 68,150 opposing. The principal reason why proposition No. 1 of the Convention of 1853 was not adopted by the people was that the question of representation became the over-shadowing and all-important feature of the proposition because the plan that was submitted lessened the representation which the little towns throughout the State, particularly on the Cape and up in the western part of the State, had at that time. These little communities feared that in the cutting down of their representation, they would lose much of their power and be neglected by the superior representation from the larger towns and cities. If it had not been for that one particular feature that unfortunately was incorporated into proposition No. 1, the whole proposition would have been accepted by an overwhelming majority, according to the best opinion of those who analyzed the situation at that time. Let me remind the members that this is a subject that the people thoroughly understand and will not be confused as to its meaning. If the people were permitted to vote on it, there would be less misunderstanding as to whatever they may say than upon any other question that we can submit, because it will be less technical and not susceptible of any misunderstanding. Why, a short time after this subject was considered at the time of its prior reading, there was a meeting of the board of trade of one of our neighboring cities,—a city known to be conservative and that has sent men to this Convention mostly of the Republican faith. The local judge evidently had followed the debates in the Convention rather closely and had asked his clerk to find out from the members of this Convention what they had against the judge, inasmuch as they voted in favor of the resolution which would change the system. The clerk asked one of the delegates and was told that the delegate had nothing against the judge personally, but that he believed in the suggested change in system and was convinced that judges should be responsible to the people, and on that principle alone he had so voted. The conversation between the delegate and the clerk of court was overheard by some of the other members of the board of trade and it became a very interested and animated subject for consideration and discussion; and in that very gathering of business men, not one of whom was a politician but composed of men who were looking for the best interest of their community, there was not a dissenting voice among all those present, except the clerk, but that judges ought to be appointed for a limited tenure. Those business men felt that the judges should be responsible to the people, just the same as all other officers are, and let me remind you gentlemen that, although that may be a single straw, nevertheless, it indicates the way in which the mind of the people is working, and regardless of political faith the voters of this Commonwealth are nearly of one mind on this great question. Discuss the subject with any man who is not a lawyer or a judge, and he will tell you immediately that he cannot understand why there should be any law that should put a man practically above the law by giving him a life appointment.

The people believe in a limited tenure; they have confidence in their own sovereign judgment; they desire that their judges shall be responsible to them. They do not wish men to sit in the position of judge such as has been described here as cranks and who may get up one morning with a sick headache and dispose of a certain kind of a case by giving a criminal the maximum sentence, while on the next day, feeling entirely different, the same kind of a criminal would be given his freedom. Inhabitants of this State want exact justice, and they demand that there be given to them the very highest form of administration of justice.

Let us adopt this resolution and change our present system to that of a limited tenure. No good judge will be denied reappointment by any Governor. No Governor would dare refuse reappointment to any good judge. The people would not tolerate it. The proposed system, however, would keep the judges in a state of mind whereby they would endeavor and strive at all times to do the very best that was within them, and when a judge tries to do his best, we all know that the people will honor and applaud him and sustain him against any power or cabal or combination in this Commonwealth, be it religious, political, financial or racial. A ten-year term for our judges with the possibility of reappointing will insure greater care on the part of the Governor who makes the appointment. It will guarantee that those who are appointed judges will improve every minute of their time in perfecting themselves and will reasonably justify us in believing that at all times we will have the very best possible talent sitting in judgment of the lives and property of the people of this Commonwealth. May I not remind the members of the Convention that as far as the clerks of the court are concerned, we have them elected for the Superior and the Supreme Judicial Courts, whereas in all lower courts, they are appointed by the Governor for a limited tenure? And surely the clerks of our courts have been just as efficient as have the judges, if not more so. Every practicing lawyer knows that the judges of our lower courts rely to a very great extent on their clerks for council and advice in running the courts. No one has been heard to raise a cry that there has been any abuse of the power of the Governor in appointing for a limited tenure all the clerks of all the lower courts in this Commonwealth. And it is a successful practice as far as it concerns the clerks. Is it not fair to argue that it would be just as fair and satisfactory if it was applied to the judges? It is unfortunate that we have so many lawyers in this Convention, because as a rule lawyers do not come forward with that bravery and courage in the expression of their individual opinion as it concerns the judges before whom they practice, as they really should. They are unfair to themselves but more particularly to the judges. It has been well said that the curse of great leaders is the sycophancy of courtiers; and by the same token, much of the weakness of our judges is the flattery and the subservience of lawyers who are appearing before them and who hope, by their flattery and their subservience, to secure some little favor from those judges. Such an attitude does no credit to the legal profession, and undoubtedly is one of the reasons why people are so reluctant to go to court. Every practicing member in this Convention has encountered, time after time, people in all walks of life who are afraid to go to court to present their claims because of a feeling of distrust against the courts and those who are administering justice. I need not mention the many instances of the expression of popular distrust of the courts, other than to call attention to two historical instances.
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

In the fifteenth century, Jack Cade came to London with his army from Kent, and as soon as he crossed the river he said: "Kill all the lawyers," and again: "Some of you go to the temple and tear down the Inns of Court;" and they did tear them down and they burned the valuable library that had been gathered together after years of care and toil and that has been an irreparable loss to English jurisprudence. We once had a rebellion here in Massachusetts known to history as Shays's Rebellion, and the battle cry was "Close the Courts!" The spirit of unrest which has hovered over this country for the past twenty years is very sensitive about the courts. The masses of the people have felt that great wealth dominates our judges through its ability to employ adroit, clever lawyers who are able to hoodwink and influence the courts in favor of their powerful clients. Where there is so much smoke there must be some fire. Let us not, then, pass this subject by without profound reflection. Do not ignore a real demand on the part of the people. It must be admitted that there is unquestionably a very large number of people who would like to vote on this question; and if there is a large portion of our people who desire to vote on this question, it is the duty of this Convention to give them an opportunity of doing so. The gentleman from Quincy, during the debate on this subject at its last stage, quoted John Boyle O'Reilly, the beloved Irish poet, exile, and lover of Massachusetts and her institutions. Let me in closing also quote O'Reilly to you:

Do not be deceived. Put your ear down to the rich earth, and listen to the vast gurgling blood of humanity, and learn whither it strives to flow and what and where are its barriers. This is the culture worth getting, the culture that wins the love and shout of millions instead of the gush and drivel of tens. Love and hope and strength and good are all in the crowd,—and not in the diluted blood of aesthetic critics.

Mr. Williams of Brookline: I offer the amendment printed under my name in the calendar, but in the event of the substitute of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) being adopted, then I shall ask the privilege of withdrawing it.

The amendment moved by Mr. Williams was to insert after the word "may," in line 4, the words "on due notice and hearing."

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: I wish to make just one observation, and it will take only a word or two. In speaking a few moments ago regarding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Mancovitz), the gentleman from Dalton who sits directly behind him (Mr. Shea) said that there had been very little to show any need for the suggestion. He said the cases are very few in which there is any incompetency in the minor judicial officers. I am not quoting him exactly, of course, but you will recall his words, very likely, more nearly than I do.

I wish to submit to the Convention, for its careful consideration, the suggestion that if the cases are very few,—of course they are very few,—if the cases are very few, but still exist, that it is the business of this Convention to give very careful thought to the curing of the very few cases. If there is any way in which we can bring the judicial system of our Commonwealth a little nearer perfection,—and I am glad to express my confident belief that it is very near perfection now,—if there is any way that we can bring it nearer to perfection we ought to find that way. I take it that the question regarding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Mancovitz) is simply this: Whether, in the judgment of the delegates in this Convention, the adoption of a term of office limited to seven years, or any number of years, will have a tendency to lead men of ability and skill, such as we desire to see in that office, to decline to serve. It may be that that is so, and that therefore the adoption of such an amendment probably would reduce the capacity and the standard of that judicial office. On the other hand, if it be true that the adoption of the term of office of seven years, if that be the proper term, — the number of years is perhaps not very important, — the adoption of a limited term of office will enable any Governor having charge of the appointment of judges to correct the mistakes of his predecessor, and to see that a man who has not been doing good work is replaced by a better man, then we should vote in favor of that amendment.

After thinking the matter over, and giving to both sides balanced attention, so far as I am able to do it, I have reached the conclusion that the suggestion I have just made is more likely to be correct: that the possibility of making a change when an office is not well filled is more to the advantage of filling the office well than the possible deterring of men from accepting the office by the fact that the term of office is limited. I shall be very glad, therefore, to give my vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston in the first division.

Mr. MOYNIHAN of Boston: I shall not hold the Convention long. I have had seventeen years' experience in the courts of this Commonwealth, and I have sat in this Convention and listened day in and day out to different members talk of how well our forefathers had builded when they gave us this original Constitution. They did build well, and in that building they said that judicial officers should hold tenure for good behavior, and I believe in that. But at that time, when they builded, they spoke of justices of the peace, and this is their language:

In order that the people may not suffer from the long continuance in place of any justice of the peace who shall fail of discharging the important duties of his office with ability or fidelity, all commissions of justices of the peace shall expire and become void in the term of seven years from their respective dates; and, upon the expiration of any commission, the same may, if necessary, be renewed, or another person appointed, as shall most conduces to the well-being of the Commonwealth.

Now, let us follow out the analogy of the forefathers. They knew at that time, as well as we know now, that they wanted to keep those higher courts away from the electorate or the people. They felt therefore that the higher courts should be appointed for a tenure of good behavior. But what are our lower courts? Are they not simply the outgrowth of the justices of the peace? The police court to-day is nothing more or less than the justice of the peace of the days of our forefathers, because as we became more cosmopolitan we have substituted for the justice of the peace a trial court. It is a justice of the peace as our forefathers knew it, under a new name.

If our forefathers builded well, why should not we emulate their example? I, for one delegate, have absolute confidence in the Governors whom I have known in my experience in this Commonwealth.
I say to this Convention, and I say to you in all sincerity, that there is not a Governor whom I ever have known who would remove a good man and put a bad man in his place, in any judicial position, even in the position of justice of the peace. Therefore if you are going to be consistent, if you are going to vote on this proposition as you think in private, I know that the sense of this Convention will be that the amendment of the gentleman in the first division, limiting the tenure of office for judges of police and trial courts to seven years, will be adopted.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: When I gave notice that I should move the amendment printed under my name I did it for the purpose of clearing up the situation, for the Convention then had acted on the question of pensions in three different proposals, from three different points of view. Those who recall what I had to say when the report of the committee on Social Insurance was being considered will know that I do not favor this limitation which appears in the amendment which I have given notice that I should move. The situation that I wish to clear up is this: When we were considering the question of limited tenure of judicial offices we showed a disposition not to fix any specific age for the retirement of judges. We did recognize, however, that there were cases when judges held on too long, and it was to reach those cases that the proposition before us was adopted. But we did not adopt that until we had coupled with it the provision that the General Court might provide pensions for judges so retired.

I submit that it lay in my mind, as I think it must have lain in the minds of most of you, that such pensions as were contemplated then by us were to be adequate pensions, pensions like those which had been granted to judges now retired. That being the case, it seemed to me that our subsequent action should be brought into contrast with it. I think we realize the difficulty of getting Governors to remove judges; and to make Governors less reluctant to remove judges, and to make judges less reluctant to be removed, we thought that the provision of an adequate pension might help the situation out. But we came to No. 279, and then we adopted a resolution to prevent class distinctions and special privileges, limiting the pensions to $1,000 a year.

These two propositions are in conflict. I will not take time to discuss No. 279, because this morning it has been discharged from the calendar and recommitted to the committee. But we still have the proposition of a pension to deal with under No. 280, the report of the committee on Social Insurance. My point of view as to constitutional matters was referred to this morning by the delegate from Lexington (Mr. Clapp). Such views as I hold can be found expressed by such leading Americans as Washington, Marshall and Lincoln. I agree with the suggestion found in those words which Washington put into a letter to a friend, in which he said:

To me it is a most extraordinary thing in nature that we should have confederated as a Nation and yet be afraid to give to the rulers of that Nation, who are the creatures of our making, and who are amenable to us, sufficient power to direct and order the affairs of the same.

I would give to the executive sufficient power to administer the laws. I would not give him control over legislation. It is at this point that I disagree with the English system. Likewise I would give to the Legislature full and complete authority to deal with those questions whose solution depends upon constantly changing conditions, such as pensions, insurance and compensation. I do not think we ought to deal at all with the question of pensions in connection with this proposition. I think the whole matter after the word "disability" should be stricken out, and that the question of pensions, insurance and compensation should be dealt with in a comprehensive amendment such as that which I have recommended under No. 280, and which you will find printed in the calendar to-day under my name.

With this statement, I think the Convention will understand the purpose I had in mind, and therefore I shall not move my amendment. I ask permission to withdraw it.

Mr. Montague of Boston: I am very much opposed to any change in the method of the selection of our judges here in Massachusetts, but I long have thought there ought to be a somewhat easier way for the removal of a judge who has become incapacitated, but who does not know it, or, in a few cases, who is unfit to hold the position. Therefore I am in favor of the resolution now before the Convention allowing the Governor and Council to make such removals. It is hard to see just where we are at with this resolution and the various amendments. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Williams), which provides for a hearing, is fair. It also seems to me that the amendment by the gentleman from Boston, Mr. O'Connell, — the first amendment, not the one he talked about, but the first amendment, which brings in some word like "unfitness," — perhaps that is not the right word, but some word of that kind, — is a desirable one to have.

With reference to the pensions, it seems to me better to leave that matter as the resolution now has it, allowing the General Court to provide pensions, for this reason: I can conceive of a man being removed from the position of judge who deserves no pension at all, even $1,000 or $600 or anything else. I believe in leaving it to the Legislature to provide the pension, if any. That is the way it stands now. I would not make removal necessarily carry a pension.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: Does the gentleman understand that the substitute resolution which I offered when this matter came before the Convention to-day contains the very words of Mr. Williams' amendment, namely, only after "due notice and hearing" shall be given?

Mr. Montague: I did understand that, but it seemed to me that the resolution of the gentleman from Quincy contained some things which made it less simple to me than the way I have put it. But if the Convention understands that that is so, if the amendment of the gentleman from Quincy contains the exact thing that I have suggested, that is entirely satisfactory to me, unless it has something in it — which I thought it did — which I did not like.

On the whole issue, I suppose every lawyer of any such number of years' practice as I have to plead guilty to, came to this Convention with his mind made up on the general proposition of how our judges should be selected. I did; and I do not see how any man who has practiced many years could fail to have arrived at a conclusion before he came here. My practice, although small compared to that of many lawyers in this Convention, has happened to lead me into many different States of the Union; I think at least one-half. One thing that led me to make up my mind before I came here was the unanimity of opinion among the lawyers whom I met in those various States as to the wisdom of the Massachusetts method of the selection of judges. I never have met a lawyer in any of those States who did not speak with the highest respect and approval of the method of Massachusetts, and who did not wish there was the same system in his State. I think most of our lawyers have had the same experience, wherever they have been.

There is one argument, to my mind, in favor of the election or appointment of judges for limited terms, and that is that it would help the lawyers.

Take the amendment of the gentleman (Mr. Mancovitz) with ref-ERENCE to municipal court judges. The thing that would happen would be that a young fellow would get on the bench, stay during the term, go off, and, with the added prestige, earn more money than he probably could earn if he had been on the bench. I think that would be true also of the higher courts. In fact, one lawyer spoke to me, and hoped that I would favor the method because it would tend to increase the fees which the lawyers might earn, and he cited New York, where he said the custom was for a man to go on the bench, and then when he went off if he was wise and made friends while he was on the bench, he would go off the bench and make three or four times as much as he could if he never had been on; and that tended to raise the whole level of the fees of the profession. I think there is something in that. But your committee on Judiciary preferred to recommend what in its opinion would be the best thing for the people as a whole, those who have the necessity to go to the courts, rather than what might be to the advantage of the lawyers who practise in the courts.

Mr. George of Haverhill moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Black-mur be amended by striking out, at the end thereof, the words "The General Court may provide pensions for judges so retired" and inserting in place thereof the words "upon the terms and conditions that may be provided by law for the voluntary retirement of judicial officers."

Mr. George: I do not rise for the purpose of attacking the judiciary. During the past twenty-five years, every time I have had an opportunity to vote on a proposition that had a tendency to weaken our judiciary, I always have voted against it. I am opposed to the election of judges of the Supreme Judicial Court or the Superior Court. I do not believe that we should attempt to remove politics from the appointment of judges by putting the judges into the elective system, where politics would be the determining factor in choosing a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court or the Superior Court. But I must confess that there are some objections to the present situation. Now and then there have been men appointed to the bench, especially to the lower courts, who have been unfit temperamentally. We all know what they do in every other line of business where they find a man who is unfit. If he was in the postoffice, selling stamps at a window, and he continually was getting into trouble with everybody who wanted to buy a three-cent stamp, they would put him somewhere else. If he was in any other walk of life and constantly in trouble, such as a conductor on a street railway car, they would find a place to put that man. But if he once gets on the bench there is no way of getting rid of him. He stays.

While we have had exceptionally good judges on the Supreme bench, I wish I could say the same thing about the Superior Court and feel that it was true. There have been appointees who by their very conduct have injured the standing of the court. Every time you have a judge on either the Superior Court or a lower court, whose conduct is such that it brings constant criticism and contempt, you injure the court. One judge of that kind will do more mischief than a dozen or fifteen good judges possibly can do. I think that there ought to be a way to get rid of a man who is unfit temperamentally. Therefore this resolution does not go far enough, but I think it can be amended on the next stage.

My amendment proposes this. The delegate from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) insists that we shall say here that these judges, so removed or so retired, shall receive a pension. I should like to know where else in the Constitution you can find any such statement about any court or any judges. We have another proposition here, which is coming up later, which may change the whole aspect of the question of pensions. Suppose we decide that the judges ought not to have pensions; then the judge who voluntarily resigns cannot have a pension, but the old judge who stays on, — and probably they all will stay on until they are removed, — then he could draw a pension if the proposal of the gentleman was accepted.

I propose to strike out that part where it says this particular kind of judge shall receive a pension, and say that those judges, when they are forced to retire, can retire upon the same terms and conditions that may be provided by law for the voluntary retirement of judicial officers. If they do pay pensions to judges who voluntarily retire, then the Legislature may provide for the judge who is removed by the Governor and Council. On the other hand, if there is no pension paid to a judge who voluntarily retires from the bench, then the judge who does not know enough to get off when he is told to will have to get off without a pension. In other words, my suggestion does not bring pensions into the Constitution.

I am in favor of the independence of the judiciary. That is a much misunderstood word. A man can be a gentleman if he is independent. He is not obliged to be mulish. A man is not obliged to be arrogant and set himself against reason in order to show his independence. The independent judge whom we want on the bench is the man who is willing to listen, the judge with an open mind, who will hear all the facts and without outside influence judicially determine the case with equity and right between the parties. That is the kind of independence we want.

We do not want to go so far as to say that we do not dare to settle this proposition. It is our business to settle it. I know there are 150 lawyers in this Convention; I assume that they will have a controlling vote on this proposition. It is up to them to give such reasonable latitude that a Governor and Council may retire a man whose presence on the bench is objected to by reason of his being temperamentally unfit or mentally unsound.
Mr. Underhill of Somerville: The Convention made up its mind some weeks ago as to what it is going to do about the judiciary; consequently I move the previous question.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: In regard to this question I somewhat agree with the last speaker, that the Convention probably already has made up its mind, but I have one word to say on the subject. It will not be very long.

I have known the judiciary of Massachusetts in all its gradations for nearly fifty years. During that time I may say that I never have known a man on the bench who, however I might feel about his capacity, I thought was unfit to be a judge; that is to say, who morally was not fit to be a judge. On the whole, I know no class of men who have inspired me with a greater respect than our judges. But I wish to say that there is no human being in the world who I imagine is incapable of improvement; that is to say, who can do, if he is not under pressure, as well as he can if he is under a certain amount of pressure. You take every profession with which I ever have had to do, and the body of that profession I think always improves if it is put under a certain amount of pressure.

For example, I remember when I was a young man promotion in the army and navy went entirely by seniority. Now the officers in the army and navy have to perform a certain amount of service, to show a certain fitness, before they can be advanced in rank. I have no doubt that that has improved the quality of the service. I myself have no doubt also that the officers of the army of the United States rank higher, as a rule, than those in any other service in the world. I have seen officers in many services, and I do not think that there is any class of men in the service of any government who rank higher than our officers do.

You may take our professors, the professors in our colleges. Take, for instance, Harvard College. I have known professors of Harvard College now for many years. They are as a whole men of eminent qualities. I have the highest respect for them. But I do conceive that they have been improved by the measures which have been introduced during my lifetime, which have given them a limited term of service. That limit is not fixed for the purpose of driving them out of the service; it exists not for any such reason as that. It is put on as a kind of stimulant, and it is the sort of stimulant that I am inclined to think is advantageous for us all. And I do think that if the same stimulant were applied to our judiciary it probably would improve it in all its parts. It is not that you want to get rid of your judges, but it is that you would give them something to look forward to, some standard to maintain, in the future.

Mr. Balch of Boston: With all the foregoing debate on the subject of the judiciary, I have not had an opportunity to make my position clear, but I wish now to make a few remarks confined to the revamped proposition for seven-year and ten-year judges. My friend from Boston in the first division (Mr. Mancovitz), responsible for the proposition for seven-year judges, has introduced us to his honorable friend the well-known judge, who will hang us if it happens to be before lunch or acquit us if it happens to be after lunch. Now I wish in my turn to introduce you to an equally well-known character. I refer, of course, to the judge who will hang us if we happen to be Democrats and acquit us if we happen to be Republicans. I desire to point out a little, simple, mathematical proposition applicable to these two famous judges. With the judge who hangs us before lunch and acquits us after lunch any one of us coming before the courts, no matter before what judge we are tried, will stand what is called in the slang of the day at least a 50-50 chance; but if we have come before our honorable friend the judge who hangs us if we are Democrats and acquits us if we are Republicans we may not stand any chance at all, and if the whole bench happened to be filled with these well-known gentlemen, no matter which judge we came before or at what time of day, we might not stand any chance at all.

I do not need to point out to this Convention that neither of these judges any more exists in nature than the unicorn or the hippogriff. They are purely imaginary monsters. Nevertheless, behind this little piece of nonsense there is a cold basis of hard common sense. The erratic, crotchety judge is a very real evil when he exists; but as an evil he is not to be mentioned in the same breath with the permanently, politically or economically biased judge. From one there may be escape; from the other there is no escape whatever. I trust, and feel the utmost confidence, that this Convention, in voting on this question, will continue to show the same sturdy common sense it has shown hitherto when faced with the proposition of making an inroad on our ancient liberties as protected by the judge insulated from the current of the political passions of his time. We have had it proposed before to remove the insulation entirely; it is now proposed merely to crack it. I trust the Convention will not even crack the insulation.

Mr. Whipple of Brookline: We are facing a somewhat exceptional situation, and one which is of great importance. Nothing can be worse for the Commonwealth than a want of confidence in its administration of justice, and a want of confidence exists and has been voiced. It is necessary for us, if we can, to ascertain and to remove the cause. It is very difficult to do this. Perhaps it is impossible to analyze correctly all the contributing causes, but one cause, as it has seemed to me, is this, growing out of our system of appointment of judges to hold their office during life or good behavior. That results in what I may call a residuum of judicial incumbents. It cannot be disputed that the large mass, the larger number of our judges, are men of the highest character, honesty, integrity, and of honest purpose. I do not think too much can be said of the character of the judges who have occupied judicial positions in our Commonwealth. Once appointed, the sense of responsibility seems to change them, so that men who in practice have not shown judicial qualities or even shown the highest qualities of character, when once charged with that responsibility have discharged the office of judge with high credit to themselves and to the Commonwealth. But this has happened: Men accustomed to the use of uncurbed power and temperamentally unfitted for the judicial office soon get these mannerisms, — sometimes something worse than mannerisms, and display temperamentally unfitness. Under our system there is no way of getting rid of this residuum. They are not bad enough in their conduct so that they could be impeached; it would be heartless and cruel to do it, or to make charges which could be the basis of impeachment.
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

This measure, it seems to me, is the best solution under our present system of selection whereby men who have proved themselves to be incapacitated, or temperamentally unfit, may be swiftly and speedily removed. I think, however, that we may well consider whether an amendment which has been suggested by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell) ought not to be included, because it is not always from the judges who are of advanced age or mental or physical incapacity, it is not from those men that we have the great difficulty; it is from men who are temperamentally unfit, whose manners are intolerable, — and we know them. We do not speak their names, we know them. Conscientious men, just men, with high ideals, but temperamentally presenting characteristics which make them intolerable, they bring into disrepute the whole bench, they shake confidence in the administration of justice.

Mr. McAnaney of Quincy: The gentleman from Brookline in the fourth division (Mr. Whipple) says that there is to-day in this Commonwealth a want of confidence in our courts. I deny the correctness of that statement. In my opinion there is not to-day a lack of confidence in our courts. It is true, however, there has been from time to time dissatisfaction expressed with reference to some of the decisions of our courts, such dissatisfaction being addressed against the law which the judge declares, and not the judge. There is a vast difference between a feeling based upon dissatisfaction with the law which the court, in the performance of its duty, is compelled to declare, and a want of confidence in the courts. It has been urged that the adoption of a limited tenure would improve our judiciary. Let me state that when this matter was before the Judiciary Committee gentlemen who now are urging this resolution, with but one exception, came before the committee, and in every instance the cases to which they directed our attention were those of judges of the lower courts. They spoke of judges who, after serving a long period of years, became arbitrary. It was stated such judges could not be removed, because nobody wanted to have them impeached or removed by address, and therefore there was no remedy. These views led to the resolution which has been brought before this Convention by my able colleague from Quincy in the second division (Mr. Blackmur). If his resolution is adopted, we shall have an easy method of removing judges who have become incapacitated by reason of advanced age or physical or mental impairment. I think it is a mistake to forget that the lower courts are important factors in the well-being of every community in which they are located. Judges of the lower courts are the judges having to do with the shaping of the policy of those communities with reference to the maintenance of law and order. They are the judges who have to do with the wayward youth of the community. They are the judges who from the ripeness of their experience and years upon the bench know best how to deal with these young offenders so as to make of them useful citizens, and the words that they utter upon the bench are likely to be remembered and every year adds value to the service which they are rendering the Commonwealth. If I had my say and I were confronted with the proposition of limiting the tenure of office of Superior Court judges or that of lower court judges, I would prefer the unlimited terms for the lower courts and the limited one for the Superior Court, because I believe that the lower court judges, who are connected intimately with the life of the community, are judges who ought to be on the bench so long as they are physically and mentally capable of performing their duties, and they should be protected in the fearless discharge of the functions of their office.

Mr. Whipple: May I ask the gentleman whether he would object to the insertion of the word "unfitness" in the measure suggested by the gentleman from Quincy in the second division (Mr. Blackmur) so as to make it possible that judges who temperamentally were unfitted should be removed from office upon application to the Governor and Executive Council?

Mr. McAnarney: That can be offered at the next stage. It requires careful thought. What do you mean by unfitness? Do you mean if a lawyer becomes dissatisfied with a judge's decision, or the exercise of his discretion in a given case, that notwithstanding the Supreme Judicial Court on exceptions may sustain the judge's ruling, he may be charged with unfitness and forced to defend himself before the Governor and Council?

Were we to put the word "unfitness" into this amendment without any words defining it or limiting it, we would be acting unwisely.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: The gentleman from Springfield in the third division (Mr. Kilbon) in speaking of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancovitz) in the first division, spoke about a judge's appointment for a definite term having influence on men taking position on the bench. I just want to quote two very brief extracts regarding the State of New Jersey, where the appointive term is seven years. There the Chancellor is appointed for seven years, and the assistant chancellors are appointed also for terms of seven years. The first quotation is from the document prepared by the commission that compiles information for the Convention:

Chancellors are appointed by the Governor with the approval of the Senate for a term of seven years. The court now consists of a Chancellor and seven Vice Chancellors, who sit separately in different parts of the State. The Vice Chancellors are appointed for seven-year terms. That bench is regarded generally as the strongest in the State, and has given entire satisfaction to the bar and public.

My next quotation is from the address of Governor Fort of New Jersey delivered in Boston some three years ago:

Take the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey, if you will. For thirty years the Democratic party had power in New Jersey consecutively. During that time no Democratic Governor ever appointed a Democrat to succeed a Republican on the Supreme bench. For the next fifteen years the Republican party of New Jersey had the power, until the coming of President Wilson, who succeeded me as Governor. During that fifteen years no Republican Governor ever put a Republican in place of a Democrat upon the Supreme bench. And I want to say another thing to you. It may not be so in New York, but I was Governor of New Jersey for an entire term and I appointed seven of the nine Supreme Court judges, and I can say to-night that no man in New Jersey, Democrat or Republican, ever asked me to make an appointment to the Supreme Court. That is the history of our Supreme Court.

And I wish to say, gentlemen, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancovitz) simply asks for appointment for a seven-year term for our lower court judges. I think we have this evidence of the success of the practice in another Commonwealth, and we are entirely justified in adopting an amendment of that sort. I think we need have no fear as to the character of the appointments or the reappointments that may be made. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman will prevail.

The amendment moved by Mr. Mancovitz of Boston was rejected, by a vote of 42 to 99.

The amendment moved by Mr. Williams of Brookline was adopted.

The first amendment moved by Mr. O'Connell of Boston, — inserting after the word "age," in line 4, the word "unfitness," — was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 94 to 96.

The second amendment moved by Mr. O'Connell of Boston, — striking out lines 3 to 6, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following: "All judicial officers shall be nominated and appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Council, for a term of ten years; and they may be reappointed at the expiration of such term," — was rejected, by a vote of 38 to 104.

The amendment moved by Mr. George of Haverhill to the new draft moved by Mr. Blackmur of Quincy was adopted, by a vote of 71 to 58.

The new draft moved as a substitute by Mr. Blackmur of Quincy, as thus amended (see No. 405), was then adopted by the Convention; and it was ordered to a third reading, July 25.

It was read a third time Tuesday, August 6, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology, as follows (No. 413):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

2. Article I of Chapter III of Part II of the Constitution is hereby amended by the addition of the following 3. words: — and provided also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may after due notice and hearing retire them because of advanced age or mental or physical disability. Such retirement shall be subject to any provisions made by law as to pensions or allowances payable to such officers upon their voluntary retirement.

Mr. Maguire of Boston: I move both amendments offered under my name in the calendar.

The amendments were as follows:

To amend the resolution by adding at the end thereof the following:

And provided further that the Governor by and with the consent of the Council may remove any judge for incompetence in the discharge of his official duties after giving him an opportunity of being heard and of being represented by counsel in his own defence.

Also by adding at the end of the resolution the following:

The judges of the Supreme Court and the Superior Court, and the probate courts, and the land courts, and the district courts, and the police courts shall be elected by the people for a term of seven years. The names of the candidates for the judges of the aforesaid courts shall be placed upon the ballot at the regular State elections in alphabetical order without party or other designations except the title of the office. The General Court shall determine the qualifications of said candidates as to age, experience and length of membership at the bar.

Mr. Maguire: In offering the amendment which provides for the removal of a judge for incompetence in the discharge of his official duties the object I have in mind is the improvement of the judiciary.
Most classes of people are checked up in some way. For instance, if the clergy fail to satisfy their congregations they are removed. If physicians are incompetent they cease to have patients. If lawyers are inefficient they no longer have clients. But if the members of the judiciary are incompetent, there is no relief for the people; their commissions are for life, there is no way of removing them.

At the last stage the word "unfit" was objected to because it was too broad. "Incompetence", it seems to me, applies more particularly to the judge in the performance of his official duties. In other words, it is well known what incompetence may mean. An incompetent teacher means one who fails to perform his duties in a satisfactory manner.

When this matter was up for discussion before, my good friend from Quincy in this division (Mr. McAnarney) spoke about the several hearings on this subject before the committee on the Judiciary. He referred to the fact that several members of the Convention who spoke in favor of an elective judiciary referred to some judges almost by name as being incompetent or unfit. He said they did not really criticize the appointive system. The answer to him is that a system that produces bad judges or poor judges or incompetent judges or judges who are complained of in the very vigorous manner that the delegates to the Convention complained of them, seems to me to be subject to a very vital objection. It endangers the administration of justice.

The amendment really needs little argument to support it. The Convention hardly will be willing to say that an incompetent judge should be allowed to remain on the bench. At any rate I believe we all are opposed to mental incompetency. There are many empty vessels on the bench, and it is impossible to reach them, it is impossible to remove them, unless we have some constitutional provision like the amendment which I have offered.

Now for the amendment providing for the election of the judiciary on a non-partisan basis. There was a rather singular thing in connection with our hearings of the Judiciary Committee, and that was the presence of the attorney for the Boston Elevated Railway Company. It seems to me that his presence there was a matter that should have brought objection from my friend from Quincy. Yet on the whole the presence of that corporation lawyer was not out of place, perhaps, because since the last Constitutional Convention, in 1853, the growth of public service corporations, and their interference with legislative matters, in fact all matters pertaining to government, have been so great a scandal as to be a cause of widespread complaint by friends of good government.

This attorney, when questioned by me, admitted that members of his law firm and the officials of his corporation indorsed individuals for appointment on the bench. He could not trust the people to elect judges, but his fee was paid by them. Of course such a little incongruity like that never disturbs a corporation attorney. As I said last summer I do not think he had any influence with the committee, but he was there. His shadow was across our table from the beginning of our hearings until the end.

I never see an attorney representing a public service corporation that I do not feel like telling him to be careful, that life is not so long, that sooner or later when his work is done forever and he is sleeping on the hill, it will be reviewed by some philosopher or poet. How sad if his career is summed up like the lawyer of Spoon River thus:

I was the attorney for the "Q"
And the Indemnity Company which insured
The owners of the mine.
I pulled the wires with judge and jury
And the upper courts, to beat the claims
Of the crippled, the widow and orphan,
And made a fortune thereat.
The bar association sang my praises
In a high-flown resolution.
And the floral tributes were many —
But the rats devoured my heart
And a snake made a nest in my skull!

Since those hearings the Boston Elevated Railway Company has been on its knees asking the people to help it by taking charge of the road, and by paying a 7 cent fare. The Bay State Street Railway is in the hands of a receiver, and its fares have been raised to help meet the difficulties of mismanagement or worse. The old stories of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, the Boston and Maine Railroad, and the Boston and Albany Railroad provoke indignation that such misdoings as they have been guilty of could happen in a free Commonwealth. The tale of the gas and electric light companies is the same: Legislative lobbying; abuse of their franchises; extortion from their consumers. These corporations do not trust the people to elect judges, but when they are in distress through their own willfulness it is to the people they go for help, asking that the past be forgotten and a new start made. They trust the people only to pay the bills.

This unfortunate condition of affairs has grown up since the Convention of 1853. Previous to that time we were in the main an agricultural community. Since then has come the great industrial growth and formation of the public service corporations. The latter have caused most of the troubles of the last two generations. They have debauched the Legislatures. They have been at the root of all the evils in government. They generally have worked through the party in power, but they also have had so much influence with the party of opposition that they have been well-nigh immune from effective criticism. Big business has been so generally indifferent to the claims of its employees and the communities where its mills turned out large and unfair profits that only the other day a great churchman, remembering the bitter days of his youth in Lowell, felt obliged to refer to the shame of it all in words that burned:

He takes our life for wages,
He holds our land for rent,
He sweats our little children
To swell his cent per cent;
With secret grip and levy
On every crumb we eat,
He drives our sons to thieving,
Our daughters to the street.

Yes, it is a never ending fight against privilege.

Safety from wrong lies in the honest, fair administration of justice. This is best secured by a non-partisan elective judiciary. A judge elected by the people in such a manner certainly has a higher commission than one who receives his appointment from a Governor after importunity and indorsement by politicians and special interests. Another value of the system is that it would place the legal profession on a high plane. It would put the honorable responsibility on its members of being especially active and vigilant in securing the election of competent judges. The law schools would be stimulated to turn out men of the highest mental equipment. Oh, how much better such a system would be than the present method of appointment which gives first consideration to political and business expediency. The change will be hard to effect. But —

Against the grim defences
Where might and murrains hide, Unswerving to the issue
Loose-reined and rough we ride
Full tardily, to rescue
Our heritage from wrong,
And establish it on manhood,
A thousand times more strong.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: We have offered here two amendments which in substance repeat the proposals which have been offered to this Convention before and defeated. One of them goes to the point of the removal of unfit or incompetent judges through charges made by individuals to the Governor and Council. The other goes to the question of an elective judiciary. Both of these proposals manifestly will diminish the independence of our judiciary. As I followed the vote on the question as to whether the word "unfitness" should remain in the amendment, it was quite evident to me that many members of this Convention responded instinctively to the thought: "Certainly. Why not? Why not get rid of unfit judges?" And the suggestion has been made in practically the same terms by the gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Maguire): "Why should we not wish to get rid of incompetent judges?"

I wish to say a few words in general with regard to the necessity for the independence of the judiciary, and a few words in particular to point out what the proposal to handle the incompetency of judges by attack before the Governor's Council means. For the real fault and trouble with this proposal to remove unfit judges lies precisely in the consequences of removal for unfitness by an attack of individuals before a body which, however able, is a political body composed of a few men.

The reasons why the independence of the judiciary should be preserved, even if at the expense of having occasionally a judge who is not up to the mark to which we should desire him to come, lies both in the situation and in the character of the judge's work. A judge in the higher courts must give up entirely his practice. A judge in the lower courts, the district, police, and other courts, must largely give up his practice. In other words, he is in the higher courts always, and in the lower courts practically, confined to an exercise of the lawyer's power, to put it in that broad way, which is a profession in itself. He has ceased to be an advocate, he has become a judge; and as he makes himself more efficient as a judge he limits to a large degree his power of returning to successful practice.

Most legislative offices, most political offices, are pleasant and often beneficial incidents in a business or professional career; but in the case of a judge he has given himself for life to a single profession, which shuts out practically everything else. Other officers are expected to respond quickly to the public will, to carry out popular policies; a judge can have no popular policies, he can have no policy at all, and justice under the law often means running contrary to popular policies and popular feeling. Other public officers may gain popularity by championing the cause of a community, a class; a judge, on the contrary, cannot. His work attracts no public attention, is not known by the public until he is attacked. On the other hand, some one is dissatisfied with him in nearly every case. No other public officer has so many opportunities to make enemies or so few opportunities to make friends.

We need judges of strength and firmness, not only to keep the proceedings in the court-room within the lines of reason and justice, but also with regard to the effect of their doings on the community, especially in criminal cases. A judge has to see justice done in unpopular cases; and some of the chief occasions for popular discontent with our judiciary and attack upon our judiciary have been precisely cases where the judges maintained justice in the face of popular attack. You remember perhaps that most famous case in our judicial history, the Boston Massacre case of 1770. You remember the case of the enforcement of the fugitive slave law in this State. That enforcement was argued openly in the Convention of 1853 as a reason for an elective judiciary. The judges had run contrary to the public will, the public desire, but they had maintained justice and the law. That was the occasion for the attack on Chief Justice Shaw, and that was, I understand, really ultimately the reason for the removal by address of Judge Loring of the Suffolk Probate Court. We have that famous case of the murder of Dr. Parkman by Professor Webster, when Lemuel Shaw, the Chief Justice, was attacked bitterly for the charge he gave to the jury. And we have the more recent case, which still must be vivid in the minds of us all, the Tucker murder case in 1904, prosecuted by ex-Attorney-General Parker. In that case the judges, Justices Sherman and Sheldon, were attacked most bitterly and violently by the yellow press of this State and people who were induced to follow it. Those judges, all of them, had to stand up independently in the face of popular pressure.

To-day a dissatisfied litigant, as somebody has put it, goes behind the court-house and swears at the judge and the jury, and then eventually forgets, at least accepts like a sensible man. But with an easy method of removal, every disappointed lawyer with political affiliations, every vindictive woman litigant with an appealing story, every unfriendly newspaper with its power to distort the truth and to convert ordinary incidents into sob stories of oppression, would keep a judge under fire with threats, executed or unexecuted, of removal; so that no strong man would wish to take or retain a seat on the bench, and only the complaisant and politically tactful could survive. For every one of these cases that I have suggested one can furnish notable examples in actual fact.

I listened the other day to a complaint about the manners of some of our judges. The gentleman who made that complaint (Mr. Whipple) admitted that these judges were honest and that they were able, that they were just, but he said their manners were intolerable. There are things that are far more important in our courts than manners, important though they may be,—justice, fairness, wisdom. Chief Justice Shaw, who was referred to in the last year's session of this Convention as "the old tyrannical judge of Massachusetts," was not gracious in court, to be sure; yet he was the first judge in Massachusetts to declare, contrary to popular and current legal opinion and to the ruling of the court below, that a strike for the purpose of maintaining a closed shop was not an indictable conspiracy, and at his retirement in 1860, after thirty years' service as Chief Justice, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Boston wrote to him expressing the confidence which he had felt in the Chief Justice all through the "Know Nothing" days and adding: "I have shared in the general regret that the Commonwealth and its citizens are no longer under the protection of the triple shield of your profound jurisprudence, your calm wisdom and your incorruptible justice." (Chase, "Life of Chief Justice Shaw," 217.)

Who is it who complains of the manner of our judges? It is not the labor movement. One of the gentlemen who sit in the second division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll), who represents the labor-unions, said last year that the difference between labor and the judiciary is that of the question of injunctions; and the gentleman from New Bedford in the same division (Mr. Harriman) this year has told us that labor has no complaint of the judiciary except in the few cases in which economic questions are raised; and the present amendment, honestly construed, would give labor no advantage and no pressure on the courts in such cases,—I mean the amendments offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Maguire). Do we hear the jurors complaining of the manner of the judges or a litigant or a witness? The witnesses often are grateful to the judge for protecting them from some lawyer. And even in the wilds of the western part of this State, rumors have come to us on occasion that some of the most forceful and able lawyers in this State, who raise complaints about the intolerable manners of the judges, are themselves not always scrupulous nor gracious in their handling of witnesses before judges whose manners, though "intolerable," have defended the witnesses from unconscionable aggression. Only the lawyers complain, and only a few of them. The manners of both bench and bar have improved in the last fifty years, but who will say that the bench has not kept pace in that improvement with the bar? Some lawyers would like to dominate the court-room, to use their dramatic powers and their skill in repartee and persuasion without the guidance and restraint of judicial wisdom, reducing the judge to less than a moderator, and he has been reduced in numerous States,—I will not take time to go into details,—to a position less almost than that of a moderator.

I want to address myself for a moment to remarks which have been made heretofore with regard especially to our district and police courts. It seems to be the opinion of some members that while we should preserve the independence of our Supreme Judicial Court and our Superior Court, in the case of the district and police and municipal courts we wisely may elect the judges for a term, or make them removable for unfitness or incompetency by a political board. I do not maintain for a minute the proposition that our lower courts are perfect or that improvement and reform are impossible or unnecessary. No one recognizes the shortcomings of our lower court system better than many of the justices of those courts themselves. But a frequent change of personnel will not correct those faults; it will make them worse.

There are three principal reasons, as I see them, and that seems to be the opinion of men familiar with the lower courts, why such courts have not developed to their full possibilities. One is the low range of their salaries. I am not going to argue that point, but I should like to put myself on record here as a member, for the present at least, of the Legislature of Massachusetts, as saying that we need to make the salaries of our district court judges sufficient to get men of very high caliber and very great knowledge of human nature. I regard their position as in some respects more important than the position of any other judges in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In the second place, we have a situation in regard to the judgment of civil cases before these courts that inevitably reacts upon their dignity and power and standing. I refer to the absolute right of appeal in these cases, the right to appeal the whole case to a higher court, not merely for the correction of errors, but for a complete new trial. Appeals are claimed in thirty to forty-five per cent, I understand, of all the cases tried, no matter who the judge is, and in practically all cases of any consequence. That system robs the court as well as the lawyers of the stimulus of responsibility, and brings the judicial power into disrepute. Able men do not find mock trials attractive.

The third of these most important things that act to hamper the proper effectiveness of our lower courts is the isolation of these courts from each other,—seventy-four courts, all of them absolutely apart from each other, with the exception of the municipal courts of Boston. We need, as has been suggested, I think, by my friend from Cambridge who sits before me in this division (Mr. Aylward), a coordination of these courts, a uniformity in their procedure. We need perhaps a Chief Justice or some other centralizing authority under whom that may be accomplished.

All those difficulties can be cured by legislation; they cannot be cured by merely changing the personnel. Assurance of and protection for judicial independence are needed even more in the lower courts than in the Superior Court. The position of a judge of a lower court is none too attractive for a good lawyer as it is. It must not be made less so but more so. Lower courts are stationary. They deal constantly with the same lawyers, and the same parties often, who find on the bench constantly the author of the decisions which offend them. Many people in every community, as you and I well know, have no understanding of judicial impartiality and no love for it. With an easy method of removal, local politicians, local newspapers, local organizations and the parties to local disturbances would try to control the bench. The position would become so uncomfortable that no really able and self-respecting man could wish to take it. In the lower courts the wonder is, to my mind, not that they have not been invariably excellent, but that so many courts, working under the degenerating system that has come down to them from justices of the peace, have given so high an example of that judicial conduct of which ex-President Taft spoke when he said:

Justice in the minor courts, the only courts that millions of our people know, administered without favoritism by men conspicuous for wisdom and probity, is the assurance of respect for our institutions.

When we look upon the number of inhabitants of Massachusetts who year by year up to the time of the present war have come thronging in here, to whom we have opened the gates of opportunity, whom we have asked to become of ourselves, citizens and brethren, when we realize that their knowledge of the justice, the ideals of America, often to a large degree is obtained from the handling of these minor cases, so called, these domestic cases, these cases that spring up throughout the whole body of our people, when we realize all that, I think we may agree that instead of regarding the minor courts as courts whose independence may well be attacked, we should take exactly the opposite view and maintain that these courts should be built up to the highest possible efficiency and integrity. And to do that we must maintain absolutely the independence of the judges.

You have seen, gentlemen, in years past attempts to remove various officials of this State by means of the action of the Governor and Council. You may look back to the action of the Council pro and con on various proposals for appointment and removal. I will not name any of them, but anybody who has been familiar with our history will recall some of them. I ask you, do you want, because there may be a few judges who might be bettered, to submit the whole body of our inferior judiciary, if I may use the word in a purely technical sense, — for they will be the ones to be attacked and threatened, — do you want in the interest of justice, in the interest of the Commonwealth, to submit these men to the liability of frequent attack before this political body of the Council? I am not attacking the Council in the least. I know that they do their duty with as much honesty and devotion to high purpose as any body of our officials. But this certainly is true, that if you make it possible to bring up a judge under the charge of incompetence or unfitness made by individuals before that body, you not only are opening the doors to a tremendous evil in unjustified attack, attack for selfish or revengeful purposes, but you also are making it practically impossible for a self-respecting man, the man whom we want, to be judge in our minor courts.

I appeal to this Convention to think for a moment of the value of these courts, and not even in the case of the lower courts, in order to get rid of a few possibly unfit judges, to submit the whole judiciary to such an attack. I appeal to the Convention to keep our judiciary independent, even if it means keeping upon the bench some judges who might fairly be called unfit. For that evil will be far less harmful than the evils which certainly will result from the procedure which would be established by the amendment now before us.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I did not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I should like to ask him before he finally takes his seat what argument he possibly can urge that would keep any unfit judge on the bench; and if this provision gave us the hope of relieving the bench of a single unfit judge, in all logic should we not address ourselves
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. Churchill: If I may have a moment in which to answer the gentleman, I will say this: If the gentleman or his friends will offer a proposal which will commend itself to this Convention as a necessary, rational and effective means of removing only the unfit and incompetent judges, without subjecting the men who should not be subjected to attack to the likelihood or the possibility of an attack, I shall be glad to vote for that amendment. The illogicality of the gentleman's proposal is that, basing it upon a premise which I will accept, that there are among all our number of judges some few unfit judges,—I am not competent to decide that question, but I accept it,—the illogicality of his position is that in order to get rid of those incompetent judges he is perfectly willing to submit the whole system to disaster. It is the logicality of getting rid of a sore on your thumb by cutting off the whole hand.

Mr. O'Connell: May I ask the gentleman, inasmuch as he concedes that there are these incompetent men,—

Mr. Churchill: I concede it for the sake of the argument.

Mr. O'Connell: For the sake of the argument, and I understood you in your argument before to say that there were some, and inasmuch as it is conceded that it is well to remove unfit and incompetent judges because of their unfitness and incompetence, what would you suggest that would protect our effort from the evil that you fear? If there is any protection that can be thrown around the proposal, certainly we are only too willing to accept it. It is not for the purpose of casting the courts into politics, but for the purpose of elevating our judiciary and curing an almost universally recognized defect in our present system that the amendment is suggested. If there is any suggestion coming from the gentleman that will relieve it from the odium that he wishes to cast upon it, I for one, as a proposer, will be only too glad to join with him.

Mr. Churchill: If the gentleman is asking me a question, the suggestion which the gentleman makes is very like that which has been made not infrequently in this Convention: "Why don't you offer something constructive?" That is a very good invitation, and we all of us would like to be constructors. But when in the course of argument there is plainly pointed out the fact that all the possible proposals, at least that have appeared, are manifestly worse than the thing they attempt to cure, and the proposers of those ask their critics to suggest something that will be free from these errors, I submit that the conclusion which the gentleman desires from his question is not a conclusion that any rational man may give. I wish that I were able to offer precisely that. It is precisely because I do not see, and no one in this Convention with far more knowledge of these matters than I have has been able to offer, an amendment which will do the thing I said, get rid of these few possibly incompetent judges without submitting the whole system to that attack,—it is precisely because of that and precisely because the proposals which in lack of that are offered are proposals which will make the situation far worse than the situation which you wish to cure, that I criticize your proposals and hope that this Convention will vote them down. But if somebody with more ability than I have, and more ability than
I can see at the present minute to hit that point, will offer such an amendment I shall be glad to support it.

We must do the best we can under the circumstances. That is the case always. The proposal before us it seems to me is: Shall we in order to get rid of a few who cannot otherwise be gotten rid of subject the whole judicial system to this kind of attack? We have to take our choice. Neither is perfect. Which shall we choose?

Mr. Richardson of Newton: We have listened now to one address on each side of this question, on which the Convention has expressed itself already in no uncertain terms more than once since our first day’s deliberation. I think the Convention is ready to assert itself again in no uncertain terms, and therefore I move the previous question.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Churchill) has challenged this House to produce a method by which it is possible to winnow out the judges of a system of courts, so to speak. He has indicated that it is impossible to remove a few unfit judges without impairing the independence of all the other judges. If that be the case, what are we to say to the framers of the Federal Constitution and to the authorities of the government of the United States, who for more than a century have had in effect a method for doing precisely what the gentleman says ought not to be done, namely, the removal of judges of the United States by impeachment, readily applied, applied within a few years to an inferior judge of the United States who was so unfit that the machinery provided for that purpose was applied to him, to the great benefit of the United States and doubtless to the strengthening of the hearts of the faithful judges.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to say that the gentleman who has just spoken has absolutely misunderstood, doubtless through my own fault, my attitude. I have had absolutely nothing to say with regard to the effect of impeachment or removal by address. I have addressed myself simply to this proposal of removal by attack and charge before such a body as the Council. I entirely agree with the gentleman that a man who manifestly is incompetent and unfit to a point of impeachment ought to be, could be, and has been removed.

Mr. Cremer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) why, if the system which he extols is a good system, it should fear attack before the Governor and Council.

Mr. Churchill: Being a school-master I am always supposed to answer questions; I do not always understand them. I ask the gentleman if he will repeat his question.

Mr. Cremer: I should like to ask the delegate from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) if the present judicial system which he extols so highly is so good, as he says it is, why it should fear attack, — what he deems attack, what he calls attack, — by proceedings before the Governor and Council. I should like to know if he thinks the Governor and Council of Massachusetts could possibly be such an unfit body to determine whether judges were incompetent or not.

Mr. Churchill: I can only say in answer to that question that during the course of this Convention for two years both in public and private I have endeavored to make plain certain ideas of my own to my colleague who usually sits on my right (Mr. Cremer). In so many cases I have found after addressing to him the most logical, the clearest, the most convincing remarks, that he has remained absolutely impenetrable, that my answer to his question will have to be this: That if I have not convinced him already by the remarks that I have just made I certainly cannot do so by any further remarks.

Mr. O'Connell. I am very sorry indeed that the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Richardson) saw fit to move the previous question. I want to call the Convention's attention to this fact: That on three different occasions this subject has come up and on each occasion the previous question has been invoked with the deliberate purpose of preventing a discussion that would illuminate and bring forth the weakness of our present judicial system. Adequate discussion of this most elementary of all propositions that affect the public has not been allowed, which is not fair to the people who sent us here. We have not been permitted the opportunity to debate this subject as we should. Take, for instance, to-day. I want to offer an amendment to this measure. I waited for five days to find out what the committee on Form and Phraseology would return to us, and it was printed only to-day, and placed in the document book, although dated as of yesterday. Only to-day could I find out how I should word my amendment. And now, when only two men have spoken, one on each side, a man secures recognition from the chair and urges the P. Q., when over twenty members arose seeking a chance to speak. If the previous question is carried, it will prevent me from offering an amendment that ought to be offered to this resolution. Is this reasonable, gentlemen? Is it fair to a subject that affects the people and that is near to them? I urge you at the present moment not to adopt the previous question.

Unanimous consent having been given, Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston moved that the resolution (No. 413) be amended by inserting after the word "age," in line 8, the word "unfitness."

Mr. O'Connell: I want to thank the gentleman from East Boston (Judge Murley) for the courtesy that he has secured to me from the Convention, although this does not relieve the majority that has been whipped together to-day from the charge of refusing fair discussion of the proposal. I want to say to him also that I admire his course as the only judge in this Convention who a week ago voted to exclude unfit judges from the bench. I like that kind of manhood, and I like that kind of character. There are thirty-odd judges here, and I am surprised that many of them did not follow his example in doing the same thing. [Applause.]

Mr. George of Haverhill: I want to call the attention of members of this Convention to what we voted for the other day, and I am going to call your attention to what the committee on Form and Phraseology has served us in this belated document No. 413.

Article 1 of Chapter 3 of Part II of the Constitution is hereby amended by the addition of the following words: "and provided also that the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may, after due notice and hearing retire them because of advanced age or mental or physical disability, upon the terms and conditions that may be provided by law for the voluntary retirement of judicial officers."

The committee recommend to omit all after the word "disability," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following sentence: "Such retirement shall be subject to any provisions made by law as to pensions or allowances payable to such officers upon their voluntary retirement". In effect they have recommended the striking out of the amendment that we adopted the other day, cutting out the words "pensions and annuities." I submit that in view of the action of the Convention the other day this looks like a species of sharp practice.

This recommendation of the committee on Form and Phraseology ought not to be accepted. We ought to insist on the amendment that we adopted the other day, which does not put into the Constitution objectionable phrases and leaves our courts in the same relative position as other departments of the Commonwealth.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: It is delightful to listen to the carefully prepared address of the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), and no one who loves oratory or good delivery could sit unmoved and uninfluenced by that oration. One must ask himself, however, what opportunity the orator had for learning the facts about which he speaks, and so I am quite anxious to learn if the gentleman ever has tried a case, or ever has appeared before a judge, or knows at first hand what kind of a system of administration of the law we have in Massachusetts. His evident lack of familiarity with the address leads me to believe that he did not write it. He referred from time to time to the manuscript which consisted of a combination culled from the most eloquent utterances conceived by the friends of the judges. If the delegates looked through the verbiage at the substance of that address there would be no doubt but that this Convention would stand by its earlier action; however, my namesake from Salem (Mr. E. G. Sullivan) has been very busy prancing around and getting everybody here who is a friend of the judges, so the combination, fulsome oratory and the practical work, may induce some who were not convinced thoroughly of the merit of this measure to change their viewpoints and their votes.

We have had this matter discussed here several times, and in no uncertain way this Convention has voted to submit a resolution to the people whereby the Governor and Council may remove judges who mentally or physically are incapacitated. Look at the records of your House of Representatives, and you will find repeatedly where judges have been appointed for special terms because the presiding judge in the district was unable to officiate. My learned friend the professor from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) says he believes that such questions should not be submitted to the politicians in the Governor's Council, and then he says: "I don't mean any reflection on the Governor's Council, but keep the sacred judges from the reach of politicians in the Governor's Council." He prefers to have an address to the Legislature, where there are no politicians,—this glorious body who he believes ought to be elected only every two years, and who he believes ought to sit only every two years. He says: "It is true, notwithstanding all this friendly comment and oratory which I have borrowed from the friends of the judges, that there are some unfit judges, who ought to be removed, but let us not submit a resolution which would make it possible to remove a bad judge if thereby the position of a good judge might be endangered." In Massachusetts we have our Governor and the Governor's Council, pretty fair men, pretty good representatives of the people, if they are mostly Republicans. My friend from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), who is a member of that dominant party, is fearful that some upright and honest judge might be haled before the Governor’s Council and subjected to the indignity of removal and be separated brutally from the pension and the pay-roll, and he says: “Oh, keep the judges from the reach of the politicians, and let an address be sent to the Legislature, where there are no politicians and where the judges are safe.”

I say we have passed upon that resolution in no uncertain manner. We have seen no objection to submitting to the Governor and Council the question whether the judge is mentally infirm or physically unable to perform his duties, and if he has reached an advanced age, where he ought to retire. I say there is no reason, notwithstanding this oratorical effort of the professor from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), with no substance (I mean the speech, not the professor), something like the initiative and referendum speech, where he said, after talking pleasantly for an hour: “I am attempting no argument.”

Mr. O’CONNELL of Boston: I regret very much that under the rule it will be impossible to adequately discuss this subject with but ten minutes left for debate. The amendment which I have introduced simply permits the Governor and Council to remove a judge because of unfitness. To me it is a very proper and becoming reason. When we reflect how often mistakes of judgment as to the character and fitness of men are made by all of us, whenever we are called to pass judgment on making appointments to any form of occupation or activity, we realize how often mistakes are made. None of us is infallible in judgment and surely the Governor and Council may make as many mistakes in appointing and confirming a man who they think may make a fit judge as any other organization and they should not be denied the opportunity of correcting their errors when it is patent to them that a grave mistake has been made and the State is made to suffer thereby. Some gentlemen seem to be apprehensive as to the meaning of the word “unfitness,” and whether or not it is the best term to use. Personally, I have no pride in position on this matter and would be glad to adopt any other word that would satisfy them if it covered the principle involved. We all know that the first consideration for the appointment of a judge is his fitness, so called, to fill the office, and it would seem as though the same standard that establishes and determines fitness should be able equally to decide as to unfitness. In becoming unfit a judge certainly fails in the first principle and essential that justified his original appointment. What is unfitness? I quote from the Century Dictionary. “Unfitness” means the character of being unfit in any sense. “Unfit” is defined as follows:

(a) Improper, unsuitable, unbecoming, inappropriate. (b) Not suited or adapted; not fitted. (c) Wanting suitable qualifications, physical or moral; not competent; unable; said of persons.

Its synonyms are found to be, unqualified, unmeet, unworthy, incompetent, insufficient. To me the word “unfitness” seems the proper word for us to use in view of this generally recognized authority as to the definition of the word. It is comprehensive enough to be understood easily by the people who would pass on the question of its adoption and yet it is limited enough to confine the Governor and Council so that they could not attempt to displace a man who simply would displease them or some particular party for some fancied grievance or disagreement. Is there a man in this Convention who will dare rise and say that he does not want an unsuitable judge removed? Is there a member here this afternoon who will dare rise from his seat and say that he believes in a doctrine that will continue an unfit judge sitting on a bench in Massachusetts? Are we here in the year 1918 willing to proclaim to the world that we concede that we have incompetent judges in Massachusetts but we do not dare suggest a change because forsooth somebody suggests that politics may arise in it and that the law possibly may be abused? Shame on the men of 1918 if we cannot address ourselves to a subject of this kind and show ourselves to be masters of it so that we may be able to cure or suggest a cure of an evil that is conceded to exist!

The gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) said in his general platitudinous way in the argument which he has just read to us that the lower courts have been honest. I do not know what his experience has been but I doubt very much if he ever has had any actual experience with our courts. He is not a member of the bar and judging from the manner in which he read his argument, he has not any familiarity with the evils that beset our present system. Let me call his attention to the report of the Commission on the Inferior Courts in the county of Suffolk, appointed in accordance with the provisions of chapter 79 of the Resolves of 1911 and which is known as House Document No. 1638 of 1912. Let him look at page 8 of that report wherein the following, among other things which I have not the time to call to the attention of this Convention, are enumerated as faults of a system which prevails not only in Boston but throughout the whole Commonwealth.

In one court, sentences for drunkenness are largely predetermined by the court upon inspection of the probate officer's report of previous convictions, right or wrong, and this in the absence of the prisoner. . . . In certain courts a policy prevails of fining in practically all cases of persons arrested for drunkenness who are not residents of the particular districts.

There is a most uneven form of justice prevailing in this Common-wealth due entirely to the fact that many of the judges of our courts are entirely unfit for their work and will not change their ways even though the whole community is aroused at the demonstrations of unfitness that frequently are exhibited. Look at the judges who lobby in this Legislature, year in and year out to increase their salaries or to secure an increase of salary for their clerks or court attaches. Direct your attention to the scandalous proceedings that are prevalent in some of our courts where associate judges practice before the regular judges, only in turn to find the regular judge appearing in cases before his associate judge. Think of a situation where a judge will issue a warrant against a man and then take a retainer to defend that same man against whom he has issued the warrant and having the case tried before his associate. Think of the judges in all our local courts who wish some favor from the Legislature, who continually and openly are favoring lawyers who are members of the Legislature in order to secure their good-will and vote! These are evils that indicate that the men who practice them are unfit for their office. Men know that what I am saying to-day cannot be challenged or contradicted and yet a member like the gentleman from Amherst arises and proclaims that there is no remedy for such an evil. I cannot believe it. Gentlemen, we must use our judgment and we must do something at this time. If there is a conceded wrong and an evil to be redressed, can we not find a remedy, even though it be very warm and even though members have been sent for and brought in here through the activities of the judiciary committee to defeat any proposition seeking to change our present system? Can we not here to-day find some word that will protect all our good judges and at the same time provide a means of getting rid of unfit members of the bench? I yield to no one in a desire to have all kinds of safeguards thrown around a good judge, but I want none but good judges to sit on our benches. I cannot tolerate any petty monster on the bench, nor do I like ill-mannered, ill-tempered judges, displaying personal idiosyncrasies in defiance of the law, conducting themselves in the court as though they were proprietors, forgetting themselves and the great dignity of the office that they fill and bringing about a contempt of our courts. Everything should be done to hold our courts in the very highest respect by all classes of people and there should be no blemish allowed to exist if it possibly can be removed. There can be no possible excuse for having an ill-mannered or impatient or intolerant judge on the bench who displays his lack of training or unfitness by abusing either lawyer or party. There can be no excuse for judges being impolite or discourteous. The professor (Mr. Churchill) says that some judges may be excused for their bad manners because some of the lawyers also who appear before them may be guilty of having bad manners. This is a poor form of reasoning and a very much poorer excuse for keeping a judge, unfitted by bad manners, on a bench in Massachusetts. There is no possible excuse for a judge having bad manners. Bad manners in itself unfits any man for this important position. It should be the duty of the bench to try to elevate the bar and the members of it by showing that the judge at least has good manners. I see about me now many members who have come in, in the last half-hour, in response to the call of those who are interested in defeating this proposition to-day, while at the same time many members who favor it are absent because they did not know it would be reached for consideration to-day. It is unfortunate that you members have not been present to hear the discussion, but let me repeat once more to this Convention that there is no subject nearer to the people and that there is no greater duty imposed upon the members of this Convention than that of doing whatever is necessary to elevate our courts to the very highest point of perfection. It is a mistake to believe that the judges are perfect or that our present system is perfect. I urge you gentlemen to accept the amendment which I have offered because in one word there can be no justification in Massachusetts for any member of this Convention voting to keep seated on our bench an unfit judge.

Mr. Whipple of Brookline: Under our Constitution the judges of our courts are selected and appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council. In making these appointments what do the Governor and Council decide? Is it not whether a particular candidate is fit to occupy judicial office? Do any of the gentlemen of this Convention say that the Governor is not fitted for an equal responsibility, with the advice of the Council, to determine whether an incumbent of that office, by reason of advanced age or temperamental characteristics, has become unfit longer to occupy it? Cannot the chief magistrate of our Commonwealth, who determines their fitness for the purposes of appointment, be trusted to determine when and whether judges no longer are fit to occupy the position? I see no reason why, when a man has been appointed and it develops that possibly a mistake has been made, or when his temperament or character has changed, a judge should not be removed by the same tribunal, which then determines that he is unfit, which originally determined that he was fit. I therefore earnestly urge that we have this provision for the easy determination of the fitness or unfitness of a judicial incumbent so that those who are unfit,—and nothing is worse in the administration of justice than an unfit judge,—may thus be removed from office.

Mr. Choate of Southborough: It seems strange that so simple a question can arouse such a storm of oratory. All these provisions that bear upon the selection and qualification of judges have for their purpose simply the obtaining of the best possible men to sit upon the bench, and in dealing with them it seems to me that we ought to treat them calmly and deliberately for the purpose of ascertaining whether they accomplish that purpose or not. It is not a question of whether occasionally there may be an unfit man upon the bench; it is not a question of whether we should deny the Governor the right to express an opinion upon that question; it is whether on the whole, with all the machinery that we provide to put the judge there and to keep him there, we are going to get the best possible men to serve us in that position.

There is a perfectly adequate method for removing an incompetent or unfit judge now in our possession. Address and impeachment has been used and can be used again, when occasion requires it, to remove a judge from the bench who ought not to be there. The objection, and to my mind the sound objection, to this amendment is that it allows complaints to be entertained without proper consideration, complaints to be entertained for which there is no sound foundation, complaints to be made in public, tried out, arising out of irritation and aggravation and disappointment, with the inevitable effect that they will act as a tremendous deterrent to the very men whom we want to serve us in that position. Do not lose sight of the fact that the man who is suggested for a judge is almost invariably a lawyer of experience and somewhat mature age, that he is obliged to give up the whole of his career and all the success which he has achieved in the practice of his profession and adopt a line of life and work which is wholly foreign to that in which he has been brought up, that he by accepting that position has absolutely unfitted himself, if he does his work well, to go back to the practice of his profession, that the removal of a judge by the method suggested by this amendment is to destroy him not only for his work upon the bench, — of course it does that, — but to make him discredited and impossible for further usefulness in his profession.
I take it that the Convention, having expressed already its opinion upon the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Maguire), will not change its view upon that, and I hope that the amendment providing for the removal of judges by the Governor and Council will not prevail.

Mr. Blackmun of Quincy: I desire to say just a word in reply to my friend from Haverhill in the third division (Mr. George) in his attack upon the committee on Form and Phraseology. I assure the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) and the Convention that the committee did not intend to make any substantial alteration in the resolution as it was sent to them; they simply confined themselves to what they understood the Convention meant to cover in its resolution. I would respectfully call the attention of this Convention to our document No. 413 in this one single paragraph, and I read from the third or fourth paragraph:

It is believed that the resolution in its original form was more comprehensive than the Convention intended. In that form it required that the retirement of judges for disability should be subject to all the conditions, such as age limit, governing their voluntary retirement. The revised form is thought to express the intent of the Convention.

So, gentlemen, it probably would have limited the Governor's Council to the removal of judges only when they were seventy years of age, and therefore we made the changes as suggested.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I desire to point out the fallacy underlying the plausible but misleading argument of the gentleman from Brookline in the fourth division (Mr. Whipple). The objection to this proposal is not to the tribunal before which complaints against judges are to come, but against the way in which such complaints are to originate. The objection is that anybody whosoever, no matter how irresponsible, can initiate an attack upon any judge with or without good faith and reasonable cause. The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Maguire) who is responsible for the amendment has asked how we could have had any power to get rid of unfit judges and yet avoid that. I reply that we easily could have done it. He could have done it if that had been his real purpose. For instance, he could have given the power of initiating complaints to a council or joint committee of the bar associations of the State or to a council or committee of the judges of the State or to any other of several responsible and specially qualified bodies. Such a procedure might have been safe. Instead he has left it free to any disappointed litigant, to any disgruntled attorney, to say, openly or covertly, to any judge: "If you do what we don't want we will 'get you.' We will frame a case. We will start a political drive on you. The very best you can hope for is to be upheld after endless bother, large expense, and all the annoyance an artificially stimulated hostile press can subject you to." That is the effect, — in my belief that is largely the purpose, — of this amendment. Gentlemen, do you wish it left open to any corporation to say to any judge: "If you do thus and so we will 'get you'?"

The amendment moved by Mr. O'Connell of Boston was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 80 to 119.

The first amendment moved by Mr. Maguire of Boston was rejected, by a vote of 26 to 103.
TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

The second amendment moved by the same gentleman was rejected.

The resolution (No. 413) was passed to be engrossed Tuesday, August 6.

The Convention voted, Thursday, August 15, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 156,796 to 86,023.

Mr. Thomas J. Boynton of Everett presented the following resolution (No. 192):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

All judicial officers now in office or who may be hereafter appointed shall from and after the first day of January in the year nineteen hundred and eighteen hold their respective offices for the term of seven years from the said first day of January, nineteen hundred and eighteen, or for the term of seven years from the time of their respective appointments as the case may be (unless sooner removed by impeachment or by address of both branches of the Legislature to the executive) and no longer unless reappointed thereto.

The committee on Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention Tuesday, June 18, 1918.

Mr. James F. Aylward of Cambridge moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

All judges of police, district and municipal courts, duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, shall hold office for the term of seven years, and upon the expiration of such term they may be reappointed. The present judges of said courts shall hold their offices for the term of seven years from the date of the adoption of this amendment by the people.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 53 to 79.

The resolution was rejected Tuesday, June 18, 1918.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. AYLWARD of Cambridge: I do not know that I can add anything to what I stated this morning. I believe with a great many members of this Convention that probably a great part of the criticism that has been directed to the courts is directed to the lower courts. I instanced some cases this morning, when there was not so large an attendance here, and they might bear repetition. I stated that the two upper courts each had a Chief Justice who to some extent controls the actions,—that is, the deportment, rather,—of the judges under him, but that the lower courts had no head, that each judge in each locality was a law unto himself as to how he should conduct both himself and his court. I stated further that there was a great grievance that had existed for many years, and that at various times people had come before the Legislature and attempted to have that grievance remedied; that was the appointment of Associate Justices and those Justices being permitted to practice in the courts of which they were Justices before their principal. I stated that it was not claimed particularly that there was any injustice meted out or that there was any favor granted to the Associate Justice, but the people thought he had an influence with the court and through that thought, particularly among the foreign element, he was enabled, to the detriment of other men who practiced in the court to which he belonged, to acquire quite a business in that manner. I stated also that while the manner of conducting proceedings in some lower courts is very good in some localities, as for instance in my own district court, where the list is called at nine o'clock, as it should be, and the cases taken up in order, in other districts, although lawyers, litigants, doctors and witnesses, who may have been summoned, have arrived as directed at nine o'clock, they must wait until it suits the convenience of this particular judge, who comes trailing in at ten, half-past ten or eleven o'clock. There was no way for any one to say he ought to be there earlier; nobody has any control over him at the present time. Those were some of the reasons I stated. I stated that away back fifteen years ago when I was in the Legislature this grievance became so strong, namely, about the associates practicing in the courts, that a bill was introduced and favorably commented on for quite a time before the committee on the Judiciary, of which I was a member, to remedy the evil; that later on it appeared that in some of the smaller towns in the farther parts of the Commonwealth these Associate Justices were sometimes the only lawyers in their town, and that if they were prevented from practicing in that manner they would be compelled to resign. It seemed to me they ought to resign. But at any rate such was the sympathy for them among the members of the Legislature that the bill at that time did not prevail.

I do not think I ought to take up the time of the Convention. I do not think there is a lawyer in this Convention who at some time in his practice has not met with a great many of the evils that this proposal is intended to remedy. My amendment does not affect the present tenure of the men there,—of the men holding office. Under this amendment they would hold office for seven years and, no doubt, would be reappointed if they wished it; but hereafter those who would be appointed would know that the term was for seven years. This resolution would remedy other evils also, would have a salutary effect on many of the things that have been complained of in this Convention. For those reasons, I believe that if this amendment is adopted ninetenths of all the criticism of our courts will cease and that the Legislature and the people will not be bothered any further on this subject.

The amendment was rejected, by a vote of 53 to 79.

The resolution (No. 192) was rejected Tuesday, June 18, 1918.

Mr. Charles O. Bailey of Newbury presented the following resolution (No. 191):

Resolved, That Article XXIX of the Declaration of Rights, Part the First, of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and Article I of Chapter III, Part the Second, of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, are hereby repealed, and the following articles substituted therefor:

Article XXIX. It is essential to the preservation of the rights of every individual, his life, liberty, property, and character, that there be an impartial interpretation of the laws, and administration of justice. It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit. It is, therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court should hold their offices for long terms if they behave themselves well; and that they shall have honorable salaries ascertained and established by standing laws.

CHAPTER III.

ARTICLE I. The tenure, that all commission officers shall by law have in their offices, shall be expressed in their respective commissions. All judicial officers, duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, shall hold their offices, unless sooner removed, for such fixed terms as may by law be established, but no judicial officer shall serve hereafter for more than fourteen years except by reappointment; and the Governor, with the consent of the Council, may remove them upon the address of both Houses of the Legislature.

The Committee on Judiciary reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Mr. Mancovitz moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft (No. 345):

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Constitution by inserting the following:

All judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, of the Superior Court, Land Court, or courts hereafter created in their stead, shall hold their offices for the term of ten years, and all other judicial officers of any inferior court now or hereafter existing, shall hold their offices for the term of seven years. And upon the expiration of such term they may be reappointed. They should have honorable salaries established by standing laws, which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which the judicial officer is chosen. The present judicial officers shall hold their offices according to their respective commissions; but hereafter when any vacancy shall occur excepting in the Supreme Judicial Court it shall be filled by appointment for a term as herein provided, but in no event to continue in office after attaining sixty-five years of age, excepting judges of the Supreme Judicial Court, who shall not continue after attaining seventy years of age. No person shall be appointed a judge who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and have been ten years a citizen of this Commonwealth, and been admitted as an attorney for ten years.

No person shall be appointed a judge in any of said inferior courts unless at the time of his appointment he is a resident and qualified voter within the venue of said court, and his commission shall expire upon his removal from the venue of said court.

This amendment was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 61 to 142.

The resolution was rejected Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Mancovitz of Boston: I should like to ask a question of parliamentary procedure. Does the action on No. 115 preclude the moving of substitution of document 345 for the present resolution under consideration?

The President: The Chair rules that it does not.

Mr. Mancovitz: Mr. President, I move you, sir, that resolution No. 345 be substituted for the report of the committee.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: In view of the fact that this resolution has been thoroughly discussed I move the previous question.

Mr. Mancovitz: I regret very much that the gentleman in this division (Mr. Luce) saw fit to move the previous question. He must be aware that there are a great many delegates to this Convention who believe in the merits of No. 345. Personally, as the mover of that resolution, I saw the point of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) and voted for the substitute.
because I believed that went part of the distance, but we have not had a chance to vote upon the main question. Rather than endanger an improvement upon the present system I was willing to vote for the substitute, and thus bring before this Convention the main issue embodied in No. 345, and I hope the main question will not be ordered, so that we can discuss No. 345 and take a vote upon that.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: As I understand the present situation, the motion by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancovitz) brings before us the main question of limited tenure as covered in the resolution of the gentleman from Chelsea (Mr. Finn), that being No. 345, so that if the motion by the gentleman from Boston is passed we shall have an opportunity of voting on the measure that we have been talking about for the last two days, and I urge in all fairness that this Convention at least ought to vote on the subject that we are discussing. As a result of parliamentary procedure, the amendment being adopted, we have been precluded in the adoption of those amendments from voting on the main question. Now this substitute offered gives us an opportunity of voting on the main question itself, as to whether or not we want limited tenure of judges in this State; and I urge upon the Convention, whether they are going to accept it or not, that they at least in decency ought to permit the question to be put before them.

The amendment moved by Mr. Mancovitz was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 61 to 142.

The resolution was rejected Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Appointment of District Attorneys.

Mr. Charles P. Howard of Reading presented the following resolution (No. 161):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Attorney-General shall be appointed by the Governor, and shall be removable by him. The Attorney-General shall be the head of the law department of the Commonwealth. He shall appoint for indeterminate terms such assistant Attorneys-General and such other subordinates as he shall deem proper, and he may remove them. District attorneys shall be appointed by the Attorney-General for indeterminate terms, and assigned by him to such districts as he shall deem most advisable. They shall be subject to the direction of the Attorney-General, and shall be removable by him.

The committee on County and District Government reported that so much of the resolution as relates to the appointment of district attorneys ought not to be adopted.

The resolution was considered by the Convention Friday, July 12, 1918; and it was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I do not rise to speak on the merits of this measure, either for or against it; I am not at all sure personally that at any stage I shall favor it; but the joint committee on State Administration and correlated matters, now sitting, have drafted a resolution which touches upon this same subject indirectly. The matter of the method of choice of an Attorney-General I hope will not be concluded at this stage. I hope that it may be left for consideration when the whole wide subject of the organization of the State and its departments comes before the Convention; and for that reason, and for that purpose alone, I hope, instead of being killed now, it may be kept alive on the docket to be dealt with on its merits at its next reading.

Mr. Mancowitz of Boston: If the gentleman who has just taken his seat in this division (Mr. Balch) will examine the calendar, he will find the report deals with only so much of the resolution as relates to district attorneys, and not Attorneys-General. Any action by the Convention accepting the report of the committee will not in any way affect his rights as to the Attorney-General.

Mr. Balch: If that is the correct interpretation, then my remarks obviously would not apply.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I feel so deeply on this subject that I cannot allow the resolution to go to a final vote, and still less to rejection, without expressing my view of it to the Convention.

There are two proposals pending in this resolution and the next on the calendar, of which the one now under consideration is the more comprehensive because it involves appointment of the Attorney-General and the district attorneys as well. The next resolution is confined to the district attorneys.

There are no two more important offices under the government of the Commonwealth than the offices of Attorney-General and district attorney. In respect of the power which they actually exercise, a power as nearly arbitrary as our constitutional system permits, there is no other officer in the government to be compared with either of them. More than this, each office calls for the daily exercise of functions which are essentially judicial. They are offices which call for the exercise of judgment upon many questions of the most important and many of the most delicate character. It is speaking within bounds to say that the Attorney-General, by and large, is quite as powerful or influential a functionary as the Governor, and the district attorney a vastly more important character than any single judge of any court. As a rule we have had good men in these offices, in spite of the system of selection, but there have been some serious exceptions which ought to be impossible in Massachusetts. Down to the Know Nothing craze of 1854-55, these officers were appointed, as they ought to be, because they ought to be removed so far as possible from the direct control of popular prejudice or popular clamor. I say that, knowing the stigma which is affixed here to anybody who says anything about popular clamor. The thing from which the administration of these offices ought to be absolutely removed at all times and under all circumstances is the temptation to curry popular favor or pander to popular prejudice, which excites or is excited by popular clamor, and once excited, is deadly, for you cannot reason with it. It is the one thing that cannot be reasoned with.

In 1854 and 1855 the Know Nothings obtained control of the government of Massachusetts, upon the anti-Irish and anti-Catholic issue, a movement directed wholly against the foreign immigrant, who at that time was the Irishman and nobody else, and against the influence of the Catholic church in our politics. They made these offices, which had previously been appointive, elective, because, as I suppose, they wanted direct control over them. That is the source from which the rule proceeded that we are now called upon to deal with. I should not suppose that any man of that race can take any peculiar pleasure in voting to continue in effect a system which was established as a stab at his own race and religion. Of course that reason does not affect my view of this question, to the slightest extent; but the general reasons in favor of making these offices appointive are so strong that I hope that the Convention will at least give the resolution another reading, so that it can be further discussed.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: I introduced an order for a similar purpose,—about district attorneys,—and it got by when I was not looking; therefore I will speak upon this. I have had more than thirty-nine years' experience at the bar, and I am thoroughly persuaded that if there is any officer in the Commonwealth who ought to be an appointed officer it is the district attorney. We provide in the Constitution that judges shall be as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit, and when we have an officer who has more power over the accused that come into court than the judges do, he ought to be as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit; he ought not to be swayed by any political considerations, he ought not to be subject to any influences by anybody; and if I had my way he would be appointed for a term that would put him beyond all such influences.

The most honest district attorney with whom I ever dealt, a man who I thought tried to do exactly right, brought an information against the owner of a quarry, because he said the quarry was a nuisance to the public. He had a number of people come in and complain of it, so he brought this information. But when he found that there were twenty-odd voters who worked in the quarry the merits of the case vanished, and he tried to see how he could get out of it.

I have seen a good many instances of sinister influences imposed upon district attorneys by people in the liquor interests, particularly in days gone by; by people in other interests in days that are. I remember one instance in which we had a strike, and I represented a shoe manufacturing concern. We drove out of town most of the violent members of that organization that had struck by getting out warrants and letting them know that the warrants were out; but we got word one day that a "slugger" was coming to town, and we did not know when he was coming or who he was. But he appeared. He knocked a strike-breaker down and knocked him against a policeman. The consequence was the assaulter got into court, and when he was asked in court if he would do it again if he had a chance he said he would. He was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment. He appealed from that sentence. Apparently there was no power on earth that could make that district attorney sentence that man,—in my judgment all the influence was brought to bear that could be,—a man who openly in court said he would violate the law of the Commonwealth again if he had a chance. Was there any sinister influence about it? We thought there was.

Take the liquor business. I remember going into court with a man who had four complaints against him, and the evidence was so overwhelming that there was not a possible scrap of a chance for that man to escape by any legitimate means from the penalty. The least evidence there was, on any of the days on which he was complained of, was of a hundred sales in his establishment.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Bartlett: As I was saying at the adjournment, district attorneys under the present system are too much subjected to influence. I was citing the man who had the liquor cases. I could not do anything for him, I had about twenty more desperate cases, and he got some one else, but I watched the course of it. I say that political influence was brought to bear. By various excuses the case was continued from time to time until the evidence disappeared. This is the old story. These are illustrative instances. District attorneys are subjected to such influences, not only from politicians and political committees, but personal influences and every sort of influence that can be brought to bear. I do want to say that the district attorneys as a whole are good men. They belong to the honorable profession of which I am a humble member, and that is a good deal. They are good men. They are men generally of good judgment, and humane men, and want to do right, but they are subjected to these influences. Sometimes the influences are such that they have effect, sometimes they are not; but they ought not to be subjected to them. And sometimes they are put in a position where strong suspicions are raised against them which ought not to be raised. I do not suppose that there is a district attorney in the Commonwealth, or ever was one, but would like to have his tenure of office such that he could be approached no more than a judge, and a man who would dare to approach one of the judges of our higher courts, at least, by influence, would run more danger of the resentment resulting being worse for him than if he had not said anything. He would find it resented. He would find the judge, if anything, leaning the other way. When we have the power in the hands of the district attorneys which they have, the power of saying whether or not a man shall be sentenced, the power practically of saying whether or not he shall be put upon probation, almost the power of saying exactly what the sentence shall be as the thing goes, if there is any official who ought to stand upon the same basis, have the same freedom that the judges have, it is the district attorney. And when we can have it, when we can have that system by which they shall be as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit, the system by which we appoint our judges, why should not we apply it to officers of this sort?

In 1853 or 1857, I think, the change was made that district attorneys be elected. It seems apparent that the reason for that was that the Know Nothings were in control and the Know Nothings wanted to control the district attorneys.

Of course the argument that the appointment of district attorneys is also in favor of the short ballot applies. The district attorney also ought to be free from having to make a campaign. He ought to be free from the thought when he is put before a jury: "How can I make all these jurymen think I am the greatest man in the world, so that they will back me in the next campaign?" I have seen some district attorneys who I think had as the most prominent thought in their minds: "When I get through this term of court will every jurymen go out of here my solid supporter, and can I get these jurymen in such shape that they even will bolt their party to support me?"
hope that some measures by which the appointment of district attorneys will take the place of the present system will pass the Convention.

Mr. Shea of Dalton: I should like to ask the gentleman who last spoke how he interprets the words "indeterminate terms," and if he has any opinion on the tenure of the district attorney's appointment.

Mr. Bartlett: I would say that I have not observed the particular terms of this particular document. It has got the principle in it of the appointment of district attorneys. My measure which, as I said, got by when I was not looking, provided for appointment by the Governor. But by adopting this resolution at this stage we can hold on to that principle of the appointment of district attorneys and change the resolution as the Convention shall see fit to decide.

Mr. Davis of Cambridge: I should like to ask the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Bartlett) a question. Before the recess he cited a case of a liquor dealer convicted of four offences, and said that the case never was heard of when it reached the high court. That means, of course, the Superior Court. Now, in regard to that case, does he not know that the law requires, before that case could be disposed of without trial, the written consent of the judge presiding at the session was necessary before it could be disposed of?

Mr. Bartlett: I would say that I never found that written consent. I did find this: That at that term at which it should be tried the district attorney notified me the man was sick. I saw his mother the next day, and she said he was sick down at the beach. That night I was down at the beach, and they said he was sick up here with his mother. But it went over because he was sick. The next term of the court he was on the jury, and of course they could not try a man who was on the jury. The next term of the court his case was reached the last day of the term, it was in the winter, and he was down at Nantasket Beach or somewhere along the south shore, and could not be reached or found by telegraph or telephone. What happened to it afterwards I do not know.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: May I ask the gentleman a question? I should like to ask the gentleman if the law does not require that in election cases as well as in liquor cases the consent of the judge presiding in court must be had before the case can be not pressed.

Mr. Bartlett: So far as I know it does, but these things happen.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I have one word to say about this question of the appointment of the Attorney-General.

It appears to me that this Convention never has taken a serious view, or what it seems to me is a serious view, of the questions which are involved just at present. In the condition which the world is in we never are going back again to the conditions which prevailed before this war began, and I think that we might as well, all of us, make up our minds to that great fact. We never shall be a civilization such as we have been in the past, and we must revise all our ideas, in order that we may keep pace with the events which are surrounding us.

In regard to this question of the appointment of officials I conceive that there is a great issue involved. It is the question of what we call popular government. I submit that what we call popular government, or have called popular government in the past, is not popular government now and never will be popular government again. It is an entire mistake for us to suppose, for example, that what we call Czarism, that is to say, the government of Russia before the revolution, was a government against which there was a revolt because the Czar was absolute. He was not absolute in the sense in which he is believed to have been absolute. He simply was a representative of special interests, and it was because he was a representative of special interests that he was overthrown.

The despotism under which the world is suffering now is not a despotism of individualism. It is a despotism of special interests. And as my friend below me (Mr. Pillsbury) has said very justly, there is no such despotism as the despotism of a popular majority, and there is no such untrustworthy official as an official who is seeking votes. Those are the dangerous men. What we are trying to obtain now, and what the world is more and more bound to try to obtain in the future, is the suppression of special interests. It is the protection of the whole. That is the one great principle, as I understand it, of popular government now. It is the one thing which is going to separate popular government in the future from popular government in the past, when we believed that everything was to be cured by a vote. It is not that. Everything is to be cured by the concentration of power in some one who really will protect the whole community, the interests of all of us, not the interests of any special class, not the interests of any special majority, not this man or that man or the other man, but the interests of the whole. That is, as I understand it, the scope of government in the future, and as we can approach that we are doing a good work, and as we approach the opposite we are doing harm.

It is for that reason that it seems to me that this resolution, which is favored by my friend, is of very great importance, and I conceive that his advocacy of it was an admirable speech before this Convention. It is a principle which I myself cannot press too hard. I feel it very deeply. It is the one thing which can be the salvation of a democracy and it is the only thing. A democracy which seeks to be a government for the whole people and becomes the government of a special interest or a special majority is the worst despotism that you can have.

This question obtrudes itself on us in every question which has arisen before us. It must intrude itself upon us in every question which shall arise before us. It is the question of the protection of the whole. In other words, it is what is popularly called by that name which is so detestable to this Convention,—it is State Socialism. State Socialism means that the State is the property and the instrument of all of us, and you see the process advancing every day. To-day, for example, it is the taking of the telephone by the government. Yester-day it was the taking of the railroads. The telephone and the railroads, once taken by this government, never are going back. They never can go back, because those are the interests of all of us. They are not the interests of one special corporation or another special corporation. They are the interests of the whole, and they must be managed for the whole and not for any special corporation or any special interest. If we are going to suppress crime we must suppress crime by a man who represents the whole and not a special portion of the community who have voted for him. And that is the principle. That is the principle which we now are sitting here, as the first assembly of this kind which has undertaken to take action since this great war. began, to consider. It is that great principle which I hope we shall express before we rise, and it is for that that I believe this resolution ought to pass.

Mr. Mancovitz of Boston: I agree that the office of district attorney in this Commonwealth is a great and powerful office, and it is the one office that stands between judicial tyranny and the people's rights. Members of the legal profession who have practiced in the criminal courts in our Commonwealth know what that means. The rules of procedure in our courts are such that the truth very seldom appears before a jury in the trial of criminal cases, and the only place where the truth can be brought forth,—the interest of the parties in the prosecution, the witnesses in the Government case, the strong point in the defendant's case,—is in the frank and fair discussion with the district attorney in his office, where the prosecuting officer and his witnesses, the defendant and his witnesses, sit down and discuss the matter. If there is any merit in the defendant's case which would not appear in the course of a trial, the prosecuting attorney will use his judgment and see that mercy is shown and justice is done.

Have we heard from any one in this Convention, or from those who appeared before the committee in favor of this proposition, that there has been abuse of power or that there has been corruption in the office of the district attorney? No. No such condition exists in this Commonwealth.

The distinguished gentleman from Newburyport who appeared before the committee last fall (Mr. Bartlett) found fault because, in the liquor case in which he was interested as counsel for the parties who started the prosecution, he was unsuccessful in sending the offender to jail. He did not know, apparently, that chapter 100, section 65, of the Revised Laws provides that in liquor cases the district attorney is powerless to make a recommendation, or to nol. pros. or file a case.
The case must be dealt with by the court itself. And so it is true in election cases, as well as non-support cases.

In Suffolk County, where I practice and have practiced for nearly 18 years, I believe the criminal docket will show 10,000 cases a year.
If you are going to try each case before a jury and a judge, it will be necessary to increase your courts tenfold and it would become necessary to increase the staff of the district attorney's office tenfold so as to enable him to try each case.

A delegate in this Convention who is a judge of an inferior court appeared before the committee in favor of the appointment of district attorneys by the Attorney-General. Why was he in favor? His answer, at least to the committee, was frank, and this was his answer:
He thought that the district attorney should send for him and obtain his views as to what disposition should be made of the case he tried and from whose decision the defendant appealed.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I should like to ask the member who is speaking why he thinks that those statutes were passed if it was not on account of some abuse of process by the district attorneys.

Mr. Mancovitz: I would point out to the gentleman and to those who believe in the proposition that in case there is abuse of authority there is ample power in the General Court to stop that abuse,—to restrict it.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: Let me say, in answer to the question proposed by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), that those laws were made at the instance of the district attorneys, who came to the Legislature and asked that they be relieved from the pressure, and the principal moving cause that the gentleman from Milton intimates came to protect abuse by the district attorneys, went on the statute-books at the request of the district attorneys themselves.

Mr. Bryant: Why not relieve the district attorneys from pressure in other cases?

Mr. Mancovit: I might say to the gentleman: Relieve the General Court of its functions, and the judge of his functions and have one man act as your creator, administrator, enforcer and dispenser of laws.

I was amazed at the distinguished gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) in this division saying that he believed this proposition is a step forward,—a step forward in democracy. He cites the condition of Russia. Why, the Russian revolt, the condition of Russia, arose because there was a centralization of power in the hands of a few, because the great mass of people could not reach those who had the enforcing power. Those were the conditions that caused the revolution. Just as soon as you change our present system as affecting the district attorney, we will be called upon by the people to change the present method of appointing the judges. The great savior of your judges has been the district attorney, because the poor man without counsel and the unfortunate who have occasion to come into the criminal court do receive the advice and assistance of the district attorney's office; because the district attorney acts not only as attorney for the government, but also as attorney for the defendant, as the defendant is a part of the government whose interests are to be protected. What evidence has come before this Convention that a change is required? None. One delegate to this Convention came before the committee and found fault with the district attorney because the district attorney did not see fit to come and ask him what disposition should be made of the cases. Think of it! Our Constitution gives a man a right of appeal, gives him a right to trial by jury, and if the district attorney sees fit to make a change of disposition, either by a fine or probation, the lower court justice finds fault because the district attorney does not send for him and say: "Here, Mr. Judge, do you think I ought or ought not to change your disposition?" That was the reason why he believed in a change in the system. Do you believe that should be taken into consideration? All men of common sense will say no, it should not.

Men have sat in this Convention and said that they believed in popular government. I am beginning to believe they do not mean what they say. The delegates are afraid of the people. They want to curtail the power of the people. They want to put the power of government in the hands of the few. If you believe in the present thought of democracy, it is my view, sir, that every possible opportunity should be given the people to express their choice upon the public officials, especially those who are charged with the enforcement and administration of law, and I fully expect that the Convention will sustain the report of the committee.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: This is a subject upon which no doubt a very large majority of this Convention certainly is ready to vote, because 150-odd members, as I understand it, are lawyers; they all have made up their minds how to vote on this question. I am not in a position to give very expert judgment on it, but I am in this Convention not to change the Constitution of this grand old Commonwealth in any way unless some good reason is shown for it. I think as long as we have a unanimous report of the committee that this change should not be made, and inasmuch as our Attorneys-General almost without exception in the last few years have come from those who have served in the office of district attorney, it seems to me the case has not been proven that a change is necessary. You must bear in mind that the district attorneys are elected for three years. They all have been very honorable men, so far as I know anything about the district attorneys. Take those who have held the office of district attorney and see how they have gone to be Attorneys-General. Our present Attorney-General, Mr. Attwill, was district attorney in Essex County. Two distinguished members of this Convention have been Attorneys-General, but they have not been district attorneys, and there is a very good reason why. The honorable gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) was not district attorney because he lived in Suffolk County, and nobody would think of running against Mr. Stevens, because he had both nominations all the time. The distinguished member from Everett (Mr. Boynton), although his being a Vermonter would qualify him for any office, could not be elected district attorney in Middlesex County because he was a Democrat. Now we take some of the others. I will be very brief, gentlemen, but I want you to appreciate this. Mr. Swift was Attorney-General, and was district attorney in his district. Mr. Malone was district attorney in Franklin County, Mr. Parker was district attorney in Worcester County. Mr. Knowlton was district attorney. Mr. Marston was district attorney. Mr. Waterman was district attorney. And probably a lot of others. We have a distinguished member here, Mr. French; he never was Attorney-General, but he was a district attorney and nominated by both parties. He was afterwards United States Attorney. And we have Mr. Justice Moody of the Essex District, who was district attorney there. He was afterwards Attorney-General of the United States.

I shall vote for the committee's report, and not to make any change.

The resolution (No. 161) was rejected Friday, July 12, 1918.
Mr. Arthur N. Harriman of New Bedford presented the following resolution (No. 150):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3. The labor of a human being or the right to labor is a personal right and not a property right or a commodity or an article of commerce. The right of any person to leave the employment of another either alone or in company with others shall not be denied or abridged, or its full exercise impeded or invaded by any act of the General Court or by any order of or proceeding in any judicial court. It shall not be unlawful for working-men and women to organize themselves into, or carry on labor-unions for the purpose of lessening the hours of labor or increasing the wages or bettering the condition of the members of such organizations; or carrying out any legitimate imitate purposes as freely as they could do if acting singly.

The committees on Labor and Judicial Procedure, sitting jointly, reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted (Messrs. Brown of Brockton, Ross of New Bedford, Donovan of Lawrence, Shea of Cambridge and Skerrett of Worcester, dissenting).

The views of the majority and the minority of the committees in connection with the above resolution, and also resolutions numbered 30, 146, 219 and 220, presented respectively by Messrs. James A. Donovan of Lawrence, E. Gerry Brown of Brockton, Daniel R. Donovan of Springfield and James T. Moriarty of Boston, were printed as document No. 337, as follows:

The theory upon which all these resolutions proceed obviously is that if their promoters, the labor organizations, can get rid of the law of injunction and thus be free of the only effective power which the courts possess to prevent what is unlawful in their operations, they can control the labor situation and dictate terms to all who wish to engage in labor or to employ it.

Resolutions Nos. 30, 150, 219 and 220 propose to forbid the issue of injunctions in labor disputes, making them alone an exception to the general law. This would result in preventing employers on the one hand, and employees, whether belonging to a union or not, on the other, from effectively enforcing their legal rights in the courts. It would deprive all these persons of the equal protection of the law. Such legislation, as enacted in our St. 1914, chap. 778, has been held by our court to be in conflict not only with our own but with the Federal Constitution, which is beyond our reach. In other words, it is the declared law of Massachusetts that the proposed action would not be valid or of any effect.

There are many and serious objections to the proposed resolutions if they could be carried into effect. They divide the citizens of the Commonwealth into two classes, employers and employees of labor in one class and all other citizens in the other. They put the first class above and outside the general law and leave them to fight out their battles by strategy or force while the public, which has to suffer the consequences, must look on powerless to prevent the resulting paralysis of industry. It can readily be imagined what would happen if the public service corporations, for example, were to suspend their operations with no power in the Commonwealth to compel them to resume their functions. It would amount to surrender of its powers by the Commonwealth into the hands of the corporations.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

As to the effect upon others, a small employer or a non-union man would be powerless in the hands of the body of organized concerns, whether combinations of labor or of capital. The labor-unions themselves could not protect their rights in court. It is true that they are willing and prefer to trust rather to the dominating power of their organizations, but from their own point of view they are unwise in trusting to force rather than to their rights and remedies under the law. From the point of view of the public, they should not be made independent of the law. To confer such a privileged status upon a particular class would not be permissible even if the object deserved favor; much less when the object, openly apparent if not openly avowed, is to control and dominate others equally entitled to the protection of the law.

Resolution No. 146 seeks to incorporate into the Constitution the undisputed abstraction that the right to labor and enjoy its fruits is inherent in the individual. Of course it is, but to declare this in the Constitution would add nothing to the rights of any citizen.

To declare that labor is not property or a property right is a very different matter. It reverses not only the law, which we can do, but the truth, which we cannot do. The right to labor is plainly property, has long been held in law to be property, and is protected as such by law. It is, of course, a personal right, but it is so far in the nature of property, as capable of hire for reward, that the law regards it as also a property right and protects it as such. To a multitude of our citizens outside the labor organizations the right to labor is the most valuable property right they possess. To hamstring this right by taking away from them the only effective means they have of enforcing it would be so oppressive and unjust that it is not to be thought of.

The sole purpose of the resolutions in declaring it not property but a personal right is to put it beyond protection by injunction, as this ordinarily extends only to property rights, and their general purpose is to put the labor-unions in this particular above the restraints of the law, in order that, being free of these restraints, they may dominate and control all labor and set employers of labor at defiance, and having this power may dictate terms not only to independent labor but to employers and to the whole community, which will then be at their mercy; a purpose which does not commend itself to favor.

Shortly stated, among the reasons against doing what is proposed by the resolutions or either of them, these may be taken as conclusive:—

1. It would be idle and ineffective if in violation of the Federal Constitution, as our court has held it to be.
2. While that decision stands it would not become this Convention, in the face of it, to make such an experiment as this upon its power to invade the Federal Constitution.
3. Whether the decision is right or wrong, no man or class of men should be made superior to or independent of the law which governs all others.
4. The declaration that labor or the right to labor is not property is so plainly contrary to the truth that the proposal to put it into the Constitution is absurd upon its face.
5. The proposed action is not likely in the end to be in the interest of the people who seek it; on the contrary, it may prove disastrous to them.
6. It would deprive all independent labor and all employers of labor, who do not seek it, of the common rights which belong to all other citizens.
7. If operating as its promoters evidently desire, it would give to organized labor a virtual monopoly of the whole labor field on its own terms; which is inconsistent with the public interests.

The undersigned members of the Joint Committee on Labor and Judicial Procedure dissent from the report of the majority on Convention document number 30, a resolution designating labor as a personal right rather than a property right and that injunctions should not issue unless irreparable damage is about to be committed and we also dissent from the majority report on Convention documents 146, 150, 219, and 220 wherein the portions of these resolutions contain substantially the definition of labor as contained in document 30, for the following reasons:

1. We believe that labor is a personal right and service and not a commercial commodity.
2. We believe that our civil and criminal courts can give justice to all without the use of injunctions which operate against the innocent as well as the guilty.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

3. We believe that the proposed resolution is in accordance with the so-called Clayton Act, passed by the Congress of the United States and is now a part of our Federal law.

It appears to the undersigned members of the committee while concurring in the foregoing report, that this Convention may afford an opportunity to break the ground for an effective remedy for industrial disputes which at present confessedly is wanting, by empowering the Legislature to establish a tribunal adequate to deal with them according to their nature and character. The courts, proceeding as they must under limited powers and fixed rules, have not been able to adjust the relations between employers and employees to the satisfaction of either. Unrest and agitation are constant, disturbance and interruption of industry are frequent, and we live under the perpetual menace of labor strikes which but recently threatened paralysis of the transportation of the country and may at any time shake to its foundations the industrial system on which the people of Massachusetts depend for their prosperity and many of them for their existence.

While no machinery for dealing with industrial disputes may be able to reach and remove all the causes from which they arise, it is plain that some new agency better adapted to deal with them is imperatively needed, in the interest alike of labor, of employers of labor, and of the people at large. Voluntary arbitration is much resorted to, and the constant recourse to it shows the need of a tribunal with broader powers than the courts possess and the possibilities which lie in this direction. Arbitration, to be effective, must be able to enforce its awards, and the establishment of such an arbitral tribunal is understood to require some modification of our Constitution. Compulsory arbitration has been much discussed; it is not a wholly untried experiment, and many intelligent students of the labor question regard it as the ultimate and only effective remedy for the prevention and redress of industrial disputes.

So far as we can learn, this subject is not otherwise before the Convention. Without professing fixed opinions upon it, and without time to mature them, it appears to us that we ought to avail of this opportunity to enable the Convention at least to consider, if disposed to, a subject of so much importance to our Commonwealth. The accompanying draft of a resolution will serve to show a form of action in the line of the views here expressed.

Form of Resolution Empowering the Legislature to Establish Compulsory Arbitration of Industrial Disputes.

To the end that industrial disputes or disturbances tending toward strikes, lockouts, boycotts or other interruptions of industry may be avoided or if arising may be more speedily and effectively adjusted, the Legislature may establish a system or systems of compulsory arbitration, for the prevention and redress of all disputes or differences, whether between employers of labor and employees in labor, or between employers, or between employees, or otherwise, arising out of, relating to or affecting the collective employment of labor; and may enact any legislation necessary or proper to make any such system fully effective by enforcement of the awards or decisions of any arbitrator or arbitral board or body thereunder, and otherwise. Anything in the Constitution inconsistent with the full effect of this article or of any legislation properly enacted thereunder, is hereby annulled so far as may be necessary therefor and no farther.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The undersigned, a member of the joint committee on Labor and Judicial Procedure, dissents from the report of the majority on Convention document No. 30 (and also on Convention documents 146, 150, 219, wherein these resolutions contain substantially the same definition of labor), and gives notice that for the purpose of obtaining the sense of the Convention upon a definition of labor freed from other subjects which are contained in the said resolutions, he will offer at the appropriate time, as a substitute, the resolution to be found in document No. 342.

E. GERRY BROWN.

Document No. 342 is as follows:

ORIGIN OF CONFLICTING DEFINITIONS OF LABOR PRESENTED FOR SETTLEMENT IN THE CONVENTION.

Congress passed a law known as the Clayton Anti-Trust Act. Therein Congress declares as the law of the United States, that the labor of a human being "is not a commodity or article of commerce." It is distinctly and unquestionably an organic declaration. It is contradictory of that which is now accepted as law in Massachusetts.

In line with the Clayton Law the Legislature of 1914 passed the following chapter 778:

AN ACT TO MAKE LAWFUL CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN EMPLOYERS AND LABORERS AND TO LIMIT THE ISSUING OF INJUNCTIONS IN CERTAIN CASES.

SECTION 1. It shall not be unlawful for persons employed or seeking employment to enter into any arrangements, agreements or combinations with the view of lessening the hours of labor or of increasing their wages or bettering their condition; and no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the Commonwealth or by any judge thereof in any case between an employer and employees or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, or any act or acts done in pursuance thereof, unless such order or injunction be necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property or property right shall be particularly described in the application, which shall be sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

SECTION 2. In construing this act, the right to enter into the relation of employer and employee, to change that relation, and to assume and create a new relation for employer and employee, and to perform and carry on business in such relation with any person in any place, or to do work and labor as an employee, shall be held and construed to be a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment either by the employee or employer where no irreparable damage is about to be committed upon the property or property right of either, no injunction shall be granted but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law.

SECTION 3. No persons who are employed or seeking employment or other labor shall be indicted, prosecuted or tried in any court of the Commonwealth for entering into any arrangement, agreement, or combination between themselves as such employees or laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or increasing their wages or bettering their condition, or for any act done in pursuance thereof, unless such act is in itself unlawful.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the case of John Bogani et al. v. Giovanni Perotti et al. (224 Mass. 152) held the opinion that the statute cannot be sustained. The opening declaration in that opinion is: "THE RIGHT TO WORK IS PROPERTY."

The issue with the declaration in the United States law is at once made. It is plain. It is complete. One is in direct opposition to the other. One is right and one is wrong. The National law says labor is not property; the Massachusetts Supreme Court, which unmakes the law enacted by the Legislature of Massachusetts, says labor is not entitled to this construction.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The court having assumed and declared as fundamental that labor is property the decision proceeds to place that kind of property under the protection of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the property guarantees in the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights.

The court having thus interpreted or expounded its view that the Constitution of Massachusetts contains the declaration that labor is property, there is now offered as a declaration to the contrary the substitute resolution that "the labor of a human being shall not be deemed to be a commodity or an article of commerce."

ARGUMENT.

I disagree with the opinion of the majority (Document 337) that this substitute declaration "reverses the truth." I claim as a fundamental truth, that labor is not a commodity; that there may be labor not a commodity; but labor never is the commodity.

To illustrate, the power is in a law; the law is the expression of the power. The power is antecedent to the law; the power represents the labor power which was exerted to express the will of the people. The law is what the will of the people has created, yet it is not a commodity.

Again the labor power of an officer of the law is not always sufficient to enable him to enforce the law; he needs the additional power of the law. The badge of an officer is the emblem of that power; they must be joined and act together.

The chemicals, fluids, etc. (commodities) entering into the physical body of a human being can be defined; but should the Power, which is the man, and without which there can be no labor and the physical body is inert, should this Labor Power be defined as property? or failing of any definition of what the Labor Power is, may it not be safely declared that it shall not be deemed in this Commonwealth to be a commodity or article of commerce?

Is the freedom of this Power to act,—to give service or not to give service,—to follow the human laws which govern property?

The Clayton Act says "No," the Massachusetts Court says "Yes;" and slavery laws and its advocates said "Yes."

Labor at one time was recognized in law as a commodity, as an article of commerce, something that could be bought and sold the same as cotton and other articles which were the product of that labor could be bought and sold. That was in the days before and after the time when a Massachusetts minister (complete works of Abraham Lincoln, Nicolay-Hay) bought and sold Dred Scott. The Clayton definition is the only logical truth that justifies the legal act giving freedom to the slave.

One decision based upon common law and a later one based upon the Massachusetts Bill of Rights,—all men are born free and equal,—destroyed property title in labor in Massachusetts. If the slave was property the owner's bill of sale of that slave was good title. But somebody had stolen the original title. The Almighty Power gave the title to the Negro personally. It was inherent in him. It was a personal right. There was no property right there. The only attribute of property was his labor power to create Property.

The majority report says, in the sixth paragraph,—its nearest approach to an argument,—"it is of course a personal right, but it is so far in the nature of property as capable of hire for reward, that the law regards it as also a property right and protects it as such." For whom does it protect any property right which the Court assumes that labor has? Is there any doubt that the protection which the Court and the majority report now seeks to maintain is for the benefit of those who desire to give to labor less than labor is entitled to receive? Isn't the argument of the majority an appeal to prejudice against labor? Labor to secure its natural rights is forced to organize against the power of combinations of property which encroach upon those rights. The right to life and liberty is protected by the fourteenth amendment which also mentions property. It is the right to liberty and life which is given by the Clayton Act.

In support of this line of argument and to demonstrate the existence of the two contending forces and which is the better entitled to ask for and to receive the support of the Constitutional Convention, the words of the late Senator Hoar are quoted. They are found in the Congressional Record at the time of the passage of the Sherman Act. They are as follows:—
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

THE CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 66, section 1, after the word "action," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following clause:

Provided. That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. Hoar. Mr. President, I wish to state in one single sentence my opinion in regard to this particular provision. If I correctly understood the Senator from Vermont — I did not hear him fully, and very likely, hearing only a part of what he said, I did not apprehend it — he thought that the applying to laborers in this respect a principle which was not applied to persons engaged in the large commercial transactions which are chiefly aimed at by this bill was indefensible in principle. Now, it seems to me there is a very broad distinction which, if borne in mind, will warrant not only this exception to the general provision of the bill, but a great deal of other legislation which we enact, or attempt to enact, relating to the matter of labor.

When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the State. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the government and the character of the State itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transactions in wheat, or cotton, or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not, or shall deal lawfully or not, shall affect the State injuriously or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborers' wages shall be maintained or advanced, or whether the leisure for instruction, for improvement, shall be shortened or lengthened, is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the State itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible and without which the Republic can not exist, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

Senator Hoar has expounded the principle which should govern in the Convention deliberations concerning labor. Labor is not property; it is not held for sale the same as property is held. Property has many attributes which labor does not have. The only attribute of property in labor which the majority, or its court, can trace is that labor is a service; or, to use the language of the majority is "Capable of hire for reward." When either definition "Service," or "Capable of hire for reward" is given it is a begging of the question whether it is or is not property.

The makers of the Constitution wrote a section providing for the expenses of the government. If labor was property it should and would have been valued and itemized for taxation according to the custom of that time. Property and labor, property and life,—are differentiated in the Constitution. Labor belongs with life; not with property.

If labor is service, and service is property, then at what point or moment of transfer does service become property that cannot be taken without due process of law?

When a man is drafted into army service is his labor property? If his labor is property wherein does he lose the protection of the fourteenth article? If he is property when he is working as a member of a labor-union how does his status change when he is obliged to work for the United States government?

If labor or service is property does each man who is drafted contribute equally? If not why is one obliged to contribute more than another contributes, from the viewpoint of earning power, which he does if service is property?

To say that labor is not a commodity or article of commerce, or conversely to define labor as a power which is antecedent to property, a power without which commodities do not come into existence, is to recognize labor in any form as essentially a part of a unity.

This definition does not, as the majority say "divide the citizens into classes." The majority conception of what labor is, and what labor seeks to accomplish, does make the labor of a wage-earner as a laborer, of a different class from one whose labor is that of a professional nature.

Labor is the operation of the Universal Power to create; in the individual it is the individual expression of that Indivisible Power to create,—its highest function. When the labor power is exercised upon materials then the product of that kind of labor is a commodity or article of commerce. But the labor power is exercised when it finds expression through the production of an idea which may or may not be later clothed with the building designed by the labor power of the architect; or the fitting of the various parts to the building by the labor power of the mechanic; or the labor power used in evolving the laws that keep people out of trouble, or get them into it, providing for deeds, contracts, etc., concerning the building; or the labor power of the sermon which teaches the Brotherhood of Man, founded on the truth that all honest labor is an expression of the highest labor unity; and those who have ten talents of labor power should help,—not despoil,—those who have only one talent of labor power, for conscience is indissolubly diffused in labor power.

Not content with its majority report against the declaration that labor is not property and having finished its opinions that labor is property and is under the protection that is found in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States nine members of the Judiciary originate a resolution which in entitled: "Form of Resolution Empowering the Legislature to Establish Compulsory Arbitration of Industrial Disputes." If this resolution is based upon their declaration that labor is property they should amend the title so that it might read "a Resolution to provide that in labor disputes, property may be taken without due process of law."

Prejudice often governs where reason should prevail. The majority opinion appeals to prejudice based upon what has been, and what may be. Truth does give power, but power should never be used which does not clearly find its base in truth. Sophistry may for a time blind the eyes of those who seek truth carelessly, but not those who have no desire for anything but the truth.

The only relief from the Supreme Court decision is in this Constitutional Convention. The declaration enacted by the Congress of the United States and signed by President Wilson establishes the principle as a law of the United States that the labor power of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Will the Convention sustain the Massachusetts declaration?

Article V of the Bill of Rights declares that judicial authority is an agent of
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The people and at all times accountable to them. This Convention is the people. Will it a. a sovereignty sustain its Congress and its President of the United States?

The National Republican platform says: "We pledge the Republican party to the faithful enforcement of all Federal laws passed for the protection of labor."

The National Democratic platform says: "We have lifted human labor from the category of commodities. We have protected the rights of the laborers against the unwarranted issuance of injunctions."

The Massachusetts Legislature, following these pledges, enacted in 1914 chapter 778.

The Supreme Court has reversed that action. The Constitutional Convention is asked to sustain the first four, by voting for the resolution contained in document No. 342.

The resolution was as follows:

The labor of a human being shall not be deemed to be a commodity or article of commerce. And the Legislature shall not pass a law nor the courts construe any law of the Commonwealth contrary to this declaration.

The resolution (No. 150) was considered by the Convention Thursday, July 18, 1918.

Mr. E. Gerry Brown of Brockton moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 15, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the words "The labor of a human being shall not be deemed to be a commodity or article of commerce. And the Legislature shall not pass a law nor the courts construe any laws of the Commonwealth contrary to this declaration."

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution (No. 150) was rejected Friday, July 19, 1918.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: This is perhaps one of the most mooted questions that has been before the people of this Commonwealth. It has reached down into the very life of the people, and because of the conditions that have existed there has been a certain class of the citizens of this Commonwealth upon whom the contest has been forced, and I refer to those people in industry who have become organized. The entire labor movement, — and I make no distinction, sir, between organized labor and the labor movement, — has been affected by this usurpation of the power of the courts against the welfare and the well-being of the people. There are men here who will not agree with the position taken by those in the labor movement, but let me, if I may, trespass upon the time of this Convention to sketch in a brief and somewhat hurried manner the conditions that have given rise to this great question that has become involved in our industrial life.

It is inconceivable, sir, that those men who formed the first Constitution could have conceived of the industrial conditions which have come to exist in our present life. We then had an individualistic system which has gone on until it has become collective, and capital has organized upon the one side and labor on the other. It has become inevitable that these two forces, struggling for existence, sooner or later should be brought into direct conflict, and some time or other, under some conditions, somewhere, the battle line will be drawn, and then and there at that time, beyond the control of any men upon either side of the controversy, the battle will be fought to a finish, and in that battle is concerned every private interest, the welfare and the well-being of the entire people of our country. This contest is inevitable. As I have said, those men who drew the Constitution did not realize, and they had no means of knowing, the conditions that are in industry to-day. As time has gone on we have found that the industrial problems of our life have entered the political field, and we are confronted to-day with problems which affect the welfare of our entire people. The bread and butter problems of our people are being debated upon the floors of Legislatures and are being decided not alone in the halls of labor organizations and upon the fields of industry, but they have been thrown into the parliamentary phase of our system and there they are for settlement, and they must be settled. There is no man here who can shut his eyes to the fact that sooner or later this great question of capital and labor has got to be settled, and for the peace and prosperity of our country it must be settled right.

I do not stand here to-day and say that all the virtue and all the wisdom is confined within the ranks of labor. Far from it. Neither do I ascribe to the other side all the vices and iniquities that human flesh is heir to. Under our competitive system both sides are obliged to depend for their very existence upon the question of the survival of the fittest. The weaker must succumb to the stronger. In doing this there is injustice. Now, then, this contest is inevitable, and as labor organizations have become powerful, and as they have desired better treatment and a larger share in the productions of their hands and brains, they have gone into the political field to get them, and they have gone, not as I wish they would have gone, as a political organization of their own, but they have gone in and sought to convert, either by persuasion or by coercion, the politicians of the various political parties, doing it out of dire necessity, and saying to them:
"If you don't do as we say, if you don't follow as we wish you to do, you will be retired to private life". That has been one of the phases thus far, of this great struggle. What do we find? We find that some men have succumbed. Men have said that this is wrong, that it is class legislation. It is the only avenue that labor has taken to protect the worker upon the industrial field.

There is provided a court of last resort, and in this country it is the courts. And I say here to-day that the courts, as our jurisprudence system is constructed and administered to-day, are the last citadel of private privilege, and there private privilege is being defended upon this, its last bulwark for its salvation. The working people have risen and captured, or are capturing, the political arm of our government. To protect property is the primal mission of the courts, always has been from time immemorial, for the first property right was that of a man to own the labor of another man. And so to-day in the courts, not through any personal desire of their own, but through precedent and through that theory that property must be protected above everything else, what do we find? We find that these modern industrial questions are passed to the courts.

And I want to digress just far enough to say that there has not been an issue before this Convention, from the time the President's hammer fell in our organizing until to-day, that has meant anything to the people of this Commonwealth that has not involved the principle of where does the determination of the police power of the people lie. That has been involved in every question before this Convention. The police power lies with the people. We admit it. But, sir, who is to interpret that police power? To-day the courts do it. To-day the courts have in their hands the power to nullify and make ineffective the legislation of the representatives of the people, and they do it, and you and I know that they do it. Need I refer to any more glaring case, and, sir, it may be the Dred Scott decision of the labor question, than that on the child labor law, or the more recent one of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, where the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that it is illegal for a man in the employ of another to ask a fellow-worker to join an industrial organization if in joining that it will curtail the privileges of the corporation by which he may be employed? Can you consider anything more dangerous to the liberty of the people than that?

Again let me refer to the child labor law, and I do it because it is typical of any Supreme Court. The child labor law was passed after a long, long campaign, and in it was involved the fact that some States which were perfectly willing, and others under the lash, — and I say it of Massachusetts as well as of other States, — under the lash of organized labor, declared that the labor of children was illegal. By and by it came to the court at Washington, our Supreme Court. After all this agitation, after child labor was admittedly wrong, and after Congress had passed a bill and after the President had signed it, a Supreme Court that is amenable to no force under our government, that has no responsibility to any one as an organization other than as its members in their own humble opinion may view those questions, that court by a majority of one has said that the act to curtail the commerce in child labor, and consequently kill child labor and make it unprofitable, is not legal.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: The gentleman is referring, I take it, to the North Carolina child labor situation and the recent decision of the Supreme Court. Does he mean to say that the Federal law which was there attacked rested on any exercise of the Federal police power?

Mr. Harriman: In reply to the honorable gentleman in the third division (Mr. Washburn of Middleborough) I want to say that I have reference to the Supreme Court decision which recently has annulled the child labor act, the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: As I understand the North Carolina case the Federal statute rested on an assumed exercise of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, and on nothing else, and the decision of the court was in effect that that law invaded the police power of the States. It did not undertake to say that child labor was unconstitutional. The Federal law had sought to provide that products which were the result of child labor should not go into interstate commerce, and the Supreme Court said that such legislation was undue interference with the police power of the States. Is not that the fact?

Mr. Harriman: It is the fact, and I tried to make this point: That the police power lies in the people, and the police power that governs the welfare of our entire people lies in the Congress of the United States, as does the police power of Massachusetts lie within the confines of its own Legislature.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: How can the gentleman say in one breath that the police power is within the jurisdiction of Congress alone, and then in the next breath say that the police power of Massachusetts rests exclusively with our State Legislature?

Mr. Harriman: I want to say that to my mind the objection is not valid that the gentleman has raised, because interstate commerce means what it says,—States with States. To my mind, the answer is, if a majority of the States in this country ordain a certain thing it should be the law of our entire country. So far as the State itself is concerned it is left under our government to the States, but there are some things that radiate from our State into other States. And there is more of an argument, if I may digress, for National prohibition than there is for prohibition in each of the individual States. It affects them all. For that same reason the Supreme Court of the United States has no right to interfere with an act passed by Congress. I was assured this morning by a distinguished member of this Convention, that law was the administration of common sense and justice, and if that be so, is there anything that you can conceive of in common sense and justice anywhere where our flag waves and where American citizenship is supposed to rule, is there any thought in this land that would say child labor under any condition was right?

I have digressed somewhat from injunctions, and I would touch upon that later. In my belief injunctions are but a small part of the evil. They are one of the outgrowths of this tyrannical,—and I use it advisedly,—system that has grown up in allowing a few men to set themselves above the acts of the people. That is the clear drawn issue, and upon that issue I and I believe other labor men are willing to be measured.

It has been said in this Convention, said during the initiative and referendum debate, which some of you may recollect, that labor attacks the courts, that labor would do away with the courts. Sir, it is not so. Labor is defending itself and through itself is defending the people in their liberties against the encroachments of a system which has grown up in our courts and through our courts, and the sooner that it is realized the better. There are men, not labor men alone, but there are men who have sat upon some of the highest courts in this land, men who have occupied positions of Chief Justices of States, who say to-day, and say openly, that they believe, sir, that the Supreme Court of the United States should not have the power to pass upon acts of Congress. That, sir, is revolutionary to some, but it was not revolutionary at the formation of our government. When Mr. Justice Marshall decided the Marbury case and established a precedent many men doubted the wisdom of that decision, and Thomas Jefferson is quoted as saying that the Justice should have been impeached for that decision. And so you see that there has been all through, even from the inception of our government, that idea that the people should be free and untrammelled in their exercise of the police power which undeniably belongs to them. The labor movement has been charged with being opposed to the courts, with wanting to destroy them, but, sir, let me ask you as I stand here to-day, and as labor men review some of the acts that have transpired and say that they have seen what we claim is injustice done, what can you blame us for thinking?

It is said here, and of course men may rise and say, that all men have an equal chance before the law. They do theoretically, but they do not in practical, every-day affairs of the courts. For instance, a man who has money, a corporation that has plenty of the wealth of the land, can hire good lawyers, smart lawyers, the leading lawyers of the bar. Not only that, but they can stand the expense of long drawn out litigation, or the making of long drawn litigation if it is for their advantage. Can an ordinary man, without money do it? Of course he cannot. I will admit, I am not attacking the individuals on the bench; if you once get before them you get justice so far as in my opinion they will give it. There has been an attack upon this floor in this Convention upon the election of judges. I voted for the election of judges because I believe that it would tend to take away some of the criticism and some of the ill feeling, and would make them a bit more democratic and responsible to the people, but, sir, either under an elective, an appointive, or a selective system of getting our judges the source of supply is the same, the lawyers. They are human, some good, some bad, all trying to do, I presume, as well as they can. But, sir, let me tell you that human selection does not create infallibility, and a judge may err, and what we are protesting against is a system that will allow even an honest man with a mistaken judgment to set aside the will of the people and allow bad legislation, legislation that ill affects the entire people, to become the law of the land, and that is the great, and the only great phase that affects the people of this country.

Now our injunctions. We find that injunctions have been issued for almost everything under the sun. Men have been thrown into jail. To show how injunctions are issued, during one of the strikes in Bethlehem in the steel works they got out injunctions against a body of men, hauled them up into court and finally went to trial, and they had this trial, and they had it in the office of the Steel Trust. They had constabulary all around that place and no man but the officers of the law was allowed, and one attorney for thirty-three men. The men were convicted and fined $1000 for throwing stones. Take the Debs case, — and that is a fair case in many ways. There are two lessons to be drawn from it. Debs at that time was the secretary of what was then the trainmen's organization. A strike was impending. The railroad men in Chicago organized, as did the labor men, knowing that the war was coming. The labor men employed an attorney, the railroads employed an attorney, and the strike came. The railroads' attorney went down to the Department of Justice and got himself appointed as a special district attorney and helped issue the writs against Debs. And I want to ask, would the Department of Justice have made a special district attorney out of the attorney for the labor men? That case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. There are two phases of it to which I want to draw your attention. It was decided, even in those days, that the Constitution of the United States was drawn so close that it had power over those working upon railroads, that they could not go out on a sympathetic strike. And in the Adair case, where a man was discharged from his position because he belonged to a labor organization, that same court declared that the power of the Constitution was so loose, it was so loosely constructed, that they did not have any control over the employment of men in that industry. Mr. Debs was sentenced to six months in jail under the Sherman Act, — under one part of it. It went along, and that act was somewhat amended, and then came before that selfsame court, — true, with a somewhat different personnel, — the case of the Standard Oil Company. They were convicted, but instead of giving them six months in jail as they gave a working-man they gave them six months to rearrange their charter. Do you think that the labor people of this country do not realize and recognize those things? Can you blame them for believing that they did not get a square deal from that arm of the government? In nine cases out of ten they have had absolutely no voice at all. And I want to say now that I believe that the only cure, I believe that the thing that will strike right to the very roots of the evil which does exist, is taking from the courts the power to declare acts of Legislatures unconstitutional.

In this great contest that has grown up I want you to realize that fundamentally the law does not recognize the working-man. He has absolutely no protection, or recognition of his rights, under our law. It is said in our Constitution, and we are taught, that a man has an inalienable right to work. What does that mean? It means that he can work anywhere. And yet there is no provision made for his securing work if he is not to be employed at a profit, and if he does not work he becomes a loafer. If he becomes a loafer he becomes a vagrant. If he becomes a vagrant he gets into court and is convicted and becomes a criminal.

Now, these are in part the bill of grievances which labor has to present. There are men in this Convention who can discuss more intelligently the practical working out of injunctions. I am not going to cover that, for I do not think it is wise for one man or two men to cover the same ground. But I do want to say that when we go to court, and I want you men to realize it, particularly the lawyers in this Convention, we do not find fault as an organization, nor do the people, with the justice that is doled out between man and man. If I have a friend who goes to court, has a suit against another, loses his case, and then comes to me for sympathy, the only sympathy I give him is that he did not hire a good lawyer. That is his business, and does not affect the community at large. But, sir, it does affect the community where there is legislation, and particularly progressive legislation that is nullified or where there are injunctions issued against us. The only thing that can accrue to the benefit of the man who has asked injunction has been the power to discourage industrial organization among the men or among the women who work, and in nine cases out of ten injunctions that have been issued on the flimsy excuse that men would do some wrong have been issued with the direct and open purpose on the part at least of the manufacturer to discourage industrial organization.

And why do men fear industrial organization? Why is it that those men in industry who have grown strong and powerful through organization and through collective effort should seek to deny to their workmen the very weapon by which they became a power in their industrial life? It is because they know that their profits and that their material prosperity have been made out of the labor of other human beings, and if they can make it a property right let me tell you they will in turn use it to further enslave the working people of this and every other country. I want to say now that while the chains of slavery were stricken from the black man, that did not abolish the system of slavery in our civilization; and that slavery exists where it is in the power of any man to say: "You can work for me or you can walk the streets", and then he does not employ men unless there is profit in it. And so the profit system goes on and on until at last it reaches that point where the workmen themselves are forced by economic pressure to do,—what? To benefit their condition, and the moment they start to benefit their condition they find themselves opposed to the material welfare of those who employ them.

I know of but a very few instances where labor has had anything personal against those who employed it. It has been the system that it has rebelled against. In our neighboring city of Lynn to-day what do we find? We find one of the greatest and most powerful organizations refusing to their men the right to organize,—and why? I have asked that question several times. Because it means that if the men organize they will get shorter hours of labor, they will get better wages and they will get better conditions, and they themselves will have a voice in the industry by which they earn their living. Now let us analyze that for a moment. It is wrong for men to organize, and if you men will read document No. 150, which I brought into the Convention, you will find that it allows men to organize, gives them the constitutional right, which we now believe they have, but which has been infringed by injunctions and by other acts of Legislatures and courts. We believe that they should have that right. If they organize it means that they are in a position to bargain collectively with their employer, it means that they are not going to work at the hour the employer says, or at his wages. It means that they are going to have shorter hours of labor. Is there a man here who will defend long hours of labor? They will when they are employed as attorneys, but not when they sit-in this Convention.

Now let us come to wages. If the employee gets more wages, it means to a certain extent that there are less profits to those who employ them, therefore it is not good business, so far as the accumulation of dollars and cents is concerned.

Now we come to conditions, and conditions, let me say to you men, are many times more vital to the worker than his hours of labor or wages, for conditions mean health and safety of life and of limb. And out of that there is another phase, and I beg this Convention again to digress just a bit. Out of that condition has grown the demand for a workmen's compensation act. It has been touched upon in this Convention. And why came it about? It came about because of conditions in industry, where men, women and children were maimed and killed, and so the organized movement which represented the workers had to take on the burdens and come before Legislature after Legislature, asking for relief. And I want to point out, so far as those three defences which were made so much of, that they were placed in our law, not by statute law, but by judicial decisions, and if there ever was a case upon record where working-men have suffered and where the people have suffered by judge-made law it was upon this protection of property by the courts.

I want to speak now in regard to our workmen's compensation. Some of you may not know, if you do not you all should know, of the bitter, bitter battle which was conducted in this very room for this great measure; and who opposed it? Why was it opposed? It was opposed for the very reason that it meant less profits to the employing interests of this Commonwealth, and you cannot advance a single argument other than that.

I challenge any man on this floor to say that there was any other reason for that, only that it meant more money to the workers and therefore it must come out of industry. And so there was established in this Commonwealth the theory that industry should bear at least a part of the burden, and a law was passed. It is very interesting. The law was passed, and the people assumed that it meant what it said, that the workers of this Commonwealth were to be protected in industry. It did not go as far as it should have gone. The State, to my mind, should have established a State fund and forced every man into it. And at once and for all, and this is where we should have the police power, they should have declared that there should be no agency in the Commonwealth that should make money out of the crushed bone and sorrow and suffering of the workers, the producers, in this Commonwealth. That is the theory of it.

Now, what does the decision of the court do? A man said to me in the lobby this morning that that did not amount to a great deal; but it does, and I hope to be able to show the Convention, at least what our fears are by past experience, that it amounts to a great deal. The Supreme Judicial Court through a decision in 1915 on the assumption of risk, and I read that "the assumption of risk meant that by accepting employment in any industry the workmen entered into an unexpressed, tacit contract that they would bear all the suffering and loss that came to them," the court found that practically all cost and loss were to be accepted. The Workmen's Compensation Act abolished this cruel and unfair doctrine, along with two others which the courts had created, "fellow-workmen" and "contributory negligence". But the Supreme Judicial Court in Ashton v. B. & M. R.R., 222 Mass. page 69, tells us that

It is well settled that where one is employed to perform manifestly dangerous work, there is no liability where the risks growing out of the work are assumed by the laborer by his contract of employment.

Thus the Supreme Judicial Court in 1915 ignores the law of 1911 which abolished the doctrine of assumption of risk, and it assumes the existence and force of that doctrine, as though the Legislature never had spoken.

Again, the same court:

The removal of such defence has no application in a case of this kind where evidence shows that the deceased assumed the risk by virtue of his contract of employment.

That, sir, is the decision of our court. It will be said that it does not go as far as the act, but it was an entering wedge. I am not a lawyer, but I know that cases are decided on precedent, that one judge draws it from another, and if one judge goes a little way another judge may go a little way further. I know that if there is any force that is able even in the least to interfere with or to annul or to curtail the power of this act the court that allows a little of it will allow a greater and a still greater share, until perchance that act in itself will revert back to where it was before. But now what happened; — and again I give simply a side light. In regard to this the Legislature of 1911, and I read just a section of the 1911 law, because it may throw some light, said that

In an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in the course of employment, it shall not be a defense that the employee or a fellow-workman was negligent, or that the employee had assumed the risk of the injury.

In addition to this case, the case of Johnson v. Cochrane Chemical Company, in the same volume, seems to set up the discredited fellow-workman idea. And there you have it. There you have it again in practically modified form. There you have another occasion of where the court has interfered, interfered with the will of the Legislature that meant so much to the women and children of this Commonwealth for their protection.

Oh, can you think that there is no unrest? I heard a man in this Convention deliver an address, and he said there was not any unrest that he had been able to find. Sir, there is unrest. I have here the testimony given before the Industrial Commission at Washington several years ago, and they divide that testimony, — I am not going to read this entire book, — they divide the testimony in this book given at that hearing. They called before that investigation probably scores and scores of lawyers and men in all walks of life, and out of that this much here (indicating) that I show is devoted to labor and liability. Men came from all walks of life before that commission. Here and there they picked out the best men they could find to come before that body and express to them their idea.

Judge Cowan of New York, who has occupied a high position, — has been Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals, if I remember right, — appeared before that commission and said that the issuance of injunctions and the interference with legislative power to his mind was the cause of industrial unrest. Judge Clark of North Carolina said the same thing. Let me show you. Ordinarily every man believes that where the courts are open men are entitled to a civil trial; yet in West Virginia, during a strike, martial law was declared. Courts were open and yet the martial law tried them and fined them, and courts held that trial by military authority was legal. And it went so far that Judge Cowan was obliged to make a public statement. He said in that statement if that was allowed to stand, the liberties of this country were in danger and absolutely had no standing.

Those are some of the things. While they have occurred in other States, and while I am willing to admit that perhaps in Massachusetts we have not had the same industrial unrest that we have elsewhere; while I am willing to admit that our courts perchance are better than theirs, — it is tinged with local pride, — I say to you that those decisions that I have named are detrimental and breed unrest because there is a feeling in the mind of every man, particularly those of the Anglo-Saxon race, that he has a right to trial by jury; that it is an inalienable right, and these decisions would deprive him of the right of trial by jury, would deprive him of one of the God-given liberties for which his forefathers fought and for which he is willing to die if necessary to preserve those selfsame liberties. And that, sir, is the issue so far as the courts are concerned.

And now I will touch briefly upon injunctions, because they apply to this State. We have in this State wide sweeping decisions of the courts in regard to injunctions. Adopting the same course that was adopted under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the organized labor people of this Commonwealth and others came and asked for an anti-injunction law, and it was passed, passed by representatives of the people; and again we supposed that the voice of the people was supreme. But lo and behold, we find that again it was but an illusion. Again there stood that selfsame force which again would annul the voice of the people. Sometimes I wish that I was a lawyer and sometimes I am satisfied because I am not. Because if I were a lawyer perhaps I could discuss this question of injunctions more ably and go into the law better for your information from our standpoint. However, this anti-injunction law was passed, and then the Supreme Judicial Court, in a decision handed down, nullified and declared unconstitutional the anti-injunction Act of 1914. This act has been on the statute-books of Great Britain,—practically the same law,—for forty years. It was not drawn in Massachusetts but was the work of the best talent that the American Federation of Labor could procure.

The most striking thing about this decision is the complete reversal,—and here again is a different phase of it; here again will be shown when the courts on another occasion took position diametrically opposite to this, in which they reversed themselves, showing that they are not infallible and that it is far safer to rest it in the chosen representatives of the people and the people themselves than in a body of men responsible to no man other than to him who appointed them, and thereupon that responsibility practically ceases to exist. In December, 1892, when Dinah Worthington and others of Fall River struck for higher wages, were defeated and black-listed and went into court with a petition that the employers be restrained from interfering with their rights to earn a livelihood by maintaining a black-list and that they be enjoined to withdraw and destroy all black-lists, the court replied (Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, 423):

The rights which the petitioners allege the defendants were violating—

Now listen to this, — these rights to earn a livelihood,— are personal rights, as distinguished from rights of property.

Their case was dismissed without injunction or other form of relief.

When, however, in Haverhill the Shoe Manufacturers' Association appealed to the court against the labor agents, the Supreme Judicial Court said:

The right to labor and to its protection from unlawful interference is a constitutional as well as a common law right. (Cornellier v. Haverhill Shoe Manufacturers' Association, 221 Mass. 554, 550.)

The Supreme Judicial Court, in its last decision on this matter,—this is the case in which there arose the question of the constitutionality of the Anti-injunction Act of Massachusetts (Acts of 1914, c. 778),—quotes in 1916 several decisions supporting the following declaration:

The right to work, therefore, is property. (Bogni v. Perotti, 224 Mass. 152, 155.)
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES. 1057

In the Fall River case the court said the right to earn a livelihood is a personal right. Nearer our time it said this is a property right. [Reading]

It is protected by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and by numerous guaranties of our Constitution. It is as much property as the more obvious forms of goods and merchandise, stocks and bonds.

And that, sir, was the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in reversing itself, putting labor in the class with bonds and stock and livestock. There is no difference, sir, between labor and the material of manufacture. It is raw material. It is the same under this decision, and in our industrial system it is in the same position as a bale of cotton, with one exception,—if business is not good a manufacturer can put a bale of cotton on the shelf and let it stay, but he cannot put a weaver on the shelf or he will starve and die. That individual has got to eat, and there is the human element that enters into it that differentiates between labor and property. And so we find the court in reversing itself has come to protect property in preference to the right of the working-class, and it quotes,—oh, you lawyers must laugh and smile to yourselves when it quotes the fourteenth amendment to protect property rights: oh, you men know as well as I that the fourteenth amendment never was intended to protect property rights. You men know that it was meant primarily to protect the Negro in the south after the war, that those men who voted for it had no idea of its being used for the protection of property, and not until 1882, where a railroad in one of the western States thought itself used unfairly, was it ever invoked to that end. No man ever had thought of it until some bright lawyer had an idea that he would get away with it, and he did get away with it and carried it on until it became the judge-made law of the land behind which every private interest has hidden and has plundered the people of this country right and left and has been protected.

Why, sir, out of fifty-one cases that have been brought to the Supreme Court of the United States under that amendment, only eleven of them, I think, relate to personal right and in only one of those was the plaintiff successful in his litigation. Oh, you men know that that amendment has been perverted to protect property rather than person, and these men get behind that fourteenth amendment and say: "Oh, this law is unconstitutional." And let me say now that whether you change your Constitution or not, the time is coming, my friends, when the things that are not constitutional now will be constitutional and the things that are constitutional now will be unconstitutional then. Because times change; we live in change, and the things that are not good must pass. There is a higher law, there is a higher voice, there is a last court of resort that is higher than any Supreme Court, higher than the quibblings of lawyers. It is the court of public opinion, and in that court of public opinion will be decided, as was decided the freedom of the black man,—will be decided the freedom from wage slavery of the white man. This I believe to be true. I may not live and you may not live to see the fruition of these ideas, but, my friends, they are coming. Is there a man here who will deny that Government is controlling more than ever before? Is there a man here but who will admit that you cannot regulate another man's business? It has been tried. You cannot do it. A thing must be owned publicly or it must be owned privately; there is no middle ground. And which is it going to be? It is going to be, in my opinion, the view of the majority that in this great war for democracy,—why, sir, the people actually believe it; they are coming to believe it,—they are coming to believe that democracy means something more than casting the ballot, that democracy means a square chance in life, that democracy means shorter hours, better labor conditions, wages that are commensurate with the standard of living. That is what they mean by democracy now. And how are you going to get it? There is only one way, and that is for democracy to enter industry.

Now there are men here who do not believe it, but you at least want to pay attention perhaps not to my voice but to this phase of it. Democracy is going to enter industry, and those people who are employed in industry are going to have a larger voice in the government of that industry. They are going to have a larger share in its output, and if once started on its road it will continue until the workers control the entire industry in which they labor. And if they do that, my friends, you will have linked with your political arm of your government industrial solidarity. And I say now the only safeguard, the only safeguard that can accrue to our people,—and I want to stop long enough to say that I do not include simply the wage-earners in the working-class; every one who does anything of usefulness belongs to it,—the only thing that can accrue to the future prosperity of our land or the world is that industrial democracy, the people in industry, should be allowed to express themselves upon the political field. If we do not have this it will be either the bomb or the bullet, one or the other. I believe that in this country we can avoid that condition. But you never can avoid it if you allow any arm of your government that is irresponsible and unregulated to stand between the people and better conditions of livelihood. And the courts of this country do it, they are hedged in by precedent; they are hedged in by all the legal technicalities that a man can imagine. The average man who comes to the bench comes colored one way or the other; and if he be colored, if he be tinged with progressivism, let me say that there is not a force under God's heaven that is not used to keep him from that position. And while it may be true or untrue, I want to make this statement which cannot be denied, that the conservatives of this country never played into the hands of their opponents as they did when they opposed the appointment of Mr. Justice Brandeis to the Supreme Court. You cannot convince the great mass of people of this country but what the fundamental opposition to the confirmation of Mr. Justice Brandeis was the fact that he was known to be a progressive and consequently was unsafe and did not have a judicial atmosphere about him to sit upon the Supreme Bench of the United States. They may say: "It is not so;" and it may not be so, but you cannot convince the rank and file of the people that it was not so. You will find everywhere that where men tinged with progressivism come up that same opposition is against them; and why? It is because, as I said in the first place, the principle has been, the custom of law from its inception down to the present day, has been to protect property, and there to the courts property flies for protection,—and gets it.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The labor movement has no desire to take property away from a man, it has no desire to work an injustice; but, sir, it does hold this great principle, and it is the fundamental principle of democracy, that no man,—no man,—has a right to acquire property and use it to the ill of any other man. That is why we are finding fault, because no man has a right to take unto himself the products of other men's toil and by doing that work a hardship on any human being on the face of the earth. That, sir, to my mind is the science of government; that, sir, to my mind is the goal we are approaching. It will be hindered, it will be impeded, but, sir, the end is as sure and certain as that the sun will rise and that the sun will set. And this great war that is going on is going on because primarily, fundamentally, the peoples of the world do not have an opportunity to govern themselves. You can have legislators elected and you can have the initiative and referendum, but, sir, no more dangerous step ever was made, no greater blow ever was received by progressive legislation in this Commonwealth, than when there was put into the I. and R. the protection of our judicial power. Can you conceive of a free and enlightened government where there are three arms of our government,—the executive elected, the legislative elected, but the judiciary entirely free from any restraint whatever other than their own opinion? Oh, I believe it is a fundamental weakness in our Government. This government will survive. This government will survive even if that change has taken place. And I want to assure you again in closing that I have no fault to find with the judges. They are honorable men. But, sir, they are dealing with machinery that is antiquated and was not made to fit the present industrial conditions which have invaded the field of politics and which will invade it still more. I am pleading to-day for the enactment of this legislation that will give to the worker the right to organize and give to him that fundamental right to do collectively what he can do singly, to give to him the assurance that labor is not property, that labor is something that is holy in itself, and I trust this Convention will do it. But if this Convention does not do it the end is not yet. We will go on and go on till every barrier protecting private interests,—the interests of those men who would live by the sweat of another man's brow,—is removed and until every man, woman and child shall have an equal opportunity, and with that equal opportunity will come equal chance before the law and where no man will have incentive through material interest to injure the welfare and the well-being of his fellow-men, the State. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I have a great deal of sympathy with much that my brother in the first division, the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), has said, and I have had occasion to consider and be brought near the problems of labor a good deal in the last ten years. I was on the committee with the gentleman from Clinton (Mr. Saunders) which drew the Workmen's Compensation Act, and in that connection we saw a great deal of the laboring men, union labor and others. I was for a short time the chairman of the then newly created State Board of Labor and Industries, and in that connection saw a good deal of the union and non-union laboring men. And I am heartily in sympathy with many of the things which they seek to do. And I will say in parenthesis that they understand what they want and get it very much better than the people who are supposed to be opposed to them, namely, the capitalists. They get legislation, much of which is good legislation in my mind. They get it more successfully than the people who are opposed to that legislation get things which they want. And why do they do it? I merely put this in because I think other people should draw a lesson from the union laboring men. They get it because they keep to their job. They keep all the time before themselves the possibility of getting legislation which they want, and they see to it that that always is before the minds of the people and of the Legislature. For that I say they deserve the laws that they have got, many of which, as I say, in my opinion are very good laws.

Now my brother has covered rather a wide field in his remarks and I shall try to narrow it down to the proposition which is before us. In the first place, I wish to deny an idea which I do not think the gentleman meant to give but which apparently ran through his remarks, and that is that unionism was illegal. Unionism has been legal in this State since 1842 at least. In that year Chief Justice Shaw,—a name not very much liked by our labor friends,—but Chief Justice Shaw held that a labor-union was legal and that people for joining a union, merely for that reason, could not be indicted for conspiracy. So that since 1842 at least labor-unions have been legal in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I suppose that you allude to the decision in which the judge laid down the dictum that what it was lawful for one to do it was not unlawful for them to gather together in union to do, and that a man could not be bound by the acts of a certain organization unless he himself participated in it? Is that the one you refer to?

Mr. Lowell: I refer to the case of Commonwealth v. Hunt—

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Lowell:—which is one of the leading cases in this country, if not the leading one.

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Lowell: In support of union.

Mr. Brown: I recognize it; that is it.

Mr. Lowell: That has been the law here, I say, since 1842.

There has been a great deal of talk by the member from New Bedford, and a great deal of it I sympathize with, that courts always have not been just and fair to labor men; and they have not. There is no question of that, that in many States injunctions have been issued at times when they should not have been. I agree to that, that sometimes in this State, though less than in other States, certain injunctions have been issued and carried out in a way in which they should not have been. I agree to that. But that is not the proposition before us. In the first place, the resolution which we are talking about, No. 150, starts out with this:

The labor of a human being or the right to labor is a personal right and not a property right or a commodity or an article of commerce.

With that declaration, I sympathize. I do not believe in it, I do not think it is true altogether, but I sympathize. I do not blame the gentleman from New Bedford from feeling himself, we will say, degraded by being classed with a bale of cotton as a commodity, and I realize his idealism in trying to get something against that into our Constitution. But the fact, as I see it, — and we perhaps are going into metaphysics, which is not, I think, a very good excursion, but I will not take you very far, — the fact is that labor is in a certain sense a personal right; of course it is. I cannot be made to dig in my garden unless I want to, — as I do perhaps once a week. But labor is also in a sense property, because there is nothing made anywhere to which labor is not a part, and it is property also in this regard:
The courts have drawn a distinction, and as it seems to me a very proper one, in cases where there is a contract to labor. If there is a contract to labor, then that contract to labor by the man who is going to do the labor is a property right, and the courts have made him fulfill that contract.

Mr. Brown: Mr. President.
The Presiding Officer: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Lowell: I yield, if he does not go too far into metaphysics.

Mr. Brown: I thank you, sir. I certainly shall not, because I am going to narrow my remarks very closely. Please tell me this:
True, it is your right to labor in that garden. You may elect not to labor in that garden, but when does that become property? At what point from the time you start to labor till the time you get through, — at what point is that property?

Mr. Lowell: That leads us into metaphysics and I merely say that my feeling on the subject, which is worth as much or as little as the next man's, is that a man's right is personal until he agrees to give it to somebody else, and then perhaps at that moment of time it becomes a property right.

Mr. Brown addressed the chair.

Mr. Lowell: I refuse to yield because we have here not a question of metaphysics, about which we can argue all day and like Milton's fallen angels be just as wise at the end of it or at the end of the century as we were when we started. We have here a practical question. The idealists in the labor movement, — and there are many of them, and very attractive gentlemen they are and many of their ideals are attractive, — the idealists in the labor movement have got this idea about slavery and about personal rights. The idea that the labor people are slaves is to my mind, — I cannot comprehend it, so that I will not try to battle with what I think is a shadow. But the idealists have this floating vision of the personal right of labor being put into the Constitution. It is merely a vision, in my mind, because it would not do any good. It would not change the law at all if it were put into the Constitution, but the practical man, — and the labor men, rank and file, and the leaders, are most of them nothing if not practical, — they know what they want and they know how to get it, and they do get it. The practical men have got something quite different from a millennium when they come to asking for their rights. Their idea is this, — it is in every one of these resolutions and that is what they are after, — their idea is that there shall be no control over their organizations by any one whatever, but that they shall be supreme. Now, is that right? At this time of our civilization are we going to say that any class of men shall be without control over them? If we are, vote for these measures; if we are not, vote against them. That is all there is to it. As our frame of government is formed, an injunction is the only thing which can prevent violence if a strike occurs. Now it may be unfortunate that that is the fact. I do not say that the court is the ideal tribunal to have that matter under its control. Perhaps we could frame some better way. I helped in framing the Workmen's Compensation Act, which took from judge and jury the question of the value of a lost leg and gave it to a tribunal which we thought would give better results, and I think on the whole it has. Now possibly some different tribunal might be found. But it has not been found; and the fact is that as we are now, the only power which controls either the capital or labor in this matter is the power of the court through the issuing of an injunction.

I shall not defend the issue of injunctions. Some ridicule was brought in our committee, in the hearings of the joint committee, over the cumbersome language of the proceedings in equity. Well, they are cumbersome. Like everything else they are the result of history and they are quaint and antiquated, many of them. It is a fit subject for gentle ridicule, perhaps, and there are times when the courts, — though they are few in this Commonwealth, — there are times when the courts have gone too far. But will you say for that reason that the laboring class and capitalists shall be set apart that they may fight out their battles in the streets of Boston with no one to control them? That is practically what it amounts to if we pass this resolution.

The case referred to, of Bogni v. Perotti (224 Mass. 152), was the case in our Supreme Judicial Court which said that the bill passed in 1914 was unconstitutional, and the court referred to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States which said that no State should deny the equal protection of the laws. And why was that decision made? It was made for this reason: That under it the labor men themselves were denied access to the courts which any one else except labor men could have. Now you are setting apart a class of labor men and saying: "You shall not go to court to protect your threatened interests, while every one else not within that class can go." The court said that clearly was depriving them of the equal protection guaranteed, — or equal protection; the phrase is "the equal protection of the laws." That is right.

In my opinion if we change the word "property", if we say "labor is not a property but is a personal right," we should not change that in the slightest. If we called it a personal right we still should be depriving the person of the equal protection of the law if we made a class of persons, depending on whether they labored with their hands or did not labor, and providing that for these the courts should have no power or no control. So that that is the question, — and I am not going to delay this Convention any further, — that is the simple question. When we have left aside the metaphysics of one part of it the practical question is simply this: Shall we make a class in the community which is absolutely, entirely above control by anybody else, which can do what they please without the slightest interference by anybody else? It seems to me that is absolutely wrong. That is the clear issue. If you want it, vote for any of these measures; if you do not, vote against them. [Applause].

Mr. DONOVAN of Springfield: I just rise to ask a question of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, if he would answer the question, please.

Mr. LOWELL: I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. DONOVAN: I should like to ask the gentleman if he wishes to convey the impression that to declare the right to labor a personal right would create classes,—that is, I suppose he means social classes,—in this State, and would he contend that if we hold that the right to labor is a property right it will eliminate classes or at least it would be a refusal to recognize the existence of classes?

Mr. LOWELL: My friend from Springfield is a practical man. He does not want us to put the phrase "Labor is a personal right" into our Constitution and then stop there. What good would that do us? He wants us to put into the Constitution and as a necessary corollary to it, into our legislative proceedings, our laws, the fact that no injunction can be issued dealing with this personal right. That would make a privileged class just as much as when labor is called property. It makes no difference whether you call it what I think it is in this connection, property, or what I think it is not in this connection, personal right; it makes no difference what you call it. When you add on the fact that in dealing with that series of affairs "No injunction shall be issued," you thereby make a class distinction and make one class superior and supreme within the Commonwealth.

Mr. HART of Cambridge: May I ask a question of the gentleman who just sat down? If the dreadful consequences which he portrays are to follow from the provisions before the Convention, how does it come that William H. Taft, ex-President of the United States, made himself the champion of an attempt to prevent the United States courts from exercising the right of injunction in labor trials?

Mr. LOWELL: I cannot answer that question. What ex-President Taft did or did not think I have no means of knowing. But if ex-President Taft had been in Massachusetts with this law which was declared void before him, he could not have arrived, in my opinion, at any other decision than the one that was arrived at, for the very reason which I repeat,—apparently the gentleman wants me to repeat,—over and over. I repeat that when you make any class of the community not subject to the procedure of court when everyone else is, you are making a privileged class.

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: The fundamental thesis underlying all these resolutions reported by the committee is this: Labor is not a commodity. Labor is not property. Now I want to confine my argument to that proposition. I ask the judgment of the Convention upon that. Why do we proceed to argue on deductions if we can come down to the original premise on which deductions are based? Do you say it is metaphysical? I answer: It is in the Constitution now. By the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court the Constitution now says labor is property. The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, acting on a report of the Judiciary Committee, composed of some of the ablest lawyers in the United States, did not consider this question metaphysics. If I had time I would read you the distinguished names which say that this declaration is fundamental and goes way to the base of human freedom. The Clayton Act distinctly declares as one of its provisions: “Labor is not a commodity,” and it was recognized by the enemies of labor as it was recognized by the friends of labor as a new epoch in the cause of human freedom. Immediately following the passage of this act the labor men of Massachusetts, feeling that they would like to have Massachusetts to the front in the cause of human freedom as she was in days of anti-slavery, caused to be enacted a law in which that fundamental principle found expression,— “Labor is not property.” The Supreme Judicial Court accepted the challenge and in the case to which the chairman of my committee (Mr. Lowell) has referred, laid down the principle,— “Labor is property.” Thus you find the Constitution of Massachusetts, as interpreted by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in conflict with the supreme will of the United States as expressed in Congress after a long and very able debate upon this whole subject.

Is it of any consequence? Sometimes I think not. As I look about this chamber for men who were elected here by the use of funds of labor organization and the money of labor men and women,— they are absent. Why should I take any very large brunt for organized labor? I am not taking it for organized labor; I am going to take it for the cause of human freedom. [Applause].

Your precedents, so far as conspiracy is concerned, go back 600 years; it took us 600 years before we got clear of precedent. Labor was property in the Feudal times. It went with the soil; it was a part of it. Labor certainly was property in slavery times, because the labor power was personified in the individual. “How much for this good looking Negro? Look at his teeth; examine him; sound and kind, a good producer. How much?” He was auctioned on the block. Property? Of course he was property. But behind that machine, that human machine, was that everlasting human power, the Divine power. And the logic of events determined: “There is no property in human flesh.”

May I say incidentally this: I want members to be interested.
I want them to confute my argument by question at any time, prove to me that I am wrong. I ask the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr.
Pillsbury), prove it not by the dictum of the court but by argument as should be done in any modern decision; not a mediæval dictum; but scientific reasoning. Show me when this labor power becomes property. I know when the product of that power becomes property, because I can put my finger on it. Man has a natural and inalienable right to acquire property, but he is not property. I can show you how by the exercise of that natural and inalienable right, including the right to apply God-given power where and when he will, that he acquires property. Here are two things, the natural right of the individual and the property which he has acquired. I can see that.
Too often in the past and too often in the future shall we hear the labor men undertake to say: “You lawyers are not laborers.” Will you help them by saying: Labor is property”? The chairman of my committee wants to help them, because if labor is property because labor produces something tangible then your labor as a lawyer is not property. You are not a property producer. Come, now, prove to me that you are. As a lawyer you use labor power; and I use it as a printer. With this labor power I show a product as a result of its use; you can see the product. You lawyers use the same kind of power; you labor as we labor. You ministers use the same kind of power,—I hope purer than sometimes we get it. But when does that power become property? When does the labor power exercised by the minister become property? Show it to me.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: The gentleman from Brockton, accepting his challenge, has referred to the Clayton Act. That was a statute. How can a statutory declaration be deemed to be fundamental or organic if it conflicts with the Federal Constitution, as the Supreme Court of the United States has said that such a similar declaration does?

Mr. Brown: May I ask before proceeding, and I think for the education of the Convention as well as myself, will the gentleman who last spoke please enlighten me further, when has the court said that?

Mr. Washburn: The Clayton Act itself has not been construed; that is so.

Mr. Brown: Granted.

Mr. Washburn: But the Supreme Court of the United States, in several decisions to which I will call the gentleman's attention if he is not familiar with them, has held that labor, the right to labor, is a property and not a personal right.

Mr. Brown: Of course it has! Of course it has! And you are face to face now with the question: "Is the court right?" The court said other things in the Dred Scott decision, and Abraham Lincoln says: "Obey the court, but change the court." And the court was changed, and the court does not now render any such decision.

You have a fundamental declaration here, a fundamental principle of human freedom. You are right at a parting of the ways, in my opinion. Are you going to continue the old feudal system that a man is property? He was under the old conditions. Again I return to the idea: When does your power as lawyers become property? I think that is the easiest way to prove as a fact that labor is or is not property. Is it in the brief? As property the brief would sell for old paper. I do not say that there is no property as the result of your labor. Why, you create property by using your labor power. I think you can see here as lawyers what I am struggling to make clear. Why not some lawyer, some college graduate, stand up and show me wherein I am wrong about this, metaphysics or otherwise? Is metaphysics too much for us? Is labor property or not? Is labor a commodity? The Clayton Act says it is not. It either is or is not. I do not care to go into injunctions, I do not care to abuse judges, I do not care to argue whether it is a power to be used by labor organizations or not. The question is: What is labor?

Mr. Merriam of Framingham: I wish to ask the delegate from Brockton if he does not fail in this matter to distinguish between the laborer and labor? I know of no decision in our land to-day by any court that the laborer is the property of any one. The decision by our court in Massachusetts is that the right to labor is the property of the laborer, and I think in that matter there is a broad distinction, and my friend from Brockton has failed to distinguish this fundamental proposition, that our court nowhere has asserted the right of property to the laborer, but merely is upholding the right to labor as the property of the laborer himself.

Mr. Brown: I would be glad to have the gentleman turn to that act and show me that the court says that it is a personal right that belongs to the individual himself, that that is a property right which is personal and belongs to him. Show it to me.

Mr. Merriam: That is the exact language in substance of Chief Justice Rugg in the case of Bogni v. Perotti, where, so far as I can recollect, he states that the right of a man to his labor is his property, and that is the essential meaning of the word. The word "property" means what is one's own,—that the right to labor is the laborer's own property, entitled to the protection of the law. And in view of that decision I wish to repeat, as I said before, that that opinion, it seems to me, is a bed-rock decision in the interest of the laboring man himself.

Mr. Brown: As to whether it is or is not for the benefit of the laborer is not the question I wish to debate. As to what it is in substance according to the interpretation of the gentleman from Framingham, who above all others is fair and would not state anything contrary to what he sees it, that is his interpretation. That is the difficulty. Unfortunately, I do not read that as he does. As to the fact that the property is owned by the laborer, that goes without saying. In the name of heaven, to whom does the property belong if labor is property, if it does not belong to the man himself until he sells it? Of course, of course. But the question right here is: When does labor become property? It is fundamental. Again I appeal to the lawyers and I wish that the gentleman from Framingham would inform me just when his labor becomes property.

Mr. Merriam: I think the chairman of the Labor Committee (Mr. Lowell) has answered that question,—that the laborer himself makes his right to labor property when he agrees to give it in a fair contract by which he receives an equivalent,—usually an equivalent made such and recognized as such by his own free decision and act.

Mr. Brown: Right there we approach the subject in a new phase. If it be as you say, and that man is property or he can be brought into court as property, you then commence your equity proceedings, and that is the only way that you get control over the individual, and you would lose that much control over his conditions the moment that he was not property. You bring him in under contract as property that he has sold himself. What else has he sold? Again we are back to the selfsame question. He has not sold except he sells all that he produces, but since no one can tell what is going to be the product of his labor, he gives his time. But the power behind that labor is what I am differentiating between and the commodity itself. I am trying to show that until you can recognize the fact that with that power is locked up the conscience and the right of an individual to determine upon his action, you no longer can approach the doctrine of human freedom, the right to move where he will and to have liberty so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others.

Says the gentleman, the chairman of my committee: "What labor is trying to do is to get rid of the courts, to get where courts cannot control it." Now that is impossible, for one of the fundamental rights which is guaranteed and which no one, not even a labor organization, has the right to take from the individual is the right to work; such a declaration is in one resolution. The gentleman who is one of the committee, the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), says that that is an abstract statement. Nobody would deny it. I surely would not. He has a right to work wherever he may choose to work, and he has a right to the proceeds of his toil. But as it stands at the present moment the Massachusetts Legislature cannot pass an act which will be based on the Clayton Act declaration that “labor is not a commodity” and carry out its provisions, because the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has turned down just such an act, thereby denying to the Legislature the right to use, — if I may use that much familiar phrase that has been rolled over by the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Adams) and the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), as learnedly and logically as by the gentleman from Wellesley, — the police power.
The Legislature cannot use the police power or any other power based upon the proposition that labor is not a commodity, that labor is not property. I would say I may be wrong and everybody who has construed the Massachusetts acts may be wrong in saying that the Massachusetts decision that labor is property is final. The American Federation of Labor, immediately the Supreme Judicial Court had decided this case, summoned the ablest attorneys they could get; they got the greatest constitutional lawyer they could engage, only to find that in Massachusetts in some way, — I do not know how it was done, but they had lost the right of appeal. The language of the Clayton Act, if I remember, was not brought to the court. I want the chairman of my committee to be perfectly free to interrupt me, because I have no feeling that he did not allow me to do so. If I am wrong, tell me so, but if I understand it, this is the way it came before our committee: That while this case was being decided the judge made some sort of understanding or the lawyers did, so that when the American Federation came to Massachusetts and wanted to take the case up to the Supreme Judicial Court they could not do it. Under Massachusetts procedure in some way they were estopped from carrying it up. I cannot explain the fact, but it was explained to us by a member of our committee, Mr. Donovan of Lawrence, who was counsel at the time. He told us how far that played a part when the case was being considered by our Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Lowell: I do not remember the circumstance, but I suppose it was not taken to the Supreme Judicial Court for one reason, that nobody tried to take it there.

Mr. Brown: I would be glad to appeal to the knowledge of the gentleman from Wellesley, if he can help me in any connection whatever, — I do not know that he can, — but does he recall that it was stated before our committee at any time why that question was not taken up and if the Clayton Act was brought to the attention of the court, and why?

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I can hardly answer a question the whole of which I am afraid I did not hear, but out of great personal respect for my friend from Brockton, I will give him this information.
A section of the Clayton Act begins with this recital: “Human labor is not a commodity or an article of commerce.” And that self-evident lie, one of the most preposterous things ever written into a statute even by the American Congress, which is a large claim, was put there solely to introduce one of the most despicable pieces of demagogism ever written into the Federal statutes, in the exemption of all labor organizations and all agricultural organizations,—the working-man and the granger,—from the charge of criminal conspiracy under the Sherman Act, to which all other men and organizations are liable.

Mr. BROWN: So far as the gentleman has answered the question,—and I congratulate him that he is able to sit in this Convention and not hear me when I am speaking; it is a wonderful faculty and I have no doubt the rest of the Convention wish they had it.

Mr. PILLSBURY: You turned your back upon me.

Mr. BROWN: The gentleman tells me it is because my back is toward him. I am sorry that I am not built in a sphere, so that I could talk in every direction at once. I am fitted in every other way except my shape. [Laughter.] And still he does not enlighten us as to why the case did not go up to the Supreme Judicial Court, and I suppose it is because he did not hear me. But that he should characterize the Clayton Act in the way that he has, members of the Convention, I appeal to you, there must be something in it. No ordinary gnat crawling in this Convention would receive the attention of the gentleman from Wellesley. It is unworthy of his recognition. Only a great problem like this is worthy of the denunciation which he has placed upon it. Surely it must be very fundamental, there must be something wonderful which has taken place, when he thus does denounce it. I cannot use his words, but I will refer him, if he will do me the honor to read my own little effusion in minority report, document No. 342, to the words of George Frisbie Hoar. He has denounced George Frisbie Hoar, who differentiated between the labor power of the individual who was trying to better his conditions, and the capitalists who put their dollars together to make the largest profit they could get out of the whole people. Senator George Frisbie Hoar showed that very great difference between the property in its concrete form aggregated together to oppress the people, and labor, even though it is in a trust, gathered together not for profit of the whole but for the individual uplift. And he said that when people gathered together for that individual uplift they were engaged in work that touched very closely the foundation of this government.

Now I am not an alarmist. Do not take me for one, although sometimes I appear to be red hot. But who can fail to discover that this question which goes really to the base, is one that is going to work a great deal of mischief unless it is settled right? How can it be otherwise? Say to a man that he is property: "You are property, Mr. ex-Attorney-General from Wellesley; property you are." And I have less respect than I had for you before when I assumed that you were a great lawyer and that you were exercising one of the God-given gifts, that power that makes you a great lawyer, and that you are even a more useful laborer than I am, when I am using that power either as a printer or as a very poor editor. It is one and the selfsame power that you and I use. If I furnish to some daily an editorial which comes out of my power, I can convert it into money, then I can see property. But I am not property; labor is not property. The product of the labor is property, but not the individual. And you cannot get that individual into an equity court and treat him as you have treated him unless you call him property, and that is the only fiction by which the courts have been able to do it, and I do not wonder that the gentleman stands up for the whole of the fiction, because if he loses the fiction that labor is property he loses the greatest weapon that the employers have had to compel labor to work whether they will or not. There is nothing to conceal here. Of course it affects the injunction; the Clayton Act having declared for exemption of labor organizations, there was the basis. Out of that grew the principle upon which exemption was based. If labor is not property it must be something other than property. That something was the power to produce property. As a power it is divine. If it is divine,—well, we have got metaphysics, of course, perhaps, but there we are. But you are dealing with a statement of fact, and it is fundamental; it is at the very base. To my mind, if there was nothing else in this Convention for labor to ask for but that, and it could get a declaration that labor is not property, it would get something.

First, we are asked to agree on something that is very plain: Is labor property or is it not? I say now that when you declare that labor is property you have drawn a broad line between the man who works with his hands and produces a product, whether he be an artisan skilled or whether he be a laborer in the trenches, and you furnish him with the very idea that he had got, that you lawyers and ministers and other men who are a very essential part of free government, as I see it, are parasites. A lawyer is a worker. Every man is an instrument. The humblest man who performs his work well is doing his work and his mission. And the highest is not above the decree that he is an instrument, merely a trustee for the higher power, that he may serve the brotherhood well. In so far as he does that, he does his duty, but in doing his duty I do not consider his power property. I may reiterate, because it is the fundamental thesis. I deny that your man would lose any rights in the courts if it was declared that labor is not a commodity. Why, the highest right that can be accorded is the man’s natural right to work. Do you tell me that if you had it written in that labor is not property and a labor organization said to a man: “You can’t work,” the man has no redress? Do you say that equity cannot spread its arms and protect that man because you have declared that labor is not property? Certainly it can. So let us not be influenced by that argument. That is an appeal to prejudice. To say that this is too much to give to a man because he may misuse it is in the same class. It is to be given if it is right, it is to be withheld if it is wrong.

Mr. Theller of New Bedford: In a friendly way I will ask the gentleman from Brockton a question on certain quoted passages in the case to which I think the gentleman is referring, Bogri v. Perotti [224 Mass. 152, 155]. The court after saying “That the right to work is property cannot be regarded longer an open question,” says this:

It was settled that the right to labor and to make contracts to work is a property right by Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 173–175, and Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 10. Controversy on that subject before this court must be regarded as put at rest by these decisions. The right to work, therefore, is property. One cannot be deprived of it by simple mandate of the Legislature.

The court goes on to say, — I am omitting certain sentences:

It is as much property as the more obvious forms of goods and merchandise, stocks and bonds. That it may be also a part of the liberty of the citizen does not affect its character as property. It was said in Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, at page 14, "Included in the right of personal liberty and the right of personal property . . . partaking of the nature of each . . . is the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property. Chief among such contracts is that of personal employment, . . ."

Can it not be argued from those words of the Supreme Judicial Court that what the Supreme Judicial Court defined was, as it says in the opening sentence which I read, "the right to work" and the right to work is a right which is derived from personal liberty? In other words, labor is not property, but one of the essential rights which labor has, and which it may dispose of for a consideration, — place its own limitation upon that right or liberty and receive a price for it. So that it is not selling itself into slavery; it cannot do that anyway under certain statutes that we have, but it can dispose of part of its liberty; and does not the man who has property in the form of commodities dispose of his right to hold them to somebody else? When he owns a stock or a bond he has what the laborer has, an inchoate right, a paper right. The laborer has the right to liberty unabridged but in order to have civilization, to have contracts at all, must not the laborer have this right to labor, this right to work for a temporary period and dispose of it for some other commodity, money or some other property that he needs, and is not that what the Supreme Judicial Court meant, — not that labor personified was property, but a derivative right from the right of personal liberty, and that the right to labor, contractually, was property? [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN: I am under great obligation to the gentleman for reading that into my remarks. It is an essential part of them. It affirms what I said, that the court said that it is property. You cannot differentiate an individual's right from the individual himself unless you go into my metaphysical field that there is a power behind the man. But I say I congratulate you, — instead of "Brother Delegates," I should say "Brother Stocks, Brother Bonds, Brother Railroads," — I greet you to-day. You are on a par. The Supreme Judicial Court says so. You are just as much property as stocks and bonds. Well, if you are, why cannot you be sold, — except, as you say [turning toward Mr. Theller], for that personal right? Where, Mr. Delegate who last questioned me, where, — I ask any lawyer in this Convention who is familiar with the case, — where does the court do anything but base its rulings on former decisions? Where does the court argue the case as I am trying to argue it here? Where does the court prove outside of its own dictum that labor is property? It says so. Well, that does not make it so. And then it meanders around trying to differentiate between the right to labor, personal liberty, and so forth, mixing up the accepted fact that a man may sell his services in the way of a contract and as the result of selling his services obtain property. Of course he can. But as it stands at the present moment, — you have read it, Mr. Delegate, — labor is property, like stocks and bonds. It certainly was property in the early days of Massachusetts when Massachusetts bought and sold its slaves. It was property when the slaves went up in the gallery of the Old North Church apart from everybody else. But there came a time when the courts had to set that one side, and they had to set it one side something on this line that labor power could not be property, but not enough to bring the principle out clearly. You are in no different condition to-day so far as labor is concerned than it was in the days of slavery, so far as there is any legal decision. If we have gained any freedom of the right to unionize without being liable for conspiracy it has been, as I said before, only through a fight of 600 years. Conspiracy was alleged in the case of the King v. Tub women of London, because the tub women had united to get better wages, and if the tub women got better wages the King did not have so much to spend on his favorite women, so the King kicked, and he went back to Julius Caesar for precedent on conspiracy that would throw the women down, and the King got his and all the others who have stood in a like position have got theirs. Finally the people organized to better their condition. Having organized to better their condition, along comes the Sherman Act with the idea of protecting the people; and who did they catch? The only people that they ever have caught in the net is labor and the only people they ever have fined who have paid the fine is labor. They have fined the great corporations but they never have paid it.

The debate was continued Friday, July 19.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I had the floor of the Convention by your courtesy at the time we adjourned, and at the close of the session two of the attorneys who are members of the Convention asked me that I should continue. I also had a talk with the chairman of my committee (Mr. Lowell), whom I much like, and who kindly endeavored to show me the fallacy in my argument; and I heard him through and I felt that I must be biologized with my own belief and incapable of any new thought. As I meandered down to the depot thinking the matter over this thought came to me: There are men who think more of who says a thing than they do of what is said. Go get your authorities, present to the Convention some name other than yours or names other than you have presented to lift this matter out of any suggestion of metaphysics or any suggestion that it is not practical or any suggestion that it is trifling or any suggestion from the standpoint of the prejudices that it is done simply for the benefit of the labor organizations. Now I am going to address you for a few moments, so long as I find the Convention has any interest, along that line. And first let me say, as to what the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillabury) and the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) have cited from the courts, I agree. I want to take out from what the gentleman from Wellesley has said, his adjectives, and let the fact stand,—that labor is property because the courts have said so. That is about what there is to it and I am not denouncing the courts.

Mr. Pillabury of Wellesley: I hope my friend will pardon me,—I very much dislike to interrupt him,—for correcting him when he ascribes to me the statement which he puts into my mouth. What I should say if I had occasion to say anything about it, is that labor is property not because the courts have said so, but because it is so, as every man of common sense knows.

Mr. Brown: For a clear-cut, concise dictum delivered in support of a dogmatic assertion, the gentleman from Wellesley has no peer. He has simply said on his ipse dixit, "Labor is property; that is all there is about it; don't argue it any more; it is property." Now whence comes that idea? Where did the gentleman get it? He gets it from the law. Where did the law get it? Well, let us go back. It got it from the time that all labor was performed by slaves. There is no doubt about it. That was your condition in feudal times and later. Well, if you continue to deal with that condition from the law standpoint, of course you will declare labor as property and of course in Massachusetts law it is property; although National law says it is not property. The court in Massachusetts, following precedents back into the dim and dusty past, amid the wrecks of the tyranny that darken the view, was justified in saying that labor was property. I go with you that far.

Now let us see what happened in consequence of the court's decision and through treating labor as property. It became necessary for the Congress of the United States to pass what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. While it was passing, this very question which I am discussing came up incidentally. I only refer to it; I may or may not have time to quote something of it. I am not going to now; I merely say that the idea then commenced to suggest itself as a reason why labor should be excepted from the operations of the Anti-Trust Act. Senator Hoar and others thought there was no necessity of putting it in the act, that the courts would not construe labor as being subject to the Anti-Trust Act.

Now as matters developed there was in existence what is known as the Hatters' organization. They had a label. You will see that in a number of hats you buy. You will not find it in the Stetson, but if you take a Lamson & Hubbard and turn the sweater down you will see the Hatters' label in that hat. Now the object of that,—and other organizations have also their own label,—is this: That the unions felt that they owned their purchasing power and they felt they could call on all labor organizations to use their purchasing power to support the labor that was employed under a label. In other words, you hire a union man when you buy a label hat. Acting along that line, organized for that purpose, they proceeded to carry on a war,—and that probably is the word,—by not buying the other hats. The manufacturers came into court to complain that it was a violation of the Sherman Act. It went to a decision of the court and, labor being construed as property, the decision came down that it was a violation of the Sherman Act. It was carried to its full conclusion. The labor-unions were fined and if there is any labor man sitting in this chamber with a card in his pocket, including myself, he paid either one, two or three contributions to that fund because every hatter was to lose his home unless a fund could be raised in the labor movement to save to those hatters their homes. Incident to that discussion you will remember that Gompers and Morrison and others came near going to jail, trying to defend the personal right to speak and write as they had done. They found their personal rights so befogged and entangled with this question of property that they made no progress. Thereupon the question became a political one and the sentiment in favor of some change was embodied in political platforms. Just let me refer one minute to the record:

The Democratic and Progressive platforms endorsed this principle. They cast 10,402,977 votes as against 5,484,974 votes for Mr. Taft, Mr. Taft maintaining the principle that labor was property and the other two parties taking the other side of the contention. Naturally enough, it was felt that the votes of the people justified the taking of some action. Thereupon there was framed the administration measure known as House 15667, reported by Representative Clayton May 5, 1914.

Skipping a little bit:

The Judiciary Committee offered certain amendments, those which labor demanded and were necessary, and the matter came to the House, and on June 1 Chairman Webb for the Judiciary Committee . . .

May I pause to call your attention again to the fact that the Judiciary Committees of the Congress of the United States, both in the Senate and in the House, felt this matter of great importance, not speculative, mythical, whatever you please to call it, but something of transcendent importance —

Chairman Webb reported and the House in Committee of the Whole voted to adopt by 207 ayes and not a single dissenting vote . . .

and also other amendments. Now let us see:

Now goes the matter to the Senate, and the debate in the Senate was of unusual interest [as you will see by looking at the record]. On September 1 Senator Cummins . . .

I pause long enough to number Senator Cummins as No. 1 in the list of "undesirable citizens" who have been instrumental in passing legislation which has called down upon them the vituperation of the gentleman from Wellesley.

Senator Cummins moved that in lieu of section 6 the following be inserted:

"That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

Why was that there? How came that concept to be introduced? Why, plainly, without that, a proposition to exempt labor and agricultural associations is class legislation pure and simple. If you are going to exempt the labor organizations you must find a principle upon which it can be based, and there is the principle, — new, as it will be shown here very clearly, but accepted. Let me in passing call to your attention that this is vitally connected even with the progress of the war. The Labor Board and the Labor Policy Board, — there are two of them, — are both proceeding along the line of this concept.

The substitute was a combination of sections 7 and 18. On the next day, September 2, while Senator Cummins was discussing his proposed amendment, Senator Culberson, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee . . .

I pause long enough to put on the list No. 2 of the "undesirable citizens" who are subject to the anathemas of the gentleman from Wellesley for having given us this legislation. But while I am doing that I am willing that the gentleman from Wellesley should deny that either he is not or is, or they are not or they are, peers with him as lawyers, and this is a legal matter. [Reading]

Senator Culberson, chairman of the Senate Committee asked Senator Cummins if he would be satisfied with section 7 if the words "that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce and" were inserted therein, and Senator Cummins replied that he had intended making that suggestion if his amendment was rejected. And then without a dissenting voice . . .

Now we have got the whole Senate of the United States in that category of "undesirable citizens" who have foisted upon us this legislation which has met with the anathema of the gentleman from
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Wellesley. The entire Senate of the United States we have got in here and we are going to have more, gentlemen, before we get through here. [Reading]

... this amendment was accepted by the committee and adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole without a dissenting vote. The bill was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 46 yeas to 16 nays. The bill went to conference. The conference committee made its report September 24 with the labor provisions practically unchanged. October 15, 1914, President Wilson signed the bill.

He did more. He wrote:

"Incidentally, justice has been done the laborer. The labor is no longer to be treated as if it was merely an inanimate object of commerce, disconnected with the fortunes and happiness of a living human being, to be dealt with as an article of sale and barter. But that, great as it is, is hardly more than the natural and inevitable corollary of a law whose object"...

We are coming to the object of the law in the eyes of the President, a college professor, a Governor of a State, one capable of analysis, one capable of using the English language, and we are coming to what he says:

"whose object is individual freedom and initiative as against any kind of private domination."

There is my cause; there is what I plead. Before I go another step I want incidentally to bring this matter in. Before I have finished and while I am in my time, lest I forget it, I desire to move a substitute for the matter now pending, the resolution which is found in document No. 342, of which I have not an extra copy but which has been sent for and which I will send to the desk. At any time for the convenience of the President I will pause to have it stated, but I do not know that it is a necessity, if I may be excused for reading it.

The Presiding Officer: The Chair understands the gentleman to move substitution of No. 342 for the pending matter?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Horgan of Boston: Here is an extra copy.

Mr. Brown: By the kindness of the gentleman in the first division I have sent it up and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The labor of a human being shall not be deemed to be a commodity or article of commerce. And the Legislature shall not pass a law nor the courts construe any law of the Commonwealth contrary to this declaration.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I rose only to say that I presume my friend from Brockton intends to move his resolution as a substitute for the report of the committee, not for the other resolution.

The Presiding Officer: The Chair was in error. It should have been put in that way.

Mr. Brown: If that is the correct parliamentary usage I will take it and renew my invitation I gave when opening, and will welcome a question any time, even in the middle of a sentence, if members will only ask questions to amplify or to controvert what I am saying. But to continue:

The National Democratic platform says: "We have lifted human labor from the category of commodities. We have protected the rights of the laborers against the unwarranted issue of injunctions."
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

If there are Democrats in the Convention as well as being members of the Convention, I claim their support of this resolution. It is connected with the wishes of the President. If this matter goes down as a measure to be voted upon by the people, it stands on its merits alone. If this matter does not go down to be voted on alone on its merits it will be the duty of labor to call upon the political parties to engraft it in their State platforms and in their National platform. It will involve also the position of the candidates on that declaration. We are once more in a position of alternatives much like that suggested by the gentleman from Waltham who showed what happened in respect to the overtime bill.

But let me read further, having spoken of the Democrats:

The National Republican platform says: "We pledge the Republican party to the faithful enforcement of all Federal laws passed for the protection of labor."

All Republicans should be in line. As a result of those declarations, and the Congressional law "that labor is not a commodity," as has been said here, the Massachusetts Legislature passed an act exercising its power and declaring labor a personal and not a property right. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts met the challenge and again inserted in our Constitution as a fundamental concept: "Labor is property." The decision opens with that declaration; it runs through the whole line of what should be argument.

You cannot disassociate the labor of a human being from his personality. I sketch a picture. There is a man standing in front of a forge, his hands on the bellows. The fire burns. He reaches for a pair of tongs, he takes a piece of iron, he puts it in the fire. The forge burns, the iron goes on the anvil; click, clack, the hammer; he finishes; it drops; it is a nail.

Change it. A machine stands here; it is square; all iron; power is generated by friction; the machine is at work. Iron goes in at one end; out from the machine drops a nail.

Well, there is no question that the iron machine that is dropping out those nails is property. There is no question that its products are property. No. The machine can be sold as old iron with one value; it can be sold as a working machine with another value. Now, gentlemen, that is property. The iron machine is an inanimate object beyond doubt. You handle it, you feel it, you transfer it, you give title to it and it moves as a commodity. It is property beyond any question.

Drop that picture; let us go to the first picture. The nail that dropped was property. It was commodity. It can be passed from hand to hand. The machine, the man, the power that drives the man, — is it property? Can you pass the power, the machine from hand to hand? What do you mean by machine, you ask? Flesh and blood? Oh, no! The time comes when the flesh and blood is dormant; the end, you say, has come. But what has happened? Where is that property, please? That power that once made the machine a wealth producer is not a commodity. It should not be itemized as property.

Mr. MITCHELL of New Bedford: I have two reasons or excuses for injecting myself into this debate. In the first place, I have a conception of the importance of this subject, and in the second place, I happen to be a member of one of the committees from which this report has come. In the debate of yesterday there seemed to be a good deal of confusion. It was largely a confusion of definitions. There seemed to be some confusion of ideas as to what the right of labor is and as to what labor is under the law. I think this confusion grows somewhat out of the hesitancy of the mind to grasp the conception of intangible property. The argument of my friend who sits just in front of me (Mr. Brown of Brockton) illustrates this. The delegate developed the argument that if the labor of a man or the right of labor possessed by a man is property, then the man behind the labor must be property also.

Now of course we know that that does not follow at all. We know that under our law there can be no such thing as property in a human being. At the risk of being rather elementary I want to illustrate what I mean. I will suppose, — it is a rather violent supposition, — that I have a thousand dollars in gold; and I will come to another very easy supposition, — that I lend that thousand dollars in gold to my friend from Brockton who sits in front of me. Now I have not that thousand dollars in gold, that is, I have not that tangible property any longer. But my friend has given me his note for a thousand dollars; I have an intangible property that is the equivalent of the tangible property that I parted with; and that intangible property is just as good as the tangible property, because back of that promise of my friend to pay me the thousand dollars are his high character and his undoubted financial responsibility.

Now that promise of my friend to pay me the thousand dollars is just as much property as the money that I loaned him, just as valuable to me.

Or to vary the illustration, suppose that I agree to perform services for my friend; suppose I agree to serve him for a stated period at a particular compensation. Now what does he get? Why, he gets my promise, he gets my contract to perform service for him. That contract is property; that belongs to him and he can invoke all the process of the courts to compel me either to perform my contract or take the consequences.

Now that is the kind of property that labor is, — that the right to labor is. It is intangible property, but it is just as much property and just as truly property as the tangible things that we see about us.

Again there is another matter, of mere definition perhaps, that is rather confusing, and that is the expression which we have heard over and over again that labor is or is not a commodity or an article of commerce. Perhaps I may be bold enough to differ on that matter with the distinguished chairman of my committee (Mr. Pillsbury). Without being very careful I should hesitate to differ with him on anything except a mere matter of definition. The labor of a human being, in a sense, is a personal matter. Contracts for personal services are not assignable. That is, in the case where I have agreed to render service to my friend he has no right to go and assign that contract to somebody else and make me serve somebody else. He cannot sell my agreement just as he would a horse or a house or something tangible, because the law says that contracts for personal services are not assignable. Labor rights cannot be bartered or bought and sold upon the market and therefore in a very real sense the right to labor is not a commodity or article of commerce.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Mr. BROWN: I am paying close attention and I agree to all that the gentleman has said, but will he address himself to the language of a lawyer who is defining that,—and I am quoting the definition of Senator Cummins. Here is his definition:

The value of the legislation is found in the recognition of the everlasting difference between the conscious capacity of man to accomplish something and the inanimate commodity which his intelligent activity creates.

Let me read it again. [Reading the same sentence.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry that I cannot spend any time in attempting to fathom these ideas of Senator Cummins. I am trying to show in a practical way the legal and proper conception of the right to labor.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to ask the gentleman this: Accepting, as I suppose he does, that that definition is the present legal definition, would it be possible for the people to give a new definition, and how would be regard that new definition if there was one such as this? What is his idea of the difference between the two?

Mr. MITCHELL: We cannot change the nature of a thing by giving it a definition.

Mr. BROWN: Correct.

Mr. MITCHELL: Now, what is the right to labor under our law? In the first place, it is a personal right. Insofar as that proposition is concerned it is not necessary that the proposals before us should be acted upon at all. The law firmly holds that the right to labor is a personal right. My colleague from New Bedford (Mr. Theller) very clearly said last night that the right to labor is embraced in the fundamental right to life, liberty and property. No man can deny me the right to labor. But the right to labor is something else under our law. In order that I may be clear and that you may understand just what I mean when I speak about the right to labor, in this connection I will say that I mean two things, perhaps more accurately two aspects of the same thing. In the first place, there is the right to enter into employment, there is the right to seek labor, the right to seek to be employed. That, without any question, is now a property right. In the next place, there is the right which grows out of a contract of labor after it has been entered into. That, without any question, is and always has been in our Commonwealth a property right.

The statement has been made in this debate that in the case of Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, it was decided that labor was not a property right. Now no such thing was decided in that case, as of course any lawyer in the Convention knows. The question which arose in the case of Worthington v. Waring was whether persons seeking to find labor, seeking to be employed, could be placed lawfully upon a black-list, or rather, whether, having been placed upon a black-list by certain manufacturers, a court of equity, by injunction, would give them any protection.

The court did hold in that case that the right which was attacked was a personal and not a property right, and refused to grant the injunction. But that case did not decide broadly, that the right to labor was not a property right. In order that I may be clear in this matter I will quote, from the opinion of Chief Justice Field, the sentence in which he states the issue before the court. He says:

It does not appear by the petition that any of the petitioners had existing contracts for labor with which the defendant interfered.

That is, it was not a case where contracts of labor were interfered with, it was not a case where any right of labor growing out of a contract of employment was attacked. It never has been decided in this Commonwealth that, in this sense, the right of labor is not property. It always has been held to be property. But even to the limited extent to which the case of Worthington v. Waring went, I think that from the time the decision was rendered its authority was doubted. In a case following that, some years later, the case of Burnham v. Dowd, Mr. Justice DeCourcy in the course of his opinion expressed doubt as to the correctness of the rule laid down in Worthington v. Waring. In the later case of Fairbanks v. McDonald, 219 Mass., Mr. Justice Sheldon still more strongly expressed doubt as to the authority of Worthington v. Waring. In the still later case of Cornelier v. Haverhill Shoe Manufacturers Association, 221 Mass., in which the opinion again was written by Mr. Justice DeCourcy, the decision in Worthington v. Waring was squarely overruled. I will take the liberty to read a sentence or two from the opinion by Mr. Justice DeCourcy in that case. He says:

It is true that in Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, this Court refused to enjoin the defendants from making use of a black-list, stating that the rights alleged to be violated were personal and not property rights, and that there were no approved precedents in equity for issuing an injunction against the grievance there complained of. In the light of more recent decisions of the court recognizing that the right to labor and to its protection from unlawful interference is a constitutional as well as a common law right, there appears to be no sound reason why it should not be adequately protected under our present broad equity powers. As intimated in Burnham v. Dowd, the case of Worthington v. Waring cannot well be reconciled with our later decisions. It must be considered as no longer binding as an authority for the doctrine that equity will afford no injunctive relief against an unlawful combination to black-list.

So that the doctrine laid down in Worthington v. Waring, even to the very limited extent to which that went, has been shattered entirely by the recent decisions of the court. But the point I want to make, and to make most strongly, is that it never has been decided in this Commonwealth that the right to labor in the sense implied in the resolution before us is not property; it always has been held to be property.

Mr. DONOVAN of Springfield: I should like to ask the speaker if he distinguishes between the right to labor and the labor power.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know what the gentleman means by the labor power.

Mr. DONOVAN: I would say that in the amendment offered under my name, — I believe it is document No. 120, — is stated (we seek to have it embodied in the Constitution) the declaration that the labor power of the human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. I do not know whether we are talking upon that, whether that document No. 120 is included in the discussion that we now are conducting; if so, it is not, according to my point of view, a discussion as to the right to labor, but rather the labor power of a human being.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to call the attention of the gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) to the statement of Attorney-General Wickersham, — if he cares for it I will quote it, — but he was opposed to this; but when it was passed he made this statement, — I have it here, and when it was made: That if this declaration, which you say you accept, (that the right to labor is not an article of commerce) had been in the law, there never would have been a hatters' case, there never could have been a conviction. So then, see the importance, the hundreds of men losing their homes, millions of men and women paying their money in order to compensate somebody who was injured, because there was not in the fundamental law as a concept the very principle which the gentleman himself says, — why, he argues against the idea that we shall place it now in the Constitution. I trust myself broadly on Mr. Wickersham's statement, that if that had been in the law they would not have decided the case as they did. That is what I should like to hear from you upon.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot debate the proposition with Mr. Wickersham because I do not know what he said and the matter is not before me. I am trying to discuss the proposition that appears here and as it is before this Convention.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I wish to state for the benefit of my friend from New Bedford (Mr. Mitchell) that I think he has stated with entire correctness the tendency of the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and the results which they finally reached.

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been established clearly, as I have said, that in this Commonwealth, and in all our States for that matter, the right to labor is clearly a property right. I do not propose to develop the legal argument any further. I do propose now, without going into any legal niceties, to discuss this proposition, upon the broad ground of human right. It is perfectly proper, if our labor friends wish to do so, to criticize any decision of any of our courts. In the nature of things the courts must decide what the law is, and when they have decided what the law is we must bow to their decision. But in a democracy every citizen has a perfect right to say that the court proceeded upon a wrong theory or that a certain decision ought not to have been rendered. That is a right that is undoubted. Of course in court it is always a perfect answer to say that the matter has been so decided, but here it is not an answer. I realize that in this Convention, in a body dealing, as we are dealing, with the fundamental things that lie back of all decisions, we have the right to consider any question from the standpoint of fundamental right. I freely admit that even judicial decisions at times must justify themselves before a body like this. But I submit, that if any line of decisions ever was justified, if any line of decisions ever was declared justly and properly, it is the line of decisions by our courts determining the right to labor to be in law a property right.

Let me discuss this in a practical way, just a few moments. There is a certain form of property that we all have in common, and that is our labor. Every one of us owns that species of property. There are other species of property that are owned by some men in this
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Convention; some men have stocks and bonds, some men own mills or factories, but there are some of us who have practically no property except our labor.

Now, it would be a monstrous thing to say to the man who has only his labor: "The other man who has the other sort of property, the man who owns the mill, the man who owns the bonds, shall be perfectly protected in his right of property, he may invoke all the processes of the courts to protect him, but you, who are dependent on your labor alone, must stand defenceless when you are attacked; you cannot invoke the process of the courts, because your right to labor is not property." It seems to me that that not only would be fundamentally wrong but it practically would destroy the opportunity for human advancement. We have no right to say to the people of the Commonwealth that the man who depends on his labor must go to some union or some association, in order to secure such precarious protection as he may, that he cannot come into the courts of the Commonwealth and demand his rights there, and that he cannot have the same privilege that the owner of the other species of property has of asking that the courts fully protect him,—that he cannot come into the courts that are the property of all the people.

We cannot afford to say that sort of thing to the man who is dependent upon his labor for his support. Or, to put the matter in another form, we boast that this is a land of opportunity. We boast that any man, no matter how poor he may be, if he have only his hands and his brain, may aspire to anything in the gift of the Commonwealth. In spite of what some social reformers have said, that is substantially the case. The very fact that some of us are here to-day is proof that this opportunity does exist.

Now, you take the man who must depend upon his labor for his advancement. His labor is the only asset that he has; and what is it that makes his labor available? It is his right to contract with reference to it, to enter into enforceable contracts of employment. It is the right to use his labor as an individual for his own advancement. It is the right, if you please, to have his right to labor declared in law to be what it is by nature and in fact,—a property right. Without that his rights are gone and his only means of advancement are destroyed.

On this floor, and in the hearings before the committee, it has been asserted that the conditions of the worker in industrial life to-day are the same as were the conditions of the slave in slavery times, or the serf in certain countries in the recent past. That analogy is wholly false. I venture to say that if these proposals were incorporated in our Constitution we would be taking a long step toward putting back the laboring man, the man who must depend upon his labor, into the same condition as was held by the slave or the serf years ago.

What is it that makes the man a slave, or what is it that made a man a serf? Simply the fact that his labor belongs to somebody else, that he has no property right in his own labor. Since his labor belongs to somebody else, it can be bartered away or traded without his consent. He has no power of advancement, no means of making his way in the world. This slavery, this serfdom, would be the certain result, it seems to me, of the adoption of these proposals that are before us. I cannot believe that our labor friends intend by this series of resolutions to destroy the very basis of labor value, and yet I have a very firm conviction that the adoption of them would lead to that precise result. [Applause].

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I move to amend the report of the committee by the substitution of document No. 150.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I rise to a point of order.

The Presiding Officer: The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. Brown: That is the converse of the proposition, as I understand it, which is now before us. No. 150 was before us before there was a move to substitute the other. Now the motion is, as I understand it, to resubstitute what was pending. Am I in error?

The Presiding Officer: The Chair rules the point of order is well taken. The only question before the Convention is: Shall the resolution be rejected? If rejection is negativized, then the document is substituted. Then would come in order the motion of Mr. Brown of Brockton.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: Do I understand the Chair to rule that while the question of rejection is before the Convention an amendment to the proposition cannot be made?

The Presiding Officer: The ruling which the Chair made was that No. 150, the amendment as offered by Mr. Harriman of New Bedford, was not in order, because that was in the subject-matter under consideration, but that according to the procedure of the Convention the amendment of the gentleman from Brockton was in order,—the substitution of his amendment.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I am reluctant to enter this debate, especially under the heat of the day,—though I feel none of the heat which the discussion seems to have generated in other quarters,—because I am satisfied that my friend from Newton (Mr. Lowell), at the head of the joint committee which reported against these resolutions, ably aided as he has been by my friend from New Bedford (Mr. Mitchell) and others, has said enough to sustain the report; but I am called upon by an invitation so direct and pressing by my friend from Brockton (Mr. Brown), for whom I have the sincerest respect as a man, however misguided, who believes every word he says, that it would be almost discourteous to refuse it. Indeed, I feel a personal obligation, arising out of my personal affection for him, to make him a wiser man if I cannot make him a better, though it is not entirely clear to me that I am justified in taking the time of the Convention for that purpose. [Laughter.]

I think, however, that one or two things remain to be said which may help to clarify the discussion, somewhat confused by the introduction of what my friend from Newton (Mr. Lowell) called metaphysics, but which might be called by a name by no means so polite.

I will begin by a plain statement of the reason why the palpable untruth that the labor of a human being is not a commodity has become so dear to my friend from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and to organized labor in general. That lies at the very center of this labor injunction controversy, and to that extent my friend from Brockton has found out the crucial point, but he is trying to stand upon a falsity and a fallacy, and that is the difficulty with his position.
Organized labor, rightly or wrongly, wishes to control the labor situation and the labor market, and to be in a position to dictate terms, not only to all employers, but to all independent labor, — to every man who works and does not see fit to join the union. If they can get rid of the injunction they can do it, for the injunction is the only effective legal remedy against the unlawful methods or proceedings which often accompany the strikes. It is no remedy to sue three or four hundred strikers individually for civil damages. That will not keep the mill running nor compensate the owner for his loss. Still less is it a remedy to indict them for riot or conspiracy. The only real remedy is the injunction, which says to them, when they are conducting an unlawful enterprise or a lawful enterprise by unlawful means, — "Stop." But the injunction can be issued only to protect property rights. Accordingly, in order to get rid of it they take the somewhat devious course of asking us to declare in the Constitution that labor is not property and the right to labor not a property right. It would be much more direct, more simple, more intelligible, more honest, to write into the Constitution, plainly, that no injunction shall issue in an industrial dispute.

Mr. Brown of Brockton addressed the Chair.

Mr. Pillsbury: Pardon me; my friend from Brockton can make a much better speech than I can, but I prefer to have him make it under his own name [laughter], and if the Convention had observed the rule of one speech at a time it would have saved months which have been wasted here in idle interruptions.

Instead of going at it by the plain and direct way of saying in the Constitution that no injunction shall issue in labor disputes, which at least involves no falsity or fallacy, they are trying to get at it by writing into the Constitution that labor, or the right to labor, is not property and shall not be so regarded; because, if they can do that, they have paralyzed the injunction, which can issue only in defence of property or property rights.

What was said by my friend from New Bedford (Mr. Mitchell) this morning about the Worthington case has superseded what I might have said on that point and made any further reference to that case unnecessary. But we heard yesterday another voice from New Bedford, in quite a different key, from my friend who usually sits in this division (Mr. Harriman), who spent the best part of an hour in repeating the old familiar diatribe and denunciation of the courts. It was unworthy of him and I am sorry that he felt called upon to do it. He was betrayed into it, I assume, by the warmth of his feelings, and to some extent, undoubtedly, by misstatements which he takes as truths, but I think it ought to be answered. Instead of attempting to answer it myself, I have at hand a more effective answer from the gentleman who has been so distinguished as counsel for the labor organizations that his activity in this direction, as I suppose, has made him twice a candidate for Governor, who recently on a public occasion said this:

As one who has had some experience in the trial of so-called labor cases, I hope I may be pardoned if I venture to say a personal word of commendation and approval of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. In this practically new and unexplored field our Supreme Court has probably penetrated further than any other civilized tribunal. In many of its decisions it has been most liberal in its views and in its treatment of the workman. In many cases it has laid down rules of law that have been and will be invaluable to organized labor. It has been most painstaking and careful, eminently fair, and absolutely fearless. It has lived up to the highest, noblest, and the best traditions of Massachusetts, and no greater praise can be accorded to it.

I read this public statement of Mr. Mansfield, the counsel of the labor-unions, not more to confute my friend from New Bedford (Mr.
Harriman), who said to the Convention yesterday exactly the contrary, than because I think the man who made it is entitled to the credit of it. He expressed the same view before the joint committee, where he represented organized labor, and he has never taken, in the Bogni case nor any other, the absurd position that labor is not property nor the right to labor a property right. On the contrary, in the Bogni case, the latest of the important cases, in which our court held the Act of 1914 unconstitutional, the case which projected this whole controversy into this Convention, he printed into his brief the express concession that the rule is no longer to be questioned, that it is idle to say that the right to labor is not a property right or that labor is not property; and I will leave my friend from New Bedford in this division to fight out his controversy with his own counsel.

These things would not have tempted me into this debate,— nothing but my friend from Brockton (Mr. Brown) and some of his assertions could have done it. I was born of a race of abolitionists and inherited the despised and persecuted Negro as part of my filial charge, and whenever and wherever I hear slavery mentioned I ininstinctively prick up my ears; and I am bound to say that when I first heard my excellent friend from Brockton suggest the fantastic idea that the doctrine that labor and the right to labor is property makes the working-man a slave, and imposes upon him a system of slavery, I wept and cast ashes on my head that so good a man can be the victim of so absurd a delusion.

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: You misquote me, sir.

Mr. PILLSBURY: What is the truth about it? That is the best way of settling the question, if we all know what it is,—and in this case we do, every one of us. The truth is that human labor probably is bought and sold more and oftener than any other commodity in the world; for every one of us who works, and in this country that includes pretty much everybody, from the shoeback up to the most powerful captain of industry or the President of the United States himself, sells his labor for a price, and every one of us, whether working or not, buys the labor of others and cannot get along without it.

The legal truth about the right to labor is this: It is a personal right, beyond question, and as such is part of the constitutional right to liberty which the courts will protect, and apart from this injunction controversy it makes no difference in the end whether you call it by one name or another. But it is also a property right, because labor can be and is every day sold for money. It is the only property that a vast number of our people possess, and these resolutions would take away their only effective legal remedy for the defence of it.

My friend from Brockton invites me to argue this with him. Why, some things are incapable of argument. I would as soon think of arguing that water is wet as of arguing that labor or the right to labor is property. He invites me to prove it. "Prove it," he says,
"Prove it to me." Some minds are impervious to proof. [Laughter.] It is common knowledge that you cannot convince the victim of a delusion that it is not so. To him the delusion is the only real thing there is. But sometimes illustration may do what argument cannot do, and if my friend from Brockton will permit me, let me remind him of two or three common facts of his daily existence, for I doubt whether he has ever held up the mirror to himself. I learned yesterday with great interest that he is a printer. I presume that when he works at that vocation he works for wages, and I hope they are liberal. Does he really feel and believe, when he puts the pay envelope in his pocket that he is a slave? Who ever knew a slave to be paid for his labor? Where does he go at night when he gets through with his day's work? Does he go, like Bryant's slave in Thanatos, "scourged to his dungeon," or does he go, with his money rattling in his pocket, whithersoever he pleases, "sustained and soothed by an unaltering trust" that there will be more money in his pocket to-morrow? [Laughter and applause.]

But it is worse than this. If my friend is a slave, he is also a slave-trader and a slave-driver, for he cannot get along without the help of his fellow-citizens any more than the rest of us can, and he does not try to. He goes to the cordwainer to make or mend his shoes; to the tailor to make or mend his coat; to the barber [laughter, apropos of Mr. Brown's luxuriant growth of white hair and beard] to dress his hair. [Laughter and applause.] I agree with him that such a crown of glory ought never to be profaned by the shears, and if I had the privilege of wearing it I should no more think of asking a barber to cut it than my friend from ward 5 in the third division would think of asking a barber to cut his. [Laughter and applause. A reference to Mr. Lomasney of Boston, who is quite bald.] Now, whenever and so often as my friend goes to the shoemaker, or the tailor, or the barber, if his own theory be correct, he is imposing slavery on them, and trafficking, if not in their bodies, in their very souls. And when I reflect that he does these enormities every day of his life, I shudder to think that so good a man in his impulses can be so depraved in his conduct. [Laughter.]

If I try to chase this absurdity any further I shall become absurd myself. Let me deal with the subject a moment more soberly. The fancied analogy with slavery is a false analogy, into which my friend from Brockton is self-betrayed by the warmth of his emotions. The crucial fact at the bottom of the whole labor controversy is that organized labor demands the privilege of breaking its contracts at pleasure, so that it may dominate and dictate terms to every employer and to every independent laborer; and because it cannot be allowed to do this, and because the injunction is in the way of it, we have this outcry against the injunction and the talk about slavery. If you want to talk about slavery there is better material and nearer at hand. It is universally admitted that the government has a complete power of control over the service of its citizens for the purposes of its maintenance and defence. We are at this moment watching the operation of this power on the most tremendous scale. Labor in peace, and military service in war, are both alike service, no more and no less. Men often volunteer for the service of war, as they have always volunteered for the service of labor; yet no one would contend that the volunteer soldier shall have the right to desert the colors whenever he finds that he can better his condition, or that he is a slave because he cannot. The defence of the country, the government itself, would break down under such a doctrine.

The service of labor is no less essential to the maintenance of government than the service of war. Since organized society, or therefore government, cannot exist without a vast amount of work done, if voluntary labor sufficient for the purpose does not offer, compulsory labor must be sought and found; and compulsory labor for the maintenance of society and of government is no more slavery, nor would be if we should have to come to it, than compulsory service in war.

Mr. Moriarty of Boston addressed the Chair.

Mr. Pillsbury: I ask my friend not to interrupt me. I shall be through in a moment, and then if I can say anything to his satisfaction it will give me pleasure.

All this is no truer to-day than it has always been, but I presume it has never occurred to my friend from Brockton to doubt that he lives under a government "as free as the lot of humanity will permit," nor really to regard himself as a slave. All society, all government, must rest, does rest, on the obligation of every member of it to do his part toward maintaining it; and this involves, as one of its primary elements, the obligation to perform private contracts, fairly made, no less than the social duties demanded by the government as of right. It would be as easy to undermine society and overthrow government by general disregard of private obligations in time of peace as by refusal of military service in time of war, and no government could permanently survive if it permitted either the one or the other. So far from slavery, this principle lies at the very foundation of liberty and free institutions; and these are some of the reasons why the talk about the principle of slavery being involved in the sale of labor or enforcement of labor contracts is nothing but the product of a disordered fancy, and why the remedy of injunction in industrial disputes must remain until we find a better, which in my opinion must ultimately be found in an arbitral tribunal, operating equally upon employers and employed and having power to enforce its awards, thus securing the industrial peace which is always and everywhere essential to the public welfare and the stability of our institutions, and in Massachusetts is essential to the very existence of a vast proportion of our population, which depends upon industrial peace for its daily bread. [Applause.]

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: It is a dangerous thing for a tyro to follow a master jurist, an adept in constitutional law, of vast experience in the exposition and application of the law. I cannot speak as a lawyer, but as a student of laws there is something to be said upon this subject which perhaps has not yet come to your attention.

We are dealing with two intertwined questions,—first, the question of the right of injunction; second, the question of property in labor,—as though they were accidentally connected. Now, the truth is that these propositions now before this Convention involve several different principles, or lack of principles, with regard to labor. The first is the question of the right of the courts to lay injunctions upon persons in order to restrain criminal acts. That involves the doctrine of property, since ordinary equity proceedings do not extend to the acts of persons, nor invoke criminal proceeding. The judge makes them criminal by asserting that labor, or at least the right to labor, is a commodity, a property, which may be made subject to injunction.

Then follows a point which hardly has been touched upon here. How is the injunction to be carried out? Why, by contempt proceedings, involving trials without jury, and without the ordinary application of judicial procedure; and these three matters are inextricably connected. The proposition before us is to restrict, — not (as you will observe if you examine the text), to prohibit the use of injunction in labor matters, but to restrict it; and we have been assured upon this floor that any attempt at restriction meant nothing more or less than the turning over of the control of the Commonwealth to the labor men, who thus would become the only men in the Commonwealth who could act without restriction; while all the rest of us were to be prostrated at their feet.

I was amazed that this doctrine should be put forth in this Convention, a doctrine practically that there are here on this floor, and throughout the Commonwealth, two different classes of men whose interests are vitally opposed, one of which is endeavoring to destroy and humiliate the other. I do not believe that to be the case. I do not believe it, in the first place, because the labor men of this Commonwealth not only have an organization, but they have rights. It seems to me extraordinary that the people of Massachusetts, through their representatives in this Convention, are so slow to recognize what we actually admit every day of our lives, namely, the number and the power at the ballot through their organizations, of the laboring men of the country. Nor do we all realize that the laborers, acting under the advice, direction or threat of their leaders, have in general taken a stand which makes the war possible.

If the laboring men of Massachusetts, and of the other States, were in a frame of mind to tumble down the rights of other people, they have an opportunity now; if they were in that frame of mind what an opportunity to decline to support the government in its effort to protect this Commonwealth, and every Commonwealth of the Nation, and to make them perpetual! The laboring men within the United States would have the power to stop the war, so far as the United States is concerned, if they chose to exercise it. They do not choose to exercise it. They stand up to their guns as well as the other Americans. They furnish their quota of men in the trenches; they have done their part; and we assume that they, like their brethren, will continue to do their part to the end of the story.

If the principle of no injunction in labor disputes is so dangerous it is very curious that in 1897 a voice was raised against it; which doubtless you will instantly decide must have been the voice of a labor agitator.

In answer [says this voice] to the argument urged in favor of the injunction, — that the injunction is a swifter and speedier mode of dealing or a short cut to the desired end, that it avoids delay and uncertainty incident to a jury trial, occasions less expense, and insures speedier punishment, — is opposed the conclusion that, conceding these pleas to be true, they would justify mob action.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Whose voice is that? A labor leader's? No. It is the voice of a United States Circuit Court of Appeals, in a case reported in 83 Federal Reporter 912.

Again, a like voice arose in 1901, to the effect that if the relief sought is to be granted by a process of injunction, this means that a judge, — one individual, — sitting in equity, must hear the evidence, determine the facts, convict the defendant and then, by fine and imprisonment, enforce his judgment; that no jury shall intervene, and that no barrier and no safeguard shall stand between the will of the judge and the liberty of the defendants.

What are these words? They are the decision of a majority of a Kentucky court, in a case reported in 78 Southwestern Reporter 482.

There may be differences of opinion upon this subject, but I protest against the attempt to put down members of this Convention, whatever their attitude toward this question, upon the ground that the pending proposition is unthinkable, — that it is an offence against society, to argue that the present use of the labor injunction is contrary to the ordinary rights of the individual, and an improper method of judicial procedure.

We talk about this as if there always had been injunctions in labor disputes. So far as I can discover, the first case in which that point was distinctly raised was the case of Springfield Spinning Company v. Riley, in 1868, in which the offence was truly dreadful, I will admit. It appears that the labor men had issued placards which requested all "well-wishers of the Union not to trouble or cause annoyance to the Springfield Spinning Company by knocking at the door of their offices, until the disputes between them and certain workmen should be finally terminated." This frightful threat, this destruction of the foundations of the Commonwealth, the court held to be a publication involving intimidation, for which injunction was the appropriate remedy.

Again, in 1888, in the case of Sherry v. Perkins, in Massachusetts, it appeared that a banner had been displayed bearing the awful words: "Lasters are requested to keep away from P. P. Sherry's. Per order, L. P. V." Those incendiary words could be met only by an injunction, and an injunction was issued.

The field of injunction has been widened by two Federal acts, namely, the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, which has introduced to some minds the idea that working-men who are in any way connected with interstate commerce may be restrained by injunction when others may not, and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890, in which conspiracies in restraint of trade were prohibited. Under those acts there have been some additional cases, and the practice has grown wider and wider. As I tried to call to the attention of the Convention yesterday, a very curious fact is that in 1893 Judge William H. Taft of Ohio issued an injunction against a strike inaugurated by P. M. Arthur, for many years the head of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. That same Mr. Taft it was who subsequently was elected President in 1908, under the Republican platform which protested against the use of injunction as then applied, presumably by the United States courts. President Taft was so much interested that he followed it up with a message in which he urged legislation. Legislation was introduced into Congress but was not passed at that time. But in 1912 the Supreme Court of the United States issued certain rules, under the law by which they incorporated the main principle for which President Taft had contended, namely, that injunction should not issue without notice nor except in extremity, so to speak. Those principles, so alarming to some members of this Convention, were introduced into the rules of the Supreme Court, which govern the proceedings of the court. That is to say, these disturbers of the Commonwealth, these destroyers of our peace, appear to have found their way into Congress, into the White House, and even into the Supreme Court.

It is true that in a number of recent cases the Supreme Court has upheld labor injunctions, sometimes in the State courts but more commonly in the lower Federal courts, particularly the twin cases of the Hinchman Coal & Coke Company v. Mitchell and the case of Eagle Glass & Manufacturing Company v. Rowe, both of them in the year 1918. It is true also that in those great decisions there were dissenters, and if I had to choose between agreeing with the majority of the Supreme Court and agreeing with Justice Holmes, Justice Clarke and Justice Brandeis as to what is the law and what is a proper application of law to the conditions of labor in this country, I always shall be glad to be ranged with the dissenters. Those judges, in one case three and in another case two, dissented flatly against the whole principle and against the whole idea that it could be used to prevent laboring men from carrying out a policy of common action. The majority of the court, and many lower judges, think otherwise. Some even claim that picketing was intimidation and therefore ought to be stopped by injunction.

This whole question of injunction, this whole question of the relations of labor, is farther complicated with the issue which has just been discussed so inclusively by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury).

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I dislike to interrupt my friend, but is the word "injunction" mentioned in any resolution now before the Convention for discussion?

Mr. Hart: I am very happy to say that since it is impossible, as I have been trying to argue, to disassociate the question of injunction from the question of property in labor, I was just about to come to that particular point. That is, the usual reason why an injunction is laid is that the court first frames its mind the conception that labor, or the right to labor if you choose, is a commodity. Now, the difficulty with that doctrine is the very serious one that there appears to be no method of specific performance of labor contracts that does not involve involuntary servitude, except, of course, in the army and in the navy and with seamen upon the sea. That marine status of absolute subjection to the rule of the captain and the officers for the time being, has been very much diminished by the act which just before the war was passed by Congress and presumably now applies to our merchant shipping, although it has been somewhat disturbed by war.

The difficulty is a very simple one. I am a workman. I have nothing but my hands. I engage to work for a man, we will say for a year, and by and by I do not like the job and I quit. What can he do to me? Why, that is a contract. If he has lost money by me he can sue me. Well, plainly the suit of an employer against an employee or a number of employees is a very unsafe recourse! And when you have won, what do you get? Suppose you are awarded your damages, you cannot induce the man to come back to your shop. Then what is the next step? There is only one logical next step, under the theory of labor injunctions; that is, if you are to enforce the contract you must enforce it specifically, you must put me at a lathe and say: "Here, turn that piece of iron"; you must give me a shovel and say: "Dig a hole in the ground, and if you don't there is a black snake whip". Where does that method carry you? We all know that forced labor is impossible. That is to say, the doctrine of specific performance of labor contracts, which lies at the bottom of this whole theory of injunction, is a doctrine which is incompatible with the ordinary principles of freedom. We hear something now about the conscription of labor in other matters; the Federal government may call upon civilians, as it has called upon men of military age subject to military service, for services which the government will assign and which the government will enforce. If we come to that, we shall be under not only a very different labor system from any with which we are acquainted, we shall have an entirely different social system, we shall have a changed governmental system.

Mr. Brown of Brockton addressed the Chair.

Mr. Hart: The gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) is entirely able to defend himself on any question. I beg pardon. The gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) has been very courteous to me. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. Brown: Of course I am interested in the gentleman's argument, but I want to have it clear right here. And what does labor say to the government? Conscript us, if you will, for the benefit of the whole, but — when you conscript us for the benefit of the individual!

Mr. Hart: Part of what the gentleman has said I was about to say, and the rest of it certainly was said with great ability.

The point here is the very simple one, that if you are going to conscript labor you have got to accept it as a war measure, an extreme measure. When it comes to the issue of defending the United States, when it comes to the question of setting up this country as an implacable opponent of tyranny and oppression in the world, when it comes to the necessity of our maintaining a position which will make free government possible, I am as willing as any man in this Convention, as any labor man in this Convention, to give way upon that question and for this time. But, let not our abnormal war conditions be made an argument for a legal system under which in times of peace this remedy, this drastic and this unreasonable remedy, may be applied.

The truth is that the doctrine of injunction never would have been heard of but for the increase in labor power, the weight of the labor-unions, the disputes about the closed shop and the open shop. In a way the injunction is looked upon as one of the defences of the propertied class. What is the propertied class? We all belong to both classes. All the members of this Convention certainly are hard working. Some of them could live without labor, and even without their salaries as members, but their means and their incomes are not the real question here. The real question is that we are all members of the same Commonwealth and on the same terms. As a matter of fact, we have recognized property, we have had to recognize the existence of great numbers of laborers, we recognize labor organizations, though employers in general have striven against it for a century. We have recognized labor-unions on a small scale and on a large scale as we have recognized capitalistic combinations. We even have made agreements with labor-unions which practically are part of the laws of the United States and actually a part of its administration. It is futile, it is idle, for us to sit here and to try to set apart the labor men, who are our brethren, who work in their shops as we work in our offices, who are as much interested in this Commonwealth as any of us, who have children to educate and to put out in the world. It seems to me, speaking mildly, an affront to say that those men are seeking through this amendment, whatever its legal defects, to assert a power of domination over the rest of the community. I am just as willing to put the future of myself and my children in an electorate which includes the working-men of this country as in any select part of a different electorate which could be designated by this Convention or in any other way. [Applause.]

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: As the arguments in this case have been very exhaustive, I move the previous question.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) who has just taken his seat. I should like to have the gentleman assume a case where he was involved in some very important legal controversy, and where he had given a retainer to a distinguished attorney for the purpose of retaining him upon his side of the case, and it later transpires that the distinguished attorney, being false to his trust, has gone over to the other side of the case and proposes to appear for the gentleman's opponents. Whether or not the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) would think a legal system was to be commended which would prevent the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) from using the power of the injunction to restrain the legal gentleman in question from so violating his trust?

Mr. Hart: In a case like that put before us I should think the first thing to do was politely to kick the attorney out of your own service, try to get an honest man, and if there were no honest attorneys, why, then I think I would have to go out of business. But of course the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Richardson) knows as well as I do that the case he is putting is a case that is exceedingly liable to happen under the present judicial system of Massachusetts; and the remedy of asking a court to enjoin a lawyer from appearing upon the other side, and submitting him to contempt proceedings if he did appear or if he gave any advice to my opponents, appears to me to be one of the slenderest, feeblest and most futile remedies that I could undertake. I would rather put my money in some other hole.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: Speaking on the previous question, I hold that this is a very important matter. I have come to the conclusion that the other resolutions before this body, or that are to follow, would be involved in case we disposed of this question, which is resolution No. 150. I understand if we disposed of this without further consideration that it also would dispose of the others which follow. I have intended to speak upon this matter, and have given some thought to this subject, and I hope that the previous question, if it does involve the other resolutions, will not be considered at this time.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I hope the main question will not be ordered now. This is a matter on which, as the Convention knows, I have very strong opinions, but there are many gentlemen here, some of whom agree with me and some of whom do not agree with me, who wish to talk upon it. It seems to me that they should be given the opportunity. It seems to me perfectly true, as the gentleman (Mr. Donovan of Springfield) has just said, that the two following resolutions are practically this same thing, and we might as well discuss it all on this one rather than having two more bites at the cherry.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: I hope the delegates to the Convention at this time will reject the previous question. It will become more serious after the Convention adjourns if the previous question is adopted, more serious in other conventions as well as here, and will give the opportunity to some people to criticize the action of the Convention on an important question they wish to discuss. If I had my way, I should like to hear a great discussion of the injunction question by the best lawyers in this Commonwealth. Some of the actions of the past Legislature, and the decisions of the courts by their injunctions upon some of us individual members, show to us the exact dealing with the representatives of the court in handling this question. I am under the opinion that the delegates in this Convention should be able to produce a quorum, so that they will give to the people who are interested in this question, to the gentlemen who oppose them, the right to discuss this question, which, whether they claim we are mistaken or correct, is in the interest of the wage-earner, no matter whether the word “slavery” is used in argument, and many times by many people, instead of wage-class. We all are free American citizens, and a discussion of this question, on which we often condemn the political propaganda of the political parties and the gagging of free speech, will give an opportunity to those who are in favor and those who are opposed, so that we may become educated on this important question by defeating the motion for the previous question to-day.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I should wish, if the gentleman would consent so far, that his motion for the previous question be withdrawn. This is a very important issue, and I for one am very much in need of instruction upon it, and I should very much like to hear these gentlemen who have prepared themselves and whose opinions are of value to me, allowed to speak. I do not believe that there is any question likely to come before this Convention which is more important to more members than this question. I myself for many years have been reading decisions of the courts, and I have been listening to the discussion, and my mind still is undecided. I very much hope that discussion will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I feel assured in a way that debate on these other questions will come at this time. I therefore will ask to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I have listened with a great deal of interest, particularly to the speech of the gentleman in this division (Mr. Pillsbury), who spoke so ably in behalf of labor as a property right. I admit that the criticism made by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) probably to some extent was well founded, when he says that labor organizations by indirect methods have sought to bring about a result that might better have been stated frankly and have been sought as an amendment to the Constitution in the way in which he put it, "to limit the issue of injunctions in labor disputes." That may be true. It may be true because of the fact that labor organizations in matters of law, like the rest of us, have sought the advice of lawyers. We have recognized that in the words of Mr. Dooley "the lawyers make the laws and the flaws in the laws," and we have sought their assistance. Of course it was natural that a lawyer would approach this question from the standpoint of his profession and would seek to obtain his end by indirect means. I will confess that we have had to make use of lawyers. As Elbert Hubbard once said, "lawyers are men whom we hire to protect us from lawyers," and we have had to so protect ourselves. The result is that they have introduced the measure in this possibly indirect way to achieve results by taking the method of removing from the jurisdiction of the courts of equity the issuing of injunctions in labor disputes.

I have based my remarks almost wholly upon the report of the committee as printed. It seemed to me that they no doubt would have given careful consideration to this document, and therefore that I might make it a basis for criticism from the point of view which I hold. I notice that they say in discussing resolution No. 146: "Resolution 146 seeks to incorporate into the Constitution the undisputed abstraction that the right to labor and enjoy its fruits is inherent in the individual. Of course it is, but to declare this in the Constitution would add nothing to the rights of any citizen." It appeared to me that if the right to labor as embodied in resolution No. 146 was merely an abstraction, undisputed but an abstraction, that it was inconsistent with their attitude or their definition of the right to labor when referring to the other resolutions, Nos. 219, 220, and the others. There they say: "To declare that labor is not property or a property right is a very different matter. The right to labor is plainly property." To me it would seem that if the right to labor was an abstraction when treated under resolution No. 146 it was still an abstraction and not a concrete property right.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: Might I ask the gentleman to explain to me, as I do not clearly understand, if he wishes me, for example, to understand that he wishes to impress upon us that labor is to be considered as a property right, that is to say, as much a property right as any tangible thing which we have, or whether he looks upon it as a privilege. I would ask him whether the issue does not really lie there. Labor consists, as I understand it, in the idea. It is an abstraction, as observed. That is to say, a man's labor is worth only what the idea that he has of it makes it worth, his wish to labor, in other words. Is it, therefore, other than a privilege? Is it a tangible thing at all?

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: The phrase, the right to labor, is rather confusing to me. As I have studied labor economics, we deal with labor power rather than the right to labor. To me the right to labor seems to be an abstraction, from the fact that there is no guaranteed opportunity to labor. If there is such an opportunity, then the right to labor would cease to be merely an undisputed abstraction; but as held legally it seems that they use the phrase, "right to labor," as synonymous with labor power. The resolution which I introduced dealt with labor power, that "the labor power of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce."

According to my understanding of working-class economics, commodities came into being with the production of things for sale rather than for use. A commodity must have exchange value. The working-man, or the man who produces labor power for his own personal enjoyment and not for sale, probably would not come under the category of a possessor of a property right according to the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), but the working-man who eats, who sleeps, who gets shelter, who builds up his body for the purpose of selling the power that is generated within him in return for payment, I suppose according to that definition would be the seller of a commodity. His labor power then would be a commodity subject to the law of supply and demand in the labor market, just the same as any other kind of commodity, shoes, clothing or any other sort of thing, and in a way similar to the conditions that prevailed under chattel slavery. In other words, he would be a wage-slave. He would be selling for wages, which he exchanges for food, clothing and shelter, his labor power. The slave, on the other hand, was bought and sold and gave his labor power for food, clothing and shelter. He did not sell it piece-meal. He belonged to the man who owned him. Now what we are seeking to bring about is a constitutional declaration which will say in the law of our Commonwealth that the labor power of the human being belongs to himself, is a part of himself, and that he cannot be restrained by judicial decisions in disposing of or withholding that labor power.

The report of the committee makes the statement that the only effective means that thousands of working-men outside of labor organizations have of enforcing their right to labor is through the courts; and I deny that the courts enforce that right to labor. I deny that the courts provide any opportunity for the working-man inside or outside of labor organizations to labor. That was what was sought in resolution No. 146, introduced by the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown). It sought to provide in the Constitution that the right of a human being to labor and to enjoy its fruits should not be denied. Now, if that was embodied in the Constitution it would hold, it would seem to me, that the State should provide some way for the exercise of that right. Under the present circumstances the courts do not enforce the right to labor. It may be there is some legal haze about this which I have not been able to penetrate, but to my understanding this statement is entirely wrong, it is entirely contrary to fact, and courts do not enforce the right of the worker to labor.

To show that the gentlemen in their report are looking at this, not from the standpoint of the working-men outside of labor organizations, but rather from the standpoint of the employer, they say in their report that the reason why the law holds labor to be property is because it is capable of hire for reward, evidently looking at it from the standpoint of him who hires for reward. The employer hires labor for the purpose of making profit, for the purpose of exploiting; in other words, getting from the worker more than he gives in return. The working-man gets in payment for his labor power wages, and he produces commodities. The difference between the price of the commodities which he produces and the wages which he gets as a workman goes to the employers; that is, the class of employers who take rent, interest and profit. There is where the difference goes between the wages paid to the workman and the price of the commodity which his labor produces.

Our contention, then, is based upon the fact that the working-man who sells his labor power to the employer sells himself with it; and if it is interpreted that the labor power of the working-man is a commodity, then he himself, who is inseparable from it, is also a commodity. I do not see how we can rule differently. And this is the position taken, not by the idealistic labor men, as the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lowell) yesterday, speaking for the committee said; this is the position of what is called the more conservative trade-unions. The I. W. W. take the same position that the gentleman from Wellesley in this division (Mr. Pillsbury) takes. [Laughter.] They hold that the labor power of a human being is a commodity, that it is bought and sold upon the market subject to the laws of competition, and their object then, the whole fundamental basis of their position, of their philosophy, is this: To organize the workers as sellers of labor power, control that very essential commodity, and by controlling that most necessary commodity control the world and control all government. It is the logical position of the syndicalist, who says that only by the control of labor power can labor win the full value of its toil,—only through its control of its labor power. It is those who believe in parliamentary government, who believe in orderly procedure, who take the position that I am advocating here to-day, those who believe that while the courts exist as they do, the supreme courts, all the actions of society will tend to be subject to their interpretation, and therefore we seek to remove from the field of their jurisdiction such matters as this, which would tend to put us as workers in the position of confining ourselves to the philosophy of the syndicalist. We then would be forced to hold that while labor power was capable, as a commodity, like any other commodity, of being monopolized, then through the power of that monopoly we would be able to force any conditions that we saw fit to impose.

I have been surprised to find such unanimity of opinion between what we call the extreme radicals of the labor movement and the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). I would ask him a question as to an unemployed working-man. For instance, I have in mind a few years ago a multitude of unemployed workers, or who wished to be workers, unemployed at the time, who assembled on Boston Common and then marched upon the State House. I believe the gentleman from Waltham in this division (Mr. Luce) at that time was Lieutenant-Governor, and he met the committee of the workmen on the steps of the State House. They were seeking employment. They were seeking an opportunity to labor. According to the report of the committee they had a valuable property right in their possession at that time. They had labor power for sale, but they could not find any one to buy it. The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), then Lieutenant-Governor, was in no position to purchase this abundance of wealth that lay before him. They had "valuable property rights" according to the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), in this division, but I contend that those property rights (?) which they were supposed to possess were not valuable. They could not dispose of them, and therefore they were useless. They were without exchange value. They were not a commodity. Now, would he claim that it is only the man who is working who has a commodity for sale, who is selling a commodity? Are the vast number of unemployed without any commodity for sale? They are without an opportunity to sell it. Is it property in one case, in the case of the employed workman, and is it not property in the case of the unemployed workman?

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough. Does the gentleman contend that any piece of tangible property, we will say, which cannot find a market, is not therefore property tested by his definition?

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I am contending against the report of the committee, which says to the multitude of our citizens outside the labor organizations the right to labor is the most valuable property right they possess. I am considering this as a valuable property right. To them it was of no value. It had no exchange value. Value, as I understand it, deals with the exchangeability of goods, not the use of goods. Now, to them that right to labor was not valuable, because it was not exchangeable. Therefore I hold that it is not a valuable property right.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I dislike to disturb the gentleman, but I should very much like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: Would the gentleman repeat the question, please?

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: The gentleman is arguing in effect that an unemployed laborer, unable for the time being to dispose of his right to labor, does not possess any property right. I ask him, testing out his definition, whether, assuming that any given piece of tangible property could not find a market, he would say that it therefore was not property.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I would not say that. I would not contend so in the case of tangible property. I have denied the tangibility of labor power divorced from the person who possesses it.

Another matter has occurred to me. We know that the workingmen and others have been conscripted into the military forces of our country. It seems to me that the conscription of those men was a conscription of them as human beings, not as possessors of property.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: If the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question,—I already have asked him a question and I should like to repeat it, because I am not getting precisely the information which I had hoped to get. I asked him to give me some information on exactly what the labor people meant or wanted when they demanded a right to labor as distinguished from a capacity to labor, or something of that kind. Now they object to having the courts hold that the right to labor is property, and what I want to get through my mind clearly, absolutely clearly, is what the labor party object to in having the courts hold that right to be property. As I understand, the right to labor is no use as long as it remains in a man's mind; if it is undisclosed, its value only depends on finding a purchaser. As I understand it, the great Socialists, so to speak, always have insisted that it was the duty of the State to provide labor for its citizens if they wanted it. That is to say, first of all, the man demanding labor had to have the desire, the wish in his own mind, to be employed. In the second place, he had to communicate it to somebody representing the State, and then the State had to furnish him with occupation. Now I can understand in that situation why or how labor actually should be a commodity. It is a salable commodity for which the State provides a purchaser. That is all perfectly logical and the result follows that the citizen is bound to supply the labor if he is asked to by the State. That is the correlative duty and all that is logical enough. But I do not understand that that is the position of the labor party. I do not understand that the labor party says: "Here, we are willing to provide the labor and now the State must furnish us employment." I do not understand that it is the question they raise, and I simply ask to be enlightened as to what the position is.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: First, to answer the question of the gentleman from Quincy, I will say that the position that he has outlined is not the position of the organized labor movement of America, and in this proposition that is now before us we are not considering the right to work which was embodied in a resolution introduced, I believe, by the gentleman from Brockton. The right to work, if such an amendment was embodied in the Constitution, would imply, it seems to me, the necessity on the part of the State to provide employment. The matter that I am speaking upon now, which deals with injunctions in labor disputes, we might, as the committee apparently did, consider with the others all together. They rejected proposition No. 146 and they took up the other propositions in their order. But the question that I am debating at present is upon the ruling of the committee sustaining their report, — a decision that has been made by the Supreme Court in certain cases, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in particular, — that labor is property. I am trying to show that labor is not property in fact; at least, I am trying in my argument to prove that labor did not become recognized as property until it was so interpreted by the courts. Am I answering your question?

Mr. Adams: Partially.

Mr. Donovan: Well, if it is necessary to give a yes or no answer to that question, whether the organized labor movement is seeking to bring about a State guarantee of employment, I will say that at this time it is not seeking any such consummation. Does that answer it?

Mr. Adams: That answers it. The only other question is, how, then, does their claim go further than claiming a privilege, — a privilege to offer their labor?

Mr. Donovan: The matter in which the organized labor movement of America is particularly interested at this time, and the proposition now before this Convention, is on the interpretation of the courts of this State that the labor power of a human being is a commodity or is property. We are trying to show that in fact it is not property, and we are trying to show that up to the time that the courts ruled that labor was property, it was not considered property.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

We have in our language the word proletariat. It is a word that has been given rather a widespread definition amongst the people by the uprising in Russia. Now the definition of proletariat is a propertyless workman, — a wage-earner, a man with no property.

Now it is evident that at this time, — and this definition is in all the later dictionaries, — there is such a group of people considered, men who have no property. Under the decision of our courts that labor is property it would seem that the dictionaries are entirely wrong in their definition, that there are "no such animals." It would seem that according to the courts there are none such in our country. Now it is recognized in other countries that there is such a class as a propertyless class, a class of wage-earners, those who sell their labor power from day to day and depend upon the sale of their labor power for their food, clothing and shelter.

Mr. Whittier of Winthrop: I should like to understand this thing if possible. I am paying a good deal of attention to it. Take a person, for instance, who starts out with absolutely nothing but his labor to sell, and as a result of selling that labor and accumulating some savings he acquires some property as a result of the sale of that labor. Is not the sale of that labor represented in the property that he purchases? Is not the one synonymous with the other?

Mr. Donovan: The gentleman has stated the position very clearly, that after selling his labor power and saving as a result of the sale of his labor power, he becomes possessed of property. But that would imply that he was not in possession of property until he had acquired it by the sale of his labor power. We contend that the workman, with nothing but his energy, his skill, his brains and his ability to work, has no property, but he has power to labor, and we hold that it is his personal right to withhold that labor power or to bestow that labor power as he himself sees fit; otherwise we contend that his labor power, which is a part of himself, is not controlled by himself.

As a further illustration of the idea which I wish to convey I will refer to the description of the labor power of our fellow-citizens who now are fighting so vaiently on the front in France. It is not contended that property was conscripted at the time that they were drafted into service, but that they were drafted into service as persons, not as possessors of property. And we know that a distinction always has been made, — in fact and according to common knowledge, — between the man who possesses nothing but his labor power, his humanity, and he who possesses property. Throughout our whole history as we read the debates of former Conventions we know that the distinction was made between the man who held property and the man who was without property; that suffrage was determined in the early days of our Commonwealth by the amount of property in the possession of the enfranchised. We know, — we have heard it quoted here in the debates on the I. and R., — that Daniel Webster made this one of his important points in the Convention of 1820, when he referred to "the masses of the people who possessed no property," and he held that the rebellions, the revolutions that had startled the world and had overturned society, had been caused by revolts against property. Now he recognized a property class and a propertyless class. It was left for the lawyers, or in other words, for the courts, to interpret labor power as property. I believe, if my information is correct, that William Howard Taft was the first one to issue an injunction in a labor dispute based upon that interpretation. Now I would say that William Howard Taft was the "Columbus" of labor as a property right; he discovered it. Prior to that it was non-existent. To-day it is non-existent except in law. It became necessary for the organized labor movement to seek to remove that interpretation, and the way they sought to do it was to have it declared a personal right constitutionally. They sought to declare it through Congress, and Congress so declared it, but evidently it did not stand. And now we are seeking to declare constitutionally that labor is a personal right and not a property right. There is a great difference of opinion; I can recognize it here. That difference of opinion is not confined to the so-called conservatives on the one hand representing the property class and the radicals on the other hand representing the masses of the peoples of which organized labor is a very important part, but in the labor movement itself,—not so much in the American Federation of Labor, but in the labor movement, taking it in its broader aspect, there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Of what use would it be for this Convention to declare the right to labor a personal right if such declaration were inconsistent with the Federal Constitution?

Mr. Donovan: I would answer,—and the answer, of course, is obvious to all of us,—that if we made a constitutional declaration that was contrary to the Federal Constitution it would not stand. But I contend that this amendment in no way interferes with the Federal Constitution. I do not know where the idea comes from that it would in any way conflict with the Federal Constitution. To my mind this question is purely a part of the great fundamental question, the labor question. If we take the position that labor is a commodity, well and good. The labor movement undoubtedly will find some way to control that "commodity." But I tell you frankly, as one who understands the labor movement fairly well, its history, its theory and its practical application, or the way in which it faces the practical problems of the day, I know that there is in this great labor movement, not confined to the American Federation of Labor, but the labor movement as a whole, taking in other outside organizations and agencies, a disposition to act upon the ruling such as laid down by the report of this committee. They would say: "Well and good, we accept your position,—the labor power of a human being is a commodity. We seek to control that commodity. This makes us sellers of a commodity which the other class, the employing class, buy. They buy that commodity the same as they buy raw material of any kind, for profit, to turn it into finished material to make profit for themselves. This, then, is evidence of a class struggle, a class war, a war between the sellers of labor power and the buyers of labor power." It is a clear recognition of the class struggle which is the basis of the syndicalist movement, the I. W. W. movement, which so terrorizes many of our good friends on the extreme conservative side of this chamber. This is the foundation upon which their syndicalist's philosophy is built,—that the labor power of a human being under the capitalist system is bought and sold; it is sold by the workers who must live, it is bought by the employers who must have labor power to carry on their profit-making industry; that between the two an eternal conflict is going on and that there can be no compromise. This represents the point of view of the Bolsheviki, of Russia.

Now, those of us who believe that we, by an amendment to the Constitution at least, may take this out from under the jurisdiction of the courts, and give the labor of a human being standing as a personal right, feel that we are working largely in the interest of reform rather than the interest of revolution.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Does the gentleman think that such a declaration as he desires will remove the entire matter either from the jurisdiction of the State court or the Federal court?

Mr. Donovan: The opinion of the labor movement, the organized labor movement, the American Federation of Labor, I might say,—and this of course is the opinion that has been given to them by their attorneys,—is to the effect that this would free the workingman from the jurisdiction of the courts on a matter or matters such as injunctions in labor disputes, except in cases where an irreparable injury to property was threatened. Now, if it would not do that, that at least is the purpose of the amendment, and it has been introduced on the advice of the attorneys of the American organized labor movement. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: May I interrupt once more to point out that the Federal Constitution expressly provides that it shall be the supreme law of the land. Now, what the gentleman is seeking to do is not to amend the Federal Constitution, but the State Constitution. The Federal Constitution further recites that the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. I still am unable to see how such an amendment as the gentleman desires would take the matter out of the jurisdiction of either the Federal courts or of the State courts.

Mr. Donovan: This matter is a legal point, which I am unqualified to discuss, or at least to give a final judgment upon. I can say only that, speaking in behalf of the organized labor movement, which has been responsible for the introduction of this amendment, I believe, and have no reason to think otherwise as yet, that it would serve the purpose for which we seek this change in the Constitution, or this amendment to the Constitution, which has been introduced.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: Personally I do not believe that labor is a property right. I do not believe it is property. I also do not believe in the extremes to which injunctions have been carried, and I find a great many here who agree with me,—I have met them constantly,—who are opposed to this amendment and will vote against it. Now, my question is this: Why do you not let this go by and make your fight on No. 266, which is a simpler proposition, and which is very much more likely to receive support? I should like to ask why all this controversy here upon this, when you have the issue presented succinctly in the next number?

Mr. Donovan: I would answer that the reason why we do not postpone our discussion of the matter until another stage, or until the other propositions come up, is because we fear that there would not be sufficient fight left in the radical wing of this Convention by the time those come up, and we were taking time by the forelock by jumping into the mess at this time.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Mr. Bennett: May I ask, is not this proposition something quite different from the next one, more complex and more words in it, while what you are trying to get at is presented more simply in the next proposition? Therefore you get licked on a thing because of other details, while if you confined yourself to your own simple proposition you might carry it. That is what I do not understand,—why this fight on this thing?

Mr. Donovan: In answer to the gentleman I will say that the reason why I felt it necessary to project myself into this struggle at this stage is because the report of the committee covered practically all the propositions in one report. They were considered together, and the report was made upon them as a whole, and it was very hard to divide them in the discussion here upon the floor. Therefore it was considered advisable, while the opportunity presented itself, that we do our best to bring in the side of labor on a matter that is before the Convention, at least, the principle which is embodied in practically all those questions or propositions contained in the report of the committees on the Judiciary and Labor, sitting jointly.

I was just about ready to close. I was outlining a few minutes ago the attitude taken by a certain large and considerable section of the organized and unorganized and semi-organized labor movement of this country toward this question, and I was trying to bring to the attention of the Convention the fact that what we seek here is really in the way of providing against a contingency that otherwise will arise. It may be that the decision of the courts to the effect that labor is a property right will embarrass for a time the organized labor movement. I have no doubt in my own mind but what that is the purpose of the decision. Not that I consider that it was in any way dishonest on the part of the gentlemen who made it, but because I recognize that they are representative of certain ideas, that they hold an attitude toward society that is a result of their environment, their economic, social and political environment,—and that naturally their mental reaction is different from that of the man who depends upon his labor for his livelihood, and their philosophy of life cannot but be different.

But I am saying this: That I do not believe that the injunctions issued in labor disputes, which have become much more prevalent as time has gone on, will have the effect that evidently has been intended by their most sincere or most persistent advocates. The interpretation of the decision that labor is a property right is based, according to the report, upon the desire to protect the "thousands of unorganized workers who are outside the labor organizations." I wonder if it would not interfere with the operation, or would not make it necessary for a new decision to be made, if the placing of the working-men who are outside the labor organizations under the protection of the courts of equity would not be interfered with, in case those workers were not outside the labor organizations; in other words, if they became members of the organized labor movement. It is a fact that the organized labor movement is growing so fast at this time that it bids fair to envelop those thousands who formerly were outside of labor organizations, and who seem to be the hope of those who wish to use them as examples of a property right, and have sought to "protect" them by the courts of equity.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Now, this is the tendency, and it presents problems that go down to the very fundamentals of our democracy. Labor organizations are seeking to protect themselves, and to do it legally; but if all the legal safeguards are taken away, if there is no opportunity to do it legally, the very fact of their being a class dependent upon their labor,—and this is interpreted as being a commodity,—they, like every other producer of a commodity or seller of a commodity, are going to seek to control that commodity, and control it by the power of their organization, just the same as the controllers of oil, the controllers of cotton, the controllers of other commodities have sought and have succeeded in controlling those commodities by the strength of their ownership, by the strength of their organization.

I will leave the question with that thought expressed. I hope that the members of this Convention will realize that the question before us, the question before every governmental assembly to-day seeking to work out the problems of democracy, is this issue of the growth of big, powerful economic groups; the labor organizations, representative of the workers, on the one hand, the big organizations, representative of the other economic groups, the employers, those who control the manufacturing of various commodities, on the other hand. Between the opposing forces a vital conflict is going on that will manifest itself upon the industrial field, upsetting the social life of our Nation, or we will meet those conditions in a parliamentary manner; we will remove the restrictions in our Constitution; we will make it more easily possible for the workers to exercise the franchise as citizens, and in that way we will safeguard them against what is the only alternative,—to rely entirely upon their organized economic power. In this way we will be able to make it unnecessary for them to take action along lines that would be less parliamentary, less in keeping with peace, and the welfare of the community. [Applause.]

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: When the previous question was moved this morning and then withdrawn, I think it was the understanding of the Convention that the debate on this matter would include, and practically conclude, debate on the two following matters; but since that time notification of one amendment has been given to the Convention, and the Convention has been assured that debate will take place on the two following matters, or at least one of them. And so, sir, I think that there has been sufficient debate, and I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I do not want to take up the time of the Convention on any one of the ramifications of this socialistic problem; but I do wish to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that resolution No. 150 is not as socialistic as the conservatives of this body may think. It is really a copy of section 3 of the English Trades Disputes Act. That act, which has made a great success in the labor movement in England, I will try to quote:

An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground alone that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment, or that it is an interference with the trade, business or employment, of some other person, or with the right to dispose of his capital or his labor as he will.
Now, my brother from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), the eminent labor leader whose discourse on political economics was so illuminating, has brought to this Convention that English Trades Disputes Act. Therefore that should commend itself to this Convention as not being outside the bounds of possibility. The gentleman in this division (Mr. Lowell) said that we were going into metaphysics when we said that labor was a personal right; it seems to me we are going into metaphysics when we say that labor is a property right. As I understand the word "commodity," it means something movable other than animals. That is Webster's definition. Therefore it is a personal right to labor, as I understand it; and that is the construction which the English court, or the English people, or the English highest court, public opinion, has placed upon the English Trades Disputes Act.

I think it is very wrong for the members of this Convention, and particularly my distinguished friend from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), to force this previous question because some man perhaps took up a considerable time and he did not like his sentiments. This question lies at the fundamental principle of the whole country. You must remember that they are coming back to these shores presently, I hope, because there are rumors now that they have 200,000 of the German army; they are coming back to these shores, — over a million young men. They have learned to keep step, they have learned to be organized, they appreciate the value of organization, and they will be just as jealous of the laborers' rights, and more so, than when they went away, because their minds have broadened. They have been in England; they have fought side by side with the English soldier. The Englishman, when he goes back, knows that he has the benefit of that English Trades Disputes Act, the very act which brother Harriman has brought to this Convention, and which should be adopted by this Convention.

It is only a couple of hundred years ago when two agricultural laborers of Dorsetshire, England, struck for an increase of a shilling a month. They were arrested and tried for conspiracy, and given ten years on a prison ship, and one of them died while in servitude. Now the English trade movement has gone on from that time until this very moment. The latest development of the trades disputes has been given to the English people by Parliament, and my brother from New Bedford has given it to us. I am going to vote for it. I believe labor is a personal right, not a property right. I believe the Supreme Court of these United States and the several States and of Massachusetts, — though it does seem rather impertinent, for a young lawyer, but I am not case-hardened yet to the rights of the people, — I do believe, as my brother from New Bedford said, that the Supreme Court is so steeped in precedent that it cannot get beyond the evidence of precedent and do as our English brothers do.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: It is an old saying that drowning men catch at straws. I am not prepared to dispute the truth of that, but if it be true I am sure that no unfortunate going down for the third time ever exercised a more despairing clutch at the aforesaid straw than some of us have in grasping for some shred of practical reason upon the surface of this controversy. As I have experienced the successive waves upon waves of argument, and been drenched thereby, I have felt myself approaching a mental condition which perhaps can be expressed chemically as a saturated solution. [Laughter.] While I am very conscious of the saturation, the solution is not so apparent. [Laughter.]

This, as its friends and opponents alike agree, is a metaphysical discussion. It is all of that. I should say psychological. It has not yet been raised to the spiritual plane, but I have been expecting some honorable member to propose an amendment to the effect that man is a free agent, or something of that sort, which would complete and round off the discussion.

Now, sir, as I understand it, the advocates of this proposition earlier in the debate drew attention to the fact that our courts had reversed themselves upon the decision as to whether labor was a property right or a personal right, the assumption lying in their minds that in both cases the decisions were inimical to the interests of labor. That is proof conclusive to me that litigation or controversy may arise and be submitted to the courts wherein the alternative decision may or may not be in the interest of labor; and why, sir, may not that condition arise again in the future? If we deny recourse to one alternative, and pin ourselves absolutely to the other, are we not thereby developing the position of labor in some future controversy wherein it may be to the interest of labor to decide that it was a property right? It seems to me that there is a point there which has not been cleared up. I confess, sir, that all this long-endured discussion, to my mind, has not convinced me of the advisability of this measure. If I were convinced that it were a step ahead in the protection of labor I gladly should support it. At present, sir, I am not so convinced. I say this in justification of my position as, I hope, a consistent friend of labor and a union man myself; but I intend to vote against this measure in the belief that labor is safer with the condition in the courts as it is.

Mr. Robbins of Chelmsford: This Convention is endeavoring to alter and amend the Constitution of Massachusetts for the better government of all the people and the better protection of the greatest number. In many disputes, and especially in any dispute in which violence is used, the innocent bystander often is hit. In disputes between labor and capital the innocent bystander always is hit. Elaboration upon that point I think is unnecessary. Division of the people into two classes, the employers and employees in the one class, and the rest of the citizens in the second, will be brought about surely by the adoption of this proposition, as indicated by the language in document No. 337.

The discussion upon this matter has been long. I have heard some of the speakers and some of the speakers I have not heard, but to my mind the whole point to be gained by the advocates is the removal of the injunction. How would this operate in practice? I am not a lawyer, so I cannot deal with the legal aspects of this question. I only know that as a member of that second class, outside of the employers and the employees, I feel a sense of security under present conditions which I believe I should lose if this amendment was adopted by the Convention and peradventure approved by the people. What confronts us to-day is unrest. Why? Because the whole world, financially, socially and industrially, is in a turmoil. Read your papers,—a strike here, a tie-up there; government work, some of it.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

After the war,—what then? You cannot discount the possibilities. Would you wish to give more power to this first class, or more restriction? There can be but one answer. Always, when danger is impending of any nature, we wish to cope with it with all possible lawful means. The gentleman from Brockton in the second division (Mr. Brown) has said if the courts are wrong, change the courts. Does he not mean, if the courts decide contrary to his views of what is right or wrong, change the courts?

If the proposition went no farther than its language would imply, it perhaps would be harmless. Take the first two or three lines:

The labor of a human being or the right to labor is a personal right and not a property right or a commodity or an article of commerce.

That in itself is harmless. But if labor is not property no injunction is operative. There is the trouble. Other portions are harmless in themselves. Organize, walk out, stay in,—but let other people do the same. Organization for protection is all right; it has my indorsement. But organization which gets beyond the control of even its organizers I contend needs some means of government and control.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I would be rather ungracious perhaps to further take up the time of this Convention except in a very brief way, to draw some conclusions that perhaps I missed yesterday, or which have not been brought to the attention of the Convention.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Robbins) has referred to unrest. There is probably no better authority as to the reason for unrest than the summing up of the Industrial Commission, after all their exhaustive hearings, and I read this to this Convention:

First, the unjust distribution of wealth and incomes.
Second, unemployment, and the denial of an opportunity to earn a living.
Third, the denial of justice in the creation, adjudication and administration of law.
Fourth, the denial of the right and opportunity to form effective organizations.

I believe that to be true; and while I am particularly interested in the first three or four lines of this document No. 150, I hope there is no man in this Convention but what realizes the sense of the closing lines of that document, which has been brought to our attention by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Herbert A. Kenny). You men may not believe in the English system, you men may not believe in what the English working-men are doing; but if there is anything upon the face of the earth at this time that holds any hope, any well-regulated scheme for the future, it is the manifesto that has been produced by the English working-men since this war commenced. I recommend it to every one of you. Those people in England have fought and died for the right to include the last two lines of document No. 150.

I presume it will not be passed by this Convention. I may live to see it,—I hope I will; if not, for the salvation of this country it must be that those lines shall become the law of this country. Unrest exists, and how is it to be cured? It is to be cured by the majority of the working people of this country, the so-called wage-earners, the working-class; and until they receive their rights, prosperity and peace will not exist in this country and justice is absolutely impossible.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I want to point out again, as I tried to yesterday, the real meaning of this resolution and of all the other resolutions. We have heard interesting discussions here on an academic question of property in labor, or labor power, — whatever is the difference I do not know, but there seems to be a difference between labor and labor power which is beyond my capacity to fathom, — but we have heard a very interesting discussion, almost entirely upon that aspect of the question, from the advocates of these measures; and it is very clever, I think, to try to turn the attention of this assembly from the real reason for these measures to an interesting question which is entirely harmless in itself.

But, as I said before, the laboring men of this country are practical men. One of the ablest men in this country, with whom I am happy to say I have a slight acquaintance, is Mr. Samuel Gompers. Do you suppose for one moment that Mr. Samuel Gompers cares whether we put into the Constitution of Massachusetts that labor is a personal right, or property, or anything of the kind? Of course he does not. What Mr. Samuel Gompers would say, if he were asked and he responded truthfully, would be: "We wish to have this thing in our control; we have got a great deal of it now within the hollow of our hands, and we want the rest of it."

That is the situation. It is not a professorial discussion over terms of art. It is not anything of the kind. It is the practical question whether organized labor shall be without control in this Commonwealth. As I said at first, nobody will deny that the courts have issued injunctions wrongly sometimes and have carried them too far, and so on, but that is not the question. The question is: Is there to be any power in this Commonwealth that shall be above the labor power? And I say there ought to be. Now, if you do not agree with me, vote for this proposition; if you do, vote against it.

The amendment moved by Mr. Brown was rejected.

The resolution (No. 150) was rejected Friday, July 19, 1918.

Mr. Daniel R. Donovan of Springfield presented the following resolution (No. 219):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined.

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The labor of a human being shall not be held to be a commodity, article of commerce or a property right, and the right to enter into the relation of employer and employee, or to change that relation, or to assume and create a new relation for employer and employee, or to perform and carry on business with any person in any place, or do work or labor as an employee, shall be, and shall be held and construed to be, a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment by the employee, whether singly or in numbers, no injunction shall be granted except where it shall appear that irreparable damage is about to be done to property, but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law.

The committees on Labor and Judicial Procedure, sitting jointly, reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Friday, July 19, 1918, and was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: The question which I would have asked the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Lowell) and which I think he would have done well to have answered at the time, is: Why, — if he thinks it is vague and chimerical and visionary to discuss whether labor is a personal or a property right, — why did he put in document No. 337, over his own signature, at the bottom of page 3, the following:

The sole purpose of the resolutions in declaring it not property but a personal right is to put it beyond protection by injunction, as this ordinarily extends only to injuries to property or property rights.

Is that visionary? Is that vague, is that chimerical in any way? No. But he puts there over his own signature the reasons why this declaration of principles is sought, and then he proceeds to get up here and say that the discussion is of no importance.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I thought I made it as plain as my limited command of language would allow me to, that I was against taking away injunction in this kind of cases.

Mr. Bennett: I refer to the stenographer's notes, if he did not say that this discussion was practically worthless, of no importance, or visionary, — words which meant that, — because it did not make any difference whether it was a property right or personal right. I understood that; that was the force of his argument.

Now, I appeal, — as the gentleman in the Chair (Mr. Luce of Waltham) said here one day, — from Philip dreaming to Philip awake, to what he wrote here over his own signature.

Some years ago, a good many years ago, there was a man up in Lawrence working in a little machine shop. He was considered by most people a crank. He spent his nights and days pottering over a piece of machinery, and he killed, pretty nearly, some of the people who worked with him, and if his constitution had not been very strong he would have killed himself. What property was there in his labor? He was considered a crank. There was no property in his labor. He produced the McKay Sewing Machine, and to-day there are about $34,000,000 for the lawyers to quarrel over as his estate. When did his labor become property? At what point did it become property?

Two or three hundred years ago, over in the Netherlands, there was a man working nights and days, and going without food and sleep, seeking expression for something within him in a great painting. He could not borrow a dollar, he could not get enough food to eat, but he did not care. His soul was finding expression. And now, two or three hundred years later, the result of his effort sells for $100,000 or more. When was his labor property, and how was the property valued?

At the present time there are a lot of distinguished citizens of this Commonwealth working in Washington and in Boston for a dollar a year, giving their labor to the Government for a dollar a year. Is that labor property that is being given for a dollar a year?

Here is a man of great mind, of great intellect, of great capacity, who labors for evil, and all the results of his labor are evil. Is that property?

You go to hire a man to milk cows, or to set type, or any of the other occupations with which I am familiar. Take the reporter on a daily paper. Can you size up the property, can you size up the enthusiasm, can you size up the expression of his soul, can you size up the industry, can you size up the product he labors for? No, it is the product of labor that is wealth, and not the power to labor, which may be spent evilly, or which may be spent for good.

I do not belong to any labor-union, and I never saw a copy of Karl Marx. I am going to get one right off and read it, but I never saw a copy of Karl Marx's works. I have seen quotations from them. I do not believe labor is property, and I believe that the injunctions in labor troubles are often an expression of that improper and selfish distribution of wealth which we are growing out of. But it seems to me that I never have seen a better manifestation of the reasons why the labor men sometimes do not get farther ahead than has been made here in this discussion and in these three separate propositions. There is not one of them carefully drawn. Why, here is what seems almost the best of them, presented by Mr. Moriarty, and at the end of it it says that they should not interfere with certain efforts,—the courts should not interfere with certain interferences of the labor men, unless the interference is lawful. That is what he says in that resolution there. In another measure,—a man has stood up here and said labor was not property,—it says in the very resolution itself, the very amendment itself, that labor is property. The very amendment itself says that. None of them is drawn carefully, and I think I am right in inferring, and I do infer, that what most of them desired was not to carry through some reform for the good of mankind, but to make a buncombe demonstration for constituents somewhere.

That is what every one of these propositions seems to me like. They are all aimed at those two things. One is to restrain the use of the injunction, curtail the use of the injunction, and the other is to declare that labor is a personal right. Whatever the scope of that may be I do not know. It seems to me if they had got together, and they all had united on one simple proposition carrying those two elements, those two conditions, I really believe they would have carried it through the Convention. I do not know, but it seems to me it might have been done.

We had a discussion here the other day about autocracy; and the labor movement in the United States never gained wide-spread and universal respect until it had an intelligent and altruistic autocrat at the head of the American Federation of Labor, who is taken into council with the President, and who commands universal respect. Do you suppose that he would have sanctioned any such boy's play as has been in this Convention with these four or five different propositions antagonizing each other, when they all claim to have the same ends in view? Yet they come in here; one gentleman wants to show his constituents that it was his, another that it was his, and four or five others that it was theirs. I think it is too bad for them. I do not care personally anything about it. I have nothing at stake, excepting that I should like to see a true solution of these problems. I think a true solution lies in those two directions. I think the use of injunction has been scandalized in the United States to a great extent; and I think, whatever may grow out of this declaration,—it seems to me there is not any difficulty in determining the difference between labor and labor power,—the final result of this will be that the use of injunction will be curtailed,—nobody doubts it,—and that labor will be declared to be what it is,—service, obedience to the Great Commandment, "If any man will be first among you, let him be your servant." Labor is service; and I wish we had something before us that we could vote for with a clear understanding, and a clear and reasonable support of these issues. [Applause.]

The resolution was rejected.

Mr. James T. Moriarty of Boston presented a petition of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor, accompanied by the following resolution (No. 220):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution
2 by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 Section 1. It shall not be unlawful for persons em-
4 ployed or seeking employment to enter into any arrange-5 ments, agreements or combinations with the view of 6 lessening the hours of labor or of increasing their wages or 7 bettering their condition; and no restraining order or in-8 junction shall be granted by any court of the Common-9 wealth or by any judge thereof in any case between an 10 employer and employees, or between employers and em-11 ployees, or between persons employed and persons seeking 12 employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute con-13 cerning terms or conditions of employment, or any act or 14 acts done in pursuance thereof, unless such order or in-15 junction be necessary to prevent irreparable injury to 16 property or to a property right of the party making the 17 application for which there is no adequate remedy at law;
18 and such property or property right shall be particularly 19 described in the application, which shall be sworn to by 20 the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

1 Section 2. In construing this act, the right to enter
2 into the relation of employer and employee, to change
3 that relation and to assume and create a new relation for 4 employer and employee, to perform and carry on business
5 in such relation with any person in any place, or to do
6 work and labor as an employee, shall be held and con-
7 strued to be a personal and not a property right. In all 8 cases involving the violation of the contract of employ-9 ment either by the employer or employee where no irre-10 parable damage is about to be committed upon the 11 property or property right of either, no injunction shall 12 be granted but the parties shall be left to their remedy at 13 law.

1 Section 3. No persons who are employed or seeking
2 employment or other labor shall be indicted, prosecuted
3 or tried in any court of the Commonwealth for entering 4 into any arrangement, agreement, or combination between 5 themselves as such employees or laborers, made with a 6 view of lessening the number of hours of labor and in-7 creasing their wages or bettering their conditions or for 8 any act done in pursuance thereof, unless such act is in 9 itself lawful.

The committees on Labor and Judicial Procedure reported recommending that the petitioner have leave to withdraw.

The resolution was considered by the Convention Friday, July 19, 1918.
Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable moved that the resolution be amended by striking out sections 1, 2 and 3, and inserting in place thereof the following:—

Full power and authority are hereby vested in the General Court to provide for the adjudication of any controversies between employers and employees and to provide against lockouts, strikes or any other course of involuntary or unnecessary unemployment and to fix penalties and make any other reasonable or necessary provisions to carry out the purpose of this amendment.

This amendment was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 97 to 112.

The resolution was rejected Tuesday, July 23, 1918, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 126 to 79.

On the following day a motion was made that the vote by which the resolution had been rejected be reconsidered; and the motion to reconsider was negatived.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: I do not know whether it would be wise to make a motion to substitute the resolution of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor for the report of the committees, or whether it would be better to discuss the question in our way and place the matter before the delegates in the Constitutional Convention, but if in order I move to substitute No. 220 for the report of the committee.

The Presiding Officer: The Chair would state that the question before the Convention is one upon rejection. If rejection is negatived that will substitute the report of the committee automatically.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll: That is agreeable to me. I was looking for the technical points of parliamentary tactics, because very often in organizations they are important.

I am not going to take up much time of this Convention on this great question of injunctions. I have nothing up my sleeve, I have no secrets, I have nothing to cover in the interest of such legislation as is here; but I am going to try to prove to the delegate in the fourth division (Mr. Bennett) that when men of honor make agreements some power unknown turns the vote of representatives of this Commonwealth to defeat the very thing that the delegate in the fourth division just spoke about. Injunctions are a very important subject, used by employers of labor to destroy freedom, free speech, and the right that belongs to every American citizen, and I am going to prove it by the injunctions served on me.

The arguments made on the question of labor being a property right, etc., and the extension of the decisions of the judiciary, show what is so far-reaching that it is the cause of the unrest in this Commonwealth to-day. There is no man in this Convention who has more respect for the courts than I have, and I said so a few weeks ago. I said that the system of the courts of this Commonwealth was a credit to this country. And I said the same on Boston Common at the biggest labor demonstration ever held there,—that on the Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone trial in Colorado. I said that if we found fault with one or two men appointed as judges in this Commonwealth it was not the fault of the system of the courts, but of their decisions. I always felt that no one judge was the court, that the court was the majority vote of the Superior or the Supreme Judicial bench, but in such court decisions as we read in the public press or in volumes of decisions we see that sometimes the judge assumes the authority to be the court. And what I want to call to the attention of the delegates is this: The same bill I think was at Washington, D. C., and some of the greatest lawyers of this Commonwealth had their opportunity to try and stop this far-reaching injunction proposition that is used by the employers of this Commonwealth.

In 1906, with the criticism of some of your newspapers of this city, I challenged the committee on Judiciary to give us a recess committee to hear this important subject, and asked that some judge, some business men and some labor men be appointed upon it and hear this question. A recess committee was appointed; and we brought Mr. Gompers from Washington, D. C., and we brought other men throughout this country before this committee. I believe some delegates to this Convention, some of our well-informed attorneys, could give better reference to what I am going to mention than myself, or perhaps they were part of the agreement that was drawn. And I believe the gentleman who was then secretary of that committee is a reporter to-day of the doings of this Convention for one of the newspapers of our city, and he can tell you the same story. But the weight of the invisible government brought about defeat in the State Senate of this Commonwealth. I now report that we agreed after a whole summer of discussion on the question of injunctions on a very little resolution, a very small one, and I think the representatives of the railroads, the attorneys, agreed to it. I think the committee came back to itself, and said: "We have a small bill, and it means peace between the courts and the labor movement of this Commonwealth."

It went through the House of Representatives. The representatives of organized labor accepted it. That was in 1906. In 1907, a year that I remember well, there passed through the House of Representatives the enactment of that law, and when it came to the graveyard of legislation, the State Senate of this Commonwealth, the very man who sat on that recess committee and voted for that bill, because he thought it was a benefit and a relief from the courts, was the man who changed his vote in the State Senate of this Commonwealth and defeated that bill. Perhaps that was the last year that he served in the State Senate of this Commonwealth. Was that the invisible government? Was that the representative of the corporation, who agreed with the representatives of organized labor to bring about peace between the courts and the trade-union movement? I defy contradiction, and a record can be found of the actions of the men, of the attorneys, who appeared before that recess committee. I attended every meeting during the summer as the representative of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor, taking the place of one of the best orators of this Commonwealth, Frank K. Foster. That is the method of legislation. That is the method of whom?

The people would say we have no reason to fear the courts. Certainly we have no reason to fear the courts, but it is about time that the judges of our courts told the employers of labor, and especially the attorneys, that they are no longer to knock at the home of the judge at seven o'clock in the evening or send papers to our houses at midnight for strikes we know nothing about, serving a notice upon us because we are officers of the trade-union movement, to appear in court on Monday morning on a writ of injunction in the course of a strike. Is that what the injunction and what the courts are made for? Let me prove it to you.

When the Boston Herald was putting up that building on Tremont Street, Haskell Brothers were the backers of it. An agreement was made by the Boston Herald at that time through the Haskells,—and I mention the name of the paper so that it can bear investigation,—with organized labor, and the men went to work to hurry up the building day and night, to erect it so that it could continue on its business, and everything was to be done by arbitration and friendly relations. I had nothing to do with it. On Saturday night the firm of Haskell Brothers had broken their agreement and brought in some furniture from the Derby Desk Company,—I think that was the name,—which was unfair to organized labor, and the working-men, after the agreement was broken by purchasing the furniture, said: "We refuse to handle it." Immediately an injunction was proceeded with. The judge who represented the courts of Suffolk County issued an injunction on me as the Secretary-Treasurer of the State Federation of Labor to appear in court on Monday morning at ten o'clock and answer to the summons delivered at my home. My wife and family were at that time in a condition of fear, but of course midnight did not phase me then, I was home an hour after the paper was delivered,—perhaps one o'clock Sunday morning. I was called out of bed at half-past four by the same man to meet with another representative of organized labor, with him, in Wells Memorial Building. This is where I object to interference with the powers of courts on injunctions. On Sunday morning at nine o'clock Henry Abrahams, Mr. Haskell and your humble servant met in the office of the Boston Central Labor Union, 987 Washington street. I said to Mr. Haskell: "You are bringing me into court to-morrow morning at ten o'clock. What for? What have I done? Bring me down to your building and I will try and settle that difficulty." And after three propositions I submitted to him for himself,—what right has he got to be the court? —he sent word to me at 8 o'clock on Monday morning, or at six o'clock: "Don't report to court. The case is dropped." That is using the judges of this Commonwealth in a scrap of organized labor between employers and employees.

How about the fight on Keefe on Columbus Avenue because he would not hire union men? That is what makes unrest. They referred the case to a master, and after spending $7,000 in the case are we ever going to get a trial out of it? Two years ago, because we said the firm was unfair, the master made a recommendation or a finding. We are waiting for trial. Why do they not give us a trial, before the judge, not before a master, to see whether we have violated any law?

What right have the courts of this Commonwealth to tell me as a labor man that I could not walk on certain parts of the streets of Boston because there was a fight between a firm and organized labor, just because, unfortunately or fortunately, I had the honor to be the Secretary-Treasurer of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor up until about 1908? And during that time, that is what I objected to,—that the employer, through the advice of his attorney, would serve writs on honest, innocent men to appear in court on the question of injunction. Then you say we have some rights and freedom of organization. Obligated to use the courts to form a ring around the power to tie up the freedom and the liberty of the working-men! That is what the trade-union movement objects to. That is the reason they are fighting to get the right to prohibit injunctions in the time of dispute. I am in favor of the protection of property, I believe in upholding the country and the laws, and I defy any man in this Convention or in this State or in this country, after my many years of dealings in the labor movement, to point to one dishonest act of mine in the handling of the question of organized labor between employer and employee at any time in the course of my life.

When they speak about the difference of opinion of the trade-union men, that is true, and when they ask us here: "Why are you not a unit?" I reply that it would be a bad thing if we were a unit. It might be worse than it is to-day, and it is better to have a little division amongst us. But when a man says to this Convention that because a delegate had the honor of being a labor man he represented the labor movement, we do not throw back the sarcastic insinuation and say that because you are a lawyer you represent the bar association. I am a labor man. I am elected from the seventeenth Suffolk district, and they are the people who sent me here. Because we come here everybody uses this as opposition to the question of labor. I want to say to the delegates to this Convention that this resolution is the bona-fide measure of organized labor of this Commonwealth, and we can stay here for years. In the words said by the gentleman in the third division, the system of organized labor is the question that we will get what we want, and if we keep on in this fighting way, keeping it before the public, that is true. We want public sympathy. When the labor movement knows what has come from this Convention it may force it to continue its action of a few weeks ago to bring about, after next September, a thorough organization of the officers of the labor movement, and force them into political activity, which will be a benefit as a result of this Convention.

The labor movement does those things. That is the reason they go out before the people and tell the people that it is their fight. They want the right to strike. They want the right to organize. They want the right to educate. They want the right to go out and state on the public streets of Boston that John Smith is out on strike, that Jim Jones is unfair to organized labor, that he will not pay union wages and that he will not allow the regulation of the hours of labor. We stand for conciliation. We are an admirer of arbitration, and I believe that when a trade-union signs an agreement between employer and employee it should back it up loyally and manfully to the expiration of such an agreement. That is my understanding of the labor movement. I do not believe in breaking agreements, the same as some of them break them to-day in this Commonwealth. But I believe, and I believe that every delegate in this Convention will agree with me, that the courts go too far. They have no right to step into these petty strikes without first giving a hearing before putting a summons on us to bring us into court, and if they do put a summons on us to bring us into court what right has the employer or his attor-

money to take that writ away and say we are not requested in court? That is what brings to the working people of this Commonwealth discouragement and discontent over the courts of Massachusetts, and those are the methods and the acts.

I trust and I believe, and I want to say to the delegates to this Convention, as I said before the measure was introduced that I believed, that it is a question of legislation, and not an amendment of the Constitution, and the day will come when it will be adopted.

Like everybody else, I carry a union card, and pay my dues. I do not hold any other office but the office of secretary of the Trades Union Liberty League, and we are much interested in the election in the coming fall of many men in the public offices of this Commonwealth. As far as active work in the labor movement is concerned I take a back seat and sit down and mind my own business, and when requested or invited by employer or employee I give my services free to keep peace, to end strikes or anything for the benefit of the Commonwealth, and I trust that the delegates to this Convention will bear this in mind. Your sympathy is no good to us if it is not sincere. We cannot live on sympathy. Up till December 5th, 1907, true, my occupation was a horseshoer, and up to the day of December 5, 1907, and what happened in Governor Guild's office I stated, I stood behind the anvil, there was not a position in the gift of the city or the State that I would leave that position to accept. But since that day, like other men in the walks of life, I have held the other positions connected with labor organizations.

The labor movement will make its mistakes. The office of the trade-union movement honors conscientious men. We do not believe in throwing "bull." We do not believe in explosion. We believe in public discussion, we believe in education on all these questions, and we believe in stopping the courts. We should have the freedom that rightly belongs to us, the right to strike. And there is the whole plain story on the question of injunctions in the argument that you have just been through on the question of the right of property to the property of labor. Part of that may be of service in this. But the day is coming through the right kind of legislation and the right kind of men we send to the Legislature, that when we make an agreement again, and we agree upon something that will make peace and happiness, we shall not allow the invisible government of Massachusetts and the turning of men on a recess committee to prevent peace when it meets with the approval of such lawyers and delegates as have sat in this Convention in the interest of harmony between employer and employee of this Commonwealth. That is what I say to the Convention. I have taken up more time than I intended to. That is the fight of organized labor. That is labor's fight. True, I believe it is the principle of the trade-union movement. Defeat your enemies, and be loyal to your friends, no matter what their politics may be. And that is what drove them to it,—the Legislature's actions of the past year. I participated in much of it, and I never regret one act of mine in the interest of the people of this whole Commonwealth and the advancement and protection of the hours of labor or the interest of legislation for the benefit of all. I trust the day will come when we shall not be coming annually to the Legislature and the lines of parties will be dead and the liberal spirit of Americans will be brought about so that the lawyers, the doctors and the professors will be a unit in the maintaining and support of this Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: It has been quite a number of years since the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) and myself stood behind the anvil, blew the forge, wore the leather apron, pared horses' hoofs, etc., and although the gentleman has given up his leather apron for a Palm Beach suit and now manicures his fingernails instead of paring horses' hoofs, his bellows is in good condition and his voice rings loud for the cause of labor.

But, all joking aside, I have the highest regard for the gentleman and his career since he left his honorable employment as horseshoer and has taken up more actively the affairs of labor. If all the labor leaders were as fair, honest, and upright as he, there would be less trouble in the Commonwealth, in the country and in the world.

So, I now address those who have forgotten through this long debate of two days that there is another class of people in the Commonwealth. There are others who ought to be considered besides labor, as so called by union leaders and the politicians. They are the regular common people, the teachers, the doctors, and others in professional lines and manufacturing and clerical employment. I have lived among these people all my life, and I think they are entitled to some consideration, and that union labor has no particularly fragrant bouquets to throw itself, after the position it has taken in the last two or three months. I am speaking also for our boys across the seas, and for those in camps on this side, who cannot go across, for lack of equipment. Why? Because there is a strike! And what is the strike for? Higher wages? Better conditions? Not on your life! It is for the recognition of the union, after the promise of union leaders to President Wilson that there should be no strikes along that line.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman from Somerville if he would tell me the strike that he refers to.

Mr. Underhill: I hold in my hand a copy of this morning's paper. "Demand made by the Lynn strikers. Recognition of the union." The first and chief demand "recognition of the union." There never has been a strike there before, there never has been dissatisfaction, so far as I know. They were working not as union men, but as well-paid and satisfied workmen, and they struck because of the interference of paid agitators of union labor, in order that they may organize this plant.

Now, what is the reason for union organization at this particular time? To my mind it means just one thing. I have information from a man who attended the last National Convention of the American Federation of Labor. He said the principal question discussed was: "What will be the condition of union labor at the close of the war?" That gave them the most concern; when the enlisted men, these millions of men should come back from abroad and from our cantonments and become competitors in the market of labor, what would be the condition of union labor? I believe the answer has been shown in the newspapers of the last few weeks, that they have come to a decision, and that the birthright of the men who have gone across and are working for $30 a month and their keep is to be taken away from them when they come back because of the complete and powerful union organization of industrial plants.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Now, sir, if there is one law under Heaven that helps in some way, shape or manner to control union labor, and we have it on our statute-books or in our Constitution, in the name of those men across, in the name of the common people of this Commonwealth, for God's sake leave it there. Do not take it away, because it is the last defence we have. From the President of these United States down to the members of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and others who hold official positions by the votes of the people, most of them are afraid down in the bottom of their soul of the labor vote. They are afraid of it. They have favored and flattered it, petted and pampered it, fed and fattened it, until they have raised a tyrant in their midst, a master with which they cannot hope to cope unless there is some control upon its action.

I am not ashamed of my labor record. I have voted for and urged such labor measures, so called, as the Workmen's Compensation Act, the full crew bill, etc. I was the first in Massachusetts to urge before the Legislature an eight-hour law for the women and children of this Commonwealth. What was its reception? Every labor leader in the House of that day opposed it. Every labor leader in the Senate opposed it. I have been as active as my strength and intelligence would allow in an endeavor to better the condition of the children of the Commonwealth, and, when I began my fight and for many years after, not one voice of a labor man was raised to help me; not one. But, sir, when it comes to a question of the restriction of production, and that seems to be the principal idea of to-day, I part company with union labor and maintain with all the strength of my being that the restriction of production is not conducive to the welfare of independent labor or union labor, to the prosperity of the people of the community or to the uplift and success of the Nation as a whole.

The government has been calling upon us, every one of us, to do our utmost, to put forth the last ounce of energy and strength we have, and what has labor been doing? Has it agreed to work more hours a day? Oh, no, less hours a day. Every strike, almost, calls for fewer hours, a restriction of production and increased pay. The boys across, the $30 a month boys, are working day and night, no restriction as to the number of hours they put in. Winter is coming on and they will need winter shoes, and what is happening over here? A strike! A strike by men who entered into a solemn contract with their employers and with the labor-unions themselves, and those men are treating their contracts as the Germans have their treaties, — as a scrap of paper, a mere scrap of paper.

Those are the men who the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Brown of Brockton) said the other day were paid more than a living wage, were contented and prosperous, and he boasted there had not been a strike there for twenty years; and yet they take advantage of the situation that exists to-day and they are willing that their wife's sons, bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh, shall go barefooted on the frozen fields of France, in order that they may enforce their leaders' demands here. These strikers are quoted as saying: "We are not influenced by German propaganda. We are patriotic. We have bought Liberty Bonds, and War Savings stamps." Oh, is not that patriotic! Children have bought savings stamps. Every man who possibly could afford it and many who could not afford it bought
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Liberty Bonds. That is an investment and they deserve no credit, unless great sacrifices were made, for it. Some have given their sons! They have done no more than the poorest and wealthiest men and women in the country have done. They have done no more than you and I have done. We are willing to give our boys, but we want a fair deal for those boys. Ah, those laboring men, the men of yesterday, the day of the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) and myself behind the anvil, they are not that kind of men,—they were not that kind of men! Look upon the pay-roll of any of your big manufacturing concerns to-day, and how many names can you pronounce? You find once in a while one of the old-fashioned names, like Driscoll or Underhill, but you do not find many,—not many. And, sir, to my mind those men with alien names are creating and fostering treason to-day in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I introduced a bill to the last Legislature calling for a prohibition of lockouts and strikes during the war, providing that for two weeks after disputes should arise, and demands made, the men should continue at work until some proper board should adjudicate the case. Union labor was against it to a man. Why? It restricted the rights of labor. No thought of the rights of the millions of men who were going "over there"!

We have heard a lot to-day about the abuse of the laboring man by the employer, the abuse of the unions by the courts. Well, sir, let me present one or two cases and show you another side of the shield.

To my attention not long ago came a family,—a wife, husband, six children. The man was seriously ill. His illness was of a long duration, and for six months we did all we could to keep that family together. We happily succeeded. He was a painter by trade, and upon his partial recovery I secured some little inside work in our vicinity for him. As he grew stronger I looked about for other places, and I found a good big-hearted man who had an inside job in one of the hotels in Boston who said he would employ him. This man put him to work, but the business agent or walking delegate of the Painters and Decorators Union came to the employer within two hours and said: "Mr. R., I will have to call our men out. You have non-union help here." "Why," he said, "I haven't anything of the sort." "Yes, you have," replied the delegate, "a new man went to work this morning." "Well," said Mr. R. "send him to me, and I will have him join the union." My friend said, "Mr. R., I am willing to join the union, but they won't let me." "Won't let you? What do you mean by that?" "Why, sir, they want $50! You know I have been sick for six months. The butcher, the baker and everybody in my vicinity have trusted me because they knew I was honest. The union won't take $10 a week for five weeks out of my pay in order that I may join, they want $50 at once;" and when Mr. R. offered to advance the money the agent said he could not work on that job anyway.

Last spring, while sitting in this chamber, I was called out by a man who said: "I have been a foreman carpenter out in your town, and, as you know, the building business is dead; there is not a thing doing. I have a job offered me at Ayer, and the union won't let me go to work." I said: "Why don't you join the union?" He replied: "I have tried to join the union, and the only condition under which they will take me is that I shall not go to work at Camp Devens."

I called into consultation a man high in the councils of the labor-union movement, a man for whom I have a great deal of respect. I put the case up to him, and he said to me: "Charlie, we can't do a thing with the building trades. We cannot do a thing with them."

Now, those are two instances. You say they are isolated. There are hundreds just like them, and you know it. Unions leave to charitable associations the care of their unfortunates who do not pay their dues. I know, because they have come to me for help. They will not let a man work unless they can tell him where he shall work and what he shall do. Is that any better than some of the employers of labor do?
Do you want it all? Is there not a grain of comfort, is there not a particle of justice for the greater majority of the people of this land, who do not belong to labor-unions, or who have not sufficient income to put them in the capitalist class?

The gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) said they wanted the sympathy of the public. They must go about it in a different way to get that sympathy. As we read that in Lynn the employees of a firm making surgical instruments for use in the trenches and in the hospitals are going to call a sympathetic strike to help the strikers in another plant unionize, or when our women go up to the Red Cross to do voluntary work and there is no gauze to work with, because there is a strike, how much sympathy do you suppose that brings to union labor? I should consider myself false to my trust, false to my country, false to my God, if I did not stand here to-day and protest against the action of labor during the last two months, yes, since the beginning of our going into this war. It has been disgraceful and disloyal.

When it is all over the people are going to ask: "What have you done? What have you done?" "Oh, we bought Liberty Bonds and we bought War Savings Stamps, and we gave our mothers' sons and our wives' sons for cannon fodder." There is no greater gift than that a man shall give his only begotten son that the world may be saved.
That is God's example taught us from the time our minds were first receptive to the voice of our teachers. But, sir, if a man forgets that there is an obligation to that son, if he forgets there is an obligation to the wife and mother, and if he says: "MY union first, MY union forever, to hell with THE Union!" what kind of a patriot is he? That seems to be the attitude of union labor of late. Where is my proof?
Take up any paper for the last three months, any of them, and you will find my proof right there, and the papers do not give it sufficient publicity at that.

The only excuse they give is "Profiteering; Look at Hog Island."
That is an excuse. It is not an argument. It is not a defence. There is an old French saying that he who excuses accuses, and it is selfaccusation when they themselves are doing the very thing for which they condemn some one else. The men who were accused by politicians of profiteering at Hog Island said: "For God's sake let us build the ships first and put us in jail afterwards." The men who struck at Hog Island for shorter hours and more pay would not treat with the board of arbitration which had been formed for such very purposes by the government at Washington. Their attitude was: "Oh, no, we have you by the throat. We are going to take advantage of every opportunity that offers, and we are going to strangle you into a position where you dare not resist our demands."

The autocracy of Kings and Emperors! Is it any worse than the autocracy of the Bolsheviks? Theirs is the plan you are urging to-day. The bourgeois of Russia were the sufferers, and the poor people in my class and in the class that most of you live will be the sufferers here. It is not a question of whether a man is working for profit for another, because it does not follow, when labor strikes and the employer is obliged to accede to his demands, that the employer makes any less money. He raises the price, and we, middle class and poorer class people, and labor itself in other industries, pay the bills. Then other labor strikes and the price of that commodity goes up, and another one asks for increased wages because of the high cost of living, and the price of that commodity goes up, and in the words of the old song of Battery A: "We go round and round with our feet on the ground, and I guess that's going some." It is a continual round, a circuit without a terminal. The increased cost of living mounts and mounts and mounts, and wages go up and up and up, and the professional man, the salesman, the small business man, the backbone and strength of the Union, cannot get another cent added to his income.

Profiteering? The manufacturer has to pay back to the government a large percentage of his profits. The man who gets his wages raised and hours reduced — does he pay anything? He does not pay one cent more. No, he blows it in. Go to our industrial centers to-day and look at the stuff they are buying, — diamonds, victrolas, player pianos, etc. They are going to work in their automobiles. They are getting more than $5,000 a year, some of them. Why, $100 a week is nothing to some of the employees to-day. They are the plutocrats of the community. And yet they say that the only thing that we have to-day which gives the defenceless people a measure of protection must be removed from our Constitution. God forbid. [Applause.]

Mr. Benton of Belmont: We heard the delegate from Brockton (Mr. Brown) criticizing certain ones because they were not present. I am not criticizing him at all. I wish he had been present to have listened to the very able address of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill).

I move you now that this Convention adjourn.

The debate was continued Tuesday, July 23.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable moved that the resolution be amended by striking out sections 1, 2 and 3, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Full power and authority are hereby vested in the General Court to provide for the adjudication of any controversies between employers and employees and to provide against lockouts, strikes or any other course of involuntary or unnecessary unemployment and to fix penalties and make any other reasonable or necessary provisions to carry out the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. Bodfish: I rise in the interest, as I conceive it, of the great mass of our people, who are neither large employers nor employees of the big industries, nor members of the labor organizations.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: May I ask my friend from Barnstable to give way a moment while his amendment is read again? It is exceedingly interesting, and I do not think all the delegates heard it, and I did not quite take it in myself.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The Secretary again read the amendment offered by Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable.

Mr. Bodfish: I rise, as I say, to speak in the interest of the great mass of our people who are neither large employers nor members of labor organizations. While our employers constitute a powerful class, and while the members of organized labor also constitute a powerful class, they are numerically small, a very small proportion of our entire people. It seems to me that in these discussions the interest of the entire people should be considered first. I will not mince words; I will come directly to the point.

In the latter days of his life Abraham Lincoln said: "It is strange that any man should dare to ask the assistance of Almighty God in wringing bread from the sweat of other men's faces," yet in all ages and among all peoples this has been done; it has so happened that many have labored and have been deprived of the fruit of their labor; while many without labor have enjoyed the fruit of the labor of others. "This," Lincoln said, "is wrong and should not continue." Yet it has continued, we all know. He also gave expression to the fear that the day would come when the inequality in wealth would threaten the very foundations of our liberties. He saw, as all who will can see, that as a result of human imperfection and a growing complexity in our industrial situation, it was becoming more and more impossible to get a proper distribution of the fruits of labor. The capitalists themselves recognize this when they speak of standardization. The members of trade-unions recognize it when they attempt to fix arbitrary wage scales.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, this Nation has achieved wonderful industrial development, more wonderful perhaps than has been shown in any other part of the world, due, I think primarily, to the wealth of our natural resources, and, secondarily, to the impetus of individual initiative. Great enterprises, like transcontinental railway systems, vast undertakings in the mining and lumbering regions, and big milling projects, of course all require large combinations of capital, and with those large combinations of capital has come power; with the exercise of that power has come abuse, such as the black-list and the lockouts. To meet this abuse labor has been compelled to organize, and with the organization of labor there has also come power, and with the use of that power there has come abuse, such as strikes and boycotts.

Now, we have attempted to cope with these large combinations of capital through anti-trust legislation and regulations of various kinds. To-day, in this Convention, we are confronted with the demands of organized labor, which, unless curbed, will invade our rights farther than organized capital ever has dreamed of going. When either of these great combinations declines to settle its disputes with the other, all of us are subjected to the peril and suffering which follow in such a case; as in the great coal strike of 1902, which none of us can forget, where a few hundred captains of industry, on the one side, and a few thousand members of organized labor, on the other, threatened the entire Nation with freezing.

It seems to me that these things deserve careful consideration and that they should not longer be tolerated. Shall we continue to require all other people to take their differences to the courts and let organized capital and organized labor continue to appeal to force and endurance as the test of what is right? Time was when our common law recognized trial by combat, but we long since have outgrown that as a test of what is right and what is wrong. There are to-day but two exceptions, as I view it, and these are that we allow that method now in labor disputes and in disputes between Nations.

We are engaged in the greatest war the world ever has known to establish the reign of law and reason among the peoples of the earth; and we are willing, are we not, to spend our last dollar or to give our last ounce of strength, yes, to give our last drop of blood if necessary, in order to make sure that this great purpose for which we are struggling shall succeed, for otherwise government of the people, by the people and for the people will perish from the earth, and that is unthinkable. Shall we then continue to permit organized capital and organized labor to appeal to this crude and barbarous and savage method of settling their disputes, when we are requiring and demanding that even the Nations of the world shall submit to peaceful methods of settling their disputes? It seems to me that we have got to purge our body politic of this evil thing. The means are now at hand,—an amendment to the Constitution permitting the General Court to provide for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes. Let us adopt that amendment, and upon those who oppose it be the blame for further strikes, further lockouts, further unnecessary unemployment, riots, destruction of property, bloodshed, and perhaps, though God forbid it, the further impeding of the purpose of this Nation to carry out its glorious purpose of establishing the reign of law and reason throughout all the earth. I thank you.

Mr. Powers of Newton: I am very glad that the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) has offered the amendment in support of which he has just spoken. I have been fearful that this debate might be completed without any consideration of the question which has been submitted through the amendment of the gentleman from Barnstable. I desire to discuss for a short time this morning this question of arbitration. I approach the subject with no hostility toward the cause of labor, or even organized labor. I have been what I call a laboring man all my life. In the early days I performed manual labor, and I was under the delusion that there was an easier way of getting a living than by working with my hands, and so I took up a profession. I want to say to you, and I want to say to all the friends of organized labor, that that was one of the great delusions of my life. I heard my friend in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) say that in his early years he worked in a blacksmith shop. Well, that would have been a pastime compared with the work which I did when I worked on a farm.

During the last 30 years I have been an employer of labor, and during that entire period I never have had a strike nor a lockout. I run a sort of a benevolent and philanthropic institution, called a farm, and I employ labor. I have entered into a cooperative arrangement with the labor on that farm, and I want to explain to the Convention what my system is. It may be of service in working out the problem that is now before us. By this cooperative system I give to the laborers the entire product of the farm. That is, I sell the product and turn over all the cash I get for it, and then I turn over, in cash which I earn in my profession, as much more. That gives to the laborer the entire income from the investment I have made in the farm, and as much more, which I earn somewhere else. In that way the laborer gets the entire return from the capital invested and he gets as much more from capital invested elsewhere.

That has worked out remarkably well. During this entire period I never have had a strike. I never have had any occasion for a lock-out, and these men apparently are entirely satisfied. I pay them $5 a day. They are supposed to work eight hours a day; that is, they are supposed to be in sight of the farm eight hours every day. They do not work all the time,—a hot day like this of course they are not expected to work.

Now, in my early youth I worked on that same farm for a dollar a day, and worked fifteen hours. At the present time the laborer works eight hours a day for $5 a day, and the crop which he produces is not half sufficient to pay for the labor.

I remember some years ago hearing Congressman Cushman, who represented at that time the third district of the State of Washington, make a speech in Congress on the labor problem. He said he had been making a study of labor conditions out in his district. He had been anxious to find out what was being paid as wages on the farms. So he said one morning he took his horse and his buggy and he drove out to make inquiries. He came along to a field where there was a boy about seventeen years old working. He stopped his team and motioned to the boy to come down to the fence, and the boy came down and leaned over the fence. He said: "My boy, how much do you get a day for hoeing those potatoes?" "Well," said the boy, "if I work all day I get nothing; if I don't work all day I get hell." [Laughter.] And that was about the way we used to work in the early days when I was on the farm.

I am very glad to see the progress that labor has made. I think it is entirely right. I do not believe that the capitalists object to the improvement of laboring conditions. I think the great trouble in Massachusetts to-day is the suspicion that exists upon the part of the laboring man toward large combinations of capital. I notice one thing. The small manufacturer has very little trouble with labor. In many cases he pays the laborer less than is paid by the large corporation, and yet he has very little trouble.

Some years ago I had occasion to take an active part in the settlement of the Lawrence strike. I met the committee of organized labor, made up of twelve men and one woman, who represented the strikers of Lawrence. I sat down and talked with those people for an entire day, and I was simply amazed at their idea of what they thought capital was earning. Why, they believed that capital was earning 50 or 60 per cent upon the investment. I took the very reports that had been made up of those mill corporations and showed them exactly what capital was earning; and when that was brought out, and they believed it,—they did believe it,—there was not the slightest difficulty in settling that strike.

I assume that labor to-day believes that the capital invested in manufacture in New England from the first down to the present time has earned tremendous sums; but I am going to make this statement:
That if the capital that has gone into manufacture in New England had been put into the savings banks, receiving upon the deposit 4 per cent, it would have earned more money than it has earned in actual manufacture in New England.

The same is true of the railroads. If the money which the investors put into New England railroads had been put into banks, receiving 4 per cent, they would have been much better off to-day than through the investments they have made in the railroads. We have got to work out what may be called an understanding between capital and labor.

Take the strikes of late. What has been the result of them? Right at this point I want to ask my friend in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) what the attitude is of organized labor toward government ownership of these great sources of production,—whether they favor it or not. We have seen all the railroads east of the Mississippi go under the control of the government, and they went under the control of the government simply because a strike was threatened. We have seen all the great wire companies, both telegraph and telephone, put under or in control of the government, simply because a strike was threatened. If these strikes go on you are going to see government ownership of all the great sources of production in this country. You are going to see the coal fields, the great steel industry, you are going to see the steamboats, you are going to see even the large manufactures, come under government ownership.

Is it for the benefit of the laboring man that the government should own and control the great sources of production? Is it for the benefit of the American people that they should work for the government rather than for themselves? Are we to do away with what is called individual initiative, individual freedom, for the sake of having a socialistic government, by which the government owns and controls everything? The moment you get government ownership, that is the end of strikes, because you cannot strike if you work for the government without being guilty of treason.

Let me call your attention,—at least I want to call the attention of the men who represent labor on this floor,—to one case of government ownership which has continued for a long period of years, and that is of the mail facilities in this country. I recall a man who to-day is delivering me mail who was delivering letters at my office when I came to Boston more than forty years ago. He was receiving at that time $1,050 a year for his service; he is getting to-day for his service $1,400 a year. In other words, he has got an increase during that period of about $38 a year, during those forty years. That is government ownership and that is government pay. Why, it does not follow because workmen may get large wages during the war working for the government that they are going to get it in times of peace.

Now, this proposition that is brought forward by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) is a proposition to give to the Legislature authority to arbitrate strikes. I do not know exactly how it will work out. But suppose the Legislature had authority under the Constitution to require capital and labor to submit the proposition, and to decide it. Suppose they decide in favor of capital or what labor thinks is in favor of capital, will the laborer continue to work? Is there anything under our form of government by which you can compel a man to work if he does not want to work? You can compel capital, because it is organized in corporations, to perform its contracts. But can you compel labor to perform its contracts?

Suppose the case of a thousand workmen who had struck, and, under this new proposition brought forward by the gentleman from Barnstable, that question is arbitrated; and suppose that the tribunal that arbitrates that question determines that the wages are right and fair, and they direct those one thousand workmen to go forward and carry out their contract. Is there anything inherent in our government by which you can compel a man to work if he does not want to work? You can compel capital to perform its contracts, but can you compel labor to perform its contracts?

I sincerely hope that there is some way by which this Convention can take a forward step in the greatest question that is going to be before the country at the termination of the war. I wish something could be worked out by which we could arbitrate these differences and prevent these industrial disturbances. I am hopeful enough to believe that our public school system, by educating men, will make those who represent capital more humane, make the men who represent labor more reasonable, and that gradually we shall work out,—not government ownership, I want that to disappear,—but that we shall preserve that freedom of initiative which has made this country great; that freedom of individuality, where it is possible for the man who starts at the very foot of the ladder to reach the top of the ladder during his lifetime.

A few weeks since I attended the services at the burial of a merchant of Boston who some sixty years ago came to this country in the steerage of a steamer from one of the countries of central Europe. When he arrived he was a boy of sixteen years of age, without money, without friends, without any knowledge of our language, depending solely for success upon his personal effort in this great country of individual freedom. When he died he was regarded as one of the leading philanthropists of Boston, and surrounding his bier were the representatives of all large public institutions who went there to do honor to a man who had reached the position of one of the leading merchants of Boston, and who by his generosity and public spirit became a leader in philanthropy, in the promotion of important humane measures, a friend of literature, a leader among men. His life is an illustration of what can be accomplished in a country where the genius and liberty of the individual are given ample opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. Moriarty of Boston: I am sorry at this time that I have to rise in defence of the laboring men in this Commonwealth. I am sorry at this late day in this Convention that anything should happen like that which happened in this hall on Friday afternoon,—a disgrace, in my mind, to every individual man and woman who has to toil. I refer not only to the remarks of the delegate in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill), but also to the delegates who applauded him for that onslaught on labor. A number of his statements were absolutely untrue. In this assembly, during the last term of the Legislature of this State, the president of the American Federation of Labor spoke from that rostrum. The labor movement is not responsible for the headlines of the newspapers, that are controlled by the capital of this country. We are not responsible for the headlines that appear in those papers. The American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, to which I have had the honor of being a delegate for a number of years, never has stated, or never has had any understanding with anybody, that there shall not be strikes during this war or at any other time. The policy of the labor movement has been that they are willing that no strikes shall take place other than where profiteering is in vogue. And since this assembly adjourned on Friday, the great memorial day, when some of the delegates wanted to adjourn this assembly on account of the great victory that had taken place on the other side, we have heard of an onslaught in this assembly; on this side, against those who are on the other side. You will find in every instance that the boy who is now on the other side is the son of a working-man and not of an employer. I hold a letter in my hand that I received from a former employee of the General Electric Company of Lynn. He was in the employ of the General Electric Company when he enlisted in the service of the United States army, in the aerial division, and is now only nineteen years old. He said, in finishing up his letter:

It was surely a pleasure to me to have read in the Boston Post that a strike is now in progress at the General Electric in Lynn.

That is a place where it has been almost impossible that men and women and children could work even under fair and proper conditions. Some of the boys and some of the men have left that factory to go across the water, to fight for democracy, and somebody is criticizing them for taking the same right in that great city of Lynn.

Profiteering! The General Electric Company has got a number of plants in numerous parts of this country, and the wages, the conditions, of every other factory are a hundred per cent better than in that establishment in Lynn. Ninety-nine per cent of the work now being done in the General Electric Company is being done for the United States government. And to answer the last speaker from the first division (Mr. Powers), who asked if we believed that government ownership should take place, I answer: "Yes, by all means, to cut out the profiteer." The gentleman in the first division did not spare either the organized labor movement or the unorganized labor movement. It is very good and very easy some times to get the organized labor movement to go on strike, but I rise in defence of the men and women in Lynn who were not organized when they came out on strike, but came out even though unorganized, the same as they did in Lawrence some years ago.

But the speech on Friday was well set. It was not one of those things that jump out of the basket on a minute's notice, but it was prepared, and the speaker was the mouthpiece of the people who have been fighting against organized labor, not only now, but in years past, and his record in the Legislature will prove my assertion.

It was only a short while ago that an organization that has been against the interest of democracy for the working people sent broadcast his speech against the children of this Commonwealth.

In regard to charity, that he says the labor movement does not enter into, I want to say that we enter into charity, that we spend all of the money that is collected for charity, and we do not belong to that charitable organization that spends 75 per cent for officers and for office hire and the other, the twenty-five per cent, for charity.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: I desire to ask the delegate in this division (Mr. Moriarty) to state the organization that he now refers to. There have been insinuations here broadcast enough.

Mr. Moriarty: Not that I am afraid, but I do not believe that it ought to be put on the records. I will give the name in person to the gentleman if he wishes it and if that is not satisfactory I will make a later statement of the charity that I mean.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville addressed the Chair.

Mr. Moriarty: I refuse to yield. I am going to give the same treatment that I received on Friday.

I want to say that during some unemployment here two or three years ago I had the honor to be a member of a committee of five of the Boston Central Labor Union who collected $2,700 to give to the unemployed or the families of the unemployed, and those people received $2,700, — all that was collected. As far as charity is concerned, organized labor does not believe in charity. It believes in the employer putting enough money in the envelope so that there need be no charity. We ask for nothing but fair compensation in return for the value of our labor. And we say to you delegates here to-day that you ought to be careful. We are asking nothing but what we are justly entitled to. We are entitled to fair treatment. We are entitled to so much per hour for labor.

I do not believe that the Legislature of this Commonwealth should have the right to say that I am not entitled to 75 cents per hour for my labor, and if I do not go to work that they can put me away for any crime. If you come down to arbitration as provided in the amendment that has been introduced, that will be the link that will be put on us, and I want to serve notice on this organization that in taking that up you are only forcing upon the working-man of this Commonwealth the same that was imposed on him in Russia. A lot of you men have read how in certain parts of Russia sons and daughters were not allowed to travel without a yellow ticket. Do not make this country or this grand Commonwealth anything like that. And that is what you are going to do if you pass that compulsory arbitration resolution. I feel the measure that I have introduced here will bring labor and capital nearer together than any arbitration proposition you may now put in here. I do not believe compulsory arbitration is going to bring the employer, the Commonwealth and the employee one iota closer together. I believe that it is going to make a wider breach. If you men here, assembled, not to do a personal duty, but to do a duty to all of the citizens in this Commonwealth, carry out your intent by passing this amendment, then you will do a duty that will be against the great interest of the masses of this Commonwealth.

I hope that from this time out, while our country is at war, there will be no more onslaught in this Convention on the organized or unorganized men and women who work. I believe that after being in here since a year ago last June this is the second time that I have taken the floor in this Convention. I believe that the labor men here are as conservative as any class in here. I believe that the man and woman on the outside are likewise; but they are afraid all the time. They are afraid that inside and outside things like that which happened on Friday may happen again. I ask you, in the name of both the organized and the unorganized working people of this Commonwealth, to pass the resolution introduced by me and endorsed by the American Federation of Labor of this Commonwealth. I feel then that we will be in a position where the employer of this Commonwealth and the employee will be brought closer together.

Mr. BODFISH: I should like to ask the last speaker, not as a partizan of labor, but as one sitting in this Convention who is a friend of labor, if he will tell us how many members there are of organized labor in the State, and if in securing shorter hours and higher wages for those, he may not be securing longer hours and lower wages for the others, especially the farmers, and if he prefers strikes and lockouts, boycotts and black-lists, to having their differences adjudicated by peaceful means, without involuntary or unnecessary unemployment.

Mr. MORMAERTY: I would not want to give the number of organized people without first looking it up. I could give that to the gentleman later, and would be glad to. We believe in peaceful persuasion, but we believe that we ought to be given the right to at least do our own business without being forced to do it. My attitude, it may be, can be explained better by saying that during the first car strike in Boston, after an agreement was made between the Boston Elevated Railway Company and the street car men that in any more trouble arising between those two parties an arbitration board of three would be appointed, one by the men, one by the Elevated and one by the mayor of Boston, in about a year something did arise that they could not agree on amongst themselves. The car men refused to abide by their agreement. They said that they would refuse to allow the mayor of Boston to appoint the third party. I had the honor of being the president of the Boston Central Labor-Union at that time, and I issued a statement to the newspapers that either the car men would agree to live up to that agreement that they had made in good faith with a State official and the Boston Elevated Railway Company, or I, as the president of the Boston Central Labor-Union, would instruct the labor men in Boston to give them no support. And that statement can be found on the front pages of the Boston newspapers at that time. In answer to the brother in the first division (Mr. Powers) organized labor agrees to an agreement, organized labor agrees to live up to an agreement, but individuals in our movement are allowed to drift by just such joker legislation as this.

I want to say that I have represented my international organization on many occasions. During this war I have been in Washington. I was in Washington only last week and sat down with the War Policy Board to see if it is possible for the government to lay down a policy where there shall be no strikes. But this is the condition: In the Fore River shipyard an agreement was entered into between organized labor and the United States government,—I want to change that, not an agreement, a memorandum,—and we agreed with the ship board, with the wage adjustment board and with the officials of the Fore River. One part of that said there would be no money taken from the employee for insurance, for doctor bills, or for any other purpose. The officials of the Fore River shipyard were at that hearing. For the last two months Fore River has taken from the envelopes of the employees employed in those two yards, at Squan-} men are standing loyal, with the assurance of the leaders, or so-called leaders: "Stay at work, and we will try to bring about a settlement."

I could stand here all day and tell you about what labor has not received from the way that I see it, but I do not like to take up the time of the Convention. I say that one thing that organized labor does not want is compulsory arbitration. They believe they should have a right, a just right, to sit down and make their own bargain, without being forced there at the point of a gun.

I am going to conclude by giving one illustration in regard to the injunction, and maybe I have had as many injunctions served on me as any member of the union. The only thing that I have said when injunctions have been served on me was: "Well, the employer will pay for my dinner anyway, because when the injunction is received we will receive $2.25 or $2.50 with it." We realized before going into court the injunction, temporary injunction, was going to be granted, and in 99 per cent of the cases in our Commonwealth the injunction was granted before we went into court. After the injunction is granted it forbids me from going to that place of employment, to any man or woman, and saying to him or to her: "I can furnish you employment that is better in wages and better in conditions than what you are receiving here." If I go there, and if it is known, I may be brought into court and sentenced, without trial by jury, for contempt of court. But I may do this: I may go out and wait for that man until he leaves his place of employment, I may hit him over the head with a piece of iron pipe and injure him so that it will be impossible for him to do labor for that employer to-morrow. Because I am technically assaulting instead of using persuasion I will be given a trial by jury for almost committing murder and will be sent away for using—persuasion. Do you say that that is fair? Then I say to you: Pass a measure that is not identically like mine, but making the injunctions closer. Give the Justices of our courts even more power than they have at the present time.

I remember one incident. There was a strike on the Hotel Plaza, and the George A. Fuller Company, one of the biggest contractors in this Commonwealth, called every subcontractor into its office on State Street and said to them: "Go to the courts and apply for an injunction against every representative in the building trades," threatening that if they did not they would never do any more work for the George A. Fuller Company. I remember the trouble distinctly. The trouble was all about a man who since has passed away. I remember Judge Pierce's words to the man who applied for the injunction: "I have realized that you have been a puppet, that George A. Fuller has said to you jump and you jumped, and he said to you lay and you layed. I therefore don't grant you the injunction, but do grant it to the George A. Fuller Company." He might just as well have given it to the man who he claimed was a puppet, because he was the man involved in the trouble, but he gave it to Fuller, to protect everybody but the employee. After a time they brought men here from all parts of the country to take our places. Six policemen and a sergeant walked from the building to their rooming-houses on Columbus Avenue, and we did not even have the right to tell those men of the trouble that they were in or that we were there, because we were enjoined from talking, interfering, doing anything in regard to that job. I remember that in a case of an injunction in Worcester men were not allowed to walk on the same street that the plant was on. Some of the men lived on the same street, and they had to jump over their back fences to get into their houses or violate the injunction.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: It had been no part of my purpose to add anything to the already full and somewhat acrimonious debate on this important matter until the delivery of that noble effort, oration, on Friday last by the member in the fourth division from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), featured, as it was, by invective and diatribe, that makes the orations of that great Grecian in his Philippics seem like tame reading. But, gentlemen, I am not altogether certain but that it is well that every word has been said that was uttered by him and that has been spoken by every other member who has had anything to say on this subject.

After studying the matter over Saturday, and I confess I thought of it on Sunday and Monday again, I have come to consider it when studied in all its breadth and its depth as one of the most important questions that we have had to consider in this hall since we assembled more than a year ago. It is fundamental. It is fundamental to the conditions of this Commonwealth and of this great country of ours, and the truths that have been enunciated by different individuals, not only by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), but by others, are especially pertinent at this time.

Reference has been made by more than one speaker to the noble boys whom we have sent overseas till we have considerably more than a million over there now. Several hundred thousand of them have been standing with their backs to the wall, fighting, falling wounded and dying, and calling from day to day, from week to week, for you and for me and for every other man and every woman left at home to send more men, more guns, more ammunition, more clothing, more food, that they may successfully wage that contest against the enemy of humanity, civilization and democracy. Hence I say I regret that at a time like this, when the power of every man and every woman is absolutely needed, there should be anything to disrupt labor conditions, anything to disturb, anything to cause the loss of man power. Not only are our boys doing everything that human power and human ingenuity and human skill and courage and bravery can do across the seas, but our wives, our mothers and our sisters are arising at early dawn, preparing the morning meal for the family; and after they have done that duty they walk a mile and two miles to the Red Cross centers, there to prepare bandages and dressings for those boys. They work till nearly night. Then they go home and resume the household duties. That is what our women are doing.

Certainly our men should be interested in this great problem, and I do regret most keenly that at this time not less than 30,000 able-bodied men in the New England States alone are away from their usual places of work and labor by reason of labor disturbance. But, gentlemen, I am not going to offer at this time any excuse for these strikers. I am not going to justify them. The thing has taken place. But it is our duty as men sent up here to study the vital questions that interest this Commonwealth and this Nation to-day to take hold of this matter and study it to its very depths, and I hope we will do it. I hope the previous question will not be moved on this until its depths have been fathomed, if it takes all this week to do it.

But there are others besides these strikers, gentlemen, who are doing nothing to aid in saving the cause of humanity. Pardon me if I divert just a little, because this is incidental, if not absolutely pertinent. In the United States to-day a quarter of a million able-bodied men are engaged in the manufacture and the transportation and the sale of alcoholic liquors. These figures come from the liquor men themselves. A quarter of a million!

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: Is alcohol used to make powder?

Mr. Clark: Yes, sir, and it is used to make sots and slackers also, and to incapacitate men for work. It incapacitates one-half million of men in this country every day for any effective service. That, with the quarter of a million, makes three-quarters of a million who are incapacitated by this one thing. I am making this statement at this time to show that the striking union men in this Commonwealth and in New England to-day are not the only ones who are hindering in the manufacture of those things which are essential to the progress of the country and to the success of our arms in Europe. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts itself, the government itself, is culpable in this matter, and I am not altogether certain but that this Convention is somewhat culpable in throwing over the proposition to present a prohibition amendment to the voters of this Commonwealth. I am not altogether certain about that. I mention this incidentally to show before I get through with this how large a number of our able-bodied men are not engaged in anything that goes to serve the cause of humanity. Why, we were told last winter, and I believe it was absolutely true, that the breweries in the city of Boston alone, when the churches were closing, when the schools were completely closed, consumed more coal than all the schools of Boston consumed and destroyed, more food-stuff than all the school children in Boston consumed, and one of the Boston papers stated that more than 25,000 of the Boston school children went to school every morning without having had a suitable morning meal.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I rise to a point of order.

The Presiding Officer: Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. Richardson: We have a large question here on this labor matter, sufficient to take up the time of the Convention if it is not diverted from that subject. My point of order is that the gentleman's remarks are not pertinent to the question.

The Presiding Officer: The gentleman from Brockton will confine his remarks to the resolution before the Convention.

Mr. Clark: I feel very strongly that I am confining my remarks to the main question and to those questions that revolve around it as satellites and are intimately associated and connected with it and must be taken into consideration with it before this great and fundamental question is settled fully and before labor gets its just deserts. I am with labor first and last, from the top to the bottom, but I am with it to do it the good that I believe it needs done. I am to save it from its own self if it needs it in some directions and some respects. That is all I have to say in regard to this liquor matter.
A word about the origin of the labor-union's strength. I think the speaker on Friday last and some others have intimated, if they have not declared emphatically, that the labor-unions themselves were responsible for their strength, and that the strangle hold which it is claimed by some they have on the manufacturers was forced upon the manufacturers. I know absolutely to the contrary. A few manufacturers, desiring to get an advantage over their fellow-manufacturers, and a few union leaders perfectly willing they should if they would pay the price, got together, devised a scheme whereby a manufacturer should employ union labor alone, and as the price for doing so he was to be guaranteed immunity from strikes, arbitration was to prevail. I know that some of those manufacturers exulted in their shrewdness, — in their cunning, as they considered it. But a little later, when I was in the Legislature, one of those manufacturers came to me and said: "The Legislature seems to be under the influence of the unions." I replied: "Possibly it may be to some extent, but not so very long ago you were pleased to be under, the influence of the labor-union leaders, and you invited them to come to your office and make a contract with you whereby no non-union man need ever hope to find a place in your employ." He stroked his whiskers and he said: "Doctor, I don't know but there is too much truth in what you are saying." I answered: "You know there is." Yes, gentlemen, the manufacturers are responsible themselves for this strangle hold, if it be a strangle hold, that the unions have upon them. The unions are not wholly responsible for this.

Are the laboring men as a rule getting a sufficient wage for these times and with the high cost of living that prevails to-day? The unskilled workman who leaves my city in the morning, goes down to Squantum or some of those surrounding places there, works eight hours, returns at night, continues that through the week, — the unskilled workman, one of those men whose name the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill) on Friday said he could not pronounce, — well, I cannot, it is not necessary that I should, he is a workman, he is doing work here, he is helping make those things that will help our boys overseas, — is getting between $30 and $40 a week for his work, wholly unskilled. What about the man who has spent years of time in securing skill in the use of his hands, and whose mind becomes trained so that he can step up to a machine and do a day's work, earn for his employer $12, $15, $20 during the day, — I do not know how much? What about the $20 a week that he gets? Will it pay his house rent, his fuel bill, his grocer’s bill, his clothing bill, and pay into the church, of which he should be a member or in which he should be interested, a pittance once a week? Out of $20 can he do it? I say no, if he has a family of three or four children and a wife, and desires to maintain that standard of American living and American citizenship that you and I want every man, wherever he may come from, whether it be from the sunny land of Italy, from the Emerald Isle, from the cold regions of Russia or anywhere else, to maintain in this land of ours. Can he do it? No. When he finds that he is short of money to pay his honest bills, and he finds that manufacturers are becoming millionaires over night, — yes, gentlemen, almost over night, there are manufacturers who were on the ragged edge and just ready to go into the receiver's hands two years ago who to-day are millionaires, — do you wonder the laboring man who has wrought for one of those men, helped to make him a millionaire in this short time, is restless, is uneasy? I am not now justifying the strike, do not misunderstand me, but I am endeavoring, in my feeble way, and I recognize that it is a feeble way, to impress upon this Convention the fact that the present conditions cannot continue and American freedom be lasting. It cannot.

There is a grave responsibility upon us here, and I hope we shall measure up to it. The gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill), as I remarked, rather decried some of these strikers and these labor men because we could not pronounce their names. They cannot pronounce my name; I do not feel hurt because they cannot. I do not feel that they are any less worthy of my consideration because they cannot pronounce my name or because I cannot pronounce their name. This government has swung wide open the gates to every foreigner, from whatever land he might hail, with one or two exceptions. They have come here to be American citizens. They have built our railroads. They have dug our canals. They have erected our ten, twelve, fifteen, twenty story structures in our great cities. And, gentlemen, when it comes to their children in our public schools we Americans are not up with them. They have a deeper interest. They are bright. They learn more rapidly, and in a few years, when our children's children come onto the stage of action, those foreign children's children will be in the lead and will be shaping the destinies of this Commonwealth and of this great Republic. Do not deride them. Do not crowd them into the background. Do not crush them beneath your heels because they cannot pronounce your name or you cannot pronounce their names. I recognize the fact that they were formed by the same creative hand, and I am ready to stretch out my hand and welcome them to a higher plane of living, a higher plane of thought and purer and nobler aspiration in this land of God-given liberty and freedom.

However this question may be decided to-day or to-morrow or later, this question alone, gentlemen, will not solve the problem. It is not enough. It does not hit the real core of the situation. Never until the laboring man has an interest in his work more than just that envelope and its contents on Saturday night or Saturday noon will he take hold of the work like the proprietor. I wish the man might be living to-day, I hope he is living, who can devise a scheme for settling this great question upon just and equitable principles for stabilizing labor. The only thing that I think of, and it has done it in cases in the past, it has done it in connection with the great gas company that furnishes London with its lighting and much of its heating in the past, is the cooperative system. Just as soon as that cooperative system was put into operation every employee became a proprietor, he became a part owner, he became interested, and that company began to prosper as it never had prospered before. The price of gas was lowered to the consumer, and at every dividend period every employee in that company received an interest, a greater interest and still a greater interest as time went on in that company. I wish that might be tested, tried out more fully in this country than it ever has been before. [Applause.]

Mr. Whipple of Brookline: I hesitate to intrude upon a discussion where there are so many members of the Convention so much better prepared to discuss questions at issue, but last week there was uttered in the progress of the discussion on the floor a statement and a sentiment from which I wish to register my emphatic dissent and record my distinct disapproval. I do not know whether you all caught what was said or appreciated and realized the full significance of it. Because I did not hear it distinctly, but caught only the general import I asked to have it transcribed, that I might be sure that I heard exactly what was said. You will remember that in the course of that friendly and intimate discussion between the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) in the second division and his friend the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) in the first division there was a reference to the Clayton Act, and this is what was said by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury):

The Clayton Act begins with this recital: "Human labor is not a commodity or an article of commerce," and that self-evident declaration, one of the most preposterous things ever written into a statute, even in the American Congress, which is a large claim, was put there solely to introduce one of the most despicable pieces of demagogism ever written into the Federal statutes, in an exemption of all labor organizations—

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I rise only for the purpose of correcting the quotation of my own language which my friend has read and I presume is not personally responsible for. He has quoted me as saying that the first sentence of that section of the Clayton Act is a "self-evident declaration," as I presume he read it from the paper before him. What I said was that it is a self-evident lie.

Mr. Whipple: Very well, I will accept that, and we will read it in that way, although it has no pertinence to the part of the declaration to which I wish to enter, register and record my dissent.

One of the most despicable pieces of demagogism ever written into the Federal statutes in an exemption of all labor organizations and all agricultural organizations, the working-man and the granger, from the charge of conspiracy under the Sherman Act.

That was the statement, and that was the charge. I will pass by the reference to Congress, because it is a matter of taste, perhaps, whether one desires to refer to that great National law-making body in those terms; but I direct attention to the remainder of the statement, that this act, or this exception, excepting labor organizations and farmers from the operation of the Sherman Act, was one of the most despicable pieces of demagogism ever written into the Federal statutes.

Do you, gentlemen of this Convention, desire that to go on record without a protest? I protest because that is a charge of betrayal of trust, made against the men, the Senators and the Representatives in Congress, who voted in favor of that measure, and a charge of betrayal of trust against the President of the United States himself. And I do not believe that those men, believing that the measure was against the best interests of this Nation, still voted for it or approved it to get votes. Is not that a charge of betrayal of trust, — the men who approve or who vote for legislation that they do not believe in, — do they not sacrifice the interests of their country and of their constituents for private gain, for private advantage? That is the charge which was made, a charge which I resent, because I believe in the men who passed the bill and I desire to record my confidence in the uprightness and the integrity and the honesty of Woodrow Wilson, who approved the act and assisted it through. [Applause.] But I desire to record my disapproval of the statement most of all because I believe that the legislation itself was a measure of justice, a measure of fairness, a piece of progressive legislation which was an honor to the men who proposed it to be enacted.

Why do I say this? Look for a moment at what the provision is. Article 6, section 6 in the Clayton Act provides —

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the anti-trust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof;—

which, translated, means nothing more than that the Sherman Act should not forbid the existence and operation of labor organizations with all their beneficial and advantageous results, or from their securing by lawful means the promotion of the interests which they were organized to secure. [Reading]:

— nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof be construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the anti-trust laws.

What did that act mean? What was the history which led up to it? Well, we have to go back a bit to the passing of the Sherman Act, which was the first anti-trust law. What was the purpose of that act? What evil existed in the body politic which it was desired to crush and weed out? Was it not this, — that the aggregations of capital throughout the land had become oppressive? Oppressive to whom? Oppressive of the people, but especially oppressive of the laboring classes and the farmers, the producers of the world. It was felt that the farmers, who produce, were not getting a fair share in the distribution of what they produced, and that the laboring men were not getting a fair share of what their labors and their efforts produced, but that after the production was made food gamblers and speculators seized upon the products and by numerous combinations, by rebates and every other device then known, acquired the greater part for themselves. And so for the protection of the people at large, and especially for the protection of labor, which was suffering under discrimination, for the protection of the farmer, who raised the produce and who did not gamble or speculate in it, the anti-trust act was passed, and subsequent acts were passed perfecting it. That was the object of the Sherman Act, — to prevent illegal conspiracies, as they called them, which wrung from the pockets of the people illegal gains, took from labor a greater part of what it produced than they had a right to take, took from the farmer a greater part of the value of what he produced than fairness and justice permitted them to take.

But what happened? It was a broad act, loosely drawn in general language. Immediately distinguished lawyers, who always can see how to do that sort of thing, said: "Why, here is a chance; let us apply the law to the laborers themselves and to the farmers themselves and see how they like it. Under its general terms we can root out labor organizations, which are troublesome to us because they are doing something for labor, and these organizations of farmers who get together to talk over matters about their crops and to see how they can get a cent a quart or half a cent a quart for milk, — we can give it to them.” And therefore the Danbury Hatters’ case came on and went to the Supreme Court of the United States, where judgment was given taking away the homes of hundreds of working-men there in Danbury, because the Supreme Court had to say: “As the act is drawn it has to apply to labor organizations.” Therefore the bill that was passed for the protection of the farmers and the protection of the laborers was turned by that quick thrust as a weapon against them.

That was the situation. When there came into power the men who passed the Clayton bill they said: “It is the part, it is the duty of legislators to take care of, to give especial advantages, if you please, to the men who toil. They cannot send expensive lobbies here to Washington to tell us what they want, and the farmers are not represented in the legislation.” To apply the words of that great President, these legislators said: “We know very well what the financiers and the bankers and the great railroad presidents want, and we do not need to have them tell us. We would give more to know what the man on the street wants, what he thinks, how he feels and what his problems are, — the laboring man and the artizan.” And so here, despite a lobby, there was brought up a measure which I say was a measure of justice, a measure intended to correct the broad language of the Sherman Act and restore to the protection of legislation the men for whom originally the legislation was intended. And therefore there was written into that law that it should not apply to farmers’ organizations which never had done harm to the public, which never had got very much of a rebate, which never had piled up very greatly swollen fortunes; that it should not apply to the humble working-man’s organizations whose activities had not done very much harm to the community, which had been directed to lifting just a bit the status of his life, giving him a little more of the product which he assisted in producing. These lawmakers said: “We will not stand by and see what was intended as a protection of those classes used as a weapon against them.” And so as a measure of justice and fairness, as a measure of progressive legislation, as a measure making the Sherman Act what it originally was intended to be, that clause of the Clayton Act was passed.

Was that one of the most arrant pieces of demagogism that ever has been known in this country? Do you want to say, gentlemen of this Convention, that it was, and assent to that proposition? I for one will not assent. It is legislation of which I approve; it is forward looking, progressive legislation, legislation in the interests of the people at large.

It has been said that the measure before us and that measure are “class legislation,” as if that settled something. Well, does it? What is the objection to “class legislation”? Do we not have a lot of it?
Recently a law has been passed that gentlemen without employment, — loafers, — must work. Is not that class legislation? Does not that hit a large body of people of a particular class, namely, those who do not work? That is class legislation. Why did they pass it? They passed it because they wanted to discourage the pursuit of that particular class of individuals. It is class legislation to say that a man who habitually commits crime shall be put in jail or punished. In a certain sense it is class legislation. It certainly is class legislation when a lot of manufacturers go to Washington and ask for special privileges under the tariff. Why do they ask special privileges? "Encourage our manufactures; encourage us as a class." They say: "Anybody can go into it." That is very true, anybody can. Anybody can become a laborer, anybody can become a farmer, and this legislation was merely legislation to encourage two classes,—to encourage laborers to try to better their condition by the methods which they use for bettering them; to encourage farmers to consult together and try to better their condition. It is class legislation.

The measure which is before us now has been said to be class legislation; that is, that the particular class of men, labor organizations, shall be exempted from certain restrictions. Whatever other objections there may be to it,—and there are objections,—the objection that it is class legislation is not a sound one, because it represents a policy, and a correct policy, as exemplified in the Clayton Act, and that is this: A policy to encourage agriculture, to help agriculture, to build it up, encourage people to go into it, because without agriculture where are we? Do we realize that through agriculture and through the labor of those who work in the mines and in industries practically everything we have comes to us? Is it wrong policy to encourage them when they have been ground down and legislated against and discriminated against through a long period of years?
The time has come when the government of the United States has taken in hand the upbuilding of certain classes, the favoring of certain classes, to encourage them; and the classes that it has undertaken so to help are the humbler classes, the laborer, the toiler and the tiller of the soil. This principle should be applied to the measure before us. Is it for the real benefit and in the interest of labor organizations and the laboring classes? If it is it should have our approval. If it is not it should not have our approval. By that test the question should be determined. Do they deserve the encouragement, this particular form of encouragement or this particular form of exception? I must confess I am not certain that they do. I am not certain that it would be for the interests of labor, although I must admit that the men who have fought labor's fight and endured the struggle are better able to judge than I with reference to it, and they have considered it carefully. But it seems to me that the measure which they ask for is fraught with danger to them. But that something should be done, that they should be encouraged and should be helped, should be the policy which should guide the action of the Convention upon this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: We are at a critical stage of a very important debate and I wish first, as we shall have to vote shortly on two or three questions, to call the attention of the Convention to the parliamentary situation, so that at least there may be no confusion about it. The resolution before the Convention is No. 220. It goes almost without saying that this resolution must be rejected, whatever becomes of any substitute for it, for it is a literal transcript of the whole statute of 1914 which was held unconstitutional by our court in the Bogi case. The mover of the resolution has taken over bodily the whole Act of 1914 and proposes it for adoption here as part of the
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Constitution. For reasons of form, if no other, that is not fit to be written into the Constitution and for these reasons it must of necessity be rejected unless it is at least boiled down into constitutional form and substance.

For this resolution two substitutes are offered, one by my friend from Boston who sits directly behind me (Mr. Horgan). He now tells me that it is not to be pressed, so I need not comment upon it. The only pending substitute, then, is the resolution moved by my friend from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish), and I desire to say at once that nothing could have gratified me more than to see this proposition come from a gentleman for whom I have high respect but with whom I have very often found myself unable to agree. Upon this measure I am in hearty accord with him, and I can tell the Convention what I think about it almost as well in a minute as I could in an hour.

I believe that if this Convention had come here in June, 1917, written that measure in some form, — I am not committed to its precise form, which I think may need revision, — if the Convention had come here a year ago and written that measure into the Constitution and then adjourned and gone home, it would have proved its worth to the people for all it cost and would have been entitled to the public gratitude.

I doubt very much if all the members of the Convention appreciate the momentous importance of this subject to the people of Massachusetts. There is not another State in the Union, with the possible exception of our neighbor Rhode Island, which is in much the same situation, nor perhaps another community anywhere, that is put in so difficult and dangerous a situation by industrial warfare as this community in which we live. Massachusetts is an industrial State, and so she must remain. A vast proportion of her population, probably a majority of all the people of Massachusetts, depend upon industrial employment for their existence, literally for their daily bread; and to the welfare and prosperity if not the existence, of an industrial community like this, industrial peace is a vital necessity.

Now for more than a generation we have been standing by and looking on helpless at the war between labor and capital, which has disturbed the public peace, unsettled industry, wasted untold time and money, driven some of our industries out of the State and threatened the stability if not the existence of those which remain, — and why? Because we have no tribunal possessed of power to take hold of industrial disputes in the right way and straighten them out. That is a principal if not the ultimate reason. The courts, proceeding upon fixed principles and under rigid rules of law, have found themselves unable to do it. They have succeeded in paring off some of the sharpest edges of the controversy. They have succeeded in protecting independent labor in some of its rights and, so far as I know, in protecting organized labor in all its rights if denying it some special privileges which it demands. But the courts cannot go to the root of the difficulty. It is beyond their reach. There must be an arbitral tribunal with authority to take these contending parties in hand, in the broadest view of all the social and economic questions involved, deal out equal and exact justice between them, and enforce its awards. In other words, we must have a competent arbitral board or boards as the only practical remedy in sight for the warfare between labor and capital and the only thing that offers a prospect of securing industrial peace in this industrial community.

I take the resolution of my friend from Barnstable, though I have not had time to examine it critically, as embodying the substance of compulsory arbitration. There is or was before the Convention a form of resolution submitted by a majority of the joint committees on Labor and Judicial Procedure, which we hoped would so far commend itself to favor that some member would bring it up formally for action, but that has not been done. The proposal of my friend from Barnstable contains, probably, all that is necessary in substance, and I sincerely trust that the Convention will substitute it for the pending resolution, so that it may at least be further considered.

I do not believe the Convention has before it another measure out of which so much benefit may come to this industrial community as out of this if properly recast and put into the Constitution. It opens the way, which at present seems barred in all directions, to a rational and practical remedy for the adjustment of industrial disputes. I am aware that the word "compulsory" has an offensive sound in some ears, perhaps in all ears, because no man likes to be compelled to do anything against his will. But I think our friends of organized labor are making the mistake of their lives in standing out against compulsory arbitration, which is sure, in my judgment, to come. I think they are mistaken for the plainest of reasons, namely, that if there is any ground for their position or their claims,—and I admit that there is and have no criticism to make upon them except that I think they are self-deceived,—all they want and all they can ask is equal and exact justice, and this if not more they can confidently expect at all times and under all circumstances from such a tribunal as the Legislature is authorized by this resolution to create. They cannot in reason ask more than this. They are asking for special privileges, and that is their fatal mistake,—the mistake which in the end is bound to undermine their whole position, exactly as illustrated in a remark of that most liberal if not radical judge, Mr. Justice Holmes, which I have seen quoted in some newspaper: "I said to a labor leader: 'What you want is favor, and when you are denied it you say that the denial is wicked.'" Neither organized labor nor anybody else can maintain that position in this country, where the majority of the people believe in equal rights and equal opportunities alike for all men.

The resolutions which we are debating now for the third day are fatally defective, every one of them, because they ask special privilege for organized labor. They ask that the legal remedy which is open and applied against everybody else shall not be applied against them. They ask to be exempt from the only effective remedy against that which is unlawful in their operations. It is for this reason that the majority of the Convention has already seen, instinctively, that the idea of writing these resolutions or either of them into the Constitution cannot be entertained. All men must stand on the same ground in this community, and it shall not be said in our Constitution that one class of men may defy the laws and go free of the penalties which fall upon all other men or classes under the same circumstances.

I said that I could tell the Convention in a minute all I desired to say about this resolution, and I think I have done it, but perhaps I ought not to sit down without acknowledging the compliment of my friend from Brookline in the fourth division (Mr. Whipple). If I felt at liberty to say anything here which is not chemically pure from all taint of anything political [laughter and applause], I should avail myself of the occasion to express my obligations to my friend for furnishing the voting body of Massachusetts, in advance, with the platform on which he may one of these days be really, as he is at all times nominally, a candidate for a seat in the Senate of the United States. [Laughter.] He has unequivocally declared, let it be remembered, that he is totally and absolutely in favor of legislation, — so much in favor of it that he protests against a word being said to the contrary, — of legislation which singles out and exempts two classes of the community, the classes having the most votes as it happens, from the penalties of the Sherman Act, which is primarily and principally a criminal statute. He declares that he is unequivocally in favor of setting apart two classes of voters to be exempt from the punishment inflicted by the anti-trust acts upon all other men or classes under the same circumstances, and of making it the law that, whereas all other men who conspire or combine in violation of these acts shall go to jail, when these two classes do the same thing they shall go free. This is class privilege, in its most odious form. I feel greatly indebted to my friend for that candid declaration and welcome him to the full benefit of it. [Applause.]

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I have just heard the labor movement charged, — because we want things arranged so that the burden shall not lie so heavily upon us, — with being willing to commit crime and with asking that if we do commit crime we may go free. I want to say now that when the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Pillsbury) talked of independent labor, there is no such thing upon the face of the earth as independent labor; only those who stand together in an industrial organization.

I shall not detain the Convention any length of time, but I want to say again that when a man says because I stand among you and raise my voice for a square deal that I am asking for protection if we commit crime, we do not want any such thing, my friends, and the gentleman in this division makes my blood boil when he says labor is demanding selfish, class legislation. We are asking you now and I want to ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat this question: When he started out he said that this resolution No. 220 could not be in the Constitution of Massachusetts because it was the Act of 1914. And I ask you why it cannot be there if the majority of the people in this Commonwealth want it there? His say so does not make it right, neither does it make it wrong. You men, many of you lawyers, ought to go out into the highways and byways of this State and listen to the people upon the street, listen to them in their halls, and you will find, whether you believe it or not, that there is no organization that the people are so bitter against, that they speak of with so much severity, as they do with reference to the courts when they interfere with the enactment of legislation passed by the Legislature for the benefit of the people. Now you men may not believe that, but it is absolutely true. Pass a measure of remedy in your Legislature and go into any city or town in this Commonwealth and ask the average man on the street what he thinks of it, and he will tell you:
"It will last till it gets to some court." They have no faith in the courts when it comes to these things. I have heard a judge in our court say that he did not want to have anything to do with these industrial problems. And so, as I said the other day, the only cure for this is to take from the courts the power to annul legislation. Take from them the right to pass on legislative acts and leave it in the hands of the people; allow it more freely under the initiative and referendum, and you will remedy these things. Water will seek its level, but no living man is willing to have the chains placed upon him. Industrial arbitration, — compulsory arbitration? A man this morning said the mill people did not make any money, they were surprised at the small dividends. The Lawrence strike, — why was it? It was because the men who controlled that industry refused to obey the mandate of the law of this Commonwealth without reducing the pay. That was the reason for the Lawrence strike. And while the outward conditions may be still, the strife is still there. In the city of New Bedford we had a strike during war time and all the people walked out. Now let me tell you, most of those people down there do not belong to an industrial organization. It was rebellion against the entire system that allowed profiteering and the cost of living going up beyond all range, and those people walked out. Who settled it? Oh, it is nice to stand here and be able to say that the man who settled that industrial strike for New Bedford and the man who came there helping the government was the man whom the ex-Governor would have been glad to place upon the Minimum Wage Commission of this State and he was opposed by the capitalists of this State who declared him unworthy of the position, and yet he was qualified to settle the dispute for the government with the mill operatives which meant thousands of dollars going to the mill operatives but also meant supplies without number to those who are fighting our battles. I stand for that, not because those of my political faith but because this administration has gone out into the highways and byways and brought men of that caliber in to deal with labor.

Let me say, you working people have a right to organize, and you are denied by injunction and you are denied by every known purpose and it would be well for some of you who apparently may be interested in compulsory arbitration to find out that it has not worked in other places. You cannot have industrial peace, — it is a misnomer. I go further. Labor and capital never can walk hand in hand together under a competitive system which says the strong shall survive and the weak may perish. It is incompatible with those two extremes. And so I plead with you. I do not want to force myself on this Convention, but I tell you candidly that you cannot cure it, — you will not cure this evil by placing further restrictions upon it.

The Clayton Act gives a fair administration of the law. Do away with your injunctions and let us settle it. There is not a man here who is not willing to allow himself to be judged by a jury of his peers, and that is what we ask for. I am not asking for any judge or anybody else to go to work and declare an injunction as they did in Boston against the carpenters, refusing them to even say to a certain firm that it should not retain in its employ a man who was unfair to them, refusing them the right to print upon a card that a certain firm was unfair to these people, despite the fact that the Constitution of Massachusetts allows the right of free speech.

Let me close with this: There is a law to protect against criminal action, and if these things be criminal proceed under the law. Ah, my friends, — and particularly the lawyers, — let me say to you, do not think for a moment that if you dodge this question and if you do not meet it fairly and squarely you have in any way evaded the issue. The delegate in this division (Mr. Pillsbury) has said that all peace and serenity would have been in this Commonwealth had there been compulsory arbitration. Do you believe it? Do you believe you can force any man to do what he does not want to do and have peace? I can conceive of a state where the interest of the many is regarded as higher than the interest of the few.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I should like to ask the gentleman if he would oppose the passing of any law because we cannot enforce it perfectly, because somebody may violate it?

Mr. Harriman: Certainly not. But I want to say this: It is unfair to say that labor in itself must knuckle down to some arbitration agreement and he will find it so, you all will find it so. After this war what is going to happen? No man knows, but I do know this, that the sort of wages now paid will not be paid; I know that thousands of men will be thrown out of employment, and I know, as you know, that with the cost of living as it is men are not laying up for a rainy day, so called. Ah, let me say to you, let me say to you in this Convention that a duty almost as deep and heavy rests upon us here as upon those who are across the water. For let me say, when those men come back they will want to go into industry, and where will they find their place? Will you keep wages down? Will you here to-day or in this Convention enter into any arrangement that is so drastic as would fix practically a price upon labor that will fix the cost of living? No, you dare not, not one of you who is opposed to this proposition.

You dare not go into a man's industry and say: "You shall not do this" or "You shall not do that." This is what the government of the United States has been doing, Will the people stand for it after the war? The labor men will stand for it. The men who are interested in the welfare of our country will stand for government ownership and control of great public utilities. You do not hear a man complain of the increase of fares upon a railroad; and why? For the same reason that he does not kick about the increased rate for mailing a letter, because the money goes into the pockets of the government and he is willing to pay it. But you put the fare at three cents a mile and let it go into private industry, and you will find that a howl will go up, and rightly so. The spirit of the times demands that there must be more collective ownership. Organized labor, while it is demanding this, is not demanding it for itself; it is demanding it for every man and woman and child if they be obliged to work. So far as our individual affairs are concerned we can take care of ourselves. But we are willing and we want to go outside of those to the so-called independent laborer. I should like to see one outside of the labor organizations; he does not exist. He does not exist any more than the fallacy that labor and capital can walk hand in hand and lie down side by side so long as their very existence for livelihood rests upon the power that they have to take by strength from him who is weaker than they. And that is our industrial system. That is the argument upon this floor.

Mr. Bodfish: Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is impossible to settle differences between capital and labor under our present system, and if so, why does he advocate the proposition he now is urging?

Mr. Harriman: I say that it is not possible,—it is not possible under this system nor do I believe it is possible under the system which he invokes to settle industrial disputes. They are ever going on and on until finally the great mass of the people will realize that the benefit of a few is not paramount to the many, but that the great mass of people themselves have a right to rule themselves, and that great mass of people is those who labor, not only by hand but by brain, and the mistake that is made in this Convention or anywhere else is to consider labor and capital as the two extremes. Capital is inanimate and labor is a live, living thing; it has a soul. And for that soul and for its welfare and against the unwilling and against the murderous dollar it is that the labor movement protests and will continue to protest and will defy compulsory arbitration or any other form of industrial or political slavery that rests upon the great mass of the people to their detriment and to the betterment of the few,—a particular class who have accumulated to themselves enough of the wealth of the world to be able to use that wealth for the further enslavement of the many and for their aggrandizement.

Mr. Brine of Somerville: This debate has been going on now for about three days. This is the third day and I think almost everybody knows how he is going to vote. I move the previous question.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: I am sorry that at the adjournment time the delegate from Somerville, with his liberal spirit would not give the labor men an opportunity to speak against compulsory arbitration, which is the latest amendment put in here. They want to put the previous question over on us and he tells us we have had three days for debate. We have had really only two days for discussion, for it began on Friday. The subject now before this Convention,—the injunction proposition,—came up Friday afternoon. I was one who spoke and the delegate in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill) was the other. Therefore we have not had two or three days discussion. I should like an opportunity to make a defence of the trade-union movement, which proposes nothing that would make any trouble or create any unrest or lack of harmony. I should like also to speak against compulsory arbitration. If anybody knows anything about the Canadian compulsory arbitration law he knows this is the way it works: When the men had asked their employers for arbitration they found that they were filling their places one by one and those who were looking for compulsory arbitration were being discharged.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Brine of Somerville: I desire to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion for the previous question. The gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) made a point that I had overlooked. He stated that they were talking now, not on the resolution on the calendar, but on the amendment by Mr. Bodfish, and while they had talked for two or three days on the original proposal, the amendment had had very little consideration. I think his point was well taken, and I desire to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: The matter before the Convention is of such great importance that I personally should like the amendment offered by Mr. Bodfish to be heard once again. I think perhaps we have failed to catch the whole purport of it, which is rather unfortunate.

The Secretary again read the amendment offered by Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable, as follows: —

Full power and authority are hereby vested in the General Court to provide for the adjudication of any controversies between employers and employees and to provide against lockouts, strikes, or any other cause of involuntary or unnecessary unemployment, and to fix penalties and make any other reasonable or necessary provisions to carry out the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. D. D. Driscoll of Boston: I am opposed to the resolution just read, or the amendment that is made here. It was done in such haste that it did not give the men who have had some experience in the labor movement a chance to study it. Our committee do not hold a day session. I got in touch with the officers this morning and held a session to have them make a standing on the questions here, so the labor movement could give its information to the delegates of the Convention. This subject had not been announced at that time. I feel it is my duty to oppose it. While they give us the name of being labor leaders, I know so much about the labor movement that I can say that all we do, as far as delegates in this Convention are concerned, is to represent the people while we are here; and we are glad to give, from our experience in the labor movement, any information that is of any benefit to any delegate in this Convention.

I am opposed to compulsory arbitration. I am opposed to members trying to come here and trying to give the Legislature the power that that resolution now read would give. My reasons for that are these: First, you are going to drag the labor movement into politics. That I am opposed to. Other people may believe it. Other men disagree with me on that. That is their right. I am seriously opposed to it on that ground. It is true in the labor movement that we have men who believe in the socialistic propaganda and such legislation as this, which they claim is in the educational line to the labor men. The other men are called the "pure and simples;" unfortunately, I am one of the "pure and simples." I do not believe that all this politics is of great benefit, — forcing the trades-unionists into the political propaganda. If it comes to the day that it comes too strong, they would not want to nominate anybody but themselves.

I believe good men come into the Legislature to enact laws who never carried a union card. I believe sometimes we send men with union cards better than other men, and let justice be done. That is human nature.

We have discussed this question in many conventions. Will you drive the proposition, the political faction, into the great political discussions? I hope the delegates to this Convention to-day will defeat it. Is it worth while for many men here who are interested in fair play, — and I am not well posted on it myself, only in regard to what I have heard in the conventions of the American Federation of Labor? I have attended a great many of them up until December, 1907. I was just about to return home from one in November, 1907. We had discussed all these questions there, and it was there I heard from the Canadian Trades Congress, from their delegate,—I had the honor once of being there myself, representing the American Federation of Labor,—of the failure now of compulsory arbitration in Canada. Though the question was being arbitrated, the men who then were working were discharged one by one, and their places were filled, and compulsory arbitration was still going on. That may be for the success of some employers, but it is a damnable course for the working-men.

When it comes to the proposition of compulsory arbitration, it is a great big problem. It is one of those things that the gentlemen who believe in it could give a little more study to than they have done. If the people of this Commonwealth are sincere, and believe in giving fair play to these classes, without legislation, I am ready to meet the representatives of the corporations of this Commonwealth,—and I do not give the corporations the great power that you hear them crucified for on the platform on the controlling of legislation; but I am willing to meet their representatives, after this Convention adjourns, and I will arrange with them to meet the representatives of the labor movement of Massachusetts, and see if we cannot inaugurate a system to come to the next Legislature with increased power and reorganize the State Board of Conciliation and Arbitration, so that it may become a greater benefit and do the great work that Mr. Endicott is trying to do in Massachusetts. If the men are interested in arbitration and conciliation, and are sincere, I will arrange with their attorneys to meet the representatives of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor to discuss this question, and give the textile unions and others a chance to meet all of them, and see if something cannot be done through legislation to give them greater power; so that we can have men on the battle-field, and do away with strikes and strikers, through conciliation and arbitration; and you will find more peace that way and better success than in what is going on to-day.

It is up to the delegates of this Convention. It is one of those serious questions. I do not want to start making a labor speech. I have spoken in all parts of this Commonwealth on the question of labor. We have our faults and we have our blessings. Everybody has that. You may charge us on the floor of the Convention, you may say we are all good fellows, and we are honest, etc.; no thanks to anybody but ourselves for that. But when accusations are made against any man, or any body of men, I say they are worthy of what credit rightfully belongs to them.

During the argument on last Friday by the courageous member of this Convention he gave his personal opinion, which he has a right to as well as anybody else. When he referred to the war and organized labor, I said to the labor men at a meeting that I attended since then: "Be cool, do not get fussed up over that kind of talk. It will straighten itself out; let the matter take its course; when it is all over, read it." Sure,—we are defending the country. Why, we defend it so strong that the men of one of our little unions in Boston, known as Bartenders' Union 77, put up $100,000 of the money of their members for bonds in the last bond issue. The city of Boston, through its labor organizations,—think this over, gentlemen,—helped to lead the city of Boston to make its great reputation, as did the union men throughout the country. Somerville fell down, and if Somerville fell down and did not do its duty as a city it must be full of non-union men, because the union men went out and purchased bonds. And they said: "No thanks to them," but they did not mean that. I did not take the statement that way. I do not believe it was meant that while the boys across the water are hungry, not getting shoes, that the trades-union movement is to blame for it. No, it is not. The trades-union movement, which you men do not understand, is standing loyally behind the battle-field to-day, with all the influence of hot air and hot talk to come out on strike, loyal to the principles of the government, standing loyally behind their machinery, backing it up, while other men go about and form individual unions. Now the trades-union movement does not uphold it. They are not to be crucified and assailed for the actions of those men.

Let me bring it to the attention of the delegates here. True; I know something about these organizations. I have been thirty years a member. Up to December, 1910, I held the office of secretary-treasurer of the State Branch of the American Federation of Labor. I visited all the unions. I helped out the international unions, and always tried to prevent strikes and bring about agreements. Our international union gives us two freedoms,—the right to our political and religious convictions. We do not uphold these little strikes you read about in the papers. They may not be members of the international union.

The best illustration of it I can give to the delegates is this reference the other day about the city of Brockton. Who is upholding the strike in the city of Brockton? Some of the men out of the independent unions have been personal friends of mine for twenty years. They have an international organization, they have the shoe-workers' international union; and there they have a case for arbitration, a division fight on the inside. Some men bolted and left the organization. They are not members of the American Federation of Labor, and there is no reason why statements should be made by anybody that the labor men of this Commonwealth are not loyal to their country. I never met a labor man in my life who said: "To hell with this country; it is the union power first." They all said: "My country, 'tis of thee." That is their cry everywhere. They will fight for their country and stand loyally behind the people to bring victory.

I should not like to have it said after adjournment of this Convention, if you defeated every piece of legislation there is here in the interest of labor, that any man ever will dare stand on a platform and assail the character of the delegates who may agree or disagree with me, because the gentleman had charged, or this Convention had charged, that the trades-union movement of America was not loyal to the country, in the defence of the war we are now in. I refer you to the President of the United States, I refer you to the representatives of the Army and Navy, who called our men to Washington last week. What for? We will show you what for before we get through: To bring about the victory of this great fight that is now going on. I do not give all our work to the press. We are going to do the greatest work that is being done throughout this country in the interests of success and victory, so that it will be America, the American Nation, and America forever. That is the attitude of trades-unionism, trades-union members and organizations of this State and of this country.

I make this statement here, because in many meetings of the labor-unions we may look for a copy of speeches made here, so that we may know these things. Our unions which are connected with our international union are just as loyal to the country as anybody else. I am not going to tell you about the charitable work we have been doing. I have been secretary-treasurer of many of these charity committees. I put in four years and a half as deputy on the penal commission of Suffolk County, and I know the labor-unions give up their money and some of them never get it back; they restore the furniture, look after their families, in various cities of this Commonwealth. I challenge anybody to say there is any better work than that done. That is the work that has been going on, the work of all the unions, not only in this State but throughout the country.

Let me say to the delegates of the Convention here, I am not worked up a bit about the statement made here. I admire the gentleman for his courage, but he has got no more than I have got. I admire the statement he made here, but I do not believe the men in organized labor are not loyal to America in the fight that is now going on.

I tell you about the unions, their bonds and their fighting, what they are doing. We are hollering for peace. We gave 15,000 names and addresses of our members to the War Emergency Board at the State House, I believe Colonel Gaston is at the head of it and Cornelius Carmody one of the deputies. We told our men to be ready to sacrifice the occupations they are now in and go into the ammunition factories. The young men have got to go to the front. There are 15,000 names in the State House now waiting to be called.

The only thing we say to the people who employ labor in this Commonwealth is, select your labor adjuster, some man in whom you yourself have confidence, not a man whom we recommend, so that when you have trouble we can go to him with a delegate and be able to restore peace, and say whether or not a man can be laid off. When we reach the men who are in our labor-unions, whether they lived in Germany or came from Pinkerton's Detective Agency, who may be the biggest kickers for a strike, we know them, and we are suspicious of men working in the Fore River works, at Squantum, at Lynn and other places, and we want to catch them, and we are trying to catch them.

I am opposed to any man in Massachusetts, no matter where he works, talking any language but the English language, in any public speech or in any workshop in this Commonwealth. I challenge the employer to back up the issue, so that they will have to talk the language that we are talking, and we will know what is said, and what is going on in barber shops, and the electric cars, and the workshops.

That is the kind of work the labor movement is doing, no matter what your feelings may be on the question of injunctions. And as I said in my little talk last Friday, let it be said that we are not going to go from this Convention except with the best of American spirit toward each other, whether we differ on injunction, the right to strike, or the right to do picket duty. I want you to have the feeling they have in Congress, and in the United States Senate, and that the President of the United States has. We are true, loyal Americans, and we want victory. We want America to win, and we want to go up and down with our people, not as you have gone, but in the lines and trenches, ready to fight to the death to bring victory and happiness to the coming generation, and not to have them suffer the same as we suffered in our time fighting for what we believed to be fair play and justice. [Applause.]

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I should like to ask of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), if he believes that all questions concerning disputes between capital and labor should be submitted to a board of arbitration; and if he does, would he be in favor of the voters of the State electing that board?

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: My answer to the first part of the question, if I understand it, is "Yes;" and to the second part, if I understand it, "No." I believe in the appointive system for public officials rather than the elective system so far as practicable, and I would have every officer under the government appointed, except the members of the Legislature, who exercise the law-making power.

Mr. Lomasney: Now, you see what the gentleman really means. Everyone knows that the question of injunctions is raising a great deal of trouble for the courts; and many of the judges are anxious to get rid of passing on them. To-day when a proposition is put forward that a board should be elected, the gentleman says that he would not be willing that the qualified voters of the State should elect that board. He told you before the recess of the great interest which the people of the State had in such a board. He told you what a great manufacturing State we were. He told you of the large investments that capital had made in a great number of manufacturing industries; and then he told you of what it meant for both labor and capital to live in harmony. Still with all those vital and important interests at stake his claim now is that we should not refer to the voters themselves the question of who should serve on this board.

It seems to me that is just where he fails. It seems to me that he speaks the word for what is known as "privilege" in this State. I believe there are a great many manufacturers, however, who disagree with him. But, since he, as the representative of that element of the community known as special privilege, and for whom he speaks, has seen fit to make a sneering allusion to the candidacy of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Whipple) for a place in the United States Senate, I hope that in view of the stand for the people that the gentleman from Brookline has made he will accept the challenge issued to him by the gentleman from Wellesley, Mr. Pillsbury, and not run away as some other men do here. It seems to me, sir, that there is now but one course open to the gentleman from Brookline; and that is to go before the people of the State on the issue as to whether or not the people believe in such a narrow policy. Do they believe in the election of such a board? Or do they believe that every office-holder but the Legislature in this State should be appointed? That is the real question now. I am glad that the gentleman from Wellesley is so frank and has put the matter forward so clearly. It seems to me that this is the vital issue here: "Will you trust the people?" If the manufacturers cannot be trusted to handle their own affairs, if the working-men of the State cannot be trusted to handle their own affairs, what becomes of democracy?
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES. 1147

Of course, the gentleman from Wellesley is wrong. I think that this Convention believes he is wrong. I believe that you must meet this question in some practical way and relieve the courts; and it is better to have a board elected by the people to meet this situation than it is to have the matter of injunctions continually brought into the courts and constantly bringing down on the judges the criticism that they now are anxious to avoid. Therefore, I shall vote for the passage of document No. 220.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: While the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Whipple) can take care of himself, and can do so without any of my help, it pleases me at the present time to bring to your attention that one man has held the Senatorship of the United States,—one man whom those outside of his party have loved and honored,—and if you have any doubt that he holds precisely the same ideas that were held by the gentleman from Brookline you have only to turn to the remarks of George Frisbie Hoar when the Sherman Act was passed. His argument then, the ideas on which it was founded, have been reproduced ably by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Whipple).

First, compulsory arbitration. The gentleman does not like the word "compulsory." The Convention should agree with him. At this very moment our eyes turn to read what is the latest position of the incarnation, the champion of the theory of compulsion. About the time he went to war there was pending in the Reichstag the resolution favored by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury),—compulsory arbitration. The word compulsory is a contradiction of the word arbitration. Arbitration means conciliation; conciliation means bringing together; bringing together means living in harmony. Say you, do you believe in harmony with a club? For that is your compulsory arbitration reduced to the last analysis. It is not workable. We are reaching out here to deal with a difficulty, and perhaps thinking we may deal with the difficulty without dealing with the cause which produces the difficulty. Unless you remove the cause of these strikes you will continue to have them; the cause is the fundamental.

Take this particular case of Underhill v. The Trade-Unions and this demurrer, as I might put it, of compulsory arbitration. While I am talking to a Convention made up largely of lawyers, if I want to prove my case I ought to seek among lawyers to find some principle from which I could reason conclusively that the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) was wrong. Have you not a principle that runs something like this: That if a person lights a squib and throws it, and another party throws it elsewhere, and thus does damage, the one who lights the squib is responsible for the damage; responsible even though it might not have done any damage in the original place?

I cannot cite the case, but I think there is some such case in law. If there is not I would lay that down as the principle, then, upon which I should like to proceed: The idea that the one who originates, the starter of the cause, is responsible for its results. To prove that the unions are results and not the cause of results, I hold in my hand one paper that contains statements to support my contention. It is the Boston Herald of last Saturday. That paper came to me at a time when I was in a very seductive spot for thought; the shadows of the trees undulated on the sunlit green that fell to the water's edge;
the waves that were just lapping the shore and gay painted boats that floated there, sounded a harmony to the singing of the birds overhead.
Amid such conditions I read the Boston Herald.

The first thing that attracted my attention was news of the war;
then I went speedily to the report of the Convention proceedings and to what the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) had to say.
Then I turned over to the headings from Washington, one that app lied to this very question,—I want to be as brief as possible and at the same time make myself understood. The heading is:
"Government Business Dominates Industry." It continues:

Though labor unsettlement is growing to an alarming extent, it is inspiring to find in various directions new high records are being established in industrial output.
The reports of enthusiasm among shipyard workers over the results they are attaining are inspiring. Reports from manufacturing districts tell of steadily increasing percentage.

You will find no reference to the Underhill theory of "obstruction" by reading the article through. I turn over to the financial page, and again find something dealing with the labor situation,—but I am fearful of time and the patience of the delegates. What I want to bring to your attention is this: The price of labor is being fixed by employers competing with each other for labor which, at the present time, is abnormally high. Does anyone doubt it? Take the price which the government has fixed for unskilled labor. Well, how is it a propos? Because the very moment that you fix a standard for unskilled labor very high, there must be a necessity for it. It must be that the government has examined what was the cost of living of that unskilled labor and then placed a wage whereby labor could live, acting on the theory that labor must be contented, otherwise there is no production; and that is why the government has been so liberal with labor. It wants production. Every American wants production.
The result is that skilled labor takes the fixed wage of unskilled labor as a standard and asks for higher wages. Turn the pages of the Herald again and you find another statement. Mr Endicott voluntarily raises the wages of his employees. Nobody asks for it, but he raises ten per cent. Turn to the next page and somebody voluntarily has raised the wages of employees 20 per cent. Thus you will find that the causes of the disturbances do not originate with trades-unions or with labor. They are fundamental. Employers and employees are trying to find a true and honest relation between wages and the cost of living.

Every man, if one is, is entitled to a profit. Otherwise than that he never can acquire property, because if it takes all that he can get to live he certainly then has not got what the Constitution guarantees him,—the right to acquire property. Therefore he must have a profit.

Now, while we are drifting about in the world war at the present time here is another very interesting item in this Herald, in the financial column. We have been dealing so much with privileges with classes, it is well to have an eye for a moment on this item which I read:

The agitation among producers of gold for relief from the conditions which surround their industry, created by steadily rising costs, and a fixed price for their product is becoming insistent.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

The financial article goes on to tell what is coming after the war. Well, leave that. If the price of labor was measured by a yardstick, and between one pay-day and the other the yardstick would change does anyone doubt the amount received by labor for its wage would be the same when the yardstick is changed as it was before the change? The yardstick which measures the price for the employer and the employee is changing, has been changing, and probably will continue to change for some time to come. Therefore the fact that there are strikes will continue, and they are bound to continue, until the standard becomes stable.

We are living under the most unusual conditions. It was not many years ago that we were assured that gold was the standard that was stable and that never changed. An election was carried on that theory. The statesmen declared that value could not change; and yet conditions have changed it. There was a time when 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine was a dollar, and it is to-day, and will be until legislation changes it; but as the dollar is created and put into the volume it becomes one of the units, whether it is created by gold or whether it is created by the credit of the system which we have got in this country, and the value of each unit is governed by the law of supply and demand. Now, this is apropos here, for this reason: There will be the continually rising price of labor because of the continually rising price of commodities, caused perhaps by a continual increase in the number of units that measure the price of labor and its products. It means a shifting measure. That brings changed relations between the employer and employee.

What I am trying to show is that you cannot fairly condemn the labor-unions as the cause of all these disturbances; they automatically or involuntarily try to lift the burden that is imposed upon them. If any are to be condemned, it is those who have the valuable privilege and monopoly of demanding and obtaining their own price for their product. Between the two opposite extremes we find trouble. The question is, where did it originate? And, whether there be any condemnation placed on it or not, the certainty is that the troubles originate in the changing of the yardstick. We have spoken here about the wages, but the wage is an incidental. A man works to obtain the necessities of life and to have something left over. If wages do not bring to him these necessities and the profit, do you expect that he will remain contented? Do you expect that compulsory arbitration will change such conditions?

My contention is that there is no necessity to change the principle of voluntary arbitration upon which you now are adjusting these relations.

I take this opportunity to refer to what I was credited as having said,—that the present system was slavery. I am not conscious of having said it. I am conscious of saying only what I now say to this Convention. Standing before you are two men, one of them black, the other white. They both have the same productive capacity; they both offer their services for the same wage. These two men are equal before the law. Does any one contend there was a time when a man, if his flesh was black, was held in slavery? How was he put in slavery? Does any one deny that the slave condition was maintained by the law? It was a physical condition of slavery perpetuated by law. The law made that man a slave. You say he is free now and he never by any process of law can be placed in the condition of slavery again. That is the assertion. Yet that which has been may be again. The black man is no longer a slave because public opinion would not permit that condition to remain. He was a chattel slave, — property at one time, — and I honor your relatives, Mr. Pillsbury, because they stood against human slavery. There were many of Massachusetts leaders who fought slavery, — Whittier, Wendell Phillips, Lucy Stone, Susan Anthony, Lloyd Garrison, and many others stood with Parker Pillsbury. We honor them. The State honors them. The State is proud of gathering into monuments the rocks that were thrown at those who obstructed in the streets the enforcement of the law to return a slave. The fathers are proud to go to the monument with children and point to the statue of Lloyd Garrison; but they often forget to tell them that it is made up of rocks that their fathers threw at Lloyd Garrison while he was living. Those thus honored were in their day law-breakers. They received stolen property in concealing the slave; but they obeyed "the higher law." They found in the higher law their justification for violating the human law as it then stood. Is it not possible that the higher law justifies the acts of labor which Mr. Underhill condemns? The labor men believe that "the higher law" demands better living conditions for men, women and children. You hear it expounded here in different ways. You may hear it expounded by a socialist, by one who was a socialist and has nearly gotten over the attack, by a Republican, by a "pure and simple," as one has said, possibly by one who thinks he is pure, and who is not so sure that he is simple. You may go all the way through, but you find underlying the trades-union movement humanitarian ideas. They want to uplift the man who is in a condition in which he ought not to be. The wage is merely incidental. There is not an equality in the contending sides of wages demanded and wages given. An aggregation of capital, controlled by three or four men, can agree to do something to evade a decision, and there is no proof of it left behind; that would happen in a decree for compulsory arbitration. They can get outside of the decree. An aggregation of men in labor-unions without money cannot get rid of the decree. There is no equality here. Many a man is compelled to work for his daily bread and nothing else, and never even by the strictest frugality can accumulate much of anything. Worse than that, to meet the expenses of the family, woman, the daughter or wife of the working-man, often is obliged to work and submit to the conditions that exist in some of the mills or factories. If this is the best we can get out of civilization I would not have much respect for civilization. Woman, angel as she is, is compelled to go down and work because her wages are needed with those of the father to support the children. When unions enter a protest, and try to alter these objectionable conditions or to get better wages, the opposition comes forward to say there is no such thing as slavery. I have been nearly thirty years in the labor movement, I have been the greater length of that time bearing the international typographical card. I have been twice president of my Typographical Union, secretary of my Central for a long time, more than twenty years sitting in that Central, hardly losing an evening at their meetings. I think I know something about conciliation; and the difference between voluntary and compulsory arbitration. Right you are, Mr. Delegate from Wellesley and the other delegates who say this question is important. Why, you do not know what may be coming like a cloud on the clear sky. In my own city the unions were at work. They are under an arbitration agreement. There came a difference about wages; the union stood by its contract. The men, strange to say, meet entirely aside from the union, and proceed on their own course to strike and not wait for an orderly determination. They have contributed for twenty years to the building of the theory that all parts of a shoe shall be under one union jurisdiction, yet, because of unusual conditions, we are threatened to-day with the tearing down of the whole of the upbuilding.

Mr. MacMaster of Bridgewater: I should like to ask the delegate, having in mind the situation in his own city at the present time, if it would not be a good thing to have some tribunal that could adjudicate that situation, with power to carry into effect its decree of adjudication.

Mr. Brown: I will answer the gentleman. While all government is force, and in the last analysis I suppose you would say that force has got to govern, my contention is, No. There is only one way we can settle that, and that is by the appeal to reason. At present the only issue is right here: The workers have broken a contract. “You have broken a contract,” say all the unions there on the outside, “and you are endangering our conciliation, you are endangering our collective bargaining. You are endangering everything. Go back to work. You do not know your grievance. You say you want such a wage. Well, but your contract provides for arbitration, and then you will know whether you do or do not get the wage you demand.” For the time being there are men who have sufficient influence not even to allow the other side to speak. Possibly you tell me: “Why, that is your city that a little while ago you were proclaiming as a city of brotherly love!” That is true. This trouble comes out of a clear sky. It is liable to come anywhere.

My idea has been from the beginning that we talk over this great question here. You have an opportunity to convert the labor people just as much as the labor people have to convert you. All men, all men who amount to anything, have got some faith in their own ideas, faith in those ideas even when the rope is around their neck, as Garrison had it. On the declaration that labor is property, I have an idea that Abraham Lincoln would say: “My hand penned the word ‘emancipation’. The idea was from the Everlasting. The figment of a fiction that the labor of a human being is property is as weak and thin as a broth made of the breastbone of a chicken that starved to death.” Abolitionists had decided ideas on this theory that human flesh was property. I can sympathize with your legal minds that law has said so, and for stability it ought to remain so; but I shall continue to maintain that law may give such an undue advantage to those who want to oppress labor that the result may be a condition equal to slavery.

Propositions for voluntary conciliation and arbitration have come from the labor-unions. They never have objected to them. They have abided by them. They have helped to build them up. That is peaceable voluntary arbitration. Compulsory arbitration are two opposing words. They do not go together. I have tried to show that it is the spirit of harmony and the spirit of conciliation, the influence of reason,—not force,—that brings men together.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: Debate on this very interesting and important subject began about this time on Thursday afternoon: We have now given to it nearly ten hours, twice as much, if my memory serves me, as has been given to any other topic before the Convention at this session. In view of that fact, and in the hope that members have been illuminated enough by the interesting arguments we have heard, I move the previous question.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I have not got very much to say upon this question, but I wish to state, in view of the criticisms that have been made here this morning by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) in comparing the Act of 1914 with this proposed amendment No. 220, in which he said that law was an attempt to legalize unlawful combinations, that I was a member of that House of 1914, and had heard all the pros and cons on this question when we enacted the substance of the document under discussion, No. 220, into the laws of that year, and that we had then, at that time, a Governor to whom must be given great credit, for in spite of a great deal of pressure of big business from a great many directions, trying to make him veto that law, he had the courage of his convictions and made that the law of Massachusetts in so far as the Legislature and the Governor could do so. That law was discussed and thoroughly understood by the members of that House and by all of the people of Massachusetts. It was the courts that said afterwards that the law as enacted in 1914 was unconstitutional. Now the labor people are doing the only thing they can do, and act intelligently, to make that law constitutional and strip it for all time of the doubt of whether labor is property or a commodity. Labor says: "That is what we are aiming at; we want the substance of the law of 1914, which the courts have said is unconstitutional. We want that law made constitutional. That is the only question involved here. Labor wants that law that was enacted in 1914 made constitutional. The only intelligent way that we can have that law made constitutional, as we have been advised by our attorneys, is to have that law or its essence as passed in 1914 embodied in our Constitution." That is the plain proposition before this Convention, and that is what labor asks you to vote for. It is not any far-fetched idea, it is not any idea that is repugnant to common sense, repugnant to justice; it is asking that a law that was adopted in a Massachusetts Legislature by a large majority of both branches may become constitutional.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I sincerely hope this Convention will vote down the amendment moved by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish). The American Federation of Labor came to this Convention asking bread, and if we adopt the substitution of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) we are giving them a stone. If we are not prepared to write into the Constitution what organized labor desires in the shape of No. 220 let us simply say so, but let us not add insult to our action by thrusting down their throat, or attempting to thrust down their throat, the compulsory arbitration proposition which organized labor has fought for years. Now they have come here asking that the courts shall be restrained from interfering in certain of their activities. If we are not prepared to give them that, let us say so and vote down everything. Let us not, however, turn around and say: "We will force the General Court to take cognizance of these activities that you want no court to act upon. We will force the General Court to act upon them." In other words, we are not only refusing to do what labor wants done, but we are doing the thing that they do not want done, if we substitute the amendment of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish). Let us vote down the substitution of that amendment, and then let us do as we choose about No. 220.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: The proposition is a very simple one, and much of the debate has been utterly ungermane to it. As I understand the scope of the amendment moved by the delegate from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) it in very simple and general language seeks to give additional power to the Legislature to enact legislation which will tend to check industrial disputes or disturbances which arise through strikes, lockouts, boycotts and other interruptions of industry. If there is any one thing in which the people of this Commonwealth are interested to-day it is surely that one thing, and I say very earnestly that if we refuse the people of this Commonwealth an opportunity to express their feeling upon this general question we are very derelict in our duty. I cannot understand why any representative of labor here should arise in his place and oppose a proposition which would give to the people of this Commonwealth an opportunity to express their opinion upon this question.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I desire to ask the gentleman this question: Are you prepared, if labor will agree with you to send down your question of compulsory arbitration, to send down as an alternative proposition our measure declaring that labor is not property, — send both down to the people? Are you in favor of that?

Mr. Jones: The specific question of compulsory arbitration is not now pending before this Convention. It may be that a remedy could be found, it may be short of compulsory arbitration, just as it has been found in Canada. My understanding of the Canadian industrial disputes act is, after considerable investigation, that it has been productive of great good. It is not a compulsory arbitration act in its strict sense; it is more a compulsory investigation act, and no strike can be had until the matter in dispute is investigated and an opinion is given by some independent tribunal.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: Will the delegate add, in the sincerity of his talk, a word on his proposition regulating hours of labor? I am opposed to it, but I ask him if he will put that on his resolution with this.

Mr. Jones: All these questions, if this amendment should be adopted by the people, will come ultimately before the Legislature of this Commonwealth, and there the whole question can be threshed out and decided. Now the power of the Legislature is distinctly lacking. I think we all recognize that it is a good thing to have our board of arbitration and conciliation. I understand my friend in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) to admit that it is, and to say that perhaps as a result of conference the powers of that board may be enlarged. Now, suppose it should turn out and the decision should be that the powers of that board should be enlarged by giving them some power to enforce their decree. That power is lacking now in our Constitution. I sincerely trust that this very simple general proposition of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) will be adopted, and that the people of this Commonwealth will have an opportunity to express themselves upon this all important question in our social and industrial life.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I do not care to qualify or modify in any way my remarks of Friday. Some attempt has been made to answer me on the floor of this assembly to-day. I leave it to the Convention as to the success of the answer. There are one or two things, however, I should like to touch upon in the minute that remains. One is to ask the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Moriarty) to explain how a young man of nineteen years of age now flying in France could have received word of the Lynn strike and sent back a letter commending the action of the strikers at this time, particularly when the age limit, as I understand it from personal investigation, is twenty-one years and the government distinctly refuses to enlist men under that age in the aviation service. Now, sir, he can answer in his own time, not in mine.

There is another thing also that I should like to mention regarding his statement, that is, that my speech, as he dignified it, of Friday was prepared, and that I was acting as the mouthpiece of certain interests. My speech was not prepared, only so far as listening during the morning session had prepared me to reply to those who had spoken. As for being the mouthpiece of somebody else, I plead guilty, sir, to the indictment. I speak as the mouthpiece of the independent worker, of the man who is trying to run a small manufacturing business, of the small tradesman, the salesmen, clerks, stenographers, teachers, doctors, ministers and many, many others. In reply to the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) I will tell him why the city of Somerville did not come across with its quota for Liberty bonds. It is true I represent the unorganized workers, and they are just as important to the community as union workers; but, sir, while the union workers are trying to lift themselves by their boot straps with round after round of increased wages and increased cost of living and then increased wages, the wages and the income of these people for whom I speak remains stationary and the pay of the soldier remains stationary, and his family at home are bearing the added burdens of the increased cost of living.

And so, sir, my good city of Somerville did not quite reach its quota, but we have over 5,000 boys in the service, 5,000 men from our little city over there, and they are working, most of them, for $30 a month. I am proud of the record of my city. We do not place our patriotism upon a financial basis, how much we put into Liberty bonds that these boys when they come home have got to pay for through taxation in the years to come. That is not the way we measure our patriotism, sir, nor do we measure it by lip service; we measure it by action and sacrifice. The accusations I made against labor are intended for those whom the coat fits, and they can put it on. If their service consists in buying Liberty bonds and in hot air promises and they are satisfied with that kind of patriotism, then, sir, let the present and the future judge whether they are acting right and honestly and patriotically at this particular time. I am willing to give credit to labor-unions for what they have done for the improvement of the human race in years gone by, but, sir, I denounce, as I did on Friday, the effort to throttle needed production and the disloyalty of strikes on war work.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I rise to clear up one or two things that I think should be cleared up. I have no personal motive in this. I gave little thought to this matter until last Friday, and from that time I have given every spare minute I had to it.

Now, I am friendly to labor. I remember when labor used to say: "Look at our hard condition, our low wages, our suffering families. Capital is not giving us a square deal. We are ready to arbitrate; capital is not willing to arbitrate." And they got our sympathy because they were willing to trust to the decision of an impartial tribunal, and so we had our legislation to curb the trusts, and so we gave our sympathy to organized labor and to labor in general. But to-day what do they say? What does the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Moriarty) say in answer to my question when I ask him if he prefers to continue strikes and lockouts, boycotts and black-lists, to peaceful arbitration? He says he wants peaceful arbitration, but if that does not get what he wants then he wants the right to do the other thing. I submit that if organized labor is going to take the position that organized capital did a few years ago when they said: "My property is my own, I can do what I please with my own, I will have my own way with my own"—if organized labor is going to take that position we might as well meet them to-day and tell them that they are living in America, and that in America organized labor, organized capital, every other organization, must submit to the welfare of the whole. [Applause.]

It would be too bad indeed if organized labor were forced to go into politics. I think that is why we adopted the initiative and referendum,—I voted for it,—so that organized labor, so that every person in the State, could have an opportunity to correct and supplement legislation if the Legislature failed. I think that they are in politics now. We all ought to be in politics.

The suggestion of the gentleman from Boston, who sometimes is described as the gentleman from ward 8 (Mr. Lomasney), is that he will oppose this thing because the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) happens to believe in the appointive rather than the elective system, which is not at issue at all in this amendment. I think that is about the weakest argument that ever came from him. I always thought his arguments were strong, but I submit that there is not much virtue in that argument.

Mr. O'Connell of Salem: The gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Bodfish) who has submitted the amendment for compulsory arbitration says that he is a friend of labor, and mentions labor-unions. I was about to ask the gentleman if he knew what constituted a labor-union. There is no closed door to labor-unions. What we, the members of labor-unions, have come here for, in asking that the injunction clause be eliminated, is for the benefit of those who hereafter may come into labor organizations. The gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) says he represents a non-union district. Is there any good reason to believe that a year from to-day Somerville may not be a strictly union district, and will he have any method or any way of extinguishing the growth toward trade-unionism if his constituents appear desirous of joining hands with those who already are in it? Is it a question of what has made labor-unions? That question is a fundamental one. Human rights, the feeling that human people want what belongs to them, have made men and women band themselves together.

They say that our patriotism is only lip patriotism and in the buying of Liberty bonds. I want to say here that from a small organization of 35,000 men of which I am a member we had on the 22d day of last May 8,500 members in the service. We have our brothers and we have those dear to us over there. And we are not stopping the wheels of industry. We have done more to bring about coöperation and to bring about a maximum production than any other element in this Nation to-day. The administration at Washington on every occasion and all occasions when it wanted to bring about that maximum production has called upon the leaders of organized labor or those who have been in a position to leave to go there and suggest, and they have responded and have been in accord. They have suggested for the best and they have done their utmost. It seems shameful at this time that those who are in the group of organized labor should be condemned, should be antagonized. Antagonism is not what we need to-day. Antagonism will not bring around what is fundamentally right. We need further coöperation. We need less antagonism. We need an intermingling of our different views.

Compulsory arbitration has been submitted as a substitute for the original resolution. I do not think it is germane to the question. I think that there should be a division of the question. I do not think the time is here for compulsory arbitration. If compulsory arbitration must be made constitutional, then to my mind our present form of arbitration under statute law must be unconstitutional. If I were one of the most intelligent and well-educated men of the Convention I believe I could be better able to speak upon this subject, but I feel that I know my rights as a laboring man. I know what drove me into a labor-union,— seeing working people trodden down! And I have done my utmost since my association and affiliations with labor-unions to bring about a better spirit for the uplift of this country, for the uplift of the working-man and for the benefit of the business man. If there must be compulsory arbitration, if there must be arbitration on wages, then there must be arbitration upon the selling price of the product of that labor, there must be conscription of both. There cannot be one of one and none of the other. There must be fairness, or it is unconstitutional, and the constitutionality of these things is the question we are arguing upon.

I feel that we ought to divide the question. We ought to eliminate the compulsory arbitration amendment until we have gone further into the merits of it. This is a big affair. It is an affair that many men can study to some degree and express themselves upon far better than they have expressed themselves to-day, and some of the intelligent men of this Convention can read and learn much upon this question. I believe that on the question of injunctions we feel that we have been enjoined improperly by some of the courts. We believe that honest, true men, men who have been welcomed into the States and who are fine citizens here, are entitled to more than being enjoined when they believe they are standing for human rights. This is a moral question, not a question of law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER: There are two minutes left for debate.

Mr. MORTON: I do not want to take half that time. All I want to do is to correct a false impression. I did not say that that boy was flying in France. He is in the service, flying in this country,—practicing flying.

Mr. DONOVAN of Springfield: I have just a short time. I wish I had more time, so that I could give this Convention the truth in regard to the situation with the General Electric Company in Lynn. That matter has been dragged into the debate, and it would be well that the delegates should understand what the situation is, what caused the walkout. The reason for it is this: The United States government has adopted a labor policy which the general manager of the Lynn plant refused to put into effect in that plant. As a result of that policy certain men and women working in the plant attempted, as was guaranteed them by the policy, to form a labor organization for the purpose of collective bargaining. They were discharged; sixteen or more were discharged during the past two weeks. Two thousand men had been drafted into the army, and they were receiving from $18 to $35 a week. Their places were taken by women, who received on the average from $10 to $12 a week. These women were the first to walk out.

Mr. LOWELL of Newton: I have only a few words to say.

In the first place, as to the anti-injunction part of it. I need not repeat what my sentiments are as to that. I merely ask every delegate who does not believe in giving labor organizations entire control of the Commonwealth to vote against it.

As to the other,—compulsory arbitration,—I must preface my few remarks with the statement that what I say is merely my personal belief, because we had no very extended discussion about it and it is not a matter on which the committee on Labor stands as a committee. I believe the majority was against it; I am not quite sure even of that fact. As to compulsory arbitration my position, and it is merely my own position I am stating, is this: Compulsory arbitration, as every one knows and the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) has very well stated, is an absurdity in terms. It is compelling free will. That may not be any objection to it provided public opinion has gone far enough to support it, but in my opinion the public of this Commonwealth has not gone far enough to support a system whereby the decision of an arbitration court should be enforced by force; and therefore, to my mind, compulsory arbitration in its extremest form is not yet ripe for consideration in this Commonwealth. As to the form which they have in Canada, which as I understand it is merely keeping the wheels of industry going for two or three weeks until the matter shall be submitted to an arbitration tribunal, and after that enforcing it merely by public opinion and not by an officer armed with a club, as to that it is my opinion that we have plenty of constitutional authority for it. So that I merely say that I shall vote against it, because I do not think we are ready for an extreme form of it; and the milder form of it, if the Legislature should wish to pass it, seems to me entirely constitutional.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I rise to a point of order.

The Presiding Officer: The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. Harriman: My point of order is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) cannot be acted on without prejudicing the matter No. 220; in other words, that the amendment of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) is not germane, in so much as No. 267, not having a provision for compulsory arbitration, is fortified against it.

The Presiding Officer: I shall rule the point of order not well taken.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Before voting on the amendment which is now before the Convention, I should like to know whether it imposes upon the Legislature the duty of establishing some system of compulsory arbitration, or whether it merely invests the Legislature with the discretion of doing that. Perhaps the Secretary will read it.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bodfish was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 97 to 112.

The resolution (No. 220) was rejected Tuesday, July 23, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 126 to 79.

At the next session, Wednesday, July 24, Mr. Jones of Melrose moved that the Convention reconsider the vote by which it had rejected the resolution.

Mr. Jones: The Convention realizes the parliamentary situation of this matter. My desire is to bring before the Convention, if possible, the amendment proposed by the delegate from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) which embodied a principle which, if adopted by the people, would give to the Legislature some power to enact legislation which would check industrial disputes, strikes and lockouts. The Convention having by a very narrow margin rejected that amendment and also rejected the resolution of the committee, it becomes necessary, in order to get the amendment of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) before the Convention, to first reconsider the action of the Convention upon the resolution.

I feel that this is a very serious situation. The delegate from Newton (Mr. Lowell) yesterday in the last few moments that he had made certain statements to which of course there was no opportunity of making a reply, and I felt perhaps that his statement that the Legislature had ample power now to enact legislation along the line of the Canadian industrial disputes act was somewhat questionable. If the Legislature in consideration of his question should attempt to evolve some legislation along the line of the Canadian act, it would involve compulsory investigation. It does seem to me that it is at least questionable whether any board or tribunal can be set up in this Commonwealth, and that power given to it, without some constitutional enlargement of authority, and I do not think that the statement of the delegate from Newton in the third division (Mr. Lowell) ought to be taken as an exact statement of fact. I see no harm whatever in allowing the people to pass upon this very grave and important question, and I feel that if there is any doubt as to the constitutional power of the Legislature to set up some tribunal which shall correspond to the tribunal which is set up by the Canadian industrial disputes act, that matter should be cleared up now. For that reason, because it is such a vitally important matter, and a matter in which the people of this Commonwealth are so vitally interested, I do feel, as I said yesterday, that the Convention would be derelict in its duty to the public if it should let this opportunity pass without trying to do something to remedy this great evil and giving the people of the Commonwealth an opportunity to pass their opinion upon it.

For this reason I have moved to reconsider the action of the Convention upon the resolution, and if that motion should prevail, why, then I should move to reconsider the action of the Convention upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Barnstable in the fourth division (Mr. Bodfish).

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: I hope that the delegates to the Convention will not vote in favor of reconsideration. We have given a good deal of time to discussing this question. We had a well attended meeting here yesterday afternoon, we had a vote by yeas and nays, and the men voted as they felt, showed their feeling on it. I do not believe in wasting any more time on the subject, because there is another resolution, I believe by a minority report of a committee, further down, that will have to come up again for discussion by the Convention. I may say the same as the delegate in the second division (Mr. Jones) just said. If the delegates to the Convention want to be consistent and want to give to the people a square deal, why not take the same feeling on the injunction amendment that you want to take on the other, and let the people vote on that, and decide whether they shall have anything to say in the time of labor disputes about the matter of issuing injunctions. Now, I am perfectly contented with the discussion that took place here and the square deal we got in this Convention, and the opportunity for every labor man to speak on the subject. We were treated manly and fairly, although defeated. I believe that the Convention discussed the question so well and was so well attended yesterday that it showed the feeling from the hearts of the delegates to the Convention. I trust that the motion for reconsideration will be defeated.

Mr. SAWYER of Ware: I should like just to call the attention of this Convention to the fact that if we reconsider and put this matter on the calendar it will provoke one of the hottest fights that this Convention has had and will make our duties at least a week longer than they should be. If we want to assume for ourselves the burden of an extra week's work in hot weather, let us reconsider. If we are satisfied with the lengthy debate of yesterday and the roll-call votes on two phases of the proposition, why, we have at least a very good excuse for not wanting to remain here one more week. And as for the main question of compulsory arbitration, I fear that the gentleman who advocates it has not looked the matter entirely through. It would mean to accentuate the warfare between capital and labor, revive it in its most bitter form, throw it and thrust it into the politics of our State, and nothing could be worse in these times of warfare than to provoke such a quarrel between capital and labor.

Mr. DRESSER of Worcester: I agree with the statement of the chairman of the committee in this division (Mr. Lowell) that the Legislature now has power to do what may be necessary in the matter of compulsory arbitration. If we recall the decision of the court in the
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES.

Adamson case, or the case that had to do with the Adamson law, there is marked out there a perfectly plain and distinct path which looks toward the establishment of compulsory adjustment of every dispute relating certainly to public utilities. To-day, so far as all industries which have to do with war work are concerned, the Federal government is taking steps to care for the matter so far as it may, and it seems to me that it is the better course to let those steps proceed and not to cumber our Constitution with a provision that I think legally is unnecessary and practically, for many years, would be useless. I hope that the matter will not be reconsidered.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I wish first to correct the impression of my friend from Boston in this division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) that there is another compulsory arbitration measure coming on. He refers, I suppose, to the resolution submitted by a minority of the joint committees on Labor and Judicial Procedure, which heard the labor injunction resolutions, submitted by a minority of that committee as part of document No. 337; but the committee have not formally put that resolution before the Convention and the matter to which it relates is now disposed of, so that my friend from Boston (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) is mistaken, I think, in his supposition that another compulsory arbitration measure is coming on, under which the subject can be reconsidered.

The question whether to reconsider, as moved by my friend from Melrose (Mr. Jones) is a difficult question. I cannot but sympathize with the motion, because it is quite clear from a slight examination of the roll-call of yesterday that if there had not been such a deplorable number of absentees, the proposal of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) would have been carried by a considerable majority, as I think it ought to have been. The gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) says that if the question is reopened we shall reopen the warfare between labor and capital in its bitterest form. Does he not understand, does not the Convention understand, that we cannot shrink from any proper action here for any such reason as that? Any question in controversy, and especially a momentous question of this character, must be fought out at any cost until it is settled, and settled right. That is the way we carry on our government, and it is the only way to carry it on. To return to the pending motion, I do not know that I can express my own view of it and my own feeling about it any more shortly than by saying that while I sympathize with the motion of my friend from Melrose (Mr. Jones) I should not have made it, under the present circumstances.

Mr. Dean of Fall River: I trust that the motion of the gentleman from Melrose (Mr. Jones) will prevail. In regard to the statements of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Sawyer) that this will promote warfare, I take a somewhat different view. This whole matter of compulsory arbitration is designed to stop warfare. What we have now is a duel between capital and labor. Under compulsory arbitration what you have is an orderly manner of settling disputes without warfare. That is the merit of this proposition and why we ought to give it every possible consideration. It produces a more stable condition, just the sort of thing that ought to be produced by a written Constitution. Give your General Court power to deal with this situation.

I am at a loss to understand labor's position in this matter, and their objection to compulsory arbitration. Is it because they are afraid of words,—the word compulsory? I take it they are not. The court is compulsory. The court sits and passes judgment as between man and man, and that means order, it means safety to the people who live in the Commonwealth. Now labor comes in here and says that it objects to the court dealing with injunctions. We say: “You shall have a new tribunal, which shall have authority to settle this matter.” Certainly labor wants to have peace. The only way that I can see that labor can possibly object to this matter is because it might weaken to some extent the importance of labor-unions, in that that constant strike and friction which persist so generally may be reduced, and the importance of the individual labor leader may be lessened. Now, that is not an evil, and the man who is working, the laborer, wants just that sort of thing.

And before I sit down I want to say a word about what the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) said the other day. He seemed to pin his whole case on the manner in which the arbitrators were to be selected. If he will study the Bodfish amendment, he will see that there is nothing in that amendment that prevents the election of arbitrators, and that is what he wants. I want him to tell us, I see he is about to speak, if his whole objection to this amendment rests upon this matter of the appointment of arbitrators. Does he not approve of the General Court, that he protects so strongly here, having power to deal with this situation?

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: I believe, where you make a compromise, that each side should give and take. Now, what is the question here? I do not represent organized labor. The question is,—and you might as well face it,—who is to select the court that is going to pass on these questions? Let us assume that the Governor is to appoint the court. Then who will control the Governor? Who will have his ear? Do you suppose a Governor in the State ever lived who did not have his close friends in whom he confided? Of course not. Why are judges elected in so many States all over the country? Because the laboring classes prefer to trust the people rather than the Governor. Now, if you men representing privilege in this Convention, or capital if you want to term it such, want to have compulsory arbitration, why do you not trust the people of the State to elect this board which is to carry out the law affecting the interests of capital and labor?

I put the question frankly to the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) who for years has ably represented many of the corporations of the State. In asking him if the clients with whom he has been associated would be willing to allow the people of the State to elect this board, he frankly said: “No, we will not let the people of the State elect the board.” Why? Because, as these corporations say: “We cannot control the people all the time.” That is the reason.

That was his position when he said that he would not trust the people of the State to elect this board. Then how can you find fault with labor, or men who sympathize with labor, in not supporting a position such as this, when it is sought to drive them into accepting compulsory arbitration before a board which the Governor is going to appoint? If you want to compromise you should strike a half-way spirit of fairness. It seems to me that if you allow the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) to put his amendment into the Constitution then it should be provided therein that the board should be elected by the voters of the State, rather than leaving this matter to the Legislature to pass a law creating a board which would be selected by the Governor or by some corporation interest. That is where I think the weakness is in this amendment. I think if you left the question of compulsory arbitration to a board not elected by the people of the State, then you would be in this position: You would be saying that you could not trust the people of the State to elect a board favorable to the best interests of the State. But I say that in my opinion the people can be trusted to elect such a board.

Now, I do not care whether you reconsider this question or not, but those of us who have been here pretty nearly every day ought to realize that there is a day of final reckoning. We fought this matter out yesterday. We were here, and both sides were beaten. One side was beaten on one proposition, one side on the other. Some of the most conservative men in this Convention voted against one proposition and some against the other. I can see no reason to reconsider our action. If we do, the question will drag along, and will take three or four more days of our time. It seems to me, if we are going to get through here, we should say that this case has had its day in court. If we start reconsiderations now, we shall have it pointed out later that we have done it in this case and have established a bad precedent. I hope reconsideration will not prevail.

Mr. UNDERHILL of Somerville: To get back to the question of reconsideration, on yesterday I voted for the Bodfish amendment, although I knew positively that it was of no particular use to write it into the Constitution, for, sir, in the early session of the Legislature of last year I introduced to that body a bill calling for compulsory arbitration during the war. The bill was along the lines of the Canadian arbitration act, and followed it very closely, with some more liberal provisions to labor than that act contained. It was a bill drawn by myself on my own initiative, and was presented to the committee on Labor and argued before that committee. No one raised the question, either in the committee or later in debate upon the floor of the House, as to the constitutionality of the proposition. Labor was before the committee in force and opposed the proposition, as they always have and as they have a right to do. On the other hand, the general public were not sufficiently interested to appear there in large numbers. It is true a delegation representing the Taunton Central Labor-Union advocated it because they had been locked out. It is true also that a number of small manufacturers advocated it, and I had letters from some of the interested citizens of the Commonwealth backing up the proposition. But, sir, when it came before the Legislature for action and I tried to get the negative report of the committee changed and the bill substituted, there was hardly a voice raised with mine in support of the measure. Now, sir, if the members of the Convention are particularly interested in this form of legislation let me suggest to them that unless labor is able next fall to carry out its threats and defeat me for the House I shall be here at the next session of the Legislature, I shall introduce the selfsame bill, and I welcome, not only welcome but urge, all of you who are honestly and earnestly concerned or interested in the matter to come up here and give me a little lift on the proposition. It is not necessary that we shall have reconsideration in order that this matter may have favorable action before the Legislature.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) if he introduced that bill knowing that the War Labor Board, the Federal commission formed for the purpose of taking up industrial disputes during the time of war, already had been appointed, and that it would come under Federal jurisdiction rather than under State jurisdiction, particularly in the industries that were doing war work.

Mr. Underhill: That board had not been appointed when I introduced the bill, nor had it been appointed up to the time of the hearing, for no objection was raised by labor on the ground that the Federal jurisdiction would take care of the matter. It was simply that they were opposed to the general proposition of compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Morgan of Boston: It seems to me that in view of the consideration that was given this proposition prior to the vote taken yesterday, the merits of the question having been thoroughly threshed out, the only justification for reconsideration at this time is based upon the assumption of the gentleman from Melrose (Mr. Jones), who made the motion, that there is a question as to the constitutional power of the Legislature to treat upon this question. I believe that the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), who has just taken his seat, has sufficiently emphasized the fact that in the judgment of those who are familiar with legislative procedure the Legislature has sufficient power without constitutional authority to settle this problem along the lines desired by some of its advocates, if the Legislature so desires.

The other suggestion, offered by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), that if the absenteeees had been present compulsory arbitration would have prevailed, seems to me so far-fetched that it is not sufficient justification for reconsideration. Therefore, I trust that reconsideration will not prevail.

Mr. Dean of Fall River: I want to take up what the last speaker has said. In the first place, this bill offered in the Legislature by the gentleman in this division (Mr. Underhill) was a bill providing for compulsory investigation; it was not compulsory arbitration. It was drawn along the line of the Canadian act, following out an old principle in practice up there. You may remember that up there they have compulsory investigation before they allow strikes on railroads and public service companies. That is as far as they go, and that is in substance what they have there. This bill went further, as I remember it now, but it was along that line. Now, there is grave question in regard to the constitutional power of this Legislature to deal with compulsory arbitration, and I want to remind the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) that the policy which seems to have been adopted here is to write into the Constitution and to give to the General Court power to deal with these questions where there is any possible doubt about their constitutional authority to deal with them. The best possible illustration of that is the report of the committee on Social Insurance. The chairman of that committee (Mr. Washburn of Worcester) came in here with a long amendment in which he set out a number of specific propositions, stating that he personally did not favor any of them; but he said, in view of the possibility of doubt as to the constitutional power of the General Court to deal with them, he had prepared this amendment and presented it in that form. Now, going as far as he did in that amendment, it seems to me that in this case it clearly is justified in writing this amendment into the Constitution.

Mr. Whitehead of Fall River: I should like to ask the gentleman if he would state here that if we reconsider this measure, if it does not mean compulsory arbitration, and not simply compulsory investigation, because labor-unions are not opposed to compulsory investigation, but they are opposed to compulsory arbitration. I will vote in favor of this if I am satisfied on what you say that it is only a matter of compulsory investigation and not compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Dean: My friend from Fall River (Mr. Whitehead) misunderstands me. This is a matter of compulsory arbitration. That ought to be made clear. It gives the General Court power to provide for compulsory investigation or compulsory arbitration, and those of us who are standing behind this measure say that it is the only constructive proposition that has been advanced to solve this eternal problem that we have between capital and labor, and we believe it is a peaceable, stable way of dealing with the proposition.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: Will the delegate allow a question? Does not the State Board of Arbitration and Conciliation now have by legislation control of compulsory investigation of strikes and lockouts in this Commonwealth?

Mr. Dean: I am not an authority on this matter, but, as I understand your present State Board of Conciliation and Arbitration, the two parties to the dispute have to seek their aid to have them come in, and that the great trouble is they have not sufficient power to really clean the matter up. The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) said the other day that he would favor a proposition, as I remember it, to reorganize this Board of Conciliation and Arbitration and create a proper bureau to deal with this situation. Now let me say that when you get that bureau created what you need to make it effective is just this sort of amendment.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: The plan of compulsory arbitration allures many, because apparently it holds out the hope of solving the difficulties that arise between labor and capital. The trouble with the proposition here is that it does not go far enough. It is our duty in this Convention not only to establish the principle but also to establish how that principle shall be invoked. The labor element is right in distrusting the proposal in the form in which it is presented here, because it simply hands over to the Legislature a power which, in the opinion of a great many respectable authorities, the Legislature now possesses, and up to the present time has not seen fit to put into operation. In view of the fact that we have taken what might be called the extreme view of the labor men and rejected it, and at the same time rejected this alluring proposition from a person who holds himself out as a friend of labor, we have followed a wise course, we ought not to take the proposition of compulsory arbitration and jam it down the throat of labor at this time and in this hall. I believe that many of us here who voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) yesterday voted against it.
INJUNCTIONS AND LABOR DISPUTES. 1165

because of the uncertainty of the manner in which it might be invoked. I would be prepared to vote now for a proposition of compulsory arbitration that carried with it a provision that a board or court created for that purpose should be elected by the people. Otherwise it presents too many dangers, dangers of creating unrest, and possibly something more, on the part of organized labor. It does not present any guarantee that organized labor shall be protected in what they regard as their proper rights.

It seems to me that the motion to reconsider should be defeated.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I want to say that I did not know that the motion to reconsider was going to be made. I had intended to take up this fight again under No. 284, for it seems to me that if there is any justification for minimum wages and shorter hours, there is a justification for some means of settling all disputes between capital and labor. I want to say that I was surprised at the delegate from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) directing his question to the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) as to the way in which the board that might adjust these differences would be selected. The way the amendment is drawn leaves it open entirely, and in the hands of the General Court. Though labor men fear the General Court it seems to me that that is no reason why we should not have some settlement of their difficulties. There is no reason why the General Court may not, if it finds it necessary or proper or expedient, provide for an elective system of selecting those who shall carry out the purposes of the amendment. The amendment is simply broad enough to allow the Legislature to deal with the question that may arise, and if they find one solution not sufficient they may try another. I have confidence in the General Court, especially with the initiative and referendum, which may be adopted, by which we may control or supervise or supplement their action. I have no fear of the General Court if the initiative and referendum fails. I think the General Court still will continue to treat us right, and it seems to me that this matter should be left to it. Suppose it should establish a tribunal like the Industrial Accident Board, with an appeal to the courts. Is there any fault to be found with that? It seems to me that this thing must be placed in the hands of the General Court, with full power to provide compulsory methods of settling the disputes between capital and labor.

The motion to reconsider was negatived.
