The date shows when this volume was taken.
To renew this book copy the call No. and give to the librarian.

HOME USE RULES

All Books subject to recall

All borrowers must register in the library to borrow books for home use.

All books must be returned at end of college year for inspection and repairs.

Limited books must be returned within the four week limit and not renewed.

Students must return all books before leaving town. Officers should arrange for the return of books wanted during their absence from town.

Volumes of periodicals and of pamphlets are held in the library as much as possible. For special purposes they are given out for a limited time.

Borrowers should not use their library privileges for the benefit of other persons.

Books of special value and gift books, when the giver wishes it, are not allowed to circulate.

Readers are asked to report all cases of books marked or mutilated.

Do not deface books by marks and writing.
The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

http://www.archive.org/details/cu31924025080007
DEBATES
IN THE MASSACHUSETTS
CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION
1917-1918
VOLUME III
CHAPTERS XVII TO LXI
Table of Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XVII. — Absentee Voting,</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XVIII. — Compulsory Voting,</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XIX. — Woman Suffrage,</td>
<td>84</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XX. — Biennial Election of General Court,</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXI. — Biennial Elections,</td>
<td>89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXII. — Biennial Sessions of General Court,</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXIII. — Apportionment of Members of the General Court,</td>
<td>159</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXIV. — Decennial Census,</td>
<td>190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXV. — Proportional Representation,</td>
<td>202</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXVI. — Negative of Senate on House,</td>
<td>208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXVII. — Abolition of the Senate,</td>
<td>211</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXVIII. — Adjournments of the General Court,</td>
<td>234</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXIX. — Appointment while in Office,</td>
<td>236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXX. — Recess Committees,</td>
<td>242</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXI. — Administrative Legislation,</td>
<td>314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXII. — Referendum by the General Court,</td>
<td>381</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXIII. — Title of the Legislature,</td>
<td>383</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXIV. — Franchises,</td>
<td>386</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXV. — Homes for Citizens,</td>
<td>403</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXVI. — Official Pensions,</td>
<td>469</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXVII. — Social Insurance,</td>
<td>543</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXVIII. — State Insurance,</td>
<td>619</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XXXIX. — Bill-Board Advertising,</td>
<td>621</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XL. — Intoxicating Liquors,</td>
<td>673</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLI. — Minimum Wage,</td>
<td>674</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLII. — One Day's Rest in Seven,</td>
<td>739</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLIII. — Historic Places,</td>
<td>741</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLIV. — Building Zones,</td>
<td>750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLV. — Power to Impose and Levy Taxes,</td>
<td>757</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLVI. — Compensation of Municipalities for Loss of Taxes on Property</td>
<td>856</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>of Educational Institutions,</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLVII. — Uniform Application of Taxation Laws,</td>
<td>884</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLVIII. — Powers of the Governor,</td>
<td>887</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>XLIX. — Removal of Certain Officials,</td>
<td>1008</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>IV</td>
<td>Chapter L. — Pardons</td>
<td>1011</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LI. — Abolition of the Council</td>
<td>1016</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LII. — Women as Notaries Public</td>
<td>1018</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LIII. — Administration of State's Business</td>
<td>1021</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LIV. — Selections for the Public Service</td>
<td>1107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LV. — State Budget</td>
<td>1141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LVI. — Loaning the Public Credit</td>
<td>1217</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LVII. — Officers of the Militia</td>
<td>1235</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LVIII. — Powers of the Commander-in-Chief</td>
<td>1272</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LIX. — Amendments by General Court</td>
<td>1279</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LX. — Future Conventions</td>
<td>1281</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter</td>
<td>Chapter LXI. — Identification of Amendments</td>
<td>1302</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
XVII.

ABSENTEE VOTING.

Messrs. Roland D. Sawyer of Ware, Herbert Parker of Lancaster, Charles O. Bailey of Newbury and David I. Walsh of Fitchburg presented resolutions numbered, respectively, 42, 58, 125 and 289, which were referred to the committee on Suffrage.

On the 17th of July the committee reported that Resolution No. 58, presented by Mr. Parker of Lancaster, ought to be adopted as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have power to provide by law for voting by qualified voters of the Commonwealth who are absent from the city or town of which they are inhabitants at the time of an election, in the choice of any officer to be elected or upon any question to be voted on at that election.

On the 18th of September the resolution was discharged from the Committee of the Whole without debate and it was considered by the Convention on the following day.

Mr. Lincoln Bryant of Milton moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "Commonwealth", the words "in the military or naval service of the United States or Commonwealth of Massachusetts".

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "Commonwealth", the words "and for all persons who have taken out their first naturalization papers in time of war".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. E. Philip Finn of Chelsea moved that the resolution be amended by inserting before the word "elected", the words "nominated or".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

The General Court may pass any law in addition to the foregoing provisions if any shall in practice be found necessary in order more fully to carry into effect the purpose thereof.

This amendment was withdrawn.

On Wednesday, the 26th day of September, the committee on Form and Phraseology reported that the resolution ought to be adopted in the following form:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have power to provide by law for voting by qualified voters of the Commonwealth who, at the time of an election, are absent from the city or town of which they are inhabitants in the choice of any officer to be elected or upon any question to be voted on at such election.
Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the new draft be amended by striking out the words "General Court", and inserting in place thereof the word "Legislature".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Pillsbury also moved that the new draft be amended by striking out the words "to be voted on", and inserting in place thereof the word "submitted".

This amendment was adopted.

The resolution, as amended, was passed to be engrossed Wednesday, September 26, and on Friday, September 28, the Convention voted to refer it to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 6, 1917, by a vote of 231,905 to 76,709.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: There seemed to be a good many dangers in connection with giving a wide open power to the Legislature to send commissions all over the United States or Europe for anybody to register his vote upon. It never has been constitutional in our State, as I understand it; and if the report which I read is accurate, I think that only two States extend the privilege beyond those persons who are actually engaged in military or naval service. There are a large number of States which do provide that men in the army or navy may have the privilege of voting. I think the privilege should be limited to that. And for that reason I have offered this amendment.

Mr. Creed of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman who has last spoken: Will he not trust the Legislature to regulate that matter? I believe he is an opponent of the I. and R.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: The gentleman's amendment at the present time may seem to fit the occasion, but there are thousands of workers in this Commonwealth who are serving for the welfare of the people as well as those who are in military service,— the train men, building trades men, commercial travelers, and many others; and, to my mind, there should be no exemption made. I state to you, Mr. President, and to this Convention, that it is wrong to pick out any particular class of citizens and give them preference for all time over any other class of citizens. To have this just and right, and to have it as it should be, I am in favor of it as reported by the committee. It should include all the citizens of the Commonwealth. Realizing as I do the duty that goes with serving the Commonwealth and serving our country, let me tell you, sir, that there is just as much honor in serving it in civil life as there is in military life,— no more and no less. I trust, sir, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I should like to suggest to the gentleman who has moved this amendment (Mr. Bryant) that he withdraw it at the present time. Let this resolution take a reading to-day; then he can offer his amendment at its next stage.

I understand, sir, that there are some other members of this Convention who may desire to offer amendments; and it would seem wise that they be offered now and then we take all the amendments up at one reading.

I wonder if the gentleman from Milton will do that.
Mr. Bryant: I will accept the suggestion of the last speaker, and ask to have my amendment printed with the privilege of offering it at a later stage.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I think we might as well vote on this amendment now, and vote it down. This is not a war measure alone, as the amendment of the gentleman from Milton would make it. Why, Mr. President, both political parties have endorsed this proposition before the war began. It was set forth in the inaugural of Governor Walsh, and I am not sure but by Governor McCall also; commercial travelers have been coming here asking for a constitutional amendment of this sort for years, and not only the commercial travelers but the railroad workmen, many of whom are forced by their runs, — engineers, firemen, trainmen, and men of that character,—who are forced by their runs to go out into other States and lose their vote. There has been an increasing sentiment on Beacon Hill for a number of years for such a proposition as this.

Now the question is brought before us whether we want to narrow it down to just a war measure. That is playing with the matter; that is dodging the issue. Let us vote down this amendment now, and show that we want what the people want.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I hope this amendment will not prevail. As a member for over twenty-five years of the leading commercial travelers' organization in this country I happen to know that there is a desire on the part of traveling salesmen, and has been for years, that something of this kind should be adopted. There is not a council of the United Commercial Travelers in America in this State but what would be unanimously in favor of this, and has so gone on record in the past.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: Unless I am laboring under a grave misapprehension in the premises, this amendment is entirely unnecessary, because already we have voted to provide means for the voting of soldiers and sailors. Did we not send a commission down to the Texas border for them a few years ago, to take the vote down there?

Mr. Aylward of Cambridge: As a member of the committee I do not wish to oppose the suggestion of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Buttrick). I desire to say, however, that the question of exempting soldiers, or making this measure apply specially to soldiers, was not considered by the committee. Nobody appeared before the committee on that ground; but several appeared for the purpose of showing the necessity which there was for such a measure for various bodies of voters of the Commonwealth,—not only commercial travelers, but railroad trainmen, comprising I have forgotten how many hundred men. As a matter of fact, there was quite an opinion among the committee that the act should be extended; and I expect,—the committee expect,—to receive amendments from members of the Convention to extend this act further; rather than to limit it, to extend it to people who are unable on account of sickness to vote. But the committee did not take that position; they believed that the resolution of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Parker) was a proper measure at this time.

Mr. Kneel of Westfield: I trust the amendment proposed will not prevail. This is a question, at which fortunately we have arrived, in which there is no partizanship, no sectional feeling, — one of those questions, of which I hope there will be many more before the Convention closes its deliberations, where simply cold reason and wise judgment should apply. It is a relief from combat of partizanship and from bias, whether from section or party, to have a matter where we can settle the question before the Convention in calm deliberation and wise exercise of our reason. Nor will it take very long. The proposition is a very simple one: It is also a proposition calling for immediate action. We ought to do something, gentlemen. We have passed the anti-sectarian proposition. Let us pass another matter which we can settle in the course of, it seems to me, an hour's debate, and add to our record, already halting, of achieved things.

The proposition is one providing that the Legislature may have an increase of a certain power it now has. Under the United States Constitution the Legislature now may prescribe the manner, way, and terms in which the votes of absentees, — in which the votes of anybody, — may be polled and counted, with reference to Presidential electors, members of the United States Senate and members of the United States House of Representatives. The Legislature now can do any one of those three things in any way, shape or manner that it pleases under the United States Constitution. And it has done so, particularly in 1916 when it gave the right to the soldiers who were on the Mexican border to vote for those three classes of officers. But the Legislature lacks power to give to the voter who is absent the right to vote for State and municipal officers. It may be possible that under the power of the Legislature to create cities and municipalities it may prescribe as to those who vote in municipal and city elections; but that is doubtful, to say the least. It stands therefore thus: Under the United States Constitution the Legislature may provide for absentee voting for Presidential electors, for Senators, and for Representatives of Congress; but beyond that it cannot provide. Now, that is the power which it is asked should be provided. What further power should the Legislature have? That is a matter for you and me to consider. Should it extend to the right to vote for State officers? I say “Yes.” It should go so far as the Legislature in its wisdom sees fit to grant the right, — by giving the general right to vote, or the right to vote for certain officers. That we lack; that, I think, we should give.

Now, to whom should the right be given? There comes the important question. It is the opinion of the committee on Suffrage that there should be a line drawn as to those who should have the right to vote, and who are not present at the polls when election day comes. Where should the line be drawn? The committee draws the very plain, straight line of absence from the town or city where they have the right to vote.

Suggestions are made, — possibly may be advanced; they were made to our committee, — that that right to vote should go beyond the line of absence from the town or municipality where persons have a right to vote. The committee thought it was ill advised, — it could not say it was wrong. It would be practically impossible to draw a safe line, except we stop at the point of being absent from the town or city where the person has a right to vote. That is drawn in the proposition submitted by the committee to the Convention, — that the Legislature may provide for voting of absentees from the town, the place where they have the right to vote. We stopped there because we said that was the only safe line, practical line, at which to draw it.

That includes this: It includes all our sailors and soldiers wherever they are, on the fields of France or wherever in service they may be. That is taken care of; the Legislature would have power to do that. It provides also for any person who, by reason of employment or occupation, necessarily has to be away from home on the day when the election comes. It provides that commercial travelers, railroad trainmen, fishermen, business men off on a predetermined journey, anybody who can show as a matter of fact, — the Legislature will prescribe the details, — anybody who can show as a matter of fact that he has got to be away from the town or the municipality where the election is held can cast his vote in such way as the Legislature provides.

The only remaining question is: Shall it be extended to other people than those absent from the place of voting? The committee said "No." We might enter on dangerous ground there. We define a certain zone where the fact can be determined easily. For the person who seeks to vote as the Legislature may prescribe, — by mail, by declaration beforehand, any one of a dozen ways, the Legislature may say, — the question is: "Was he present or absent from the town where he is entitled to vote?" That is simply ascertained; very easily determined. To go further than that, and say that a man who was at home but by reason of sickness or disability could not vote, might vote on a doctor’s certificate, we said was going too far.

The proposition seems simple, it seems wise and well to extend the power that the United States Constitution provides; to extend it to soldiers and sailors and those who are necessarily, imperatively absent for a predetermined cause. That is enough. Stop there. That is provided for by the resolution submitted here. [Applause.]

Mr. Cusick of Boston: I hope that the amendment to limit the scope of this resolution will not prevail. My reasons for that are these: Many of the problems that confront the people of this State may be settled right in the future if we can do something to induce a larger proportion of the electorate to assume their civic responsibilities. I believe we shall do a good thing here if we give to the voter every convenience that is possible to induce him to vote. Then I say, members of the Convention, after you give the voter every convenience, if there is any possible way I should like to see such an amendment and such a law placed upon the statute-books as would compel every member of the electorate to assume his civic responsibilities.

I think, sir, this resolution is a great step in the right direction, and I hope that it will not be limited by the amendment, and that the original resolution will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston offered the amendment printed at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I wish to call the attention of the Convention to what I think are two very good resolutions, — No. 128 and No. 287. The last-named resolution has been presented by Mr. Scigliano of Boston, who, I may say, is the leading Italian citizen of our city. Now, there is a great demand in this seaport city, at least, that foreigners coming to our shores can be better assimilated if they are given the right to vote upon the taking out of their first naturalization papers. It does seem to me that the foreigners who have come here and who have taken out their first naturalization papers, and who have enlisted in the United States army and navy, surely ought to have the right to vote. In time of peace it may be rather straining the Constitution of Massachusetts to ask for such a drastic course of giving the vote to those citizens who have taken out their first naturalization papers; but here is a time of war, when we need every man for Europe. When there is a decided drawback on account of the reluctance of a great many citizens to enlist, we find that the Italians and other foreign races are enlisting very heavily, answering the call to the colors. Now, the majority of these foreigners have taken out their first naturalization papers, and where they have signified their intention, where they have conformed to the dictates, you may say, of what is contained in document No. 287,—Mr. Scigliano’s resolution,—it seems to me that those citizens, those foreigners fighting for their country, with their first naturalization papers, should be allowed the right to vote. [Applause.]

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I should like to point out the effect of this amendment if it had been part of our law during the past three years. It might permit a large number of Germans now serving in the German army to vote in American elections. [Applause.]

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: I hope, sir, that the proposition embodied in document No. 58 will pass, without the adoption of either of the proposed amendments. That document, sir, and the proposition contained therein, has been designed by the committee, and reported by the committee, to meet a real evil. Economic conditions are such that many worthy citizens of the Commonwealth find it impossible to be at the polling-place near their domiciles on election day. It is proper that provision be made that all citizens of the Commonwealth who are placed in this position be given an opportunity to express their views.

As originally drawn, the document is sufficiently comprehensive to include soldiers and sailors, and therefore no exception need be made for their benefit; but the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) would have the effect of confining it to that class only. I believe that such a limitation is not within the spirit nor the proper scope of the proposition.

The last amendment proposed brings in an entirely new subject; it brings in a subject which is not proper and which did not have the approval of the committee who heard it, namely, the extension of the suffrage to persons who are not citizens of the Commonwealth. Whatever may be the merits of that latter proposition, they can be discussed by this Convention when the report of the committee on document No. 287 is reached. There is no need, no urgency, no reason for this Convention to express its views on that proposition to-day. There is an urgent need that the Convention act speedily on the proposition of absentee voting, in order that the proposition may be speedily presented to the voters of the Commonwealth, and perhaps a special session of the Legislature called to enact the legislation which will accord the soldiers and sailors of the Commonwealth engaged in National service an opportunity to vote.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that the original proposition will be passed, and that both these amendments will be rejected.
Mr. Parker of Lancaster: I hope, Mr. President, that the consideration of the several amendments proposed to the report of the committee presented in the form of the resolution now before us will not lead the Convention, even momentarily, to disregard what I conceive to be, and to have been, the primary reason for the consideration and the adoption of the resolution now before us. I suppose, sir, that the insistent cause for the presentation of this resolution, the imperative requirement that we act upon it now, is to meet a condition which would be deplorable, as it would be insufferable, if our fellow-citizens of this Commonwealth, now abroad in the service of State and Nation, should be deprived, by reason of the sacrifices that they have so willingly made, of the dearest right and duty of citizens, to exercise their franchises in the participation of the government of their Commonwealth.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny: Do I understand the gentleman to deny the suffrage to the foreigner in this country who has taken out his first papers, who may sacrifice his life for the honor of the country?
Does he wish to deny him the pleasures of citizenship?

Mr. Parker: I should deny to no man the rights of citizenship, when he had attained to those rights. [Applause.] Nor, sir, would I be heard for a moment to question or to disparage either the valor or the patriotism of many men not yet fully entitled to the rights of our citizenship, but having plainly shown that they have the qualities which later will ripen into the fullest consummation of citizenship.

Mr. Newton of Everett: Will the gentleman allow me also to call his attention to the fact that only ten per cent of those who take out first papers ever complete their papers?

Mr. Parker: I accept, Mr. President, the statement of my honorable friend as the absolute truth. I always am enlightened by my honorable friend.

I was about to add, Mr. President and gentlemen, but one further word with respect to this resolution, which I hope may be adopted in the form submitted by the committee. I would not belittle the great proposition presented by the suggestion that we are merely to take measures to see to it that the Legislature, by wise and carefully drawn enactments, may preserve to our fellow-citizens in the military and naval service their franchise rights. Surely we would suffer no condition to continue that might result in imposing a penalty upon our fellow-citizens by reason of the sacrifice that they have made for us and for their Nation.

I trust, therefore, sir, that, responsive to a sentiment that I know is unanimous in this Convention and unanimous in the Commonwealth, we shall promptly deal with this resolution, to the end that our soldiers and sailors may have this tie to their Commonwealth from which they are separated by this valorous service.

Let us not be delayed in accomplishing that result by the consideration of any lesser things. I would oppose, Mr. President, modestly presenting my own views, the amendment which would limit the operation of this constitutional amendment solely to those who are present in the military or naval service of the Commonwealth or Nation. Because it has come to my knowledge, confirming my observation of many years, that there are a great number of our fellow-citizens whose occupational duties are such, in connection with trans-service,—corporations, as to compel their absence from the places of their residence upon the days of the primaries or the election; and I believe it to be impossible, upon such information as I have, to arrange a substitution in these employments, or the substitution of different employees, which will not leave some object to the present necessity of absence from their polling-places on the day of the election.

I should hope therefore that the measure as reported by the committee might be adopted in the form that it is now presented. The Legislature will then have full power to provide by carefully drafted enactments, measures that shall relieve first this grave situation to which I have adverted, and secondly, and in addition merely, the difficulties of these occupational duties which do now of necessity deprive many of our citizens of their right to the franchise.

I am opposed, sir, to any amendment which would invite legislation, looking to the possibility of casting the vote by reason of alleged illness or physical infirmity. It might be, it always would be, a difficult and confusing question of fact. While I have no doubt that the Legislature would have adequate intelligence to make provision so far as possible to eliminate this confusion or prevent the possibility of fraud, still I feel we would be entering upon a dangerous field by suggesting that any cause except absence for service for State or Nation, absence from home by reason of the necessity of occupational employment, should be suggested as a ground for casting the ballot other than as now required, where we go in the presence of each other and solemnly discharge, not a privilege, or exercise a privilege, but solemnly discharge a duty.

I hope, therefore, sir, that the measure as reported by the committee may stand, unimpaired by amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. Barnes of Weymouth. Mr. President, quite likely the members of this Convention already have reached the conclusion,—due to the persuasive statements made by the last speaker, as well as his predecessors,—that this resolution should be adopted without either of the amendments that have been offered. And that action, Mr. President, I trust will be taken by this Convention.

Although it may be that we have arrived at that conclusion, Mr. President, I cannot permit the debate to close without calling to your attention the appeal of a very large number of sober, honest, industrious citizens in this Commonwealth who, by reason of their employment, are deprived year after year of the privilege of exercising their rights as citizens and of the privilege of casting their vote. I refer, Mr. President, to the railroad trainmen who are engaged in the transportation industry in this Commonwealth. It is because I happen to know something about the difficulties of their casting their vote that I have taken the opportunity of calling this matter more specifically to the attention of the Convention than has hitherto been done.

The necessity of maintaining railroad schedules, and the operation of trains which must go on throughout the twenty-four hours of the day, prevent leaves of absence for all but a few of the trainmen in order that they may vote, and the very large number of them are deprived of the opportunity for voting. There is no solution, Mr. President, for that situation, except something after the fashion provided in this amendment. The men themselves recognize that those schedules must be maintained. Train crews of many lines and many runs, leaving Boston in the afternoon do not return to their homes until twenty-four hours or forty-eight hours later; so that in a great many cases they are absent during the whole of election day. In many other cases they are required to leave their homes early in the morning, before the polls are open, and cannot return at night until after the polls are closed. So that for those reasons, Mr. President,—for the necessity of maintaining the train schedules and service,—they have no opportunity to cast their ballots.

Several of the representatives of the trainmen's organization have spoken to me about this matter on various occasions, and I know that they are deeply interested in having some such resolution as this adopted that will permit them to exercise their rights of citizenship.

As has been pointed out so well, Mr. President, this resolution is simply an enabling amendment giving the Legislature power to pass an act, and one with adequate safeguards and with proper and adequate machinery to have this matter carried out and to permit those men to vote.

For those reasons, Mr. President,—for the reasons that the other cases, those engaged in war, those engaged in other commercial pursuits, are deprived likewise of their right of suffrage, and for the particular and compelling reason to my mind, that so many of our citizens who are engaged in the transportation industry are deprived of their right of suffrage,—I trust, sir, that this resolution may be adopted by this Convention without either of the amendments that have been suggested, to the end that we may provide as full an opportunity as possible for every citizen in this Commonwealth to exercise his right of suffrage.

Mr. E. Philip Finn of Chelsea offered the amendment printed at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Finn: I just want to say that I believe this proposed amendment to the Constitution as reported by the committee, should be adopted without being amended as has been proposed. My amendment is in the nature of a perfecting amendment. It is the intention of the framers of this measure that the Legislature shall have the right to decide how this privilege shall be exercised, and when. For that reason I include the words "nominated or," so as to let the Legislature be free and unhampered.

I only offer it, as I say, as a perfecting amendment, and hope it will prevail.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: As a member of the committee on Suffrage having charge of this matter, I wish to say that the committee are opposed to any amendments at the present time. We do not believe that this ought to be limited, restricted, or extended beyond the provisions of the resolution which is now before the Convention.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I desire to say just a word, because to me there is a very clear-cut analogy concerning the principle that has been so forcibly presented here, between the votes of the soldiers and sailors on the one hand and such citizens as trainmen and traveling salesmen on the other. The situation in its inwardness is this: The reason that we are saying here, I think almost unanimously, that the absent soldiers and sailors should not be deprived of their enfranchisement at an election is because the State or the Nation has extended its own hand and removed these men, for the time, out of their place in the body politic. Therefore, the argument is, in its reality, that as far as we are able to do so, we should provide a way for these men, being thus removed from home, to exercise their right of citizenship.

Now, Mr. President, we also have an industrial situation, or rather an industrial system, and by that system, through no fault of their own, men are removed from their places in the body politic and deprived of their rightful votes. The system of industry which is doing that, which removes these men, is also in the interest of the public good. The sacrifices of the soldiers and sailors are more spectacular, and they are more impressive, but for the common good, these men, removed from the voting booth by the system of industry, are toiling and sacrificing. Therefore, it seems to me that the analogy is a perfect one, and that is why I desire to lift up my voice here, as feeble as it may be, against any amendment that will in any degree narrow or limit this resolution. [Applause.]

The debate was continued after the noon recess.

Mr. Newton of Everett: As a member of the committee on Suffrage I desire to take a few moments to explain this proposed constitutional amendment and the reasons for it, and to speak, in regard to the suggested amendments. The situation that confronts the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is this: Under the Constitution of the United States provision can be made by the Legislature for the voting of qualified voters absent from the Commonwealth, for President of the United States or Congressman or any United States officer, but, strange to say, under our Constitution the same provisions cannot be made for the elective officers of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. That is, a voter undoubtedly could be given the right by the General Court to vote for a Representative if he were not present upon election day because the Constitution simply provides that a Representative to the General Court shall be elected by written ballot, but a Senator cannot be elected except by a person who is present and voting at a meeting regularly and duly called for that purpose. Likewise a Governor of the Commonwealth cannot be voted for unless the party voting is present at the proper place to vote.

Now, the Legislature was troubled by this situation and has been trying for some years to have that cleared up so that it could have a right to provide that people who were absent from their community and absent from their State on public business should have the privilege of voting for Governor and State officers and Senators and Representatives, as well as having the privilege to vote for President and Representatives to Congress. Therefore I find that the public are somewhat embarrassed because they have not clearly in mind that for years the Legislature by statute has provided for soldiers and sailors voting who were absent from the Commonwealth, for President or for a Representative to Congress, while it could not provide constitutionally for their voting for the Governor or for their local Representatives and Senators.

Now, I assume that we all accept it as a fact that a great number of voters, because of their vocations, are prevented from voting on election day, our election days coming always on Tuesday, as you know, the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, and there has been a very strong demand made by the traveling men and salesmen, by railroad men, by other men who, because of their vocations, are kept away from voting, or are put to tremendous expense to come home and vote on a particular election day. Therefore the committee felt that the Convention would be justified in so changing the Constitution that the Legislature could enact laws so that men who were absolutely and unquestionably detained or kept away from their city or their town on election day should have the right to vote. That includes of course the soldiers, the traveling men, and the laboring man who may be kept away, or the railroad man who is kept away, and we drew the amendment with that idea, making it just as broad as we could make it, but not at the same time making it so broad that it would open the door that might lead to fraud and wrong when attempts were made to make it easier for the person who was at home to vote. In other words, the committee did not believe that the person who was at home should be given any privilege beyond that which he now has, namely, to go to the polls and vote, but that if a person was detained by his vocation away from the community, that he ought to have the right, if the Legislature saw fit to give him that right, to cast his ballot for State officers as well as for United States officers.

Now, with that, unless there is some question that worries someone, I should like to call attention to the amendments that have been offered and the reasons why we think those amendments should not be adopted.

Mr. E. W. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the gentlemen representing the committee if it is the committee's intention to limit absentee voting merely to the State officers?

Mr. Newton: By no means. This amendment is broad enough so that the Legislature can provide for absentee voting at any election either local, district, county or State, but it does not provide,—and this ought to be clear in your minds,—it does not provide that the Legislature can make provision to allow a person who is at home on election day to vote.

Now, in regard to the amendments. One amendment offered by the gentleman from Chelsea (Mr. Finn), Mr. President, suggests a constitutional provision in regard to nominations to office. Well, of course that is not a constitutional question. I do not assume that I need to make any other statement than that. The Legislature makes provision for primaries and nominations, and they have a right to do it, and they can make any provision they have a mind to, but there is no constitutional question here at all, and therefore this is not an amendment that we should adopt.

Second, there is a proposal by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Herbert A. Kenny) in regard to allowing aliens to vote: Such a proposal is now before the Committee of the Whole, on which our committee have reported adversely. A word is to be said against that, and will be said at the time that question is brought up, but I want to call your attention simply to this: Under the law to-day a man may take out first papers, and he then has seven years to complete those papers, and the records of the United States Court here in Boston show that in the Massachusetts district alone only 15 per cent of all the people who take out first papers complete their naturalization. If you should put this in here and the Legislature saw fit to enact legislation, you would practically give an alien seven years to vote, Mr. Chairman, while he might never become a citizen, and I assume this Convention would not want to take that responsibility upon its shoulders to-day.

Third, the records of the United States government as far as they can be compiled show that only 10 per cent of all the aliens who take out first papers ever complete their citizenship, and I leave it to the Convention whether, under those conditions, it would want to run the risk of putting such a proposition as was suggested by the gentleman from Boston into this constitutional amendment. The third amendment is suggested by the gentleman from Milton,—that absentee voting should be limited wholly to those in the military and naval service of the United States or of the Commonwealth. Well, of course I think that is too narrow a field to consider. There is no more reason why a man who, by his vocation, is kept away from the community should not have the right to vote than a person who is kept away by the exigencies of the military service, and I assume that the Convention will not at this time think that it ought to make such a discrimination as that, especially in view of the fact that there has been such a great demand all over the Commonwealth that men who cannot or are unable, because of their particular business, to be present in their community on election day should not be deprived of that right, and it is on that ground that the committee has reported this resolution. The resolution itself has been submitted to the Attorney-General and received his approval, and as far as we are able to say it is in conformity with constitutional requirements.

Mr. Joseph F. O'Connell of Boston offered the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Boston: I have offered that amendment which I hope the committee may be able to accept. I have taken it practically from a similar section of the Constitution of the State of Maine which provides for absentee voting. I have been impelled to do it after hearing the debate this morning, because I recall my father, who fought in the Union navy in the civil war, having told me how many thousands of Irish immigrants who came to this country shortly before and during the time of the civil war secured their citizenship in this country by enlisting in the Union army and navy and helping to preserve this great Republic. Whilst I have been unable to summon the exact law just at this moment, I do know that many thousands of Irish exiles came to this country after the civil war broke out and enlisted in the northern armies. They did this on the invitation of Congress which wisely had passed a law giving them the rights of citizenship after service in the army and navy and an honorable discharge. The honorable discharge might come in a day, it might come in a week. Anyway it presents to me an element that ought to be covered in a law of this kind, and I think that the suggestions of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Herbert A. Kenny) along that line would be covered by such a saving clause as I advocate at this time. If thousands of aliens go into the army and they are ready to sacrifice their lives as they already have demonstrated they are willing to do by enlisting, certainly they ought to be given all the rights of our citizenship, and the right to vote ought to be conferred upon them. If the National government speaking through Congress already has given them that right in a general way, it would seem as though the Commonwealth of Massachusetts ought to be willing to coöperate by making a provision in its own Constitution that these men may enjoy, as they would in other States of the Union, all the rights of citizenship. Therefore, I would urge upon the committee that it accept this amendment which I have offered simply for the purpose of perfecting the constitutional amendment suggested and recommended by it, and which I am sure will be adopted gladly by the people of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: The committee I believe will not be unanimously in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. O'Connell), because we do not believe it necessary, we do not believe it proper and we do not believe it expedient.

Mr. O'Connell: May I ask the gentleman from Lancaster if the committee in writing this law took into consideration the National law in reference to the subject?

Mr. Buttrick: The committee in writing this resolution took into consideration conditions which existed in Massachusetts, and they took further into consideration the legislation which has been enacted in various other States in reference to absentee voting. We believe that conditions which exist in Massachusetts should govern a Massachusetts amendment to the Constitution, and that is why we reported this resolution.

Mr. Whipple of Brookline: May I ask the gentleman who last spoke what there is in the conditions in Massachusetts which persuaded the committee that this amendment would not be acceptable; if he can state briefly and specifically the conditions in Massachusetts that differ from those in other States or in the United States?

Mr. Buttrick: I do not know, sir, that conditions exist in Massachusetts that are any different from conditions that exist in other States. That is something which is not particularly material at the present time. As I stated before, we took into consideration conditions which existed in Massachusetts, and if the gentleman from Brookline will take the trouble to take document No. 23, which emanates from the commission to compile information for this Convention, entitled "Absentee Voting", and read from page seven to the top of page nine down to what is called No. 3, I think that he will find therein plenty of argument why this resolution should pass, and I do not believe, sir, that this resolution should be encumbered with any amendments which might mean something that the resolution itself does not mean. The resolution is perfectly plain. There cannot be any ifs or ands about it. It provides for certain specific things, and those are the things that the committee felt, after hearing the entire evidence,—and in fact there was not any opposition to it presented at all,—after hearing the entire evidence the committee felt, and they feel now, that this resolution is the one that ought to be submitted to the people.

Mr. Kneil of Westfield: May I add in additional answer to the gentleman from Brookline that the committee has felt, at least I did, that this extraordinary right of absentee voting granted to soldiers and sailors is not a reward for patriotism and an incentive to performance of patriotic duty, but is to be granted on the sole ground that they are citizens. They are regarded in the province of this measure and in the contemplation of the committee as persons qualifi ed to vote who, in obedience to a great supreme obligation, are unavoidably absent from the Commonwealth and on their return will resume their duties; and meanwhile they are citizens, unavoidably, magnificently, heroically, splendidly absent from the Commonwealth, who have their rights of suffrage retained to them. We hope after an absence not too long prolonged they will come back to perform in person their duties to the State, municipality and the Nation where they left them off, when they went away to carry our banners on the fields of France. [Applause.]

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: I have just had a word with the gentleman from Everett (Mr. Newton), a member of the committee in charge of this proposed amendment, about the amendment I have suggested, and after consultation with him we both believe it would be better to withdraw my amendment at the present time. I should like unanimous consent to withdraw it, with the privilege of presenting it at the next meeting of the committee. In the meantime I should like to call the committee's attention to the Act of Congress passed on July 17th, 1862, which may be found in the Revised Statutes of the United States, Section 2166, on page 379, which covers the subject as I have considered it in my amendment.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: At the request of the gentleman in charge of this measure I once more ask leave to withdraw my amendment.
Since I have heard the discussion I shall make that request.

The amendments moved by Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston and by Mr. E.
Philip Finn of Chelsea were severally rejected. The resolution was ordered to a second reading.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading Friday, September 21.

The committee on Form and Phraseology reported, Wednesday, September 26, the new draft cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: My attention is attracted to a slight verbal change here which I think, in the universal judgment, would improve the language of the resolution, and I call the attention of the committee, rather than the Convention, to it in the first instance, for an expression of their judgment. In the eighth line, "or upon any question to be voted on at such election," the phraseology is a little awkward, and I suggest that we strike out the words "to be voted on" and insert in place thereof the word "submitted," so that it shall read "the choice of any officer to be elected or upon any question submitted at such election." I move that amendment.

Mr. Butttrice of Lancaster: I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee on Form and Phraseology, who has had more experience in these matters than I have, whether or not he agrees with that suggestion.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: Not having had any time to consider it,
I would say it seems to me that the change is the same in substance.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: Growing out of the consideration I have just had to give to reports of my own committee on Public Affairs, I direct attention to the use of the term "General Court," and to the possible complication which will arise when we have the
I. and R. I take the universal desire to have been that if there are to be exceptions to the enacting of I. and R. legislation they ought to be stated in the I. and R. provision of the Constitution. It certainly would raise a serious question if this Convention should report a new method of legislating through the I. and R., and at the same time should provide new grants of legislative power expressly limiting them to the General Court or to the Legislature. I have heard, by the way, from some source that we were going to abandon the phrase “General Court,” and substitute “Legislature.” I therefore suggest that the committee consider whether instead of the words “General Court” we should not substitute “Commonwealth.” “The Commonwealth shall have power to provide by law,” or perhaps this: “The Commonwealth may by statute duly enacted provide, etc.” I have had to meet that problem in the reports of my own committee and it seems to me it ought to be met generally.

Mr. Pillsbury: It does not make the slightest legal difference, in this or any other measure, whether “General Court” or “Legislature” is used, the fact being that in the present Constitution one is used about as often as the other. Both are used there as interchangeable and synonymous, as undoubtedly they are. But a committee of this Convention has reported in favor of striking out the words “General Court” wherever they occur in the Constitution and substituting the more modern and more accurate and appropriate term, — “Legislature.” So that it would be permissible, to say the least, to use the word “Legislature” in this and all other measures in the present state of things, but it makes no legal difference. It is suggested to me that I move this amendment. I should prefer to leave it to the committee on Form and Phraseology, but for the sake of getting it before the Convention, I move the substitution of the word “Legislature” for the words “General Court.”

Mr. Anderson: I wish the gentleman from Wellesley would state his view as to whether there ought to be limitation of this kind in case the I. and R. form of legislation goes through, — whether we should not get there a foundation for unnecessary doubt and very likely litigation, — whether all our legislation, or grant of power to the Legislature, ought not to be so phrased that any statute duly enacted shall be operative.

Mr. Pillsbury: Without time for consideration, Mr. President, for this is a new question to me, I see no present occasion for any further change in the pending resolution.

Mr. Loring: As I understand Mr. Anderson’s suggestion, it is that the word “Commonwealth” be substituted for “General Court” in the first line of the resolution. That would be a change of substance and not a change merely of phraseology. That is, the power is now given to the General Court to provide by law for qualifying voters. Mr. Anderson’s amendment goes farther. It would provide not only that the General Court might provide by law for voting, but that it might be done by the initiative and referendum, if such a measure passed, and that would be a change in the substance of the law and not in phraseology merely.

As for substituting “Legislature” for “General Court,” if the Convention will remember that matter was laid on the table with the idea of waiting until we got further along in this Convention and found out whether the Constitution would be codified or not. If the Constitution is to be codified then it would be well to change "General Court" to "Legislature" wherever it occurs. Otherwise, as "Legislature" occurs only once I believe in the Constitution at present, it would be better to keep "General Court," as that is used more often and generally in the Constitution at present, and we do not want to increase the variation. So unless the whole Constitution is codified the words "General Court" should remain as they are, but if the Constitution is codified then we should change this resolution as well as the others which refer to the "Legislature," which I suppose could be done by substituting, by separate amendments.

The amendment moved by Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley,— to strike out the words "to be voted on", and insert in place thereof the word "submitted", — was adopted.

The amendment moved by the same gentleman,— to strike out the words "General Court", and insert in place thereof the word "Legislature", — was rejected.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy (addressing Mr. Parker of Lancaster, who had spoken on the general proposition to submit to the people at the coming State election certain amendments which had been passed by the Convention): If it be, as it apparently is, the wish of this Convention that the absentee voting resolution as an emergency measure go to the people at the November election, and if that resolution be adopted by the people, and if in the coming January or spring the Legislature passes a law providing for absentee voting, do you not think it fair and right, and does it not ring true to your own sense of justice, that the men in the navy or in the army of our country who are fighting our fight should not be disenfranchised by reason of their sacrifice? Do you not think it right and fair and better to hold in abeyance these other amendments, and wait until these men can avail themselves of an absentee voting law, and then, sir, as voters of this Commonwealth, say whether they favor or oppose any of the proposed amendments?

Mr. Parker: I dare believe, sir, that there is no one of my colleagues in this Convention who holds in graver thought our duty and the duty of all the people of this Commonwealth to see to it that those of our kinsmen who are fellow-citizens, who are absent, offering their lives for our Commonwealth, for us, and for our Constitution, should have every consideration extended to them, and every "safeguard of their suffrage and citizen rights. I say unquestionably, in answer to my friend's inquiry, sir, that no radical change in the body of our constitutional law should be acted upon by the people until these absent citizens of ours should have opportunity to express their will.

Sir, I would deplore it beyond any phrase of regret if these men who are absent, gone under the colors, under the pledge to sustain our law and Constitution, should return to find that for which they had gone forth to fight had been changed, impaired, weakened, or altered, in their absence. I would have them return to their same Commonwealth and to her institutions as they knew them when they went.

The measures which I would urge, or believe, rather, must be submitted to the people when finally acted upon here, are those which I view either as emergency measures, such as the absentee voting resolution clearly is, or those which I view rather as dealing with administrative functions of our law as distinct from the radical, fundamental, institutional principles of our law.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Will you allow me to talk about the soldiers? I am anxious to talk about them. Nobody is more grateful to these men who are taking their lives in their hands to save Liberty than I am. The only reason I am here is because I believe in liberty, because I believe in religious liberty; and these men who fight for liberty and democracy have my most earnest and my strongest support. Now, the gentleman from Boston in the second division asked whether we would like to have our soldiers receive letters during all the next year,—I understood him,—from their relatives and friends on both sides of this question, showing how the State was all divided in reference to it, for another year. My friends, that is just what I do not want. I believe the soldiers do not want to see any such sort of a campaign through a whole year in this State; that if they had the right to vote to-day and vote here in this Convention they would say: “Put this thing on the ballot this fall and get through with it just as quickly as you can, because it is a treaty of peace conceived in the largest spirit.” And so I ask the members of this Convention to vote for the amendment of my friend from Boston,—the distinguished District Attorney.

If, Mr. President, I have not at least evidently attempted fully and frankly to answer my friend’s inquiry, I desire that he should further interrogate me.

Mr. McAnarney: I thank the gentleman for admitting everything that it seems to me he was in fact compelled to admit by virtue of his innate fairness, and admitting enough, it seems to me, to justify my position that these amendments should not be submitted to the voters at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. Parker: I should be very glad if that be so, for I would subordinate every other consideration which I have urged to the sure protection of every suffrage right of our soldiers and seamen, our sons,—deserving far better of our Nation and Commonwealth than we who in our security here protect ourselves by the artillery of talk, while our friends may be dying under the projectiles of war. I yield everything, sir, to the proposition that the rights of our absentee citizens shall be preserved.

The new draft, as amended, was then passed to be engrossed, and on Friday, the 28th of September, the Convention voted to refer it to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 6, 1917, by a vote of 231,905 to 78,709.
Mr. James T. Barrett of Cambridge presented the following resolution (No. 282):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting at elections.

The committee on Suffrage reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

When it was reached on the calendar Wednesday, July 10, 1918, it was rejected without debate.

On the following day the rejection of the measure was reconsidered, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 114 to 83. By another call of the yeas and nays, rejection, as had been recommended by the committee on Suffrage, was negatived, by a vote of 82 to 140; and, accordingly, the resolution was placed in the Orders of the Day for a second reading.

The resolution (No. 282) was read a second time Thursday, August 1.

Mr. Albert Bushnell Hart of Cambridge moved that the resolution (No. 282) be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "but nothing in this article shall be deemed to authorize disfranchisement as a penalty for the omission to vote".

This amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. Allan G. Buttrick of Lancaster moved that the above amendment be amended by inserting before the word "disfranchisement", the word "permanent".

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 75 to 49.

Mr. Ezra W. Clark of Brockton moved that the resolution (No. 282) be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "or to encourage such voting".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Albert H. Washburn of Middleborough moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "but the right of secret voting shall be preserved".

This amendment was adopted.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading Thursday, August 1, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 108 to 96.

It was read a third time and passed to be engrossed Tuesday, August 13, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 96 to 90.

The resolution was rejected Thursday, August 15, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 104 to 106.

At the next session, Tuesday, August 20, the Convention, by a vote of 127 to 67, reconsidered the vote by which the resolution had been rejected and, on the recurring question, it was voted, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 148 to 96, to submit it to the people.

The proposal was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 134,138 to 128,403.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I move that the Convention reconsider its action taken yesterday in regard to document No. 282, with regard to compulsory voting, whereby it was rejected.

I am placed in rather an embarrassing position. This is the second time in my life that I have moved a reconsideration. I assure you now there is no sordid motive in this movement of mine to-day. I feel that this question has been agitated from one end of this State to the other. By whom? By the men whom you find at the polls every election day. That being the case, is there any reason why we should not give them an opportunity to say whether they will give the Legislature the power to incorporate into our Constitution a provision that the General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting? Is there anything very dangerous about that? Are there any principles involved there that we cannot understand? I have been here, like many members of this Convention, and heard these questions that have been argued pro and con by the best talent that we have in this State; and when they got through the factions could not come together, and how do you suppose the laymen could tell how we should vote?

This question is one that is going out to the men who are doing your work on election day, to settle by Yes or No. The principle involved there is: Are they satisfied to do all the work that is being done on election days and let the slackers remain at home? We have had one important question settled here, as far as the Convention goes, and that is the initiative and referendum. Now, it is fair to presume that the men in the Convention, the members of the Convention in favor of the initiative and referendum, were honest.

It is fair to presume that they were honest and believed that the initiative and referendum would prove a great boon to this Commonwealth in settling a great many difficult problems. Do you suppose for one moment that those men who voted in favor of and worked for the initiative and referendum would believe in it for one minute unless they thought and were willing that all the voters should go to the polls and vote? They do not desire nor want to leave the questions to part of the voters. They want all these questions left to all of the voters. On the other hand, there are those who are opposing the initiative and referendum; I am sure I did, and will continue to. But, nevertheless, we want anything that is referred to the people referred to all the people and not a part. When the Convention is composed of these two factions I do not see how they can let a question of this kind go by and not give the electorate an opportunity to say whether they desire to have these people, or the habitual absentee from the polls, do their duty.

I hope this question will be reconsidered, and my purpose in making this motion in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, on a question with which they are familiar, and on a question that has been talked about from one end of the State to the other, so that they will think they have had some consideration. Yesterday when we got geared up to high speed and ran down through a page of the calendar, a lot of stuff was disposed of. Nobody could tell what was going on, really. Nobody realized that this important question, one that the people have sent in here, was being put out of court without any consideration whatever. If this reconsideration prevails the people of this Commonwealth will know that this matter has received a little attention. I do hope that we shall give them an opportunity to go on record in regard to this subject next fall. I do not see any reason why we should have any fear. Can there be any fear connected with this? These men who have managed the ship of State, who have run here every year,—I have been one of them,—why in heaven's name cannot we allow them to say whether you can call on these reserves and bring them up to the polls and do their part of the duty? There is nothing harmful in that matter. There is no boomerang coming out of it. You see the underlying principle is that every man shall do his duty, and his duty is not done until he goes, if he is registered, and votes.

I hope that the Convention now, this morning, in its lucid moments, will allow this matter to be reconsidered; and then my hopes reach a little further,—that it finally may find its resting place on the ballot next fall. [Applause.]

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I think this matter ought to be reconsidered. Yesterday, sitting in my seat, I did not attempt to make any protest when this matter was in the process of being rejected, and the reason that I did not arise to say anything was because I noticed that there were four or five dissenters on the committee in regard to this matter. They said nothing. I do not know where these dissenters are to-day. That being the case, that these men dissented from the majority report of the committee and said nothing, I think it a wise thing that the Convention give us the opportunity for reconsideration.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: There were two resolutions referred to the committee on Suffrage, Resolution No. 41 and Resolution No. 282. Resolution No. 41 was presented by the gentleman from Quincy who sits in the third division (Mr. McAnarney), Resolution No. 282 by the gentleman from Cambridge who sits in the fourth division (Mr. Barrett). These resolutions were given a hearing, and the arguments that were presented were so convincing to a minority of the committee on Suffrage that when the vote was taken, although the majority voted that the same ought to be rejected, there were several dissenters. When the matter came up yesterday I was not in the chamber, and if I had been I should have tried to have said a few words in favor of the resolution and against rejection. I dislike of course to ask reconsideration of any matter; perhaps it was my own fault that I was not here,—it probably was. I did not realize that the Convention would get into high gear so quickly. When it did it speeded up and got away from us. When I got back in here I found the matter had been disposed of and a lot of other matters with it.

I had hoped, sir, that the gentleman from Quincy who sits in the third division (Mr. McAnarney) would enlighten the House in regard to compulsory voting, as he enlightened the committee. It was a most able presentation; in fact, I think the ablest presentation of any subject that was presented to our committee. And he did impress our committee to such an extent that quite a number of us felt that it was a matter that ought to be discussed carefully in the Convention. It is an important matter,—a very important matter,—one that ought to receive a great deal of consideration.

For that reason, sir, I rise at this time to ask the Convention to give us a reconsideration, that we may discuss the matter. Then if the Convention thinks that it ought not to pass and ought not to go on the ballot, well and good. We will accept that judgment, as we have to accept the judgment on the reconsideration.

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: May I ask the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Buttrick) a question before he yields? I should like to know if he considers the question of compulsory voting as important as the matter of equitable representation that was just refused reconsideration. It seems to me that the one that was refused reconsideration before is the basic principle, and this the subsidiary matter; and if the Convention refuses reconsideration of the principal matter, on which all voting is based, the other might very well be relegated in the same way. I want to know if in his judgment this question is not of less importance than the other.

Mr. Buttrick: I consider the question which is now before the Convention to be one of the most important matters that has been brought before this Convention during either of its sessions,—much more important, sir, than the question of whether or not the county commissioners shall apportion the representation or whether it shall be done by the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I have no objection to reconsideration provided it is for the purpose of discussing the merits of the resolution; but if the motive behind the demand is only that the advocates of the amendment may secure another opportunity to vote upon it, then I object to it. Under the present system many voters knowing, more or less consciously, that their votes probably will not result in representation for themselves, have become so discouraged at conditions that they refuse to come out and vote. I quote from a speech delivered in Congress on January 13, 1914, by Senator Owen and printed as United States Senate Document No. 359, Sixty-third Congress, second session. It refers to a State election in Massachusetts and is therefore very apt:

At the State election in 1913 in Massachusetts Mr. Walsh, who was elected Governor, received only 183,267 votes, or less than 40 per cent of the total vote; and it may well have been that nearly all of the other 60 per cent preferred any one of the other candidates to Mr. Walsh. In three of the last four Boston city elections the same can be said of the successful candidate for mayor. In the autumn of 1909 a mayor of Salem, Massachusetts, was elected by 24 per cent of the voters, and in the opinion of a prominent Salem lawyer each and every one of the five unsuccessful candidates was, by a strong majority, preferred to the winner. The splitting of the vote which causes this injustice is frequently brought about by design. . .

The knowledge or the feeling that something is wrong with the system, combined, perhaps, with the other demands upon his time, keeps him (the voter) from registering or from voting. In mayorality elections in large cities the actual vote cast probably does not average more than 70 per cent of the registered voters or 60 per cent of those qualified to register.

It is clear, therefore, that our usual plurality system, first, may not elect the candidate desired by a majority of those who vote; secondly, may discourage desirable candidacy; thirdly, may induce voters to express other than their real opinions; and, fourthly, discourages many from registering and voting.

The solution of the problem created by the voter who remains away from the polls lies not in punishing him but in giving him representation, even though he be of a minority. The adoption of the system known as proportional representation is, some of us believe, the solution for this problem, and also it offers a remedy for the gerrymandering evil. Proportional representation would give to each party or group of independent voters a voice in public affairs in exact ratio to the vote cast for its candidates. What is there that is wrong about that? Should not equality and justice prevail in a republic?

Here are some of the faults of the present system: Political parties in the Legislature are not represented in proportion to their voting strength in the State. Minorities in every district are absolutely disfranchised. Why should they, — what incentive have they to come out and vote? Even a party that polls a majority of the votes in the State is not sure of a majority in the Legislature, a fact that has been demonstrated repeatedly here in Massachusetts. A minority of the voters may secure a majority of the members, as it did in Great Britain in 1886, when the Home Rule question would have been settled had the Liberal party, — which indorsed that issue and cast more popular votes than any other party, — received the proportion of representatives to which the votes cast justly entitled it.

For members of the House of Commons the Liberals (Home Rule) polled 2,103,954 votes and secured but 283 seats, instead of 339 to which equitable representation would have entitled them. The Conservatives (Unionists) received 2,049,137 votes and obtained 387 seats, or 104 more seats than the majority party. Equitable representation would have given them but 331, or 8 less than the larger party. This is a world-wide problem. What chance for representation have Republicans in the South or Democrats in Vermont had?

Mr. Newton of Everett: Of all the motions that have been before this Convention for reconsideration, this, it seems to me, has the least merit. Yesterday when it was reached in the calendar it was passed. When it was reached in its order all the members, or nearly all of them, were here in their seats. The parties who put in Nos. 41 and 282 were both in their seats. They did not see fit to discuss it. They evidently were satisfied with the report of the committee. And this Convention of course will be satisfied as to the merits of the case when they realize that, no matter whether we give constitutional power to the Legislature or not to compel people to go to the polls, we cannot compel them to vote. On the merits of the case it seemed without merit to the committee. On the merits of reconsideration it must seem without merit to this Convention, when they consider that either one of these gentlemen had an opportunity yesterday, if he saw fit, to discuss it.

Mr. Aylward of Cambridge: I am very much surprised at my friend from Lancaster (Mr. Buttrick) making this motion.

Mr. Buttrick: I desire to call the attention of the member from Cambridge (Mr. Aylward) to the fact that I did not make the motion to reconsider. Had the motion not been made by my friend from Provincetown (Mr. Smith), I probably would not have made it; but inasmuch as it was made, I saw fit to support it.

Mr. AYLWARD: I acknowledge my error. I am surprised that he supported this motion, because if I am correctly informed he is one of the men in this Convention who are very much displeased at the long delay, or the long time that this Convention is occupying. One reason he gave for reconsideration; namely, that the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) was vitally interested in this matter and had made an able presentation of the question before the committee. I can reinforce what the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) has said, not only was the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) in his seat yesterday and at various times when this measure was passed by him up to yesterday, but he had ceased to take that interest in it which would provoke a discussion, feeling that although he had the same views at present that he expressed before the committee, there was no utility in presenting them here and further delaying the work of the Convention.

Mr. WEBSTER of Haverhill: As the member in charge of this matter I wish to say that if it is the sense of the Convention that the sentiment in favor of this matter deserves discussion I personally have no objection. I say this in order that it may not be thought that I am trying to escape the toil of debate upon the matter. Personally the proposition is repugnant to me. The eloquent gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney), when he came before our committee, in his very opening words said that one's attitude toward this question would depend upon whether he regarded the exercise of the franchise as a duty or a privilege. I, sir, most certainly, regard it as a privilege, one bought with the blood of beloved fathers and safeguarded by the wisdom of generations, a privilege into which we enter as the climax of our citizenship, and which is withdrawn from the criminal. I have not accustomed myself, sir, to personify the franchise as a strong man armed, "the front of Mars, with horrid, bristling crest," swaying the sword of compulsion above our cowering heads. Rather would I conceive its apotheosis as a gracious woman akin to that goddess whose features are made familiar by our coinage and like her for whose sake Ilion crumbled in lamented fires, clothed with beauty as with a garment. Heaven forbid that she should be compelled to the rude embraces of the undeserving. [Laughter.] I certainly feel strongly in a personal way upon this matter. Nevertheless, if any member feels that the cloture has been applied to him, I for one will acquiesce cheerfully in the motion to reconsider. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Brockton: I arise primarily to say that my taste is quite different from that of the honorable delegate from Haverhill (Mr. Webster), who has just taken his seat. I believe there is merit in his proposition, perhaps not recognized fully by any of us as yet, and I believe it went into the discard yesterday chiefly from lack of consideration, by that tidal wave that swept over the docket and carried with it something like a dozen of these resolutions. Now, under the present conditions frequently not more than 25 to 30 per cent of the legal voters in any voting precinct attend the primaries. What is the result? It is this: That the man with an abundance of money at his command gets out two-thirds of that 25 or 30 per cent, and the candidate equally worthy, equally able and perhaps equally honest, is left, because he has not the means to hire the automobiles to send his agents throughout the district and gather in that 25 or 30 per cent who will go out. It is a disadvantage to the man of small means. Now, I am not quite in favor of this resolution as it reads, but I hope that reconsideration will prevail, that this Convention may consider a proposition that interests large numbers of the people of this Commonwealth who have looked forward to this Convention that it might do something for them. It might be amended something after the following language: That it is expedient that the Constitution of the Commonwealth be so amended as to require or encourage the voters,—leaving a latitude with the Legislature. I believe this proposition is worthy of consideration, and when properly modified that it should go into the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I most sincerely hope and trust that this Convention will vote at this time to reconsider, instead of throwing it absolutely into the discard.

Mr. Morrill: When I concluded my remarks I was quoting at random from the publication issued by the Massachusetts Proportional Representation League, and to show further why people refrain from voting I will quote other facts from it:

In many districts it is a foregone conclusion that the Republican candidate will win, and therefore Democrats have little satisfaction in voting. In others the success of the Democratic candidate is equally certain, and Republican voters are discouraged in their turn. As to the smaller parties, there is very seldom a chance of electing their candidates in any district.

What inducement have they to come out in great numbers?

This mainly accounts for the widespread lack of interest in elections, and for the large number of voters who mark only the head of the ticket.

To show other inequalities that exist in Massachusetts, I will quote from the 1912 presidential vote. But first permit me to say that the Republicans, with less than 36 per cent of the average vote cast for the State ticket that year, were placed in power in the Legislature with an overwhelming but insecure and unencourageous majority of the 1913 Legislature. In the House of Representatives of that year the Republicans had 38 more members than all the other parties added together, yet they were the second party as shown by the votes cast, either for President, for Governor or for the State ticket as a whole. For President the Democrats received 274,315 votes, the Republicans 156,139, the Progressives 142,375, and yet this third party, the Progressives, obtained but five members of the House, while the Republicans, with less than 14,000 more votes than the Progressives had, obtained 139 members. Gerrymandering in the past, together with basing representation upon small districts,—rather than from large districts or from the State at large,—furnishes the reason.

Mr. Linke of West Springfield: I rise to a point of order.

The President: The member will state his point of order.

Mr. Linke: My point of order is that we are supposed to be talking on reconsideration of the question, and not proportional representation.

The President: The member will confine his remarks to the matter under consideration. The question is on reconsideration.
Mr. Morrill: I am showing why we should not reconsider this resolution, because if we should I do not know but there might be a chance to pass it. I am showing why the people stay away from the polls, people who we are all agreed we should like to see express their opinions. But none of us is desirous that the large number of citizens who possess no political opinions should be forced to the polls through fear of punishment and thus complicate to infinitude a situation already complicated and menacing. We want an expression of all the intelligent opinion we can get; the less of the unintelligent opinion we get the better will be our situation and the easier will be the solution of those of our problems which can be solved by political action. At present, representation is based on arbitrary geographical lines rather than upon common opinions of government. Voters having a common point of view cannot now unite successfully. They find that out; at least some of them are conscious of it and others are not, but all realize that there is some reason for their vote being rendered ineffective,—that there is some reason why, after going to the polls year after year, they repeatedly fail to obtain representation. Becoming discouraged they say: "What is the use of voting?" Some become anarchists, some become syndicalists, some adopt various other ideas; but the plain fact is that all have lost faith in political government. We desire to restore that confidence, to the end that this government shall be really one of, and for and by the people.

The rejection of the resolution was reconsidered, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 114 to 83.

Mr. Barrett of Cambridge: I move that the debate on this measure be postponed until Tuesday next, and that it be placed first in the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I feel like a ditto mark. The necessity of repeating arguments, however, seems to be unavoidable. We started out to cross every bridge as we came to it. As a result we have gone through our program with unprecedented rapidity, and yet I think with equal justice and without hardship to anybody. I trust we shall continue with this policy.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I think it is unwise to postpone action on this matter now. There is not a great deal more to be said on it, unless they want to continue the length of this Convention. Every member of the Convention has got his mind made up. Let us go to it now and settle it. I hope postponement will not prevail.

Mr. Barrett: My reason for asking postponement is that some members of the Convention, who are very much interested in this measure, are unavoidably absent. One in particular said he desired to have this postponed until Monday, and it was at his request solely that I made the motion. The matter has not been discussed, as the previous speaker has said, and I believe that the proper time will be next Tuesday, when members will have a chance to deliberate and become more conversant with its merits. Two members of the committee on Suffrage who have dissented from the report of the committee are unavoidably absent today, and that is the reason I made the motion to postpone until Tuesday next. I hope it will prevail.

The Convention refused, by a vote of 39 to 96, to postpone the consideration of the measure.
Mr. Linke of West Springfield: I believe the purpose of the maker of the motion to reconsider on this question has been or, in a short time, will be fully satisfied, and with that in mind I move the previous question.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I dislike to take up the time of the Convention in any of these matters; but inasmuch as the Convention, by a very large majority, has reconsidered its action of yesterday, and inasmuch as some of the members of this Convention consider this an important matter, it would seem to be unwise at this time to order the previous question. I shall not take up the time of the Convention in a long discussion of this matter. What I have to say in relation to its merits can be said in a very few minutes; but there are several other men here who I understand desire to talk upon the subject, and if the previous question is ordered it seems to me that it will be a little bit unfair.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I simply stand amazed in this Convention that any member of this Convention would take the floor after we have secured a reconsideration and make that motion. All I have to say further is that while I might admire the delegate's nerve I have very little respect for his judgment.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: I certainly hope that the previous question will not carry at this time. After having taken the time to reconsider this, let us have whatever discussion members may feel to be necessary to clear the situation, and understand each other's views before we take action.

The Convention refused to order the main question.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I do not propose to tire this body with any lengthy remarks. I expect the subject now under consideration has been talked over. I know it has outside the Convention, and now without having any preliminaries we will go right at it and try to strike the nail right on the head.

The gentleman in this division,—I think he is chairman of the committee on Suffrage,—when he made the statement to this Convention that they had ample opportunity to consider it, and that they were all in here when this question was up yesterday, is absolutely wrong; and if he has come to his conclusion in regard to the merits of compulsory voting by the same reasoning that he made his argument, why, I think compulsory voting has got a help instead of a set-back. When he puts up this argument: How are you going to have them all vote?—why, that was brought up here yesterday out in the reading-room. It is that same old saw: You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. Of course you cannot make him drink; but he knows, and I know, and any other man who knows anything about animals knows that if you lead him the next time and the next time, finally he will drink your tub dry. He will frighten you, he will drink so much. And so it is with a man going into the booth. He will not vote, but he will come out and he will feel sheepish. He will look around. He will talk with other men. He will find that they are familiar with the questions and the matters and the men that are going to be voted on. He will scratch his head and wonder what is the matter. What will be the matter? He has not voted. He will go again, and he will come out and will feel worse than he did the first time. Finally, the third time and last, he will find it is impossible for a man to stultify his conscience to such a degree that he cannot mingle with the public and indulge in conversation with them because he has not done his duty; and that man will become the most enthusiastic man for this very same principle of compulsory voting, and the only thing that he will feel bad about then will be that there are not more opportunities to vote, — the same as the horse will drink more water.

This is an educational matter. Let us use righteous judgment.
Is there any member of this Convention who has any duty to perform who is not going to give it some thought, is not going to reason and think it over? Of course there is not. So you will find that when these men find it obligatory on them to go and vote they are going to give this question thought, and they will study it over, and they will talk it over in the market-places and in the grocery stores and with the folks at home, and the result is they get more light and are better able to vote. How is it with the younger men who are coming on here, — thousands and thousands of them? When they are put on the registered list what will they do? They will come on more familiar than you and I were when we went on. Why? Because they know that they are going to be obliged to vote.

The gentleman in the first division tells about swinging the sword around, driving men into the booth to vote. We do not hesitate in times of war to send men over across to fight our battles, and they go.
We have passed an act in the Legislature that made it impossible mostly, unless a man put up a pretty reasonable excuse, for him to be excused on a jury. No revolver and no sword there, — nothing of the kind. They respect it, and by so doing I think the lawyers in this body will bear me out that the personnel of the jury has been very much improved by that act. I know in our own town when any active business man’s name was on the jury list you would find him at our annual town-meeting, and when the jury list was read over he would be the first man to get up and ask to be excused, and he always would be excused. Then there would be some other fellow get up and desire to have his name put on the jury list, and it would go on. You would not take his judgment on a yellow dog, but that was the kind of men a good many times that went on your juries. By making it compulsory, however, for men to go on juries, your juries have been improved. How is it about the law that prohibits people from spitting on a sidewalk? They live up to it. Now and then one man thoughtlessly breaks the law, or some do it intentionally, but there is no revolver and no sword, no necessity of it. If a man is living up to the law the best he knows how, and is willing to do it, that is all there is to it, and that is all there will be in this case.

We have our corrupt practice act. It has been altered, amended, changed, cut off, elongated, and everything has been done to it that could be done, and now it is not satisfactory to anybody, more especially the man who is running for office. I believe that if compulsory voting is put onto our statute-books in this State it will reduce corrupt practices to the minimum. Any man who has made it a business for years and years to be at the polls on election day knows what it means when they are getting down toward the last hour. You go and look over the voting list, and you see three or four or half a dozen names. You say to yourself: "Well, they are not here," and you pull out and go after them. You go to the home. Well, they are on the roof shingling, they are on the beach, they are out in the garden, or they are somewhere. Well, you will find them, and after you find them the first thing you have got to do is to commend them upon what they are doing,—stealing another man's cucumbers, or something else. When you think you have got them into a proper frame of mind you will pop the question. "No, I ain't going." "Why not?" After arguing with them for a time you may get them to go and you may not. But you go home that night when you get through, whether your party wins or whether it loses, and you think: "Well, I never will get into this scrape another election day;" but you do. The same men go year after year and do this work, while the slackers sit right back and laugh and say they are not interested.

And there is another proposition. You all have heard it. I have heard it. A man finds some fault with the administration, with the Governor or some lower official, and says: "I don't care anything about him. I did not vote for him. He is not my Governor." "He is not my Senator." "He is not my Representative." Now, that is not so. He is every man's Governor in the State. He is every man's Senator or Representative. Do not give the voter an opportunity to say that, but let him know that by his remaining at home and habitually keeping away from the polls he acquiesces in the action of those who do vote, and the consequence is the men who are elected are his Governors. They are all our own Governors.

I feel as if there were a great many here who wanted to speak on this question, and I hope their speeches will be brief and be right to the point. Then we can settle this question, which will be satisfactory to the public. I am very much pleased to think this Convention has reconsidered this proposition, if for no other purpose than that the people of this Commonwealth can see that there is one question that has come right direct from them. While you may call it simple and plain and a minor question, I think it is one of the most important questions we have, that men should go and do their duty, because they are the beginning, they are the embryo, of all law, and that is where this proposition should receive close attention. I am glad we have had a roll-call, because I want it to go down,—not now, but handed down to generations,—so that when the children of the parents, and their children, look back on the men of this Convention they can say: "My grandfather did so and so. He voted for" or "He did not vote for compulsory voting. That was in the time when they thought that every man should do his duty."

I hope that this resolution will be adopted.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I greatly appreciate the action of the Convention in voting to reconsider this resolution. The thing that ought to be pointed out here is a thing with which this body is abundantly familiar, a situation that now exists in every community upon election day. Had I thought that this resolution would be reconsidered this morning, it would have been easy to have brought here ample figures which would have been comprehensive, touching all of the various communities of this State, which would bring forcibly before us the vast number of stay-at-homes on the days of election. I am sure that every member of this Convention has knowledge of this, even having taken part in the attempt to arouse the public interest in an election. I have a very brilliant friend who has arisen again and again in the body to which he belongs and said: "It is not ignorance that bothers me, it is ignorance," and again and again upon the day of election vast numbers of our citizens simply ignore the day of election; they ignore their duty.

I cannot agree with that eloquent member in the first division (Mr. Webster), — and we are sorry in this part of the Chamber that we cannot always see the brilliant sparks that rise from his literary anvil, — that voting is a mere privilege. I have been referring to it as a duty.

I desire, also, to point out the great opportunity that exists for corrupt practices in elections. Have any of you gentlemen ever taken an automobile when you were running for election to office, or sent your friends with automobiles, to bring to the polls the stay-at-homes? Is it not true that the man who can provide the largest number of friends and supporters and automobiles and carriages has a great advantage? It seems to me that there is opportunity for a vast amount of corruption as this matter now stands in regard to voting.

I now want to place this whole debate upon what I conceive to be a fundamental principle, and where it belongs. In a democracy like ours, where men on all sides are appropriating the blessings of democracy, accepting them as though they were matters of fact to which they are entitled, men who are utterly oblivious of how those blessings ever were achieved and secured ought to accept also the responsibilities of democracy. I believe this to be the fundamental principle upon which this whole matter rests. I am utterly opposed to that class of citizens in our community who live in their good homes upon our good streets, take advantage of all of our institutions, send their children to our schools, accept the privileges of our libraries, accept the protection of the police force and of the fire department, live there snugly and in comfort and appropriate all of the blessings of the community, and yet never lift their finger, never contribute so much as a hair's weight to carry the responsibilities of the community. I believe, gentlemen, that there ought to be something done to make men who accept the blessings of democracy also assume the burdens of democracy, and that is why I am in favor of compulsory voting.

I have asked one or two gentlemen here to tell me what their real opposition to this compulsory measure is, and they have said to me: "Too many men would vote who are unintelligent, and who do not understand the issues, and who do not know what they are voting for." Now, gentlemen, I want to turn that about and look at it from the practical point of view of a man who is running for office. What does he say? Does he make any objections to an unintelligent voter? A man who stands now as a candidate for public office, — whoever heard of him rising anywhere and saying that certain men ought not to vote because they were unintelligent? What does he do? He says: "Get every last man out, no matter how ignorant he is, no matter what kind of a character he is." That is the practical point of view of a man who is running for public office.

And then, again, who are the voters who stay away from the polls, and who are the people who can be brought most easily to the polls? If you refer to the statistics you will find that it is the Back Bay of Boston that refuses to come out to the polls, and it is not what some of you would call ignorant men in other portions of the city. The politicians and the candidates for office get every last ignorant voter out, and they get him out easily; but it is a difficult proposition to get some enlightened man, some educated man, some man with a high intelligence, with a cultivated, developed mind, who is down here in Boston busy in his office on election day. It is rather a difficult thing even for the candidate or his friends to approach him to get him to come out and vote.

I want to say, also, in regard to the education of the voters, that if somehow by such an arrangement as this resolution provides we could make men feel the burden and the duty and the responsibility of voting, not holding the franchise as a mere privilege, I believe that soon you would discover this to be a process of education.

I am interested in this measure, feeling that it ought to pass, fundamentally upon that principle that I have laid down, that citizens in the community who accept the blessings of the community, if they will not accept also the burdens of the community, ought to be made to accept them.

Mr. Coombs of Worcester: I merely wish to ask the last speaker whether, under the benevolent workings of the initiative and referendum, of which I believe he was a devoted adherent, the question of compulsory education of the voter will not be almost settled by itself.

Mr. Knotts: I think that I was as consistent as I could be, but I think also, if the gentleman remembers, that I voted first with one of the partizans on that matter, and then with another, until I had both sides vexed. But it seems to me that here we ought not in any sense to attempt to evade our responsibility simply because we have decided to present some other matter to the voters of this State to decide.

Mr. Barrett of Cambridge: As the mover of the resolution under discussion I wish to speak briefly, because I realize that the temper of the Convention is somewhat opposed, — and justly so, — to long speeches.

The matter of compulsory voting is nothing new in Massachusetts; in fact, it has been debated in every State in the Union. I believe one of the western States, namely, North Dakota, has adopted compulsory voting and written the same into the State Constitution, giving the Legislature of the State power to pass laws governing compulsory voting. The State Legislature I believe has not taken any action up to the present. I believe that in the State of Missouri Kansas City had a compulsory voting clause in its charter, which has been ruled illegal by the courts of that State. Be that as it may, I believe the resolution has a great deal of merit. There is nothing more demoralizing than our present election system and condition. I presume every man within my hearing in the Convention at some period of time has supported candidates for election, and we all realize in cities, particularly those cities having a population of 20,000 or more, the condition of our elections. Let a man have the brains and ability of the present chief executive of this Nation, it would be impossible for him to serve in any capacity in a municipality with a population of 25,000 or more without expending a vast amount of money. In the first place, you have to employ paid assistants. You have to employ checkers. You have to employ canvassers going from door to door to see that John Smith or John Brown has exercised the function of citizenship that he should be compelled to exercise. You have the political ward heeler watching and waiting for his stipulated price to vote. I have seen in a city not three miles from here, at the close of an election, twenty-five men lining up and telling the candidates for office that they absolutely refused to exercise their suffrage unless they were paid so much for their vote, and I have no doubt that the candidates who were successful on that occasion bought those votes at the price stated. On the other hand, you have the idle rich. They think it is beneath their dignity to go to the polls on election day and exercise their right of franchise, and those are the very people who most severely criticize and oftentimes denounce the present condition of government under which we are living. I believe that the Legislature of our State ought to get permission to change present conditions. That is simply what this resolution asks for. It certainly is a step in the right direction, particularly in this period when American citizen- ships amounts to so much and should amount to so much. The man is not fit to be called an American who on election day thinks himself too big a man or too little a man to exercise his right as a citizen. In view of those facts and bearing in mind that I said at the commencement of my remarks that I wanted to be brief, I believe that this measure has merit, and I hope that under these conditions the Convention in its wisdom will reverse the report of the committee and adopt this measure, which I had the honor of presenting to this Convention.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: I had supposed this matter ended yesterday. It is only by chance that I happened to be here this morning. Now that I am here I will state my position on this resolution.

To my mind, whether a man is in favor of a compulsory voting law depends upon how he views the opportunity to vote,—conferred by law upon certain members of the community: The people of this State, to my mind, are divided into two well-defined groups. In one group are the legal voters,—for convenience I will refer to them as the voting class or legal voters; in the other the non-voting population. The non-voting population comprise the alien, the adult female, the minors of both sexes, the males who, by reason of mental or physical infirmities, are incapacitated from becoming legal voters, and the disfranchised; they are the great and overwhelming majority of the people of this Commonwealth; the voting class, the legal voters,—the minority. Now what duty, if any, do members of the voting class owe to the non-voting people of this Commonwealth? If they owe them no duty, the matter is ended, there is no occasion for any compulsory voting law, because if they owe the non-voting population no duty, the fact they may vote is a mere personal matter, a personal privilege, which a man may exercise or not just as the whim seizes or as convenience dictates. A man who takes that view of the opportunity to vote afforded to him by the law will not be in favor of a compulsory voting law, because it might interfere with that which he regards as a purely personal privilege. But if, on the other hand, sir, those who are set apart by the law as the sole people of this Commonwealth who may vote, to whom have been granted the duty of speaking and acting for, not only themselves, but also for the other, the non-voting class, —if such owe to those people who are unable by virtue of our law to vote for themselves a duty, the duty of voting, and voting for their best interest, then it seems to me there can be no objection on the part of any one to having a compulsory voting law which will make the voters discharge their duty, or penalize them for failing to do so. To use a legal term, can it not be said that the legal voters of this Commonwealth are the trustees for the non-voting population of the Commonwealth?

What are the men who are legal voters of the Commonwealth to the citizens who cannot vote? What are the legal voters other than the trustees of the political rights of all the people? Can any man seriously contend at this day that the opportunity of voting, which some members of the community have, is a mere personal privilege? Let us analyze that proposition. Take any man of this Convention who is the head of a family. Let us assume he has a wife and young sons and daughters. Election day arrives. The opportunity is presented for that man to vote. By voting, in effect, he passes upon the laws.
He is dealing with the laws of the Commonwealth. His vote, if the initiative and referendum be passed, may be cast directly upon proposed laws having to do with the health, the life and the liberty of that wife and those children. If the initiative and referendum should not be adopted, or even if it be adopted, his vote at least will have this effect: It will have the effect of either tending to elect or defeat the men who, in their turn, will have an opportunity to pass upon laws dealing with the life, health and happiness of that wife and those children. Tell me, you men, do you mean that the head of such a family on election day owes no duty to that wife or those children?
Can it be said of him in all seriousness and with a clear conscience, by any man, that when he leaves the threshold of his home on the morning of election day he may throw away and disregard the obligation he owes to his wife and children to go to the polls and vote upon such laws, or for or against those who will have the making of them in their keeping? Can he disregard that obligation and go and attend to his business? Is he not clothed before man and God with the responsibility of a trustee, and is not the duty upon him to go to the polls and cast his ballot, according to his conscience, for the well-being, the safety and happiness of that home and, extending it further, the well-being, safety and happiness of his State and country?
Is there any question in the mind of any sane man who analyzes the situation as to the soundness of that proposition? If there is, if my statement does not upon its own face carry sufficient weight to prove it, then there is no occasion for our having upon our books any corrupt practice act, there is no occasion for all those laws for the protection of the sanctity of the ballot. There is no sanctity in the ballot if it is not something which is sacred because of the effect its exercise may have upon the people; and if it is something so sacred that it needs safeguarding and protecting, then it is something which is so sacred it should not be neglected. Like a religious obligation it should be observed, and the necessity for its observance impressed on all whose duty it may be to exercise it. It seems to me that proposition is so clear it does not need extended argument to develop it.

In my advocacy of this proposition I have been confronted with this argument, a practical argument. I doubt if any man has spoken to me upon it who has not run in the old saying,—we all are familiar with it,—"You can lead a horse to the trough, but you cannot make it drink." Yes, you can lead a horse to the trough, but you cannot make it drink. What is the effect of that saying? It is this: You can command a man to do a thing, but you cannot make him do it. That is what I understand it means as applicable to the question under discussion. Let us analyze that for a moment and see where it leads us. Let us see whether it has any merit in it. You can pass laws commanding men to do things, but you cannot make them do them. As one member of the committee on Suffrage said to me: "You lower the dignity of that great and priceless American privilege of voting when you make it a matter of compulsion and say a man must vote." The two arguments go together. They dovetail. One is the natural outgrowth of the other. Well, the wisest of all minds laid down the first general laws governing mankind. I have yet to learn the Ten Commandments lose anything of their dignity or virtue, lose anything of their merit, because the great maker of all laws, He who ordained them, said "Thou shalt" on the one hand, and on the other "Thou shalt not", or that virtue loses any of its ennobling qualities because under the moral law its observance is necessary to salvation. [Applause.]

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: It seems to me the gentleman is arguing a good deal on theoretical and general matters, whereas on this matter of compulsory voting it is a condition, not a theory, that confronts us. The committee on Election Laws in the Legislature for many years has had this problem, and we always have found this: That if we are going to have compulsory voting, then the secrecy of the ballot must go; that we cannot enforce compulsory voting in any way and maintain secrecy of the ballot. If the gentleman who is speaking can give us something we have been unable to get for several years in the Legislature, I would be glad to have him tell us how we can get a man to vote, and have knowledge of his voting, so that we may punish him if he does not vote, and at the same time maintain secrecy of the ballot.

Mr. McAnarney: If the gentleman is in a position to assure me a majority of those who are listening to me this morning will vote in favor of a compulsory voting law if the details are worked out, my argument will be shortened.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I ask for information the opinion of the gentleman who is speaking on this matter. Has not the General Court authority now, without this constitutional amendment, to pass a compulsory voting law?

Mr. McAnarney: It is my belief that there is a grave constitutional question, grave doubt, as to whether the Legislature to-day has the constitutional right to pass a compulsory voting law with appropriate penalties for its violation. It is for that reason that I appeared before the committee and am urging now the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. Walker: May I ask the gentleman whether the question ever has been tried and decided, or on what grounds he thinks the General Court has not the power?

Mr. McAnarney: As to whether it ever has been tried and decided, my information leads me to believe the question never has been passed upon by any court of last resort in this Nation, except in the case that arose some years ago in the State of Missouri, with which we all are familiar, because it is cited at some length in the pamphlet on compulsory voting given to us by the commission. If we were on the subject of an elective judiciary I would talk about that case, because the opinion in that case reads like a campaign document. That is all it amounts to. It has nothing to do with the legal merits of the question before the court. In my opinion there is doubt as to the power of the Legislature to pass a law which will make it compulsory that a man shall either vote or forfeit the right to vote. While there is that doubt, and it has been voiced in this Commonwealth for years, and the Legislature in the face of it never has passed a compulsory law, it seems to me the time is opportune now to pass a constitutional amendment which will remove that doubt.

The matter the gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) called to my attention I will deal with before I conclude what I have to say, because it seems to me so simple and clear. To be perfectly frank with the Convention, I cannot understand why the Legislatures in the past have been unable to find any practical method of enforcing such a law, — if that was the only objection standing in the way of adopting the law.

The gentleman's remarks interrupted me in the trend of my argument. It compels me to go back to my original line of argument, because of the fact I am advised there are many in this Convention who look upon this proposition as un-American, and, as I said and will repeat, beneath the dignity of the American voting privilege. I want to call your attention to this fact, that whoever hesitates to vote for this matter because he thinks it is putting the shackles on his conscience is laboring under a misapprehension. As a matter of fact, when you come to analyze it, there is to-day too little, or, rather, there is at this moment less of the real freedom those men are talking about in the history of this world at this moment than there ever has been before, and in my opinion there is more freedom at this moment in the world than there ever will be again. I mean freedom from law.

You say it will be un-American and lower the dignity of our American manhood to have a compulsory voting law. It seems to me that is not so. As a matter of fact, we all know, the lawyers of this Convention know, that there is very little freedom in one sense, I mean freedom without the restraint of the law. There is plenty of freedom under the law. Take, for instance, this test. Men are compelled to-day to render their Commonwealth services as jurors. Are not the Legislatures frequently required to legislate for the purpose of preventing men shirking their responsible duties as members of the community in attending the courts and answering as jurors and render that public duty to the Commonwealth? And are not those men compelled to render that duty to the Commonwealth under a compulsory law? Does a compulsory jury service law lower the dignity of that service or impair its value? Are not men compelled to attend court and testify to the truth under a compulsory law? I appeal to you, is there any question in your minds that a witness who goes upon the stand under the commanding force of a subpoena issued by a magistrate of this Commonwealth is less likely to tell the truth than he who volunteers his services as an interested party in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant?

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: Would compulsory voting in any way eliminate the casting of a blank ballot? Does my brother consider a blank ballot a vote?

Mr. McAnarney: I will deal with that. When I deal with the request made by the gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer). I want first to clear up any confusion, if there be any, in the minds of the delegates as to the danger of passing this law, of this casting any stigma upon the voting right of the citizens of this Commonwealth.

Another practical illustration. We have it all over the country to-day. We have to-day a military conscription law in full force and effect in this country. Now, let me apply the test that law gives to the compulsory voting law. If it were wise to have a conscription law in order to carry the youth of this country into this world war, and as to the wisdom of that no man can doubt, let me ask the delegates to this Convention, when the boys of Massachusetts "go over the top" do you believe for one minute that the German foes who may be waiting for them can tell which is the volunteer and which is the conscript? They cannot. Compulsory service does not lower the dignity of that service. Compulsory conscription, compulsory military service, does not lower the dignity of the military service. When those boys "go over the top" the volunteer and the conscript are the same; fired by the same spirit and animated by the same intentions. And when men serve on the jury it makes no difference, it does not take from the quality of their service, because they are compelled to serve as jurors.

When men testify in court under the sanctity of their oath it makes no difference in the quality of their testimony that they are compelled to respond to a summons of the court, a compulsory law. Why, then, should it make any difference in the quality of the service that you would render to your State, to your family, and to yourself, if you were compelled to respond to a compulsory voting law? So many arguments could be advanced along that line it seems to me many of them, all of them, perhaps, are obvious to every delegate. I will not continue further on that branch of what I have to say.

Let me come next to the practical operation of the proposition. It has been suggested that you cannot make it practicable. Let us see if that be so. Now, the best test of all is experience.

Where has the compulsory voting law been tried, and where tried has it lived up to the hopes and expectations of those who caused its adoption? The pamphlet every delegate has upon compulsory voting, bulletin No. 24, gives you all the information you need upon that subject, and I will not take your time by calling your attention to details of it. There it sets forth the different countries — Australia, Belgium, Spain, the cantons of Switzerland, — where it has been adopted, and in each and every one of these countries it has resulted in increasing the percentage of the voters who go to the polls and vote.

You cannot make a man cast a ballot for Jones or Smith for Governor of this Commonwealth by merely making him go to the polls and cast a ballot. He may cast, if he wishes, a blank ballot. Yes, that is absolutely true. There is no occasion for arguing against that proposition. You can compel him to go to the polls. You can compel him to cast a ballot, or you can provide penalties under which he will labor if he does not do so. There is no question as to that. But you can say to a man: "You have the right to vote; if you see fit to refuse to avail yourself of that right for one, two or three years, then the right to vote is taken away from you. You no longer are worthy of that right. If you don't think enough of it to respond to the call of your Commonwealth to vote, then your right to vote is canceled and you stand disfranchised." Do you believe that penalty is not a penalty which will carry weight in the mind of every sensible voter of this Commonwealth? Would I, as the head of a family, when election day came, want to go out of my door and say to my family: "I cannot vote to-day. I am disfranchised. I don't stand on an equality with my neighbor. He can exercise this great right or duty of voting, but I cannot. I am an outcast, a political outcast. I have no right to vote." Do you think that any sensitive, sensible or sane man would put himself voluntarily where in the eyes of his own family, not alone of the Commonwealth, he would stand branded with that stigma of un-Americanism and lack of civic worth? No, we know, we know that men are sensitive to public opinion and to the opinion of those who are near and dear to them; and one of the most effective spurs you can place upon any man, in my opinion, is to put him where he will have to face that great question as to why he is different from other men, less worthy, in the eyes of those to whose opinions he looks for approval.

Now as to the secrecy of the ballot. I wish the gentleman who put that question to me would himself tell me how it invades the secrecy of the ballot to know that a man voted on any given day. What does that disclose as to his vote, to know that he cast his ballot on a given day? How does that disclose how he voted? The record can be kept as to whether he voted. No record can be kept as to whether he cast a marked or a blank ballot, I grant you that, but there will be a record that he cast his ballot.

And then we come as practical men to a practical proposition. Is it going to be said here in all seriousness that any substantial number of citizens of this Commonwealth are going to vote on election day and continue to cast blank ballots? Do you think so? Do you believe it?, Have I got to meet that argument, that men will go to the polls and will cast blank ballots? Well, if they get grouchy about this matter, the first time they may, but the second time they will be less likely to do so, and the third time they will not. The voting habit, once instilled into them as a responsible, conscientious duty, which the law says they shall exercise, will be sufficient to prompt them to exercise it properly; and if this generation does not respond to that, the next generation will.

The trouble has been in this Commonwealth that a term has been made a term of reproach which in my opinion should be made one of honor. It is too common in this Commonwealth to point the finger of scorn at a man and say he is a politician. To my mind it should be one of the highest compliments you could pay to a man to say of him: "He is a politician." The day ought to come in this Commonwealth, and it is my opinion it will come, when every man will be glad to call himself a politician; and when that time comes there will be no reproach in the term.
Is there any occasion for this law? I wish I knew what was in the minds of all the delegates, other than the fact, perhaps, that some of them would like to have me get through. If I did I might not feel obliged to argue this proposition fully in all its details. Is there any occasion for it? Well, right down in his heart, every one of us knows there is. You and I have been thinking this is a pretty important Convention, we have had to do with some serious matters, have we not? And we have been going about our duty conscientiously. Now in the city of Quincy there are about 7,000 (in round numbers) legal voters. The delegate who got the highest number of votes received only 1,900 votes out of about 7,000 registered votes. To state that fact alone ought to answer the question as to whether there is occasion to have a compulsory voting law.

It was argued here on one side during the initiative and referendum debate that only a small number of citizens, of registered voters, voted upon a proposition that was submitted to them under the initiative, and on the other hand the initiative and referendum friends held up that vote as speaking for the people, the voice of the people; and yet down in our hearts,—I am not dealing with the merits of the initiative and referendum at all,—we all of us know the vote did not in any sense reflect the opinion of the majority of the voters of the community. [Applause.]

If there had been a compulsory voting law on the day when the people of this Commonwealth voted for this Constitutional Convention,—I wonder how many of us could say truthfully we knew we would be here to-day. [Laughter.]

As testing the merits of the proposition to which I am addressing myself, the necessity for this law, what percentage of the voters of this Commonwealth take part in the primaries? Never mind the elections; the primaries, because the primaries determine the quality of the candidates and the quality of the men who are going to serve the Commonwealth for the ensuing year. Not the election. The man who votes on election day has only a choice, he may think, perhaps, of evils, of only one or two men, but the men who go to the primaries are the men who determine the standard of your candidates for public office. What percentage of the voters of this Commonwealth attend the primaries? Less than one-quarter.

How many of you attend the primary of your own party? How many of you attended the primaries of your own party last year? Some of you may have, but I will venture the prophecy that there are many of you who did not. And yet it is the primaries that really select our public officials. Now, sir, if there were a compulsory voting law, and voters were compelled to attend the primaries, without attempting in any way to throw any cloud upon those who have served us or may be serving us to-day, I venture the suggestion that the standard of public officials would not be lowered in any respect if the full citizenship, voting citizenship, voted at the primaries and on election day.

The President; The time of the member has expired.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: If my friend from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) desires or will take further time I rise for the purpose of moving that it be accorded him.

The motion was adopted.
Mr. McAnarney: Take the election of 1916. When I appeared before the committee on Suffrage I had the statistics of 1916 with me. I did not expect that I would speak to-day, so I have not got those of 1917. But I was interested in looking into the campaign of 1916 and found this condition of affairs: Governor McCall that year, you remember, ran, or rather Mr. Mansfield ran against Governor McCall. The Governor won by 46,000 votes. In the city of Worcester alone 5,700 registered voters did not vote. Fifty-seven hundred registered voters did not vote in the city of Worcester alone, and yet the man who was elected Governor was elected by only 46,000 voters. Out of 23,000, 5,700 did not vote.

Now, we will take it further. I have the record of the cities here, many of them. In the State election of that year there were 628,000 registered voters; 120,457 registered voters did not vote. Many of them may have been commercial travelers, many of them may have been sick, but were all the 120,456 or most of them incapacitated from voting by reason of absence or ill health? Do you believe it? In the cities and towns that year out of a total registered vote of males and females of 742,870, 211,500 did not vote. Twenty-eight per cent did not vote. Does that speak well of their sense of duty? It seems to me that it does not. In the city of Boston 31 per cent of the registered vote did not vote that year.

Now I want to put this proposition to you as a practical one. Do you think that is doing the square thing by the Commonwealth? Is it doing the right thing by the Commonwealth? Are we doing the right thing by the Commonwealth if we know that practically only one-quarter of the people of this Commonwealth attend the primaries and select the candidates for public office and we are going to allow that condition to continue? If you stood alone, if any man in this Convention stood alone, clothed with the power and authority of remedying such a condition on his conscience, would he say: “I will not act,” or would he say: “I will act, and I will act for the benefit of the State. I will have a law passed which will compel these people to vote, or they shall pay the penalty for not voting?”

A compulsory voting law need not require that a man who is sick or absent shall lose his right of voting. Provision may be made by which such a person can register the fact as to why he did not vote. Reasonable provisions to protect such can be made. Many of them easily can be thought of and devised. A remedy can be provided so that he who does not vote because of an honest and just inability can be protected in his failure to vote. But he who does not have that reasonable ground for not voting, in my opinion, should be compelled to vote, or else it should be said to him: “You are the trustee for your fellows. You have refused repeatedly to discharge the responsible duties of that trusteeship. The time has come when you have got to resign your trusteeship, and resign it you must.” As my friend in front of me suggests in a low tone of voice, “Say to him, ‘You are a slacker.’” Yes, that is what too many of us are, and I want to remedy that condition of affairs.

I will not further trespass upon your time, unless some gentleman has any questions he wishes me to answer. [Applause.]

Mr. Walker of Brookline: For many years I have been looking forward to the opportunity of voting in favor of a compulsory voting law. All through the years that I was in the Legislature it was the question of devising a practicable working law. I am thoroughly in favor of giving the power to the General Court to pass a compulsory voting law, and I trust a good one may be devised. I wish therefore to ask you to consider one or two friendly suggestions in regard to this matter. I myself never have doubted the power of the General Court to pass a compulsory voting law. It seems to me there is little or no doubt on that question. Some of the best lawyers in the Commonwealth are here, however, and if they think there is a doubt I shall be only too glad to clear up that doubt by a constitutional amendment; but we must remember that we are going to put a good many amendments on the ballot, and I do not wish to see an unnecessary amendment appear there. Now, if there is a doubt as to the constitutionality of a law providing for compulsory voting, in what respect would it be unconstitutional? For what reason would it be unconstitutional? I do not think that any one believes that a compulsory voting law which provides for an ordinary penalty would be unconstitutional. It may be possible that it would be unconstitutional if we withdrew the right of franchise or the privilege of franchise from a man who neglects to vote. That may be unconstitutional, but I wish to ask you to consider whether this amendment to the Constitution meets that objection. Does it? It simply says that the General Court "may provide for compulsory voting." It does not say that as a penalty for not voting the General Court shall have the right to withdraw the privilege of the franchise. Now, it seems to me that if that is the real objection, the amendment should take such form as clearly would grant that power. I hesitate to vote for this amendment, for two reasons: One, because I think it is unnecessary; and the other because, if it is necessary for the reason that I have stated, this particular resolution does not meet the situation.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I wanted to say a few words on this, but in order that all the members may be warned of the motion pending, I will move the previous question.

I have served on the committee on Election Laws for five years in the Legislature. Several years we have had a bill for compulsory voting before us. I do not recall that it was objected to as unconstitutional. The committee on Election Laws always has reported adversely on it, because it always has seemed to that committee to be impracticable. We never have had any one before us who was able to convince us that he could draw or present to us a law that would work justly and fairly and yet apply the drastic punishment for failure to vote that the advocates desire. The other day it was stated by one gentleman in this division,— I do not know but what it was the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) himself,— how large a bulk of our statutes the election laws occupy, several times more than the criminal law. That is because almost everybody who wants to become a public reformer begins to think that if we could have some dickering with the voting proposition the State would be saved, and so he comes before your committee with all sorts of schemes, and of all the visionary schemes that ever have come before your committee this has seemed to us the most visionary. The plan to compel men to vote is to disfranchise those who fail to do so. How are you going to draw a statute to disfranchise men that shall work with fairness and justice?
There will be those who are sick here, and traveling men. Here is the working-man who recently has changed his occupation from one city to another far distant city in the Commonwealth. The expense for him to go back will disfranchise him. If you should draw such an act as the gentleman proposes it would work ultimately to the benefit of the well-to-do, who economically are situated securely in one locality, and the disfranchisement of the working people. Go to our industrial cities. See the great floating working population going from one city to another. It means a tax upon them, such a law as this, of ten or a dozen dollars yearly in the loss of pay and the loss of a day's labor to get back to vote, or else it means that they stand stigmatized in the community as slackers. Now, if you want to do that which will disfranchise the working people, those who move from place to place in search of employment, then draw such an act as this. I have very little fear that the passage of this will do any harm. Your committee on Election Laws in the Legislature, when it has faced this proposition, never has been able to find much sense in it, and I doubt if any future Legislature will find any more sense in it than the past Legislatures have, and I think this simply will be putting upon the pages of our Constitution a useless and needless amendment if we pass it. We cannot make any law beyond simply compelling attendance at the polls. We can compel attendance at the polls; but if you are going beyond that and are going to punish the man who does not vote anything but a blank ballot, why, then, the same principle demands that you punish the man who votes only a half ballot.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: It seems to me that this whole matter can be summed up in a very few brief sentences. The right to vote is not a special privilege; it is a duty which inhereis in the very sovereignty of our electorate. The greatest peril to our republican institutions lies in the apathy of that electorate. The General Court should be given full and certain power to deal with that peril. This proposal gives to the General Court that power. I think it is not necessary to set forth details of method in the amendment. Those minor ingredients, as Marshall says, can be deduced and should be deduced from the objects set forth in the amendment itself.

We want our best men in public office. Frequently they cannot become candidates because they lack the means of getting the voters to the polls. Under compulsory voting they would not be obliged to meet this unfair handicap. For these reasons, it seems to me that this proposal ought to be adopted.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I take the floor at this time to answer the gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer). This is my second surprise that I have had on this proposition. The gentleman from Ware told us this morning that he had been a member of the General Court for five years, and on the committee on Elections,—that is what I understood him to say,—and for five years this proposition had been before that committee, and was considered by that committee as one of the crankiest, most unworkable propositions that they had to deal with; in fact, they decided it was the ace of all these fake propositions.
I have been a member of the General Court for seven consecutive years, and only twice in my time, to my remembrance, do I remember this proposition coming before the General Court. That was in 1913 and 1914, and I put that bill in myself. There was nothing in that bill in regard to disfranchising anybody. The whole subject-matter of that bill was this: Any voter who was in a precinct during any hours on which the polls were open should vote; in case of failure to vote he should make a reasonable excuse to the registrars; if they were not satisfied with his excuses they could give him a certain amount of publicity and a small fine of $2.50 or $5. That bill was not amended. You could get a good voice vote on that bill in the Legislature, you could get a good rising vote, but you could not get a roll-call. That is, during five years out of my legislative experience there has been no bill of this kind before the Legislature.

The gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker) lays so much stress on disfranchisement. Why, as he says, if there is any doubt about this matter, why not let it go now to the voters and decide on it and have it written into our Constitution? This little question is not going to lumber up the ballot a great deal. Take a proposition of his own. If he had any business proposition do you suppose for one moment that he would not remove all doubts possible? Certainly he would. And that is what you do here, what this Convention does, if there is any doubt in the mind of the gentleman.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I want to call to the attention of the Convention again that we are not attempting to pass a compulsory voting law. We simply are attempting to write into the Constitution of Massachusetts the words: "The General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting at elections." If there is any question as to the constitutional right of the General Court to pass a compulsory voting act, then this will do away with the constitutional objection.

Mr. Walker: I wish to emphasize the point that this amendment will not take away the constitutional objection. Now, I want to give the General Court, if there is any doubt about it, power to pass a compulsory voting law. This amendment does not remove the constitutional objection, because the constitutional objection, if there is any, lies in the fact that, as a penalty, the right to vote cannot be withdrawn, and this does not cure that objection.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: I rise to add one word of testimony to the eloquent argument of the delegate from Quincy in the third division (Mr. McAnarney). There is one Republic in South America which has distinguished itself among all her sister Latin-American Republics for progress, prosperity and stability. The learned ambassador to this country from that Republic, the Argentine Republic, Señor Romulo S. Naon, was asked at a meeting in this country, something over a year ago, whether there were any features in the governmental system of Argentina to which he attributed any part of the remarkable development of that country; and his answer was not hesitating, but came back as quick as a flash, that there were three features in the government of that country, to which he thought a large share of its prosperity might be attributed. And the three features were these: Compulsory education, compulsory military service and compulsory voting. [Applause.]
Believing that the hands of the Legislature ought to be untied upon this proposition, I shall favor this amendment.

Mr. BUTTRICK: I wanted to say just a few words more when my time expired. I want to say this to the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker): That if rejection is negatived, this resolution, I suppose, will go on the calendar for its next reading, and between now and the time it is reached I assume he will have an opportunity to prepare the amendment which he thinks ought to be adopted. It seems to me as though the time was ripe for us at least to give this resolution a reading; and then, if there is any objection to it that possibly can be raised, to amend it in such form as will make it workable.

Mr. WALKER: I wish to say that I think that is a very sensible suggestion. I shall vote for the matter at this stage, and at the next stage endeavor to introduce an amendment that will meet the point which I make.

Mr. SAWYER: There is only one State in the Union that has put a provision like this into its Constitution. That is North Dakota; and though that was done seven or eight years ago, the North Dakota Legislature never has acted upon it. Of the foreign States referred to, Austria was foremost in passing a constitutional resolve in favor of compulsory voting; but only one province in its popular branch has acted upon the provision and passed a law for compulsory voting, and only two provinces have accepted the same provision for the upper branch. I apprehend if we do the same thing here that this constitutional provision, like the provision in North Dakota, will be a dead letter.

Mr. WEBSTER of Haverhill: My chief concern in this matter is to improve the results of voting; and if it could be proven that an increase in the number of votes cast would achieve that, then acquiescence in this resolution would be obviously the proper thing. But, sir, it seems to me that under normal conditions an increase in the vote would permit of but limited change in the complexion of things political.

For instance, when we speak of Boston or of Berkshire County our thought may indeed be primarily geographical, but the suggestion is almost equally strong of a state of mind.

That is the normal condition at present; but under the stress of an unusually interesting campaign, in the presentation of some peculiarly vital or popular issue, or by the bringing forward of some exceptionally strong candidate, it may be possible to reverse the results which ordinarily would be expected; and in that, sir, to my mind, probably lies the chief value obtaining in the present system, in that party leaders are subject to a constant incentive to discuss live issues and to search for strong candidates, in the hope that through those influences they may effect a political overturn. But if they knew that the whole vote was coming to the polls anyway, that incentive would disappear automatically; and I apprehend, in spite of all the hopes entertained by the gentlemen who advocate this proposition, that when the condition had crystallized, so to speak, under a continuous use of the proposed system, it would be found that the resultant situation was in no respect an improvement over the present, and indeed that a considerable inferiority of help to the body politic might be noted.
The honorable member from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) made a strong appeal to us, as representing the voting part of the community, with regard to our responsibility to the non-voting population. That appeal has weight with me, sir. I do not retort to the gentleman with the outworn if somewhat obvious query, "Am I my brother's keeper?" because I remember that it was the world's first criminal who asked that question, and his class have been asking it ever since. [Laughter.] A thousand times, yes, I am my brother's keeper, and by my political action a heavy responsibility for those not so fortunate as myself rests upon me.

But by increasing the number of voters are we going to get a more intelligent action? That is the whole question with me. And I say, No. I believe that in the chemistry of the ballot-box is separated naturally the intelligence of opinion which we need in the direction of public affairs. The admission has been made that it is the "Silk stockings" who need a bench warrant to get them to the polls. That inference runs through all the discussion here, as it does upon the street; and how many times I have heard,—especially upon the lips of defeated candidates,—that the best and most intelligent men in our community do not take the trouble to vote.

That proposition is to me per se an absurdity. Failure to vote, to my mind, is abundant proof of a man's unfitness to vote. When they tell me how good, how intelligent, men are who stay at home on election day, I say, No, I cannot accept that view of it; a man who does not appreciate the privileges conferred upon him by this free government and participate in its conduct is not intelligent. If he is so selfish, if he is thinking about his own business affairs to such an extent that he will not take time to go to the polls, then I say he is not only not a good man, but he is a miserably, a detestably, unfit citizen; and if I am a candidate for office I do not want his vote, and I do not want that man to have a voice in framing legislation under which I must live.

What are the classes of men, sir, who refrain from exercising the privilege of the franchise? To my mind they separate themselves roughly into two, as I recall. First, the men who consider themselves not sufficiently well informed to vote; and I submit, sir, that it will be wise upon our part to accept them at their own valuation [laughter], and it will be for the health of the body politic if we let them go in that belief. Let us include with them those who are too indolent or selfish. I class these as one.

Then there is another group which in my own political experience I have had occasion to observe, and they are the men who have a grievance against the government, who have taken umbrage at the result of some particular ballot, at the passage of some legislation, or the success of some candidate who is so unfortunate as to lie outside of their approval, and those men refrain from voting as a rebuke. Now, sir, they deserve a moment's consideration. I am going to summarize, by a brief quotation, the sentiment of that class of men. It is the father of Huckleberry Finn speaking:

Oh, yes; this is a wonderful government, wonderful. Why, looky here. There was a free nigger there from Ohio,—a mulatter, most as white as a white man. He had the whitest shirt on you ever see, too, and the shiniest hat; and there ain't a man in that town that's got as fine clothes as what he had; and he had a gold watch and chain, and a silver-headed cane, — the awfulest old gray-headed nabob in the State. And what do you think? They said he was a p’fessor in a college, and could talk all kinds of languages and knewed everything. And that ain’t the wust. They said he could vote when he was at home. Well, that let me out. Thinks I, what is the country a-coming to? It was ’lection day, and I was just about to go and vote myself if I warn’t too drunk to get there; but when they told me there was a State in this country where they’d let that nigger vote, I drewed out. I says I’ll never vote agin. Them’s the very words I said; they all heard me; and the country may rot for all me, — I’ll never vote agin as long as I live. And they call this a govment" — says Pap. [Laughter and applause.]

I submit, sir, that although this is an illustration from the pages of fiction, and gentlemen may term it exaggerated, it is a typical instance of the feeling of a class of men that we all have met.

Now, I want to deal with one or two other questions, if I may, in the brief moment permitted me. One gentleman says this will minimize corrupt practices. I doubt it, and I might go further. Voting consists of two things: going to vote and then casting a vote. You need not pay a man to get him to the polling-place if you get this legislation through, but you can pay him for whatever you want after he gets there. Which would be the man most likely to accept an improper consideration for his vote, — the man who goes there from choice, or the man who goes grudgingly, feeling he is giving up time that he ought to be recompensed for? Just consider that point.

The analogy has been drawn with considerable force between compulsory voting and the draft, the military draft. Sir, when the one common fact of compulsion is stated, the analogy dies. There is no further nexus between those two spheres of activity. It is true that drafted soldiers are just as good as volunteers. Anomalous as that statement may be, it is not the less true and often proven. But military service is a necessity, — a necessity to the very physical existence of the State. That establishes one point of considerable difference. The drafted man goes out and his service is in the open; we know what he is doing every moment. You do not know what the voter does in the secrecy of the ballot-box. Further, the drafted soldier has to pass a searching examination to prove his fitness for the duty before he ever is put upon the firing line. Another thing still, before he is put upon the firing line, even after he is drafted, he is trained thoroughly and completely for his duty. Do you see any points of differentiation there, gentlemen?

Now, I desire to touch upon one other matter, — getting out the vote. That seems to be a rather serious consideration in the minds of many. My honored friend from Brockton (Mr. Clark) says that it is going to do away with what he supposes, and what many gentlemen of this Convention suppose, is the advantage enjoyed by the men who can command an automobile to get voters to the polls. Now, I speak as a practical politician. I have had a little experience in that sort of thing. I have been interested, in the past twenty years, in a great many campaigns for political office, either as a principal or as an accomplice. [Laughter.]

It has been my somewhat shadowy experience in the past to be a candidate for public office on several occasions. I always had to engage in that interesting humanitarian experiment known as a poor man’s campaign. I never had an automobile carrying any voters of mine to the polls, — supposedly. My opponent or opponents invariably have been well supplied with such means of transportation, and they very obligingly have carried droves of voters to the polls who voted for me. [Laughter.] One of the shrewdest politicians whom I ever knew, a real student of the practical science of elections, once said: "You can always safely reckon on your opponents doing at least fifty per cent of the work of getting out your vote." I believe that is a careful and sensible statement of fact.

I have no patience with, I deprecate, I detest, the suggestion, which unfortunately even here runs through so much discussion, that under the present condition of things, only the men with wealth have a show to get office and political prominence. I think that is a dangerous assumption to place before the rising generation of this Commonwealth. I say to the ambitious youth of Massachusetts: If you have the brains and ability to conceive a live issue, and so state it that busy men will grasp and appreciate it, if you have the courage to go out and advocate that fearlessly, and if, above all, you have the sincerity which inevitably will inspire confidence in your honesty, then there is no avenue to political preferment in the Commonwealth that necessarily is closed to you. [Applause.]

And I hope I may say, sir, with becoming modesty, that my own experience is a refutation of that assumption [laughter], because whatever means I have used to get political preferment, the Lord knows I never had any money, and I always have relied upon the soap box rather than the cigar box. [Laughter and applause.] A man can get by and get away with it if he has a message.

Now, sir, you will note particularly that reference is made in these propositions only to elections. Why do not they include primaries? Because they realize the moment they do so what a Pandora's box is opened. It would be the most unpopular measure that ever was foisted upon the people of Massachusetts, as I believe even in its modified form it would be very, very unpopular. Why do not men go to the primaries? Why are so few recorded there? Because they have to go and register their party affiliation, and a great many men, I will not say whether properly or not, are unwilling to do so. I have belonged to different parties, too; I have had my courage tested in that matter, and I never have hesitated to declare what party I affiliated myself with for the time being. But some men have a conscientious objection to that and regard it as really an invasion of the principle of secrecy which is conceived in the Australian ballot system if they even have to go so far as to say what party they belong to. Therefore many otherwise desirable voters will not register in the primaries. Now, you cannot compel a man at first to declare his party affiliation and at the same time compel him to vote. That is compelling him to say what party he belongs to, and I believe that would be considered a serious invasion of personal political liberty. This is simply one of those inconsistencies which adhere to the whole proposition.

The assumption runs, as to the size of the vote, that if only we could get everybody recorded there would be no dissatisfaction. That is not so. Some man would be defeated. The advocates of a measure that was defeated would be just as much dissatisfied if everybody voted as they are now, and perhaps more. At present there is a sort of elastic wall for their opposition and disappointment to beat against. They feel: Well, it is our own fault; if the fellows had all come out we would have had them beaten. It is our own fault and we might as well grin and bear it. I submit that is a reasonable interpretation of the feeling as it exists now, and that there would be no improvement worked by the feeling that, "Well, we got them all out anyway; you are down and might as well make up your mind you are beaten."

I believe it is a good thing to have a variation in the size of the vote cast. If an issue is brought forward, and the vote is small, that indicates that the issue is not gaining in importance in the public view. If a candidate cannot bring out his party vote, that indicates some element of weakness in the candidate. All those things are viewed in the light of past experience. The party fathers will look at it and will say: "Well, we must avoid those mistakes in the future, we must get better issues, we must get stronger men;" and then the size of that vote goes into history and it becomes subject-matter for investigation and study in the political laboratory, so to speak.

I believe, sir, that every argument that has been brought forward in this discussion, perhaps, in a sense, more truly than pertains to any other discussion we have had here, is susceptible of a two-sided interpretation. I do not believe there is any proposition in advocacy of this measure that can be proven absolutely. It is a matter of opinion. It is, as we began, a question of sentiment, and must so remain.

If I may be pardoned another personal allusion, I should like to tell the members of the Convention why I feel so strongly that a man ought to have such a desire to vote that he will vote. I recollect on the occasion of my coming to that age when I could cast my first vote I was employed at a distance, outside the State, under conditions which are not germane to the argument and need not be rehearsed. My duty to my employers obliged me, or I so felt, to be present in a certain part of a neighboring State on the afternoon before the election. If I fulfilled the obligation, the train service was such that I thought it doubtful if I could get home the next day before my time to vote would be gone, the polls closing early in my little town. I therefore left there in the evening, walked all night a distance which the Boston & Maine section records fix as 59 miles,— and I thought at the time they did not exaggerate it,—I walked that distance in fifteen consecutive hours and got home to vote. [Applause.] Now, suppose in years to come, when my boy has arrived at the age when he is to vote, I should tell him with, perhaps, a pardonable feeling, that he might be inspired by my example, not to neglect his own opportunities and privileges in the way of voting; and then if this system had been in force for several years, he might naturally rejoin: "Why, yes, of course, father; you thought you would be arrested if you didn't get home."

I submit that this whole suggestion tends to prostitute the very sentiment that should animate a man when he arrives at the age and has proven himself worthy and qualified to enjoy this most important privilege.

I hope, sir, that the sober sense of this Convention will attempt no change in the methods which, however much we may complain of conditions, educate, agitate and animate the people. Perhaps this very discussion here, when we tell the slackers what we think of them, may have an effect. That is the only way to reach the difficulty, to my way of thinking. I hope the Convention, with sober judgment, will make no change in the existing system. [Applause.]

By a call of the yeas and nays, the Convention, by a vote of 82 to 140, refused to reject the resolution; and it was placed in the Orders of the Day for a second reading.

The resolution was read a second time Thursday, August 1.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "but nothing in this article shall be deemed to authorize disfranchisement as a penalty for the omission to vote".

Mr. Hart: The question that is before the Convention at this moment is not a new one. It can be traced back to the earliest history of the Colonies and early States. There are no less than eight different acts of the Virginia Colony and State upon that subject, but the last of those acts is dated in 1798. This is sufficient proof that the method of applying some kind of pressure upon the voters who fail to exercise their right has been employed repeatedly within the United States. It also has been employed in some foreign countries, particularly in the Canton of Zurich in Switzerland, in which about thirty years ago a law was passed to the effect that every voter must appear and vote or be fined, with the very serious result that about something like 20 per cent of the voters appear and cast blank ballots. They would not incur the fine, but, on the other hand, when it came to the point they were entirely unwilling to commit themselves to making up their minds.

In this Commonwealth, as in all others, we are sensible of the great difficulties that arise from the inattention of voters to their duty. Some twenty-five years ago I made an investigation into this subject and discovered that in Massachusetts at that time, in many important elections, the number of legal voters who participated was not more than 55 per cent. There are communities in the south in which not one-tenth of the legal voters appear and cast their ballot on the voting day. It seems as though there might be some pressure applied to the voters to compel them to meet this duty upon which the welfare of the Commonwealth depends. I am not here to protest against the resolution as introduced by my colleague from Cambridge (Mr. Barrett), but to try so far as may be by a few remarks to enforce the principle that the worst thing you can do with a voter, a grown man, — or a grown woman in the States where woman suffrage prevails, — the worst thing you can do with the voter is to put him in the excluded class which is deprived of the suffrage, and extinguish hope of returning to it except by some difficult process.

The truth is that the non-voters are of many different kinds. We are familiar with the leakage which is necessary in the vote because of absence of men from home on the day of voting, and illness and old age make a considerable difference, so much so that in 1885, out of the number of voters in Massachusetts who, upon the face of it, were normal voters, which was 465,000, there were only 431,000 legal voters. I have said that there are various classes of non-voters. In the first place, there is the man who does not vote because he is not interested in politics. I am acquainted with a young man 42 years of age who has lived most of his life in Massachusetts, whose only evidence of decision is that he never has cast a vote. Of course that intelligent, educated young man is of very little service to the community in any capacity. He not only never has cast a vote, but he never has done anything in his life that will render any service to the community and he never will do anything.

There is another class of non-voters in whom we all are especially interested, and that is men who fail to vote because by not voting they produce a political effect. I already have alluded to the fact that in some of the southern States the vote is very small, often not over 10 per cent of the registered voters. Why? Why, because in those States the whole thing is decided by the primary; and there is only one party that has the least hope of winning the election, so that the person designated by the primary is certain to be elected, and those who go to the regular polls know it is a matter of form. It would be preposterous to disfranchise 80 or 90 per cent of the voters because they did not go through a process which would have made no difference in the result. And in the same way many members of a party which is in a hopeless minority refrain from voting. Where the party in control might cast three-fourths of the votes, it would be preposterous to deprive the members of the minority party of their vote as a penalty for staying away from the polls on some particular ocasion, when they know they could not accomplish anything by voting. That is to say, there are many reasons for refraining from voting which ought not to be punished by a deprivation of the suffrage.

Another class of non-voters is of great political significance. How did Grover Cleveland come to be President of the United States?
Because in the year 1882 the administration of President Arthur put up as candidate for Governor of New York a very unpopular man, Mr. Folger, Secretary of the Treasury. Against him was nominated Grover Cleveland, who had been mayor of Buffalo but was little known throughout the State. He proved to poll a majority of 192,000.
It made him instantly a National figure; it was seen at once that he would probably be the man to be nominated by the Democrats in 1884. How did he get that majority? He got it because about 200,000 Republicans would, not vote for their party candidate, and they meant to put such a mark on that candidate and the influences that put him there that their party would listen to it. The result was then that not by an accumulation of 200,000 extra Democratic votes, but by the will of 200,000 Republican voters who said: "We would rather have Cleveland for Governor than have one of our men whom we do not like," Cleveland reached the Governor's chair.

Now, I maintain that that is a political right. A man ought not to be deprived of the privilege of declining to vote when declining to vote has a political effect.

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: I should like to ask the speaker if he would approve of an amendment in this form:

Resolved, That the Constitutional Convention have authority to provide for compulsory voting at its sessions.

Mr. HART: If I were the presiding officer I should rule that that amendment is entirely germane. We see for ourselves,—we are not able to compel the vote of our own members, nor even their attendance.
In concluding I wish simply to say that it is a very serious thing for this Convention to disfranchise what, in any one election, may be one-third of the vote. If we want people to vote there is a way to secure a large number of votes, and that is to put up candidates in whom they are interested; not a long ticket in which three-fourths of the names are unknown to them, but a ticket made up of names for responsible and important offices. The great solution of this question is not disfranchisement, but the short ballot.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I move to amend the amendment offered by the member from Cambridge by inserting after the word "authorize", the word "permanent", so that the same shall read: but nothing in this article shall be deemed to authorize permanent disfranchisement as a penalty for the omission to vote.

With this amendment, sir, I see no objection to the amendment.

I might say, sir, if I may be permitted to offer my opinion, that I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) ought to be adopted. I do not intend to take the time of the Convention discussing this question. It was debated at considerable length when the matter was up before, and I think perhaps there are others who desire to be heard. I do, however, desire to move the amendment.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I rather hope that we are going to take a second sober thought on this resolution and look at it for a few moments from a practical standpoint. There is nobody in the Convention who believes more than I do that we should deal with general principles, but we do not want to be so dazzled by glittering generalities that we cannot come down to the practical side of the matter. We do not want to have our heads so high in the clouds that we disregard all the probabilities and possibilities and practicabilities of a matter, and because we think we see a small abuse go ahead in general terms to try to legislate it out of the Commonwealth by putting a provision in the Constitution. I hope we shall look at this thing for a moment from the practical point of view. Now, the Legislature, I am informed, has tried to draft bills for compulsory voting. We were informed by the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) that this started in Virginia, I think it was in 1798, and if he put any more examples to us since that time I did not happen to hear them. Now, what is the difficulty in the way?

Mr. Newton of Everett: May I ask the gentleman also to inform the Convention that South Dakota attempted to put this into operation by law in revising their Constitution, but found that no Legislature was able to put it into satisfactory form.

Mr. Bryant: I was not previously informed of that fact, but I am not at all surprised to hear it. Now, I asked the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) if he would approve a resolution to make compulsory voting necessary in this assembly. Why is it we have not had compulsory voting here if the thing is possible, is practical?

Look at the situation before us. Here are men paid $500 for this session to come here and vote. We are dealing with a body of 320 nominally, and probably only 250 actually, and yet with all the desirability of having people vote, with all the importance of the questions that come before us, nobody has been able, or at least has tried, to frame a resolution that would compel people to come here and vote. Why, if we had such a rule here as the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) wants, we should miss his presence. We should miss him from our meetings forever, because he would be confined in some institution in this Commonwealth on account of his absence from roll-calls.

[Laughter.] I want to remind the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) of another fact. He does not want this passed unless it is provided that a man shall not be deprived of his right to vote. If the gentleman had been present when the resolution went to its second reading he would have heard it argued that this constitutional amendment was needed for the simple and sole purpose of enabling the Legislature to prevent a man from voting, depriving him of his vote. Everybody agreed that the penalty of fine or imprisonment is now within the power of the Legislature. What they disagree about is whether the Legislature now has the power to disfranchise a man for failing to vote, and that is the sole and simple purpose that this amendment is offered to the Constitution to accomplish, just exactly what the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) does not want to accomplish; and if he appreciates the real situation he will vote against this resolution and so will make it impossible for a man to be disfranchised if the Legislature ever finds a way to enforce a reasonable system of compulsory voting.

Mr. Besse of Newburyport: I should like to ask the gentleman if members of the Convention who are not here are not compelled to vote at the time.

Mr. Bryant: I do not think I understand that question. If I do understand it I should answer it in the negative.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I was trying to frame a question that I think the gentleman can understand. I should like to ask the delegate whether at times he would not desire to employ compulsory voting in this Convention.

Mr. Bryant: I think it is desirable not only for every member of this Convention to vote, but I think it is desirable for every legal voter of the Commonwealth to vote; but just because I believe that, and I believe that every man should vote here and elsewhere, I am not going to vote to put into the Constitution of Massachusetts a provision which on its face is perfectly impracticable and which simply throws discredit on the common sense of the Convention, as I believe.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: Does the gentleman think that Rule No. 14, adopted by this Convention, cast any discredit upon the members of this Convention when they adopted it? For his convenience I will read the first sentence of that rule:

Every member present in the Convention when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the Convention for special reasons shall excuse him.

Mr. Bryant: There are two answers to that. One is that nobody compels him to be here, but the resolution now before us would compel a man to go to the voting booth. The second is that I will remind my friend that that rule is not enforced, and that many men sit silent and do not vote when questions are called. If we cannot enforce in this comparatively small body of ours any scheme which will obtain the moral support of a majority of the Convention, if we cannot frame a scheme that will obtain the moral support of the majority of this Convention, to compel a man to be here and vote, how can we reasonably say to the Legislature: "You must compel 750,000 voters to go to the polls"? Is that a reasonable proposition for us to pass, with all the important measures which we have before us, when there is such a chance to confuse the electorate at the next election?

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I should like to ask the gentleman if he believes in compulsory education.

Mr. Bryant: I have no objection to the word "compulsory" in itself. What compulsory education has to do with compulsory voting is not clear to me. Of course I approve of compulsory education.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I should like to ask the gentleman why in this argument he goes into all the details of this matter which is going to be put into the hands of the Legislature.

Mr. Bryant: That is exactly what I was trying to bring out in my position here. I believe we should deal in general principles, but we should not get so general, so far away from the every-day matters of life, that we put into the Constitution something which we cannot any of us imagine a reasonable law being framed to carry out. It has been tried time and time again by the Legislature, I understand not only by this Legislature, but by other Legislatures, to frame something to compel a man to do his duty. That is all I have to say about that.

What is going to be the machinery of this? The advocates of this resolution seem to be in a good deal of doubt as to how it will be enforced. I think on the second reading, if I am not mistaken, those who wanted it passed said that it was not feasible to fine or imprison a man for failure to vote. Now, it is suggested that it is not feasible to deprive him of his franchise. What are you going to do? What pressure are you going to put on him that a reasonable man would support? Ultimately I suppose the question would have to be decided by a court. The advocates of this scheme do not intend to have him automatically deprived of his vote or automatically put in jail if his name does not appear on the voting list. I suppose some kind of complaint would have to be made to the court, and if it was it ultimately would come before a jury. Now, do you suppose that a jury of this Commonwealth is going to convict a man and put him in jail for failure to go and vote at an uncontested election, for instance? Would any jury of this Commonwealth put in jail a woman for failing to vote for school-committee, when there were only the same number of candidates that there were places on the ballot?

Mr. McAnarney: Does the gentleman feel competent to advise us how a jury will decide any given case?

Mr. Bryant: I am not as competent as the gentleman who last spoke, but there are certain things which I think common experience would indicate to our minds that a jury will not do. There are plenty of laws on the statute-books at the present time that cannot be enforced simply because they are not supported by the moral sense of the community. One of the laws or ordinances is the law about spitting on the sidewalk. Every man who spits on the sidewalk in Boston is technically liable to a fine of $5 or imprisonment, but in recent years has anybody heard of anybody being fined for that offense? They were for a while, but the moral sentiment of the community did not support it, and now it is practically a dead letter.

Mr. Cox of Boston: I should ask the gentleman in this division if he is not aware that there were numerous prosecutions under that act, and that fines were paid, and that the result has been that if the gentleman lives in Boston or goes through Boston he can walk on any of our streets and find that the sidewalks are absolutely free from sputum deposited upon them by other passersby. And I will ask him if that law has not accomplished a great deal of good and is not practically enforced everywhere to-day in the city.

Mr. Bryant: That law to my knowledge is not practically enforced everywhere to-day in the city. I have seen sputum, to use a polite word, deposited on the sidewalk many and many a time. I have known of its being deposited on the sidewalk by a policeman, and a friend of mine who is very much interested in that kind of thing had the audacity to hand to the policeman a card gotten out by some association or other which said: "Do not deposit sputum on the sidewalk, because if you do it spreads disease." He is still at large, and able to tell about it. But I contend that that law is not enforced to-day and nobody can show me within I think probably five years any conviction.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I should like to ask the gentleman if the element of compulsion is a good or bad thing for us, and, if it is a bad thing, in what laws should it be kept.

Mr. Bryant: We have got back to metaphysics now. Compulsion is necessary if the law is necessary, and compulsion is wrong if you have got the kind of law that is not enforceable or if you are not going to use the compulsion that you have got. That is just my objection to it. So that I say, when a man goes up before a jury, personally I cannot conceive of a jury convicting him if he has the slightest possible excuse for personal absence on that day. Suppose, for instance, the woman suffrage bill shall pass the United States Congress and shall be adopted by the State. Are you gentlemen, or is anybody, going to put women in jail for not voting? Do you not know that if woman suffrage ever does come to pass there will be a very large proportion of women in the Commonwealth who will not approve of voting and who will not want to vote? Are you going to put them all in jail, or are you going to disfanchise them all? I have heard of the statement about leading a horse to water and not being able to make him drink, but this is leading a horse away from the water if you are going to penalize him by disfanchising him for never seeking any water. That is the net result of the proposition which is put before you by the majority of the committee.

Mr. Newton of Everett: I hope the gentleman will not say by the majority of the committee. The committee reported against this resolution.

Mr. Bryant: I apologize for that statement. I recognize the fact as it is.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: In order that the gentleman may understand the situation I want to say to him that there was a small but energetic minority of the committee who believed in the resolution.

Mr. Bryant: I am not going into the metaphysical question of how much a vote is worth coming from a man who does not want to vote, who has not got enough of decency in his makeup to want to exercise his legitimate right to vote. Personally, I do not think his vote is worth anything to the Commonwealth. But I will not attempt to argue that question, because there may be others who consider his vote very valuable under those circumstances. Nor will I deal with the question where a political party nominates a man who is not popular with his own party, against whom there are great objections, but for whom that political party would like to force to the polls the people who are enrolled with them in that party, because they know they will not vote for the other party and that if they go they will vote for the man who is nominated by their own party, although of their own choice they would rather stay away,—and I say under those conditions they have a right to stay away. There is nothing that would better please the "bosses," if there are such, of the Republican party, and the "bosses," if there are such, of the Democratic party, than to be able to say to their followers: "Whoever we nominate, you must go and vote for. You must enroll yourself as a Republican or you must vote for our man, who you think is an improper man to vote for." That is one of the things that would be for the greatest advantage of any political boss or political ring in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH: I should like to ask the gentleman if he takes and votes the ticket straight down through every time.

Mr. BRYANT: I suppose the gentleman wants a political confession of faith. If he wants to know if I have voted the Republican ticket straight through at every election I will say no, I have not, and my sins be on my own head. I always have voted in every election since I have been twenty-one. I know I have not missed one. But everybody knows that when a weak man is put up by the Republicans or by the Democrats it has been the experience of everybody, including the gentleman himself, that one of the ways in which he is defeated is his failure to arouse enthusiasm in his own party. Nobody could make better use of this particular provision of compulsory voting than the boss of a party who has put up an unfit man.

Mr. BESSE: Does the gentleman think that the majority of the voters if compelled to vote would select a weak man?

Mr. BRYANT: I think that the majority of voters, when not compelled to vote, often have elected weak men. If they are compelled to vote I assume the result would be substantially the same, that they sometimes would elect weak men.

Now, I am not going to argue this question any more. We have got a great many things before us. Nobody has offered to this assembly any practical means of enforcing, or any law passed by any Legislature, as far as I know, enforcing compulsory voting. We are putting on the statute-books something that is not needed, unless you mean to disfranchise a certain number of the voters, unless, for example, you mean to disfranchise a lot of women in this Commonwealth who do not go and vote at school elections. Now, although they have the right to vote, in most cases the election is a foregone conclusion. There is no sense in the women going up and voting when there are only three candidates and three offices to be filled, and you cannot blame the women for not voting very much under those circumstances, and you cannot put a woman in jail, whatever my friend in the third division says a jury may do. I say no jury will put a woman in jail under those circumstances.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The extraordinary interest in the gentleman from Cambridge needs some attention. The gentleman who has just spoken and myself are quite in accord on many points, but apparently he was not here at the critical moment in the last discussion, when I introduced my amendment with the express purpose of limiting the future power of the Legislature in this respect. The proposition to punish those who fail to do their duty, as voters has many merits. It may be carried out. It may be possible to provide some system of fine or otherwise, something that will cause the voter to sit up.

For this purpose three different propositions have been made at various times. The first is a money fine. The second is a fine in proportion to the taxes that a man already pays, say 25 per cent of his annual taxes to be added to those taxes if he fails to vote at a particular time. A third method is to provide that a man shall be placed on the jury-list, if he fails to vote; that he shall be disfranchised, upon the theory, apparently, that if a man is a bad voter he will make an excellent juryman. Doubtless there are other methods that might be found. It is not my business to find them. I did not introduce this measure, but I am not opposing the main proposition, unless the amendment which I have proposed against making exclusion from the suffrage a penalty for failing to vote should fail. The resolution without this is dangerous, because it confers upon the General Court, if this amendment should pass without the restriction which I have suggested, the power to alter the constitutional limitations and conditions of suffrage; that is, to set up a new system of qualifications of voters.

Something has been said here about compulsory schooling. Why, of course children are compelled to go to school, but what happens if they do not appear on a particular morning? Are they excluded for the rest of their lives, or even for a week, from the privilege of going to school?

How is it with the compulsion to vote in this assembly? That is a question of parliamentary law which in other bodies has been differently settled. John Quincy Adams once rose in his seat in the House of Representatives of the United States and protested that it was an outrage on the rights of his constituents to compel him to vote. Supposing we are compelled to vote, and supposing the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) unfortunately is delayed one morning and is excluded; what is the penalty? Is he excluded from voting on any more roll-calls while this Convention holds? Why, the sole object of this amendment is to secure more votes, to get more voters to go to the polls and to exercise the suffrage. Without the amendment that I have proposed the effect will be to reduce the number of voters. So far as we can see, it may be in the power of future Legislatures, as a penalty for one omission to vote, to ruin a man for life by an exclusion from his rights as a freeman. Against any such possibility I here protest.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I move an amendment now in the hands of the Clerk,—adding at the end thereof the words: “or to encourage such voting”, so as to read:

The General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting at elections or to encourage such voting.
It may seem to some members, and in fact it does to me, that the wording of that resolution as we have it is pretty strong. It may be found a difficult matter to compel voters to exercise the right of suffrage, and I think such a modification as would be made by the adoption of the short amendment which I have offered, at the end of the resolution, will modify it so that it may seem more reasonable and be more easily enforced.

This encouragement might be given by the way of abating a tax to the man who exercised the right of suffrage, or by some other method which would appeal to him with sufficient strength and force to induce him to go to the polls, and I think it wise that something of this kind should be adopted by this Convention. I would favor also, if this is adopted, the amendment as offered by the gentleman in the fourth division from Cambridge (Mr. Hart), which I think would make the matter complete and sufficiently strong and forceful.

Mr. Albert H. Washburn of Middleborough moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "but the right of secret voting shall be preserved".

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: There is no occasion for me to consume the time of the Convention, beyond making a very brief statement in relation to this amendment. The amendment carries itself. It may be said that it is unnecessary, but I would point out that the Legislature in proposing the 38th Article of Amendment in relation to voting-machines, deemed it wise to incorporate language of this sort. It is quite true that there is no imminent danger of an attack being made upon the right of secret voting, but no man can tell when the hour and day may come when it will be made. It is an interesting fact that the great row, the historic row in the Convention of 1853, in connection with the Berlin vacancy, was not over the power of the Convention to fill vacancies; the storm broke out because the Legislature of 1853 sought to amend the Convention Act of 1852 by requiring in effect delegates of the Convention to be elected by an open rather than by a closed ballot.

Just one word more. Possibly it may be urged that the language proposed is inapt in so far as the word "preserve" is used. I say in answer to this that every State which has sought to protect the right of secret voting has used just this language. That is true in Pennsylvania, it is true in New York, and we have our own precedent right here in Massachusetts.

I believe, although he will speak for himself, that the amendment which I propose is acceptable to the gentleman who originally introduced this resolution, and I trust it will find the favor of the Convention.

Mr. Newton: The committee reported adversely on this resolution because they believed that there was only one thing needed to put into the Constitution to give the Legislature the right or power to force people to go to the polls, and that was the right to disfranchise them. We have heard nothing so far in this debate, either from the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) or the others who have spoken, that has left any doubt in the mind of any person but what to-day the Legislature has all the power that it needs, if it sees fit to use it, to compel people to go to the polls. The only power they have not, that there is any question about, is the right to disfranchise voters if they fail to go to the polls. Therefore we thought that we ought not for one moment to give the Legislature that power. Now, if you propose to submit this constitutional amendment to the people you ought to submit it knowing fully what you are doing. If you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) you simply are reenacting the Constitution as it is to-day. If you propose to give the Legislature the power to disfranchise a voter, then you ought to consider very carefully before you give them that power, because it is easy to contemplate what a Legislature under such conditions might do, wherein it could disfranchise a large proportion of the citizens contrary to the desire of the people themselves. Not that I desire to impose myself on the Convention except as a personal matter, but I am somewhat disturbed that this Convention should not see that in passing this resolution as it was substituted the other day it says to the Legislature: "You may disfranchise a voter." If you adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Cambridge you simply go right back to what the law is to-day, as we understand it, and you are gaining nothing at all in this situation.

Mr. Hart: May I ask the gentleman what would be the effect if the amendment were to be adopted and sent to the people without the safeguard of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cambridge?

Mr. Newton: How can I answer that question? The effect? I do not know that. I am told by the labor people that they are going to vote for this resolution, because they think it will make elections a public holiday, which they think ought to be done. I do not know what the effect would be of submitting a proposition like this; but I know this, that if the people were told that it was to give the right to the Legislature to disfranchise a voter, I have too much respect for the intelligence of the people of this Commonwealth to believe for one moment that they would vote in favor of it.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I should like to know the source of authority of the gentleman as to speaking of labor people. He did not make any exceptions. Certainly I have not heard any suggestion to that effect from any source.

Mr. Newton: The gentleman did not state the proposition as I stated it. I said that I had been informed that the labor people who favored this proposition believed that it would help or assist toward having election day a public holiday. If the gentleman represents the labor people, and they are opposed to this proposition, I am very glad to know it, because the vote the other day did not seem to show that situation.

I want to say one word more. The Supreme Judicial Court, in its very recent decision, 224 Mass., in the question of the Attorney-General v. The Commissioners of Boston, who were laying out, as you remember, the districts for election of representatives, used this expression:

The right to vote is fundamental, personal, and a perpetual right.

Now, I think we ought to consider that carefully. I do not know how it could be stated better. The right of the individual to vote! Not a person in this Convention, no advocate of this measure, for a moment admits that it is possible under the present method of the secret ballot, if you are to retain the secret ballot, to compel a person to vote. They say simply that we shall compel people to go to the polls, and we think that by compelling them to go to the polls somehow or other we will educate them into the idea of voting. Now, think for a moment what that means,—passing a constitutional amendment, suggesting it to the people on the theory that you can accomplish nothing by it except possibly make a person go to the polls, taking away, as you propose to do, from the people, from the voter, this fundamental right that is his, and giving it into the hands of a Legislature to disfranchise him if he refuses to do what they think that he ought to do under that.

I want to say something, too, to my friend from Holyoke who asked a question about compulsory education. Yes, we believe in compulsory education of the youth, but I want to ask him if he believes that we should compel them to go to a certain prescribed school. That is what he proposes here. I think if this Convention would stop to think for a moment and would consider for a moment and get themselves beyond the theoretical idea of the word "compulsion" they never for one moment would propose to put into the hands of the Legislature the right to take away from the voter that "fundamental, personal and perpetual right" that should be his, simply because a few men refuse to exercise that right.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: This question of voting is a very interesting one. Some of us would like to vote. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Barrett of Cambridge: On hearing the argument made by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), the Convention would be led to believe that some disaster was about to come to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is not the intention of the resolution or the amendment thereto approved of by this Convention that any such condition should exist. Of the hundreds of measures presented in this Convention the resolution under discussion is the simplest of the entire number. It simply makes provision that the General Court shall have authority to enact a law providing for compulsory voting at elections. That is simplicity in itself. It is not the intention of the gentleman who has introduced the measure that any man or any woman should go to jail for not complying with this simple form of going to the polls and voting at the right time and right place. To my mind, it is a step in the right direction. I have somewhat of a recollection of the time the Australian ballot system went into operation, and at that particular time the very same opposition that has arisen here to-day was directed against the Australian ballot system; and is there any sane man in this Convention or in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts who would go back to the old system of voting, when capital and labor, one just as bad as the other, controlled not only the votes but the views, in a great many instances, of the electors? I remember in the country where I was born and bred, the landlord would stand and scrutinize the vote of the tenant before it was deposited in the ballot-box. Every Nation of progress has adopted this very resolution that we are discussing now. In little Belgium, one of the most prosperous countries in Europe, it has been in operation for a number of years, and successfully. In Switzerland, Spain, Tasmania, New Zealand, where the Australian ballot originally came from, it is in operation successfully. There are two classes of men this will strike, in the event of the people voting in its favor and the Legislature enacting a law, namely, the ward heelers, the professional politician and the idle rich. I remember in my city a few years ago Mr. A did not go to vote. Mr. B said: "Mr. A, by the way, you have not voted to-day." Mr. A replied: "No, I am rather busy, I cannot vote to-day." Mr. B said: "By the way, you did not vote last year or the year before." Mr. A replied: "Well, that is my business. That is none of your business." The following year the two gentlemen met and Mr. A said to Mr. B: "What is the matter with our city government?" "I see nothing the matter with our city government," replied Mr. B. "Why, yes, my tax bills this year indicate that the taxes have risen $1.50 on the thousand," was Mr. A's complaint. "Just as you voted for, just as you required," answered Mr. B. "You were too busy last year to go and select the right men, and you are just having the condition of affairs that you are a part and parcel of." On the other hand, we will have the ward heeler, with 25, 30, 40 or 100 men to vote just as he says. I do not mean to assert that this will cure us of all ills, but I believe it is a step in the right direction, it is a step in the line of progress, and I am rather surprised that some of the advocates of the initiative and referendum should stand on the floor of this Convention and oppose any meritorious measure like this. I have no particular objection to the amendments, and I hope that the resolution will pass in its amended form.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: I did not take pains to dissent in the committee on this proposition. I think perhaps one reason why I did not dissent was because I was so fond of the chairman that I did not like to antagonize him; but I think this is something which properly may and should be written into the fundamental law of the State. It occurs to me it has been said in regard to sumptuary legislation,—I think I am right,—that the great value of sumptuary legislation is not in compelling obedience, but in crystallizing and emphasizing popular sentiment. That is what the prohibitory law has done. We just started by popular sentiment. And I never have seen anything work like the present compulsory draft law. Compulsory military service. During the civil war expressions of disloyalty were overlooked throughout the north. As I read about the American Revolution the word "copperhead" originated in the American Revolution. Toryism, copperheadism, were not visited with anything like the amount of public contumely that any disloyalty is to-day. Why, I remember that down in the village of Freedom, Maine, which I happen to know about, a man raised a battalion for the rebel army after Fort Sumter was fired upon, and all that was done to him was to send him down to Fort Lafayette in New York harbor, when he was allowed to go free after a short time. At the present time you hear no expressions of disloyalty. Why, if you judge human nature by what you read in the newspapers, three or four years ago, as to the lowness and falsity of human nature, and you compare it with the tremendously high standard of patriotism and of moral conduct and of ideal sentiment at the present time, it is wonderful. There are no expressions of disloyalty. Compulsory military service, the compulsory draft, aside from its practical application, centralizes and emphasizes the sentiment of the community.

I confess that personally I should like this law, because I should like to drag about five hundred citizens of Saugus by the ear to the polls,—the men who have not any particular, strong superiority to other people, except that they wear boiled shirts seven days in the week, for they do not work in the General Electric, or in the shoe-shop, or on the farm, but who think they know so much that they sneer at anybody who takes part in politics. I want to get hold of that disloyalty, and I want to drag people to the polls and make them vote. And I want to emphasize the fact that when you say in the woman suffrage discussion that voting is a duty it should be written into the fundamental law of the Commonwealth that it is a duty, and I want people compelled to vote. I should just as lief have the strongest kind of penalty for them for not voting, but the Legislature will provide a penalty. Let this be written into the fundamental law, and the Legislature will provide a penalty, and we shall emphasize the fact, which needs emphasis, does it not? Take the men all round you who sneer at anybody who takes part in politics. They not only do not take part themselves, they do not go and vote, but they sneer at you if you go to the houses trying to get out the vote. Your missionary spirit may be as lofty as that of any missionary who ever went to Africa or the Sandwich Islands. You may desire only the good of your community, mixed sometimes with some selfishness, perhaps, but it is largely on the basis that you want the community well run, you want the vote gotten out. If you put this into the fundamental law of the State you will put it where it belongs, and these fellows, these 500 in Saugus and 10,000 in Boston or elsewhere, who never come out to vote unless they want a little piece of road or sidewalk, or something in their school, but who never come out to vote for the general good and who sneer at the people who do take part in politics, you will go on record as emphatically as in your prohibitory law, your compulsory draft law, or any other sumptuary legislation, if I use the right term, which formulates the best moral sense of the community. I hope it will pass without much further discussion.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: My views on this resolution I stated at some length the other day. I do want at this time to say that so far as I personally am concerned, I have no objection to the proposed amendments. I am particularly impressed, however, with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn).

Now, as to the matter of disfranchising the voter, I hardly can bring myself to believe that a gentleman of the experience in matters political of the chairman of the Suffrage Committee (Mr. Newton) gave the matter serious thought before he urged his arguments upon this Convention. Is there not a law on our books to-day disfranchising voters of this Commonwealth if they fail to have their names placed upon the voting list, and have we heard any complaint against it because men were disfranchised by it? When I say “disfranchised”, when the term disfranchised is used, let us understand whether it means disfranchised for all time or merely temporarily. If a man is a registered voter to-day in a given community we need no argument to show that under the law of this Commonwealth such a man next year may be disfranchised for that year at least because he fails to have his name put upon the registered voters list.

Mr. BRYANT: If the gentleman’s argument that a man is disfranchised because he does not go to register at the polls is a sound argument, of course the argument that he is disfranchised to-day because he does not go and vote, is sound also. If he is disfranchised because he does not go and register, of course the gentleman can argue with equal truth that he is disfranchised if he stays away voluntarily from the polls.

Mr. McANARNEY: If the gentleman is referring to the same man because he does not become a registered voter, of course he is temporarily disfranchised; but if a registered voter stays away from the polls he is not disfranchised. What happens in such a case? He is faithless to the trust the law put upon him when it put him in the exalted position of one of the registered voters of this Commonwealth. That is what happens to that man and not disfranchisement. What I appeal for, and what I hope to see in this Commonwealth, is a quickening of the sense of the people with regard to the duty of voting. The duty of voting is a sacred duty. It is the duty of a trustee. To every man on whom the law confers that privilege it says: “You are among the men into whose hands is given the exercise of all the political rights and liberty of the rest of the community.” I want such a man to realize that the duty carries with it a responsibility. He should discharge his duty or resign his trust, or suffer some other penalty. The penalty is for the Legislature to determine. It may be a fine. It may be one thing or another. It may be disfranchisement for a year or for a limited period of time. I believe there is an adequate remedy for such a neglect of duty, and it can be found.

If the initiative and referendum be adopted this fall by the people of this Commonwealth do we not then want this law on our books? Do we want only those people going to the polls and voting who are interested in the special matter they have had put upon the ballot? Do we not want all the people of this Commonwealth charged with the knowledge in advance that they are going to be obliged to go to the polls on election day and vote, and with that knowledge in advance determine how they shall discharge their trust by studying the ballot and carefully studying the questions they will be called to pass upon? The initiative and referendum, it seems to me, if it is adopted, will need this for the safety of the Commonwealth.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Newton: It is perhaps a dangerous thing for professors to disagree, in the open at any rate, but I hope that the amendment which has been offered by my learned friend from Cambridge in the fourth division (Mr. Hart) will not be adopted, and I hope so because I think it is totally unnecessary. The Constitution now provides the qualifications of a voter, and although it has been amended many times the simplest part of it remains in these words:

Every male citizen of twenty-one years of age and upwards, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, who shall have resided within the Commonwealth one year and within the town or district in which he may claim a right to vote six calendar months, etc., shall be entitled to vote.
I maintain that it is just plain, elementary common sense that the addition of a clause to the Constitution in the same form in which we have it here in this proposed amendment providing for compulsory voting, does not add to and cannot subtract one syllable from the qualifications of a voter as they are fixed in the Constitution at the present time. In other words, if this amendment is adopted the qualifications for a voter will remain exactly as they are now, and the Legislature, in my judgment, would not be within its constitutional rights in attempting to impose disfranchisement as a penalty for failing to vote. That still would be beyond its constitutional power. I am in favor of the amendment as it stands now upon the calendar, and I hope that it will pass.

Let me state again the testimony which I stated the other day in the few simple words which came from the Argentine Republic, the most progressive and stable of all the countries of South America. The Ambassador from that country to this country says that the governmental features of his country which are the most noteworthy as contributing to the advance of that Nation are three: Compulsory education, compulsory military service and compulsory voting. I believe that the Legislature will find plenty of ways to put such a plan into operation without trampling upon anybody's toes, and that even if the Legislature never passed a law that the threat of compulsory voting standing in the Constitution itself would be sufficient to cure a large part of the indifference which now exists on the part of the voter.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I think those who advocate compulsory voting have formed their judgments from surface indications. I think still we may entertain hope of killing this proposition despite the opposition of the member from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) and some others. Now, speaking with regard to surface indications, there were 1,091,000 assessed polls in Massachusetts in 1917 and but 634,606 registered voters; in other words, two-thirds only of the assessed polls were registered as voters. So some members, therefore, say that one person in every three who failed to register was a slacker. This is not true, for one very excellent reason why that one-third was not registered is found in the very restricted naturalization laws, which operate to debar well-intentioned aliens from becoming citizens. They are obliged, for instance, to go to the county seat to become naturalized, many being obliged to travel from ten to twenty miles in some counties and even twenty-five miles in some others to take advantage of the law. It is necessary that he shall repeat the journey, making two trips, on the second paper. Again, Massachusetts requires of American citizens a longer period of residence within the State and within the city or town as a qualification for voting than what two-thirds of the other States require. Thirty-four States require a shorter period of residence within the city or town, three months or less being the limit in most of them. Six months' residence is required in Massachusetts. In some others only ten to twenty days' residence is required, — in six out of those thirty-four States, as a matter of fact, — three-fourths of the States in the Union. A great many of the one-third of the unregistered assessed polls are unable to register because of residence on April 1 in some other city. These men, because of industrial exigencies and the seasonal character of their occupation, frequently do not stay long enough in any single community to meet the excessive residence requirement of Massachusetts' registration laws. Then if they do happen to stay a year or two in a city and become registered, they often are compelled, when hard times come, to secure employment at a distance. Often it happens they go so far away that the expense of returning to vote, coupled with the loss of pay incidental to the time off, is an insurmountable item. An Essex County voter, temporarily employed in Berkshire, for instance, would be forced to lose three days' employment and assume the expense of the trip.

Now, are these well-intentioned people who go by surface indications going to say to a man like that, with a large family in Haverhill: "You have got to pay a $5 or $10 fine," or in the case cited more than twice that sum, when his family needs the money he sends by mail to maintain the house? Under the easiest circumstances he is obliged to pay living expenses in two places.

The people, by a mandate last year of more than three to one, instructed the Legislature to pass an absentee voting law. The Legislature failed to do it. The only absentee voting law they passed applies to those men in the army or navy. If the Legislature had obeyed the people, the shoe worker, registered, for instance, in Haverhill, but working in Dalton, or anywhere, could vote by mail and thus be saved the great expense now necessary.

Furthermore, if election day were a holiday it would help solve the problem of the unrecorded vote. But what would help most of all would be the adoption of a policy by which representation should be based on the number of people who do come to the polls and vote a certain ticket. No one then would be throwing his vote away; everyone would have an inducement to attend the polls and vote, because every citizen would count one if he cast a vote. It would be to his interest to vote, whereas, under the present system, if a district is three to one Republican, there is no inducement for a Democrat or for a member of any minority party to vote in that district.

The amendment moved by Mr. Clark was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Buttrick was adopted, by a vote of 75 to 49.

The amendment moved by Mr. Hart, as amended, was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Washburn of Middleborough was adopted.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading Thursday, August 1, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 108 to 96, in the following form:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting at elections, but the right of secret voting shall be preserved.

The resolution was read a third time Tuesday, August 13.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: Since this matter was last before the Convention for discussion certain eventualities have served to further complicate the issues which it then presented. I had hoped that the opinion of the Convention, deliberating upon certain difficulties which seem so evident in the way of carrying out the provisions, might induce to a change of belief. I simply should like to call the attention of the Convention to one or two of the things which have served to complicate the issue. The matter as first presented has been amended. It now stands before us with the remarkable provision, by way of assurance, that no one who violates the legislative provision, which may be enacted under this resolution, shall be penalized therefor by being disfranchised. Now, sir, I hope that the significance of that amendment, an amendment which piles absurdity upon anomaly, will become wholly apparent to every member of this Convention.

Mr. BUTTRICK of Lancaster: I think that the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Webster) is in error. The amendment which he refers to, and which he thinks was adopted, was defeated at the last reading of the resolution. The amendment was offered, I think, by the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) and was not adopted. The only amendment adopted was the one which is printed in the calendar.

Mr. WEBSTER: I accept the correction and the information of the honorable member from Lancaster (Mr. Buttrick) with pleasure. I am delighted to find such an evidence of sanity in the friends of this measure.

Now, sir, I suppose that it may be entirely a fruitless task to attempt any further opposition to this matter, in view of the substantial approbation which it has received in the columns of the Boston American. I simply want to point out to that journal, or to any other advocate of the initiative and referendum, one result which I can foresee clearly. Those who recall the form in which we are to present the resolution amending the Constitution, enabling the people to initiate legislation, will recall that no matter presented to them upon initiative petition will be considered as passed to be enacted unless it receives a very substantial proportion of the total vote cast. Now, let us consider what the total vote cast under the system which we propose to inaugurate is likely to be. Men who ordinarily do not care enough about politics to go to the polls at all, when they are subpoenaed to the ballot-box, in my opinion, will discharge their duties as easily as they can. They may vote for something. We do not know that they will make a mark upon their ballot; but assuming that they do they will vote perhaps for Governor, and then if they have a personal friend in some little candidature they may vote for him. The class of men who do not vote now will be a difficult body to approach upon the merits of a legislative measure on the ballot, and I apprehend that in large number they will not register their opinion. By bringing in the tremendous slacker potential vote which already exists upon our check-lists I can foresee clearly that the result of practically every initiative petition that is put upon our ballots is going to be negative; and all effort, whether it is made by the friends of the proletariat or the friends of privilege, is to be absolutely thrown away. I believe that that is one sure and certain result, and I am not altogether certain, sir, but what that result has been foreseen abundantly in certain sagacious quarters.

For many years I have been associated with various reform movements. I have felt the subtle enthusiasm which is aroused in the breast of the reformer upon raising some particular slogan for other. Time was, sir, when I believed that the human race might be regenerated and all our public questions vastly simplified by the adoption, of some one particular simple measure. Experience has chilled somewhat that youthful enthusiasm. I wish that I could enthuse with my friends who see so much benefit, such an all regenerating influence, to flow from this proposition; but, sir, even the initiative and referendum no longer comes to me with a certain promise of absolute reform. I cannot agree with my socialistic friends that the millennium, that golden age of which the prophets and the seers through all the ages have sung and prophesied, is waiting only for a majority vote to go into commission. The millennium is a wary old bird and has evaded us for lo! these many years. [Laughter.] And yet how cheering it is to find among us so many optimists who still believe that by scattering some grains of theory about they may coax it out of the roseate dawn of futurity and put salt on its tail. [Laughter.] Oh, yes, they say, compel everybody to vote,—that is all. Get them into the ballot-boxes. Make the door to the polling-booth look like a soup-kitchen back in 1893. Never mind whether they know what they are voting about or not, get them there. The result will be the salvation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Broderick of Waltham: Whether the right to vote is a privilege which may or may not be exercised by those vested with it, or involves an obligation which the State may require to be fulfilled by imposing some form of punishment for failure to fulfil it, all must admit that the right is a priceless gift, and that those who possess it deserve only censure who regard it with indifference and neglect to exercise it. This fact does not prove, however, that it is wise, necesary or expedient that this particular amendment to authorize the Legislature to provide for compulsory voting should be adopted. What is it more than anything else that makes the right to vote invaluable?
It is the fact that the voter, under our present system, is enabled to express secretly his views on questions of public policy and secretly express his will in the choice of candidates for public office. Withdraw from the voter this secrecy and you deprive him of that element which is most essential and vital to him as a voter. The citizen who votes only as he is directed does not register his own will but that of some one else. It is not long since the method of voting in this State was by the open ballot, and there may be those now who believe in that method, though they do not deem it expedient to suggest or urge openly a return to it. But it is well recognized that there is a negative force as well as a positive force, and that either one or the other may be invoked to make a law ineffective and render it null and void.
The force and effect of any law may be destroyed as effectively and completely by imposing restrictions and limitations upon its enforcement and operation as by an express revocation or affirmative repeal.
It cannot be maintained successfully that compulsory voting can be made practicable or can be enforced without destroying the secrecy of the ballot. If this amendment is intended and calculated to destroy the Australian system of voting, a more effective method hardly could be devised or introduced. But if that is the object of those by whom it has been proposed and is being supported, this fact should be disclosed in order that the issue may be met fairly and openly.

I wish to call the attention of the Convention to section 2 of Article XIV of the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:
Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Now, under this amendment to the Federal Constitution, while a State may deny or abridge a citizen of the United States the right to vote, if it does deny or abridge that right the State's representation in Congress may be reduced as a result. Is this alleged evil of non-voting so great a menace that in order to remove it the secrecy of the ballot should be destroyed and the State's representation in Congress reduced? It seems to me that it is a question that should be dealt with by Congress because it affects the rights of citizens of the United States, and because the power of a State over such citizens has many limitations. In the course of this debate many subjects have been introduced which can have no application. The draft law, for instance, has been referred to; but that law was enacted and is being administered as a great war emergency measure. This amendment is proposed to establish a new and permanent policy in the conduct and control of elections in this State. What may be justifiable and necessary to meet a great emergency may be dangerous and pernicious when applied under normal conditions, and in the ordinary affairs of government. In my opinion, what we need in this State is less rather than more coercion and compulsion in our elections. It should be made an indictable offence for any employer, public or private, or for any person who superintends or directs the industrial operations of the voter, to attempt or undertake to coerce, influence or intimidate that voter in the discharge of his political rights. Such interference with the voter is common and even notorious. But why should members of this Convention deny to the voter the immunity which it reserves to itself? Whether the right to vote is a privilege or an obligation, the voter is not compensated for voting, but members of this Convention receive compensation for their time and service, and yet they are not always in attendance. As members of this Convention we should not be so presumptuous and lordly as to usurp the power conferred by the voter to penalize and punish him, when we know he so often is misguided, deceived and even betrayed by those in whom he confides and upon whom by his vote he has conferred high honors. I believe that if we are to apply compulsion to the voter, we should include the elected or appointed public official and make him subject to be recalled or retired whenever he shall refuse to fulfill pre-election pledges, or whenever in any manner he shall prove false to his trust.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I should like to ask the gentleman if the Congressional representation of any of the southern States has been cut down by reason of the adoption of the so-called grandfather clauses in those Constitutions.

Mr. Broderick: I do not think we should embody in our Constitution an amendment under which the Federal Constitution may be violated, on the theory that it may be with impunity, even if it is a fact that some other States have done so. But I think the gentleman has reference to another article of the Constitution, Article XV, which enumerates certain classes of citizens who shall not be prohibited from voting by any State. Under section 2 of Article XIV a State may deny or abridge to certain citizens the right to vote, but the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

I am aware that there has been added to this amendment the proviso that the right to vote secretly shall be preserved, but this addition only exposes the amendment to ridicule and reduces it to an absurdity. In this form the amendment has no significance or meaning, is nothing but a mere group of words or series of sentences. The question presented to the Convention includes two alternatives, one of which must be adopted or the whole amendment rejected. One is that the Convention adopt an amendment which shall provide in fact and in effect for compulsory voting and thereby destroy the secrecy of the ballot, reduce the representation of the State in Congress and open wide the door for many abuses by the unscrupulous and selfish; or that the Convention adopt an amendment which shall have no significance or meaning. In either form the amendment should be rejected, and I appeal to the sound judgment of members of the Convention to vote against its adoption.

Mr. FITZ-RANDOLPH of Nantucket: I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Provincetown: This question has been pretty thoroughly aired in this Convention. We have had two roll-calls on it, and if the wisdom of this Convention permits its submission to the people it is one which they can answer; they are familiar with it. If you submit it to the people you simply are submitting it to the people who are doing your work in the State to-day and asking them whether they desire to haul in this reserve force which continually hangs back and might properly be termed slackers. The gentleman from Boxford (Mr. Webster) when he raises up this bogey man that was buried a few days ago is very presumptuous, and so was all his argument. Now, the word "compulsory" in this proposition is going to be left to the Legislature. You are going to leave these voters to decide, these patriots who leave their work and go to the polls and vote, not the men who will continue to hang back and find fault. They might say: "The gentleman from Boxford is not my Representative, I did not vote for him," or "The gentleman from Provincetown is not my Representative, I did not vote for him." Yet you are the Representative from that district, and so am I. Do not leave any opportunity for anything of that kind to happen.

Now, I wish to call your attention to a bill that was put in in 1914. The bill provided that if any man was in the precinct during the hours in which the polls were open he should vote; otherwise he should make a proper and reasonable excuse to the registrars. If it was not proper and reasonable he then should receive some publicity and a fine if the Legislature so determined. Now, is not that right? Is not that reasonable? That exempts all men who are outside who will make a reasonable excuse. Their excuse would be that they were not in the precinct during the hours in which the polls were open.

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: I merely want to ask whether, if a voter had gone to his office, out of the precinct where he roomed, it would be sufficient excuse under the act which the gentleman cites.

Mr. SMITH: I should be pleased to answer the gentleman in this way: That the Legislature is going to be clothed with this power. And now that we are speaking of the Legislature, I have been greatly surprised in this Convention by what men have said of it. One day in the week you would think that every man who was a member of the Legislature should be indicted and put in jail, and some of the same men the next week will laud the Legislature and hold them up before the people as one of the most honorable bodies that ever existed in the world. That has been done here in this Convention. Now, I have explicit faith in the Legislature's judgment. It was but a short time ago when the gentleman from Everett, chairman of the committee (Mr. Newton), was aiding the other gentlemen with the information that this had been tried, I think in Dakota, but the Legislature of that State was not able to arrange and fix up any bill that would be workable. At the same time he and quite a good many others in 1912 and 1913 were holding up these little States in the west and telling how progressive they were and what they could do, and yet they were not capable, — he acknowledged it himself, — of framing a law that would fit this case. Now, I tell you if this goes to the people and the people say by a majority that they want it, I do not believe but what the Legislature of Massachusetts has the ability to frame some bill that will be just and be of great benefit to the people.

There is one other question that I should like to impress upon your mind, and every member must realize it, — that we have got questions that are going to be submitted to us and you want the votes of all the people. I say, as I said the other day, that is the question. I did not doubt the honesty and the integrity of these men on the initiative and referendum. I was opposed to it; they were for it and they won. Do they want to go to that part of the electorate who vote, or do they want to submit that question to all the voters?

Mr. KELLEY of Rockland: I had prepared the outlines of a bill which, we were told by an experienced legislator, previous Legislatures had found it impossible to draw, but I have had no opportunity to present it, as the motion for the previous question was made by the gentleman whose face we seldom see, and who now already has disappeared.

The gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) inquired the other day: "Do you mean to put a man in jail if he refuses to vote?" I say No. And to his equally earnest inquiry: "Will you put a woman in jail if she neglects to vote?" my answer is No. The name of this amendment is its worst feature. It is not compulsory voting in the sense of compelling by force. If it read that the Legislature were authorized to make such provision as would insure a higher percentage of voting, or a full percentage of voting, with certain limitations and penalties, then we would know that it is not compulsory voting in the above sense.

I have had no chance to go into it, but I have had some experience in drawing bills, not much, not enough to entitle me to be a doctor of laws; but it is simply, sir, a question of classification. A man after due notice shall go on a list, not of the regular, faithful voters; he shall be upon another list, with due notice of how and when he can get off that list. And the same provisions would apply to registration.
There would be no jail business. We do not want men and women in jail; we want them voting. If this measure be passed this reading, I have the utmost confidence that it can be put in shape to meet the approval of the Convention.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: I hesitate to take even one minute of the time of this Convention, but because of the determined onslaught upon this resolution I want to say a word. The gentleman from Milton in the fourth division (Mr. Bryant) came into this assembly hall the other day when this matter was under discussion, just after the recess hour, and with his characteristic poise arose and made an appeal to common sense. After having said that the gentlemen who were in favor of this resolution were up in the air among the clouds,— and I wondered how he knew they were up there unless he had been there himself,—after having made that statement then he made an appeal for the Convention to come down to the level of common sense, and then,—characteristic again,—he began to make an abstract discussion, even threatening the Convention that he might invade the abstract, abstruse and profound realm of metaphysics. Now, if I know anything about metaphysics it knows nothing about common sense. It even contends that there is no such thing as time and space. Then stalwart common sense rises up to strike back at metaphysics, to contradict, to ridicule metaphysics. If you want to know, gentlemen, what the verdict of common sense is on this question,—
I hesitate to say it, but it will be necessary to leave the halls of this Convention and go out on the street and ask the first man you see, or go home again to your own constituency and begin to interrogate the men who elected you or who opposed you for this Convention, what they think concerning this matter, and you may phrase it as you please, compulsory voting or compulsory attendance at the polls, and invariably every man whom you ask will say instantly: "That is a capital measure, and it ought to go through." Now, gentlemen, that is the verdict of common sense.

I should like to say one other thing in this connection. I have been sorely perplexed and grieved here, not only this session but last summer, because of the method that some members of the Convention constantly employ of labeling measures. Now, the gentleman in the first division who always speaks with imposing figures of speech (Mr. Webster of Haverhill) instantly to-day labeled this resolution as a Boston American resolution. With the unthinking, that label downs the resolution immediately. Its merit counts for nothing. There are other measures here. The moment they come up they are labeled socialistic. That is enough for some members of this Convention.
Now, the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), every time he has spoken on this resolution, has labeled it as unworkable. Unworkable, that's sufficient. Gentlemen of the Convention, we ought to ask ourselves seriously this question: If the will of the people is once expressed concerning a matter, whether or not we are so impotent, we are so devoid of wisdom, we are so lacking in practical common sense, that it is impossible for us to put into execution the will of the people.
Another word. I have heard the word "grafters" used again and again in this Convention. I suppose those who know most about grafting are best able to talk on that subject; but, gentlemen, if I know anything about grafting and grafters the worst kind of a grafter we have in our civilization is the grafter of moral values, the man who constantly is taking benefits and blessings out of the community and never does anything to produce them. Let us place this matter of compulsory voting upon its real basis,—that for men who have a duty in their hand to perform and who refuse to do it, men who reap to themselves the benefits of the community and refuse to carry its responsibilities, there ought to be some method devised at least to embarrass those men into the doing of their duty.

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: I do not know where the entire realm of common sense is that the gentleman refers to, but I know that it is not in the United States, because there is not a single State in the Union that has compulsory voting.

This subject I have expressed myself on at considerable length and have given about all my ideas upon it, but I should like to answer the statement that it has worked well in several communities. If you have taken the trouble to look at the report that was prepared for us by the commission to get information for this Convention, you will have found those different places referred to. I will read them over hastily. Austria, Belgium, Spain, Switzerland, New Zealand, Tasmania. Now, those are the only places that that commission found where this thing was put into force.

I do not know whether the proponents of this measure think that the experience of Tasmania is so valuable to Massachusetts that it is worth more than the experience of all the rest of our own country, or the experience of New Zealand, or the experience of Spain. To those who think that the experience of Spain is valuable I will call attention to the fact that compulsory voting has worked very badly in Spain, and they can read what a Spaniard says about it in this volume. In Tasmania it amounts to this: That if a man does not vote, his name automatically goes off the voting list for the next election. Now, if you want that to come to pass, the Legislature unquestionably can do it now. There is no question that the Legislature can compel a man to register, if he does not vote, in order to get the vote.

Mr. SMITH of Provincetown: I should like to ask the gentleman if he believes that any Legislature that ever was elected or that ever will be elected will disfranchise a man for not voting.

Mr. BRYANT: I am not competent to answer that question. I do not think that they should disfranchise a man for not voting. What they will do or will not do I cannot say; but if they do not do that the only other possible penalty is to put him in jail, and I think still less should a man go to jail for not voting, because a fine means jail, $5 or five days. That is the only way you can frame it.

The reason I really object to this is because it is a piece of paternalistic legislation. I do not believe it is workable. I do not believe it is for the benefit of the community if it can be worked. I am reinforced in my belief that it is paternalistic and nothing else by the arguments that are put up here to support it. The first argument that has been offered to you by the eloquent gentleman who is not here to-day (Mr. McAnarney) is that we believe in compulsory education. I believe in compulsory education,—for children. Does he believe in compulsory education for grown-ups? I believe that every healthy boy should get spanked once in a while, but I do not believe in a whipping-post for men or a ducking-stool for women. I believe that boys should go to bed at nine o’clock, but I do not believe in the curfew law.

The second argument that is used is the military argument. You compel people to do things in the army, therefore you should compel them to vote! Is it possible that a majority of this assembly sees no difference between a man in the army and a free citizen outside of the army? Why, you compel a man in the army to go to bed at a certain hour. You compel him to wear certain clothes. You provide him with food. You provide for every minute of the day what he shall do. It is paternalism, pure and simple, the best example of paternalism there is. It is a necessary paternalism, for you cannot run an army in any other way, but you can run a country some other way, and we have run this country without paternalism ever since it was started. I object to an amendment that goes back to the old days when they tried to control every activity which a man had in the course of his daily life.

Mr. BUTTRICK of Lancaster: Just a few words in relation to what my friend from Milton (Mr. Bryant) has been saying. You would judge by his argument that we were attempting to pass a compulsory voting bill. We are doing nothing of the kind. He has referred to the countries where compulsory voting exists. Compulsory voting will not exist in Massachusetts if this article becomes a part of the Constitution. It all remains for the Legislature of Massachusetts to say whether or not they desire to pass any legislation upon the subject. It merely authorizes and gives to the Legislature a right to provide for compulsory voting. So let us not be led away from the main track upon the question of what compulsory voting has done here or what compulsory voting has done there. We merely put it into the Constitution and leave it for the Legislature of Massachusetts to say how it shall be carried out. As a matter of fact, my friend neglected to read to the Convention the fact that in North Dakota the Constitution provides that the Legislature may prescribe penalties for failing, neglecting or refusing to vote at any general election, and up to date the Legislature has done nothing. Possibly they will do the same in Massachusetts. But let us not be led astray about all the evils of compulsory voting when you cannot have compulsory voting if this resolution goes into the Constitution until and unless the Legislature of Massachusetts sees fit to pass a bill.

The resolution was passed to be engrossed Tuesday, August 13, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 96 to 90.

It was considered again Thursday, August 15, the question being on submitting it to the people, and it was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 104 to 106.

On the following day, Mr. Barrett of Cambridge moved that this vote be reconsidered.

Mr. BARRETT of Cambridge: I move that we reconsider the vote whereby resolution No. 282 was rejected at last Thursday’s session.
This resolution has been before the Convention for the last two years. I had the honor of introducing it. I believe it to be one of the most meritorious measures that has confronted the Convention during our two years in session. I believe that it ought to be reconsidered and submitted to the people. It is a progressive measure. I believe that the progressive leaders of this Convention are in favor of this measure. I am very much opposed to the haphazard manner in which it was rushed through last Thursday, though by no means through any fault of the Chair. We had gentlemen voting on the measure last Thursday who never had attended a single session of this Convention this year. They were brought in for that particular and specific cause and reason to defeat the resolution, and thereby to my mind not only misrepresented the views of their constituents but the entire views of the citizens of this State by depriving them of an opportunity to express their views on the matter through the ballot. I believe the matter should be submitted to the people, that we should give the people a chance to vote on this meritorious resolution, and for that reason I hope the matter will be reconsidered.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: I hope this matter will be reconsidered, because all parties to this discussion admit that the right to vote, the exercise of the franchise, is a duty. All parties agree that it is a duty. At the present time there is a great deal said in the newspapers about directors who do not direct, and almost everybody is in favor of compelling them to direct and to attend to their business of directing. How can you be in favor of compulsory service of directors who do not direct and be opposed to compulsory action in regard to voters who do not vote? The beginning of the majestic preamble of our Constitution is that the end of the institution, maintenance and administration of government is to secure the existence of the body politic, to protect it and to furnish the individuals who compose it with the power of enjoying in safety and tranquility their natural rights and the blessings of life. What excuse can you find for a man who does not attend to that duty that is imposed upon him in that dignified and majestic language?

Mr. Creed of Boston: The gentleman is speaking about not attending to duties. He is speaking now on the motion to reconsider. I should like to ask him if it is not a fact that the mover of reconsideration and also the speaker himself do not appear on this roll-call that we had last Thursday.

Mr. Bennett: I do not know about it. It is too insignificant a question to require an answer. This is a large public question. I do not know whether he appeared or not. I have not appeared sometimes when I ought to have appeared.

And that brings me to a suggestion in regard to this matter. The only objection that is made to this is that possibly it cannot be enforced. Now, who could the gentleman say is in favor of repealing the Ten Commandments because sometimes we regret to say we cannot enforce them in our own cases? If I had time, I should like to make a differentiation between moral laws and laws of expediency or administration. Why, there is no law so difficult of enforcement as the laws against the social evil, but nobody ever has thought we should not have those laws. When you come to questions of moral laws like that, one of the highest authorities of the Federal government, who is a member of this Convention, informs me that for the first time in all history there is not a house of prostitution in the city of Boston to-day. Laws embracing a moral principle are to be adopted even though they may be difficult of enforcement.

Now, I do not say that this is the most important measure of this session, but I do say that if we pass this on to the people, if we express the sentiment of the Convention in favor of this measure, there will be no matter in this Constitution which, as the years go by, we will look back to with greater satisfaction and a fuller sense of having done our duty than we will to this one, and it is fully and wholly in line with the original great compact in the cabin of the Mayflower.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I can conceive no sound reason why the people should not be permitted to pass on the question as to whether the Legislature should have power to deal with the subject of compulsory voting. That is the question now. The question is not one of legislation; the question is one of grant of power to the Legislature. I have no confident opinion as to whether the Legislature could or could not work out an effective and successful system of compulsory voting. But I do submit that it is a subject which requires attention, and it is a subject to which the Legislature should be given power to give attention. These are times when the duties of citizenship come home to us. The sons of many of us here present are volunteers in the army of the Nation. It is possible that the sons of others have been drafted. The greatest example of American citizenship shown since the civil war is the effective application of the draft law.

Now, I am not willing, as the father of one son who has volunteered, as the colleague of other fathers whose sons have volunteered, as a citizen who believes in the right of the Nation to draft men into the military service to do service on foreign soil, to sit by and see this Constitutional Convention refuse power to the Legislature of Massachusetts to draft men to the performance of their duty at the polls. There is your issue. [Applause.]

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: It was not my purpose to enter into any further discussion of the merits of the proposition, which has been debated abundantly through four stages of its passage, but I must recur for a moment to some of the delightful consistencies and congruities with which the history of this discussion has been replete.

In the first place, we have the proponents of this measure so filled with enthusiasm for the proposition that voters should be escorted to the polls with the hand of a policeman at their elbow, that they forgot when the measure was to be reached, and it went by default the first time that it was read on the calendar, and then by courtesy, the matter was reconsidered. Those gentlemen had abundant opportunity to present every possible phase of their argument to this Convention. And, perhaps somewhat under the spell of the delightful personality and strong argument of our good friend the honorable delegate from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney), the Convention upon its first vote carried this proposition by a majority of 40 votes.

Allusion has been made to haphazard discussion. Sir, if ever there was a proposition which in its passage through a legislative body indicated the influence of a campaign of education and the effect of sober second thought and deliberation, I maintain that that example is before us. This proposition has been voted upon by this assemblage four times. In its first vote, as I remarked, it was carried by a majority of 40 votes. Upon its second reading, that was cut down to a majority of twelve votes. Upon the third vote, by roll-call, that majority was further reduced to one of six votes, and upon the fourth contest it was defeated by two votes. Now, sir, I maintain that that result was not fully to be attributed to the shifting personnel of the various meetings which acted upon it, but there was a real change of opinion in the minds of some deliberate and thoughtful members of this Convention, and I further believe that nothing is to be gained by any further attempt to prolong discussion upon it.

I want to call the attention of the Convention to this fact: That many men have supported this compulsory voting proposition who at the same time are enthusiastic advocates of biennial elections. Consider how these gentlemen will go to the people in advocacy of those measures. In one case they will say the trouble is that men do not feel their responsibility to go and vote, and they must take more of an interest in politics. "Politics is a serious business, and you ought to devote more time to it, and you ought not to hesitate to sacrifice your personal or business interests," they will say. "You must go to the polls, and we are going to see that you go. If you do not go to the polls you will be jailed, because we are not going to disfranchise you. Heaven save the mark, you probably will be jailed for contempt. And then you will come under the provisions of the absentee voting law, and we will send a polling clerk to the jail and poll your vote there." That is what they are saying by one of these measures, that "You are not voting enough. You are not sufficiently disregarding your private interests." Then, on the other hand, they will say: "Why, the whole trouble with this State is that we are harassed and overwrought with politics. We have too much to do. We have to vote two or three times a year, and it is absurd for busy men to be required to give up their time to go and vote so often." And so they are going to regenerate every condition of life in the Commonwealth by saying that we shall vote only half as often as we are voting now.

Mr. Newton of Everett: The trouble with this is that it is not true. The whole Convention has misled itself by the words "compulsory voting." Even the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), who was not present at the former debate, has failed to understand what this would do. There is not a man in this Convention who for one moment dares to say that as long as we retain the secret ballot we can compel a man to vote. All this possibly could do would be to compel a man to attend the polls, and it ought to have been so designated. I suggested to the committee on Form and Phraseology that they should change the title, but they did not see their way clear to do that. If we should take this measure as it is and put the proper heading on it, and say to the voters: "We want to give the Legislature authority to compel a man to go to the polls," it would not have any standing at all; but when the words "compulsory voting" are used it seems somehow to sufficiently mislead us to make us think we are voting for something that has some particular advantage. There is not any doubt, either, in the mind of any lawyer here but what the Legislature has all the power that this would give it, namely, the power to make provisions in regard to voters attending the polls; but if you want to give the Legislature the power to disfranchise a voter, if you want to give them that power, then you ought to reconsider this measure and put it into some kind of shape, so it will give them that power irrespective of the fact of the secret ballot. Otherwise this measure ought to be left where it was left by the Convention last Thursday.

Mr. Powers of Newton: It seems to me that the Convention is losing sight of one very important consideration, and that is that our government, not only National but State, rests upon an expression of public opinion. In other words, this resolution proposes to give to the Legislature the right to require an expression of public opinion upon the election of officers, and that is as far as it goes. We have compulsion in the performance of about all the duties connected with political life. We are compelled to serve upon juries, we are compelled to pay taxes for the support of the country, we are compelled to give military service for the defence and protection of the country; and yet we hesitate to say that any one shall be compelled to express his opinion, which is the foundation of the government in which we live.

I appreciate that this is a non-partizan Convention. We are here not as Republicans, not as Democrats, not as Progressives; but one of the great parties of the State already has discussed this question and has embodied the proposal in the platform upon which it elected its Governor, and I ask permission to read from the platform of the Democratic party. I am not sure but that all Democrats here are in favor of compulsory voting. I notice that my friend from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), who is back here from the performance of important services at the National capital, has come here to say a word in support of this proposition. In doing this he represents the great party to which he belongs. Now, the Democratic State Convention adopted this as the platform upon which they elected the Governor of the Commonwealth:

It is as much the duty of the citizens to vote as to serve on a jury or to do military duty in times of public peril. The stay-at-home voter is the source of unnecessary expense at elections; and is therefore a source of evil. Since we believe that these citizens entitled to do so should be required by law to vote, election day is a solemn day and should be made a holiday dedicated to the most important of all duties of citizenship.

Now, I am with the Democratic party for the first time in my life, and I propose to vote with them to-day. I believe that there are enough Republicans who will join the Democrats in this Convention to carry out the principle laid down by the Democratic party upon which they elected the Governor of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Shea of Dalton: Our very interesting friend from Haverhill (Mr. Webster) gave us an accurate tabulation of the different votes on this question, but through some oversight he did not give a complete tabulation. I merely call this to your attention because I understood him to say that the friends of this measure were not present. Let me read to you the figures on the standing vote and ask you whether the friends of this measure at that time had any real reason for hastening out to notify others who were interested that a vote was about to be taken. On the standing vote on this question 89 voted in the affirmative and 76 in the negative. When the roll-call was reached 104 were in the affirmative and 106 were in the negative. The question is: Shall we reconsider the vote taken at that time? You members who were present on that day know what happened. I do not expect all of you who voted in the negative to vote for reconsideration at this time. Some of you would say: "Why, that is absurd. I have got to be consistent," but it seems to me that there are many big men in this Convention who voted against this measure who will now vote for reconsideration, inasmuch as it already has passed the Convention on three or four different votes.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: We ought not to recede at any point. The gentleman in the first division (Mr. Webster) is a first-class logical sleight-of-hand performer. I suppose I might better have said an illogical sleight-of-hand performer. He tells us that the proponents of this measure propose to go before the people of the Commonwealth, if it is submitted to them, and say to them: "You citizens are not voting often enough." Then, on the other hand, the same set of men, very largely, who are interested in biennials, if it is submitted to the people, will go before the citizens and say: "You vote too much." Now, he holds that up to us as an inconsistency. Well, he himself creates that inconsistency. It is not in our logic. The issue is this: We are saying on this proposition that men ought to vote when the time comes for them to exercise the franchise, men ought to vote when the hour of their duty has arrived. That is what we are saying. On the other hand, when we come to discuss biennials, the question is, how often men shall exercise their duty, how often the hour shall strike for duty to be performed. Here there is no inconsistency. Then let the delegates keep this issue clear.

More than once in the efforts that I have made in various communities in the interest of reform, when it was an off year, and when General Apathy walked abroad in those communities, more than once the chairman of a city committee, more than once a gentleman who was running for mayor of the city, has come to me and urged me, and not only urged me, but even offered assistance, to get out the vote on a great moral issue, because he said: "There is indifference; no possible way for us to get the vote out." They appealed to me, therefore, that a moral issue be thrust into the election to awaken the voters and get them to the polls,—to get them to do their duty. Let us keep this issue clear. Further, the franchise is not merely a privilege, it is a great duty. Deeply was I impressed once, in my reading, with the language of all the State papers of Napoleon. In every paragraph the word "glory" appears. On the other hand, in all the State papers of Wellington nowhere could the word "glory" be discovered, but the word "duty" was written into every paragraph. It seems to me, if now we can but submit this matter to the people, it is a clear issue upon which they can decide; and therefore, if we assist in getting the citizens of the State to perform their duty in the exercise of the franchise, we shall have rendered a great service to the Commonwealth.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: We have arrived at the stage where I assume the Convention will not lightly attempt to reconsider matters that have been passed on with as much discussion as this matter has received. I have maintained from the first that the matter is impracticable. There are a great many duties that you cannot enforce by law, and this one one of them, and I assume that the last speaker would say that it was a duty to go to church, and certainly everybody here would say that it was a man's duty to support some church. It used to be the law in this Commonwealth that every man had to support some church. A hundred years ago that was the law. The people paid taxes to this church or the other, but they had to pay to some church. Was not that a good thing? Were they not doing their duty? Why was it that that was discontinued? Because that kind of compulsion to do a moral duty we discovered a hundred years ago did not work, and in the long run was a bad thing.

I do not know exactly how to describe this particular kind of compulsion that we are talking about now. Some of the delegates who have spoken in favor of this do not want a man disfranchised. Others of the delegates who have spoken in favor of this do not want a man or a woman put in jail for failure to vote. I do not believe that the majority of the delegates to this Convention would unite upon any punishment, and I call it to your attention that so long as we have been discussing this matter nobody has suggested an adequate means of putting compulsion on a voter.

Mr. Winslow of Newton: The gentleman says that this duty cannot be required. I should like to inquire, if that is so, how it is that it works so successfully in Belgium, where 94 to 96 per cent of the vote is brought out with nothing more severe than a very light fine for the first and second offences, and temporary disfranchisement for the third or fourth offence as the most severe penalty.

Mr. Bryant: I do not know why so large a percentage of people vote in Belgium, but it is not on account of compulsory voting, because as a practical matter they do not have compulsory voting in Belgium. Anybody in Belgium who does not happen to find it convenient to go to the polls is brought up before a justice of the peace, and if he can furnish what seems to be a satisfactory excuse that is the end of it. Now, there are 161 justices of the peace in this assembly, and if this is going through I hope all you gentlemen will pick out the best natured one, because you may need some time to come before him, just as they do in Belgium, and say: "Well, it is not very convenient, and you would not prosecute me, would you?" And he would say "No." That is what they do in Belgium, because it is solely in the discretion of a justice of the peace whether a voter shall be prosecuted or not. Is that the kind of process we want in this Commonwealth of Massachusetts? It illustrates my point that the whole thing is impracticable. You cannot put real pressure on the voter, and every country that has tried it realizes it, as is shown in the pamphlet that has been prepared for us.

I have contended from the first, as I say, that this thing is impracticable. Every remedy that has been suggested here, except to disfranchise a man, is in the hands of the Legislature now. There is no question that the Legislature can publish a list of people who do not vote and put moral pressure on to that extent, if they want to, without a constitutional amendment. If people have not got public spirit enough now to go to the polls, I do not think we need a constitutional amendment to put moral pressure on them.

The motion to reconsider prevailed, by a vote of 127 to 67.
Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I want to remind this Convention that your committee on Suffrage gave this matter very careful consideration. The proponents of it were not able to present to us any workable plan, any more than they ever have in the Legislature. It was found that only one State in the Union, North Dakota, ever has put compulsory voting into its Constitution, and though that was done several years ago the Legislature never has acted upon it. Now, in face of these facts, and the fact that your committee on Suffrage and various committees of the Legislature in the years past have looked into this matter carefully, have found out that compulsory voting was compulsory nonsense, it is unjust and unfair for us to thrust it upon the people this year in face of the other questions that we have and the other amendments that are exciting public attention. As the chairman of our committee on Suffrage has well said, we can go no further than simply to compel people to attend the polls. So long as we have secret voting we cannot have compulsory voting. I hope we will stand by our judgment of last Thursday and refuse to send this to the people.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: The question has been raised here as to why compulsory voting works successfully in Belgium, it having been stated that at least 94 per cent of the voters there go to the polls. The answer is that in Belgium there is an inducement to the voter to go to the polls. Every man in Belgium who votes is certain of representation. Give everybody representation here and the people will have some object, some incentive, to cast a vote. Belgium has a system known as a unanimous constituency or equitable or proportional representation system. Each party is represented in government in exact proportion to the votes it polls, not, as in this State, on the theoretical basis of a certain amount of geography and a certain number of legal voters, those legal voters comprising registered voters and those who would be eligible to register provided the restrictive qualifications were not excessive, thus preventing them from registering, because of an insufficient residence period. Three-fourths of the States of this Union demand as a qualification for voting a shorter period of residence than Massachusetts has. Even in Maine thirty days' residence in a city or town suffices, and if I am not mistaken thirty days' residence in the State makes a citizen eligible to vote. In this State six months' residence in a city or town is required, and one year in the State. Many legal voters refuse to register because they lose their jobs, — they lose their places in the shoe towns and cities, for instance, and are compelled to travel fifty or a hundred or more miles to procure another job. And what are you trying to do? Are you willing to give the Legislature the power to compel such a man to come back fifty or a hundred miles, pay from $10 to $20 car fare and lose his wages, just to register, then compel him to make the same expenditure a second time to vote? Or, if you advocate confining voting to those who are registered, then you are advocating unfair discrimination. If it is confined to registered voters it will be easy enough for a man to give the assessors a wrong middle initial or other technically incorrect information or to have such wrong information given for him. Then he may be dropped from the voting list and thereby become exempt from voting under the terms of this resolution. Now, this Convention itself does not enforce compulsory voting on the part of its members; in fact, it permits from one-third to two-thirds of its members to be absent nearly all the time, and are we going to be so inconsistent as to say to the citizens of this State that we would give the Legislature, provided a bare majority of those voting thereon approve this amendment next November at the State election, — that we shall give the Legislature the power to compel the people to vote? In other words, are we going to say that those who happen to come to the polls this year shall be entitled to say to those who happen to be absent: “We will make you come and vote in the future”?

Mr. AYLWARD of Cambridge: The statement of the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) that this measure ought to be sent along to the voters is just as applicable to nine-tenths of all the stuff that we have rejected in this Convention, and that is no argument. Another point that has not been much touched upon in this discussion is the situation that presents itself to-day with the possible acceptance by the people of votes for women. Now, whatever argument may be addressed to compel men to attend the polls, does not that argument fail when we consider women voters? There are a great number of women, if not a majority at least a great minority, who, apart from the principle that women should vote, do not themselves wish to have to take part in elections; and are you going against their will on something that they will take no part in, in which they have not a vote? Are you going to allow the Legislature, to permit the Legislature, to draft a law to compel that large percentage of women to vote? That is a thought that I think we might well consider in these last few moments of this discussion, and if it is considered as it should be I am satisfied that this Convention will vote as it did at the last session.

Mr. LANGEliER of Quincy: It seems to me that it is most unfortunate that the title of this resolution is compulsory voting, for the opposition has played upon that title at every stage. The measure really should be entitled a resolution to provide an incentive for voting. Why, to hear the opposition talk here to-day and at previous stages you would think that we were passing a resolution which would provide that every citizen who did not vote should be landed in jail immediately. Now, we are doing nothing of the sort. Just look for one moment at the resolution. It contains but two lines:

The General Court shall have authority to provide for compulsory voting at elections.

Now, what does that mean? It means, in the first place, that we are to submit to the people of this State the question as to whether or not they desire the General Court shall have the right to pass some such law. If they vote in the affirmative, which I believe they will, then the General Court can attend to all of the details, and the opposition, who claim this penalty and that penalty will be imposed, and that it is impracticable, merely say to you in so many words that they consider the General Court incapable of passing any kind of a law that will be an incentive to voting. Why, I do not believe any members of this Convention feel for a moment that a man who does not vote should be carted off and landed in jail. It seems to me that there is plenty of opportunity by which the Legislature can arrange for reasonable penalties. For instance, a man might be deprived of his privilege the next year. But they say that you cannot deprive a man of his vote. Look at the naturalized citizens to-day who are deprived of their vote because of the fact that they are too lazy, too indifferent or for some other reason do not get their names on the voting list, and you practical politicians know how hard it is to get these naturalized citizens on the voting list, so that they can vote.

I believe that there is a good average attendance here this morning, a representative attendance, and I do not believe that it is necessary to argue much further, except I wish the members would keep this fact in mind: That we are not passing a compulsory voting amendment. We are passing a resolution asking the people if they desire their Legislature to have the right to make up such a bill as will be satisfactory to them. I hope, therefore, that the resolution passes.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I am not responsible that I have got a chance once more to address this Convention. I voted against reconsideration, but I want to say a word against compulsory voting. I once had the disease as bad as some members of this Convention have it now. My answer to what has been said is that when you come to jury duty that is a necessity, you cannot do it in any other way; when it comes to fighting you have to do it that way, there is no other way; but when it comes to voting a man who stays at home votes. He is perfectly satisfied with whatever takes place. Why should not he be permitted to exercise such discretion? It surprised me to find Democrats advocating sumptuary legislation of this nature. How we have changed! Some men who find fault that men do not vote are responsible for it. Some forty years ago the Democratic party threw overboard its landmarks and indorsed a liberal Republican platform and liberal Republican candidates. Since then it has pointed with pride to its previous performance and has had no issue, except in the nineties. The Republican party was once a conscience party, but it drifted away from its conscience and its moral issues and narrowed its spirit to protecting itself against the gradually growing strength of the progressive Democrats. The situation now created is that both parties throw over any and all issues to enable them to get power. The Republican party surrendered to prohibition and got licked. Lately it surrendered to the conscience party in the shape of the Progressive party. The Democratic party surrendered to the progressive ideas of the Populists, who rapidly were coming into power based on the ideas of Jefferson and Lincoln. The People's party made it hot for Democrats down south and the Democratic platform adopted their issues and had votes enough. There was no reason to complain of the percentage of votes that came out in those Presidential elections. When there are no issues voters stay at home. Take it at the present moment. What is the difference between Democrats and Republicans? What have they got for dividing issues? There have been only three great issues in this country anyway to divide people upon in National elections, outside the State issues, and to-day the great parties are on both sides of these great questions,—the currency, the tariff, the slavery or labor question. That is the reason why the voters do not vote; and you seek to drag out the people, who do not care whether it is John or Jim who is elected to office. I am making this point,—that the man who stays away from the polls does vote. The Democratic party knows that in the country towns, where they are beaten, and where they cannot get out their vote, this will bring the vote out. A man now says: "I am in the minority. What is the good of my going out and voting? I won't change the result. The Republicans are going to carry the State." The Republicans who whisper: "Vote for this because it will get out our vote," should take care. When they get their vote out they may find that the voters are so disgusted with the Republican party that they will vote for the Democrats. Thus far they have stopped at the half-way house of not voting. They show their disgust by staying at home, but bring them out and they will vote it. For these and other reasons, I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I am very much surprised at the stand that my brother on my right (Mr. Brown) has taken when he says those who stay at home vote and are satisfied. Does he not know that the men who stay at home are the biggest growlers we have got in the State, that they find more fault with the men who are elected and do more howling against the State laws than any other class of men? That is a fact, and I am surprised that he should make that statement, that the stay-at-home voters vote. They do not vote. If they are not there to vote, why, the other man gets the vote and is elected.

I have failed yet to hear anybody in this Convention who was opposing this proposal attribute any sordid motive to the proponents of this measure. We are advocating this measure believing on the whole it tends to the public good. There are opponents of this measure who to-day are leaving no stone unturned to defeat this measure, and they have compulsory voting to a certain degree in their own districts. There are men in this Convention who are warm friends of mine, whom I esteem very highly, who can select the man who shall come to the House of Representatives or go to the Senate chamber, who can dictate who shall be mayor of this great city of Boston and make Congressmen. While such a man seems to pay no particular attention to this measure, and those who are not familiar with him might believe that he cared but very little about it, I assure you now that in his own district at this particular time, to know that his own voters vote right on questions, that gentleman furnishes ballots, distributes them and pays the bill, so that the voters will have the proper instructions. If we had such an able and efficient and fearless and honorable leader as that gentleman in both parties in every district in this State, we would require no measure of this kind, but such is not the case. We to-day have not such men, and the consequence is the proposition to the Legislature to put it up to the people, and if in their wisdom they think they should like to have it go through, then it is left to the Legislature to settle.

I am surprised to hear the gentleman in this division (Mr. Newton) and the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Bryant) and the gentleman from Boxford (Mr. Webster) bring up that same argument we had the other day. We are not settling the details of this proposition. We are not attaching any penalty. That is the farthest from our minds. The gentleman in the first division (Mr. D. D. Driscoll) would be judge and jury on this case. We can trust the Legislature. We can trust the people, and the people can trust the Legislature. We have nothing to worry about. I am sure this is a proposition on which the people know how they want to vote, and we ought to allow them to have that opportunity. I hope that this resolution will be sent to the people.

The Convention voted, Tuesday, August 20, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 148 to 96, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 134,138 to 128,403.
Mr. Charles G. Washburn of Worcester presented the following resolution (No. 130):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The right of the citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex.

The committee on Suffrage reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was discharged from the Orders of the Day Tuesday, June 25, 1918, on motion of Mr. Newton of Everett, and was considered forthwith.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Newton of Everett: I make this motion with the consent of the dissenters to the report, and at the suggestion of the Woman Suffrage Committee of this State who think that, in view of the fact that the Congress of the United States now is acting upon the matter in a National capacity, the House of Representatives already having passed such a resolution and the matter being now pending in the Senate, it would be ill advised for this Convention to take action upon the matter at this time.

The resolution was rejected. On the following day Mr. Sawyer of Ware moved that this vote be reconsidered.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I do not know that any one else in this Convention feels as I do about it, but it seems to me that when the vote in the Federal Senate is coming on Thursday on the question of suffrage we might as well keep the matter of suffrage before this Convention until after that vote; and so I would move that we reconsider the action whereby the Convention yesterday accepted the adverse report on Calendar No. 211, and I would move further that the question of reconsideration be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: It is again my ungracious duty to object to postponement, and in this particular case I feel fortified by the fact that those who have taken the keenest interest in this subject agreed that they would not ask the Convention to take its time for the purpose of the consideration of this measure. It was my lot, as the chairman of the committee on Election Laws in the House of Representatives for several years, to take an active part in the annual discussion of this subject. We always knew that the discussion was solely for outside effect. In all probability the days that were given to it in the House never changed a vote or at any rate changed very few votes. Discussion of the matter here would have the same bearing. It would change very few, if any, opinions, and would serve none of the immediate needs of this Convention. In view, therefore, as we again and again have reflected, of the peculiar and exceptional circumstances of the time, which call for us to concentrate our energies on problems likely to be approved or with the chance of approval by this Convention and the people, I trust that the Convention again will decline to give its precious minutes to discussions that can produce no practical immediate result.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: Our attitude on this of course will depend upon which of the various groups that want suffrage we are in sympathy with, and roughly considered they may be classed as three. There is a certain body of influential and wealthy women who are interested in suffrage. With some of them it is merely a fad; with others it is an academic conviction, or a conclusion on an academic discussion. They are all of them people who economically are secure in life, and their convictions on the matter do not root very deep. Apparently those people are not desirous of fighting suffrage very hard, and, as the gentleman who has just spoken has said, they are willing to call off the battle. There is another group that has worked for suffrage in the years gone by, and that is the group connected with our churches. Their desire for suffrage, however, was very largely that the women might vote on the liquor question, and as the Legislature has settled that question I fancy we shall hear very little more from the churches in regard to woman suffrage. But there is another group, a group for whom I speak, and that is the group of working girls and working women who want the vote, and they want the vote because they feel the injustice of the situation under which they now live without it. They want the vote that they may improve their industrial and economic status. They know that they are discriminated against in the shops and the mills because they do not have the vote and the men do have the vote. Those people have been fighting for suffrage for years. Those people will fight in the battle and never let up until they get their just rights. In behalf of those people I trust that those who sympathize with them at least will vote for this proposition to-day, to keep this thing on the calendar until we see how the Federal Senate acts. Of course if the Federal Senate passes woman suffrage, why, all of us are agreeable to the proposition of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce); but if it should act adversely we want to make a fight here. I hope we will keep this on the calendar.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: This is a vital question, one that affects democracy, and I cannot see for the life of me why this Convention should not postpone action until after the Federal Senate has acted. If the Federal Senate should reject this proposition, it does not mean that Massachusetts, or the working people particularly, are disinterested; and if the Congress of the United States refuses to submit it to the people let me say to you that the argument in the Senate is that the State will attend to it. If the Senate of the United States refuses to send this to the people, then I believe that this Convention can well consider it, and I think we at least ought to hold it over until the action of the Senate.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: While personally I am not perhaps as deeply interested in this question as some others may be, yet I view it from this standpoint: That this body of men elected a year and a half ago were chosen for the purpose of assembling in Boston to consider the questions that a great number of our people are interested in, and I think that there are very few questions in which there is a deeper interest throughout the Commonwealth than in this one. I believe it is due to the people of Massachusetts that this question be discussed and considered before being disposed of. Hence I certainly hope, in justice to that large element of our citizenship, that the matter will be postponed.

The Convention refused to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider, by a vote of 32 to 74. The motion to reconsider was negatived.

Mr. Louis F. Delaney of Holyoke presented the following resolution (No. 284):

Resolved, That it is expedient to alter the existing Constitution by adopting the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Women shall have the right to vote upon the same terms as men, and no political right shall be denied on account of sex.

The committee on Suffrage reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was discharged from the Orders of the Day Tuesday, June 25, 1918, on motion of Mr. Newton of Everett, and was considered forthwith.

The resolution was rejected without debate.
BIENNIAL ELECTION OF GENERAL COURT.

XX.

BIENNIAL ELECTION OF GENERAL COURT.

Mr. Frank E. Lyman of Easthampton presented the following resolution (No. 87):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall assemble annually on the first Wednesday of January of each year and shall be prorogued at the conclusion of the one hundredth day of its session, without any proclamation or other act of the Governor. But nothing herein contained shall prevent the General Court from assembling at such other time as it shall judge necessary or when called together by the Governor.

Senators and Representatives shall hold their respective places for two years next following the first Wednesday of January after their election, and until others are chosen and qualified in their stead. The meetings for the choice of Senators and Representatives shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, biennially. The Senators and Representatives who shall be chosen at the election at which this article shall be adopted, shall hold their respective places for the term provided by the existing Constitution, and no longer; and thereafter Senators and Representatives shall be elected and hold their respective places conformable to the provisions of this article.

All provisions of the existing Constitution, inconsistent with the provisions herein contained, are hereby annulled.

The committee on Suffrage reported that so much of the resolution as relates to biennial elections of members of the General Court ought not to be adopted; and it was rejected, without debate, Friday, June 28, 1918.

At the next session, Tuesday, July 9, Mr. Frederick L. Anderson of Newton moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution had been rejected.

The motion to reconsider was negatived.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: In common with many other members I was surprised when the Convention at its last session rejected the proposal for biennial elections without a word of debate. I am sure that there is a considerable body of delegates who favor biennials and for one I cannot allow the matter to pass in silence.

Massachusetts is the only State which elects its entire Legislature annually. Annual elections have been abandoned by all except us and there is no sentiment in any State for a return to the annual system. Annual elections keep the State in a perpetual political turmoil. The legislators hardly receive congratulations before they must begin to plan for a reflection. Attention is distracted from public duties. There is hardly time for the legislator to become acquainted with his work before his term expires. The voters tire of the everlasting series of primaries and elections and fail to come to the polls. And the system encourages the formation of a class of professional politicians.
Biennials not only tend to remedy all this, but tend to give the State a stable legislative policy, more experienced legislators, and save the State, if State officers are included, what is estimated at one million dollars annually. They are a step, and a great step, toward one of our most important goals, the strengthening of the Legislature. Biennial elections do not necessarily imply biennial sessions, but, as in this proposal, may be combined with annual sessions of the Legislature. Nor do they involve any limitation on the length of legislative sessions, though that may be desirable.

The Republican State platforms of 1915 and 1916 called for biennials, and surely there are enough Republicans here to stand for a roll-call on this question. Governor Walsh urged biennials on the Legislature. The Democrats might join the Republicans on this question with perfect consistency. My liberal friends need not fear the change to biennials on the ground that they would help the invisible-government, for the most progressive and radical States have biennial elections and no one in those States has any such fear. And to make assurance doubly sure, I call attention to the fact that the platforms of the Massachusetts Progressives in 1914 and 1915 called for biennials, and the Progressives cannot be suspected of any love for the invisible government.

Let all who wish to change from our present ultra-conservative annual system stand up and be counted. The future, if not the present, is ours.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: On page 4 of the calendar is No. 230, a resolution to provide for biennial elections of State officers, Councillors and members of the General Court. Following it, No. 232, a resolution providing for biennial elections of State officers, Councillors and members of the General Court, and for biennial sessions of the General Court. Unless I am grievously mistaken, all the gentleman desires to do through reconsideration can be done under either one of these resolutions. There is no necessity of taking the time of the Convention in a reconsideration.

The motion to reconsider was negatived.
XXI.

BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. George B. Churchill of Amherst presented the following resolution (No. 126):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

4 The Governor, and Lieutenant-Governor, and Councillors, 5 shall hold their respective offices for two years next 6 following the first Wednesday in the January succeeding 7 their election, and until others are chosen and qualified in 8 their stead.
9 The first election to which this article shall apply shall 10 be that held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday 11 in November in the year nineteen hundred and 12 and thereafter elections for the choice of all the officers 13 before mentioned shall be held biennially on the Tuesday 14 next after the first Monday in November.
15 All the provisions of the Constitution inconsistent with 16 the provisions herein contained are hereby annulled.
17 The Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor, 18 and Attorney-General, shall hold their respective offices 19 for two years, beginning with the third Wednesday in 20 the January succeeding their election, and until others 21 are chosen and qualified in their stead.
22 A person shall be eligible as Treasurer and Receiver- 23 General for three successive terms, and no more.
24 The first election to which this article shall apply shall 25 be that held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday 26 in November in the year nineteen hundred and 27 and thereafter elections for the choice of all the officers 28 before mentioned shall be held biennially on the Tuesday 29 next after the first Monday in November.
30 All the provisions of the Constitution inconsistent with 31 the provisions herein contained are hereby annulled.

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

32 Senators and Representatives shall hold their respective offices for terms of two years, beginning with the 33 first Wednesday in the January succeeding their election.
34 The first election to which this article shall apply shall 35 be that held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday 36 in November in the year nineteen hundred and 37 and thereafter elections for the choice of Senators and 38 Representatives shall be held biennially on the Tuesday 39 next after the first Monday in November.
40 The General Court shall assemble every year on the first 41 Wednesday in January; and each General Court shall, 42 without any proclamation or other act of the Governor, 43 be finally dissolved on the day preceding the day ap- 44 pointed for the first assembling of the next elected General 45 Court.
46 All the provisions of the Constitution inconsistent with 47 the provisions herein contained are hereby annulled.
BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

The committee on Suffrage reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Thursday, July 11, 1918.

By a vote of 95 to 111, by a call of the yeas and nays, Friday, July 12, the Convention refused to reject the resolution (No. 126), as had been recommended by the committee on Suffrage; and, accordingly, it was placed in the Orders of the Day for a second reading.

It was read a second time Tuesday, August 6.

Mr. Joseph S. Gates of Westborough moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "and", in lines 11, 26 and 37, respectively, the word "twenty".

These amendments were adopted, by a vote of 88 to 53.

Mr. Ezra W. Clark of Brockton moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after line 40 the following paragraph: —

All elected State officers, Councillors and members of the General Court shall be subject to recall after one year of service under such regulations as the General Court shall make and provide.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Raymond P. Dellinger of Wakefield moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 41 to 46, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph: —

The General Court shall assemble biennially on the first Wednesday of January succeeding its election, and shall proceed at that session to make all the elections, and do all other acts which are by the Constitution required to be made and done at the annual session which has heretofore met on the first Wednesday of January in each year. And the General Court shall be dissolved on the day next preceding the first Wednesday of January in the second year next succeeding its first assembling, without proclamation or other act of the Governor. But nothing herein contained shall prevent the General Court from assembling at such other times as it shall judge necessary, or when called together by the Governor.

Mr. Robert Luce of Waltham raised the point of order that this amendment was not germane, for the reason that it related to biennial sessions of the General Court, whereas the resolution under consideration related to biennial elections.

The Chair (Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley) declared the point of order not well taken.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading Tuesday, August 6, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 97 to 92.

It was read a third time Wednesday, August 14, in the following form, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 421):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2 2 tion by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

1 Section 1. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Counc-
2 illors, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Attorney-3 General, Auditor, Senators and Representatives, shall be.
4 elected biennially. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor
5 and Councillors shall hold their respective offices from the 6 first Wednesday in January succeeding their election to 7 and including the first Wednesday in January in the 8 third year following their election and until their suc-
9 cessors are chosen and qualified. The terms of Senators 10 and Representatives shall begin with the first Wednesday 11 in January succeeding their election and shall extend to
BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

12 the first Wednesday in January in the third year follow-
13 ing their election and until their successors are chosen 14 and qualified. The terms of the Secretary, Treasurer and 15 Receiver-General, Attorney-General and Auditor, shall begin 16 with the third Wednesday in January succeeding their,
17 election and shall extend to the third Wednesday in Jan-18 uary in the third year following their election and until 19 their successors are chosen and qualified.

1 Section 2. No person shall be eligible to election to 2 the office of Treasurer and Receiver-General for more than 3 three successive terms.

1 Section 3. The General Court shall assemble every 2 year on the first Wednesday in January.

1 Section 4. The first election to which this article
2 shall apply shall be held on the Tuesday next after the 3 first Monday in November in the year nineteen hundred 4 and twenty, and thereafter elections for the choice of all 5 the officers before-mentioned shall be held biennially on 6 the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November.

Mr. Albert H. Washburn of Middleborough moved that the resolution be amended by the substitution of a "Resolution to provide for biennial elections of State officers."

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution (No. 421) was passed to be engrossed Wednesday, August 14, 1918, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 116 to 108.

On the following day a motion was made that this vote be reconsidered; and the motion to reconsider was negatived, by a vote of 24 to 100.

The Convention voted, Tuesday, August 20, by a vote of 132 to 104, taken by a call of the yeas and nays, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 142,868 to 108,588.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: This is at least a matter which calls for a real consideration and discussion. It is of course true that it is one of the difficulties in talking of this subject that the main arguments pro and con are pretty well known to every member of the Convention, and for that reason debate upon this subject may be exceedingly limited.

In urging upon the Convention the passage of this resolution, asking the Convention not to reject the proposal, I am not going to take their time to recapitulate arguments the nature of which and the force of which are well recognized by all the men in this Convention.
It is unnecessary. It is perfectly true that to all of us who are here to act upon the proposal as a whole it is clear that certain very great advantages would be obtained by a system of biennial elections.
It seems clear also to a good many that there are certain drawbacks to such a system. The real question at issue, and I am only endeavoring to state it, the real question at issue is whether the thing that is of most importance, the thing that is of real importance if you like, is to be lost or gained by having biennial elections. For example, I do not suppose for a moment that any one of us would deny that there would be a saving of nearly, if not quite, $1,000,000 to this Commonwealth every year if we had biennial instead of annual elections. There are certain other advantages clearly set forth in the pamphlet with which this Convention has been furnished, and well known to us all, which probably most of us would agree would be obtained.

The one answer of importance,—and I say that with forethought and mean it,—the one answer of importance to the arguments in favor of biennial elections is an answer which is based upon an idea of political education, of political interest, of political responsibility on the part of the voters of the Commonwealth. We have been dealing with several questions in which that same fundamental purpose has been in the minds of all; and yet we have differed in opinion as to the expediency of measures intended to secure that result, and, it seems to me, in the matter of biennial elections, we have precisely the same real question before us. We all want an intelligent, educated body of electors interested in the affairs of the State, deliberating upon the affairs of the State as they come before the electors to vote upon, and we want from our electors an intelligent vote as the result of interest and purpose. We all agree about that, and the problem as to whether we had better have biennial elections instead of annual elections is precisely that problem. Shall we increase the intelligence and the interest and the deliberation of our voters upon these questions by the method of biennial elections? Shall we, by cutting down the number of occasions where theoretically they should be giving their attention to these problems and making decisions by their votes,—shall we, by cutting down those opportunities, nevertheless actually increase as a total intelligent action on the part of our electorate in the choice of our officers and in the decision of public questions?

The advantages to the officers, the officials, would be great, I am taking for granted. I shall try to meet an objection on that ground if the objection is raised; but I am inclined to assume that we all agree that so far as that is concerned it would be better for good administration and for good judgment on the part of the people as to the nature of their administrators and their administrations if the Governor of this Commonwealth, for example, were tried for two years rather than being judged in less than one. Putting that aside, the one thing that we all ought to be considering in this, it seems to me, the crucial matter, is: Shall we get a better result in the action of our electorate by the biennial system rather than the annual system? An arguer upon this subject must face that as upon various other measures that have been before us. It is largely a matter of judgment, and the judgment of one individual may be just as good as that of another. You will vote upon your judgment, but the judgment should be upon that point, it seems to me, and upon no other.

We have the argument upon the other side put before us in very eloquent, very effective shape, in certain quotations in this pamphlet. We have, for example, the argument of Speaker Reed, we have the argument of Mr. Blaine, we have some short quotations from the argument of Senator Hoar, three men who were opposed to biennial elections, and it is quite probable that that argument is as well stated there as it can be stated anywhere. They are effective presentations. But the question that each one of us must ask himself is: Do I really think that is true? Do I really think, for example, that as a practical matter, as a matter of reality, it is true that if we wish the benefit of free government we must take the method,—that is the implication of the statement part of which I am reading,—we must take the method of giving the voter the opportunity to vote every year.

What is that fundamentally? It is an argument based upon an assumption which must be tested by our experience of the facts. Theoretically it is extremely easy for us to think, though not so easy as it was for John Adams and the men of his day to think, that there will be dangers to our freedom and dangers to our intelligent decisions as to our officers if we do not make those decisions very frequently. We all know perfectly well that those dangers had seemed genuine and alive to the men who made our Constitution. Are those dangers genuine? Are they alive? I cannot argue very much upon that point. Each one of you must answer that question for himself in his vote. I simply can record my own conviction upon that point. I know it to be the conviction of a great many people, not merely that they do not want to be disturbed, not merely that they are hard pressed, as they say, and overburdened with political demands,—and a good deal could be said upon that subject, but it is unnecessary to say it,—but they are convinced that they can fulfil, that the electorate of this Commonwealth will fulfil its duty better by concentration than by diffusing their attention. That is the thing in a nutshell.

So far as our officers are concerned, it is perfectly plain that on the whole this is the situation in Massachusetts. We have a system of biennial elections without the advantage of not spending money every year for the formal process. How often is a member of our State government after one year of service rejected by the electorate? Theoretically, in order to overcome the danger from our officials, we should be able to take them from their office at the end of a year, but actually as it works out in this, Commonwealth very few people are ready to judge an officer of the Legislature or of the State government after one year. An officer has to be very conspicuously bad before he is rejected at the end of one year. By a kind of tacit consent on the part of our electorate judgment is withheld until the close of a second year. When a legislator has served for two years, then is the danger time, then is the time when the electorate feels: "It is now up to us really to consider the record and the work of this man. He has had a fair chance to show what he is, to show his policies, to show his character, and now we will judge him." A spirit of fairness on the part of American citizens leads us to do that thing. Political ambitions of opponents, desires on the part of other people, have very little effect in a contest after one year. They do not contest because they know this feeling on the part of the electorate. The day for them to contest is after the electorate knows that the man against whom the contest is made has had a fair show. I believe that to be absolutely true with the exception of a very, very few cases, regularly year after year throughout this Commonwealth.

How about the effect upon the electorate itself? It is manifest that so far as the will of the people is expressed to-day in its votes for its officers that will is not expressed, generally speaking, except every other year. There are exceptions, but not many and not often. At the present time they have comparatively little opportunity to express themselves directly upon policies and measures, and it is not necessary to argue at the present moment that they must have the opportunity every year to vote upon measures and policies.

The argument for the short ballot,—what is it? Is it an argument to take away from the people the real control of its officials? Is it to remove, for example, the Secretary of the Commonwealth or the Treasurer and Receiver-General from the scrutiny and control of the people? In purpose, at least, the object of the short ballot is that by concentration, by not overstraining the demand upon an electorate, they may be disposed at fitting and proper intervals to pay real and fresh attention to their jobs as electors. Now, that is the thing. That is the question before us. Is it true that by our annual system of elections we destroy or tend to destroy that real attention, that real interest on the part of the electorate which alone can produce an intelligent and intelligible result? Is that true? I believe it is. To state the other side, the opposite side, is it not true that if the electors are given the opportunity to do what as a matter of practice they now are doing formally, and saving to the Commonwealth all these other advantages that are to be obtained by the system of biennial elections, we may depend in the long run upon a deeper interest, a fresher interest, a more intelligent consideration of officials and policies?

I answer that question only for myself. I personally am convinced that the system of biennial elections will be to the ultimate profit of the Commonwealth. The question before the rest of the members of this Convention is simply: What is your opinion about that? And your votes will be, it seems to me, upon that basis. For to repeat in conclusion, I am assuming, and I believe it to be true, that the plain advantages, so far as they are plain, of the biennial system are known to us all, and that the thing that makes the problem for us to-day as individuals is precisely that question which I have raised. Is the net result, the total result in good government, in intelligent action on the part of our electorate, going to be greater by the biennial system than by the annual system?

I want to add just one word to that in explanation of the reason why this measure biennial elections are called for and not biennial sessions of our Legislature. So long as Massachusetts pursues the present method of the introduction and handling of legislation, a method, which has its disadvantages but far greater advantages in truly popular democratic government, in a true participation on the part of the individuals of this State in the legislative work of this State, so long as that system lasts I regard it as a practical impossibility to legislate efficiently in this State upon a biennial plan. If we prefer for other and general reasons to have biennial sessions of our Legislature we clearly shall be obliged to adopt other methods of procedure from those which now obtain. So far as I know it has been a matter of general praise of Massachusetts, in spite of the common criticism of all Legislatures that we legislate too much, that it is a possibility for every inhabitant of this Commonwealth to secure the attention of the Legislature and the public attention to any proposal of legislation that individual citizen chooses to put forward. That inevitably means a tremendous number of bills which by another method we might throw out at the start. The advantage of that method, however, I as a good democrat believe to be so great that personally I prefer the system of annual sessions of our Legislature.
and biennial elections, and that is the reason why in this measure I have proposed biennial elections but annual sessions of the Legislature as at present.

Mr. Creed of Boston: If any of my constituents take the trouble to look over my record in this Convention, I trust they will give me a little credit for having given some slight consideration to every subject that has come before this assembly; but whether they do or not, I claim for myself the credit of having given to this subject of biennial elections most earnest and most careful consideration. In answer to the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) I am constrained to advocate the report of the committee on Suffrage, especially because in reading the calendar I observe that the only dissenter from the report of the committee is the gentleman who has the honor to represent in part with me the 12th Congressional district (Mr. Gallagher). While I regret to differ with my colleague from the Dorchester-South Boston Congressional district, my convictions and my investigation of this subject have forced me to assume a different attitude than appears in his dissenting opinion.

It is true that eminent citizens of our Commonwealth, leaders in social, political and financial fields of endeavor, support the passage of this resolution, and that fact brings my memory back to 22 years ago in this very State House. In February, 1896, I sat as the ranking minority member of the committee on Constitutional Amendments, listening to the merits of this very proposition. So great was the interest manifested in the subject that year that we were permitted to hold our hearings in the old hall of the House of Representatives in the Bulfinch front before it had been remodeled for the use of the upper branch of the Legislature. Day after day distinguished citizens of the State came before our committee and with great force and with great persuasiveness argued that the voters were clamoring for this radical change in this method of the time of election, and if one was not well grounded in his belief in the efficacy of our annual system of voting he would have been converted by the earnestness of their appeal. But I remembered as I sat upon that committee that there is in this Commonwealth of ours an overwhelming percentage of the voters so aptly described as the "invisible governed," who hardly, if ever, are represented at any of these public hearings; and even then I put into operation the thought that was suggested by the distinguished ecclesiastic Bishop Hughes, who in his prayer in this Convention on June 21 of last year said: "Gentlemen of the Convention, think sometimes that the walls of this chamber are made of glass and look through them at the thousands upon tens of thousands of men, women and children in the Commonwealth who will be benefited or injured by your deliberations here." But the arguments of the eminent citizens prevailed. The committee on Constitutional Amendments reported the resolution to the Legislature, and there, after debate, to use the constitutional expression, it was agreed to refer the resolution to the people, and you know the result. Although our people were engrossed in a great presidential election, over the issue of sound money or the free and unlimited coinage of silver, although there is in the Commonwealth a small minority of the citizenry basing its judgment upon the fact that two successive Legislatures, — the popular branch by a two-thirds vote have passed the amendment, — always voting in the affirmative on an amendment, the people rejected biennial elections by 50,000 majority, and then my associates in the Legislature of 1896 learned that these distinguished gentlemen no more represent the plain people of Massachusetts than the official atmosphere of Washington indicates the true temper of the American people on great questions of public policy. And so, I am to-day, as I was then, in favor of retaining our annual system of elections as an educational institution in which the individual citizen can be enlightened on questions of public policy.

But the proponent of this measure says, — if not the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) those who favor it in pamphlets and otherwise say, — that because Massachusetts is practically the only State in the Union that has annual elections of all its State officials we should join the procession of the rest of the States of the Republic. Massachusetts likewise is one of three States, — Connecticut, California and Massachusetts, — that have an honest educational prerequisite for the privilege of the ballot. And when I say an honest literacy test I exclude from consideration those sixteen southern States which under the guise of a grandfather’s clause disqualify the colored voter and deny to him his rights, privileges and immunities under the 14th amendment to the Federal Constitution. And yet, although Massachusetts is one of the three States that have an honest literacy test, no member of this Convention, no voter outside of the Convention, had the temerity to ask us to recommend to the people a resolution which would eradicate the literacy test from our Constitution.

We all heard a few days ago the debate on the question of the method of appointing or electing the judiciary, and it was ably pointed out that Massachusetts is practically the only State in the land that has the appointment of a judiciary during good behavior, which we know practically means for life; and yet you all observed how little support this Convention gave to either the election of judges or a tenure of office for years, and to those gentlemen who have advocated or who will vote for the abolition of the Governor’s Council; the short ballot, upon which I take issue with the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), a misnomer of legislation, meaning nothing more nor less than the taking away from the voters the right to elect certain officials and appointing them by some power instead; the State budget, which you passed this afternoon, giving great power to the executive; the giving of great power to the chief magistrate, — in fact, you gentlemen who will vote for every resolution upon our docket that means the centralization of power in the hands of a limited few, how inconsistent your attitude when you place further away from the people the opportunity to pass upon the honesty or the dishonesty, the efficiency or the inefficiency of the officials given this unparalleled power!

When I took my seat in this Convention I promised myself that I would not attempt to predict to my associates here what the people might or might not do on any resolution that we would refer to them, but I am going to venture this suggestion: If you mistakenly pass this amendment and the voters of the Commonwealth, engrossed in newer political principles or misled by the reactionary leaders or the conservative press, adopt this biennial amendment, then I venture the prediction that in a few years the voters of the State will be clamoring at the doors of the Legislature, asking the Legislature to pass that dangerous antidote for infrequent elections, the recall of public officials, or some more ugly or more speedy form of impeachment proceedings, so that we would have here repeated maybe that deplorable exhibition that was given in the Empire State of New York when they had to resort to impeachment proceedings to get rid of their Governor, William Sulzer, elected for a two-year term. Is this mere assertion? In the group of 22 States of the country that have biennial elections only a minority have some form of the recall of State officials in their governmental machinery; but in the group of 24 States that have some form of the recall of judges, of judicial decisions or of State officials in their Constitution and laws, a majority have that principle engrafted therein.

But yet it is, after all, to the gentlemen who were the chief spokesmen for the initiative and referendum, which I so loyally supported in answer to an agreement I made with my constituents in the South Boston-Dorchester district, even to the extent of voting against the Loring compromise amendment in regard to the constitutional initiative, that I desire to address my remarks. I understand it is rumored that they say because their favorite policy is about to be adopted there is no longer need of this annual system of elections. If they persist in that attitude let me say to them that the people of this Commonwealth will ask: When was it ever a gain for democracy to surrender a true and tried policy of government for a newer progressive principle? When was it ever fitting or proper to compromise on a principle of justice or a matter of right?

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I do not speak for my friends who have favored the initiative and referendum, but in speaking for myself I will say that I personally take no such position as he suggests.

Mr. Creed: I do not know how the gentleman intends to vote upon this question. I cannot infer it from what he states.

Mr. Walker: If I may be more explicit, I will state that I intend to vote against biennial elections and in favor of the present annual system.

Mr. Creed: Then my remarks do not apply to the gentleman from Brookline.

It is said by some of the people who favor the passage of the amendment that in an off year of elections, when there is no presidential elector to be elected or a member of the Federal Legislature, we could well dispense, on account of the apathy and the indifference of the voter, with the yearly system of voting; but I suggest that it is unfair to penalize the 60 to 75 per cent of the registered vote that goes out at every election and conscientiously performs its duty, because of the criminal neglect of a minority of the electorate. The true remedy, as suggested by the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), for the apathy and the indifference of the electorate is the education of the individual citizen. Let us teach him that in truth the ballot is the priceless privilege of the patriot. Let us educate him to the fact that it has been well said that

The crowning fact,
The kingliest act
Of Freedom, is the freeman's vote!
Let us have him learn the words of that oath which every freeman was obliged to take in the days when the Colony was under a King and before we were sovereigns in our own right:

I do solemnly promise upon my sacred word of honor and conscience that I will so cast my vote as will best conduce to the public weal. So help me God.

If I had the power, I would have the teachers in the public schools, whose duty it will be to carry out that act of the Legislature of 1917 entitled: "An Act to teach the duties of citizenship in our public schools," relate to the scholars now and then an incident in the life of Governor Benjamin F. Butler. It had been observed that every time General Butler voted in his home city of Lowell he did so with uncovered head, so one day a neighbor said to him: "General, why do you always take off your hat when you cast your ballot?" And that plain, fearless tribune of the plain people replied: "I always uncover when I deposit my ballot because I stand in the presence of the sovereignty of the people and am about to cast my ballot into the sanctuary of the people's will."

For these reasons I believe that we should retain the annual system of election, so that all the voters can partake frequently of this sacrament of political liberty.

But it may be said that I look too seriously upon the question of lengthening the time of our elections. Well, gentlemen, when I leave this State House to-day to go to my home in the 12th Congressional district I must take the first step on the road that leads me to my home. This, in my opinion, despite the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), is the first serious step along the road whose ultimate goal is the centralization of power in the hands of the few. It is the first serious invasion of the rights of all the people, and the beginning of the end of our scheme of government.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Do I understand that the principle of the gentleman is that the more frequent the election the more democratic the government? If so, why should we not favor elections every six months?

Mr. Creed: There is such a thing as reducing a proposition to an absurdity. If he means to make the government more Democratic in a party sense I hope it will so prevail; but if he means in the general sense I believe that the fathers established the unit of one year, the calendar year, and it is a very appropriate unit.

But as I was saying, while I am only a skeptic as regards the advantages that are presumed to flow from the adoption of this amendment, I have not a scintilla of doubt as regards the baleful influences that are behind it. There are thousands upon thousands of honest, upright, patriotic citizens in the Commonwealth who are behind this amendment and believe in its adoption; but the greatest and chief backer that it has, in my judgment, is a corrupt combination between monopolistic business and machine politics. It has the support, in my judgment, of every enemy of the Commonwealth who places cunning above conscience and graft above honesty in the administration of our public affairs. It has the support of every corrupt corporation lawyer, of every trained lobbyist and of every hireling Hessian of the corrupt corporations of Massachusetts.
And now in conclusion, as a sincere lover of more, rather than less, government by the people, as a firm believer in the truth of that historic utterance of John Adams, that where annual election ends, there tyranny begins, I earnestly urge the members of this Convention to defeat this biennial election amendment, and thus strike a vital blow at this infamous system of special privilege, and its partner in hostility to democratic institutions, autocratic power, and thereby retain this made-in-Massachusetts system of annual elections, to the end that this grand old Commonwealth of ours shall remain in the future, as in the past, “dedicated to the sacred cause of liberty and of equal rights.”

Mr. Gates of Westborough: I should like to make a few remarks in answer to the last speaker’s claim that the common people are not for this amendment. I want to say that I represent the common people if any one in this Convention represents the common people. I am not a lawyer, nor an orator, nor an educated man. I never have been to school six months at one time in my life. But I believe that the common people are interested in this amendment. I have been a candidate for public office many times, being a member of the House, serving three years, and a member of the Senate, and a town officer of my own town for 30 years. I went out in my campaign and stated that I was in favor of biennial elections. As has been stated by the last gentleman, the corporations, the corrupt lawyers and other men of that kind were in favor of this amendment, but I never have been approached by anybody even though it was known that I was in favor of it, and if there is so much crookedness back of this amendment it seems to me that I would have been approached long ago.

I have not had any vocal exercise in this Convention in the past year, but I want to say that I believe this is one of the most important amendments that we could adopt. And why do I believe so? As the last gentleman has stated, the prominent men of this State for years have advocated this amendment. There has not been a Governor of our Commonwealth, with possibly one or two exceptions, for the last 50 years who did not advocate this amendment. The Governor whom we have at the present time in calling this Convention said he hoped that the amendment to provide for biennial elections in this State would be adopted by this Convention.

Is it any experiment? Have we got to try something that is unknown? No. We are only one State of many, and nearly all of the States, in fact all of the States except Massachusetts, have biennial elections or elections once in three or four years.

Many of those States had their annual elections, and why did they discontinue their annual elections? For this reason, among others: A Governor cannot make any reforms or bring about any administration different from what already has been in operation, because he has no time. A Governor who was elected last January, if he had not served before as Governor of this State, even now would have to be out with his nomination papers, looking for re-election. He has to give more time to be re-elected than he does to discharge the duties of the office. And to prove that he goes all over the State, let me say this: In Westborough I have been president of what we call the board of trade. We have an annual field day, and we want one of the best speakers possible out there, and we have had one of the candidates for Governor out to our field day every year for the last ten years, and why? When we send an invitation to the Governor to come to our field day he comes, because he feels if he refuses he will lose a few votes in our town. Now, a Governor is not elected to go to cattle shows and field days and sewing circles. He is elected to discharge the duties of his office, and he could discharge the duties of his office much better if he did not have to spend six months trying to be relected.

No business man, from a business standpoint, or corporation could succeed and do a large business if they changed their officers every year. We know that the experienced man does much better business in a business corporation; an experienced man does greater work in a public position. We heard, when we were members of this Legislature, that the first year man was of very little consequence and had very little influence, — practically none. A man who comes to the Legislature for one year stands no show of getting a bill passed. When a man has been in the Legislature year after year he has influence.

And then the expense. The expense is enormous. To-day we have been trying here to have a State budget to save the State money, and yet we are spending, according to the figures given by the Secretary of the Commonwealth, more than $1,000,000 each year for our elections, and it comes out of the taxpayer and we do not get more efficient officers, we do not get better service. It is expending practically a million dollars of the taxpayers' money for something without which we would be much better off. And since we have the State primary we practically have two elections in a year now, because we have the expense of that too.

I believe that if every member should study the question and decide it from a business point and the point of the efficiency of the officers of this State, this amendment would be one of the amendments which would pass this Constitutional Convention.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Creed) spoke of the rejection of the amendment for biennials in 1896, that is, 12 years ago.

A Delegate: Twenty-two years.

Mr. Anderson: Twenty-two years ago. And in that time the electors of this State may have changed their mind. They were in a certain mood at that time. Very likely next November they may be in a different mood. This Convention is putting before the people a great many excellent amendments. Some of them passed here unanimously. I am sure that that will greatly influence the people in the fall and tend toward the passage of this amendment if we include it in that list. Consequently it seems to me there is very little force in the argument of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Creed).

Besides that, we are told that the plain people are for the annual election, that there are baneful influences back of this amendment, that monopolistic business and machine politics are favorable to annual elections. I think that that argument is perhaps the most influential of any argument that is put forward. We are afraid of the invisible government, some of the liberal members of this Convention are especially afraid of it; but it seems to me that it is perfectly evident that the invisible government is not behind this drive for biennial elections, for two or three reasons. The first is that the most radical and liberal States in the west are all of them States in which there are biennial elections, that in those States the men who are especially hostile to invisible government never have found out that biennial elections were an invention of the enemy. In those States there is no sentiment whatever for a return to annual elections. In the second place, — I have only a few moments, — in the second place, the Progressive party of Massachusetts in the years 1914 and 1915 certainly posed as the enemy of invisible government, and yet the Massachusetts Progressive party in both those years adopted unanimously a plank in its platform for biennial elections. In the third place, the ex-Governor who hails from Fitchburg, a delegate in this Convention (Mr. Walsh), who certainly was the leader for some time of the party which claims to have all the plain people in its ranks, — though some of us think there are some plain people somewhere else as well, — came out in his message to the Legislature and pleaded with it for biennial elections. I am sure that no one will say that the ex-Governor is a friend of the invisible government, or that the baneful influences of monopolistic business and machine politics egged him on to that recommendation to the Legislature. The Republican platforms of 1915 and 1916 also favored biennial elections. I do not know what the Socialists think about this matter, I have not interviewed them, but that makes all the parties in this case, with the exception of the Socialists and the Prohibitionists, in favor of biennials.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I know the gentleman would not intentionally misrepresent any one. He has given the impression here that the Democratic party is on record in favor of biennial elections. That is not so. He also has made a statement that Governor Walsh in his inaugural urged and pleaded for biennial elections. That plea that he made was qualified with the statement that there should be incorporated with such action the right of recall. If the gentlemen wants to incorporate into this amendment the right of recall of elected officials with biennial elections, why, he has Governor Walsh on his side; but if he claims Governor Walsh on his side for biennial elections without the recall, he is taking a position that is not true to fact.

I should like to say just now, before taking my seat, that these other States that have abandoned annual elections have one after another adopted the recall of public officials. Now, if we want to abandon our annual system and take up the recall, very well; but if we do not want the recall, let us stand by the annual election.

Debate was continued Friday, July 12.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: Without trying to make any argument either for or against the resolution under consideration, I just want to read for the information of the delegates, and let them do their own thinking, an article which appeared in the Boston Herald under date of November 30, 1917, written by William G. Gavin, whom many of the delegates in this Convention know as one of the best informed and most reliable political writers we have in the Commonwealth. The article in question, showing the tremendous expense under our present system of annual elections, is headed: "Millions of Dollars spent by the State, Cities and Towns and Candidates. Other unrecorded and unreported expenses would swell the total."

The text of the article reads as follows:
Massachusetts, to judge by the figures, takes its politics expensively as well as seriously. The cost to the State and cities and towns for State wide primaries and elections in the years 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916 and 1917 was approximately $1,500,000. Candidates for nomination, and for election and political committees expended in these years a total of more than $2,885,000 —

And by the way, the latter figure represents only the admitted expense filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Massachusetts has annual elections. A State wide primary costs the State about $20,000, and a State election costs the State about $10,000. An expert in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth estimates that it costs cities and towns of the State a total of about $75,000 for each State wide primary and each State election. In each of the six years mentioned there has been a State wide primary and election, and in 1912 and 1916, presidential years, there was an additional primary for the election of delegates to the Republican and Democratic National Conventions, and this year (1917) there were in addition a special primary for the nomination of delegates to the Constitutional Convention and a special election for the election of delegates.

In 1912 candidates for nominations expended $79,419.05, candidates for election $120,147.21, political committees $298,982.91. In 1913 candidates for nominations expended $60,229.58, candidates for election $121,809.72, political committees $205,901.38. In 1914 candidates for nominations expended $61,271.20, candidates for election $97,380.10, political committees $156,717.23. In 1915 candidates for nominations expended $49,167.95, candidates for election $35,790.39, political committees $342,362.30. In 1916 candidates for nominations expended $64,650.86, candidates for election $73,944.99, political committees $321,126.17. In 1917 candidates for nominations as delegates to the Constitutional Convention expended $25,881.47, candidates for election $36,356.74, political committees $55,234.69. In 1917 candidates for nominations at the State primaries expended $35,000 (estimated), candidates for election $30,000 (estimated), political committees $100,000 (estimated).

The expenditures by candidates and committees in the year 1918 of course are not available. These figures do not include the cost of the county, city and town primaries and elections, the cost of running the legislative machinery, which is about $300,000 a year, and the cost of running this Convention. These figures as to the cost of the regular and State wide primaries and the expenditures of candidates and committees are presented as being matters of statistical interest.

Now it is up to the delegates to this Convention. Here is the information. The expense runs up to millions of dollars covering that period of six years. I simply present the foregoing information to the delegates as a matter of statistical interest. It is up to the delegates here to say whether or not in their judgment the State gets its money’s worth, and whether or not it would be a good idea to change to biennial elections but not biennial sessions. I personally believe in annual sessions.

Mr. Barnes of Mansfield: I am a member of the committee on Suffrage, before which the matter now under consideration was heard. I notice upon the Orders of the Day that only one dissenter is recorded, and I recall that yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Creed) commented upon the fact that there did not appear to be any sentiment in the committee in favor of biennials except the name which appeared here. Through some inadvertence or other my name does not appear on the Orders of the Day as a dissenter, although it was my request that it should so appear; and as I recall the matter, when considered in executive session by the committee, there was a very strong sentiment in favor of biennials. It was a long time ago that we had our session, but my recollection is that there were five or six men, at least, who were strongly in favor, and I recall at least one other who requested to be recorded as a dissenter. That is my only excuse for injecting myself into the debate this morning, as I believe the ground was extremely well covered yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill). The arguments contained in the report which you all have before you are also very complete. It seems most significant to me that only four States in the Union now remain in which the members of the House and Senate and the Governor are elected annually.

I might advert, for a moment only, to the character of the support in favor of biennials as it developed at the committee hearings. I can recall that one of the chief proponents of the measure was the Massachusetts Real Estate Exchange, and I have in my hand a letter addressed to the chairman of the Suffrage Committee under the letter head of the Massachusetts Real Estate Exchange, in which the strongest possible support is made in favor of the measure. The committee was addressed by Mr. George F. Washburn, the president of the exchange, and I notice among the directors of the exchange the names of Eugene N. Foss, John Hays Hammond, William B. Lawrence, August Belmont, William M. Wood, John Q. A. Brackett, Everett C. Benton, Edmund D. Codman, Frederick Ayer, F. H. Prince. This measure had the hearty support of the Massachusetts Real Estate Exchange. Its president appeared before the committee and submitted facts and figures in favor of it. Appended to this letter of the chairman of the committee are a number of figures, most of which can be found in this report. It shows that the cost of government per capita in Massachusetts is greatly in excess of nearly all the other States in the Union, and it ascribes that fact largely to the reason that we have annual elections, with the attendant cost of primaries and elections and all that sort of thing. I am not going into detail, but I have these figures here, and will be glad to show them to anybody who cares to peruse them.

I might say, in a word, that the Massachusetts Real Estate Exchange figured that it would be in excess of half a million dollars a year saved to the Commonwealth if annual elections were abolished. Of course it is not of paramount importance, because if the benefit to the State of annual elections is to be so great the question of money should not be considered; but still it is an element which we as members of this Convention certainly should take into consideration.

I was struck yesterday very strongly by the argument of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Creed), in which he made mention of the fact that biennials would be supported by invisible government and by all the agencies of corruption. In my brief experience as a member of the Legislature, — two years, — and in having come before the Legislature frequently since that time at committee hearings, I am most strongly of the opinion, and it was argued most forcibly before the committee at the hearing, that exactly the reverse is the case; that it might be expected that those men who can control and manipulate the Senate and the House of Representatives in order to keep their grip upon those bodies, if such a thing be possible, could do it much easier by the annual system; that they would not lose their grip upon the men, but that they could coerce them annually upon their elections and tie them up with promises and payments of money in the form of campaign contributions, etc. It seems to me that if there is such a thing as invisible government, — and I have no doubt it exists to a certain extent, — it would be exactly the reverse.

Further, as regards the educational feature mentioned by the same gentleman, who said that annual elections would educate the people by constantly having public questions coming before them, it also seems most forcibly that exactly the reverse would be the case; that if business, big business as well as little business and all kinds of business, could only have a rest from excessive legislation, could only have relief, even for a year or six months, from the frequent "strike" bills which are brought before an annual Legislature, if they could only be saved the time and money necessary to fight the various "strike" matters that are brought into the Legislature, they then would have time to attend to their own business and educate themselves on public questions in a little more leisurely and orderly way than they are able to do under present conditions, when we find that in the 2,400 or 2,500 bills introduced into every Legislature practically every business, large and small, is affected, and that business men have to combine themselves into committees and leagues and real estate exchanges and everything else for the purpose of coming up to the Legislature and saving themselves by appearing here and fighting for their very existence, either by the way of taxation or restriction of privileges, or legislation for the benefit of a few, and all the thousand and one things which serve to harass and keep the business men constantly stirred up and harried.

The only other matter which occurred to me, which has not been brought out, that I recall now, was the fact that the officials themselves, who are forced every year to fight for reelection, have a fight in the primary, then another fight at the polls, and before they have time to acquaint themselves with their duties they are forced into another fight. It seemed to me that the officials, the Governor, the members of the House and Senate, should have a sufficient time to acquaint themselves with their duties and with the matters before them, instead of being rushed and hurried from one election to another; and if this Convention would pass this one thing only, the time and expense of it would be more than justified by the good that would be accomplished.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: It may be remembered by some of the delegates here present that at the last session of the Convention we had under discussion the subject known as the initiative and referendum. It was somewhat irreverently referred to as the "I. and R."
It was supported by many able, conscientious, but I think misguided delegates in this Convention. [Laughter.] I was a member of the minority that opposed it, and I opposed it upon the ground that in Massachusetts the people already are very close to this legislative body. I called the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact that any citizen of the Commonwealth might cause to be introduced here a bill or resolve upon any subject that must be discussed and finally disposed of by a committee and by the Legislature before the Legislature was prorogued. I also suggested that we had what amounted to an annual recall upon our legislators by reason of the fact that we have annual elections. And then I stated that I should oppose any effort made here in favor of biennial sessions or in favor of biennial elections.

It was the habit, a very few years ago, for many highly respectable people to sneer at our legislative bodies, both Federal and State. There was a time, I believe, not very long ago, when politics was thought to be an occupation rather beneath the attention of a serious minded person. If I mistake not, the public sentiment has changed. I observe that our National Legislature is in session now practically twelve months in a year, and I believe that we all will agree that there never was a time when the constant attention of legislative bodies to public business was more imperative than now. If there has been a time when any one has thought that we could dispense with our legislative bodies, that time has passed,—at least, for the time being. I was impressed by a suggestion made by my friend in the fourth division (Mr. Barnes), that business men want to be let alone, that business men do not want to be stirred up continually by the demands of politics. Let me say to my friend that business men and all citizens of this Commonwealth and of the Nation must be stirred up now and hereafter as they never have been before in their political activities. [Applause.] One of the prices that we pay for our form of democratic representative government, if it is to be successful, is that every citizen shall pay constant and close attention to politics. Is there any one here who now sympathizes with the sentiment entertained by certain highly respectable citizens of Russia, that the Douma was an unnecessary luxury?

It has been suggested here that if we have biennial elections it will save the Commonwealth a million dollars a year. Here again the standards of the past must give way to the standards of the present and the future. I have heard the cost of education in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts objected to. Time and again I have heard it suggested that we should exercise greater economy in our expenditures in educating the children of the Commonwealth. The public school bill in this Commonwealth for a single year amounts to about $25,000,000, the price of one first-class battleship. Is there any one here who now would criticize the expenditures for public education? Is there any one here who would remove the responsibility to his constituents of the members of the Legislature by so much as the shade of a hair to save a million dollars a year? Once we enter upon that pathway, why not go the whole extent and have a Legislature sitting once in four years, or in ten years, or in twenty years?

Mr. Anderson of Newton: Does the gentleman hold in mind the fact that this measure which is pending before us provides for annual sessions of the Legislature?

Mr. Washburn: I had not lost sight of that very apparent fact, and am sorry if I have not made that evident in what I have said. I am conscious of the fact that this is the thin entering wedge, and that when we have biennial elections we shall have strongly pressed upon us biennial sessions of the Legislature; and in the broad consideration of this matter it is impossible to speak of the question at all without speaking of it in some of its general aspects.

I hope that the Convention will sustain the report of the committee. I believe that every delegate who voted against the initiative and referendum will be inconsistent in his course if he advocates biennial elections. The judgment of this Convention should be that at this time, above all others, when great problems are going to be brought in constantly increasing numbers before our Legislatures, the immediate responsibility of the legislator to his constituents should not be lessened in the slightest degree. [Applause.]

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: As this is a subject upon which I believe the members of the Convention have definite views, and as it has been covered pretty thoroughly, and what remains to be said can be said easily in the thirty minutes remaining, I move the previous question.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: What I want to say is very brief, and I can say it in a few minutes. In my humble judgment we are suffering in this Commonwealth from too many elections, too much government and too much law; and any move toward biennial elections, even if it is the entering wedge toward biennial sessions, we ought to welcome. With all the primaries, elections,—municipal, State and special,—I think, and I hear the expression everywhere, that the people are tired of it. As for the Legislature, it long has been said that Massachusetts takes six months to make laws for the other half of the year. How long will it be before the year is not long enough to make laws for the year? There (indicating) is the gentle little volume which we are tossing out as the product of one Legislature in each year, the Acts and Resolves of 1913, a period of profound peace. That is what we are giving to the people. I am in favor of stopping the mill during a part of the time, if we cannot do any better. In 1879 and 1880 and 1881 we got along with a volume an inch thick, and who says that we did not then live and move and have our being and were as happy and prosperous and as well off as we are now? Who is there who rejoices when the Legislature sits? Who is there who does not breathe a sigh of relief when it gets through its session? If we can avoid this, have a little peace, have a little rest, it would be a great boon to the Commonwealth.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I differ with the preceding speaker. I hope that the report of the committee will be sustained. The Constitution says frequent recurrence to the will of the people is the safety of the Republic. That word "frequent" is a comparative term; it may be superlatively less or superlatively more under certain conditions. So let us look at the conditions. Is it not less difficult to-day for a man to go to the polls annually than it was when this Constitution was framed? It is very much more easy. A man took a long time to get to the polls then, but he went once a year. You ought to go once in six months, with the comparative ability, with the comparative ease, with which you can go to the polls now. The delegate from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) seems to think that the very frequency is to bring contempt. I think contempt from frequency is not to be found in the annual elections.

We have refused to give more power to the Legislature. Why do you give more power to legislators? Surely a man has more power if he is elected for two years than he does if he is elected for one.

You say Massachusetts is the best State in the Union. Well, she has annual elections. Two and two may not make four in that case.
But prove it, because the moment you cross over to the States that are not as good as Massachusetts you find they have the long terms. Do you remember the exhibition of corruption in Ohio? Do you forget the blocks of five?

If you continue the argument of commercialism how long will it be before you say that "going to church takes too much time, is an unnecessary proceeding; let us arrange that we have prayer only once a month, go to church once a month." It is on the same line of reasoning. If you cannot have too much religion in order to be good churchmen you cannot have too much of your politics in order to be good citizens. It costs something, you say, but how does it cost anything? It simply redistributes the money; that is all there is to it. You have not wasted your money. It goes from one fellow's pocket into another fellow's pocket, and usually the fellow who gets it is the one who wants it more than the one who spends it. Otherwise he would not get it.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: It is pleasant to me to hear the representatives of different organizations say that they represent the plain people and the common people on the question of biennial elections. It is more interesting to me to hear the delegate in the third division (Mr. Anderson) say the Republican party, the Prohibition party, the Democratic party, recommend biennial elections. Now, I do not know what some of the delegates present mean in saying that the boards of trade represent the interests of the plain people and the common people. I have had the pleasure in my life of associating with the people, the people of this Commonwealth, and whatever the people are they are proud of it. At every convention for twenty-seven years,—and they average about 300 delegates representing the various trades-unions of this Commonwealth,—I never have heard one union man defending biennial elections. The Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor hold their convention annually. Every gentleman is invited to be present and listen to the transaction of the business, because there is no secrecy there. Year after year the working-men of this Commonwealth have gone on record as opposed to biennial elections. I wanted to make that explanation in view of the announcement made by the other delegates of the societies and organizations they represented. The Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor represents about 200,000 wage-earners, men and women of this Commonwealth; and in their discussions at their meetings these important subjects are brought up, and any gentleman interested in them always will be found welcome to be given the privilege of the floor in defence of such questions as this, if he will answer questions by the delegates who sit in the Convention. I am saying this as a member of organized labor, and expressing the feeling of organized labor of this Commonwealth,—their opposition to biennial elections. We want to see representative government keep close to the people, as has been said by the gentleman from Salem in the fourth division (Mr. Sullivan), who read that well-written piece from the Boston Herald. We want to promote industry, and there is no delegate in this Convention who wants to take up biennial elections, to bring about any idleness under the false cry of economy, or to bring injury to the printer or injury to everybody else. It does not help any political propaganda if a practical politician of this Commonwealth practices economy in spending his money in bringing about the success of his campaign.

The delegate in the third division (Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport), who put down that big volume here to illustrate his argument on biennial elections, would need to double the size of a volume of Acts of the Legislature if biennials are adopted, because candidates for the Legislature in their false promises to the people, telling them how they love and respect them and what measures they will introduce and will bring about if they are elected as their Representative, will have to put through such a vast number of laws to anywhere near carry out their promises. I trust that the delegates to this Convention will defeat biennial elections and keep our government of the people for the people and close to the people. [Applause.]

Mr. LINKE of West Springfield: Being one of the strongest advocates in the Convention for speed, I shall not take much of your time. I simply will say that I am a working-man, consider myself so, expect to remain so. I am a member of a labor-union. I am not, perhaps, a good member of the labor-union, as I do not participate in many of its meetings, do not attend any of the Central Labor meetings, and never have held an office in the union. However, I do resent the statement that has been made that all union labor men in this State are against biennial elections, the same as I resent the statement that was made several times last year, and not criticized, that all union men are for the initiative and referendum. I happen to belong to a union which is classed as one of skilled labor, and a few of our men are thinking men, I believe, good citizens of their town or city and good citizens of the State. I do not think that some of the representatives of union labor in this State will claim that the union vote is going to follow them in all they say, and I for one am strongly in favor of biennial elections. [Applause.]

Mr. THELLER of New Bedford: I really have not made up my mind as to how to vote on this question, but I should like to have the final decision of it deferred, and I think there may be others who would agree with me. For that reason I want to bring to the attention of the members the fact that on the next page of the calendar there is a resolution, No. 223 in the calendar, relative to the powers and responsibilities of the Governor (Document No. 311), which provides for the biennial election of the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. In that report, which is signed, I think, by Mr. Quincy, it says:

Independent of action which may be taken upon the general question of biennial elections, this committee believes that the Chief Executive at least should be given a two-year term.

In my estimation we shall be in a far better position to judge of this after further debate on this proposition. At least we then can be consistent, so that I hope at any rate the Convention will pass this to another reading and not accept the committee report which has been made upon this resolution. It may be defeated easily if the Convention sees fit at a later time when we have heard the arguments which will support the proposition for the election of Governor and Lieutenant-Governor biennially.

Mr. Cox of Boston: When this question was on the ballot some years ago I voted against it. If it be put upon the ballot this fall I may vote against it at the polls. But it is a very simple matter; it seems to me one of those matters which the people can understand as well as anything you can submit to them. We have had it stated that there are a large number of people in this Commonwealth who wish to have biennial elections. For my part I can see no harm or danger at all in submitting the question to the people, and for that reason I shall support this resolution in this Convention, although if I am of the opinion that I was when it was upon the ballot before, at the polls I shall vote against it.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: Some years ago this matter was referred to the people. All the press of the State were lined up for it. But in those days we had a statesman in Massachusetts, a man who always rose to the occasion and who represented with distinction and honor this State in the Senate of his country at Washington. There indeed he always reflected the greatest credit on this Commonwealth. I refer to the lamented and the departed and never-to-be-forgotten George Frisbee Hoar. Toward the close of the contest he wrote one call to the people of Massachusetts and in it he said: "If this act be my last, let us stand together and fight for annual elections." [Applause.] And George F. Hoar, alone and almost single handed, defeated the proposition. I trust, sir, in these troublesome times, and especially at this time, without knowing how and when we may be called together, we shall not give arguments to people that should not be placed in their hands and wipe out annual elections, which form one of the safeguards of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I claim to be one of those plain people. I am one of a family of ten children. I have lived among the plain people and I hope I shall pass the balance of my days with the plain, common people. Now I contend in my district we are all plain people from Buzzard's Bay down. There may be a little change as you move on this way. And I know whereof I speak. They desire to have an opportunity to vote on this question of biennial elections, and but for biennial elections, compulsory voting, biennial sessions and a few of those matters which the plain people understand, you would not have had this Convention to-day.

Now my friend from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) and I view this matter from two different angles. He has been laying the brick and I have been carrying the mortar,—two different propositions. You go out among your constituents with nomination papers and you will have to approach them as cautiously and carefully as you would if you were going to inform one of them that his wife had been run over by an electric car. Why? Because they are entirely disgusted,—they are entirely disgusted with these annual elections.

The gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Sullivan of Salem) says it has cost nearly $6,000,000 in six years. Do you suppose the plain people do not appreciate $6,000,000? The plain people cannot go out without any limit on what their wages shall be. But professional men, there is no limit,—they can go out and get anywhere from $5 to $20,000 a day. Now these men who know what the value of a dollar is are the men who believe there can be a saving in this matter of biennial elections. And when the gentleman from Worcester says: "Why, this is the sharp entering wedge," does he not thank God that we drove that wedge home when we got the Australian ballot system?
Oh, I remember; I guess I do,—when they used to stand down in our old town hall, men with the ballots, and you voted that ballot or you did not go in my vessel. That is gone, and gone forever. If we do not give the people an opportunity to vote on this question we violate the confidence they put in us when they sent us here. It was but a few days ago that I heard my friend in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), whom I always follow when I can, say: "You fooled me once, you trimmed me once, but you can't do it twice." If you do not give this to the people you fool them and you are trimming them with the rankest trim they ever had. This matter has been in the Legislature year after year and you could not get it through the Legislature because some people believed that if we got away with biennial elections,—what would follow? Biennial sessions. I do not know anything about biennial sessions; we are not talking about biennial sessions. You are raising up a bogey. A man would not refrain from building a house because he thought it was going to burn up. Certainly he would not. And I hope that now, right on the spot, without any further argument, we will give this resolution a reading and let it go to the people and let them decide for themselves. Twenty years is a very long time since they have had this question before them and you will find some changes in opinion. You did not have the Progressive party twenty years ago, and this is one of the prominent factors in the Progressive party and the Democratic party and the Republican party that has brought out the vote and made some changes. Now, I do hope that the report of the committee will be negatived and that the resolution will go along.

Mr. Gates of Westborough: The gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) referred to one man defeating the biennial election amendment. Now all men, no matter how great and how strong and influential they are, do make an occasional mistake. I believe Senator Hoar was one of the greatest men Massachusetts ever produced, but the greatest men in any country or in any State sometimes make mistakes. I believe in this case Senator Hoar was not right, and I believe that we have other men who can testify, who were situated in a better place for observing the working of this system than was Senator Hoar. I speak of such men as Governor Claflin, Governor Talbot, Governor Rice, Governor Robinson, Governor Ames, Governor Brackett, Governor Foss, Governor Walsh and Governor McCall. They have occupied the Governor's chair in this building and have been in a position to see the working of the Legislature and to know whether it is wise to elect your Representative for one year to an office to bring about reform and administer the laws of the Commonwealth as they should be administered and yet have no opportunity to do so, because as soon as he gets acquainted with the duties of his office he has to go out and campaign for re-election and neglect his duties. No business man would hire a man for twelve months and pay him for spending six months of that time running around the country. That is what we do with our Governor. The man who is supposed to have been elected to administer the office is there only a few months when he has to go out and seek another election. I sat on the same platform with Senator Hoar and I helped Senator Hoar into Congress, but the man who now says Senator Hoar was infallible was opposed to his going to Congress. [Laughter.]
Mr. Richardson of Newton: Since the day when I was honored by election to this body I have been endeavoring by personal interviews with the people who sent me here to discover their opinion on various important matters which are before this Convention. As I have gone around the city of Newton and talked with the people in all walks of life whom I know there, I venture to say that there is no one major matter which is up before this Convention on which I have found the sentiment so nearly a unit as on this pending question. I do not believe there is any doubt that the people of Newton at any rate are three to one in favor of a change in the system of elections in this Commonwealth. They see it in a common-sense way. They believe that it is totally unnecessary to go through the form of electing State officers every 365 days. More than that, they believe that the Legislature would be strengthened if a man when standing for election were elected for a two-year term instead of the short term of one year. They think that it would add to the responsibility and dignity of that office, and in that conclusion and in their other conclusions I heartily agree. It seems to me that it is our plain duty to pass this matter at any rate to another reading, not kill it now, and see what the reaction of the press and the public is to our attitude. I venture to say that that reaction will be entirely favorable and commendatory.

Mr. Talbot of Plymouth: I notice that when this amendment was defeated twenty years ago my own county, the county of Plymouth, voted nearly two to one against it. That is not the sentiment there to-day; I know that. It is rather significant that at that time the majority of the votes cast against the measure came from the counties of Suffolk and Essex. The sentiment of the smaller towns at least is in favor of biennial elections. In my mind it is significant that State after State has changed. At first all of the original thirteen States, with the exception of South Carolina, held annual elections. They gradually have changed. To-day they have biennial elections or some longer term. The same reasons that induced those States to change must affect our State in some degree, perhaps greater or less. The proposed change, to my mind, does not involve any great fundamental proposition; it is simply a question of expediency.

The arguments for biennials have been very well summed up. The frequency of elections, the waste of time and energy; the people are tired of voting so many times a year; they do not get out to the polls. The statistics of the various States where they have biennial elections show that a much larger percentage of voters now vote than when the elections were annual. And that is what we want. We want to get the sentiment of the voters. We do not get it under present conditions.

In the pamphlet which the Commissioners compiled, No. 9, on page 27, is an article by Governor Walsh which very well sums up, it seems to me, the argument against the present system. It says:

It is impossible for those who have not been in the public service to realize how much its efficiency is impaired by the necessity of making ready and participating in the struggle of annual elections. The loss of time is great, but the unrest, distraction and diversion of thought from the channels of public service cause a still greater loss in the value of the public servant. The executive officers scarcely become acquainted with their duties before they are obliged to enter upon an elaborate campaign to defend themselves against attack and oftentimes partisan abuse, and, perhaps, are turned out of office before they have had an opportunity to prove their capacity, or to put in operation the principles or reforms upon the advocacy of which they may have been elected.
It seems to me that biennial elections will do two things. In regard to the Legislature, instead of having perhaps a third of your men inexperienced you are going to have, — at least in the second session, — every man experienced. That will result, I believe, in greater consideration being given to business; there will be more general laws and fewer acts of special legislation, and it is said that is what we want. In the executive chamber we are going to have continuity of action; that is what we want, — continuity of action and better administration. Therefore I hope this question will be submitted to the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Ferry of Northbridge: I rise to explain my position. As a member of the committee on Suffrage I dissented from the report of the committee and expected to be so recorded. I am unfortunate in not being a representative of any society or organization; I simply am here to try to represent the people of my district, and as far as I can find from talking with them, they are in favor of biennial elections.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I want to say as to the executive action in the committee, there was at that time in my recollection only one dissenter, the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Gallagher); and had these other two gentlemen who say they would like to be recorded as dissenters so desired, they could have had their names put on at any time, as the report has been on the calendar now for a year.

I want to quote the statement made by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) last year: He said: "I regard our Legislature as the best Legislature in America and perhaps the best legislative body in the world." I will go a little further and say that I believe Massachusetts is the best governed State in the Union. Now if it be true, — and who is there who cares to dispute it? — that we are the best governed State in the Union, there must be some peculiarity about our government which makes us excel the other States; and the only governmental peculiarity that we have, as has been pointed out, is that we have annual elections.

I want to say that I believe we owe the excellence of our government to two things. One is our system of legislation, whereby every citizen may petition to the Legislature and no committee can pigeonhole his bill, — it must be discussed and voted on in the open; and the other is that we have annual elections. The gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), who fathers the milder of these two resolutions, yesterday was very careful to say that he believed our present system of legislation should be retained and that we should retain the annual session. I do not believe that we can retain our present system of legislation unless we retain the annual election. The effect upon the Legislature of biennial elections is the first reason why we should stand by the committee's report and vote yes and reject this proposition for biennials. It would destroy the efficiency of the Legislature by making practically a new Legislature each year. Vermont, the last year under annual elections, re-elected eleven Senators and 96 Representatives. The second year under biennial elections it re-elected no Senators and only 4 Representatives. Ohio last year, having abolished the annual elections, re-elected only one out of 28 legislators. Indiana last year re-elected only five out of 146 legislators. It means, if we substitute biennial elections, that we go either in one of two directions, — that we enlarge our House, as it is in New Hampshire, to four or five hundred members, else the small towns never can have a Representative, or that those who come to the Legislature will recognize that they never will have a reelection and they get all they can out of it in a single term and that is the end of it. The secret of the corruption in Ohio has been pointed out in magazine articles and spoken of here,—that they have no reelctions and that there is no reward or punishment of a member. He gets his term, and that is the end of it. It would destroy the efficiency of the Legislature by having so many green men. It would destroy the balance of representation among the small towns. In some districts there are ten or twelve country towns. Each town now elects a Representative only once in ten years. Under the biennial system they would get a Representative perhaps once in twenty years; perhaps never. It will remove your Legislature from the control of the popular will. Our annual election provides, as it has been said, until the recall has been adopted, the only means by which the people can express their approval or disapproval of the conduct of their representative.

Are we as members of this Convention prepared to take so serious a step as it would be to destroy the annual elections? In 1631 the freemen of Massachusetts Bay Colony voted that the general session of the General Court should be holden at least once a year. John Adams in his works goes on at some length and insists that Massachusetts shall have annual elections. And in our Constitution it is specifically safeguarded (Declaration of Rights, 22d article):

The Legislature ought frequently to assemble for the redress of grievances, for correcting, strengthening and confirming the laws, and for making new laws, as the common good may require.

The people passed on this question in 1896 and by a majority of 50,000 stood by our time-honored position. You say that they have not had a chance to pass on it since then? Why, it has been in the Legislature several years and been voted down by a large majority. In 1914 the resolution went into the Senate and was defeated by a vote of two to one. The next year it came into the House and was rejected by a vote of almost two to one.

Last night it was said that the political parties were in favor of abolishing annual elections. The Republican party as a whole party in this State, with the exception of one year, never has gone on record in favor of biennial elections. In 1896, when the great fight was made, there was one of the biggest fights ever made in a political convention in the committee on Resolutions of the Republican State Convention. The fight for biennial elections was led by Senator Lodge and Mr. Justice Moody. A protest was sent in signed by Senator Hoar, ex-Governor Boutwell, Joseph H. Walker and many men of kindred standing and experience, and after a long discussion the committee voted 15 to 13 against putting it into the Republican platform, and the Republican party has taken that position every year since then until two years ago. Two years ago it came out and said: "We are in favor of biennial elections." Why did it take that position? Because Governor McCall wanted the support of the statesman of Walpole, Mr. Charles S. Bird, and one of the sine qua nons of Mr. Bird's support was that that should go into the platform of the Republican party. That is the only time that the Republican party has gone on record in favor of abolishing annual elections. The Democratic party never has gone on record in favor of abolishing annual elections.

They tell us there is too much politics. What is politics? What is a political campaign? It is simply a summons, a challenge to the people to exercise the prerogatives of citizenship, to take an interest in the public business; and can there be too much of that? Yesterday the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) gave it as his opinion that if we had less frequent elections there would be more interest in the elections. I want to quote from a little book on “Biennial Elections” by a gentleman who is known to you all, Mr. Raymond L. Bridgman. Mr. Bridgman has been a reporter in this State House 41 years. He has watched proceedings here with the eye of an experienced and intelligent observer. His book should have been mentioned in the pamphlet given to us by the Commission. And he makes this wise observation:

Now, political judgment grows by exercise. Is it reasonable to suppose that in the line of mental endowments here is an exception to the rule which demands exercise for the promotion of strength? It is so clear that it needs only attention to make it certain that political faculties, like other mental qualities, are promoted by exercise. The issues at stake in a political campaign are the most important in a man’s existence, except those involved in his personal relation to his Maker. They demand the utmost fund of information, the most thorough knowledge of public men and public events, the ability to discern between the true and the false, determination to adhere to the right, no matter what man or party calls upon him to subordinate his judgment or his conscience, unselfish activity for the public good at the expense of ease or pocket. Once in a year is none too often for giving large attention to public concerns. Once in a year is none too often to exercise the freeman’s right and prerogative of passing judgment upon the men and measures of the times. It is the exercise of the power which makes it effective.

The figures of the cost of annual elections were given to you. Do you know how much it is per capita? The figures are less than half a dollar, and if you abolish annual elections you may save perhaps a third of that. Twenty cents, perhaps, you will save per capita to your people by abolishing annual elections. Is twenty cents a year too much of a tax to put upon the people for the privilege of their reviewing the acts of their representatives at the State House each year?

There is one more thing. This is an important question, a public question that has been agitated long in our State. This year our voting electorate will be smaller than for years. Thousands and thousands of our boys and young men who have lived in this State all their lives are away. It is unfair to our soldiers, who are away from this State and unable to cast their vote upon this proposition, for us to act upon the question in their absence, and make so great a change in our system of government as going from the system of annual elections to the system of biennial elections. I trust the Convention will stand by the report of the committee.

By a vote of 95 to 111, by a call of the yeas and nays, Friday, July 12, the Convention refused to reject the resolution (No. 126), as had been recommended by the committee on Suffrage; and, accordingly, it was placed in the Orders of the Day for a second reading.

The resolution was read a second time Tuesday, August 6.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: Before stating the reasons for my opposition to the question of biennial elections, now before the Convention, I wish to say that I am sorry that all the delegates to the Convention are not here, because a question of such importance as this should not be passed or rejected, as the case may be, in the absence of any of the representatives of the people.

I made a statement a few weeks ago, on behalf of organized labor in this Commonwealth, in opposition to biennial elections. I call to the attention of the delegates to this Convention the fact that I have in my possession now the proceedings of the thirtieth annual convention of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor, held in the city of Lawrence, September 10-13, 1917. I have looked through the resolutions that were passed there to see if there were any in relation to biennial elections, and I cannot find one. But I do find, — and I say this without directing any sarcasm toward any member of this Convention in regard to any past statement made here as to the action of that convention last year, — I do find that that convention adopted about 72 resolutions, and the proceedings of that convention comprise 103 printed pages. The initiative and referendum was discussed for fifteen or twenty minutes on the opening day of the convention, two delegates speaking in favor of it. Mr. Henry Sterling, legislative committee agent, was one, and I was the other. We were waiting to hear the report of the committee on Credentials, and thereafter a resolution in favor of the initiative and referendum was unanimously adopted. Resolution No. 5, in opposition to prohibition, was brought up, and that took twenty minutes to discuss. That resolution was indorsed unanimously by the delegates there, four delegates speaking on that subject. The rest of the day was devoted neither to the initiative and referendum nor to anything in connection with rum; so that any statement made on the floor of this Convention by anybody to the contrary belittles the representatives of the trade-union movement and casts an insinuation upon them. But I am sorry to say that I do not find among the resolutions adopted at that convention one which they have had for over twenty years in opposition to biennial elections.

I also interviewed the officers of the State Federation of Labor, and they told me that that organization, through its executive board and joint legislative committee, is opposed to biennial elections. At a meeting of the Central Labor-Union, at which I was present as a delegate, a resolution introduced by Henry Abrahams opposing biennial elections was adopted. I can say that I have attended these conventions for thirty years; I have not missed one of them. For sixteen years I was an officer of the convention, and during the balance of the time I went as a delegate and did my duty there, except last year when this Convention was in session, and then I went there for one day, — on the Monday that the Convention did not meet here.

As I say, I participated in the proceedings of that convention last year, beginning on Monday, September 10, and I was there again on Wednesday, and during that time great questions were discussed relating to the interests of organized labor, — health and other matters. But the question of biennial elections the State Federation of Labor did not discuss. They had discussed it yearly up to a few years ago; and it was discussed in meetings of the various central labor-unions up to a few years ago, and those unions always were in opposition to it. I am saying this as a labor man and not as a demagogue. I do not know whether I am a leader or not, but I always look a little farther than the point of my nose, and I have thoughts and ideas as well as any college graduate, as I am a man who has worked for wages, and I have not always followed the leadership of others, because of course every man has a right to have his own opinion. I am pleased also to read in the press the action of the various labor-unions on this subject.

I want to say, however, to the delegates to this Convention that, of course, all the members of organized labor are not in accord on this matter, there being over 200,000 members in this Commonwealth. I want to say also that I do not believe the delegates who sit here understand the labor movement. They do not know the formation of international unions with power over their local unions; that is, the only power and authority over a local union connected with any trade or calling is that of the international union. The State branches are voluntary organizations. The central labor-unions are of the same nature, to which representatives are sent to discuss public questions concerning the interests of the country and the interests of the men and women who work and those who do not work for wages in this Commonwealth. But, to repeat, you will find that there are a few men in every organization who disagree with the majority, and of course they have a right to their opinion. So that I do not think that every man who carries a union card is opposed to this measure. Also I do not think that because a man carries a union card he is a thorough trade-unionist. He is entitled to his individual freedom of opinion as an individual. But all the labor conventions which I have attended for the past thirty years have opposed biennial elections.

You heard the statement made by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Sullivan of Salem), when the question was under discussion before, at the time that magnificent piece of itemized expense with reference to annual elections was read, and at the time the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Bartlett) took that volume and showed what annual sessions meant if the Convention adopted biennial elections and opposed biennial sessions. I say do not stop that big document from being created and going on as it has in the past. Every man knows that biennial elections means biennial sessions, and why fool the people of this Commonwealth by a political propaganda that we will have biennial elections but annual sessions of the Legislature or of the General Court. Why not face the issue and say to the people of this Commonwealth: "We are in favor of biennial sessions and biennial elections," so that the people will know what the issue is.

I want to say again to the delegates here that everybody knows that biennial elections will mean the bringing about of biennial sessions, and I feel that the people of this Commonwealth do not want biennial elections.

The delegate from the first division (Mr. Richardson) said, in favoring biennial elections, that the public press should have an opportunity to express its feeling as to whether or not it is in favor of biennial elections. What has the public press done since this Convention voted to adopt biennial elections? One or two papers, perhaps, the Boston Herald, may favor biennial elections. The Boston Post had an editorial in to-day's issue, which I read. How about the rest of the newspapers? Do they favor biennial elections?

I hope the delegates to this Convention will defeat biennial elections. I hope that they will keep our government so close to the people that when we have men who betray the people while in public office, we shall have annual elections to send new men in their places. I say this not as a representative of organized labor, because I have no authority to represent organized labor, although I have been asked by the officers of the labor movement to oppose this proposition in their interest and in their behalf, and I am making that explanation so that if biennial elections come, the people who are loyal to the trade-union movement, — and we all are loyal, no matter if we do disagree on questions that arise in our labor conventions, — there will be found on the public platform this fall orators showing the people their interest in their welfare.

I trust the votes of the delegates to this Convention to-day will defeat biennial elections, thereby continuing to keep the government of our old Commonwealth close to the people, in the interest of the people and for the people.

Mr. Gates of Westborough: I offer an amendment, inserting in lines 11, 26 and 37, in the blank which appears in each place, the word “twenty,” so as to make biennial elections come on even years, the same as our Presidential elections, — 1916, 1920, 1924, our Congressional elections also coming in even years, so that biennial elections shall come in the same years as Presidential elections and Congressional elections.

The reasons why this amendment should be adopted by this Constitutional Convention are that when the Convention was called, and before it was called, there was a demand that three great questions should be settled by this Convention and sent to the people. The first was what was called the “Anti-aid” amendment; the second the I. and R., or the initiative and referendum; and the third was biennial elections.

Those questions have been before the people for a long time and have been before the Legislature for many years. A bill providing for biennial elections has passed both Houses of the Legislature, by more than a two to one vote, more than twenty times, and there has been a public demand all over this State for biennial elections.

Those who were opposed to this measure at the last reading called attention to the fact that in 1896 biennial elections went to the people for their indorsement, and at that time there was not a majority in favor. But I want to say that conditions are very different at the present time from what they were in 1896. From 1865, after the war, the Republican party was so strong in this State that there was practically only one party; and when one party has an overwhelming majority year after year, that party gets into ruts and into a condition whereby one or two leaders control the party. At that time, Senator George F. Hoar, who had been United States Senator for many years, said that biennial elections should not be passed; and as he was the greatest leader in the party at that time, that remark changed a large number of votes and biennial elections were not adopted, although, under those circumstances, there were four counties that voted in favor of biennial elections, and if it had not been for the vote in Boston and vicinity, the measure would have passed. But outside of Boston, in the vicinity of Boston there was less than 15,000 majority against biennial elections in a total vote of 300,000.

Originally, all the States but one had annual elections. Those States, one by one, have done away with annual elections, and have biennial elections, or elections less frequently. Of the 47 States, there are 31 States in which the Senate is elected for four years, and 42 States in which the House is elected for two years; and in every one of those States the Governor would say and testify that not one of those States would for a minute consider going back to annual elections. They get more efficient officers; they get a greater interest among the voters, and, to prove that, we find in bulletin No. 9, which has been furnished to the Convention, that the States that have biennial elections have a larger percentage of voters at the polls than Massachusetts has. In looking over the statistics of the twelve States given in bulletin No. 9, you will see that of those twelve, Ohio, in 1914, cast 85 per cent of its registered votes, while Massachusetts cast only 60 per cent. The average for the twelve States mentioned in that bulletin is over 69 per cent, which is 9 per cent more than Massachusetts.

If this biennial elections amendment passed, we would not need the compulsory voting measure that was passed last week, although I believe that something of that kind should be done, but this would remedy it generally. If we keep elections before the people continuously for twelve months in the year, many, many voters lose their interest. That is shown by the Presidential election in 1916, when the candidates for Governor in this State received 537,000 votes, while last year the candidates for Governor received only 387,000. That shows that if elections were less often, we should have a greater interest and a greater number of votes cast in this State.

I spoke a moment ago to the effect that the Governors of all the other States have indorsed biennial elections, or elections once in every three or four years. The Governors of this State for the last fifty years, with one or two exceptions, have recommended to the Legislature each year that it should submit to the people a biennial elections amendment. The State convention of the Republican party in 1915 and 1916 unanimously indorsed biennial elections. The Progressive party, in its conventions of 1914 and 1915, adopted the same resolution. Governor McCall, in recommending the calling of the Constitutional Convention, said the delegates should pass this amendment allowing the people to express themselves, and there is no question but that the people should be allowed to express themselves.

I cannot understand how a member of this Convention who thinks he believes in the I. and R. can refuse to allow the voters of this State to say when they shall have their elections. I noticed on the second reading that men who think they are progressive and talked to this Convention in regard to the “dear people,” keeping the government near to the people, voted, 34 of them, against trusting the people, in whom they believe; and it seems to me that if there is any matter as to which the I. and R. ought to operate, it is our State elections.

Many of the progressives think they originated the progressive ideas. I want to say I have been a progressive all my life, and I was progressive years before some of them were born, and nearly every plank in the Progressive party in the State was a plank that had been in the Republican party time and time again. I believe that this question, of all questions, should be submitted to the people, and that is all we ask. I was not at the time so enthusiastic as some members in regard to the I. and R., but I have learned to trust the people, I voted for the I. and R., and I believe if any man who voted for the I. and R. is consistent, he will vote for biennial elections to be submitted to the people this fall.

The last speaker spoke of the expense, about which I spoke during the debate on the previous reading. Now, I do not consider the expense all important. As has been said in this Convention, the State is not in business to make money. We know that; we have evidence of it. It does not make money; it is in business to spend money; and it has been so successful in spending money that in the last two years the tax rate has jumped so much and increased so much that every man in the State is trying to figure out how we can stop the tax rate from increasing. It has increased from four million, in 1908, until now it is nearly twenty million; and the Legislature last winter spent weeks trying to find some item that they could keep out of our State expense and save taxes. Now, in this one item you can save a million dollars; you can save, next year, enough to pay the entire expenses of this Convention and have more efficient officers. To prove what I say, I will quote what Governor Walsh said. Governor Walsh asked the Legislature of which I was a member to vote for this amendment on biennial elections and submit it to the people. He asked that, he said, for the reason that the Governor no more than got in his chair and got a little bit accustomed to his duties than he had to go out and campaign for re-election and answer abuse from politicians, and his efficiency was so affected that it was impossible for any Governor to bring around the reforms he advocated in his campaign, and that if we would only give a Governor a chance to show his capacity by keeping him in office more than one year, the State would be the gainer.

So I say that we can save this money for the taxpayer and have more efficient officers; and all I ask is that you do what you were sent here for, to send this amendment back to the people. The member in the first division (Mr. Driscoll) says he always wanted the I. and R., so the working-man could have a chance to see how we stand on different questions, and that is all we want this time.

Mr. ANDERSON of Newton: This is a measure for biennial elections and annual sessions of the Legislature. When the gentleman from Boston in the second division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll) says that this means biennial sessions of the Legislature, that is an unjustifiable and unprovable suspicion. I have heard nothing from the supporters of biennial elections in favor of biennial sessions. This is a debatable question, and the proof is that it has been debated for many years, and it will be debated until it is settled right. The right settlement of this issue will be biennial elections, and the proof of that is that in all States in which biennial elections are the rule the debate has ended.

Now, there are two sides to this question. Our solution of it, whichever way it goes, will be a mere matter of probability, as all decisions in this Convention. All of life goes on probability, whether we go into business, or whether we get married, or whether we run for office,—it is all a matter of probability. If in some conservative's heart there arises the cry, "Why, he wants us to take a chance," I wish to say to that gentleman that every man takes as great a chance, or greater chances, by staying where he is than by going ahead. The only question is whether the change to biennial elections really is going ahead, whether it is real progress.

I see that there are at least three parties in this Convention who oppose biennial elections. The first of them are the labor leaders, who want to keep the Legislature under their thumb, and, if I mistake not,—I may be mistaken,—also some representatives of certain interests in this State who want to do exactly the same thing. Then there are the politicians. I do not use that word in any derogatory sense. There are some men who enjoy politics, and I must say that I find it a most interesting game. I do not know but that I might become a politician myself, if I did not have more important business to do. Some of these politicians enjoy the game so much that they want it to go on all the time. Consequently, they are in favor of annual elections. Other men who have become leaders in politics favor annuals because they find this million dollars every year very convenient indeed for maintaining their organizations. I do not mean to say that they use it wrongly, but they find it very convenient for merely legitimate expenses in oiling their machines. In fact, they could not run the machine so well if it were not that they had these annual elections with the accompanying money. And what would the poor lobbyists do if they did not have a new membership in the Legislature oftener than every two years? Some of them would starve, I fear; and yet we must consider that no great gain is ever won without some small loss.

Besides these, there are among the opponents of biennial elections some of the very noblest and finest members of this Convention, men of the grand old Puritan stock, one of the finest breeds that God ever created, sane, useful and intelligent citizens. They are immersed in the Massachusetts tradition; they were born, bred and nurtured in it, and it has become to them a prejudice, a guide, a superstition. I say a superstition, for, after all, their advocacy of annual elections is against common sense. I use that phrase, "common sense," in the technical meaning of the words; that is, the sense of the very great majority. All the States of this Union have come to the conclusion that biennial elections are best for them, and Massachusetts holds out alone. That does not make any difference to some of these delegates, for many of them are accustomed to live in select company.

Massachusetts standing alone against all the rest of democracy in this matter reminds me of the story of the old Scotchman. He lived in quite a town, and he was very religious. They asked him how many he supposed would be saved, and his answer was: "I, my wife, my son John and his wife, we four and no more,—and sometimes I have my doubts about John."
BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

121

In this matter of annual elections, Massachusetts has no wife (or no husband), and no son John, and of course no daughter-in-law; she has only a couple of first cousins whom I have not heard mentioned in this debate so far, perhaps because people are ashamed of them,—New York and New Jersey, which annually elect the lower branch of their Legislatures. The lower branch of those Legislatures usually is painted pretty black, and, if I recall correctly my brushes with the legislative committees at Albany, none too black. If annual elections are the cause of Massachusetts having a Legislature which is better than any other in the country, then it is strange that annual elections have not done the same thing for New York and New Jersey.

We are wont to talk a little about the traditions of the fathers, especially of John Adams. John Adams said, in 1776: "Where annual elections end, there slavery begins." That was not true, in the first place, because biennial States like Michigan, Iowa and Kansas are not now in slavery; and, in the second place, John Adams was in the process of changing his mind, because, in 1787, he said he thought annual elections were on trial, and, in 1808, he opposed the change from biennial to annual elections of Congress on what seems to me to be excellent ground. Not all of the thirteen States were for biennial elections. South Carolina was biennial, and before the eighteenth century was out Tennessee followed her, and it very soon became the fashion,—a fashion which never has changed, for no State which has ever adopted biennial elections has ever afterwards had any agitation for annual elections.

I was curious to see how Massachusetts voted on this matter in the United States Constitutional Convention of 1787. If you will look at the Journal of that Convention, under date of June 21, you will see that the question was whether Congress should be elected triennially or biennially. By a very narrow margin triennial elections for Congress were defeated and then biennial elections were adopted unanimously. Massachusetts unanimously voted for biennial elections in the Convention of 1787.

Now, we hear a good deal about Governor Long, for whom I have the very highest regard, and Senator Hoar, a man whom we all honor, and James G. Blaine, and "Tom" Reed, as opposed to biennial elections; but when that list is exhausted, there do not seem to be any other very great men opposed to it. In fact, I want you to notice that all those men are dead.

There are really three questions which underlie this matter, and the first of these is: Will annual or biennial elections interest and educate the voters the more?

Now, there are two psychological principles, which run diametrically opposite to each other, which may be urged on one side or on the other. The first is that the oftener we make an impression, the deeper and more lasting it becomes and the more interest the person takes. For that reason, we send children to school five days in the week instead of one, and every sensible teacher wants to have his class five days in the week instead of one if he possibly can. On the other hand, there is the other principle that when things become too common, we lose our interest in them. For instance, if a great singer comes to this city every two or three years, the largest hall in the city is packed with music lovers, the tickets are sold at very high prices, and there is great excitement and interest in the town. But if she should sing every night in the week, very soon the city of Boston would be tired of her. We see the working of this principle in the weariness of the electorate with reference to our elections. When annual elections began in this State there was only one annual election, but now there are at least four annual elections, namely, a State primary, a State election, a city primary and a city election. No wonder that they have become weary of these four annual elections.

We could debate these two psychological principles until doomsday and never get anywhere. We must appeal from philosophical opinions to facts; and these facts are shown, as the gentleman from Westborough (Mr. Gates) already has noticed, on page 13 of the information on biennial elections furnished to this Convention. There are twelve States scheduled there, with the ratio of legal voters present at the polls, and Massachusetts, in 1910, was number seven among the twelve; in 1912, it was number ten among the twelve; in 1914, it was number nine among the twelve; in 1916, it was also number nine among the twelve; and in 1917, it was number twelve among the twelve. That shows a progress downhill, it seems to me, in the last few years. Of course, it is to be noticed that in Massachusetts we have our educational qualifications for voters, and that naturally diminishes the per cent of those who vote in Massachusetts; but it would not put Massachusetts more than one peg higher if all those voters were counted. That table absolutely proves that annual elections do not interest and educate the voters more than biennial elections. I do not believe you can get around that fact. There are the figures; and they prove the case.

The second great question which comes is this: Are annual elections or biennial elections more favorable to efficiency in the State government? In reference to that, it seems to me that there can be hardly any doubt. Biennial elections certainly do stand for efficiency. They stand for the efficiency of the executive,—the Governor, and all the State officers. Almost all the Governors of the Commonwealth have stated that to be the fact. No sooner is the Governor elected than he has to begin to think about how he is going to be re-elected; and we all know that by the first of July politics begin to get hot in this State and the Governor during the rest of the year is practically diverted to a large extent from his duties, striving to get his policies continued during a second term at least.

In reference to the Legislature, this also is true. Biennials will dignify the Legislature. A longer term always dignifies a legislative body. That is one reason why the Senate of the United States is more dignified than the House, because a Senator has six years, a member of the House only two. Moreover, any man who is elected to the Legislature in this State expects to run for re-election, to be a member for at least two terms; but if he tries that under our annual system it will cost him twice as much as under the biennial system, and the result is that able men without very large funds are kept out of the Legislature and do not appear in the councils of the State, to the State’s very great detriment. Moreover, it is with the legislator just as it is with the Governor. Just as soon as he receives the congratulations of his friends, he has to begin to think of that district of his and how he is going to gain a re-election; and the result is uncertainty, restlessness and the impossibility of attending to public business.

What a fine thing it would be to have biennial elections and men really attending to the public business for a year and six months and then giving six months to their own political business! What a great thing it would be! This restlessness and uncertainty which now run through this State House all the time would be half cut out. It seems to me that the spirit in this building is very accurately symbolized in the title of that popular song being sung in the trenches. The legislators hardly get into their place before they ask: "Where do we go from here?"

In the last place, biennials will give continuity of public policy by the executive, by all the elective officers, and by the Legislature itself. Of course, you may say: "Well, they are largely re-elected now and there is considerable continuity of policy." But that is not a complete answer. In those States that have biennial elections there is a continuity of public policy which we do not see in Massachusetts, because in those States there is a concentration of interest over a longer period.

Now an objection has been raised that fewer members of the Legislature are re-elected in biennial States than in Massachusetts. The gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) quoted from a paper against biennial elections, which he was kind enough to show me and which was sent to all the members of the Convention. I have investigated this paper and found its statements absolutely false. For instance, we are told in this paper that in 1890, Vermont, under biennial elections, returned no Senators and four Representatives. As a matter of fact, in 1890, Vermont re-elected 25 Senators and 34 Representatives. It said also that in 1916, Vermont re-elected no Senators, while as a matter of fact it re-elected 27 Senators out of 30.

The member from Ware made the statement also, getting it from this document on which he seems to have relied, that only three members of the Ohio Legislature ran for re-election, — perhaps it was the Ohio House; I do not remember, — and that only one of them was re-elected, and so they had a Legislature in Ohio with only one re-elected member. I could not believe that. I asked the State Librarian if he would telegraph the State Librarian in Columbus, Ohio, to find out what was happening this year in Ohio. The reply is that out of 36 Senators, 18 were re-elected, and out of 128 Representatives 57 were re-elected.

I want to call attention to the table on page 15 of bulletin No. 9. Here we have ten States. Reducing Massachusetts to a biennial basis, — that is the only fair way to do it and the only correct mathematical way to do it, — putting Massachusetts upon a biennial basis and taking the average for eleven years, 103 members were re-elected, which is ten more than one third. In this table of ten States, Illinois, Missouri and Pennsylvania, with biennial elections, exceed Massachusetts in re-elected members on the basis of biennials, and Illinois has a Senate quadrennially elected. Also Connecticut and Nebraska are just about the same as Massachusetts, and West Virginia and Ohio only a little less. I am sure that those figures prove the case that just as many legislators are re-elected in biennial States as in annual States.
The third question is whether biennials remove legislators and other State officers further from popular control. We do not wish to deny that the people have twice as many chances to recall their legislators under a system of annual elections. But it by no means follows that annually elected legislators are twice as sensitive to popular opinion. Men elected for two years and with another two-year term to hope for have more at stake in each election. Their whole term of two years will be under public review. It cannot be soberly contended that any outstanding failure of duty or any corrupt action would be forgotten by the public or by an alert opponent after the brief space of two years or less. The actual loss of sensitiveness to public opinion would be very small indeed, if anything, in actual practice.

Suppose we concede the general principle that frequency of elections is necessary to responsiveness to the popular will. The question immediately arises: What do you mean by "frequency"? If you take one year as a standard and say that a two-year term makes a legislator only half as democratic, would a semi-annual election make him twice as democratic and a quarterly election four times as democratic? Of course, this reduces the proposition to absurdity, and shows that all these merely mathematical considerations fail because other factors enter in to change the very essentials of the problem. The fact is the legislator in biennial States is just about as amenable to his constituents as in Massachusetts.

I cannot understand how the conservative opponents of biennials can be influenced by this argument. In the debate on the election of judges, they maintained that a judge, who never was to face a re-election by the people, was nevertheless sensitive to public opinion and in the end would be found in line with the spirit of the times. How can they then consistently take the position that a legislator, who must make an accounting to the people at the end of two years, will not be sufficiently under popular control? Are mere legislators so much inferior to judges? Will they forget in two years, with a judgment day to come, what a judge never will forget in a lifetime with no judgment day at the end?

Nor can I understand how the convinced liberals and radicals can oppose biennials. All the great liberal and radical States like Michigan, Minnesota, Washington and California have biennial elections and not the slightest symptom of any movement toward annuals. In the height of the Progressive excitement, when Progressive platforms demanded all sorts, varieties and shades of reform in the heavens above and in the earth beneath and in the waters that are under the earth, not a single friend of the people in those States happened to think that biennial elections were of the devil or were instruments of the interests. Indeed, our own Massachusetts Progressives in 1914 and 1915 demanded biennials, and surely they were for the people with a big P.

Still, certain of our labor leaders and certain less conspicuous but just as active private interests hold to annuals because by them they keep the Legislature absolutely under their thumb. Now I think that my representative should let me know before election how he stands on certain great issues, and should understand that by my vote I make him my agent to put these principles into law. Still, I trust him on other questions and even on the details of the issues on which he has pledged himself, to use his own independent judgment; in fact, I want a man and not a jumping-jack to represent me in the Legislature. All of you who have had assistants or responsible employees know that the way to get the best service is to allow a certain measure of liberty. If you watch your employee as a cat does a mouse, or keep him under your thumb from morning to night, you make him uneasy, suspicious and inwardly rebellious, and deprive yourself of the advantages of his initiative and ambition. In other words, too close a watch on him makes him the worse and not the better servant. I do not believe in keeping a Legislature in terrorem. A proper sensitiveness to public opinion legislators should have. They certainly should keep their pre-election pledges, but they should be treated with confidence and honor, and a true manly independence should be encouraged.

We must trust our American democracy. While I have no patience with the fulsome and bombastic praise of our Massachusetts institutions, I have even less patience with the pessimists of this Convention, who look upon the people as an ignorant mob, the Legislature as a set of scheming politicians, whom it is not safe to trust out of your sight, and the Governors as tyrants and demagogues. A Prussian publicist would find delicious pickings for a diatribe against democracy in the debates of this Convention. As for myself, one of my great ambitions in life is to see things exactly as they are, not too rosy or too dark, unless they are really rosy or really dark; then I want to see them that way.

After all is said and done, after all our dreadful mistakes and failures have been admitted and all our discouraging difficulties squarely faced, I believe in our American representative democracy with all my heart. Taking it all in all, it is the best form of government that men have yet discovered, and, all in all, it has produced the best results. And its greatest excellence, to my mind, is that it is founded on a hopeful view of human nature, on a belief in its inherent good sense and its real virtue, when nurtured in an atmosphere of education and religion. But this does not rest alone in theory. The events of this war prove the superior excellence of democracy. War indeed is foreign to the spirit of a republic. Democracy belongs to a stage of civilization which has outgrown it, and looks upon it as a strange and hateful thing. Yet, summoned all unprepared to meet a world crisis, America in one year has organized herself to meet the foe. The American army is only a cross-section of American life, truly representative of our country, the manifest product of our democracy. And that army is not only God's reply to our prayers; it is the vindication of our form of government. That army is our answer to all the sophistries of Kings and Kaisers. There never has been an army like it in all the history of the world. It is sane, chaste, temperate and brave. It holds the highest ideals. It fights for them with enthusiasm. It lays down its life gladly, not for increase of territory or for trade advantages, nor primarily in self-defence, but for great principles of right, humanity, democracy and liberty, which, please God, shall bless all the world as well as ourselves. And this army, hasty gathered, hastily trained, is battering to pieces the great military machine which autocracy has been fifty years in building, and it is doing it just because it is a democratic army inspired by the loftiest and most unselfish American ideals.

The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) says that he is voting for anything which will strengthen the Legislature. Let him then vote for biennials. The gentleman from Brookline in this division (Mr. Walker) protests against the pessimists of our Convention and wants to untie the hands of the Governor, and to abolish the restrictions on the Legislature. Let him also prove his faith by his works and vote for biennials. If we are really democrats, let us play the democratic game, not half-heartedly and distrustfully, but in a large way and with every possible sane confidence in each other.

Surely, biennials tend to efficiency and to continuity of policy, and will save the Commonwealth a million dollars every other year. Every State in the Union but Massachusetts thinks it safe to trust a legislative body for two short years. The opposite view has its root in a long vanished past nervously jealous of tyrants, and is antiquated, prejudiced, unworthy and picayune.

Mr. Clark of Brockton moved that the resolution (No. 126) be amended by inserting between lines 46 and 47 the following:

All elected State officers, Councillors and members of the General Court shall be subject to recall after one year of service under such regulations as the General Court shall make and provide.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: Whatever expression has been made in regard to the recall in this Convention has been made in connection with an independent proposition. The amendment I here propose is to amend the resolution regarding biennial elections by including a recall provision. I do this because I am well aware that there are a large number of voters in this Commonwealth who are absolutely opposed to biennial elections unless the recall is coupled with it. Hence, the amendment that I here offer and that has been read by the Secretary is very simple:

All elected State officers, Councillors and members of the General Court shall be subject to recall after one year of service under such regulations as the General Court shall make and provide.

I am not going to take the valuable time of this Convention to discuss this matter, or to discuss the general proposition that now is before us, for this reason: It is a clean-cut proposition, and I believe that every delegate sitting here now, — there are only a few of us, and I regret to see more empty seats than occupied ones, — but those who are here, I believe, have a clear and definite idea as to how they shall vote or purpose to vote on this matter. Hence, it would be an imposition for me to take up valuable time this morning when we are starting out, I believe, with the purpose of doing a good round week's work, in discussing a proposition that is so clean-cut in our minds and upon which I believe we all are ready to vote.

Mr. Chase of Lynn: Since the opening of this Convention in June, 1917, I have been in my seat at every session. I have listened to all the speeches of all the members of this Convention. The matter before us, — in fact, all the matters upon this calendar, — have been debated thoroughly in their previous stages. There are some members who take every occasion to speak upon almost every subject. In talking with the members of this Convention, I find there is a disposition to get through this work as expeditiously as possible. Now, if there are any new facts to be brought out on these subjects, I believe they can be brought to the attention of this Convention in a few brief, concise sentences which will sink deeper into our minds than the long speeches to which we have been accustomed to listen. In order to test the feeling of this Convention upon this subject, I move the previous question.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: I trust that the previous question will not be ordered on this matter. This is a far-reaching step, if adopted, and a radical change in the system of government of our Commonwealth. I do not believe that this Convention ought to pass on this question with snap judgment. I believe that it is a complicated question, it is a question of vital concern to the entire people of the Commonwealth, and I trust that the previous question will not be ordered and that we shall have a full and deliberate discussion of this important matter.

I do not feel that with a small attendance, such as there is here to-day, and with such a limited discussion as we have had on this matter, we ought to come to a vote and submit or reject a proposition of such great importance as this matter is.

The people of Massachusetts twenty-two years ago had an opportunity of passing on the question of biennial elections, and they overwhelmingly defeated that amendment by a plurality of over 50,000 votes, and since then at no time has such an amendment been passed by any Massachusetts Legislature. Bearing those facts in mind we ought to go very slow on this great question before we pass it along without mature discussion.

Let me call to your attention, gentlemen, the fact that on this question in 1896 there was a great discussion, and some of the ablest minds of that time vigorously opposed the adoption of the amendment, because, as they maintained, it was a matter in which were wrapped up the rights of the laboring men of the Commonwealth, the prosperity of the business men of the Commonwealth, the concern of the Legislature itself, and it was a radical and fundamental change that should not be brought about. Let me read to you from a paper that was published in Fitchburg at that time, the Fitchburg Sentinel, printed on April 18, 1896, an editorial against the adoption of this amendment. Some of the ablest minds and the keenest minds, men who were statesmen in that day, were in opposition to the biennial election amendment. Here is one of the paragraphs of that editorial, gentlemen:

One of the several documents issued by the Anti-Biennial League is issued over the names of George S. Boutwell, President, Henry L. Dawes, George Friebie Hoar, John D. Long, John E. Russell, George Fred Williams, George E. McNeil, Elihu B. Hayes and Gamaliel Bradford.

Those are some of the names that are to be respected in the annals of Massachusetts government, — names to be conjured with!

Mr. Dellinger of Wakefield moved that the resolution (No. 126) be amended by adding a new article of amendment, as follows:

The General Court shall assemble biennially on the first Wednesday of January succeeding its election, and shall proceed at that session to make all the elections, and do all other acts which are by the Constitution required to be made and done at the annual session which has heretofore met on the first Wednesday of January in each year. And the General Court shall be dissolved on the day next preceding the first Wednesday of January in the second year next succeeding its first assembling, without proclamation or other act of the Governor. But nothing herein contained shall prevent the General Court from assembling at such other times as it shall judge necessary, or when called together by the Governor.

Mr. Dellinger: Since this matter has been discussed fully at an earlier stage and the previous question has been moved I have nothing further to say.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: From the reading of the amendment I was not quite clear whether this was an amendment that gave biennial sessions of the Legislature.

The Presiding Officer: Yes, sir.

Mr. Luce: I rise to a point of order.

The Presiding Officer: The gentleman from Waltham will state his point of order.

Mr. Luce: That the resolution under consideration is a matter relating to biennial elections, and that the motion for biennial sessions is not germane.

The Presiding Officer: The Chair rules to the contrary, that the motion of the gentleman from Wakefield is germane to the resolution under consideration.

Mr. James H. Brennan: I should like to read further from the editorial of this newspaper, which was printed in 1896, before the rejection of this amendment by an overwhelming vote, in which it said:

The biennial amendment found its great strength in the corporations and in the corporation lobby at the State House. This was a striking effect of the progress of the contest in the Legislature. It is true that there was a powerful lobby of business men. The united movement of the mass of the people, as was shown by the vote, was against it.

Now, let me call to your attention the fact that in 1910, from returns of the State election, it is shown that only 58.4 per cent of the entire voting population registered their will at the polls, only one-half of the total. In 1916, a presidential year, only 57 per cent of the entire voting population registered their will at the polls. And yet you want to adopt a proposition that would bring about elections every two years instead of every year. You would not have 30 per cent of your population voting. You are going to submerge your State issues into National issues. You are going to submerge questions of State importance into Congressional and National issues. You are going to submerge all of the individual initiative of Massachusetts into National questions and National issues. Business men say to us that we should have biennial elections because they do not wish to be disturbed every year by elections, and some few selfish politicians who hold public office do not wish to be disturbed; but if you said to the business men: "You shall have biennial returns in your corporations, you shall have biennial accounting of your condition, you shall have biennial directors' meetings of your corporations," the business men would be the first ones to object and to say: "No, the year is the regular division of time. We must have an annual accounting of our business, or it will not be a success." We are here conducting the State's business. Our Legislatures are the board of directors for our Commonwealth, and they should make an annual return to the people of the Commonwealth.
Mr. Giddings of Great Barrington: In 1896, when this matter was submitted, my own county of Berkshire returned a substantial plurality in favor of biennial elections. I believe that still is the sentiment of the western part of the State. I think the last speaker has confused the question of deciding between rival, hostile candidates and a discussion of public questions. The people cannot have their minds too often on public questions, but they can have their minds too frequently on the claims of rival candidates. I believe that biennial elections will make for good in the public service, but that the annual sessions should be preserved.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The elements of this question can be discussed in a very few propositions and in a very few minutes. We are here to facilitate the public business. We are prone, perhaps, in our discussions to consider whether a proposition is likely to affect an existing governmental agency, whether it will strengthen the Legislature or diminish the power of the Governor, or vice versa, or enlarge the power of the judiciary. I submit that we are here in order so far as is in our power to suggest means by which the whole public business may be better done. We are here to represent the voters, the citizens, of Massachusetts. So far as the public business extends, it goes on from year to year. The Governor is in session every year, and all the year. The courts are in session a good part of every year; the legislative business recurs. It is perfectly true that in a considerable number of States in the Union the Legislatures meet only once in two years, and I think there are some in which they are bunched up and set on the shelf lest they should meet oftener than once in four years. At any rate, there are States that are not willing to have their Legislatures sit every year.

Whatever fault may be found with the Massachusetts Legislature, nobody can accuse it of inattention to public business. The trouble, as has been pointed out before this Convention, and as is still to be developed by certain amendments which will come before us, is that the Legislature legislates on too many matters that might well be left to other organizations; for instance, to executive or administrative bodies, to commissions and so on, instead of their doing the small-change work that ought to be left to other people. Nevertheless, the people of Massachusetts are interested in their Legislature. I should be sorry, therefore, to see, and could not vote to establish, for me to vote for, any system which would prevent the Legislature from meeting every year. The year has its seasons. Business has its twelve months. Most corporations, most railroads and banks and so on, have the same recurring cycle.

It is, however, an entirely different question when we come to the periods of election. All the assertions that public interests will be destroyed if people vote only once in two years are negativied by the experience of other States, and furthermore we must face the issue that there is going to be some kind of annual State election in Massachusetts every year, whatever the term of the members of the Legislature. That is not the issue. Under the initiative and referendum we must expect a constant outpouring of a few propositions every year. There will be constitutional amendments, and those amendments presumably will be voted upon in the fall of the year in which they are proposed by the Legislature or proposed by the initiative.

Mr. Creed of Boston: Do I understand the trend of the gentleman's argument to be, then, that if the biennial election resolution is submitted to the people and they mistakenly should adopt it, we still would have elections every year for the initiative and referendum amendments?

Mr. Hart: It seems on the face of it, although the initiative and referendum amendment does not from a casual investigation distinctly so provide, that an amendment must be submitted to the people in the year in which it is passed upon by the Legislature or when the action of the Legislature comes in by the initiative. That is a fair proposition. But it does not reach the question of the desirability of a term of two years for the members of the Legislature. There ought to be a four-year term for the Governor. There is no more reason why the Governor of Massachusetts should have a term of one year than why the President of the United States should have a term of one year or two years. Furthermore, there is no reason why the Legislature should not be just as efficient if it were elected for two years, with the added efficiency which comes from a sense of a larger opportunity. A man with a two-year term has more chance to do what is in him to do for his constituency and for the public, for he has more time in which to reach his stride. The fact that we are left alone in the family of forty-eight sister States in this matter is a conclusive proof that nearly all the people in the United States of America find it to their interest that the term of the members of their Legislature should be at least two years.

Mr. Murley of Boston: I wish to ask the gentleman from Cambridge who is now speaking if it is not true that in those States where the men are elected to the Legislature for two years, at the expiration of their terms they generally are defeated, with the result that every two years those States have green legislators; whereas in States like Massachusetts, where we have annual elections, it is a gradual change and we always have trained legislators who know how to do their work properly, as they always have done it in Massachusetts.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: I desire to add only a very few words to what I said in the original debate upon this question. This is a subject upon which argument is needed less than on most of the subjects that have been raised before this Convention. There are only one or two points that I should like to call once more to the attention of the Convention.

I have tried in dealing with this subject in my own mind to regard it as far as possible as absolutely apart from any other arrangements that have been laid before the Convention, utterly irrespective of the effect that it might have upon any resolutions which have been passed or are going to be passed. The issue before us, as I tried to say when I first spoke upon this question, is, it seems to me, simply this: By what means shall we best bring the people of this State to a fuller conception and a fuller carrying out of those duties in regard to elections which we all appreciate and about which we all agree? There is nothing that has been said on either side of this question in regard to those duties with which I do not agree. I do wish very deeply that every member of our voting body were sufficiently interested to give his attention and could give his attention year after year fully and thoroughly to the problems put before him by the various persons who are running for election, and by the various measures upon which he may have an opportunity to vote. I want to declare as emphatically as possible that I am at one with these gentlemen to whom I have referred in that desire, but I want to ask members of this Convention not simply to listen to arguments but to take counsel of their own experience and their own observation. Do we secure by our annual system that interest and that attention which we all think should be given and which we all desire?

The statistics offered by my friend in this division who spoke a few moments ago (Mr. Anderson of Newton) make it clear that under the annual system we do not secure that interest and that attention. The main, I might almost say the sole, reason why I am interested in this proposition is that I firmly believe that if we do not over-press our electorate, that if we give them the necessary amount of time and the necessary amount of freedom from the constant pressure of personal elections we shall have in every two years a fresher interest, a better attention and a better and more intelligent understanding of what they are doing, that we shall have a fuller and more intelligent opinion of our electorate upon the measures put before them, that we shall have more real interest in the men who are put before them for election, and that the profit to the State, the profit for development, the profit for expression of public opinion, will come to us if we do not call upon the public for an expression of opinion too frequently.

It is not a conclusive argument, perhaps, that Massachusetts is the only State that keeps annual elections, but one thing is perfectly sure. All the States of this Union, the most conservative and the most radical, in which the same status appears that appears in Massachusetts, the same varying and contending desires for control, the same desires for accomplishment in all these States, so different in their natures and conditions,—all of them have at least biennial elections, and nowhere from any side appears any drive for a change. There is no reason, therefore, to think that here in Massachusetts the change to biennial elections will have an ill effect upon the purposes of any party or any body of men. The question is solely of the effect upon our common purpose and desire of thoughtful and intelligent political action.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I see the issue differently from the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat. This government is not old compared with the age of other governments. Our fathers had before them the history of republics and one which had stood for 600 years. They knew why any governments had fallen; it was the misuse of power. If we have any traditions that we can cherish, whether we are in overalls or broadcloth, it is the wondrous judgment of our fathers in delegating and distributing power of the people so that the power should not be misused against the people. That is the fundamental condition we should deal with here. They balanced the delegated powers one with the other, and they said frequent recourse to the will of the people was the safety of the republic. Is that old? Is that to be forgotten? Agitation for biennial elections dates back in the eighties. Then the agitators were in the Republican party.
Benjamin F. Butler was elected Governor, and then the Republicans were thanking God that they did not have biennial elections. You may keep a good man two years under an annual election; you cannot get rid of a bad man in less than two years under a biennial election.

Do you say there is no interest in the elections? Why? Because there is no issue. It is not caused or cured by annual or biennial elections. Place the blame on your public men and party policies. For more than thirty years the two leading political parties have been trying to see how they may dodge issues. Political leaders have been trying to see how they may dodge issues. As a result, what is the difference between the Democratic and the Republican parties to-day? Come now, get up and define the issues which divide them. If you cannot do it, why do you suppose the people are going to be interested when the real question is whether Jack or John gets the office? Enunciate principles which the people favor or oppose and you will see very quickly they will vote at annual elections.

I wonder, Mr. Member in the third division (Mr. Anderson of Newton), why you did not have a word to say about what was said for the annual election in the Massachusetts Conventions that had the subject before them. The debate ran very strongly against delegating power for long periods.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: The gentleman is under a misapprehension. I was quoting from the United States Constitutional Convention of 1787.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: It seems to me that everybody who believes in the initiative and referendum ought to be in favor of annual elections, because frequent elections are for the best interest of the people. I believe that everybody who was opposed to the initiative and referendum, and gave as a reason therefor that the Legislature is close to the people, should be also in favor of annual elections. I contend that every delegate who opposed the initiative and referendum "because Massachusetts has the greatest body of legislators that the world ever produced" ought to stick to the same old system which has given us such a galaxy of stars. Perhaps some delegate can sympathize with the office-holder who believes that he ought to stay in office two years without going to the expense and inconvenience of speaking to his constituents every year; but I question if anybody has expressed sympathy for the poor old office-holder who has been elected for two years to a job about which he knew nothing, which he dislikes and from which he cannot escape. We have the finest illustration of that state of affairs right here in the Constitutional Convention, where more than three hundred men were elected to serve for an indefinite period, and about one-half of them have got sick of the job and left, coming only periodically to collect their salaries. Now, how is the poor fellow who is elected for two years going to give up his office without betraying the people who elected him? He cannot do so. He may be excused from attendance or from roll-call, or he may find some more important personal duties to perform, and still continue to collect his salary, leaving his people unrepresented. Is that fair to the man who is tired of public life? Is it fair to the people who elected him? It seems to me that that phase of the question ought to appeal to those who are interested in the citizenship of Massachusetts and in the welfare of the State.

In this last vote, which was somewhat close, many voted "No," thinking that they were voting against biennial elections. The proposition presented to them was: Shall the resolution be rejected? and many who learned by inquiry that the subject under discussion was biennial elections voted "No." I cannot believe that it is the desire of the Democrats and other delegates close to the people, in this Convention, to take away any rights the people have at the present time. The government ought to grow closer to the people every day. The question is: Shall we take away from the people rights which they have now? Many men go year after year at every election to vote. They have the highest conception of the duty of an American citizen. I care not for the so-called "business man," too busy, too arrogant or too tired to vote, but I am fighting for the men in my district who, though they work long hours to support their families and educate their children, at great personal inconvenience and some hardship arise before daybreak in the coldest weather and wait patiently at the polls, that they may perform the highest duty of an American citizen.

The amendments moved by Mr. Gates of Westborough were adopted, by a vote of 88 to 53.

The amendment moved by Mr. Clark of Brockton was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Dellinger of Wakefield was rejected.

The resolution (No. 126), as amended, was ordered to a third reading Tuesday, August 6, by a call of the yea and nays, by a vote of 97 to 92.

It was read a third time Wednesday, August 14, in the following form, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 421):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

1. Section 1. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Councillors, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Attorney-General, Auditor, Senators and Representatives, shall be elected biennially. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor and Councillors shall hold their respective offices from the first Wednesday in January succeeding their election to and including the first Wednesday in January in the third year following their election and until their successors are chosen and qualified. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin with the first Wednesday in January succeeding their election and shall extend to the first Wednesday in January in the third year following their election and until their successors are chosen and qualified. The terms of the Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Attorney-General and Auditor, shall begin with the third Wednesday in January succeeding their election and shall extend to the third Wednesday in January in the third year following their election and until their successors are chosen and qualified.

2. Section 2. No person shall be eligible to election to the office of Treasurer and Receiver-General for more than three successive terms.
1. Section 3. The General Court shall assemble every two-year term on the first Wednesday in January.

1. Section 4. The first election to which this article shall apply shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in the year nineteen hundred and twenty, and thereafter elections for the choice of all the officers before-mentioned shall be held biennially on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: I merely want once more to call the attention of delegates in the Convention to the fact that they will have an opportunity under the next number on the calendar, if they desire to do so, and if they vote down No. 323, to vote in favor of giving a two-year term to the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. The gentleman from Hudson (Mr. Glazier) has moved an amendment, printed in the calendar, that the Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor and Attorney-General should be included in the two-year term proposition with the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. When the matter is reached, so far as I am able to do so, I shall accept that amendment, because it seems logical that the other State officers now elected by the people annually should be elected once in two years if the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor are to be so elected. I merely want to call attention to the issue between those who favor the comprehensive biennial proposition now before us, including biennials for members of the Legislature and for the State officers, and those who would vote in favor of biennials for State officers, but are unwilling to vote in favor of biennials including members of the Legislature. I find that there are some delegates to the Convention, at least, who sympathize with my own attitude. I feel obliged to vote against the pending resolution, No. 323 on the calendar, because I do not see my way to favor biennials for members of the Legislature. I desire to vote, however, in favor of biennials for State officers. If we should pass No. 323, and State officers should be included with members of the Legislature, I fear that it would endanger the proposal of separate biennials for executive officers before the people, which I believe might otherwise carry. I therefore feel constrained myself, and perhaps some other delegates share my attitude, to vote against the comprehensive proposition contained in No. 323, embracing both members of the Legislature and executive officers; but if that resolution is voted down I shall advocate and vote for resolution No. 253, with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Hudson (Mr. Glazier), which would secure biennials for all the officers now elected annually by the people.

Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston: It is not my intention to take up too much time of this Convention on these questions, on which I have spoken on the floor in opposition. I still am strong in believing that if the delegates to this Convention believe in biennial elections they will support the resolution that is now here; but I would rather see them kill the whole business, defeat the present proposal and defeat the rest of the proposals, and state that our annual elections, more especially at this time, be left to us, than to adopt this resolution.

Even with the absence of so many delegates in this Convention
I am a little bit surprised at the last vote upon a question so important as that of biennial elections. I think about 187 votes were cast, and there were 100-odd men absent, many of them men who you may say do not believe in biennial elections. It is true that in the district I came from I sent a circular out to the voters of the ward that I have the honor to represent, and told them that if I was elected I was opposed to biennial elections, and the people of that ward must have felt that way, because they elected me to come here as a delegate to this Convention.

There are tricks in this proposition, and you want to think them over seriously. I believe that if you adopt the amendment for biennials you will force the labor organizations in this State to go on the public platform this fall in opposition to it. We might as well seek cooperation to support some other measure connected with our Constitution. I trust that the delegates to this Convention will defeat the resolution now before us. I do not hear anybody say that he believes in biennial elections and annual sessions; but if the proposition of biennial elections was presented to this Convention with a proposition for biennial sessions and the power of the Governor to call the members of the government together under a per diem, the people of this Commonwealth would have something to discuss. It is true, I believe, that the labor movement of this Commonwealth is strongly opposed to biennial elections, and I predict that in the labor convention three weeks from to-day they will form an organization throughout this Commonwealth to go before the people and bring about its defeat. One of the great clubs that they can use on the public platform is: If you want biennial elections why do you not favor biennial sessions and save a million dollars to the Commonwealth, not put out a little seed to make it grow stronger and later bring about biennial sessions in this Commonwealth?

Under the conditions in the country to-day, and with the feeling of the delegates to this Convention who are present, I am of the opinion that the question of biennial elections, with the committee's report by the gentleman in the second division, should meet defeat. I trust that the delegates to this Convention to-day will defeat biennial elections, and not only defeat it for State officers and members of the Legislature, but defeat it for State officers, and let us go along with the peaceful annual elections, which are nearest to the people, for the people and by the people.

Mr. Churchill of Amherst: I had not intended to take up the time of the Convention by speaking again upon this subject. A proposal has been made to us, however, this morning, with a distinct attempt to influence the votes of the Convention, which it seems to me ought to be met so far as it can be met. The delegate from Boston in the second division (Mr. Quincy) knows very well that I am in favor of a longer term for the Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor. I cannot take any attitude to the contrary in that. But it is also true that if we have a system of biennial elections simply in order to bring about biennial terms for certain men we lose a very considerable amount of what we should gain by having a thoroughgoing biennial election. We shall lose practically, if not quite, all the advantage of the saving to this Commonwealth of $1,000,000 a year. We shall have the same or nearly the same expense to the public in general, to the Commonwealth and to the towns, if not to the candidates, every year, and we shall be asking our electors to come to the polls, as now, every year, and we very clearly shall be diminishing the call of duty to those men. The proposition comes down to this: In the odd years they will have before them only the Senators and Representatives. Now, if I could believe that such a situation would conduce to a great deal more interest on the part of the people as regarded their Senators and Representatives, I should call that in itself an advance. I cannot believe, upon the record of our observation of what does take place, that if we remove from the people's interest every other year all our State officers we then shall be able to depend upon a sufficiently large turn-out at the primaries in the nomination of our Senators and Representatives.

We need to remember in considering this question that in at least 180 districts of this State the choice of Senator or Representative is made not at the time of election but at the time of the primaries; and a nomination, Republican or Democratic as the case may be, in 180 districts carries with it the practical certainty of election. And what do we have now under our annual system? We have at the best about one-third of our voters turning out to make these nominations. In these districts if a man had to make his choice it would be a great deal better for him to attend the primary and be absent from the election, because upon the election there is only a ratification of the choice which one-third of the voters, or less, have made. Now, to divide our situation in this way,—to have biennial elections for those officers with regard to whom the people do, and naturally, take the most interest, and to have in the off years simply primaries and elections for Senators and Representatives,—it seems to me will inevitably conduce to less attention to the very thing that I take it the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Quincy) is aiming at in his advocacy of annual elections for Senators and Representatives,—more scrutiny of their work, more review of it, a greater readiness to say after a year's term, if necessary, to the man who has not come up to the mark: "You shall go and a new man shall take your place."

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I am disposed to agree with the position taken by the gentleman from Boston in the second division (Mr. Quincy), but I disagree with him as to the way and manner the result should be brought about. The proposal is to kill the pending resolution, document No. 126 (Calendar No. 323), and then when we reach the following resolution (Calendar No. 253), to adopt the proposal of the gentleman from Hudson (Mr. Glazier). Where would that leave us? The proposal is that the administrative officers, including the Treasurer and Receiver-General, be given a two years' term. The Constitution now provides, in Chapter 2, Section 4, Article 1, that no man shall be eligible as Treasurer and Receiver-General more than five years successively. What may then happen? Should the Treasurer and Receiver-General be elected for a third term of two years, is he to retire automatically in the middle of that third term? I prefer the resolution as drawn by the committee and reported by the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill), if we can have an opportunity of voting on the two amendments separately. The first one takes into account the existing Constitution by providing that all provisions of the Constitution inconsistent with the amendment be annulled, and it provides further that a person shall be eligible as Treasurer and Receiver-General for three successive terms, and no more. This is, in effect, the same limitation that we now have. Therefore, if it be in order, I should like to move that the original resolution, comprising as it does two amendments capable of division, be divided. Such a request was made, as I understand, under Rule 43 on the preceding stage, and the ruling of the Chair was that it was not in order; but I take it a motion formally made at this stage would be in order. I therefore make it, so that those of us who desire to vote for a two-year term for administrative officials, and at the same time are reluctant to give members of the Legislature a longer term than they now have, may have an opportunity to record our preference.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: May I simply say, in the gentleman's time, that I have no objection at all to the general idea which he suggests; but I would suggest to him, in view of the present form of the resolution before us, which does not as easily permit of dividing the two propositions as the former amendment did, that the way to accomplish the object which he has in view,—which would seem to me entirely proper, although I did not want to make the motion myself,—would be to move as a substitute for the pending resolution a form of that resolution which strikes out all provisions except those relating to executive officers. The form, as the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) says, as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology, is better than the original form which we would reach in the next number in the calendar.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I am quite willing to accept the suggestion made by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Quincy), and I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

Mr. Robbins of Chelmsford: In consequence of the order which has been adopted I find myself more limited in time than I had expected.

By virtue of a municipal office which I have had the honor to hold for the last fifteen years, I have had occasion to observe at close range matters pertaining to elections. I have been placed also in a position to sound the sentiment of the several classes of the electorate concerning their attitude regarding biennial and annual elections, and I find a large portion favoring the more infrequent method.

The argument advanced that the voter would lose interest in public affairs after a lapse of two years I think is without foundation. On the contrary, I believe when the two-year period had elapsed there would be more interest taken in elections regarding both men and measures by the average voter.

Much of the evil which we seek to correct by the proposition which this Convention yesterday sent up for engrossment,—I refer to the matter dealing with compulsory voting,—I think would be eliminated by the biennial system of elections if it was adopted. Another matter, which the Convention rejected yesterday, would be taken care of, at least in part, if elections and sessions were held biennially.

I need not go over the ground already covered by other speakers concerning lack of attention to duty occasioned by constant campaigning by men already in office. Much time thus spent would be devoted to the business for which the officer was elected. The great expense to which this State is put by annual elections would be saved. There is no question as to that. Annual primaries are now as expensive and as disturbing as the regular elections. In fact, with the preliminary circulation of nomination papers and the classification of the voters as to political party, I think more time and expense is involved in the primary than in the election. This proposition would afford relief at least every other year, and I believe the people at large in the Commonwealth would welcome such a respite.
BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

Some talk has been made about automatic recall by annual elections. I tell you no man elected is going to persist in following a course contrary to the wishes of his constituents just because he is sure of two years in office. There are other ways to make life unpleasant for such an officer than by holding up the threat that he will be defeated for re-election at the end of a one-year term. Do not deceive yourselves into thinking that you are listening to the majority of the voters of the State when you hear some of those who profit by annual elections advocate the defeat of this measure.

Massachusetts stands alone at the present time in adhering to the annual custom of electing the Governor for a one-year term. It is no more or less than political obstinacy for the Commonwealth to persist in annual elections. No State that has adopted the plan of biennials has returned to annuals. Arguments showing action of western States upon different matters are not sound sometimes when applied to Massachusetts, on account of changed conditions caused by wide differences in location and character of population. But here we have the spectacle of Massachusetts surrounded by every other State in New England, and all of the others have broken away from the antiquated idea that to have efficient government we must stir up political affairs every twelve months by elections.

In the pamphlet that was sent out by the commission to compile information we are told that Maine voted in 1879 an amendment to the Constitution providing for biennial elections. New Hampshire in 1902 adopted the same method, Vermont in 1870, Rhode Island in 1911, Connecticut in 1884. Is not the fact that 45 States and Territories are holding biennial elections significant? Is it reasonable to suppose that Massachusetts is right and all the rest of the States are wrong?

What is the opening sentence in Article 8 of the Massachusetts Constitution? It is this:

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right to return their public officers to private life, etc.

Is there a delegate here who believes the danger of oppression by our public officers is so great that it is necessary to resort to frequent elections to safeguard ourselves? Knowing that a candidate who seeks office would be elected for a two-year term, would not the selection of that candidate be more careful, and would not the qualities of two or more candidates seeking election for the same office be more closely scrutinized by the voter? If this is so, would not the whole system of government be improved?

This Convention has been circularized to a certain extent by opponents of this proposition. Let us see what they argue.
In the first place, I agree with what is said here regarding health and strength to the State as a whole, justice to the highest possible degree for all classes and all persons, the highest opportunity for State development on progressive lines. These must be the standards by which to judge the relative value of annual and biennial elections.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: I sincerely trust that both the proposal for biennial elections of the Legislature and biennial elections of State officers will be defeated by this Convention, because there is no public demand except from a few selfish individuals in this Commonwealth for this drastic change. Annual elections have been as much of a Massachusetts institution as has been that honored title that we refused to strike out of our Constitution,—"the Great and General Court."

We must not sacrifice the fundamental principles of our government for so-called efficiency. We have seen an example of efficiency in the present world war where the human element has been eliminated by German militarism and the machine-made individual has been substituted. We are fighting that menace now. We are here not as a business corporation but as representatives of the people, and we are elected to give them a proper representation and conduct of the affairs of the Commonwealth. The people of Massachusetts for over a century and a quarter have held annual elections, and there is no reason at this time why that great principle should be abolished. It amuses me to hear some of the delegates who opposed the election of judges, and who said that the fact other States elected their judges or appointed them for a limited term was no reason why Massachusetts should adopt that system, and yet the same members stand on the floor of this Convention and say we should adopt biennials because we are the only State in the Union that holds an annual election for public officers. In this State was born the town-meeting system, an annual meeting of the people of the towns of the Commonwealth, and in fact throughout New England, to have an accounting of their elected officers and returns from their public officials. If you abolish annual elections you are repudiating a system which has proven to be valuable to the American people in determining their affairs,—the annual town-meeting. We hear so much of business men demanding this change. What business man do you know of who would consent to a biennial election of the directors of his corporation, who would submit to a biennial return of the financial condition of his corporation or who would agree to an official holding office for two years without rendering an account to the principals whom he represented? Yet those are the only persons who want this great change in State affairs,—the selfish business men and the selfish politicians.

Let me read to you what Senator George Frisbie Hoar said in a great argument in 1896 against a similar proposed amendment:

I have little respect for that temper of mind which feels the constantly returning duties of self-government as a burden. Certainly no man of business, no patriot, no lover of liberty can turn from a survey of the history of any other country in any other quarter of the globe to that of Massachusetts and grudge any contribution of labor or money he has ever made or ever can make in her behalf. None of us in this generation except the veteran of the war can truly say, "For a great price obtained I this freedom." [From Biennial Elections documents on file in the State Library.]
These are the words of a former great statesman of our Commonwealth, who had no sympathy for and who had no respect whatsoever for those citizens who felt that annual elections were a burden upon the people of the Commonwealth.

We talk about our fight for democracy, my friends. Let us be consistent. Let us not remove from the hands of the people an annual check on their elected public servants, and let us retain an institution that is as sacred to the people of Massachusetts as Plymouth Rock and as revered as the Sacred Cod that hangs over this chamber, — typifying the wisdom, the sincerity and the far-sightedness of our ancestors in providing annual elections.

Mr. Ross of New Bedford: I trust that this measure and the next one will be defeated. It seems to me that Massachusetts has the best laws of any State in the Union. It seems to me I have heard men connected with the labor movement boast of the legislation in the interests of the people in Massachusetts. It seems to me I have heard men who were not so active on that side but active on the employers' side boast that Massachusetts had the best laws. I am not going to take issue with that statement, but I want to say this: If it be true, it is because Massachusetts has annual elections and annual sessions.

I am not fooled with the statement that biennial elections do not mean biennial sessions. In the past I have heard them coupled almost always; that is, I have heard biennial sessions of the Legislature coupled with biennial elections, and I think that is the custom in States that have biennial elections. And so I am going to speak to that point, because I believe that that is the ultimate result of biennial elections.

I want to say that the great check on the purity of the Legislature, the personnel and the legislation, is due to the fact that they are accountable to the people annually and not biennially. In my experience I have seen legislation which has taken years and years to pass. I am not going to quote to you figures, — there is not time, — of the difference between biennial elections in other States and annual elections, except to say this, that the figures show that in about every case, — I think in every case, — under biennial elections many more men are elected to the Legislature who have had previous service than in States under the system of annual elections. I have seen legislation which under our annual system required ten or twelve years to pass. Let me refer you to the over-time bill, a bill which I doubt if many men in this Convention would vote against to-day, — a bill to prevent women and children from being employed in industries until late at night and then having to return to their homes at ten, eleven or twelve o'clock at night after having worked all day and part of the night. In later years a law was passed to limit the time of night employment to ten hours. But even that required too long hours for the women and children to be employed in our large industries under the conditions under which they labored. And yet, under annual elections and annual sessions it required twelve or more years to secure through the Legislature amelioration of that condition and the passage of the law prohibiting night-time employment. I believe that under biennial elections and consequent biennial sessions of the Legislature it would require twice as long plus the lack of interest created by biennial elections as compared with annual elections.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: This is the same question, almost, — it appeals to the people the same, — as the one that we passed along yesterday. This is one on which they know how they want to vote. And when the young gentleman in the third division (Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston) says there is no popular demand for this, I wonder what has been the scope of his circuit. Has he been out of his own ward? There is a popular demand for this from one end of the State to the other, and I am surprised at his statement after all the effort and study he has put into that speech of his, which was eloquent, but it was not based on facts. We want the plain unvarnished facts. We want to go to the people with them.

Now, as far as the proposition of the gentleman who sits in front of me, the ex-mayor (Mr. Quincy of Boston) killing this amendment and adopting the other to provide for biennial elections of State officers and annual elections of the Legislature, why, the only proposition we want is to give the people some relief. He does not seek any relief for the people at all. In the matter of efficiency, does not training produce efficiency? If men come here and serve two years are they not better men for the district? Does not the State derive more benefit from them than it does if they are changed every year? There is no argument against that. We hear a great deal said about military training, — a good thing; but what cuts us right here in this Convention is when some of the men from the metropolitan district, from Boston, stand up here and tell us we are unpatriotic, — unpatriotic if we advocate biennial elections. The trouble with them is, they are going to lose political training. That is what they want and that is what this annual session means, — political training.

The gentleman in the first division (Mr. Dennis D. Driscoll), for whom I have the greatest respect, says the labor organizations which he represents want annual elections. Well, you would think that settled it, and I do not know but what it will if you do not wake up. Now, the organization of labor that I represent is a voluntary organization and we are three to one of his. His is artificial, for the reason that you do not know where to find them. Go down to Brockton to-day. But ours is a voluntary organization. Out of 125,000 members of organized labor in this State how many do you suppose we have? More than 50,000.

Now, I take it among you lawyers and almost everybody who works, — I never have had a great deal of brain work to do, but I always have worked physically, and I have worked physically as hard as that man, and I say it for a fact, and it is the truth, that there is a sordid motive underneath this. These men who come here and call us unpatriotic are the mouthpieces of labor because they are hired. My good friend in this division (Mr. Ross) who has been here twenty years served in the Legislature because organized labor said he could come. Of course he has got to do this thing. But now here is another proposition. Every man who belongs to any organization in this State, whether it is a secret organization, a church organization, a Legislature or a Constitutional Convention, knows that there are a few men who do the work. The gentleman who sits in the third division is one of the few. And when they gather in rooms, instead of nine or ten there should be four or five hundred. They pass resolutions and try to say it is the voice of organized labor. That is absolutely wrong. There are men who are opposed to this who hold the district in their hand, working hard, friends of mine, frightened of this. They are trying to tell the voters of this Convention and the people of this State that it is for biennial sessions. It is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I desire to offer a substitute for the pending amendment as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology, the effect of which will be to strike out all reference to Senators and Representatives,—in other words, members of the Legislature and also Councilors,—and limit its scope merely to a provision for a two-year term for executive officers, namely, the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Attorney-General and Auditor. I ask that the substitute as offered be read for the information of the Convention. It presents a clear-cut issue and as to form, at least, it is an amendment of the committee on Form and Phraseology. It has had the benefit of their revision.

Mr. Glazier of Hudson: I move the previous question. [Applause.]

Mr. Newton of Everett: I am opposed to biennials for two reasons. I am glad the previous question is ordered, because if I once got started to talking I am afraid I would take more time than I ought. The first reason is this: I believe that the oftener an individual is obliged to return to his constituents to account for his work the better both for the individual and for the constituents; and, second, because I believe the educational effect of annual elections far outweighs any objections to the necessity of the people going to the polls too often. We have a community here in Massachusetts that needs the education and discussion that come from annual elections. Therefore, as one of the members of the committee on Suffrage, the majority of whom reported against this resolution, I hope that we shall vote down biennials and keep our old system of having the individual return to his constituents and of educating the public upon these subjects upon which they need education. [Applause.]

Mr. Gates of Westborough: Several amendments have been offered to the resolution which I believe are not friendly amendments, because we want biennial elections, but we do not want biennial sessions. The resolution in regard to electing the Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor for two years was the resolution that I introduced in the committee on the Executive, because it was the only resolution that naturally would come before that committee,—which I believe is much better than not to adopt any amendment. But the main and important resolution is biennial elections, and we have not heard one argument that really is sound against biennial elections. No one here has said that we get better officers from annual elections than we would if the elections were less frequent. If we do, why do we not elect our Congressmen every year? Is a Congressman less important than a State officer? Why do we not elect our President for a shorter term? Why do we elect our Senators for six years, which is more important than any State officer? Knowing that we elect our most important officers for a longer term, it is important to know that we can trust the men whom we elect; and I believe that we would get more efficient officers in the Governor's chair. It has been said when some persons have been candidates for Governor that it was not important that we exert ourselves in an off year to elect a Governor, because if he did not prove satisfactory he was in for only one year. Now, we would be more careful and would get more satisfactory Governors if we elected less frequently.
BIENNIAL ELECTIONS.

143

They say the only argument which has been brought up here at all is to keep the government near the people. Now, do we keep the government near the people when we have annual elections and the people do not cast their vote? In 1916, when we had a Presidential election, there were 537,000 voters who went and voted. Last year there were only 387,000, — nearly 200,000 who did not cast their vote. It is proved by other States which have biennial elections that they get a larger per cent on biennial elections than we do on our annual elections, and the per cent of the average of the States is 17 per cent more than we get, and there are States that cast 33 per cent more than we do.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: One of the favorite methods of obstructionists from the days of Saint Paul, when his raging antagonists threw dust in the air, has been to follow their example. This morning I think that these tactics have been resorted to again. It has been stated here that Massachusetts has the best code of law of any State in the Union. I am perfectly willing to accept that premise as fact, although I do not know whether it is true. But to the dust throwing: The theory is advanced that the preëminence of our laws in this Commonwealth is the result of annual elections.

Now, I accept the premise that we have the best code of law in this Union, but I reject the reason offered. The reason that we have the best code is that we have had the best legislators. The reason that we have had the best legislators is because we have had the best public opinion. The reason that we have had the best public opinion is because we have had the best methods of education.

I think we ought to face this matter as it is and disabuse our minds of anything that confuses us upon this issue. I have had something to do for a number of years, in each community where it has been my privilege to live, in arousing the voters from their apathy, in trying to get the voters to the polls; and again and again it has been said to me, until I have come into this Convention with a deep conviction on this matter: "We have too many elections; let us alone for a while. We shall improve our legislators, and we shall improve legislation, if we reduce the number of elections." And I am in favor, gentlemen, of this measure as it stands.

Mr. Linke of West Springfield: I have but a few words to say. I have the honor to represent, with my colleague from West Springfield, what is known as the "Shoe-string District," comprising 14 towns in western Massachusetts, stretching from the northeastern corner of the county along the Connecticut State line and into the Berkshire Hills. Many diversified trades and industries are in this district. Starting from the small farmer who ekes out an existence in the rocks of the foot-hills of Berkshire to the skilled engineer on the railroad who gets a good weekly stipend, I have yet failed to find a man in western Massachusetts, especially in my own district, who is not in favor of biennial elections. I am strongly in favor of biennial elections, and at the present time opposed to biennial sessions. Do not lose sight of the main proposition,—biennial elections. How are the people going to vote on this proposition? I for one certainly do trust the people. I feel that the voters in my district will vote for this proposition. The railroad man,—how can he get to the polls? We have to go down to the roundhouse or down to the yard to get him off his engine. Many of them are on the road in Boston or in Albany the day we vote; they cannot get to the polls. The farmer,—how does he get to the polls? He is busy in farming, getting in his harvest, looking after his stock, and so forth. It is a very difficult job to get the farmers to the polls. Many of them live miles from the polls, a great many miles. I am strongly in favor of any legislation or constitutional law which favors the laboring man; but when organized labor opposes legislation which relieves a burden from the shoulders of the ordinary working-man, the man of intelligence, the backbone of this country, I certainly shall oppose organized labor.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) will be rejected by the Convention. The gentleman desires simply to have the executive officers of the Commonwealth elected biennially, according to his amendment. Now, sir, what will be the result? It is going to result every other year, the off-year, in a lack of interest. The friends of some good fellow who has a pull in the community are going to get out and, by a light vote, elect him to the Legislature, the most important branch of our government. On the even years, or the years in which the Governor is elected and a great interest is taken, a heavy vote will be cast and it will not be so easy for the light-weight.

Now, sir, I voted against biennial elections; but if there is an effort to confuse the issue, if there is a combination to defeat this proposition, I am going to change my vote and vote for biennial elections for all officers. [Applause.]

I trust if we are to have biennial elections we shall have biennial elections for all officers and not establish a favored class, a clique, but that all will be placed upon a level footing and that we may have the kind of elections the people want, if we refer this to them,—either biennial or annual.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: If there has been any one matter which has come before the Convention regarding the interest of all the people, it has been the Workmen’s Compensation Act. For years the workmen, whether organized or not, came to the Legislature asking for some such legislation. Certain steps have been taken, every year they are being improved, and I say now that that great act, while it is not doing the work which it ought to do, is doing the work which it is doing because several changes have been made which met the conditions which arose. Two years hence would have been too long; it would not have given the people what they needed. And when people rise in this Convention and say that a man who for twenty years has faithfully represented his constituency in the Legislature and at whom not the finger of scorn can be pointed is but the voice of others, I rise in protest. I say that labor men, whether they be organized or not, do not contain all the virtue there is in this Commonwealth; but if there is any organization in Massachusetts to-day which has labored in season and out of season, not only for its own benefit, but for the benefit of every man, woman and child who ever will live in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, it is that of organized labor. And while we have made mistakes, let me tell you that our heart is with the people; and when men belonging to that movement come here and say that they believe and that they know that the men behind them believe in annual sessions, we are not the mere mouthpieces of certain organizations, but we are giving expression to our thought and our belief as free American citizens who have the interest of the entire Commonwealth at heart.

Mr. Montague of Boston: If there is any question coming before the Convention at its entire session which seems to me to be peculiarly one to be submitted to the people, this is the question. If we could submit it to the people without passing any vote here, I should be entirely satisfied with submitting it to the people and let them say, because of all the questions, the question whether they desire their officers elected once every year or once every two years is comparatively simple and easy for them to pass upon. But in order to get it before the people we must pass on it one way or the other.

While I was a member of the Legislature here I voted every time I had a chance for annual elections. But, Mr. President, I have come to the conclusion that the people, — or at least so far as I am in touch with the people, — have come to prefer biennial elections.

I should not be in favor of biennial sessions of the Legislature. I believe in the Legislature meeting every year, and that is what this resolution calls for. They meet every year but are elected once in two years. And I have come to believe that the people of the State would welcome that change. As some of you know, I have been somewhat actively interested in politics in at least one portion of this city. I know what it is to get out the vote, to dig right down underneath and get out our vote. When we do go around digging out our vote they do not ask us: "Where have you been so long?" but "Why do you come so soon?"

I believe this indicates that our people would be glad if they had the opportunity to vote once in two years instead of every year.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Middleborough. I hope the Convention will not pass that amendment. It does not give us biennial elections. It gives us annual elections, at one of which only members of the Legislature are to be elected. It is hard enough in the off years now to get the voters out to vote for State officers and members of the Legislature, and I am sure that the election in the off year, at which only members of the Legislature would be elected, would be almost a farce. I trust that we shall not pass this amendment, but that we shall pass the amendment given us by the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I came to this problem with a fairly open mind. I have followed the debates closely, and I am impressed more and more in favor of biennial elections of the executive, but I have been impressed with the failure of those arguments, with one exception, as applying to the elections of the House of Representatives and the Senate. I think the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill) has brought forward the only real objection that there is to that. I appeal from that theoretical objection to the actual experience in New York. New York has tried this system, and so far as I can learn it has not worked out in the distressing way that the gentleman believes it would work out here. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Washburn).

I think the best way would have been to send these two propositions separately to the voters. Apparently it is now impossible to do that. If, however, we adopt the amendment offered by Mr. Washburn, it may be possible later to adopt the other as a separate proposition, thereby giving the voters a chance to adopt one or the other or neither or both, which, I think, is the right they ought to have, in order to avoid practically disfranchising part of them; because if that is not done the voters of the Commonwealth will either have to vote for both propositions or they will have to vote for neither, and those who believe in one and not in the other will be practically disfranchised. I trust, therefore, the amendment offered by Mr. Washburn will prevail.

Mr. Murley of Boston: The gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Montague) made the argument that we should pass this resolution, not because we believed in it, but to give the people of the State the chance to vote for it. To my mind that is a ridiculous argument. To follow it out to a logical conclusion, we should not have debated the questions that have arisen here; we should have submitted every question directly to the people.

A short time ago I heard the eloquent gentleman from Waltham in the first division (Mr. Luce) make a brilliant and eloquent speech in this Convention, and he called upon the delegates in this Convention to rally to the defence of the people. Incidentally at that time he made a speech in favor of the initiative and referendum; and to my mind, at least, it was the best speech for practical purposes ever made in this Convention for the initiative and referendum. He said that because of a certain act of ours the people of this State felt aggrieved and that they were looking for succor, they were looking for help,—to what? Why, to the initiative and referendum. I hope when that gentleman goes to Congress,—and I sincerely hope that he will go if he is a follower of our great President Woodrow Wilson [applause],—I hope if he goes to Congress he will advocate the rights of the people.

Now, in regard to this specific question. A short time ago I read a statement in a pamphlet issued to the members of this Convention, and it was the best argument that I ever read in favor of annual elections, and it was made, not by a member of my party, but by the great Tom Reed of Maine. I say to the people of this State, to those men who say we are behind the times, that we are the only State having annual elections. Just look back a few weeks. What have you heard in this Convention? You heard men here arguing in regard to the merits of our judicial system, and they said that while Massachusetts was the only State that believed in the appointment of judges for life, yet it was the best judicial system in the country; and I agreed with them and voted with them. And I say to you in regard to this question that the system of annual elections is the best system; it is best for the people because it keeps their public servants close to the people. Annual checks are kept upon their actions in the Legislature, and that is best for all concerned. It keeps an active interest in the great questions of the day. And furthermore, under the system of biennial elections in those States that have biennial elections, what happens? At the end of two years, when the men are seeking reelection, nearly all are defeated and you have one green Legislature after another. Now, in Massachusetts it is a gradual change. About one-half of the members are returned annually. You always, under the Massachusetts system, have an experienced Legislature. Furthermore, you never hear of any great demand on the part of the people for the recall. So to-day I call upon the delegates to this Convention to rally in defence of the people and vote this resolution down and continue our system of annual elections. [Applause.]

Mr. Robbins of Chelmsford: I want to say just one word in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) in this division. In 1917 the State expended for elections $53,798.90; and this, you understand, is in addition to the great expense now borne by the cities and towns in elections. The State bill for the preparation of ballots alone was over $33,000. And if the amendment of the gentleman from Middleborough is adopted this expense would be exactly the same for the preparation of ballots no matter how many names were on the ballot. It is as great when there are few names as when there are many.

In connection with the matter of expense, let me state that the item of expenses should not be considered if there is adequate return for the money spent; but in this matter, the yearly holding of elections, I believe the return is so small that the money is virtually wasted. Massachusetts continues to spend money like a drunken sailor while her neighbors save and smile. If through the action of this Convention this proposition is recommended to and passed by the people, and Massachusetts falls in line with the other States of the Union, that one act alone justifies the existence of this Convention.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I have but a word to say. The pending resolution is a straight resolution for biennial elections, for which the Convention has already declared, but, as I hardly need remind its friends, by a narrow margin. Now, there is some reason to apprehend that in the confusion occasioned by the introduction of the amendment offered by my friend from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) the Convention may go astray and the resolution may be lost. Accordingly, whatever might be said in favor of that amendment on its merits if it could have appeared at a more fortunate time, I trust that the Convention will now take the short and direct road to what I believe to be the desire of a majority by rejecting the amendment and passing the resolution to be engrossed,—a course which has the additional advantage of disposing also of the next number upon the calendar.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I want to call the attention of this Convention to the fact that we have over 130,000 boys in military service. By next fall's election we shall have over 150,000 boys in military service, and we are going to take away one-half their political rights in their absence if we pass upon this amendment. Now, our duty to the boys who are fighting for their country is that we should safeguard rather than take away their political rights.

The amendment moved by Mr. Washburn of Middleborough was rejected.

The resolution (No. 421) was passed to be engrossed Wednesday, August 14, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 116 to 108.

On the following day Mr. Sawyer of Ware moved that the Convention reconsider the vote by which it had passed the resolution to be engrossed.

Mr. Sawyer: As this Convention knows, the committee on Suffrage unanimously voted against this resolution, and it was intrusted to me, as one of the committee, to report, and therefore members of the committee and those who favor the present system have felt that it was right that I should make this motion to reconsider. I know that there are some who feel that they will vote against reconsideration on general principles, but let me remind them that we are now so near the end of our business here that such objection no longer need prevail. Also let me remind them that on page 3 of to-day's calendar, item No. 334, there is a matter that was reconsidered after a larger adverse vote than we had on this, so we have precedent for reconsideration.

I do not know that any charge of unfairness ever will be raised against this Convention in considering the matter of biennial elections vs. annual elections, or unwillingness on their part to thoroughly consider it, but I think this Convention ought to be jealous of its reputation, that it leave no opening for any such charge to be raised. I want to remind this Convention that it has given thus far very scant time to the consideration of this very important matter, a matter that is uppermost in the minds of many people. The previous question was moved on all three readings of this matter, and on two of the three readings moved after a very brief discussion. It will be easy, if we refuse reconsideration, for those who favor annual elections to go before the people and to state that this Convention was unwilling to adequately consider and deal with this great matter.

On the general question I want to say just this: That one of the arguments that influenced your committee in reporting adversely on this change from annual to biennial elections was the argument that it would result in a green Legislature for each session, or each term. When I stated the figures at a previous reading to show that, they were questioned later. Since then I have fortified myself with the rosters of several States, all of which bear out the figures that I made in my first declaration. The Vermont Legislature, by the roster of 1917, shows of 30 Senators previously elected none reëlected, and of 245 Representatives only 15 reëlected. The Clerk's manual for New York, where they have annual elections, against that shows 108 reëlections out of 150. In North Dakota there were 10 reëlections out of 49 Senators, and taking all the figures together there were only 38 reëlections in both Houses. And so the rosters of these several States show that it is the custom in these States that have abolished annual elections not to reëlect their men, and to have green Legislatures at each term of service.

Now, we are in time of war. The world changes over night, and it is no time to put a longer space between our elections. Never would it be so unwise to do that as at present. When our soldiers are away we ought not to pass an act that will so seriously affect their political rights. In all justice to them we cannot, and when we are so concerned with these matters of the war we ought not to burden our people with a political campaign such as will be waged in this matter.

Again, to pass this resolution means, if it is adopted by the people, that we will have no election on State issues save at those elections where National issues will overshadow them, especially in the next few years. I trust the Convention will reconsider.

Mr. CHURCHILL of Amherst: I always am willing to accept the result of a fair vote of this Convention. Sometimes I have been very much disappointed by what I have considered to be a fair vote of this Convention. All of us are anxious, or should be anxious, to have the real sentiment of this Convention made plain to the people, and to have questions submitted to the people in such manner that they may understand fully what was the attitude of the Convention.

Now, what is the case with regard to the controversy and the vote upon this very important matter? We have had three test votes, and in each case a majority for the proposition, but a narrow majority. That majority has increased slightly, only very slightly, as time has gone on, but the majority has been held, and it has been held in an increasing vote of the Convention. The vote which was taken yesterday was one of the very largest votes, I think I am right in saying the largest vote, that has been taken upon a roll-call for some weeks. Two hundred and twenty-five men voted, and in that large vote the majority, narrow still, was slightly increased.

What is the reason that we should reconsider that particular vote? If I had reason to believe that actually a majority of this Convention were opposed to this measure, if I had reason to believe that a fair vote had not been taken, if I had reason to believe that the possibility for a larger vote still of this Convention were not before us, however much I might be disappointed at the result of the vote on reconsideration, I should be in favor of it; but that is not the case. We have another stage upon this amendment, the question of submitting it to the people. It is known that that is to be before us, everybody who is interested in this question may be heard, and upon that we may have a fair vote, and for one I shall be willing to accept the result of it, whatever it may be. But what we have proposed to us this morning is, after a vote so large as we had yesterday, with efforts on both sides to bring in men in order that we might have a full opinion, we are asked without warning, in a smaller Convention, with fewer men here, to vote for reconsideration. In other words, we are asked to submit this vote to a test which, I submit to the Convention, will not be so fair as the test that we had yesterday.

Whatever our opinion upon this subject may be, we ought to remember at the same time two things: One is that we now are left with this proposition alone. If we wish to give our Governor and Lieutenant-Governor and other State officers longer terms, if this is defeated that proposition now is defeated also. Consequently I think we ought to be willing, all of us, to admit that if there is any question upon which it is reasonable to expect the real opinion of the people it is this question; and I deem it a fair, and it ought to be a persuasive, argument, to some men who are in doubt about the wisdom of this proposition, to suggest to them that if they are in doubt after such a vote as we have had three times, including the vote yesterday, they may reasonably feel that now at least it is fair for them to allow this measure to go on to its final vote and to be submitted to the judgment of the people.

As I recall the arguments that were offered last year in this room, I want to repeat one of them. Is there any question, gentlemen, upon which it is fairer to take the opinion of the people, more reasonable to take the opinion of the people, than upon this question? The issue is clear. Men have thought about it for years. In my opinion they are very much interested in the matter. Is there any question which we, if we have any doubt whatever as to its wisdom or unwisdom, ought to be more prepared to submit to the opinion of the people for their decision? I trust that this Convention will not reconsider this vote; but will take a final vote upon submission under the best possible circumstances.

Mr. Gates of Westborough: I will take up just one or two minutes. All I ask for is a fair deal and fair play. This subject has been debated in this hall four days, or parts of four days. We had an expression of 225 members yesterday, and those in favor of biennials succeeded in obtaining a majority. I do not think it is fair play for those who were beaten after a debate of this question for four days to allow a small Convention to decide on this matter. The reason I believe it is not fair play is that the country members believe in biennials, but that the city members as a whole believe in annual elections, and it is not a fair expression of opinion to spring this on the Convention without giving fair notice to those who come from a distance. I ask those who voted against biennials yesterday to give us a square deal. The leader in this Convention, one of the leaders in this Convention, in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), said when he was beaten, he acknowledged being beaten and did not cry baby, and I hope there is no one in this chamber who will cry baby because he was beaten on a fair deal.

Mr. Ross of New Bedford: I have taken thus far very little time of the Convention, and I am going to take but little more. I want to say with regard to this matter that I would have been willing to have let matters go according to the vote, but I am not willing to play a game with a man and have him win always regardless of the results of the game. I believe that some of the delegates who have spoken this morning against reconsideration and asked that it be defeated because of the fact that a decisive vote has been taken, voted for reconsideration on some other matters. Within a week or two I remember a matter having been passed with a much larger vote, twice the majority this matter had, and having been reconsidered the next day, advantage being taken of the men who could not be here on the last day of the week, and the matter having been brought up again on reconsideration after having been killed the day before. Now, all I have to say on this matter is this: It is a very important matter. As to its reference to the people, I would be willing, again, to have all matters referred to the people; but I am not willing to have referred to the people matters that I believe in and have the matters my opponent believes in not referred to the people. Let us play the game fair if we are going to play the game. As to being beaten, I never am beaten, and if this matter is defeated to-day I am ready to take up the fight again next week. I do not admit that I am beaten, on this or any other matter. I have got to be beaten before I am beaten. I have got to be squelched to be got rid of. I trust that this matter will be reconsidered. It will take very little time, and I do not believe that this Convention will be lengthened a day, or half a day, or an hour, by the reconsideration of this matter.

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I will take but a minute of the time of the Convention, but there has been a great deal said about fair play. Do you not know there are some members of our Convention who will lay great stress on fair play and giving them a square deal? Now, that is what this proposition is, to give the people of this Commonwealth a square deal. We have got along so far, and the people wanted it, and if they agree to O. K. it, accept it, and if it comes back, it is all right, and if it does not that is all right. That is all. I have made this fight so that the people might be used right.

I want to just read a few lines of an article that was sent here by Raymond L. Bridgman. I am just going to read a line or two:

In a democracy the final reliance must be on the intelligence and patriotism of the mass of the voters. Few voters seem to realize the extent and the danger of the present popular ignorance and indifference to public affairs.

In God's name, where did that come from, annual elections or biennial elections? This man has had an experience of forty years on Beacon Hill, and now he tells you that future reliance must be not on the ignorance and indifference of the voters of this Commonwealth, all of which has been brought about and has grown up through annual elections. Is it not time that the people should have an opportunity to say? Well, now, this whole pamphlet is built upon the same proposition. A man can take a text of any six lines in it and talk for days and days in reply to the argument that has been put up in opposition to allowing the people, -- not to have biennial elections; I do not know that we will have them, -- but to allowing the people to say whether or not they want biennial elections.

I hope that this matter will not be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was negatived, by a vote of 24 to 100.

The Convention voted, Tuesday, August 20, by a vote of 132 to 104, taken by a call of the yeas and nays, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 142,868 to 108,588.
Mr. J. Warren Bailey of Somerville presented the following resolution (No. 40):

Resolved, That it is expedient to alter the Constitution of the Commonwealth by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall assemble biennially on the first Wednesday of January succeeding its election, and shall proceed at that session to make all the elections, and do all the other acts which are by the Constitution required to be made and done at the annual session which has heretofore met on the first Wednesday of January in each year. And the General Court shall be dissolved on the day next preceding the first Wednesday of January in the second year next succeeding its first assembling, without proclamation or other act of the Governor. But nothing herein contained shall prevent the General Court from assembling at such other times as it shall judge necessary, or when called together by the Governor. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Councillors, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor, Attorney-General, Senators and Representatives shall hold their respective offices or places for two years next following the first Wednesday of January after their election, and until others are chosen and qualified in their stead. The meeting for the choice of Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Councillors, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor, Attorney-General, Senators and Representatives shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, biennially. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Councillors, Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor, Attorney-General, Senators and Representatives, who shall be chosen at the election at which this article shall be adopted, shall hold their respective offices or places for the term provided by the existing Constitution, and no longer; and thereafter the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Councillors; Secretary, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor, Attorney-General, Senators and Representatives shall be elected and hold their respective offices or places conformably to the provisions of this article. No persons shall be eligible as Treasurer and Receiver-General for more than three terms successively. All provisions of the existing Constitution, inconsistent with the provisions herein contained, are hereby annulled.

The committee on Suffrage reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Friday, July 12, 1918; and it was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: It is useless, of course, to argue this matter in view of the vote already passed, but I cannot refrain from the philosophy of extracting a little sunshine from a cucumber and feeling somewhat rejoiced in the vote just taken. There is one thing in my opinion that labor wants that it has not got, and that is a political issue so plain as this one. It is all very well here, I suppose, on some great matters like woman suffrage and prohibition, and certain other things, because some people did not want to go on record as they would like to have it. I know it is said here there was no politics in getting rid of it. Perhaps there was not. Those who think otherwise have a right to their opinion, and they have a right to the underground current that they have set running. But I am undertaking to say this: In the very nature and order of events, how is this going to turn out? How about the people who we are claiming are for the initiative and ref-
Then what next? Men running for office will be asked to go on record on this great matter. It will be a big political question. Some one says: “I am ready to send this thing down, though I am going to vote against it.” Why do you not do the same on all measures? You have not; therefore it is upon you to decide whether or not the liberties of the people are served better by annual elections than they are by biennial elections.

I am sorry that there was a roll-call. Every man, after he is put down in black and white, does not like to change his mind; but he might have had a different opinion with a different argument.

It is the system that should be considered. The biennial election will perpetuate the system of corruption. The gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) has pointed out how it works in other States. A man gets in just once, and if he has got a yellow streak in him he will make the most of it. It has been said if you had an election of judges that a judge could not attend to his business because he continually would be wondering how it was going to affect his election. But a judge is different from a legislator. A legislator should have his ear to the ground to determine what the people think. Is not that what he is elected for? Should he not listen to the voice of the people, or do you want to fix it so that he is under no necessity of listening to the people once he gets power? Annual elections too frequent! At a time when you are complaining that your whole structure is in a condition that it ought not to be! Too frequent,—at a time when the people have so many wrongs that there is not time enough to right them! The people, says the Constitution, have a right to a speedy redress of wrongs. They have got a right to try to redress them once a year. Now it is proposed that they shall wait two years before they shall have the chance to right them. The people are not asking for biennial elections.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: For the reasons which I gave to the Convention about forty-five minutes ago, I move the previous question on this matter.

Under this heading I may not be out of order if I give the Convention a little information which may be of interest. We have on our calendar of twelve pages thirty-nine matters, all of which probably will be debated. There are four matters that are analogous, and it consequently brings the number down to thirty-five. There are eleven working days for this Convention between now and the first of August. When the Convention reconvened this summer it was supposed we might get through by the first of August. But, sir, if you will remember, we have taken over four days discussing subjects for the benefit of some of our members who may be candidates for office this fall, and who wish to get their remarks in the record. We also discussed for one full day one matter which had just one vote in the Convention when it came to a vote.

Now, sir, some of these thirty-five matters will be debated, not only once but twice; and if we are going to carry out the policy of adjourning anywhere from five to twenty-five minutes early each day, simply because we have worked hard or because we have discharged a number of matters from the calendar, and carry out a policy of extending debate, we are going to be here somewhere into November, — at least up to election time. Now, I am not averse to that if the members of the Convention wish to take that attitude. My objection this morning to extending the remarks of the gentleman in this division (Mr. Sawyer) was not because I opposed the gentleman, for I voted with him, but because the practice has crept into the Convention of extending the time of every man who is interesting.

Now, that is not right. We are the only parliamentary body which requires a quorum for debating a question, and any man can delay the Convention anywhere from fifteen minutes to three-quarters of an hour by questioning the presence of a quorum. I trust the Convention from now on will work the full four days a week, that it will devote what time is necessary to the intelligent discussion of the question, and that without fear or favor, “with malice toward none and charity to all,” in the future I shall be “the goat” of the Convention and move the previous question whenever it seems that the Convention has all the information necessary.

Mr. Knotts of Somerville: This is a question of personal privilege. The delegate from Brockton (Mr. Brown) made a statement that I was a little surprised that he should make. If it was nothing more than a liquid flow of fluency heard by this Convention I would not rise; I would consider what he said in regard to this Convention having passed over the prohibition resolution and the woman suffrage resolution as one of those incidental and pestiferous things “like flies of latter spring that sing and sting, and lay their flimsy eggs and die.” But since the proceedings are to take permanent form, and perhaps somebody one day may read some of these remarks, I rise to make this statement.

Those questions over night became Federal issues. They shifted their base. There are men in this Convention who are bound together by cords of moral fiber and strength, and I am sure that none of these men, no one of these men, could be manipulated by political interests or by politicians, and they all would join together and say:

Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The resolution under consideration, in view of our recent action in the matter of annual elections, now has importance simply in the matter of the sessions of the General Court. I would remind the Convention that the committee on The General Court, if I remember right, was unanimously opposed to the change from annual to biennial sessions, and that we are supported in this matter by an equally unanimous view of the committee on Suffrage. Therefore two committees of this Convention, containing thirty members, after study of the question; have expressed their belief that this change ought not to be made. Believing therefore, sir, that this judgment is likely to prevail, I do not desire to take the time of the Convention in presenting the reasons why the committee on The General Court, at any rate, took this position; but if by any chance I have misread the temper of the Convention I certainly, on some later occasion, shall present the views of the committee in this regard.
Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: It probably is idle to take the time of the Convention in any attempt to seriously discuss this subject. Indeed, under the operation of the previous question that cannot be done; and it is a subject upon which there is such a curious and, to me, unaccountable difference of opinion among men generally of intelligence and sound judgment—

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: Mr. President—

The President: Does the member yield?

Mr. Pillsbury: For what purpose?

Mr. O'Connell: It is impossible to hear the gentleman when he talks in that low voice. He does not talk to the Convention up here. Now, we like to believe that we are of some consequence up here. Instead of having to move down there to him, I should like to ask him if he would not be good enough to raise his voice so that we may hear him.

Mr. Pillsbury: It is not that I regard my friends in the rear as of less consequence, but that I regard what I have to say as probably of no consequence at all. [Laughter.]

I was attempting to say, Mr. President, that the subject is one upon which there is such a difference of opinion among men of good judgment, that no man can have entire confidence in his own; and yet I have had for many years a clear conviction that Massachusetts is perpetuating one of the most serious of her political mistakes in clinging to the absurd, antiquated, archaic, unnecessary and objectionable system of annual elections and annual sessions of the Legislature. I say that out of a closer knowledge of the Legislature, perhaps, for a longer period of time, than that of any other member of this Convention, for I was first a member of the Legislature forty-two years ago, and have had it under close observation at every session ever since, and have had occasion in the meantime to view it from almost every different angle, official and unofficial.

Between these two reforms, the adoption of biennial elections, in which I heartily concur, and the adoption of biennial sessions of the Legislature, the latter is vastly the more important. I hope that the Convention, having declared in favor of biennial elections, will now accept the logical corollary of that action and declare also for biennial sessions of the Legislature. The cost of annual elections, the tumult, the hubbub, the annoyance, the interference with business, unnecessary and objectionable as they are, are a bagatelle in comparison with the constant tinkering of the laws, the principal thing which we ought to get rid of. Probably there is not a local community on the face of the earth except our own that keeps its law-making body in session half the time, year in and year out, and probably there is not a community on the face of the earth that is so over-legislated for as this Commonwealth of Massachusetts, nor a community anywhere which tolerates so much petty, inconsequential and unnecessary legislation, of which the Blue Books from year to year are the conclusive proof.

I have no idea how the fate of the present resolution will be affected by our action on the last, but the thing to do now is at least to refuse to reject the pending resolution, so that we may have the whole subject of biennial elections and biennial sessions before us for further consideration, and this I sincerely hope the Convention will do.

Mr. W. H. Sullivan of Boston: It is amusing to-day to observe the attitude of those delegates who did not trust the people when we were discussing the initiative and referendum. At that time their reason for voting and speaking against the I. and R. was that we had a most perfect Legislature in Massachusetts; it was close to the people, and Massachusetts was the greatest State in this country. Such a glorious Legislature! And now, when they are confronted with the question of biennial sessions, they do not trust the Legislature. But the real fundamental reason for their position is that they do not trust the people. They do not want the initiative and referendum because they say the poor, 'ignorant working-man is not qualified to vote. They do not want the poor ignorant voter to vote for the Legislature or the legislator more than once in two years; and this glorious Legislature,—they do not want that to sit more than once in two years.

Now, the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), in a delightful and effective speech, said that those who opposed the I. and R. ought to be against biennial sessions and against biennial elections because their opposition to the initiative and referendum was founded on the belief that the people, by annual elections, had such effective control over their representatives that the I. and R. was not necessary. This argument, however, will not appeal to those who believe themselves to be the ruling class and God's appointed agents to legislate for the people; and the very modest if somewhat patronizing way in which the gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Pillsbury) has told us what he thinks of the Legislature, and what the people ought to do, and what the Legislature ought to do, and what laws should be made, and how they should be made, fixes his position with the ruling class. The Legislature should make our laws, as it has done in the past, personally conducted and advised,—advised judicially and judiciously by the gentleman from Wellesley, who appeared as counsel for different corporations before the legislative committees.

Now, the real question is: Are you going to distrust both the Legislature and the people? Are those who spoke against the I. and R., who opposed it because we had such a glorious body of legislators, and because every year the legislators will get better—will they vote now for biennial sessions of the Legislature, or will they say to the people—

Mr. Pillsbury: This is the first time, I think, that I have interrupted a member in debate, but I cannot resist the temptation of asking my friend from Boston how any man who voted in this Convention for the initiative and referendum, on the ground that the Legislature cannot be trusted to make the laws, can now vote to continue to keep the Legislature in perpetual session. [Applause.]

Mr. Sullivan: I am glad the gentleman from Wellesley asked the question, and it affords me great pleasure to make answer to those who applauded. My reason for believing in annual elections and annual sessions is that I have so little confidence in the wisdom of the Legislature that I believe in limiting the term of office to one year. That is my reason for believing in annual elections and annual sessions. Let us pass upon the records of the Representatives and Senators every year. In that way we will make for a better Legislature because of this restraining influence.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I find it incumbent upon me to break my resolution not to address the Convention on this question, by reason of the fact that the statements of the gentleman from Wellesley in this division (Mr. Pillsbury) ought not to be perpetuated for the consideration of future generations without at least a brief presentation of the other side.

After a somewhat earnest and prolonged study of the reasons why American Legislatures have fallen into disrepute, I have reached the conclusion, definitely and positively, that the chief cause is to be found in the notorious, illogical, dangerous and harmful tendency of the American people to close the doors of the halls of justice, to lessen the opportunity for the redress of grievances, to prevent change, to keep the world stagnant. Our friend complains of the volume of legislation. Let him take the Blue Book and show me one law for which no reason could have been expressed. The argument will not hold that a bill could have passed both branches of this Legislature and received the approval of the Governor if behind it was no reason.

My friend forgets that this is not the year 1818. He still thinks it is Napoleon who is warring on the battlefields of Europe. He forgets the locomotive, the steam railroad, the telephone, and a hundred other inventions, which have changed the very face of society. He has not yet wakened to the fact that the complexity of human life has increased tenfold since you and I were born. He expostulates because men come to the halls of legislation and ask for redress, ask for change, ask that the institutions of society shall be adapted to new conditions. He desires that we shall still live in that peaceful, quiet day when every man was a farmer and there were no such things as factories, railroads, telephones, wireless telegraphy, aeroplanes, and everything else which has contributed to the enormous, almost inconceivable, diversification of interests that compels constant legislation.

The Congress of the United States has reached that point where it must be in almost continuous session, and yet the people ever complain because Congress does not attack one tithe of the questions confronting it. In the Parliament of Great Britain, in the National Assembly of France, in the Reichstag of Germany, in every legislative body of the world, the same condition exists,—the necessity of greater and more extensive study of public problems than mankind ever before saw.

If he would but read the story of the southern and western States, if he would but read the statements of the Governors of those States, among them especially those of one of the ablest, Governor O'Neal of Alabama, who has discussed these questions at length in print, he would understand that there is spreading gradually through the country a realization of the fact that the greatest harm ever wrought to the legislative branch was wrought by the movement to throttle it and to prevent it from meeting the desires of the people.

Sir, it is true that there is a great deal of trivial legislation enacted that ought not to vex the time of the General Court. I already have assured him, and I will assure him once more, that I will do all I can to attempt a remedy for that situation. But, at any rate, until the situation is remedied, is it reasonable or logical to say the Legislature shall not do the work that now comes before it? The cure is not to be sought in giving less opportunity to do the work. Imagine a board of directors that found its corporation in hard straits and said to its
Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I should say to the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Pillsbury), and also to the gentleman in this division (Mr. W. H. Sullivan), who have brought in the relations of the Legislature and the I. and R., that if we are to have the I. and R. the safety of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts depends upon the annual sitting of the Legislature. There will be mistakes made through the I. and R. that only the Legislature can correct, and if the Legislature does not sit each year we are going to find ourselves in a dangerous position.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: Little needs to be said in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), so well answered by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce). The delegate from Waltham (Mr. Luce) in one of the debates here referred to the fact that it took seven years to pass the direct inheritance tax, because the Legislature did not have time to properly consider the matter, and at the same time properly attend to its regular docket of business. How long would it have taken the Legislature to have enacted taxation reform if it had had biennial sessions?

This resolution goes beyond the other resolution simply by adding biennial sessions. The resolution already adopted would give us biennial elections with annual sessions. The resolution now before us goes the "full hog" and gives biennial elections and biennial sessions. I want to quote against that one or two statements in addition to what the gentleman from Waltham has said.

In a statement by ex-Governor John D. Long, he said:

For many years I have had a close acquaintance with the acts of the Massachusetts Legislature, and I can say that there has not been one of its sessions that could have been omitted without serious harm to the people of the State of Massachusetts.

In 1886 the Knights of Labor put forth this definition of a Legislature: "A meeting of a committee for the common good of the State." And that is just what our Legislature, the General Court, is,—a meeting of a committee for the common good of the State, and it is not too often for them to meet annually.

In addition to taxation reform, we might state many beneficent laws on our statute-books as the result of annual sessions and annual agitation,—such laws as the Employers’ Liability Act, the Working-men’s Compensation Act, the Security of Savings Bank Deposits, the Australian Ballot System, the Regulation of Public Service Corporations, the Improvement of Working Conditions in Factories, the Protection of Women and Children in the Factories, Savings Bank Life Insurance, Mothers’ Pension Aid, and many others which do not occur to me now. These and hundreds of others are the result of that constant agitation which can come only with annual sessions.

I am sure that this Convention does not want to go any farther than it went in the preceding resolution, and that they will vote "Yes" on this and accept the report of the committee, and kill the resolution right here.
Mr. David Mancovitz of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 85):

Resolved, That Part the Second, Chapter I, Section II and Section III as amended by the twenty-first and twenty-second Articles of Amendment to the Constitution of the Commonwealth are hereby repealed, and the following Articles substituted therefor:

Chapter I, Section I.

The General Court.

House.

A census of all the inhabitants of each city and town, on the first day of May, shall be taken and returned to the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, on or before the last Monday of June in the year nineteen hundred and eighteen; and a census of all the inhabitants of each city and town, in the year nineteen hundred and twenty-five, and every tenth year thereafter. In each city the enumeration shall specify the number of inhabitants in each ward of such city. This census and enumeration shall determine the apportionment of Representatives for the periods between the taking of the census.

The House of Representatives shall consist of two hundred and forty members, which shall be apportioned by the Legislature, at its first session after the return of each enumeration as aforesaid, to the several counties of the Commonwealth, equally, as may be, according to their relative numbers of inhabitants, as ascertained by the next preceding special enumeration; and the town of Cohasset, in the county of Norfolk, shall, for this purpose, as well as in the formation of districts, as hereinafter provided, be considered a part of the county of Plymouth; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth to certify as soon as may be after it is determined by the Legislature, the number of Representatives to which each county shall be entitled, to the board authorized to divide each county into representative districts. The board of special commissioners in each county, to be elected by the people of the county, or of the towns therein, as may for that purpose be provided by law, shall, on the first Tuesday of July next after each assignment of Representatives to each county, assemble at a shire town of their respective counties, and proceed, as soon as may be, to divide the same into Representative districts of contiguous territory, so as to apportion the representation assigned to each county equally, as nearly as may be, according to the relative number of inhabitants in the several districts of each county; and such districts shall be so formed that no town or ward of a city shall be divided therefor, nor shall any district be made which shall be entitled to elect more than three Representatives. Every Representative, for one year at least next preceding his election, shall have been an inhabitant of the district for which he is chosen and shall cease to represent such district when he shall cease to be an inhabitant of the Commonwealth. The districts in each county shall be numbered by the board creating the same, and a description of each, with the numbers thereof and the number of inhabitants therein, shall be returned by the board, to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the county treasurer of each county, and to the clerk of every town in each district, to be filed and kept in their respective offices. The manner of calling and conducting the meetings for the choice of Representatives, and of ascertaining their election, shall be prescribed by law. Not less than one hundred members of the House of Representatives shall constitute a quorum for doing business; but a less number may organize temporarily, adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members.
A census of all the inhabitants of each city and town, on the first day of May, shall be taken and returned into the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, or on or before the last day of June, in the year nineteen hundred and eighteen; and a census of all the inhabitants of each city and town, in the year nineteen hundred and twenty-five, and every tenth year thereafter. In each city said enumeration shall specify the number of inhabitants in each ward of said city. This census and enumeration shall determine the apportionment of Senators for the periods between the taking of the census. The Senate shall consist of forty members. The General Court shall, at its first session after each next preceding special enumeration, divide the Commonwealth into forty districts of adjacent territory, each district to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, according to the enumeration aforesaid: provided, however, that no town or ward of a city shall be divided therefor; and such districts shall be formed, as nearly as may be, without uniting two counties or parts of two or more counties, into one district. Each district shall elect one Senator, who shall have been an inhabitant of this Commonwealth five years at least immediately preceding his election, and at the time of his election shall be an inhabitant of the district for which he is chosen; and he shall cease to represent such senatorial district when he shall cease to be an inhabitant of the Commonwealth. Not less than sixteen Senators shall constitute a quorum for doing business; but a less number may organize temporarily, adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members.

The committee on The General Court reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered Tuesday, July 9, 1918, and was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 117 to 64.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: I have moved substitution of document No. 85 for the report of the committee on The General Court. There are several amendments of a similar description to document No. 85, but in order to facilitate matters and save time I am going to address the Convention on that document, which is very similar to the others.

The documents that I have introduced personally are No. 80 and No. 79 as they appear respectively on the calendar. As they are identical in their phraseology with document No. 85 I shall address myself to that document.

I will explain briefly what this amendment provides. It provides that the Constitution be amended whereby our Legislature at present is apportioned on a basis of legal voters, and a basis of population substituted therefor. It simply changes the Constitution in reference to the apportionment by striking out the words "legal voters" where they appear in the Constitution, and substituting therefor the word "inhabitants." That is the whole sum and substance of the amendment. The purpose of the amendment is to create an apportionment of our Legislature on the basis of the entire population of the Commonwealth instead of a minute fraction thereof. That is the whole situation briefly and I have a few facts and figures here to try to impress upon the Convention the importance of this great step which I believe is in the right direction.

The present method of reapportioning Representatives and Senators is unfair, unequal and indefensible. The idea of apportioning on a basis of legal voters is absolutely contrary to the intent of the Constitution. It is simply a subterfuge, enacted through a constitutional amendment in 1856 and 1857 by strongly partizan Legislatures and adopted in 1857 by an intensely partizan electorate for the sole purpose and intent of keeping the control of the government in the hands of the narrow wing of the then dominant party. At that time there had commenced to flow to our shores that great stream of present-day American life blood,—immigrants and immigration. In order to deprive the foreign-born elements of our Commonwealth of their just representation in the halls of legislation, the cute and crafty minds of that time devised this unequal method of defeating the will of the people,—representation on a basis of legal voters. What is a legal voter? The ordinary interpretation of the term is, a citizen of the United States who is not a registered voter; note the distinction,—one who is not registered but who is eligible. The only proof required of the presence of a legal voter when the census was taken in 1915 was the personal statement of the man himself or of the landlady who gave to the census enumerator the names of her male lodgers. Accordingly, foreign-born residents, who had not become citizens of our country yet, were not recognized, even though the Constitution guarantees them a government of the people and not based upon artificial and imaginary legal voters.

According to the 1915 census the population of Massachusetts was 3,639,310 people, and out of that number there were only 775,889 legal voters in the whole State, or about one person in every five. Yet, one-fifth of our population, supposed to be legal voters, are reckoned on and the other four-fifths of the population of the State, or to be exact, 2,917,421 individuals of our population, are not given any consideration whatever in making up legislative districts and legislative seats. Is this a republic, where the majority is supposed to rule, or are we in Massachusetts a vest pocket edition of some foreign dynasty where the minority rules? I have shown to you where our Legislature is made up on the basis of one-fifth of our entire population, and yet we brag and boast about our government by the people.

Now let us consider the figures in Suffolk County and see what they show. By the census of 1915 the population of Suffolk County was 826,801 people and the legal voters were estimated at 175,890, or about one in every five people, or a fraction more. The remaining four-fifths, or 650,911 people, residents of Suffolk County, are not recognized in our present method of reapportionment. And yet our forefathers fought against taxation without representation! Every one of these men, or a great majority of them, are taxed, either on a poll tax or on a property tax. And yet on the basis of apportionment they are not recognized. Is not that taxation without representation, taxing residents of our Commonwealth and taking money for the conduct of the Commonwealth out of their pockets and yet not recognizing them in the fundamental frame of our government?

No doubt some one will say: "These legislators that we elect represent the people as a whole." If so, why not apportion on the basis of those whom they are supposed to represent,—the whole people,—and not a minute fractional part thereof?

To point out further inconsistencies and irregularities of the present method, let me quote a few figures showing the unfair conditions in some of the Boston wards and sections to-day. For instance, ward 5, with a population of 77,573 people, has three representatives. Ward 7, with a population of 35,084, or less than 50 per cent of the total of ward 5, also has three representatives; and yet our census tells us that ward 5, with 77,000 population, has only 7,900 legal voters and that ward 7, with a population of 35,000, or 42,000 less, has three thousand more legal voters, — figures that I personally do not believe are authentic. Yet that is the condition and it is a simple illustration of the irregularity of our present apportionment system. Ward 7, with 42,489 less people than ward 5, gets the same number of Representatives, yet we talk about equality of representation. Another interesting situation is the contrast between ward 7 and ward 8, ward 8 being now the Back Bay ward, formerly ward 11 of the city of Boston. The population of ward 8 is greater than that of ward 7. Ward 7 has a population of 35,000, legal voters amounting to 10,000, and three Representatives. Ward 8 has a population of 38,000, or three thousand more people than ward 7, and yet the census says that they have legal voters to the number of only 7,700. While they have 3,000 more people, the census says that they have 3,000 less legal voters. And yet ward 8, in my opinion, should have more legal voters with its greater population, because of its stable and permanent population, than ward 7, the neighboring ward, which is a lodging-house section to a great extent, with a floating population.

To me, those figures are mighty strange and I do not know any way that they can be verified.

South Boston, with a population of 59,737 people, has four Representatives, while ward 7, with 24,000 less people, has three Representatives.

Now those are only examples of the inconsistency and the unfairness of our present method of apportionment. These figures ought to be convincing proof to any fair-minded man that we are being legally robbed to-day by apportioning on a basis of legal voters, and it is about time we made a drastic change so that we may have a return of the government to the hands of the people and not by a small minority of the people. We are operating our government now under a system of class rule.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I was rather curious to know, in view of the figures which the gentleman has just quoted, and also his contention as to the vast number of people who are not represented because they are not voters, how the conditions would be improved by the I. and R., for which he voted and which he advocated earlier in the session.

Mr. Brennan: I do not know how the I. and R. will operate so as to remedy this situation. However, it might be initiated by the I. and R. to bring about such a change as I believe we ought to bring about here, — a constitutional amendment whereby the people of the Commonwealth, as in nearly every other State in the Union, should be considered in the fabric of making up our Legislature. This is the only State in the Union where a cute little scheme has existed of apportioning on a system of legal voters, and I believe it is time we had a change. We are supposed to have a government of the people and for the people and by the people, but we are having government by only a fractional part of the people. And that is why the 1918 Legislature of Massachusetts of which the gentleman who has just spoken was a member, was made up as follows, — and I believe that these figures will be sufficient information for him and for any fair-minded man to realize that the present method is not fair and not just and not democratic in the economic sense of the word: Last year's House of Representatives contained 171 Republicans and 58 Democrats, or a proportion of over three to one. The Senate of Massachusetts contained 34 Republicans and 6 Democrats, or a proportion of almost six to one. The Governor's Council contained seven Republicans and one Democrat, a proportion of seven to one; and yet there are those who say that we are operating under a representative form of government!

Mr. George of Haverhill: I am very much interested in the last analysis of the gentleman's statement as to conditions of our Legislature. As I understand it, this is a proposition to change the Constitution in order to make the State more Democratic? [Laughter.]

Mr. Brennan: It is not a proposition to make the State more Democratic in a political sense; it is a proposition to make the State more democratic in a government sense. And I believe that we ought to make the State more democratic, because I believe that our State Legislature to-day is not representative of the people and it does not represent the people, — and I do not believe we ought to consider this matter from a party standpoint whatsoever. I am quoting these figures simply to show that our condition of government to-day is unequal and unfair. It does not matter to me what the political complexion of the Legislature is as long as there is a near division of the dominant parties instead of an unequal division of seven to one, six to one or three to one, as exists in the Governor's Council, the Senate and House of Representatives.

The Constitution of our State to-day is contradictory. Chapter 1, section 3, article 1 of our Constitution says:

There shall be, in the Legislature of the Commonwealth, a representation of the people, annually elected, and founded upon the principle of equality.

Does the gentleman from Haverhill think that our Legislature to-day is founded upon the principle of equality or does any fair-minded man, whether Republican or Democrat, think that our Legislature to-day is founded upon the principle of equality? There is not anybody here who can say there is a nearness, or any approach to nearness, to the equality that was intended by our Constitution.

Furthermore, I maintain that to-day our Legislature neither represents the people of Massachusetts nor is based upon the principle of equality our Constitution intended. Therefore it is time for a change, so that the Legislature may be brought back to the control of the people. And that is why we witnessed during the last session of this Convention the passage of an amendment providing for the initiative and referendum, because our Legislature had not been representative of the people of Massachusetts. That is why an initiative and referendum amendment has been adopted by this Convention, and in my humble opinion, it was the principal reason why this Convention was called together, so that the General Court would be brought to its senses and realize that we should have a representative government here and to impress the General Court that it was elected to represent the people and not private interests, as they have heretofore.
I speak from experience. I served in four Legislatures and I know the methods and means that are employed in those bodies, and I believe that the adoption of the initiative and referendum is the best proof in the world that our people are dissatisfied with the present method of apportionment and the present method of representation that we are getting from our Legislatures.

Now I want to give a few more figures on this great subject.

Mr. UNDERHILL: Replying to the gentleman's own statement, this vast population in the different wards of Boston is now represented in the General Court, in some instances by two, in some instances by three and in others by four representatives, representing all the people: I believe he mentioned that South Boston had four representatives. Now, sir, under the initiative and referendum all these men for whom he is advocating this change have absolutely no representation, because they are not voters, and those who are voters, this minority of one to five or one to four, carry out their own wishes without respect to the great majority of the people for whom he is now pleading.

Mr. BRENNAN: I cannot see any comparison between the two subjects at all.

Why should we not apportion on the basis of people? Our Representatives to Congress,—the Congress of the United States,—are apportioned on a population basis, and so are the majority of the Legislatures of the other States of the Union,—notably the greatest of all, the State of New York. If Representatives and Senators are intended to legislate for the people, why not apportion them and elect them on that basis?

Now in order that the gentleman from Somerville may not feel that I am making a statement simply from the standpoint of Boston, I am going to branch out into a wider field and let him realize for himself that the counties of Massachusetts are suffering under the same handicap that many of the Boston wards are. For instance, Barnstable County has a population of 28,818 people; they have three Representatives. Nantucket, which, under the Constitution, is entitled to one Representative regardless of her population, has 3,166 inhabitants, with one Representative. Twenty-eight thousand inhabitants in Barnstable, 3,000 inhabitants in Nantucket, a proportion of nine to one, and yet Barnstable has three Representatives and Nantucket has one, a proportion of three to one. Is not that a discrepancy?

Compare Berkshire County and Bristol County. Berkshire County has a population of 114,000 people, Bristol County has a population of 346,000 people, or three times as many. Bristol has 19 Representatives and Berkshire has 8. If that proportion were to hold true and we were apportioning on a basis of mathematical accuracy, Bristol would have 24 Representatives instead of 19, while Berkshire would have 8; then it would be in the same ratio as their population.

I also want to point out to you that four counties of this State,—namely, Bristol, Essex, Middlesex and Worcester,—have 125 members of the Massachusetts House of Representatives. Four counties out of the fourteen have over 50 per cent of the total membership, and if Suffolk County was added to the total it would make 179,—a total of 179 Representatives in five counties out of fourteen counties in the State, in a total membership in the House of 240. Is that mathematical accuracy? I cannot see where it is mathematically accurate, and I defy anybody to prove that five counties in this Commonwealth, with an aggregate of 179 members out of 240 Representatives, is a democratic form of government. Nine of our counties have only 61 members of the House of Representatives while five counties have 179 members! Is that equality?

Another inconsistent part of our Constitution is this: We have a Governor's Council. For the information and benefit of those who believe that this is a facetious argument and should not be taken seriously, let me read from the Constitution with reference to the makeup of our Governor's Council. The 16th article of amendment says:

Eight Councillors shall be annually chosen by the inhabitants of this Commonwealth, qualified to vote for Governor. The election of Councillors shall be determined by the same rule that is required in the election of Governor. The Legislature, at its first session after this amendment shall have been adopted, and at its first session after the next State census shall have been taken, and at its first session after each decennial State census thereafter, shall divide the Commonwealth into eight districts of contiguous territory, each containing a number of inhabitants as nearly equal as practicable — not legal voters, but inhabitants. If you make up your Governor's Council on a basis of inhabitants, why not your House and Senate?

In reference to the Congress of the United States, the United States Constitution provides: "Representatives . . . shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers," counting "the whole number of . . . persons, . . . excluding Indians not taxed" — which latter proviso is an obsolete phrase in so far as it refers to Massachusetts. But there is the Constitution of the United States. Your Congressmen are apportioned according to the whole number of persons in each State, and a Congressman of the United States, a Representative to your National Legislature, your National law-making body, is at least as important; indeed it is more important in the affairs of the Nation than a delegate in this Convention or a member of the General Court. Furthermore, if the United States of America feels that all of its citizens and all of its residents and all of its inhabitants should be considered in making up our great Congress which decides whether we shall enter war or whether we shall remain at peace, a momentous question of far greater importance affecting each and every inhabitant of the United States, and if we ourselves elect our Governor's Council on a basis of inhabitants, why, then, should we not be consistent and elect our Senators and Representatives on a basis of inhabitants?

Let me say to you that population was the basis of representation in this Commonwealth between the year 1840, when the 13th article of amendment was adopted, and the year 1857, when the 21st article of amendment was adopted. Why was the change made, — why was this legal voters' amendment adopted in 1857? Because, as I have said, there started to flow to our shores that great stream of immigrants who have helped largely to build our railroads, who have aided in building our canals, who have helped to build our docks, who have contributed to the building up of our water front, who have been the hewers of wood, and the drawers of water, and the tillers of the soil; whom to-day we are glad to have in our midst, because there is a shortage of labor all over the United States, and if it were not for the presence of these strong, willing, honest immigrants who are deprived of their just consideration in apportionment by our State Constitution, the United States of America to-day would be in a dire position and possibly might be in a condition of distress. Those are the honest laborers of yesterday who have produced the brilliant sons and daughters of America to-day, the sons and daughters of the first and second generations who are the doctors, lawyers and the business men of our country, and of whom 60 per cent,—sons of immigrants,—are in the ranks of our army and navy. Still we say that those men are not to be considered in the scheme of our government; we are going to set up class rule against the mass, and the legal voters are to dominate those men. Why do we allow them to come here? Why do we say that this is a land of opportunity and equality and liberty, and then set up a privileged class? I contend that we owe our very existence to-day to the immigrants; that we owe our existence here to the immigrants from Ireland, England, France, Italy, Spain, Russia, Sweden and the various other European nations from which they have been coming. We owe our very existence as a Nation to the men whom we deprive to-day of just recognition. We are the only State in the United States of America that says to these men: “We welcome you here; we tax your property,—we tax your property whether you are a citizen or not; you contribute to our treasury, and yet when we are making up new legislative districts you are not to be considered; you are classed as nonentities. We are here, and we certainly welcome you because we need you for certain purposes, but you are not to become part of our government.”

Let me say to you, gentlemen, that it is a difficult thing to become a citizen of the United States. I have had considerable experience with men who have come to this country, who are honest and ambitious and willing and earnest and who have been deprived of an education in their former European homes; and they come here and they study, they work and they try to bring themselves along, and they have to live in this country five years and then get two of their neighbors and friends to take a day off from their employment that they can ill afford and go to the court.

These men have difficulty in becoming citizens of this great country. They are compelled to go to that court, as I have said, with two of their neighbors and friends, poor working-men, who sacrifice that day’s pay, and questions are asked of them that are difficult for a high school graduate to answer,—questions as to the number of generals in the civil war; “What was the principal battle in the civil war?” “Name ten Presidents of the United States.” Boys who have just graduated from high school would have difficulty in answering those questions. If that were not difficult enough, Congress recently has enacted a bill forbidding admission into these United States of any immigrant, no matter how honest he may be, no matter how clean his soul or his heart or his mind may be, unless he can read and write the language of his own country. I believe that that was a step backward. I do not believe the test of qualification or the base of fitness for citizenship in this country should be a literacy test. I believe the only test should be: Is the man of good character and of sound body and mind? And if he is, let him come in. Many an educated rogue, an agent of an enemy country, well educated in statecraft and well educated in plotting, bribing and murdering, if necessary, comes into our country because he can read and write. He comes in freely and mingles with our people. But a poor immigrant who comes here and has been deprived of education in his own country, from which he comes to seek betterment in this land, because he cannot read and write, although he may have within him a cleaner heart and mind than the man who is educated and who walks down the gang-plank ahead of him, — he is deprived of admission to this country. That condition, gentlemen, should not prevail, and I do not think Congress acted in pursuance of the fundamental principles of the American government when they denied honest immigrants that opportunity to enter the United States. We have built ourselves up as the greatest Nation in the world by welcoming to our shores those who were oppressed and those who were downtrodden, those who sought betterment and they who sought religious and political freedom. In spite of this fact, at this late day, when we have 110,000,000 people within our boundaries, we shut the doors to those men. Many such men, as I have stated, have become our best citizens. They have formed the bulwark of this Nation. The transfusion of that new blood into the American people and American Nation has invigorated and stimulated our race and enriched the American people, so that to-day we have the advantage of the vigorous blood of all the former European subjects who have come here, and the best blood they had has been merged into ours, and that is why we are strong and great. Therefore I ask you, — I ask the delegates to this Convention, — to consider seriously this amendment, because I believe that in order to be fair and just we should give every man in this Commonwealth the same opportunity and consideration and recognition that he is entitled to under our Constitution. It is expressly provided in our Constitution that all men are created free and equal. If they are equal, why do we in Massachusetts set up a barrier barring them from consideration in our basis of government? This is an inequality that has existed in this Commonwealth for a great many years. I believe it ought to be eradicated. You men have all heard of Elbridge Gerry, you all have heard of the gerrymander; and yet after 50 or 60 years of gerrymandered Congressional districts and gerrymandered Representative districts and with an unequal proportion of representation in our halls of legislation, no step has been taken to bring about a change whereby a political equality may be reached. I think it is time that we took some action, and therefore I trust that this amendment will be adopted or this resolution substituted for the report of the committee on The General Court, so that we really and truly, like every other State in the Nation, may have an apportionment on a basis of population and not on a basis of imaginary legal voters, as they are in hundreds and thousands of cases. Therefore I trust that this resolution may be substituted so that we in this Constitutional Convention may show our constituents and show the people of the Commonwealth that we are here to make our government more representative, more democratic and more responsive to the will of the people of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. QUINN of Sharon: I hope that this resolution will be rejected, its rejection being recommended unanimously by the committee on The General Court. As you all are aware, the resolution provides that representation be based on the number of inhabitants rather than on the basis of legal voters as at present. The passage of this resolution would be very unfair to the districts which have a small and stable population and would be advantageous to those populous centers, manufacturing centers, which have a large floating population. These districts will increase their membership, whereas the small and stable towns, the small communities, will decrease their membership. Take, for example, the city of Lawrence. One-half of those eligible for military duty under the registration act were aliens. Now, that is the condition which confronts us. This matter of apportionment was debated at great length in the Convention of 1853, and the ultimate result of the deliberations of that Convention was the passage in the Legislatures of 1856 and 1857 of the present amendments to the Constitution, Articles 21 and 22, which provide a basis of representation based on the number of legal voters. I therefore certainly trust that this resolution will be rejected in justice to all citizens of the Commonwealth, in order that there may be a true and equitable representation from all districts in the General Court.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I offered a resolution of my own to correct the very injustice that this one seeks to correct, and the merits of this one have been set forth so ably and eloquently by the gentleman who moved it that I am very glad to second his resolution and to ask that it may be substituted. He set forth before this Convention the injustice and unfairness of the present arrangement, and it may have occurred to some of you to ask yourselves: Why was such an unjust and unfair arrangement put into our Constitution? In the original Constitution the General Court was made up on the basis of ratable polls. In 1836 a different arrangement as to the number of ratable polls was made, but still ratable polls was continued as a basis. In 1840 a constitutional amendment was adopted, however, making inhabitants the basis of representation in both House and Senate. That arrangement worked happily and justly and fairly. It was in accord with the rest of our Constitution, inhabitants being the basis of the choosing of councilmen and of choosing the members in the Federal Congress. It was in accord with the basis of representation in the other States in the Union. Why, then, was it disturbed? It was disturbed because of two factions that got together and that had sufficient influence to get the present arrangement through the Legislature and ratified by the people. One was the Know Nothing movement, and the other was the anti-Boston movement.

At that time we know how active the Know Nothing movement was, the distrust of the immigrant that was in the air; and so in order to curb the growing power of the immigrant it was put before the people and the people in the country sections were asked to ratify the amendment for no other purpose than to curb the growing influence of the immigrant. Now, that distrust of the immigrant was laid by for all time within twenty years in the great civil war. Further, that distrust of the immigrant was buried by this very Convention last year, when we passed the anti-aid amendment. And if there were still any doubts in the mind of any one, he has but to read now the rolls of our army to see how the sons of the immigrants are fighting for democracy. Take your rolls and look at the French names, the Polish names, men who were good enough for us to register to fight for us, and they are going forth to fight for us, but we do not consider in our Constitution that they are good enough to be considered when we choose a Representative and a Senator. Is that fair? Is that just? Why should not this Convention take the same splendid ground that it took last year, and say: "We will bury for all time the ghost of the distrust of the immigrant, and will repeal this amendment, or at least give the people a chance to deal with this amendment which is now in the Constitution."

The second argument that was used in our country localities and smaller cities to secure the insertion of the present unjust arrangement was that Boston was growing too much in power and influence. The same situation prevailed in other great States. In the State of New York they distrusted the city of New York, and so they made a constitutional arrangement that the number of Senators in the city of New York never should be greater than the number of Senators in all the rest of the State, so that the power of the great metropolis might be curbed. They went to our smaller cities and our towns with the same argument, and they said: "Boston is growing, and Boston will rule you unless you put this amendment into the Constitution." Whatever people may feel toward Boston, this cuts deeper than Boston. It cuts an injustice not only to the city of Boston but to so many of our smaller cities and towns. Look at the city of Lawrence, the city of Lowell, nay, all of these great textile towns, — Fall River, New Bedford. All of them are discriminated against. Injustice is done to all of them.

Mr. HART of Cambridge: May I ask the gentleman whether I understand that it is his proposition that immigrants into Massachusetts who have the opportunity to become citizens and who in no way seek that opportunity, in no way qualify, who take not even the first steps toward qualifying, — whether he thinks they also ought to be counted in adjusting the representation?

Mr. SAWYER: The number of immigrants within our State who do not seek to become citizens is very few. There is a large number of immigrants in our State who cannot become citizens, but they are here and are going to live here, — as long as they live they are going to live in this State. Their families are here, they are working in our mills, their families are working in our mills, their wealth is here, their interests are here, and they ought to be considered when we make up the basis of our representation.

I trust that as the gentleman from Waverley says, justice may prevail in this Convention, and that we shall substitute this resolution for the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. LEONARD of Boston: I feel much as did the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) in the third division, when he moved reconsideration this morning of another subject, when he said that the committee on The General Court had not proposed to the Convention any affirmative or constructive measures. I feel in that way regarding this proposition. I believe that a measure on this subject should come before the Convention. I do not agree with a great deal of what has been said by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. James H. Brennan). Perhaps my reasons for wishing that this matter be brought before the Convention are different from his, but I believe it is a matter that should receive consideration.
The Convention of 1853, which has been referred to, spent a very large proportion of its time and of its talents upon this question of the apportionment of representative districts. In that Convention, it was largely a contest between the delegates from the small towns, who claimed that each town should have at least one Representative, and those who, on the other hand, believed that the representative districts should be based upon some equality either of voters or of inhabitants. Their proposal on this matter, like all the proposals of the Convention of 1853, was rejected, but four years later the 21st amendment was adopted. The 21st amendment provides that in all the counties with the exception of Suffolk County the apportionment shall be made by the county commissioners, and in Suffolk County the apportionment shall be made of representative districts by the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Boston, as they act as county commissioners for the entire county of Suffolk, or in the alternative it shall be made by a board of special commissioners, and I believe a board of special commissioners may be elected in any county of the Commonwealth.

Now I want to refer to the apportionment that has last been made in Suffolk County. And I am not going to do this for the purpose of stirring up any embers that may be sleeping regarding the contest we had over the last apportionment, but to illustrate, if I may, how under the interpretation of the law by the Supreme Judicial Court I believe that there is need of the Convention giving attention to this matter of apportionment, so that we may provide for the future.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: Before the member takes the time of the Convention discussing the apportionment of Representatives in Suffolk County will he kindly explain to the Convention how in any sense the apportionment of Representatives by the boards of the several counties is germane to the subject in question?

Mr. Leonard: It seems to me that is absolutely the matter in question. I think that the question before the Convention is: How shall we apportion the representative districts of the Commonwealth? What is the method by which we shall do it? Are the existing methods the proper methods? Can they be reformed? I think they can.

In the last apportionment of Suffolk County five of the special board were chosen from the city of Boston and four from the towns of Chelsea, Revere and Winthrop. The five chosen from Boston were gentlemen selected in the Democratic primary, whose names all commenced with either A, B or C. Now, I do not say that with reflection on all of the members. I know the gentleman in the third division (Mr. J. H. Brennan), who was the chairman of the board, had ample experience and qualification for assuming that duty. But here is an illustration of a matter I want to point out further, the habit and the tendency where there is not a vital issue connected with the candidates, of selecting those candidates who have the favorable positions on the ballot. These men, the five men chosen from Boston, were in the first letters of the alphabet. One of them never had held public office before and was a young man of some 21 or 22 years of age. He was one of the members of a board assigned to do a duty which the language of the Supreme Judicial Court characterizes in this manner:
Nothing can more deeply concern the freedom, stability, the harmony and success of representative republican government, nothing more directly affects the political and civil rights of all the members and subjects than the manner in which the popular branch of the legislative department is constituted.

That was the way the board was chosen, and they undertook to apportion the districts, and I suppose, according to the prevailing methods that have existed in this Commonwealth for some generations past, the gentlemen of the political faith that dominated in that board undertook to secure, within that measure of discretion which they felt they had the right to use, an advantage to their party. The first two apportionments that they made were so manifestly and clearly unfair, as based upon the number of legal voters, that they were set aside by the court and a third apportionment had to be made. It was after that third apportionment that I happened to take some little part, because I then was an aggrieved party. The first two apportionments that they had made did not affect my own particular ward; but when the third apportionment came it tied up my ward, or the new ward that was made, which I thought was a ward that might be slightly Democratic, with another ward, and made my district entirely and exclusively Republican. [Laughter.] Although I was not a candidate for office myself, I felt that there were others. We had developed in West Roxbury some men in the preceding ten years, men like the present mayor of the city, men like Salem Charles, men like Mr. Horgan, who is sitting here in the Convention, John M. Minton, John A. Callahan, John J. Conway and others. There is now no opportunity or chance for any young man of my political faith at the present time entering into public life by elective office from that district, because of the apportionment then made; and the result of that apportionment was that the gentlemen who had control of the board in Charlestown and East Boston and the north and west end sections of the city secured by the use of their discretion [laughter], — and that has been defined by the court; the court says that the members may use their discretion within certain limits, — for these wards that are contiguous on the north side of the city they secured a representation in the General Court larger than the several contiguous wards on the southern side of Boston, — notably Dorchester, West Roxbury and Brighton. The ratio of Representatives is less, very much less, in the wards on the northern section than those on the southern side. And in approving this third apportionment by the Suffolk Commission I hold that the Supreme Judicial Court have approved of a latitude of discretion that may plague us in the future, and is in effect a greater discretion than an apportioning board should possess.

Mr. JAMES H. BRENNAN: Now that the delegate from Boston (Mr. Leonard) has explained so very ably these three apportionments in Suffolk County, I should like to have him explain to the members of this Convention how it is that a recess committee of the Legislature has so arranged sixteen congressional districts that there are only four Democratic congressmen elected.

Mr. LEONARD: I am coming directly to that. I am glad the gentleman has brought it up.

I think, as I have said, that in the use of this discretion that the members of that board possessed they undertook to try to offset the system that has existed outside of Suffolk County in this Commonwealth since the time of Elbridge Gerry, to whom the gentleman refers. And Elbridge Gerry, by the way, was Governor in 1811. The story of the derivation of the word gerrymander was something like this: They were making up the congressional districts at that time, and there was hanging in the office of a newspaper editor a map of Essex County showing the new districts. Gilbert Stuart, the artist, saw the districts there, and he with a pencil drew a few lines on one particular district and he said: "There is a salamander." The editor of the paper said: "Don't call it a salamander; it is a gerrymander," and the word has existed since that time. Now, gerrymandering was not born in this Commonwealth, though it here received its name and has been practiced by the prevailing and by the dominant party since that time up to the present; and when the gentlemen of Suffolk County undertook to try to offset that in any way they were undertaking an impossible job. It could not be done, because the gerrymandering of the past was too skilfully and artfully done and had extended through too long a period of time for one board to do it. But now I think I am indicating that there is necessity of bringing this matter before us.

The 21st amendment refers to the board of aldermen of the city of Boston. The board of aldermen of the city of Boston is now an obsolete term. We have no board of aldermen, and we do need, the city of Boston in particular needs, some new method of apportionment.

I do not think that the exact method by which we are going to apportion the districts is going to solve the entire problem. There are other matters that enter into the consideration of it. I think we opened up some of those matters in the discussion this morning. Have you ever had the curiosity to look at our election laws,—the election laws as they are on our statute-books and on our Blue Books? They are wonderfully and fearfully made. The chapter on election laws occupies in the Revised Statutes something over one hundred pages. I grant its importance. But on the other hand, look to such subjects as the descent of real property. There you have one page. Matters like common nuisances have two pages. The rights of husband and wife occupy four pages in the Revised Laws. And, gentlemen, all the vast catalogue and category of our criminal offences and of their procedure is comprised in eleven chapters, and in those eleven chapters are defined all those peculiar things of which man may be guilty,—treason and murder and arson, the stealing of a dog collar, the ringing of a church bell, the engaging in a duel, being a gambler at a fair. All of these crimes are minutely set forth and discussed, defined, and also what it is to be an accessory before or after the fact. Yet all those chapters on criminal law are of less volume than what we have to say about elections. Then, again, not satisfied with that, every few years we have to codify and change the whole system. In 1907 we had a codification that occupies 150 pages in the Blue Book of that year. In the codification of 1914 there is another 150 pages. And there are laws added year after year.

I heard some reference made to an election expert in the Convention not long ago. The only election experts are those who are directly in employment and in contact with the proposition of election laws. If you were to ask an attorney a question on almost any matter of civil law, within a reasonable time he probably could give you an answer; but if you ask him some little thing on the election law, if he is a wise man he will go to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and he will confer probably with Mr. Boynton, and he will get the information, but he never will attempt to dig it out of our statutes in our Blue Books.

And yet, in spite of all this, the number of our elective officials is a gradually diminishing ratio, almost a vanishing decimal point. Prior to 1855 the House of Representatives was composed of some six or seven hundred members, and now it is reduced to 240. It is the same with our cities. We have not got the large numbers of elective officials we formerly had. And despite all the accumulation of election laws it seems to me that the glamor and the interest and the picturesque features of our old American political campaigns have departed gradually and are very much on the wane. The last real picturesque campaign that I recall out in my district was when a gentleman ran, not in my party, but in the other party, for the congressional nomination. He was considered at that time a rank outsider, who had no business to butt in on the gentleman whom the "powers that be" felt should receive the nomination at that time. I recall that campaign very well because it was so thoroughly organized. They had all the staffs of officers, both the coms and the non-coms, and the supply sergeants, and a fully equipped commissary department for the relief of the tired and hungry workers. Everything went well. It was successful, and everybody enjoyed it, except for the unfortunate circumstance that the candidate was not elected. In the cold gray dawn of a morning or two after the campaign one of his neighbors said to him: "Gene, I think I saw considerable mention of your name in the papers lately." He said: "Yes. Yes, I guess you did." He asked: "Were you a candidate for some office?" The other replied: "Yes." "Well," said the neighbor, "did you enjoy your experiences?" "Well, now, old boy," was the answer, for that was an expression he had [laughter], "your question reminds me of the Illinois farmer who read in the market reports that the price of hogs had advanced, so he gathered together a certain number of head of his hogs and he drove them to the market. The weather was hot, and the journey was long, and the hogs were lean. By the time the poor farmer arrived at the market the price had dropped, and he concluded that the best thing he could do was to drive the hogs back home again, which he accordingly did, finishing the round trip in something less than a week. He met one of his neighbors casually, just as you happened along this morning, and the neighbor said, 'Well, Farmer John, I understand you went to the market lately.' 'Yes.' 'Well, did you enjoy the trip?' 'Yes,' said the farmer, 'yes, fairly well. You see I had the company of the hogs all the time.'" Now, that kind of marks about the epoch of the passing away of the picturesque feature of our campaigns. I believe that we do not treat the candidates for office in quite the proper fashion. It is not the same way with the appointive officials. You do not find anything in the statute about appointees or men holding appointive offices, and in the meantime their family and their number have flourished like the proverbial banyan tree.

What is the substance of all this? Simply this: It seems to me that if we gave a little bit of the attention to trying to get the expression of the people that we give to trying to circumvent the candidate for office, if we gave 10 per cent of the amount of attention, we would accomplish more results. We tell the candidate not to do this and not to do the other thing. Why, up to a few years ago it was the practice in this Commonwealth when a man was tried for murder to have three judges sit in judgment in that case. That practice was abolished some time ago. But along in 1914 the Legislature said: "If a man violates the Corrupt Practice Act there shall be an inquest held on him on the complaint of his fellow-citizens and three judges shall sit at the inquest," — not an inquest on the man's body, but an inquest on the poor shivelled-up soul of the individual who would violate some of the various and multitudinous provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act. I saw that sort of performance myself a year or two ago, when a gentleman who had been elected, — I think to the Legislature, — probably had spent more than the tariff provided for by law, and some of his fellow-citizens who had not been taken care of complained of him, and had three judges sit in judgment on him. I do not know what finally came of the case. It is altogether, as I said, different with the appointive official. He is not subjected to any such thing as that. To illustrate the difference that marks the elected from the appointed official, there is a little incident that has gone the rounds of the legal profession for some time which perhaps is old enough not to impeach the reputation of any one now living. It tells of a gentleman from one of the rural communities, — and I use that term with all respect, — who received an appointment to the bench. I do not know whether it was the Superior Court or the Court of Common Pleas, as they may have called it at that time. This gentleman came to Boston to pay his respects to a senior member of the bench. After the introduction and some casual exchange the senior Justice made an interrogation to his brother something in the nature of that which the Governor of North Carolina addressed to his colleague, the Governor of South Carolina, and the two gentlemen adjourned to that portion of the hotel where liquid refreshments were dispensed. The senior Justice introduced his brother to the gentleman who mixed the drinks, and he extended his hand with great comradeship and with the possible hope that here was a future patron of the house. The senior Justice asked: "What will you have?" Well, the newly appointed one was a little bit embarrassed, and he replied: "Anything that satisfies you will satisfy me." "No, no," said the senior Justice, "not at all, but name your own drink. Have anything you want." "Well," he said, "if it is all the same I will have a little rye whiskey." "All right, Judge. All right. George, you mix Mr. Junior Justice some rye whiskey, and give me a glass of milk." Ah, if such a thing should have happened in an election contest and be a subject of complaint, — picture for yourselves the result!

I said in the beginning of my remarks that I think if the Legislature paid some of the attention to achieving the will of the people and less to trying to circumvent the candidate they would make more progress, and I refer to the A, B, C selection made on the apportionment commission in Suffolk County. That A, B, C habit prevails all through the Commonwealth. If our Ballot Law Commission or some of our State bodies were given the power so that a man whose name is on the ballot could have an equal chance with his fellow-candidate, I think we would get away with a whole lot of this inequality that is spoken of and the lack of interest that people take in candidates. You can see it in the State government. Your Attorney-General is Mr. A, your Treasure and Receiver-General is Mr. B, and then you have Mr. C in the Auditor's office. There is Mr. L, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, but he started running some years ago. Now, if those ballots were divided, so that if there are four candidates running in a given district a fourth of the number had Mr. A's name on the first line, and a fourth had Mr. B on the first line, and so on, I think you would accomplish something.

And there is one thing more. I believe from my experience in this Convention that the whole sum and substance of electing Representatives and Senators by National party designations is all buncombe. I do not believe that a Representative has anything to do with a National issue. If you introduce a measure into the House of Representatives affecting a National question your colleagues probably will tell you that you ought to mind your own business. If we were able out of this Convention to bring some proposition whereby the candidates for Representative and for Senator could be chosen in the same way that we in this Convention were chosen to do our task, I think you should find that the gerrymander would fast disappear, because the gerrymander is the attempt of the party machine to perpetuate its strength in a given territory; and it is my experience and belief that in those territories and those districts where there is pretty near an even balance or a division of sentiment, in the long run you are going to get better representation than in those districts that have a preponderating party number of one kind or the other. I believe that what this Convention has done is going to receive in a large measure the approval of the people, and I think in that we are going to fare better than did our predecessors. In all the roll-calls we have had here it is impossible, I think, for any man to say that the party line of cleavage has run through any roll-call on any important measure.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: Will you kindly explain to the Convention the difference between what is proposed in this document and the present Constitution?

Mr. LEONARD: As affecting the county of Suffolk?

Mr. BENNETT: As affecting the State. What is the difference between the document proposed and the present Constitution?

Mr. LEONARD: The document proposed bases our representation upon inhabitants. That is one difference. I do not say that I agree to that, and I do not say I believe in it, but I do wish to make a point that we ought to get this before us for consideration. There are also other provisions. I believe that one provision of the resolution is that the districts should be apportioned by the House of Representatives. Now, I have not agreed always with the gentleman who has introduced these resolutions, the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Mancowitz), — I believe they bear the name of Mr. Mancowitz, — but I say this: That what he has proposed is at least a constructive proposition, it represents serious work and serious thought. The 21st amendment of the existing Constitution, which was adopted in 1857, has nothing about it that is of a sacred nature. There is nothing that shows by the debate which occurred in the Convention of 1853 any reason why we should cling to the amendment of 1855. I regret that the committee on The General Court did not see the difficulty we have in Suffolk County, and I suppose there are grievances in other constructive
All
in

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: The question raised by the resolution on the calendar and by the motion to substitute is a very simple question, and one which I believe this Convention can settle in a very few moments. The 21st and the 22d articles of the Constitution provide that the election of Representatives shall be apportioned on the basis of legal voters. The amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. James H. Brennan) would change the basis of representation from legal voters to that of population. The difference between the two is this: Legal voters are citizens of the United States. The word "inhabitant" includes aliens. In other words, all that there is in this proposition is whether you shall take away from the citizens of the United States certain of their powers in regard to the apportionment of Representatives and give it to the alien population of Massachusetts.

Mr. Mancovitz of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman whether there is any provision for permitting aliens to vote upon the question of election of Representatives.

Mr. Kinney: There is no question of permitting aliens to vote, but the proposition is to have them numerically counted in determining the number of Representatives the locality in which they reside shall have, thereby increasing the influence of those sections of the Commonwealth which have large alien populations. Now, that is all that is involved in this whole question here to-day. If ever there was an hour in the history of Massachusetts when an argument to take away from citizens of the United States and their sons subject to the draft law, millions of whom,—thousands from this State,—millions from all over the United States will be called into the service, to take away their influence and transfer it to an alien population not subject to such civic obligations, should not be entertained, I think it is this. I think that it needs no more than the simple statement of the case to defeat this proposal.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I hope that the gentleman does not mean what he says. Let us go back to the early days of this country, and consider who but aliens settled here and helped to make it. What were the Puritans, who, as the gentleman who represented the opposition to the initiative and referendum said, came here way back in the early days, but aliens? It is simply a question on what boat your father or my father came over on. All were aliens. They all came to this country in pursuit of liberty and happiness. Why make an argument at this time against the aliens! That was the kind of an argument that was made in the Know Nothing days when the Irish people were coming over here. There was not one of that race in the last Constitutional Convention, but their interests were pretty well protected. These men came here and they worked hard and raised large families, and you know they were abused in many cases; but when Fort Sumter was fired on where were they? Were they not ready to fight for the Union? Would you not wish to God now, although you have great generals, that you had a Sheridan and a Grant and a Sherman leading our army over there? Would you not feel more secure and satisfied that our boys would be led to victory? Philip H. Sheridan was the son of an alien, who may have been held down by tyrannical laws so that he could only just manage to read and write the language of this country. Sheridan's father came here to stay. See what an acquisition he was to this country. And your present naturalization laws would stop a man like him from having a fair chance! Hence where logically does the gentleman's argument stand now? Nowhere.

Mr. Kinney: I think the gentleman is going beside the question. Nobody attacked the aliens. Every one conversant with American history will be willing to pay the tribute that the alien is entitled to for services rendered in the building up of this country. All of us, as the gentleman has well said, are sons of alien parentage. That is not the question. No encomium of the alien is needed. The only question here is: Shall we at this hour in our history take away power from citizens of this country and transfer it, in the absence of thousands of citizens, to the alien population? That is the only question.

Mr. Lomasney: The alien population made this country, and you know it. There were men in 1853 opposed to certain aliens, and these restrictions probably were enacted because they did not understand the regard the alien had for this country. But does not the history of the country convince you that you can trust the alien? What brought these men here? Do you gentlemen realize the courage it takes for men of no education to leave their homes across the sea and come here, many of them with their wives and children, with not more than $25 or $50 in their pockets, and in many cases not a friend to meet them? That takes courage, and the aliens who came here had plenty of it.

Mr. Bennett: I should like to ask if there is not another side to this question as affecting the question of race suicide. Now, suppose here are people who have large families, and you are going to include those inhabitants in the making of a representative district, then do you not discriminate against those who have small families? The answer to that is this: I voted to extend the time of the eloquent young senator from Charlestown (Mr. James H. Brennan) very much against my judgment [laughter], because I thought that he was preparing a campaign document for his congressional campaign in this State [laughter], and of course we all are friendly and cordial toward a matter of that kind. But is not this the fiercest attack that has been made upon the initiative and referendum, because if there is anything to which the initiative and referendum properly should be applied it is these fundamental questions of the frame of government. It does seem to me that this day has been valuable to us by merely showing to us what not to do hereafter. We spend all this time on these fundamental propositions of frame of government, to which the initiative and referendum should be applied. Now, here is my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. Lomasney: Will you please put the question in writing?

Mr. Bennett: It is not necessary. Anybody can understand it. My question is this: Are you not casting contempt upon the initiative and referendum? I am moved to frame this question, not by the gentleman himself, but by the gentleman from Harvard in this division.
Mr. Hart, who has announced that when we come to the executive is going to let himself loose. I say that the best thing is once for 1 to leave these fundamental questions to the initiative and refer-endum. That is what the initiative and referendum is for. Here is y question: Is not that so?

Mr. Lomasney: If ever a son of an alien in Massachusetts who attended our public schools, stood in this body as a representative of the people and made such an exhibition of himself as the last speaker, would say he should be disfranchised. [Laughter and applause.]

Some men here little understand what those of us who are the sons 'aliens learned at our fathers' knees about the benefits this country conferred upon the alien and his sons. He, and those who believe as the does, do not understand that we always were taught to support the flag and stand by the government because of the equal rights and equal opportunities it gave to us and to them.

Now, sir, I was talking on the fundamental part of the resolution, and I am sorry his intelligence does not allow him to see it, but I am not the keeper of his intelligence.

You all must admit that under the United States Constitution we elect our Congressmen by population. We recognize there the aliens l over the country; that is the basis of election to the Congress of the United States, but the Constitution of this State discrimi-nates against them in the election of Senators and Representatives. Some men here act just like the slave owners of the South. When the colored man was denied his liberty, they sneered and boasted how well they controlled their "niggers." Some of you men no doubt believe that your unfair opposition to the aliens will be successful forever. Do not deceive yourselves. Massachusetts is only one State in the union, and, summoned before the bar of any tribunal, no man can defend Massachusetts' action on this matter, although we have in Senator Lodge one of the ablest men in the United States Senate. He frequently has trouble to defend what the men of Massachusetts ave done to the aliens in the past.

What is the history of the aliens of Massachusetts? They cannot become citizens unless they comply with your naturalization laws. o matter how honest an alien may be, no matter what his capacity ay be, if he cannot read and write the English language he cannot become a qualified voter. Massachusetts passed that law. It takes me for a man to acquire that qualification. We have evening schools, the cities and the towns provide them, to assist these people and teach them how to read and write. But who stopped many of them from learning how to read and write their own language? The government under which they lived. Those who speak the English language can old that government responsible; those who speak the other lan-guages and cannot read and write must blame their own governments. They come here with sound bodies, with good brains, to this great nd of ours to better their condition, but they must have a chance, and they must comply with our laws. In the early days the lawakers evidently became afraid of these people who lived and worked the manufacturing centers, and they frankly said so. But I sub-it to this Convention sitting here, as intelligent men, fair-minded en: Do you not believe that the alien has passed the probationary period, if we may term it such? What has the alien been doing in this country from the Convention of 1853 to this one? As I was saying when the gentleman interrupted me, let us take the civil war; they went into it and showed what they could do, forgetting all that the Know Nothings said and did to them. Then came our Spanish War, and again they were loyal and true. Then came this war. Take the sons of the aliens out of the present draft, and that is based upon population, and I think some of you men who came over in different boats, before my parents did, would see the difference. We have in this Convention a presiding officer, — his son is over there; we have the gentleman from Worcester, — his son is over there. But without the sons of the aliens over there where would your numbers be?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Salem: I should like to ask the gentleman if the sons of aliens who now are over there are not also legal voters?

Mr. LOMASNEY: I presume that a great many of the sons are, but many of their fathers could not comply with your present unfair naturalization laws. I hope to God they all can. But I am talking on the broad fundamental proposition. We are sending these young men, the cream of the country, the youth of the Nation, to fight for democracy for the world, and you are sitting here, in this Constitutional Convention, and you are denying to the same people here the right to be counted in the apportionment of Senators and Representatives. Where is the justice of your position?

Mr. BRYANT of Milton: I should like to ask the gentleman if he is willing to give these aliens representation and allow them to vote?

Mr. LOMASNEY: I know the gentleman understands that I do not believe in that proposition. I say this: When you make an exception it devolves on you to show your reasons for your exception. The United States law provides that the basis of representation to Congress shall be by population. Why? It is taken from the returns of the United States census enumerators appointed from Washington. Nothing can be done that could be fairer. It is on the basis of population. That is the basis for the election of Congressman in each district of the country. There is no good reason why the State should not adopt the policy of the United States government. Now you are exempting your Representatives and Senators from it. That may be all right for 1853, when narrow-minded men were fearful of the aliens' power. But I say, just as a judge of the Superior Court, when passing on the question of admitting a man to be reinstated at the bar a few years ago said: "Is there to be no forgiveness on this side of the grave?" When will you gentlemen admit that the alien is a true son of this country? In view of what he has done why do you continue to say we must keep the aliens down?

I have seen Bernard J. Rothwell, who came to this country an alien and who is a credit to the State, come before the committee on Ways and Means, representing the manufacturers of Massachusetts, and beg them to give them legislation to create a commission to assist the immigrant, to tell him about our laws, and to inform him of his opportunities. He frankly told the committee it was necessary for the interests of the State. Now, sir, what are you going to do, where are you going to be, unless you recognize and count them as a part of our government? The committee admitted that the alien has been discriminated against for years and you propose to continue that policy. I submit it is wrong; and you know it.
I want to give you honestly and seriously my idea, because I have arrived at an age when I feel that you gentlemen do not know conditions as they really are in these large centers of population. You do not know the struggles of the men and women, fathers and mothers, to bring their children up as God-fearing, law-abiding citizens. And why, when they are working hard to succeed, do you say: "We are afraid of them, we cannot trust them"? I make no reflection upon the men of the American race; we have all the best races in the world here. I stood on a ship going to Europe and talked for this country against our critics from abroad; and I know how much any of them really love us, when you come right down to each particular case. But I submit, sir, when they say this is not the time to do this thing, say that this is the time to prove by your action that you do believe in the rule of democracy. I do not mean to let men have the right to vote or to be represented who cannot comply with our laws.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I understand that the tenor of the delegate's remarks is that if we should include the aliens in our population in apportioning our Representatives they would be a great deal asserter off. They cannot vote; they do not have any more rights; but the simple fact that Boston and some other cities can have from ten to twenty more Representatives in the General Court will increase the happiness of those aliens who cannot take part. Now, I want to ask my friend, if for seventy-two years the nine Southern States did not have a law by which three-fifths of the Negro population was entitled to representation, and never voted, — I want to ask him how much advantage the Negro got out of that law?

Mr. Lomasney: I have no sympathy with any movement to disachise the Negro or deny him his rights as a man. So far as Boston concerned, Haverhill is in a worse condition than Boston, and always as in a worse condition than Boston. If anybody wants to make comparisons and talk of Boston and Haverhill to me, I am prepared to meet him, giving names and dates, if necessary. I submit, sir, that why I took the floor, for I could not sit silent in this Convention and see men trying to laugh this matter out of court. It is too serious matter. Why talk about equal rights and equal opportunities for all, and then deny a large portion of the population those rights? Now, if you are doing that, and you may continue to do it, but I say to this convention, and I say it to you in all seriousness, that if any man goes into a court of equity he must go in with clean hands. You gentlemen cannot face any body of intelligent men, even the professor from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) who spoke here cannot sit down around a table where there is a jury of twelve men and discuss this question, and then say to them: "We will continue to keep this law; it is and hold down the aliens," and say that you are doing justice, especially when you consider what the alien population has done for this State. Do you men here, representing the money interests of the State, realize what sturdy, honest, safe and sane men you had in the Irish immigrant? No demand from them for a lot of these fancy working hours. They stuck to their work, their home, their fireside and their family, and they tried to save from their earnings enough to secure a little home, and their stipend went into the savings bank, and you took the profits of it. They came and put their surplus ages in a savings bank for you to administer, showing their conference in you; and is this the way you would repay them? They went through the battle of life successfully. To-day we want workers outside the war lines just as much as we do soldiers within the war lines. How can you refuse justice to them now except you follow the old traditional reputation that the genuine Yankee had when he was swapping jack-knives and insisted on getting a little the best of the bargain? Upon no consideration of fair play and equity can you refuse to give this matter your support. I should be false to the education I received if I sat silent here and allowed this matter to be used as a football by the delegates of this Convention.
APPORTIONMENT OF MEMBERS OF GENERAL COURT. 181

What does the apportionment amount to? It is the fundamental principle of representation. Why not comply with the United States law in this matter? What are you doing now? You tax aliens. You give them the benefit of the police and fire department, do you not? In my opinion it would affect only the cities that contain a large foreign population. But it would put Massachusetts in such a position that she could not be assailed. In fact, then it could be said that she does not lie when she speaks in her Bill of Rights of equal rights and equal opportunities for all. Submit this question to the people of Massachusetts and you need have no fear of the consequences, because I am one of those who believe in the people of Massachusetts and in their intelligence. It is for narrow partizan purposes that they are discriminated against, and you know it. These aliens do not belong in any one political party, so that party prejudices do not enter into the matter at all. It is a matter of principle that I am contending for. Why not be fair and give them justice, in view of the part they have had in the history of the country, and especially in view of the present war?

When we are discussing other matters it often is pointed out what other States have done. Can every other State be wrong on this question and we be right? Of course not. We are right when we recognize the man, the soul. It is the man and the soul that you will be recognizing in this matter. He cannot vote until he complies with your law, but it is the man with a soul whom you are recognizing; not a piece of paper, not an alien, but a free man ready and willing to fight for the country that he loves; and you know it.

While I have not read this measure very carefully, I could not let the remarks of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. William S. Kinney) pass without reminding you, sir, of the unfair discrimination that has prevailed in this State for years, and protesting against its continuance; because, sir, you will find that in the 1853 Convention, there were many fair men, who defended the aliens of that day and recognized and predicted the successful part they would take in the history of the State. Let me suggest, sir, that under the present conditions, when we are trying to have all elements united, it is no time for us to sneer and try to be smart and say we will defeat this proposition by such unfair arguments. An essential, fundamental principle is at stake, and I trust the report of the committee will be rejected.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I move the previous question. I do so in order that I may not take too much time in calling to the attention of the Convention that the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lomasney), in his most impassioned defence of the alien, and the statement that the alien has made this country, by his eloquence and arguments convinced me, at any rate, that the country has re-made the alien; and until the country has re-made the alien I think it is hardly time for us to invest him with all the rights and privileges of citizenship. We never discriminated against the alien and never will. There is no law that discriminates against him in any way, shape or manner. There is an advantage, however, which he has had during the draft, and has taken advantage of altogether too frequently, to my mind and according to the reports of the drafting boards.

The statement has been made by him and by others that this country is an asylum for the oppressed of all lands. It is the only asylum in the world that is governed or partially governed by its inmates. That is no reflection upon those who come to our shores. But, sir, until this asylum of ours works its cure upon those who arrive each year, until it works a complete change, so that they may accept our institutions and our manner of living, I think they should have no part in the government of the asylum.

We all realize that the trend of immigration has changed; that the alien of to-day is not the picture in our minds of the alien of yesterday, or the alien of the time of the forefathers, or the father of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney). And, sir, if he could go before the draft or exemption boards, and could hear the excuses which are offered, if he could hear the boys standing on the streets making fun of the men in uniform because our boys have to go, and they do not, why, sir, he will agree that the time has come when, rather than make laws to fit these aliens, we had better make the aliens fit the law, and fit for the law.

Let us differentiate between aliens and aliens. Everybody knows the Irish race have made good citizens. Everybody knows that when they once come to our shores they stay here, they do not go back to Ireland, they make good citizens, and their young people make better citizens, because of the teachings and the opportunities given to them in this country. The stock is good, but it takes the opportunity to make it better.

Now, sir, as I started to say, with no reflection upon the men who have come here, who have taken advantage of the opportunities offered, who have become, as I said the other day, professional and business men of this Commonwealth and of this whole country, I think we want to go slow. There are thousands of men to-day in detention camps all over the country interned by our government. Why? Because they were aliens? No; because they were alien enemies, and dangerous men to be left at large in our communities. That is the alien I am talking about, and I assume the other gentlemen were talking about that kind of alien.

Mr. Sullivan of Lawrence: I have not taken the time of the Convention very much on any matter, but I represent a district where a large number of non-voting people live and I had intended to address the Convention on this subject,—not at very great length, however. I feel that I could not do justice to the subject in the time which would be allowed me if the previous question is put. I should not take more than about fifteen minutes at the most, and I am going to ask the gentleman if he will withdraw his motion for the purpose of permitting me to speak at a little greater length than otherwise I would be allowed to.

Mr. UNDERHILL: I dislike to appear discourteous, but after the previous question is moved the gentleman will have five minutes, and I have no doubt the members of the Convention will extend it to ten if he so desires.

Mr. SULLIVAN: The substance of the amendment which the committee has recommended that we reject is that the basis of representation in the General Court shall be population instead of the number of registered voters, as at present. It seems to me, sir, that this subject has been discussed up to this time on a somewhat narrower range than it should have been. It could not be discussed any better from the point of view to which he addressed himself than it has been by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney), but this is not merely a question of representation of aliens. It concerns the representation of other people who are not allowed to vote. As has been said in many discussions upon the question of woman suffrage, it is a difficult matter to determine who shall and who shall not vote. Obviously, all the people for whom the government is established cannot vote. Children cannot vote, and the age at which young men are admitted to the suffrage has been fixed, rather arbitrarily, at twenty-one. Women at the present time, in this Commonwealth at least, have not the right to vote.

Some say these are questions of expediency only. But if expediency only is considered, we may wake up some day to find our democracy gone and our liberty destroyed. They are above all questions of right and justice.

This government is established, not for the benefit of the voter, but for the benefit of all the people; and I am very much surprised that any man, at this stage in the history of this Commonwealth, should deny that representation should be based upon the whole population of the Commonwealth. The basis of representation ought to be the people for whose benefit the government is established, and that means the whole people. That means children, that means women, that means aliens.

I did not intend to add anything to what already has been said about aliens. But the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) has stated that he has seen young men upon the streets laughing at those who have to go to the front while they themselves are secure from the draft because they are aliens. I believe that he has over-drawn the picture. Let me point out to him, on the other hand, that thousands of aliens, who do not have to go, have volunteered for service; so many, in fact, that the naturalization court of the United States for the first time in history adjourned from Boston to a military camp the other day so that the alien volunteers might receive the reward of citizenship for leaving their homes and families and friends to fight for the country of their adoption. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Boston (Mr. William S. Kinney) who represents the committee says it seems surprising that now, of all times, this measure should be urged. Now, of all times, when the whole world is joining in a fight for democracy, should we determine that there should be here in Massachusetts not one vestige of misrepresentation, and that our Legislature should be selected as fairly as possible from the whole people.

It is claimed by the gentleman from Sharon (Mr. Quinn) that his town ought to have a larger representation in proportion to its population than Lawrence, for instance, because Lawrence has many immigrants and its population is shifting. Lawrence has many immigrants, but most of them have come to stay. Its population is not shifting, but it is growing rapidly. It is a city of large families. It is doing far more than its share of the work of the Commonwealth not only in industry but in education and in civic training. It would have a greater representation in the General Court if the resolution now before us were passed, and such additional representation would result in benefit to the whole Commonwealth. Let me say that when the call for troops to fight for our country is heard, we send our quota on the basis of population. If that is a good rule when sacrifices are to be made for the common cause, why should it not apply also to the apportionment of representatives? I hope that the Convention will settle this matter once and for all on a basis of justice by passing this resolution.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: The gentleman from Boston in this division (Mr. Lomasney) made the statement in his speech that Massachusetts, of all the States, alone had a system of apportionment which was not based upon population. I wondered at the time whether this State was quite as lonesome as his assertion implied. I knew that it could not be true altogether of New England. I have only to point out the fact to enable us to recall that in Rhode Island and Connecticut and Vermont and New Hampshire, each town, irrespective of its population, has one Representative. It is true that, broadly speaking, in Maine the apportionment is based upon population, but a population how determined? I will read from the Constitution: “exclusive of foreigners not naturalized and Indians not taxed.”

Now, what is the situation outside of New England? The facts are that very many States apportion their Representatives by counties. That is true especially of the south. The State of Georgia, — I have not had time to go through all these States since the gentleman made his speech, — in the State of Georgia according to the organic law the six largest counties have three Representatives and the twenty-six other counties have two. In South Carolina they are apportioned by counties and each county has at least one Representative. In Louisiana each parish, without regard to its population, has at least one Representative, as has each ward in the city of New Orleans.

And finally in the State of New York, also, the organic law fixes the number of Senators and Representatives by counties, — so many for each county or group of counties. Every ten years the Legislature is required, under the new census, to reapportion the Senate and the Assembly; but there again, in counting the population aliens are excluded by the express provision of the Constitution.

So, after all, Massachusetts does not stand alone in this respect, and in the last analysis it is simply a question of policy which each State must decide for itself.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I have heard nobody here abuse the alien. There has been no attack made upon that class of people in Massachusetts who have failed to become citizens. I am one of those who believe that Massachusetts has been extremely kind to its alien population. Any person coming from any country to Massachusetts has to stay here but five years and he can become a citizen, but an American boy has to stay here twenty-one years before he can become a voter and a citizen. I think if there is anybody slighted, and if there is anybody who is ill treated, it is the American boy, who was born and brought up here in America. I do not think this discussion should have taken quite such a wide range.

We all know what this argument means. There is only one object in view. It is the same object that the southern States had for seventy-two years when they wanted to control this country. They reckoned in the three-fifths representation of the colored race. I do not understand that anybody contended that the slave was any better off simply because he was reckoned into the apportionment and given a representative. I cannot think that any alien who is not a voter in Massachusetts is going to be any better off because he is reckoned as one of those who is part of the population. It seems to me, if the argument is true, as the delegate from Lawrence (Mr. Sullivan) has said, that the more delegates we have the more democratic we are, that we ought to have a Legislature composed of about three thousand members. If we did, why then of course the public would be greatly benefited.

I doubt very much the wisdom of such talk. We all know very well the various States have different ways of the apportionment of members of the General Court. The State of Maryland, one of the most democratic States in the Union, is divided up in such way that Baltimore never can have over one-third of the membership of the Legislature. Almost every State takes into consideration, as has been said by the gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn), that in order to give the widest possible representation it has been deemed wise, on the part of those States, not to have it based entirely upon population, and it seems to me that the Massachusetts idea of having it based upon legal voters is fair and just. We certainly do not want to indorse or adopt into the Constitution of Massachusetts some features that existed in the Federal Constitution for seventy-two years before the civil war. We had our experience then. Our experience will be like that now. It is simply a question of control. To-day we have a better representation in Massachusetts than we should if we had representation based upon population rather than legal voters.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: The town which I represent has a population of 12,000 and has one Representative. The difficulty is that there are three Representatives to the Legislature from a single district, and the Republican majority,— the handsome Republican majority of Saugus,— as in many towns; is used in order to carry in other Republicans.

I fail to have heard anything said about that feature. I fail to see anything here about aliens. I should like to see this amendment to the Constitution go through, and I regret that my friend from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) has killed it by favoring it.

It is not a question of aliens; there is nothing about aliens here. I do not know why the man has dragged in aliens. There are some sinuous purposes burrowing down from old ward 8 and from the purlieus of Boston which do not appear in the debate here. There is nothing in here about aliens. The debate very well might have avoided the question of aliens altogether and continued directly within the lines of the proposition. And why he has dragged aliens in here by the hair of the head, I do not know, except because he is in the habit of drawing them to the polls to vote the way he wants them to. [Laughter.] He has turned this Constitutional Convention into a ward 8 propaganda, — political propaganda. I protest against it, — protest against the whole thing. There is nothing in here about aliens. There is a proposition to change the method of districting, but it does not change it sufficiently, as I understand it. It goes a good way in the right direction. I shall vote for it, although I now consider it as good as dead [laughter], on account of the manner in which it has been used to promote the congressional campaign of one gentleman by a free document printed at the expense of the State.

The resolution was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 117 to 64.

On the following day, Thursday, July 11, Mr. Patrick S. Broderick of Waltham moved that the Convention reconsider its vote whereby the resolution had been rejected.

Mr. Broderick: In explaining the reason for making this motion, I wish to say to the members of this Convention that the gentleman from Newbury in the second division (Mr. Bailey), the author of this resolution, was absent unavoidably from the Convention when it was reached on the calendar yesterday, and on account of important public duties will be absent from the Convention for the remainder of the week. This resolution embodies suggestions of great merit, and it is his earnest desire to be heard in explaining its details.

I anticipate that objection will be interposed to the adoption of this motion because of what has been the rule and practice recently in this Convention in similar matters; but I wish to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that no rule or practice ever yet has been adopted which, if enforced indiscriminately, arbitrarily and without exception, did not work great hardship and great injustice. If the practice which we have been following recently is adhered to in this instance it will work great injustice. I hope that the motion for reconsideration will prevail, in order that the author of the resolution may have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Maguire of Boston: I hope the motion made by the gentleman from Waltham in this division (Mr. Broderick) will be adopted. I hope further that it will have the support of his colleague from Waltham in the first division (Mr. Luce). The gentleman from Waltham in this division (Mr. Broderick) has taken very little of the time of the Convention. He has been here every day, last year and this, and it seems to me his request that this matter be reconsidered should be adopted. I think the other day when this subject was under consideration certain phases of it were neglected. Those who opposed the apportionment of Representatives and Senators based on population intimated that the apportionment of Senators and Representatives on the basis of registered voters was done in a fair manner. The records show anything but that result.

I hold in my hand the annual report of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston for the year 1917. The registered voters of ward 7, which used to be old ward 10, are 4,734 in number.
They have three Representatives. Wards 19 and 20 have three Representatives, but 9,400 registered voters. Ward 22 and ward 23 have 9,500 registered voters and three Representatives.

Now, ward 7, better known as old ward 10, was in a position to dictate,— through the fact that it happened to have the Speakership of the House of Representatives,—that it should have three Representatives on such an unfair basis.

What applies to the city of Boston undoubtedly applies to many cities and towns throughout the State. The evil with reference to the representative districts is just as strong in the matter of the senatorial districts. For instance, East Boston is composed of wards 1 and 2. In making up the senatorial district they took ward 1 and attached to it Winthrop, Chelsea and Revere; and they took ward 2 and tied it to ward 6 and ward 12. The only connection that ward 2 has with ward 6 and ward 12 is by water, and then only beyond the Dover Street bridge. I personally feel that the making of that senatorial district was in violation of the present Constitution. The present Constitution says that senatorial districts shall be contiguous. That means in actual contact, touching; also near, though not in contact; neighboring, adjoining. Ward 2 is just as much in touch with Nahant or Revere or Swampscott, or any of the towns along the North Shore; and, in the language of the gentleman from ward 5 in this division (Mr. Lomasney), perhaps if it were attached to some of those communities it might have what he calls “standing.” Nevertheless the senatorial districts were made on an unfair basis. There is no reason why East Boston should not be together as a unit.

The reason that the gerrymander prevails with reference to the Senate is that the Senate is still the citadel of corporate influence and power. East Boston gave John L. Bates to the Commonwealth through the representative district. It was impossible for her to send him to the State Senate because the State Senate, or influences that control the State Senate, do not desire such an honest, straightforward type in that body.

I hope that the representative and senatorial districts will be considered, and that we may have an amendment to our present Constitution which will compel the Legislature to make a fair and equal apportionment on the basis of the registered voters. At the very least let there be fairness and equality. Because ward 7, that used to be old ward 10, happens to have temporary control of the Legislature, it is not right to the rest of the Commonwealth to permit it to so adjust senatorial and representative districts that it has abnormal power, which is just precisely what it did when the last apportionment was made. This sort of intolerable injustice should be prevented by a constitutional amendment.

East Boston has a right to demand fair play. She has given thousands of her sons to the army and navy to fight for world liberty; she has subscribed more than $1,000,000 to the Third Liberty Loan; she has given $40,000 to the last appeal of the Red Cross; she has bought $31,000 of War Savings Stamps in the month of June; and since the beginning of the war her women have been engaged in every kind of war activity. Surely in the light of all this she should be protected from being the victim of selfish and unscrupulous politicians who temporarily may control the General Court.
Mr. Sawyer of Ware: It is not necessary for this Convention to reconsider this matter in order to give a hearing to the author of the resolution, who is supposed to be absent. Now, this resolution is presented to this Convention by Mr. Bailey of Newbury, and he is unable to be here, and I think we ought to give him an opportunity to be heard, and he can be heard on the question of reconsideration. So I would move that we postpone further consideration of the question of reconsideration until Tuesday next, when Mr. Bailey of Newbury can speak for himself.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The Convention will appreciate the embarrassment of a delegate who feels it incumbent upon him to object to a favor asked by his neighbor and townsman in behalf of another who is a personal friend. Yet, in order that we may decide at least understandingly whether we ought to deviate from the program that has so advanced the work of the Convention as to lead to the hope that we very speedily may complete our labors, it should be explained that to approve these requests will in all probability precipitate a discussion that will cover a day, and possibly two days. The gentlemen who have had occasion to peruse the dry and dreary reports of the proceedings of many other Conventions will have discovered that no topic has aroused so much debate as that of apportionment. Reams on reams of paper have been given to perpetuating the views of delegates, evidently interested in the subject, in large part, by reason of its relations to the personal fortunes of individuals. These apportionment debates, I think, never have contributed to the harmony of Conventions, and apparently have rarely led to any improvement in the situation.

I think we all will admit the evils connected with the present system of apportionment by county commissioners, or by their equivalent in Boston; but to accept a proposal of change might be but to jump out of the frying-pan into the fire. No satisfactory solution of the question has yet been found anywhere in the United States.

If the Convention thinks that the problem is so serious that we should give a day or two to its discussion, then the Convention might very well take up the matter anew. I will call your attention to the fact that fifteen of your members, constituting one of your committees, were unanimously of the belief that it was unwise to invite the Convention to approve the pending resolution. Under those circumstances, and with the greatest reluctance to take a position ungracious toward my friends, I feel it incumbent upon me to advise the Convention not to reopen the question.

The motion to postpone was negatived, by a vote of 38 to 80.

Mr. Broderick: No doubt every member of this Convention is well aware of the fact that the Constitutional Convention of 1853 was called, if not for the specific purpose, chiefly for the purpose of considering the reapportionment of the State. The debate in that Convention on this question occupied a greater length of time than the debate on any other question that engaged the attention of its members. The members of that Convention who participated in that debate were recognized then as among the greatest lawyers and statesmen of the Commonwealth.

The demand for a more just and equitable reapportionment of the representative districts of the State is no less important and urgent now than it was then; and I am surprised, and others here are surprised, that members of this Convention should try to belittle this question, try to have it passed over before it had received the deliberation and the discussion which its importance demands.

One of the principal objections to our representative system as it existed prior to 1853 was the fact that it was based on the town plan of representation. Our present system, in a measure, is based on the town plan of representation, but in even a more objectionable form. Under this system certain cities are set off as single and separate districts and may elect three Representatives to the Legislature, and other cities are set off as single districts and may elect two Representatives, thereby reducing the voting power of the minority voter in such districts far below his voting power in a single representative district. There is no sound objection to an apportionment of the State into 240 single representative districts based on the registered voters of the State. Any other apportionment is so unjust and inequitable that it is indefensible. What is more important or fundamental than an equal and a fair representation of the voters of this Commonwealth in its law-making body?

As a Nation we are in this war, we are sending the best of the manhood of the Nation overseas, and for what purpose? In order that civil and military despotism the world over shall be annihilated, and in order that governments shall rise up on its ruins, founded upon the principle that all men are created free and equal, and that government derives its just power only from the consent of the governed.

Are we sincere in our professions that we are fighting the cause of democracy, going on public platforms night after night so proclaiming, and then coming here to this Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, and opposing an equal representation of our citizens, or are we only bluffing and camouflaging?

I believe that here in Massachusetts and as members of this Constitutional Convention, we should establish a system of representation founded, as our Constitution provides, on the principle of equality; found a government here on the principle that all men are created free and equal, and that all governments derive their just powers only from the consent of the governed.

The motion to reconsider was negatived, by a vote of 54 to 78.
Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport presented the following resolution (No. 262):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 A census of the legal voters of each city and town, on 4 the first day of May, shall be taken and returned into the 5 office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, on or before 6 the last day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty-five,
7 and of every tenth year thereafter, and no other census
8 of the inhabitants shall be taken under the authority of 9 the Commonwealth.

The Committee on State Administration reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

It was considered by the Convention Wednesday, July 24, 1918.

Mr. Nathan P. Avery of Holyoke moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 7 to 9, inclusive, the words "and no other census of the inhabitants shall be taken under the authority of the Commonwealth", and inserting in place thereof the words "which enumeration shall determine the apportionment of Representatives for the period between the taking of the census. The General Court shall have authority to take a census of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth".

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 72 to 26.

The resolution, as amended, was rejected Wednesday, July 24, 1918.

On the following day a motion was made that the Convention reconsider the vote by which the resolution had been rejected; and the motion to reconsider was negatived.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: This resolution was introduced by me. It is not the most important matter to come before this Convention, but it is worthy of consideration. It is a proposal to abolish the taking of the decennial census by the State. When I went before the committee of which the ex-Governor from Fitchburg (Mr. Walsh) was chairman, he immediately told me that I had done a public service by bringing in this resolution and that there was no occasion for me to advocate it before that committee, but that it was for those who were opposed to it to show cause. That committee had that matter all last session and a great part of this session, and with no one appearing against it and with a committee which then declared itself in favor of it now we have an adverse report. I think it is for the committee to show cause why that is. Certainly no one appeared before that committee at the time of the hearing, and if any one appeared afterwards I had not the opportunity to meet "my accusers face to face," and I do not know what they said or what they did to influence the committee to make an unfavorable report.

I apprehend that it may be that the possible prospect of having representation based upon population,—which, by the way, has been effectually disposed of here,—had something to do with the wish to retain this, as I claim, useless decennial census. The United States takes the census of population and of industries, a most elaborate census, on every year ending in ten, and since 1865 the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, almost alone of the important States, has taken a census on the years ending in 5 between the United States censuses,—a census of the inhabitants. The census of 1905 was published finally in 1909 and we did not quit paying the expense of it till 1912. We spent on that census something like $500,000.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman why it is necessary to put his resolution into the Constitution?

Mr. Bartlett: Because there is a requirement in the Constitution that the census shall be taken, and the Legislature has not the right to go against it. Perhaps, as they did in one of the western States, they can refuse to take a census. The courts say that they cannot compel a Legislature. But those who want the job, those who want to partake of the $600,000 that this census of 1915 is likely to cost, lie back upon the Constitutional provision. The special acts brought in in the Legislature previous to taking the census all begin "In accordance with the requirement of the Constitution." We can at least take that requirement out of the Constitution and save the State fifty to sixty thousand dollars a year and justify to that extent the existence of this Convention.

Now, as I was saying, the United States takes a census every ten years of everything imaginable. The volumes of the census of the United States are to be found in the library and if anybody can go in there and look over those volumes and find anything that the United States does not investigate or tabulate in every which way, I should like to know what it is. In addition to that they issue every two years large volumes of statistics of every industry. If one can go in there and see what the United States does the wonder is how anybody can find an excuse for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to do it over again. There were ten years ago some dozen or fifteen States which had this constitutional requirement of a census taken by the State. There were fifteen of them. Eight of those fifteen were the States of North Dakota, Colorado, Washington, Utah, Nevada, South Dakota, Montana and Florida, and the majority of them, I think, base their representation upon population and change it every five years. Therefore they want a census between the United States censuses. The remaining seven are considerable States,—Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Oregon, New York, Maine and Minnesota. But in those States, except the State of New York, the census is a trivial affair compared to what it is in this State. The cost of the census in Iowa, for instance, is $15,000. The cost of the census in South Dakota is $4,000. The cost of the census in Colorado is $25,000.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: Has the gentleman taken into consideration the other dependent features of the Constitution that would have to be changed if his resolution was adopted?

Mr. BARTLETT: I do not know of any that would have to be changed. This leaves the census of legal voters which can be taken by merely a return from the assessors of the cities and towns.

Mr. KINNEY: I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the twenty-second article of the amendments to the Constitution prescribes that the apportionment of Senators shall be based on the State census.

Mr. BARTLETT: All that information can be obtained from the census of the United States. The State of Michigan, the State of South Dakota, the State of Wisconsin and the State of Oregon have abolished the State census within the last ten years. In the State of Oregon it was abolished as an emergency measure "immediately necessary to the preservation of the public peace" under the initiative and referendum. In the State of New York they spent for the census of 1915 $465,000, and the late Constitutional Convention reported in favor of repealing the State census in the State of New York. The work of that Convention was submitted to the people as a whole and rejected as a whole, and that recommendation was not carried out. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts stands almost alone in doing this great and expensive work. I have here the figures of the censuses of 1915 and 1905. The census of 1905 was begun in that year. The last volume was published four years later. It was not until the 1st of January, 1912, that we got the final bill of expense and it cost about $490,000. For the census of 1915, according to the Auditor's report there had been expended up to the year 1916 $306,742, and if it goes upon the like ratio as it did in the previous census this census of 1915 is likely to cost the Commonwealth of Massachusetts $600,000.

Now this started in the Convention of 1853, where is was stated that a census of the people could be taken practically for nothing, that the work could be done by the assessors and that they would get no extra pay and they might as well do it. It was adopted in 1857 and we have taken a decennial census in 1865, 1875, and so on, beginning with $150,000 expense, and we are now up to four times that amount.

I presume that the ex-Governor, the chairman of the committee, who favored this matter, had wanted at some time in his career to do away with this matter and that the Constitutional provision stood in his way. It seems to me that it is practically a useless thing, particularly to carry a requirement in the Constitution that this census shall be taken, when we have at the very time a census of the United States taken five years before. My resolution provides that a census of the legal voters shall be taken and that a census of the inhabitants shall not be taken. A census of the legal voters is taken very easily. It need not cost anything hardly and it can be taken by returns from the assessors or the registrars of voters, as we base representation upon the legal voters. As to the figures of population being necessary, the figures of the census of the United States can be used. If it is necessary to amend the Constitution in any other particular in order to confirm this it can be done readily. But there is much to be said in favor of this proposition and I have not heard in the committee or anywhere else any argument against it except from those whose craft is in danger. I trust that the resolution may be substituted for the report of the committee.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I am sorry that I have to disagree with my friend from Newburyport when he makes the statement here that the ex-Governor was in favor of this resolution. I want to say that the ex-Governor presided over this meeting and the committee were unanimous in reporting against this measure.

Mr. Bartlett: Am I right in saying that the ex-Governor told me that I had done a public service in bringing in this resolution?

Mr. Mahoney: I cannot say, because I did not hear the conversation. But the question of the legal features the gentleman wants to eliminate from the Constitution,—of course you must know that you have got to take the census of the State for the purpose of getting legal voters. Of course you know that in this State we have at the present time about 775,000 legal voters. Of that number we have about 675,000 who are registered voters and we have about 575,000 who vote. So you can see what it is to get the legal voters. And not only that, but this goes into the matter a good deal deeper than that, because it gives the number of the native and foreign born, male and female, in this Commonwealth, also race and color, and classifies the population as male and female, married and single, and also the illiterate, natives and foreign born, and the different occupations of the State. Also it must determine by the census of legal voters the apportionment of the Representatives in the General Court and Senators.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke moved that the resolution be amended by substituting for the article of amendment the following:

A census of the legal voters of each city and town on the first day of May shall be returned to the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth on or before the first day of June, 1925, and of every tenth year thereafter, which enumeration shall determine the apportionment of Representatives for the period between the taking of the census. The General Court shall have authority to take a census of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: The gentleman from Newburyport (Mr. Bartlett) would like to do away with the census and have it merely of the legal voters. Now this question of a legal voter is a great question in this Commonwealth which many people do not understand. A legal voter is a man who is qualified to vote, whether he does or not. We have in this State 775,000 legal voters. We have also about 657,000 registered voters and we have about 557,000 who vote. You can see by that that there are about 218,000 legal voters who do not vote and about 100,000 registered voters who do not vote. If you want to get the legal voters the census must be taken by the population, and by the population we get the legal voters, and then we have got to find out whether they are native born or foreign born and also whether male or female and the race and color, and then also classify them in male and female and married and single. Now this is the work that is done by the Bureau of Statistics, and they have to find out also in this State how many illiterates there are and native born and foreign born, and then the different occupations.
Now that is a great question that people are all the time going to the Bureau of Statistics for, to ascertain the number of persons in various occupations. And then, as you know, the ascertaining of the number of legal voters, as I said before recess, is merely for the purpose of determining the apportionment of the 240 members of the House of Representatives and the 40 Senators, who are apportioned according to the number of legal voters. As you know, in this State we have assessed polls to the number of about 1,067,000, or almost 292,000 more than the number of legal voters. The gentleman from Newburyport spoke of the amount of money that the taking of the census cost. Well, when the census was taken in 1905 the population was 3,003,680. The population by the census of 1915 was 3,693,310, a gain of 689,630. Now in 1905 it cost a little over $500,000, and as you notice, the Legislature of 1914, which passed the act providing for the census of 1915, appropriated $400,000, and the chief of the Bureau of Statistics has told me that they lived within the $400,000, a saving of almost $200,000, and still the population has gained about 20 per cent.

As you all know, the taking of the State census was provided for in the amendment of the Constitution adopted in 1857 and the first census was taken in that year and the next in 1865, and after that it was every ten years. Now it has been the opinion of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics that it would be too long to wait for the United States to give the census returns, so they alternate in this way: In 1915, as you know, the State took this census; in 1920 the United States takes it and in 1925 it comes back to the State again. This whole matter of appropriation is left to the Legislature and I cannot see any reason why we should abolish this great work,—because it is a great work, it is a great source of information to the people of this Commonwealth, and I hope and trust that the report of the committee will be accepted.

I want to say for the gentleman from Newburyport that he was the only person who appeared in favor of abolishing the State census, and I hope and trust that this important matter will be left as it came from the committee. I want to say also that the census has given great assistance to the committees in charge of the Liberty Bond sales and the Red Cross funds. They have come up to get information as to the foreign born and the gentleman in charge of the Bureau said it was a source of great information for them. And I hope at this time during the war troubles that we will not in any way disturb this matter.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I can agree to a great extent with the member who has just spoken, also with the member from Newburyport. You have your United States census, at every period it is taken, becoming more scientific and more exact. Our present State Constitution makes it obligatory that we take a census not only of our legal voters but also of our inhabitants. The amendment which I propose says that we shall take a census of the legal voters and that the Legislature shall have authority to take a census of the inhabitants. If the Legislature has authority can we not trust the good sense of the Legislature in this matter? If there comes a time when it seems a needless waste of money the Legislature can stop taking a census of the inhabitants of this Commonwealth. Now we are going to spend anywhere in the neighborhood of half a million dollars when we take this census. The time may come when that will be absolutely unnecessary. The present Constitution makes it obligatory. The amendment which I propose leaves it to the good sense and the good judgment of the Legislature.

Mr. CURRISS of Hingham: When this matter came before our committee the members of the committee made careful inquiry as to authority and as to results, and after that inquiry the committee was unanimously convinced that there were times when it was necessary to have a special census of one or more of the industries of Massachusetts from a Massachusetts standpoint; that it was unwise for us to limit any census to the inhabitants and the inhabitants only; that the matter stood well where it was. The control of the matter, so far as the expense is concerned, is now in the hands of the Legislature, and it depends largely upon the appropriation and direction of the Legislature as to what the census shall be and the scope of that census. It is true that the United States government does take every ten years an elaborate census, but it is true also that it is from the standpoint of the United States. No matter how complete it may be, that census does not throw upon the returns of the particular point under investigation the light from the angle that we especially want. Massachusetts wishes to know about the manufacturers, the accidents or the various forms of activity from a Massachusetts standpoint, and for that reason the committee reports as it does that it is unnecessary to make any change in the present situation.

Mr. LOWELL of Newton: It seems to me that if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Holyoke we shall put this matter in the place where it ought to be. It seems to me entirely unnecessary and improper to have a requirement in the Constitution that a census shall or shall not be taken. If we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Holyoke it leaves it that a census need not necessarily be taken but that it may be taken. As it stands now, one must be taken each half-way period between the United States censuses which are taken. I personally do not believe that the State is getting the value of the money which is being spent for this census. There is no question that it gets some value out of it and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Hingham that certain lines of inquiry as to the industries, we will say paper making or boot and shoe making or cotton weaving or anything of that kind,—such things as that are very valuable, but the amendment will leave it entirely within the control of the Legislature without requiring a census to be taken at a stated period whether at that period it is necessary to know the facts and statistics of certain branches of labor or not. As I understand it, the principal value of the Bureau of Statistics is not in the taking of this Massachusetts census, but it is in the statistics which have been compiled. Now it seems to me that the value of those statistics—and they are valuable, as all of us know by personal experience—will be kept up just as much if we do away with the absolute requirement that at each stated period the census must be taken, and leave it merely that the Legislature may determine at what time and of what scope the census should be. So that it seems to me that we have here a very good chance of saving a very large sum of money and I cannot see what harm would be done by taking out of our Constitution the absolute requirement that on certain fixed occasions a census should be taken.

Mr. Bartlett: I want to say that all I have undertaken to do is to take out the absolute requirement.

The census is taken in New Jersey and in Rhode Island under statutory authority and I do not think there is any objection to that, although the censuses in those States are nothing like the elaborate things we have in this State. This resolution which I introduced was drawn up in the office of the commissioners on information. It is possible that what they put in there (I did not see it until after it was in; I had it sent in here), —"that no other census of the inhabitants shall be taken", — that that reflected the sense of their office. But if the provision is taken out of the Constitution that a census is required I am content and therefore shall be pleased to accept the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Holyoke.

The amendment moved by Mr. Avery of Holyoke was adopted.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: If I understood correctly the gentleman from Hingham in the rear of the second division (Mr. Curtiss) he gave the Convention to understand that what the friends of this resolution desire is now practicable under the Constitution, and that this amendment will accomplish nothing. If that be the case, may I ask the gentlemen of the Convention to reflect as to the desirability of adding to the long list of proposals we are likely to put before the people next November, an immaterial and inconsequential proposition? There may be slight argument for or against this change, but may I call your attention to the fact that every proposal added to this list endangers all the others? The more you perplex the people, the more issues you inject into the discussion, the less likelihood that any of our work will be accepted. Therefore, sir, unless there is some tangible, definite, positive, specific, considerable reason for changing the Constitution, is it desirable to proceed in this manner? Here a committee has reported unanimously that this change is not needed. One of its members gives us to understand that it will accomplish nothing. Why should we further disturb the electorate in the fall by putting this upon the ballot?

Mr. Dean of Fall River: I rise for information. As I understand the law now, we are leaving the General Court to decide when and if it is advisable to take this census, and by doing that, and not making an arbitrary provision for the taking of a census at certain stated times, a work which already is done by the National government, we are saving money for the Commonwealth in a very considerable amount, — it was stated, I believe, half a million dollars.

Mr. Luce: Simply that the question may bring out the facts in the case, may I ask the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Dean) if he understands that a census of legal voters can be taken without material expense. In other words, why would that amount be gained? Suppose the census man goes round to inquire if Jones is a legal voter and is delivered from asking him if he is also an inhabitant; or inquiring if he is an inhabitant, from asking him if he is also a legal voter? In other words, how would there be any material saving in expense if the thing obtain as he suggested?

Mr. Dean: I will agree that there is very little saving in taking a census of legal voters. I am not in favor of taking a census of legal voters, that is, I mean that alone, and narrowing it to that. What I believe is that the whole matter ought to be left in the hands of the General Court, and when through the adoption of a new method of apportioning your vote, or something of that kind, that situation arises, then the General Court will order that a census be taken, and you will find out what the status of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth is for the purpose of determining how you shall apportion your vote. But it seems to me that to arbitrarily fix in your Constitution that a census shall be taken every ten years or any other stated time is wrong. The whole matter ought to be left in the hands of the General Court.

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I do not believe that my good friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has quite grasped the question. The census of legal voters can be taken by the assessors of each city or town at no expense to the Commonwealth. The census of the inhabitants would cost half a million dollars every ten years.

Mr. Luce: Does the gentleman from Holyoke contemplate that in such a serious matter as the apportionment of Representatives the State would submit to allow the city or town to report, without checking or investigating, as to the number of legal voters it contained? Does he think that in census taking throughout the Commonwealth, with the quarrels, the disputes, the accusations, the charges made by different people seeking to obtain representation, however much we might admire and trust the good people of Holyoke, Waltham, Chicopee, or any other place, does he think that the people would accept the census reported by the assessors of Holyoke, for instance, without any State inquiry?

Mr. Avery: The State already entrusts local authorities with the registration of voters, and any census would but canvass the registered lists, and they are under the control of the local authorities. When you investigate those lists you investigate the authority and the integrity of every board of registrars in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I still repeat that the Commonwealth can take a census of the legal voters at a minimum expense, and that a census of the inhabitants is an entirely different thing. This is not an inconsequential matter. I am glad that the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has at last awakened to the fact that there should not be too many matters put upon the ballot next fall. He has introduced just a few himself. Now, here is something where you save the State half a million dollars in the next ten years, and it can hardly and justly be called an inconsequential matter.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: The entire matter relating to the census of the Commonwealth is in the 21st and 22nd amendments, and they now read:

"A census of the legal voters of each city and town, on the first day of May, shall be taken", etc., "and a census of the inhabitants of each city and town, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, and of every tenth year thereafter."

Now, that is substantially the first part of the amendment that is suggested here. The resolution as it came before our committee provided that no other census of the inhabitants should be taken under the authority of the Commonwealth. That prohibition is not proposed now, as I understand the amendment.
Mr. Avery: The General Court has authority to take any kind of a census.

Mr. Bosworth: In the amendment of the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) that part of the original proposition is stricken out. At the present time the matter rests practically entirely in the hands of the Legislature. A census of the inhabitants of this State or of the legal voters could be taken, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery) by simply certified copies, probably, of the reports of the local authorities if they contain the information necessary. Half a million dollars is not spent at a dollar apiece in counting 500,000 legal voters, or at fifty cents apiece for twice that number. It is spent in obtaining a lot of other information about which the Constitution says nothing. For that reason, the committee, not believing that any action of this kind was necessary, recommended that this suggestion should not be adopted by the Convention. The matter at the present time rests entirely in the hands of the Legislature, except for one thing. The Representatives and Senators must be apportioned according to a census taken every fifth year of the decade. That is all that the Constitution requires. It is something that must be there in some form, because you have got to have a basis of legal voters from which to start everything else. The $500,000 that is spoken of is purely extraneous. So far as the Constitution is concerned it might be entirely possible, if the Legislature wished it, to save much of this money and get a lawful census by simply taking certified copies of what might appear in the records of the cities and towns, or, if not, the Legislature merely would have to appropriate the money that would be necessary to do that particular counting, and nothing else. That is the reason that your committee reported against this matter, and it does not seem to us that the suggestion made here either adds anything to the Constitution or subtracts anything of particular value from it.

Mr. Curtiss of Hingham: As has just been stated by the last speaker, the entire matter of the census to-day is covered in amendments 21 and 22 of the present Constitution. The amendment suggested by the gentleman in this division sitting in front of me (Mr. Avery) strengthens the position for the taking of the census as it has been done in the past. I understand that he and others wish that there should be less of that work done. To-day the amendments state that there shall be a census of the voters, and also under some certain conditions a census of the inhabitants. There is nothing more in the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution to-day which makes it obligatory to take a census of the number of accidents, the condition as to married life, divorce, color, race, place of birth, matters of that kind. All this has grown out of acts of the Legislature. The Legislature has it absolutely in its control to-day as to how far the census shall go, and it has grown year by year under demands of one organization or body of people interested in certain phases of social life. If we put into the Constitution that the Legislature in addition may take certain censuses it will feel that it is obligatory to do so. It is not as obligatory to-day, as it would be with the amendment that has been suggested by the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery).

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: In taking a census of legal voters
I do not know how they arrive at that enumeration, but no act of the Legislature clothes the Bureau of Statistics with the judicial power of determining whether a man is a legal voter or not. That is determined now by the local authorities. The assessors are officers of the Commonwealth, according to the Supreme Judicial Court. That enumeration can be secured through the assessors.

The gentleman who spoke previously said that according to his understanding the Legislature is not obliged to take the census of the inhabitants. It is. These amendments, — the 21st and 22nd amendments, — begin like this: “A census of the legal voters of each city and town on the first day of May shall be taken and returned into the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, in the year 1865 and every tenth year thereafter.” Then they go on to say that the representation of the House and of the Senate shall be based upon the legal voters. There is no use at all in requiring in the Constitution that there shall be any census of the inhabitants.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I should like to know from some member of this Convention how you are going to determine the legal voters of your cities and towns. When you have your assessors go around they take merely the names; they do not ask the question whether that man is qualified to be a legal voter or not, and the only way that we can get this information is through the census. There is the question that has to be determined. You gentlemen no doubt have had connections in cities and towns, and you know how the assessors do their work. Now, this is a matter purely for the population, to determine the legal voters. As Mr. — (I do not care about mentioning the gentleman’s name, but of the Bureau of Statistics) has said, it would be a great mistake to defeat this measure. That is Mr. Gettemy. If any gentlemen of this Convention want to find out about this matter, why I should like to have you see him. I think myself it is a question that we should not trouble with. How are you going to proportion your Senators and Representatives if not by legal voters? If you are going to take them from the figures of the cities and towns how long would you have to wait for the returns if you did not have some mandatory law to make them do it? That is a question that you want to look into, and I hope and trust that you will, because here is a committee comprised of men who have had life service in regard to assessing and one thing and another and they would like to see this report accepted.

The resolution, as amended, was rejected Wednesday, July 24, 1918.

On the following day Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport moved that the Convention reconsider the vote by which it had rejected the resolution.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: With all deference to the desire for the accelerating of business, I move to reconsider the vote of yesterday whereby the Convention voted to reject the proposal as to the Decennial Census as amended by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Holyoke (Mr. Avery).

I cannot be accused of taking unnecessary time in this Convention. What I have had to say has been altogether too briefly expressed. I make this motion to reconsider because the vote yesterday was such that I am told all around that if a count had been had the result might have been different; also because I believe the delegates voted under a misapprehension of what they were voting upon. I read in a leading paper:

After voting to leave the State census in the Legislature's hands the delegates completed their trip through the calendar.

That is just what the Convention did not vote to do, to leave it in the Legislature's hands. The exact proposition that was before this Convention after the amendment of the gentleman from Holyoke had been adopted was whether or not we should continue in the Constitution the mandatory requirement that a census of the inhabitants should be taken every ten years whether that is wise or otherwise. The question was: Shall we continue in the Constitution to compel a census of the inhabitants with the accompanying expense to be taken every ten years, or shall we leave it to the Legislature? That was the proposition before us. It was not in respect to that proposition that the director of the census said it was a mistake, for he could not know that that proposition was up until it was made. This requirement as to the taking of a census never ought to have been in the Constitution, in the first place. No other State in the Union does anything like what we do in this respect. To leave it to the Legislature to say whether a census of the inhabitants shall be taken or not, I submit, is the proper thing to do. The issue is squarely up to this Convention. Is it going to say to the people: "We have ordered a census to be taken every ten years regardless of the expense, whether the Legislature think it right or not, whether it is wise or otherwise", — and that for a generation, perhaps till 2016? I submit that here is the only opportunity on the vote upon this matter, to place the thing right and to put it where it ought to be, in the control of the Legislature to say when and where the census shall be taken.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: I confess to having a great deal of sympathy with the position of the member from Newburyport, and I have yet to hear any reason why this matter of taking the census should be a constitutional provision. It seems to me that no illumination was given the Convention when this matter was under debate yesterday on that point. Why should not the matter be left in the hands of the Legislature? Why is it necessary that there should be a provision in our Constitution that regardless of the expense and regardless of the necessity, there should be a census taken every ten years? Why is it not all right to leave it in the hands of the Legislature? Why should this be a constitutional provision? Why is not the position taken by the gentleman from Newburyport sound and worthy of attention?

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I do not want to interfere in this matter. But if the gentleman will read the Manual, page 80, he will find there that the last words of the paragraph are:

The enumeration aforesaid shall determine the apportionment of Representatives for the periods between the taking of the census.

There is one reason clearly stated in the Constitution.

Mr. Bartlett: If the gentleman will read that he will see that "the enumeration aforesaid" is not the enumeration we are referring to. "The enumeration aforesaid" is the enumeration of legal voters.

Mr. Lomasney: I do not care about this question. But it seems to me that you have to use machinery to do work. I know that the taking of the polls on the first day of April is an entirely different matter than determining who the legal voters are. All you demand then is: "Give me the names of all persons who resided here on the first day of April, together with their age and residence a year ago." Under this amendment different questions are asked, so as to determine the qualifications of the resident. In substance there is asked: "Has the party who lives here the legal qualifications of a voter?" I submit, sir, that there is a great deal of difference between a man's possessing the legal qualifications of a voter and a man who is a registered voter, because many men have the legal qualifications of a voter who do not register, and those are the ones who are counted in making up your representative districts. Such a man possesses the legal qualifications whether he registers or not.
That is the distinction that I make. And you have to inquire also into other matters. I hope this resolution will not be reconsidered.

Mr. Bartlett: I do not want to take up time. The gentleman is way off the issue. We are providing in this amendment that a census of the legal voters shall be taken. We are providing that a census of the inhabitants need not be taken unless the Legislature says so.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman how he could get the legal voters in the way he said.

Mr. Bartlett: I would get the legal voters through the local authorities. As it is done now it is done in a way which the people do not know and in a way which I do not believe any Legislature ever intended should be done. The Bureau of Statistics send their men and they take down the questions and the clerks in the office determine who are voters. The census required by the Constitution to be taken can be taken by the election authorities and taken as it should be by sworn officers of the State as the assessors are, and taken as it should be by a board having judicial powers at very little cost. This amendment provides that a census of the legal voters shall be taken. The machinery of it is left to the Legislature and that can be changed, but it prevents a census of the inhabitants unless the Legislature sees fit to authorize it. There is where the great expense comes, right in there, your $50,000 a year. It was that that the Governor wanted to do away with; it was that which the Census Bureau stood up and begged might be taken, saying that they would keep themselves down to $400,000, and they are trying to do it. And it is that which we do not want taken unless the Legislature says it shall be. The Legislature has no control over it while it is provided in the Constitution that it shall be taken.

Mr. Lomasney: I hold no brief for Mr. Gettemey, yet it must be admitted that he gathers the State's statistics well and further he is an honest man. He gave a lot of time to the work of the office; he has increased the importance of it; he went beyond any other man in that office in trying to bring it up to the highest standard of efficiency and, what is more, he can be trusted. I hold no brief for the gentleman, but I am surprised that some of the members here who know him better than I should have allowed this debate to go on thus far without saying something in his favor.

The motion to reconsider was negatived.
XXV.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. Charles H. Morrill of Haverhill presented the following resolution (No. 180):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The House of Representatives shall provide that any or all of its members shall be nominated, or elected, either by districts or from the Commonwealth at large, or in some other manner, so that the members thereof shall reflect as fully as possible the political, governmental and industrial opinions of all electors or voters, and except as hereinafter provided, the membership shall consist of two hundred and forty. Each political party, or other organization within the body politic or a requisite number of independent voters or a candidate or candidates whose name or names are not contained in a group, as herein specified, shall at each session of the House of Representatives be represented therein, as equally as may be, in the exact proportion that the combined number of votes cast for Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of the Commonwealth, Treasurer and Receiver-General, Auditor and Attorney-General, bearing his, their or its designation at the last general State election next preceding the assembling of any session of the House, bears to the combined total number of votes cast for all the candidates for the said offices at the aforesaid election.

For the purpose of securing equitable and proportional representation as herein provided, the Commonwealth may be redistricted, in whole or in part, or the basis of representation for nomination or election may be established, changed or cancelled at any time; but when so established, changed or cancelled at any period, other than that specified in article twenty-one of the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the Commonwealth, the number of legal voters in the Commonwealth, or in any subdivision thereof, shall be considered to be that shown at the last preceding decennial census taken as provided for in said article twenty-one, together with a per centum added thereto for each year or major fraction of a year which may have elapsed since the said enumeration, which annual per centum shall be one-tenth of the decennial increase shown by such enumeration, and a like tenth additional shall be added thereto in lieu of the real growth of the remaining portion of the calendar year then current. And in allotting the representation,—where election is determined otherwise than by districts,—a residue of a major fraction of the basis of representation, cast for each party, or group, or candidate whose name is not contained in a group, shall be given representation; after which the minor fractions cast for each party, group or candidate whose name is not contained in a group shall be combined into one total for the whole Commonwealth, and if such total equals or exceeds fifty per centum of the basis of representation an additional member shall be given to the party or group or candidate whose name is not contained in a group receiving the larger of the said minor fractions; and the House membership may, if necessary, be increased in number for such purposes to the end that, as nearly as may be, each and every qualified elector or voter shall be equally represented.

The name of any qualified elector or voter shall be placed upon the ballot by the Secretary of the Commonwealth as a candidate in whose behalf a primary or caucus certificate of nomination or a nomination paper containing such number of certified signatures of qualified voters, not less than fifty or more than one hundred as the General Court may by law prescribe, shall have been duly filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth. In case the General Court shall fail to prescribe any number for said purpose fifty such signatures shall suffice.

All the provisions of the existing Constitution inconsistent with the provisions herein contained are hereby annulled.
The committee on The General Court reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.
It was rejected without debate Wednesday, July 10, 1918, and on the following day Mr. Morrill of Haverhill moved that this vote be reconsidered.
The motion to reconsider was negatived Thursday, July 11.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I move that the Convention reconsider the vote whereby on yesterday it accepted the adverse report on No. 208 on the calendar. Although the adverse reports on two or three of the five resolutions which I introduced were accepted, owing to delay in train service and so on, I did not make any attempt at reconsideration. I regard this matter as the most important one dealing with our political system that is before the Convention, but yesterday I was detained through a mishap on the railroad and was therefore five or ten minutes late in arriving. I appreciate that the Convention in these closing days is moving fast, and, in any event, the resolution was disposed of when I reached the Convention chamber. It is only because my tardiness was in no way due to remissness on my part that I ask for reconsideration.

Former Governor David I. Walsh, who is a delegate to this Convention, recommended to the Legislature, with all the authority that comes to a man from the office of the State's chief executive, that unanimous constituency representation,—known also as proportional or true representation,—be adopted. He is now, unfortunately, under the care of his physician and has been compelled, because of ill health, to go away for a time. He, in consequence, was unable to take the floor for the resolution yesterday, a fact which, quite aside from my deep regard for him as a man and a leader, I deplore, since it removed from the list of this resolution's advocates a most worthy champion. George W. Coleman, another delegate in this Convention, who also strongly favors this resolution, is away upon leave of absence to engage in war work for the government in Washington. Several others interested in it were absent for various reasons. So I make no apology for asking the Convention to reconsider its vote of yesterday.

This morning in my remarks relative to "Compulsory Voting,"—and I consider this to be the logical alternative to compulsory voting,—I quoted the vote cast in Massachusetts for President in 1912. Some may explain the result shown by these figures by saying that the Progressive party in that year split the Republicans and sapped that party's strength. The outstanding fact is, however, that the Republicans, although the third party in voting strength, elected 38 more members to the Legislature than all other parties combined. It was not an accident applicable to that one year alone either; so, to disabuse the minds of those who hold to any such belief, I will quote the returns for 1915 for the State ticket. Conditions by that time had slipped back again to their previous status and the reactionary trend was expressed then in slogans like "Never mind the people," an attitude more aptly even if less cautiously phrased when Vanderbilt said: "The people be damned." Taking the vote in 1915, not for Governor alone, but the average vote for the State ticket, six officers, Governor to Attorney-General, inclusive,—because I do not think the vote for Governor is a fair criterion of party strength; there is too much of a personal element involved,—the vote was as follows: Republican 254,220, entitling them, on a basis of equality, to 126 Representatives in the House. They obtained, however, 168. Democrats 197,309, entitling that party to 98; whereas they obtained only 71. Prohibitionists, 13,546, entitling them to 7 Representatives, but they obtained none. Socialists, 10,689, entitling them to 5, and they by accident elected one,—myself. Progressives, 5,937, entitling them to 3, and they obtained none. Socialist Labor Party, 3,449, entitling them to 1, and they, too, were left without representation or voice in the Legislature.

All voters in Massachusetts not Democrats or Republicans thus were deprived of representation, with the single exception I have noted, whereas each and every party should have had from one man upward. Disfranchisement in the representative assembly of 33,626 citizens,—it was nothing else! And if we add thereto the 54,000 odd Democrats insufficiently represented (71 instead of 98 members), the total disfranchised was approximately 88,000. This was brought about primarily through the practice of taking "legal voters" as a basis of representation rather than the party voters; in other words, theoretically basing representation,—providing the inevitable evil of gerrymandering does not enter in,—on the geography rather than on the principles of government held by those who are to be represented. Those who believe in proportional representation, in contrast, advocate that it is principles of government, it is people of a like mind joining together in a common cause for its expression, which should determine the extent of representation. If, as that year, there were 485,150 votes cast with 240 Representatives to be elected, those 485,000-odd votes cast should be divided by number of members to be chosen with one added to care for fractions, and a just system of representation will result. The basis in that case would be 2,000 votes, and any party casting that number in the State that year would secure one Representative and one more for each 2,000 after the first. A party casting 100,000 votes would by this system have 50 Representatives in the Legislature. Ashtabula, Ohio, and Kalamazoo, Michigan, now determine representation in their city councils by this method. Bowlder, Colorado, has adopted a method differing in some respects, but for purposes of discussion so nearly like it as to be identical.

Mr. Tatman of Worcester: The gentleman has stated properly that the real issue involved here is the question of the representation in the Legislature of political parties, or the representation of small political subdivisions; that is to say, territorial representation, representation of cities and towns. The scheme of proportional representation relies upon direct representation of political parties; and if the members of the Convention have reached that state of mind where they wish political parties to be represented in the Legislature, and not cities and towns, then they should vote for a similar resolution to that proposed by the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill). The doctrine of the so-called proportional representation to my mind would mean disproportional representation or perhaps proportional misrepresentation, because it would not provide for the representation of cities or the wards of cities or of towns. As I understand it, as elaborated in another resolution, slightly different but on the same principle as that introduced by the member from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill), it would proportion in the division of the State into a small number of districts, such as, for example, the congressional districts, which I think are mentioned specifically in one of those resolutions, and the candidates voted for by the citizens of a particular congressional district would come from anywhere in that congressional district. All the voters in the congressional district would vote for a certain number; for example, if there were fifteen to be elected they might be allowed to vote for three, and then those voting for the candidates of certain political parties would have their votes counted as voting for those parties. The consequence of that would be that the great centers of population naturally would elect the candidates who came from those centers. A very good example of that perhaps would be in the fourth congressional district, which I represent in part, where the city of Worcester has more than twice the number of voters that the fifteen or sixteen towns which also lie in that district have. It would be the most natural thing in the world for the citizens of Worcester to appropriate all the Representatives for that congressional district. And so it would work throughout the State. The great centers of population would elect the candidates to the Legislature to the exclusion of all the small towns. The theory of our government as it always has existed has been representation of the small as well as the large places, not only that they may be represented, but that the Commonwealth may have the advantage of the point of view of those who come from the small as well as from the large communities. This measure would result in the disintegration of the present political parties and in the springing up of perhaps ten or a dozen or fifteen or twenty parties, each with its own little, narrow platform, each a party with a specific hobby, and would tend to log-rolling in the Legislature, without any kind of responsibility such as now exists. As it is now, we have grown to be a country and a Commonwealth governed by parties, parties having responsibility; and if a party has failed to meet the responsibilities which have been put upon it, the people have the right to put that party out of power, which they do. The adoption of this measure would result in a division of responsibility, where you could not put your finger upon any one who was responsible for any measure which had been arranged by the log-rolling and wire-pulling in the Legislature among the various little parties.

Mr. Morrill: The possible evils the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Tatman) cites as attendant upon proportional representation are those of the present system, and, in part at least, furnish the demand that a better one be substituted for it.

Take, for instance, the Senator from the Fourth Essex district. Haverhill, having slightly more than half the number of legal voters in the district, for more than a dozen years has elected the Senator, — and it bids fair to elect him in 1918 if the press reports from Haverhill be true. The surrounding towns, every one of them, have been shut out from representation in the Senate, — a matter of 15 years, if I am not mistaken. Amesbury, on the last occasion a Senator not a resident of Haverhill represented the district, was given the office only because a combination of circumstances rendered possible a coalition with the Haverhill machine. I use the verb “was given” advisedly, gentlemen, for that exactly describes the situation; only by gift can a resident of any town in the district secure the Senatorship.
Other instances of the same kind might be cited from various sections of the State to illustrate the point. But that is only a minor evil. This shutting out of small communities from representation in one branch or another of the Legislature is important only because it is so unjust.

Among the men who favor proportional representation may be instanced Charles Sumner Bird, late candidate for Governor as a Progressive; Moorfield Storey, a former president of the American Bar Association; Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College and a publicist of world-wide fame. Others of equal or greater note might be named and the list would include Earl Grey, late Governor-General of Canada, who had a very large part in inducing both Canada and England to adopt proportional representation.

Two city charters petitioned for in the Massachusetts Legislature in 1915, both of them from Springfield, contained provisions for proportional representation in the city council when introduced. The Legislature, however, struck from each that section, whereupon the Springfield voters rejected both, — whether or not because of the omission, I am unable to say, but certain it is that neither was so popular with its projectors after that had been done as it was before.

I already have quoted the vote for President in 1912. You may be interested to know how proportional representation would have affected the Legislature that year if the average vote for the State ticket had determined the relative strength of the political parties. The Democrats, for instance, would have had 92 Representatives in the House; they had 94. The Republicans would have had 86 Representatives; they had 139. The Progressives would have had 52 Representatives; they had 5. One man, one vote, — or, in other words, if each man who voted had been really, or equally represented, — would have given 52 Representatives to the Progressives in 1913. The Socialists, who had only one, would have had seven. The Prohibitionists, who had none, would have had two. The Socialist Labor, which had none, would have had one. Cannot you see that when the government is the people in a condensed form, as it would be under proportional representation, all parties, — competing against each other, — would be forced to do their best, and progressive legislation and good legislation would be the natural consequence? I think I am justified in saying that this is the most important proposition before the Convention. It seeks to place the government in the hands of the whole electorate. With the initiative and referendum and recall, and a single chamber body, with the resultant fixed responsibility, we should have a real republic.

Proportional representation is in successful operation in Belgium, or was before the Germans overran that unhappy land. In Finland it was a fact before the Prussian Kaiser destroyed all government there. In Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, the Union of South Africa, Tasmania, parts of imperialistic Germany, and elsewhere about the world the system prevails. The home rule bill for Ireland, which now is suspended by the British Parliament until after the war, contains a provision that the Senate and the House shall be elected on a basis of proportional representation, and the provision relative to the Irish Senate was approved unanimously by the English House of Commons; that relative to the Irish House was approved by a vote of 311 to 81.
in the same body. The Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform, so called, although composed of influential men of all parties, unanimously recommended proportional representation for the English House of Commons in districts electing more than three members. The Vice-President of the Belgian Senate testifies: "In Belgium there is now no political group of any importance which would dream of proposing to suppress or even to curtail the application of the proportional system." Sir John McCall, Agent General for Tasmania, thus testifies: "We have demonstrated the ease with which the system can be worked. It has come to stay." And all along the line from every country where it is in vogue similar testimony could be offered. It has rendered legislation more stable and has softened racial, religious, and sectional differences everywhere it has been adopted.

The Convention refused to reconsider the rejection of the resolution.
XXVI.

NEGATIVE OF SENATE ON HOUSE.

The first paragraph of Article I, Section I, Chapter I of Part the Second of the Constitution is as follows:

ARTICLE I. The department of legislation shall be formed by two branches, a Senate and House of Representatives; each of which shall have a negative on the other.

Mr. John A. Donoghue of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 173):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Article I of Section I of Chapter I of Part the Second of the Constitution is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: — Provided, however, that if any bill or resolve of the House of Representatives shall be rejected by the Senate, the Senate shall return the same to the House of Representatives, who shall proceed to reconsider the said bill or resolve; and if after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the House of Representatives present and voting thereon shall, notwithstanding the rejection by the Senate, agree to pass the same, it shall be laid before the Governor, and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted by both branches. All bills introduced in the House of Representatives and referred to committees shall be reported back to the House of Representatives and not to the Senate.

The committee on The General Court reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention Friday, June 28, 1918, and was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I hope this will not be rejected. The Senate, under our system, acts as a House of Lords, as it was intended that it should by the reactionaries who framed the sections of the Constitution establishing the Senate. Organized labor every year experiences difficulty in getting labor laws through the House, only to see them, — together with every measure known generally as progressive, — defeated in what is known as the graveyard of popular legislation, — the Senate. This year, for instance, the bill to establish the three-tour system of eight hours for tour workers in paper mills, in place of the present two tours of eleven and thirteen hours, went through the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote, only to be rejected in the Senate. A long list of bills equally meritorious could be cited were it necessary. The amendment to the Constitution now under consideration provides that a bill passed by the House and defeated in the Senate shall be returned to the House, and if two-thirds of the lower branch again pass it that act shall go to the Governor and have the same standing as if it had passed both branches. That is similar to the provision the labor party of England and those who are fighting with that faction for popular rights in England secured in regard to the House of Lords. I see nothing unreasonable in asking that in a republic we also shall establish it. This is an extension of the rule of the people, and if any one who is not an upholder of the rule of the political machine and the corporations, — in other words, any one who is not an upholder of the divine right of kings and corporation magnates to rule regardless of popular will, — does not support me in this, I believe he is inconsistent.
NEGATIVE OF SENATE ON HOUSE.

209

I believe that we should establish this as one of the immediate steps necessary to curtail the control of State government by selfish or questionable interests. Owing to the fact that the Senate is composed of a very small number of men elected from very large districts, it is impossible for the majority of their constituents, — of the people, — to keep close oversight of their activities; but in the popular branch, elected from smaller districts, where the members are better known and are more intimately acquainted with their constituents, it is possible for the public to have more control. In contrast lies the danger of a small body coming from large districts. We are told frequently in the corridors of the State House that certain interests do not care so much what the House does on progressive bills and labor bills, because the Senate already is "fixed" on the matter. Repeatedly we have been twitted to that effect by the corporation lobbyists who haunt the corridors of this building. Now, why not seek to purify legislative procedure by establishing this in the Constitution, not that it is a far-reaching measure, but simply because it is a primary step along the line of extending the power of the people.

I hope the adverse report will be rejected and the amendment take a reading at this time.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The tragedy that deprived the Convention of the advice of former Attorney-General Malone also deprived the committee on The General Court of its chairman. As the ranking member of that committee it devolves upon me, therefore, to assume the burden of these matters when the gentleman in charge is not here. The gentleman in charge of this measure is engaged in the work of the food conservation service for the government, and his absence I think will be excused by every delegate. Under these circumstances I may take a very brief time in order to do the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) the courtesy of explaining the reason for the committee's report, and I assure the Convention it shall be done in a very few words.

He has broached a subject that is of great interest to students of political science, and indeed has had a much more practical bearing by reason of the reforms of the British House of Lords and the proposal to institute similar reforms in nearly all countries where the upper branch is based upon a different system of choice from that of the lower branch. The arguments and considerations, however, produced by that state of affairs, do not apply under a Constitution like that of Massachusetts, where the members of the two branches are chosen by the same electorate. For this reason much of the argument of the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) would fall to the ground. As to the rest of the argument, it may be submitted that while it is true that in many parts of the world there is grave criticism of the unicameral system, and it may be the case that the tendency is away from the bicameral system and toward the unicameral system, there has not developed in this Commonwealth any condition leading to any considerable degree of public sentiment in favor of abandoning this feature of the legislative process handed down to us by the fathers. Therefore I am confident the Convention will not desire a long discussion of the question, but being ready to vote will sustain the report of the committee.
XXVII.

ABOLITION OF THE SENATE.

Mr. Charles H. Morrill of Haverhill presented the following resolution (No. 176):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Senate is hereby abolished. The department of legislation shall consist of one branch, a House of Representatives, and shall be styled The General Court of Massachusetts. All impeachments shall be tried by the Governor and Council. All other duties and powers of the Senate or of both branches under the existing Constitution shall devolve upon the House of Representatives. All duties of the President of the Senate under the existing Constitution shall devolve upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In case the existing Constitution provides a different number of votes for the passage of an act or resolve through the two branches, the provision with respect to the House of Representatives shall govern.

This amendment shall take effect upon its approval by the voters; but those persons chosen as Senators at the election at which this amendment is adopted shall be deemed to have been elected members of the House of Representatives, and shall be entitled to serve as such for the period of time for which they were elected, and no longer, and shall have the same powers and duties as other members thereof. The number of members of the House of Representatives shall be temporarily increased for this purpose.

The committee on The General Court reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

Debate was begun Friday, June 28, 1918.

The resolution was rejected Tuesday, July 9.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Morrill: The tendency throughout the world is to do away with the bicameral system of government. What I said this morning relative to the Senate will apply perhaps equally as well to the resolution now before the Convention for debate. In addition to that I wish to say that in our sister Commonwealth, the Dominion of Canada, the bicameral system of government has been almost wholly done away with. But two provinces retain it.

The Province of Quebec retains the two-branch system of government and so does Nova Scotia. On the other hand the Province of Ontario, the largest Province in both wealth and population in the Dominion, has but a single chamber Legislature.

Our country is about the only country, so far as I have been able to ascertain, wherein the upper branch, so called, is allowed to be even equal in power to the so-called lower branch. In France and other countries of Europe, with the exception perhaps of Germany, — which we do not regard with very much favor to-day, — in the other countries or the most of them the lower branch is the superior branch. Being the branch representing popular sentiment it has greater power than the Senate or whatever name the upper branch goes by in the respective countries. But in this country, while we have been behind the times and lagging behind the progressive nations of the world, we now are beginning to catch up, especially as relates to municipalities. The almost universal tendency of the times is now for city charters to provide for but a single branch.

Debate was continued Tuesday, July 9.

Mr. MORRILL: When this Convention last adjourned I was explaining what is in vogue in various parts of the world in this respect. Since then, by consulting the Statesman’s Year Book and other authorities, I have obtained more specific information than I then presented. For the benefit of those who were not present last Friday and perhaps may be present to-day, I shall repeat to a certain extent what I said at that time.

The tendency in all countries having popular government is toward the abolition of the upper House. Where two Houses remain the tendency is to give the more popular branch greater powers. In England the House of Lords has been made subordinate to the House of Commons. In France the Senate has become more and more subordinate to the Chamber of Deputies. This is true also of Swiss governments, both National and cantonal. In Norway there is practically a one-House system. Members of the Legislature are elected as one body and divide themselves into two Houses. If the two Houses thus formed disagree they meet as one House, where a two-thirds vote is decisive.

All the provinces of the Dominion of Canada except Quebec and Nova Scotia have one-House Legislatures. That is, seven have Legislatures of one House, while only two retain the old system. Ontario is the largest Canadian province. The one-House system has worked well there and the people are in no way inclined, either in Ontario or any other of the Canadian provinces, to return to the bicameral system.

The bicameral form of government once was prevalent in nearly all American cities. It now has been abolished almost everywhere and it is regarded as a municipal and political monstrosity wherever it is still in existence. All the larger cities except Philadelphia, Baltimore and Kansas City have one-House councils. In each of those cities the two-House system has proved to be an incumbrance to the orderly conduct of business and in some of them it has been a source of corruption. It is unnecessary to take time to recite the repeated corruption exposures which have appeared in the press. Merely calling the attention of the members to that subject should suffice.

The financial problems of such cities as New York, Chicago, Boston and Cleveland, all having one-House councils, are greater than those of most American States, if measured by appropriations. There is no better reason for a two-House Legislature in a State than in a city. A two-branch form of government makes it difficult to place the responsibility for legislative action. In Massachusetts as well as in other States we repeatedly see popular legislation, — what might be termed progressive legislation and labor legislation, — defeated by what is known as “falling between the two branches;” that is, one branch will pass favorably upon a popular measure, often knowing that the other branch is “fixed” in advance by the political machine of invisible government. The other branch will vote in opposition and a deadlock is created. A small body like the Senate affords greater opportunity for those who corrupt legislative bodies to work their purpose. As I stated during a previous session, we, representing organized labor in the Legislature, have been told repeatedly by the lobbyists who haunt the corridors of this State House that they feared they were to lose upon a certain measure in the House but that they felt sure of the Senate. They told us that frankly.

Now if you had had nine years' experience in the Legislature, as a few of us have had, it seems to me if you were in favor of real popular government it would be unnecessary to take any more time in going into detail. But for those who have been unfortunate enough, or fortunate enough, perhaps, not to have served in the Legislature but who have followed what the press has said from time to time relative to the upper branch of the Legislature in this State, you must know that its reputation is questionable. And, furthermore, you must remember that but very little of what is derogatory to the Senate is allowed to appear in the press. The men who write the reports for the press up here are willing to inform the public fully as to conditions, but they know that in every editorial office there is a large blue pencil, well sharpened, with which to delete, — I believe that is the word nowadays, — their stories. This is true especially if those stories shed any light on the legislative activities of the vested interests, which control the newspapers as well as the larger corporations and which attempt to control the Senate and sometimes succeed more than is well. I hope that this committee report will be negated and that the Convention will give the resolution calling for the abolition of the Senate a reading. I think it is unnecessary to consume any more of the time of this Convention.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I take this opportunity of expressing the hope that this Convention will do something toward strengthening the Legislature. Naturally we should have looked to the committee on The General Court to take the initiative in this matter, but, for some reason, it has almost entirely failed us, reporting favorably only a trivial amendment with reference to adjournments. And it looks as though, with many separate propositions, all doomed to defeat, we were to do practically nothing. What is the matter? Are we afraid to deal with the Legislature or do we deem it above reproach or beyond salvation?

I have spent a part of my week's vacation reading what I unexpectedly found to be a most interesting volume, the debates on the initiative and referendum. Those debates show that, last year at least, the majority of the Convention did not think very highly of the Legislature. The gentleman from Fall River, the chairman of the committee on the Initiative and Referendum (Mr. Cummings), who always measures his words, called it "a weakening, waning, failing Legislature," which "has been sick a long time and needs correction." The distinguished ex-Governor who hails from Fitchburg (Mr. Walsh) said in his eloquent speech in the same debate:

The people have lost confidence in their system of representative government, due to the influence of the lobby, the surrender of their rights to private monopolies, the irresponsiveness of their servants, due to the gerrymandered district system, log-rolling methods and despicable partisanship.

Even the gentleman from Amherst (Mr. Churchill) seemed only to ask that we be patient with the Legislature a little longer. The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), in one of his lofty flights of complacent glorification, declared that Massachusetts had the best of all American Legislatures. We might dispute the statement on the grounds of truth, but content ourselves with simply pointing out that his words are very faint praise. The only out and out defender of the Legislature is that prince of our stern and unbending Tories, the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), and our points of view are so opposite that when something exactly pleases him, I begin to grow suspicious of it [laughter], and I suppose that he gladly would return the compliment. Yet we should notice as an eddy in the steady current of his life and thought, that at the last session of the Convention, even he charged the Legislature with a “grave scandal.”

The gentleman from Brookline (Mr. George W. Anderson) who bears the same name with me, and whose large experience, fearless and yet temperate statement, and trenchant analysis we so sorely miss this year, gave his final mature judgment in this sentence, whose apparent moderation contains the sharpest criticism:

After a considerable acquaintance with the Legislature for a period of twenty-five years, in my opinion there was a very small percentage of the members who were bad men, there were half of them who were good men, and probably three-fourths of them who were fair average men.

Would you like to know what the average citizen who is not in politics thinks, the man who watches the game from the side-lines and who has not thought of taking any part in it? He is proud of the judiciary of Massachusetts, he is only a little less proud of her Governors, making a few judicious exceptions, but he is just a little ashamed of the Legislature. He thinks that there is little direct bribery, a great deal of illegitimate influence, a great deal of self-seeking, a great deal of log-rolling and not very much real ability. He recognizes that there are some able leaders, a considerable number of good men, and that the large majority are well-intentioned, but weak when their political future is at stake. Possibly he has too low an opinion of his representatives, but that is what he thinks.

Now, it strikes me that the most important thing we can do in this Convention is to strengthen the Legislature, and the way to do it is to give it power, responsibility and dignity, with the purpose of attracting to it more men of large caliber, unselfish purpose, and independent character. To this end I have voted for nearly every proposition to give the legislators more power, to untie their hands and to grant them wide freedom of decision.

Besides this, we should give them a longer term. Perhaps they should have a larger salary. They should be freed from the duty of dealing with private bills and from the corrupting influence of the gerrymandered districts. The system of proportional voting should be adopted. The opportunities of the invisible government to control them should be curtailed and cut off in every possible manner. The State should see that a proper publicity through the newspapers is given to their proceedings. Real debate and roll-calls should be encouraged.

I am quite sure our weak Legislature will not be cured by such small measures as abolishing recess committees. We need to take hold of the subject with a firm hand. Possibly only radical measures will avail. It might be that the abolition of the Senate, though the very thought sends a shiver down our conservative spines, might dignify the House and put responsibility upon it, might gain it the power and prestige needed to redeem the whole situation. Of course, it would remove a check on the rash popular will, but we have that in the new compulsory referendum. Possibly we do not need two such checks. And then there is the Governor with his veto. I do not say I favor the abolition of the Senate, but I should like to hear it really debated, and consequently I shall vote for it on this stage. *Something must be done to bring the whole subject of the strengthening of the Legislature before the Convention. Now that the committee on the General Court has failed us in any general constructive remedy, have we the ability, the initiative and the courage to do a plain duty? [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE of Waltham: The timely and in many respects admirable statement of the gentleman from Newton brings before the Convention this very important subject in a manner that calls for somewhat broader treatment than naturally would be given to the concrete proposition now before us. So before reaching that proposition, as a member of the committee that has been so cleverly characterized, I would say that the gentleman from Newton is not alone in thinking the conditions of the General Court need our attention. And if the committee on that subject has not laid before the Convention any specific program of importance I may assure him that one remedy which some of us hope will prove of value is now in the hands of two other committees of the Convention, which, it is hoped, will report in a few days upon a plan for relieving the General Court, — not for punishing it, but relieving it, — that perhaps will meet the approval of the Convention.

Such strictures as his upon the General Court have received earnest study, — at least from myself, — and I think I may explain to him the reason for what he thinks is a widespread feeling that the General Court is not equal to its tasks. That feeling in very large measure is due to the fact that ten or fifteen years ago certain publishers in this country discovered that they could capitalize muck, that they could make large personal fortunes out of slander, and that by appealing to the baser emotions of the American people they could make themselves powers in the community. And so during a period that always will be characterized in history as the muck-raking period of American life, they found nothing too foul to say of the men who were trying to serve their fellows in public office. No man escaped their slander, no institutions were spared their abuse. Unfortunately, there was altogether too much ground for this in the case of some of our legislative bodies. In certain States of the west, besides those not far from the Hudson River, there was reason for the castigation of legislators which the gentleman from Newton has echoed.

When I said that this Legislature of ours was the best in this country and perhaps in the world, I invited him or any other man here to name a single legislative body in any corner of the globe that for efficiency, uprightness and freedom from criticism by those acquainted with its work equals that of Massachusetts. It is not a perfect body. It has the failings common to humanity. It has the weaknesses to which all of us are subject. It has

Men who are good and men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Waltham if it is not easier for people, even the best of people, to work better with good tools than with bad tools. What some of us want to do with the Legislature is to make a better tool of it.

Mr. Luce: It is true as the gentleman says, and I am in heartiest sympathy with him and hope that I may contribute personally, from my own experience, something to make this Legislature a better tool. That has been my chief interest in this Convention. It is the thing which I have urged with the most earnestness and to which I propose to devote myself with, I hope, the cooperation of every other member of the Convention, until we adjourn. But in order to do that it is not necessary for us to add to the suspicion of our Legislature which already is too widespread among our people.

Mr. Morrill: On the day on which we last met a matter preceding this one on the calendar was the measure offered by the gentleman who has the floor, relative to the scheme which he has just outlined. He held up the committee on The General Court for the greater part of a day explaining the minute details of that plan, and then when it was reached upon the calendar failed to try to resurrect the proposition from an adverse committee report, with but himself and one other committee man recorded as dissenters. Now I should like to know why he has so much to say upon the plan after he deserted his own child when he had the opportunity to proclaim its paternity. [Laughter.]

Mr. Luce: I might reply to the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Morrill), with perhaps more asperity than wisdom, that there are those with legislative experience who have learned the uselessness of debating propositions that can arouse no support. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morrill: I would ask the member in the first division (Mr. Luce) if he knows of any great proposition, no matter how meritorious, that ever won out without several years of repeated agitation and efforts toward educating the majority by those who had the courage of their convictions and would rather be defeated fighting for what they believed to be right than to be victorious with the crowd or to be with any otherwise unanimous group of members of any body.

In other words, is it not true that weeds grow rapidly but good fruit and vegetables come slowly?

Mr. Luce: The truth of the gentleman's remarks is so obvious, and they so appeal to any one who appreciates, as I do, his own sincerity, that I have no word of criticism to make thereof. The State is indeed fortunate when it has gentlemen like the member in the fourth division, who, in spite of the evident disapprobation of his proposals by his fellows, nevertheless keeps on fighting, conscious that he is but doing his duty. [Applause.]

The proposal that I urged upon the committee on The General Court will reappear in a changed form, I may assure him. Of the suggestions by the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson), some may be debated in the course of the day. Others, experience has not elsewhere shown to be desirable for imitation. As to the particular matter now before us, even though probably a majority of this House will not approve the resolution, it would be unfortunate if this Convention allowed so sincere an argument as that of the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) upon a proposal that perhaps has been discussed more than any other of the proposals of political science in the last century, to pass without at least a few words which may reflect the views of the majority, and at any rate tell another generation why Massachusetts at this moment did not engage upon a serious consideration of the subject.

It may be the case, as the gentleman said, that the world is tending toward the unicameral Legislature. Although that might be contested, yet in frankness it ought to be admitted that the Governors of several of our western States, and as serious an organization as the, Tennessee Bar Association, within a brief period have urged the one-chamber Legislature; and it is true also that only two of the provincial assemblies of Canada have two chambers, and in some other places the one-chamber idea has made progress. But on the other hand it may be pointed out that when Australia recently gave the most earnest consideration to its new Constitution there was no serious argument in favor of abandoning the two-chamber system, and the decision of Japan might be cited also.

Experience is against the change proposed. Let me take just a minute or two of the time of the Convention to remind it of what that experience has been.

When our fathers wrote this Constitution they recalled the fact that the Italian Republics of the Middle Ages had come to disaster under the one-chamber plan. Turmoil, strife, murder, all the worst vices of government, had there been developed. In the year 1649, when the Puritans of England believed that they could reform the world, they established a one-chamber Parliament, and four years later Cromwell himself drove them out; said he would have no more of their prating.

Our fathers for the most part were accustomed to two chambers, not a slavish imitation of Parliament, but a natural development, with some most curious episodes, such as the famous sow episode, which led to the separation of the two bodies in Massachusetts, narrated at great length in John Winthrop's Journal, and I would commend it to you if you would know how Massachusetts happened to have a Senate. In other colonies the movement was equally natural. In only one of them, Pennsylvania, was the movement in the other direction; for three-quarters of a century prior to the Revolution, that Colony had used but one chamber. Benjamin Franklin, the only great American statesman who ever committed himself to this proposition, it is believed was the man who secured its adoption for Pennsylvania as a State, but the plan was abandoned in 1790. Vermont, which imitated Pennsylvania in many ways, likewise was a one-chamber State, remaining such until 1836. Georgia is supposed to have been for a time a one-chamber State, although really the upper branch, the Council, had in effect much power over legislation. Observe that all three of those States, having tried the one-chamber idea, threw it aside and replaced it with the two-chamber plan.

The great example of the one-chamber system has been the National Assembly of France, which in 1791 put into effect the plan that my friend from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) desires us to imitate; and no man who has read the story of the French Revolution can fail to recall the terrible results that came from the absence of any check on the law-making body.

Human nature is the same to-day that it was in the National Assembly. There are still the same reasons why one legislative body should be checked by another, and the reasons are familiar. You, sir, in the years of your presidency over this House saw times when gusts of passion swept through its ranks. You saw men carried away by the mob spirit; you knew occasions when, if one House could have acted without check, it would have perpetrated injustice; you and I, going home to the solitude of our chambers, have wondered that we could have been swept off our feet by some stirring speech or by some wave of sympathy. So it is we have found that it is not prudent on these great questions that may affect the destinies of millions, that may spread unhappiness through every corner of the State,—we have found that it is not wise to allow one body, without the mature second consideration of another body, to decide our fate.

Confident that this lesson of experience will result in the rejection of this proposal, perhaps if I add a reference to the remedy that has seemed to me the wisest, I shall be the more readily pardoned because it is in part based upon considerations involved in this very proposal. The gentleman from Haverhill was accurate in pointing out that the two-chamber system has been discarded by practically all American cities. I remember when as a young man I first had anything to do with public life, there was in my own city a board of aldermen and a common council, and I remember how some of the gentlemen who think, to use Wendell Phillips' phrase, that the "roof will fall if you sweep off the cobwebs,"—I remember how some of them prophesied disaster to our city if we abolished one of those bodies. Very reluctantly did we come to the one-chamber idea in city government. Now there is not a man of us who does not know that it was a wise step, and I doubt if there is a person within the sound of my voice who would urge us to revive the two-chamber idea in the conduct of cities.

It may be very pertinently asked: If that is true of cities why may it not be true of States? The reason is simple. A city government is not a Legislature, it does not legislate,—so our courts have held, and so our observation shows. It passes, to be sure, rules and regulations, it handles administrative affairs, it handles business. Now, because the business of the State has grown so enormously in the last generation, many of our western friends have forgotten that there are other things than business in legislation, and, finding that it overshadows everything else, have urged that, just as municipal business is better handled by the single body, like a board of directors, the State business should be handled by a board of directors, a single administrative body.

But the State still remains the great law-making agency of the people. The scope of its endeavor is vastly wider than that of Congress. The problems coming before the National House do not begin to compare in importance with the things of the daily life of mankind, with those that come before every Legislature. There are the laws as to the descent of property, the domestic relations, sales, contracts, negotiable instruments, morals, crimes,—nearly all the laws that govern us in our daily conduct, laws enacted by the State, and neither by Congress nor by city councils. The consequence is that the most important of all genuine legislation is still in the hands of the General Court. It combines these two functions,—one of passing laws, and the other of administering business,—the spending each year of between $25,000,000 and $35,000,000 of the people's money. And, sir, if I could persuade those who are listening to me of the extreme importance of drawing a clear-cut, sharp line between those two things, I could feel that I had made some headway in suggesting the right solution. It is true that in matters of business we ought to rearrange our system so that they shall not be subject to the delays and to the insufferable expenditure of time and money now imposed by the bicameral system. It is equally true, in my judgment, that we ought not to expose those laws that so intimately and closely determine and affect our daily lives, to the hasty, impetuous, passionate action of a single body.

Now, if this be correct, then our line of remedy is palpable. We should relieve the two Houses from considering that great bulk of the work which was unknown to our fathers. They did not have from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 a year to spend. Taxes were insignificant, the business of the State was unimportant. Until within a generation this Legislature, like all other Legislatures, concerned itself almost exclusively, or at least preponderatingly, with questions of law. But now we find added to that this enormous mass of administrative detail, which chokes the channels of legislation, which invites the log-rolling that my Newton friend suggested, which encourages all the evils conspicuous in Legislatures, and which ought to be handled in some other way.

For these reasons I submit that my friend from Newton (Mr. Anderson) is in error in assuming that the members of the committee on The General Court had not given these things study and reflection and were not prepared to discuss a remedy.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: May I ask the gentleman just what the remedy is that he proposes?

Mr. Luce: Although I perhaps more usefully might have delayed the statement, yet the question deserves a fair answer. I came to this Convention with the conviction that the administrative detail of government ought to be taken away from the Legislature, as a matter of relief for the Legislature and a betterment to general legislation. My first idea was that this detail, the rules and regulations, the minutiae of government, might be wisely entrusted to the Senate, which should sit continuously throughout the year, like a board of directors of any of our great corporations. But after discussing the matter with other gentlemen it seemed that the proposal was so novel, it seemed so doubtful if a patient hearing for it could be secured, it seemed such a departure from all governmental tradition, that my own conclusion was,—and it was the conclusion of other gentlemen, too,—that we would better attempt to accomplish the same thing in another way. We began looking around to find out what agency of government was available to handle the minutiae, to handle the special legislation, the private legislation, and particularly that which concerns our cities and towns, now imposing upon our city and town.
officials so much onerous labor because they must resort to so awkward and difficult a means of relief, and we discovered such an agency in the Governor's Council.
I realize that the moment I make the suggestion I am met by the expectation on the part of many of the Convention that the Governor's Council, which has been so much abused and criticized, may be abolished. But from what I have learned in discussion it is to my mind extremely doubtful if, in case this Convention recommends the abolition of the Governor's Council, it would meet the approval of the people so long as we have a judiciary appointed during good behavior; for it is extremely doubtful if the people ever will be willing to entrust to one man, unadvised and unrestricted by others, the naming of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth. It has been suggested, to be sure, that confirmation might be turned over to the Senate, but that would be jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. And so, in the belief that the Governor's Council will be retained, it occurred to some of us that it would be possible by its use to adapt to American conditions the remedy that has been found so efficacious in the best administered country in the world, — Great Britain.
I am not sure that the committees now considering the matter will give this proposal their approval. I very much hope that they will, or, if not, that they will suggest some other remedy. But it is likely that there will be urged upon the Convention in some form or another this proposition: That some small body of men, either the Governor's Council, or a continuous Senate, or a body created for the purpose, shall be allowed to take away from the Legislature the minutiae of its work, the part relating to the administrative details of government, which does not involve any question of principle, always reserving to the Legislature the power to annul if it sees fit.
Mr. Anderson of Newton: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham whether that is the only remedy that is to be proposed; whether he thinks that that remedy is sufficient to strengthen the Legislature in such a way as the people of the State desire.
Mr. Luce: Nothing but experience can tell. I may say to him, sir, that in expressing the belief that it may prove the effective remedy
I am but following the same line that has been followed in many another Constitutional Convention in this country; for through a period of about 75 years, the wisest men of all our States, in their Constitutional Conventions, appear to have agreed that the root of the evil is special legislation, local legislation, private legislation; and so, in one form or another, nearly all the States have sought a remedy in the way of somehow handling this most difficult problem. Most of the States have seen fit to try to meet the situation by prohibiting special legislation, and you may find the Constitutions full of restrictions to that end.
Specific prohibitions have failed everywhere to cure the evil, and they have failed chiefly because they have ignored what was a fundamental purpose of our General Court and of every other Legislature.
It was not alone to pass laws but also it was to redress grievances.
General laws work gross injustice. There must be exceptions to all general laws, and men always have recognized the propriety of making exceptions. So we allow our citizens to come here with their grievances, and sad will be the day when the doors of the General Court of Massachusetts are closed to men who have ground for complaint, who beg for relief, who ask not alone the justice of the Commonwealth, but also its clemency and its mercy.

For other reasons, too, the specific prohibition of special legislation has not brought the cure desired. Your city or my city may be wholly justified when it comes up here and asks that, by reason of purely local conditions, it may be exempt from the operation of general laws; when it asks to go beyond the debt limit, when it wants to modify its charter in some respect. So we have recognized that our comfort, our happiness and our prosperity are involved in the power of the general government to make exceptions. Because of this no man here has urged seriously that we attempt by specific prohibition of ten, fifteen or twenty classes of legislation to meet the evil.

Let some gentleman suggest to me, if he can, any better way of solving the problem than by relieving the Legislature. I would again emphasize, — not by punishment, but by relief. There is no occasion for punishment. You and I, sir, and many of the members of this Convention, have shared in the responsibility for the work of the Legislature, for its reputation, for its character. And shall we admit that we deserve the epithets so rashly applied to us? No; and yet in candor we must admit that we did not accomplish all that we wanted to accomplish. Why did we fail short of our aims? Why was there ground for the Progressive movement of 1912?

We have been told, sir, by many a critic that in this State there is too much legislation. I would tell you that the people of this country said in 1912 there is too little legislation. They pointed out in a program that received the approval of millions of our fellow-citizens, more than fifty specific lines of action where they wanted advance. When you study the history of our own Legislature you will find that again and again and again it has been dilatory. In the end it has done the right thing. Go read what Francis C. Lowell wrote after he had served in this chamber and how it was that the Torrens system was so long in being accepted in this State, — a reform that we all now recognize was most eminently desirable. It was not because the Legislature of his day objected to that reform; it was because the committee on the Judiciary never could find the time to attend to it.

So, during my own years in the Legislature, I watched the Workmen's Compensation Act in its slow and tedious course. I remember, sir, one day meeting after the session the gentleman from Northampton who is now about to receive nomination to the highest office in the Commonwealth. He was downcast, his face was long, and I said to him: "Calvin, what are you so sober about?" And he told me it was because, once again, the Workmen's Compensation Act, in spite of his advice, had been defeated. Six times, year after year, I myself stood on this floor and urged the House to pass the direct inheritance tax, and six times I was knocked down; in the seventh year that measure became law without a vote against it, and there is not a man here now who is not glad it is law.

It is the story of Massachusetts legislation. Things recognized by the Legislature as eminently desirable, or even of extreme importance, are postponed year after year because there is not time to handle them; and that is why for fifteen or twenty years after the world had learned that the cost of the disasters of industry ought to be borne by the consumer and not by the miserable victim of accident, we delayed giving that problem its solution, simply because we did not have time to handle the big questions. We used up the precious minutes in handling little things; in deciding that the assistant driver of the patrol wagon in Worcester should be reinstated in his position, in deciding that the city solicitor of Northampton or Newburyport should be elected by the city council or should be appointed by the mayor, instead of being chosen by the people. We frittered away hours over things that were unimportant, that could have been decided as well by ten men or one man. Why, sir, almost every month in my life, in my own business, I decide questions that would take the time of our Legislature one, two, three hours, or a whole day,—for a legislative body likes nothing more than to amuse itself with a problem that every man of business would answer off-hand.

That is the reason why the Legislature does not respond to the desires of the people. It is because it lacks the sense of proportion. It is because it emphasizes the little things and does not find any time left for the big things.

So, if you would have your remedy, simply face the fact that these public interests of ours, once confined to matters of law, have come to include manifold affairs of business; that we now conduct great enterprises, and that they ought to be conducted by precisely the methods which all private enterprises have found salutary and beneficent. That is the direction to which the Convention may turn for relief, and not to devices that have been tried through centuries of the experience of mankind and in many instances have brought calamity and disaster.

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: I will accept the challenge with which the member (Mr. Luce) closed his remarks. He quoted the experience of the Florentine republics with the one-chamber system of government, and cited that as a reason for their decline. I do not agree that that was the reason for their decline. A study of history discloses that empires have come and gone and governments of various kinds have come and gone. The concentration of wealth in the hands of the very few in Babylon and other empires of the past, Greece and Rome included, is said to have put them on the toboggan-slide toward oblivion, and finally there came a renaissance.

But what about the Roman Senate? That was part of a bicameral system of government, in the days of the Roman Empire, preceding the Florentine republics to which he referred. Did that bicameral system save Rome from ruin? Did not the Roman Senate become so notorious that it is referred to even to-day as one of the worst examples in history of a branch of government becoming corrupt and unsavory in every way? In the days of the decline of the Empire were not Roman senatorships bought and sold as we of to-day buy junk or baubles,—or perhaps so-called honors, like membership in the Massachusetts Senate? Does it not look as if the tendency is somewhat along that line in regard to our own United States Senate? Is it not true that we hear of "sugar Senators," also "railroad Senators," "mining Senators," and the other Senators, and their possession of their seats through the ability to spend large sums of money for campaign and other purposes? Why do we not take warning from the lessons of history?

I admit that after listening to the presentation of the one-chamber system and the two-chamber system by my opponent and myself you cannot off-hand decide as to which was responsible either for the prosperity or decline of government in the past, but what I want you to concentrate your attention upon is that we are in America and that we are dealing with our own Senate problem, and that is something with which you are more familiar. He says that some American States have tried the one-branch system and then returned to the two-branch system of government, and he claims that therefore we should not adopt the one-branch system in this State.

I have not examined into the reasons why the one-branch system was eliminated in those States which have eliminated it; but I would call your attention to the fact that in these days of great wealth, of great public expenditures for various enterprises, in these days of enterprises being carried on upon a large scale, the American cities are rushing pell-mell into the one-branch system. Must there not be a reason for it? Must it not be working well? If not, why do cities adopt the one-branch system after they have seen it work in cities near by, cities that are rivals, socially and industrially, in which the defects of the system would be magnified if possible and the virtues minimized?

He refers to the great increase in appropriations which the Legislature now acts upon. Has not that been true of all American cities? Are we not a rapidly growing Nation? Yet cities of greater population and wealth than some of our States are adopting the one-branch system; either that or they already have adopted it.

The Massachusetts Senate is what we are dealing with specifically and we know what the experience has been here, and we know the problem that is facing us. I believe we should abolish the Massachusetts Senate. Why was the Senate, as a theory of government, first instituted in this country? Alexander Hamilton led the forces which advocated an upper legislative branch, and Hamilton's plan was that Senators should be chosen by a select few to hold office for the remainder of their lives. A great many other things which Alexander Hamilton advocated in direct opposition to democracy, — which we now are fighting to extend and preserve, — might be cited. I take it for granted, however, that the majority of the members of this Convention graduated from college, and, having had experience in the professions and the greater activities of life, are familiar with the Hamiltonian idea as opposed to the Jeffersonian, and that therefore it would be a waste of time to go into details, — even if it were not presumptuous on my part. I am trying not to consume time, but to make my remarks as pointed and as specific as I can.

As I said before, it is the Massachusetts Senate with which we are dealing now; and while there have been a few instances in which that branch has done something good after the House has refused to do it, the evidence all tends toward showing that public sentiment would have been able to force those acts from a Legislature of a single branch, with a fixed responsibility.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I should like to ask the gentleman from Haverhill if it is not true that the upper chambers which have been abolished have been for the most part either hereditary or appointive and not elective.

Mr. Morrill: In some instances they were hereditary or appointive, but the Roman Senate was neither, and a great many other cases might be cited.

Mr. Washburn: Can the gentleman cite any modern State, having an elective upper branch, which has abolished that branch?

Mr. Morrill: While I was born in Haverhill, I regard the Canadian provinces as up-to-date States or provinces. They have done away with the bicameral system of government,—all except two of them.

Mr. Washburn: Is it not true that the Dominion upper branch is appointive?

Mr. Morrill: Yes, the upper branch of the Dominion Parliament. The same was true in the early history of many of the British provinces in various countries. The Governor of Massachusetts at one time was appointed by the King. But we gradually have been getting away from these appointed and these exclusive bodies and individuals, and extending the power of the people constantly; so why should we stop now, in these days when we are drafting the flower of American manhood to go across the seas with the battle-cry of democracy? Why should we not live up to what is being professed? Why not make a reality out of what we utter by word of mouth?

A great many labor bills which failed to become law because they were defeated in the Massachusetts Senate could be cited,—the eight-hour, three-shift system for tour workers in paper mills, in place of the present eleven-hour and thirteen-hour system. Just think of it! Is not that slavery? Eleven and thirteen hours per day and night, alternating each week, with the individual employed. That is in existence to-day in Massachusetts. And the bill to establish that three-shift eight-hour system,—on which I have had the honor among other bills to overturn the committee's adverse reports, and, with the aid of others, succeeded in putting through the House,—has been defeated year after year in the Massachusetts Senate. I should like to have the delegates to this Convention take that into consideration, because the man who works for a living is numbered among the majority of the population of this country, and you are saying constantly that the majority should rule. Then why keep these impediments to majority rule and permit the majority to secure the enactment of measures from time to time as those who compose it desire, especially when a referendum, as has been proved in the past, shows that the public does demand such legislation? I will not take time, however, to enumerate a long list of such measures, because I believe an assertion of the fact carries with it conviction to those who have kept abreast of the times.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. Morrill) well may live to see the day when the Legislature of Massachusetts will consist of one House. It is not likely, however, to be within a day measured by the discussions of this Convention. Upon the face of it a single body always is better than two bodies. The proposition needs only to be stated to be accepted. Is there any member of this Convention present who is connected with or does business with any corporation, bank, steamship company, mine, industrial corporation, commercial corporation, in which decisions are made finally by two different bodies, discussing bodies, each of which has a veto upon the other? We all know that you get efficiency in commercial life through concentration of authority in few hands, who can be held responsible. That is an axiom of business; it also is an axiom of politics.

Nevertheless, in our discussions here we must measure every proposition that comes before us by three calipers. The first question is: Is a proposition upon its face likely to be serviceable? Second, will it work, will it adjust itself to other parts of the system? Third,—and in many ways the vital question,—will it be accepted by the voters of the Commonwealth if submitted to them?

I presume in this Convention the question already is concluded through the fact that a large majority of the members of this Convention are not in favor at this time, nor so far as they see at any time, of concentrating the Legislature of the Commonwealth into one House. Therefore I shall not argue that question. What I have to say is suggested rather by the remarks of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), who surely never has appeared to better advantage in this Convention than in the remarks to which we have just listened,—so lucid, so profound, and so inspired by a genuine feeling that something different ought to be done to make the Commonwealth of Massachusetts efficient. I go side by side, I go elbow to elbow, with any member of this Convention, and any citizen of Massachusetts, whose aim is to make the government of our beloved State more efficient, to secure more attention to it, to secure a better type of official throughout the Commonwealth, to secure better legislation and better administration. What the gentleman from Waltham has suggested is in line, is intended, is likely, and is calculated, to improve the government of Massachusetts. We shall bring up this whole question again when we come to the organization of the executive.

The Convention has made up its mind speedily that, for whatever reason, it is not worth while to try experiments with the Legislature. It is not precisely borne in upon the members of this Convention, as has been suggested recently on this floor, that the only objection to Legislatures, including the Legislature of Massachusetts, is that of muck-rakers. I find all the authorities are satisfied that in general the Legislatures, not simply government as a whole, but the Legislatures of the States of the Union, are defective. I hold in my hand the volume of my colleague, Professor Arthur N. Holcombe, upon "State Government." It is evident that the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) is familiar with it, because he has quoted it several times with approval, and I am sure he will agree fully with this passage, in which is summarized an opinion as to what ought to be the aim of State legislation:

No scheme for the restoration of legislative prestige is worth much which does not recognize that the greatest accomplice of legislative corruption is legislative inefficiency. Much of the work now attempted by the State Legislatures is work for which large representative bodies are not fitted. No inconsiderable portion of the output of legislation, so called, consists of measures of an administrative or quasi-judicial character. Practically all private and local legislation is of this character.

We all know the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) is specially interested in that question of private and local legislation, and that he has brought before the Convention a well-thought project by which that difficulty may be somewhat palliated, at least.
The one thing that I desire to say is that we need efficiency throughout government, and that the time to face it is now. This debate has turned from the mere question of the form of the Legislature into the issue of the form of State government. We are approaching now the great question of the reform of the executive, upon which I hope to deliver myself more at length when the proper time shall come. What I want to say here is simply that the question of a two-House legislature is not a foregone conclusion. It is a great mistake to suppose that in the history of the world or of this country Legislatures of our present type have been habitual. In the Colonies there was a two-House Legislature, the upper House, however, being also the Governor's Council. If we go back to the records of the Revolution we shall find that in the establishment of a two-House Legislature in the States the main reason undoubtedly was that the upper House should be provided in order to represent property and the men of property, and to this day there are some curious adhesions of practices growing out of the attempt to apply that principle.

Here in Massachusetts, as you all are aware, the districts were so arranged as to give greater weight in the Senate to the richer districts of the State. In the course of time that distinction has passed away, except that in some States of the Union counties have representation in the Senate. For instance, in New York matters are so arranged that the city of New York never shall have more Senators than all the rest of the State outside the city of New York, no matter what its population. In general, however, the State Senate is arranged on exactly the same proportional basis as the membership of the lower House. Practically, in most States, we have supposedly equal senatorial districts, each choosing one Senator, or possibly two. We have also what is practically a subdivision of that division into legislative districts. The members of the two Houses are very much of the same kind, the Senators themselves being graduates of the lower House. The two groups do not represent different constituencies, though the original reason, viz., that one House ought to represent population and the other property, long since has disappeared.

The second reason why we have proceeded so long under a double chamber system is the example of the United States of America. But, as everybody knows, the two-House arrangement apparently was not designed when the Convention came together in 1787. It was forced upon that Convention in order to provide a proper representation for the States, and without that representation the small States never would have come into the Union. Throughout the Union the States have imitated this two-House Legislature exactly as they have imitated the Capitol of the United States by making the numerous domed capitols in nearly all the States.

Another reason which undoubtedly has large effect upon the minds of most people is the idea that the two Houses will give more attention to a measure than one House. But, as Professor Holcombe points out in his book, two incomplete decisions may be very much worse than one decision where more time and attention have been given to it. It is a very curious thing that our great institutions of learning are governed in general, like our business corporations, by a single body. A remarkable exception is the government of Harvard University. I think the gentleman who occupies the chair (Mr. Adams, of Concord) would not disagree with me as to which of the two Houses, the Corporation and the Overseers, is the real going concern, the real guide, the real power behind the government or in the government of the University of Harvard.

Let me come back, then, to this one point: Historically we are not in the least precluded from having a single House. There is no more reason per se for having two Houses in the State Legislature than having two Houses in the city legislature. When Boston was created a city, the first in Massachusetts, it had two Houses, — the lower representing the old town-meeting, the upper representing the selectmen, who had been representatives of the town government from time immemorial. It was continued for no better reason. If our cities are more effective because they are concentrating their power in one body, there is no reason in the nature of things why our Legislature might not be more effective.

I hope, in the days to come, twenty, forty or fifty years hence, when another Convention takes up that question, when another Legislature submits an amendment which is adopted for a single House, that it may be imputed to me for righteousness that in 1918 I was one of the few who thought it possible.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: As to which side of this question I am on you may decide when I have finished, but there is a note that has not been struck yet by any of the speakers. Who can study the government of Massachusetts and the government of the United States and not admire the symmetry? Who can study them without first looking at the common foundation and seeing what were the thoughts that animated the fathers? It was Anaxagoras who made the observation that love always makes us better, religion sometimes, and power never. Power was the great giant which our forefathers were dealing with, and they undertook to fetter it by declaring how the power of the people should be delegated and used. Fearful were they even to the limit that they might bestow some power where it ought not to be placed.

The Florentine Republic? Well, what was it except an imitation of what happens when Government is in irresponsible hands? There was a rivalry between two powerful Houses; to-day there is often a rivalry between two powerful money barrels. They harangued on either side in the Florentine Republic and out of their harangues they got what they called government. But the power that sustained either was corrupting and corruptible.

The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) speaks of Cromwell. Again we come to a man who usurps or seizes the reins of government for the good of the whole, as he says, and he throws the old government out; then he has responsibility for something better upon his shoulders. He had on his head exactly what the men had in Russia when they threw out the government, — the duty of substituting a better government. And you know what Cromwell said after he had a very long thought upon the subject. He said he guessed about the only way to have a good government was to establish a government composed wholly of saints. Well, say now, that is just about the situation. It is only in eternal government, whose wisdom is unquestioned, that there are no mistakes. In justice and mercy ever the right will come uppermost. Forever wrong will be expiated by whoever perpetrates it. Cromwell did not get his government of saints. Failing in that he tried to give some better government. With many failures in government before them our forefathers were fearful of bestowing the power of government. We have with us,—I see him before me,—one who once was the gallant leader of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company (Mr. Benton of Belmont). Do you recall the fact that when the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company in this Colony came up and wanted a charter they were turned down precipitately even though they were the very best of men? Do you remember the reason that was given? The fathers said that they could not in any way establish a Praetorian Guard. Now just think of it one moment. They thought if they set up the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company they were going to have a Praetorian Guard that would stand on the walls and cry: "How much for the office?" But do we need now to think of the possibility of a Praetorian Guard? Why, it has been here; it is here. In Massachusetts you have seen it and I have seen it,—the governorship of Massachusetts auctioned off, if you please, although there were no other bidders, so far as I know. I speak not to cast any reflection,—for I speak of a friend! I speak to ask who makes your Governor sometimes. What wonder, I say, when you establish a system whereby men go up and down in some of these congressional districts and sometimes in this Commonwealth to hire anybody they can hire to work for them! What are you going to get out of a system of that kind? Is it possible to have a Constitutional Convention that can establish some frame of government that will change that? How and why are such developments possible? The people have degenerated politically, as the forefathers feared. Read all of the fourth of March addresses by all of the men of that time on the Boston Massacre. Hear them contemplating the coming of Independence; hear them after the government was established, and one keynote runs through the whole: "Banish luxury, banish corruption; by that sin has fallen the best of governments." And that is true.

Now if you can discover where you can place power so that it will not be abused, you have solved the problem. The gentleman from Waltham says that human nature has not changed. That is true. Note this fact,—and I am speaking from an observation that comes from being a newspaper man since I was nineteen, at which time I was reporting here in the Senate and House of Representatives. I have known the generations that were passing then, the one that has come and that is passing, and the one that is coming. And I have found out this: That the best way to develop a low streak in a man is to give him a little bit of power, and then you have got that low streak in all its intensity. Quite often you think a fellow is a pretty good sort of fellow, and he is on the outside, much as was said of certain people in the Scriptures,—"Whited sepulchres, fair without but within full of dead men's bones." With that kind of man all you need to do is to give him any office, legislative, judicial or executive, and you will have stories such as have been given out here. Give such a man even the honorable office of Governor, there will come times when he will not know whether he is Philip drunk or Philip sober. You are not going to correct that by delegating more or less power. You are going to correct these conditions only by educating people to pay more attention to the men whom they select for officials. It was Solon who, when he gave out his wise laws and somebody asked: “Are those the best laws you are capable of giving out?” replied: “No, but they are the best that the people are capable of receiving.” And so therefore why do you mourn as you sit here that sometimes you have in your legislative or executive chambers men for whom you blush and thank God that everybody does not know as much about them as you know? Why, do I say, do you mourn? Because the source of the whole of it is in private virtue. Your public virtue forever and forever will keep step with private virtue and your private virtue with your public virtue. What is the common opinion of the people to-day of men who hold office? First, that if they get there they have a chance for graft, to rake off something. That they feel sure of, one thing beyond a doubt, and perhaps they were educated to it, as the gentleman from Waltham says, by the exposures and by seeing men who entered office with nothing coming out with something. So therefore they feel that men can have the opportunity. What, then, is finally their conclusion? That if the man takes it he is a knave; if he does not take it he is a fool; that he is either one or the other; therefore they get down to the idea that everybody who is in politics is either a fool or a knave! Remember, some members have not put them on a much higher pedestal in addresses to this Convention.

The foundation of all good government, to my mind, is right in the people. So long as you have them practice as they are practicing, practicing through their self-constituted political machines, we shall have just what we have got. What is the first question the machine will ask about a candidate for high office? “Has he got any money?” And if he has not, he goes into the discard; they go hunting for somebody who has got money. It is not for men who are educated, for men who understand the science of government, who are worthy; as a rule, men who are the most worthy are not themselves seeking office. It is men who have accumulated wealth; they want to purchase the office; to wear it much as you wear a watch charm on your watch chain, something to hand down to their grandchildren, —for instance, that their grandfather had been Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Your government and your men who are elected are an expression of the condition of the people. So long as the people are content to allow wealth to be distributed in such a way that it accumulates in the hands of the few, just so long those few who have not anything to do except to run for office will pay the bills and, having paid the bills, they will think they have bought the office and that they own it.

On the question of one or two chambers, I think the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) has misunderstood my position. I have been pointing out all along that the danger in any government is that the power that is delegated by the people shall be used against the people rather than for them. Often the Senate is linked up with the Governor. Senators are told that the Governor wants a bill killed; he does not want it to come up to him because it will embarrass him; and the Senators do not dare to say anything except to do what the Governor says, for fear when they go down to their district they will “get the hook.” The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has a remedy. I am not without one. I believe that this whole State should be divided into electoral districts small enough to have democratic principles and intimate knowledge of officials flow from the center to the outside. The electoral districts should not be much larger than our precincts. In those districts should be places such as school-houses where the people could be educated on government. In those districts nominate electors; make the electors the most worthy men in the Commonwealth; give to them the duty of nominating all officers. It would be their duty to look up the qualifications, even down to the school records of the men who were willing to serve as officials. The electors would examine all who desired. Then the electors would recommend all of the best. Their reputation as electors should depend on their ability to find the best men or the best man. That is the principle of the National Electoral College. It never was understood that the President and Vice-President should be nominated and elected by political machines as they are. A beautiful thing, the Electoral College,—the thought that representatives of the people, with no private interest, should gather in a college and consider all the men who were proper for President, and then after they had got through voting, out of the three highest, if they could not agree, the Senate and the House should choose our President and Vice-President. Some such system, coupled with a system of educating and assimilating the people who are coming into this country, might be applied in selecting State officers. I want to speak plainly: I believe the time has come when even the church should awaken more interest in the broad principles of civic virtue,—in other words, good religious education applied to government.

Mr. Hart: I should like to ask the gentleman whether he stands prepared to submit an amendment for the consideration of this Convention to make all voters of Massachusetts virtuous and intelligent.

Mr. Brown: Unless you have a system of government that does make your voters virtuous and intelligent, you have failed utterly in that which the forefathers thought that they had accomplished. When they gave out the great corner-stone that all men are created free and equal, that they are given different talents, that each in his place is entitled to all the proceeds of his toil and no one should take anything from him without giving him an adequate equivalent, that was a system that would have produced virtuous and intelligent people. It was Jefferson who said that in a well-ordered Republic no man should be unduly rich and no man should be unduly poor, and that is true. No man is unduly rich in this Republic or in this State unless he or his ancestors held a privilege. He is rich more often by privilege than he is by virtue. I am living under this government and I shall support it, State or National, but I will be willing to pray all the time for something better and I am not assuming any virtue,—I have worked for years with the idea that government could be restored to the ideals of the forefathers.

The best effort I have known in that direction was the ideal in the old People's Party,—the Populist Party. How one could love that party! No city ever gave them any large stipend for gathering their Convention in their midst, because when they gathered the bar-rooms were empty. If the delegates had any spare time they prayed, and they prayed honestly and earnestly that God would guide them, that they might save the Republic from the dangers they prophesied, the dangers that are now upon it and which they clearly could foresee. So I have answered the gentleman's question, I think, that we ought to be able to take some steps toward making the people more virtuous, and we would take those steps if we could prevent in some way wealth being distributed so that those who do not earn it take from labor the bread which labor has earned.

It is a great problem, but the answer is coming. It is coming out of this great upheaval across the water. We are drawn into it because we have got to do part of the uplifting. Out of that there are coming conditions that will create what the gentleman from Cambridge speaks about,—a virtuous, self-respecting, God-fearing, man-loving people.

I think I have finished, and whether or not I have determined which side I am on I do not know. But I will tell you this, that before I tear down a superstructure so well built as the one we now have, I shall hesitate. Remember how many years it took Montesquieu,—how many years he studied governments that had come and gone before he evolved the idea of checks and balances. Our forefathers built this truly representative government as the result of a study of the history of all governments. Come, look at it just for a moment. They recognized every man as free, entitled to all civil and religious liberty that did not infringe upon the liberty of others. To the end that he may not be the sole judge as to whether or not his liberty infringed upon others, it is left to disinterested judges to decide differences. Their little towns incarnated true democracy. The town, the city, the State and the Nation. These are the courses of the building. The strict constructionists who wanted to live right up to the letter of the Constitution were in the minority and those who found incidental power traveled away with the government. A system of towns, cities and State government, the one balancing the other, is drifting into a strong centralized government. It was not what was contemplated by the fathers. It is a sweeping away of the anchors that they had thrown to windward to perpetuate an American Republic. But I believe the Republic is under the guidance of the One that was invoked when it was founded, and that in some way the Ship of State will sail through. Until you clear the source it is no use for you to expect anything better than the source to come out of the fountain. The stream is muddy. It is muddy because of years of easy-getting wealth, the evils of wealth corruption, the distaste of men for work, the absence of frugality, the disappearance of our farms and our farmers and the kind of men who were born upon them. But we have done something, Mr. Delegate from Cambridge, this Convention has done something, you have done much yourself, in providing for an appeal to the one original source of power,—the people. We have given the people a chance to take a hand at the job.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I have listened with a great deal of interest this morning to these silvery-tongued orators, but we are here for some other purpose. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I want to offer very briefly two or three reasons why I support this proposition. I believe the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) was right when he said that some time we shall abolish the Senate in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and then it will be imputed for righteousness to those in this Convention who believed in the abolition at this time. Inasmuch as this thing has been championed by a Socialist and a Progressive, I desired that a member of my own party also should here champion the abolition of the Senate, and I do this particularly because the party to which I belong suffers from the existence of the Senate.

The first reason why the Senate ought to be abolished is that it is not representative. We (the Democratic Party) some years elect a Governor; many years we cast a majority of the votes of the State, but never do we get more than six or seven Senators. According to the rules of the Senate, seldom does a minority party have Senators enough to secure a roll-call. We may go before the people with things in our platform, fundamental things of government to which our party adhered and for which a majority of the House of Representatives vote, and yet we do not have enough representation in the upper branch to have a roll-call. Therefore because the Senate is not representative I believe it should be abolished.

Secondly, the Senate by its authority also divides responsibility.
By jockeying matters between the two branches it is possible for Representatives and Senators equally to escape responsibility for the enactment of legislation or the killing of legislation in a way detrimental to the people's interests.

Thirdly, we are seeing that the bicameral system does not work in cities. The old boards of aldermen and common councils are being abolished. If it does not work in the cities, — and we are finding it does not, — why then should we believe that there is anything sacred in maintaining the same system in the State Legislature?

Fourthly, the General Court is an organization, in many ways a great corporation, dealing, and more each year, with economic matters, and hence more and more a corporation. We cannot believe that the efficient management of a great railroad or other corporation could be carried on with a bicameral board of directors, if it were conducted in the same way that the General Court is organized; and the analogy is sufficiently strong that we ought to abolish the upper branch.

It has been said here that we have the bicameral system upon us because of the conclusions of great students of systems of legislation; that having looked over the various possible legislative systems it was felt by those competent to judge that the bicameral system was the best at that period. This, I believe, is not true. It is simply a heritage of the past, and in taking it we have followed the line of least resistance. The barons, the great property owners in the past, were men who first got power to force from the Crown certain rights for themselves; and the granting of the lower body, the House of the people, came only later, and that first body always has been jealous of its power of veto on what the House of the people could do. This whole question was threshed out in the French Revolution and following it. The radicals of that time wanted a single chamber and the conservatives a bicameral system. We are continuing a great historical fight, and while we have not the votes to carry it in this Convention, let us stand up and be counted.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: Except for a single reason I should not feel justified in prolonging this debate for one minute. If posterity ever looks into the history or the debates of this Convention it may appear singular that out of the large number of members here who have served in the Senate, including two or three unfortunate men upon whom is the ineffaceable stigma of having presided over that body, not a word has proceeded in its defence. I presume the others have remained silent, as I might well have done, for the reason that there is no sufficient occasion to say anything. But I must say, Mr. President, as a general proposition, that I think it contributes somewhat to the value of a debate to have it participated in, at least, by those whose knowledge of the subject is not somewhat less than nothing. For example, I should regard it as in the highest degree foolish and unjustifiable for me to discuss before this Convention, or anywhere else, the question why our friends of the Baptist denomination consider total immersion as essential to a proper scheme of salvation [laughter], as that is a question about which I have no special or peculiar knowledge and therefore could not contribute anything worth saying or hearing. [Laughter.]

My friend from Haverhill proposes to abolish the Senate. He has served in the House, he says, nine years, and, entertaining the opinion which he has expressed of the Senate, I may fairly presume that he would scornfully refuse an election to that body. [Laughter.] But if he had served there nine terms as he has in the House, or even one, probably he would not have proposed this resolution, for then he would have seen the other side of the shield and would be in a position to appreciate to some extent the reason why it ought to be rejected.

The general reasons which put the Senate into our Constitution are so well understood that I will not say a word about them except that they exist to-day in the same force, indeed in greater force, than they had when the Constitution was made. And let me call the attention of the Convention to one single fact. If you question the personnel of the Senate, or the character of that body, every well-informed man in Massachusetts knows that the Senate is constituted, from year to year, and always has been since my time, of the ablest and safest men who have appeared in the House in the few preceding years. In other words, the Senate, as a whole, is the picked flower of the House, the most experienced men and, as a rule, the best.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: I hope that my knowledge of the subject under debate is not so absolutely less than nothing as the gentleman from Wellesley’s knowledge of the Baptist denomination. The Baptist denomination does not believe that immersion is necessary to salvation. The Baptist denomination believes that no rite or ceremony but only the correct attitude of the heart is necessary to salvation. In reference to my right to speak here with reference to the Constitution and matters of Government, I will say that I used to teach constitutional law in the University of Chicago. [Laughter.]

The resolution was rejected.
XXVIII.

ADJOURNMENTS OF THE GENERAL COURT.

Mr. Robert Luce of Waltham presented the following resolution (No. 83):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth by the adoption of the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.
The General Court, with the concurrence of both branches, may within thirty days of their assembling, adjourn themselves for not more than thirty days.

The committee on The General Court reported the following new draft July 16, 1917 (No. 312):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth by the adoption of the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.
The General Court, with the concurrence of both branches, may, in the course of and wholly within the sixty days after their first assembling, take a recess or recesses amounting to not more than thirty days.

The new draft was considered by the Convention Friday, June 28, 1918, and was ordered to a third reading the same day.

The resolution was read a third time Thursday, August 1, and was passed to be engrossed in the following form (No. 394):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.
The General Court, by concurrent vote of the two Houses, may take a recess or recesses amounting to not more than thirty days; but no such recess shall extend beyond the sixtieth day from the date of their first assembling.

The Convention voted, Thursday, August 15, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 147,104 to 100,552.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Williams of Brookline: I have not read this resolution. Will some of the gentlemen on the committee state what it contemplates?

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: This is a very simple but a very useful resolution. It would enable the General Court to do just what this Convention did,—meet for a short session, then take a recess while its committees were working and come together again, and save time. Those who have stood by that action of the Convention certainly can have no objection to the General Court having the same privilege.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The restriction upon the power of the General Court to adjourn is an inheritance from Colonial days, when the Governors were able to prorogue the Court and thus to cause the colonists great inconvenience and often damage. In the Declaration of Independence one of the grievances set forth by the colonists was the power of the Crown thus to interfere with the orderly conduct of business. So when our Constitutions were framed our forefathers, with this grievance fresh in mind, put in provisions meant to prevent the executive from getting rid of a hostile Legislature, or to prevent the Legislature itself, quarreling with the executive, from using adjournments as a device to worry him. The reason for these clauses long since has passed away. Not in our generation has there been any occasion for the use of this provision which prevents the General Court from adapting its sessions to the needs of the time. It occurred to somebody in California a few years ago that it might be a convenience and facilitate the work of the Legislature if, after coming together for organization, it could take an adjournment, during which time the matters that had been laid before the Legislature could be studied either by committees or by individuals; and so California put into its Constitution this, which is known as the split-session idea. Commending itself to us when our Convention opened we decided to experiment with the same thing; and you will recall that last summer three weeks, if I recollect right, were given to the committees to perform their work, that they might do it without the interference of the sessions of the Convention itself. I have heard no word of criticism of our experiment, but, on the contrary, it seems to have given general satisfaction. Having tried it, as the gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) has said, with success, it would seem not unreasonable to give the Legislature the same opportunity, which it may use if it sees fit. It is but a permissive amendment, empowering the Legislature to do just what we did, if it desires.
XXIX.

APPOINTMENT WHILE IN OFFICE.

Mr. Samuel W. George of Haverhill presented the following resolution (No. 55):

Resolved, That no State official holding an elective office, counsellor, or member of the General Court, after qualifying as such shall be eligible for appointment to any other office the salary of which is paid from the treasury of the Commonwealth, during the term for which he was elected.

The committee on State Administration reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

The resolution was considered by the Convention, Friday, July 12, 1918.

Mr. George moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following article of amendment:

No member of the General Court shall, during the term for which he is elected, be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth, except an office to be filled by vote of the people.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 51 to 68.

The resolution (No. 55) also was rejected the same day.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I move the amendment printed in the calendar.

For the last fifty years we have had a statute in this Commonwealth that provided that no member of the General Court should be eligible for appointment to any position that was created by the General Court of which he was a member, — that is, for the term for which he was elected. I think that law was inviolate for a great many years, but within the last eight or nine years there has been a disposition on the part of the Legislature, whenever they saw an opportunity, to repeal that act. For instance, they would pass a law creating a certain commission, and then they would repeal this statute, so that they could have an understanding with the Governor and the Governor would appoint them to certain places on commissions. In fact in one year there were commissions handed out to three individuals amounting in salary to $12,000, to men who had been useful in getting certain schemes through the Legislature which proved to be very acceptable to the Governor. I know this is a very trivial matter, — probably anything that interferes with the desires of the members of the General Court is very trivial, — but I am one of those who believe that this is a Constitutional Convention and when it finds any particular part of the Constitution ineffective I think that it ought to apply a remedy. This year in the Legislature there was common report that there were a hundred members who shaped their course of action in the Legislature by reason of the fact that they were candidates for appointment on certain recess committees and certain commissions, and there was an attempt in three instances to repeal this statute, which is a constitutional provision of the United States and of many other States, in order to let a large proportion or a large number of the General Court have an opportunity to get positions worth anywhere from $4,000 to $8,000 a year created by themselves with the approval of the Governor. Now, I want to read how the Constitution of the United States deals with this proposition (Article 1, section 6):

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Now our statute to which I referred, which was adopted in the 50's, reads as follows (Rev. Laws, chap. 3, sec. 21):

No member of the General Court shall, during the term for which he is elected, be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth created during such term, except an office to be filled by vote of the people.

I think it generally has been considered if a man wants to be a candidate for the General Court or any elective office and the people want to elect him, they ought to have the right to elect him. But if a man goes out and secures an election to the General Court and he uses that position in order to bargain away some action of his or some influence that he may have gained by such election to secure an appointive position, I think it ought to be stopped in the same way that the Constitution of the United States stops it.

I did not intend to discuss this until we reached the other matter dealing with the recess committees, but I think the question ought to be divided, and that the Convention should discuss it at this time, and possibly give it a standing, so that at some other time it may receive intelligent consideration. I believe that we should remove all opportunity of bargaining between the Governor and the Legislature. It was intended that the Legislature should be independent of the Governor; it was intended that the executive should be independent of the Legislature; and for a great many years, up to within the past ten years, it was a rare instance that the Governor ever invaded the Legislature to make an appointment. I know some years ago when one of our most worthy members of the Superior Court was appointed, —now dead,— that while the Governor wanted to appoint him he refused to appoint him as long as he was a member of the General Court; and I know that Governor after Governor has refused to do so. But within a few years there seems to be a breaking down of the rule. I remember one time back in 1894 when it was proposed to put through a bill in the Legislature to permit the Governor to appoint one of his most intimate friends in the Legislature, and he said if that bill came to him he should veto it, —that is, with this repeal of the law in it that I have referred to. As I say, it has not been repealed in many instances until within the last three or four years, and as I said a few moments ago; —and I understand since then that I did not set the estimate high enough, —there were a hundred members of the present General Court whose conduct was so shaped because they expected that they were going to get a position of some kind as a result of legislation that was pending then in the General Court.

Mr. MAHONEY of Boston: I do not see any necessity for this resolution. Your committee gave a hearing on this matter and the only person who appeared before the committee was the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George). This matter is taken care of by chapter 3, section 21, of the Revised Laws, which reads:

No member of the General Court shall, during the term for which he is elected, be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth created during such term, except an office to be filled by vote of the people.

In 1894 I was a member of the Legislature with the gentleman from Haverhill and there were two cases of this nature which came up before the House. One was that of a gentleman from Cambridge who was secretary of the Board of Prison Commissioners. He was a member of the House in 1893 and 1894 and each year he resigned for the purpose of taking up his position as secretary of the Prison Commission, and the House accepted his resignation. Another case came up in 1894 in Fall River. A bill came before the Legislature to create a police board or a licensing board there. It caused a great deal of opposition because it was interfering with local self-government, but after a bitter contest the bill passed the House and Senate and became a law. The mayor of Fall River wanted to show his appreciation, no doubt, for some member from Fall River who had done good work on the bill, and he mentioned it to this gentleman, and that same member from Fall River tried to resign for the purpose of taking an appointment on that commission, and the House at that time refused to accept his resignation. I merely cite those two cases to show that this matter is wholly in the hands of the Legislature to govern their members.

There is an opinion given by the late Attorney-General, Mr. Knowlton, on this matter, and I will read it to you, and I think after that there will be no necessity of going further on this measure:

Pub. Sta., c. 2, § 33, provides: "No member of the Senate or House shall, during the term for which he is elected, be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth created during such term, except an office to be filled by vote of the people." The obvious purpose of this statute is to remove from a member of the Legislature any temptation to be influenced in his vote by reason of the possibility that he may be a candidate for the place created by the Legislature of which he is a member.

As to your further inquiry, whether a Representative can resign his office after the prorogation of the Legislature, so as to become eligible to such an office, the statute provides that he shall be ineligible "during the term for which he is elected." A Representative is elected for the political year beginning the first Monday in January; he is therefore ineligible during the entire year. It is unnecessary to consider whether he can resign without the consent of the body of which he is a member, although the authorities are against such a proposition. (Opinions of the Attorneys-General, Vol. 1, 347.)

And I leave the rest to the Convention.

Mr. GEORGE of Haverhill: I see that the gentleman who has charge of this report (Mr. Mahoney) agrees with me as to the real virtue in this proposition. The only difference is, he believes it should be left to the Legislature whether they shall act at what they consider a convenient time, while I believe that we should do the same as they have done in Maryland and other States, put it into the Constitution and take it away from the Legislature. If the object was good in 1857 when they passed the law,—and the former Attorney-General says it was perfectly right and the gentleman in charge says it was perfectly right,—let us embalm it by putting it into the Constitution of Massachusetts, and then it will be perfectly secure.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I am not quite certain whether the majority of the members of this Convention fully comprehend the importance of this matter or not. It has been shown by one of the gentlemen in the fourth division (Mr. Mahoney) that we have a legislative enactment that provides against the appointment of a member of the Legislature to any position which that Legislature creates. But the fact remains that in numerous instances,—and I think those instances have been increasing in frequency in recent years,—if there is some good fellow in the Legislature who is popular and who would like the position, as I myself have seen on several occasions, his friends gather around him, they help to put that measure through, create that position, that commission or that office, whatever it may be, to give that good fellow an office. And then they got around the provision of the law of the legislative enactment by providing in the act creating that office and creating this salary of $5,000 or $6,000 that the provision of this general law shall not apply to this particular act; hence they nullify the law. It has been done repeatedly and it is an evil. It is a corrupting and demoralizing evil, not quite on a par with the recess committees, but along the same line. And I hope that the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman, the delegate from Haverhill, with whom I am in absolute accord at this time but with whom I do not always agree, will prevail.

Mr. Curtiss of Hingham: This matter came before the committee on State Administration, and the chairman of that committee is absent. The reason the committee made the report that it has made is simply this: We felt that the proposed amendment was not necessary. If any Governor of this Commonwealth wished to make an appointment of a member of the Legislature then sitting, even if this were in the Constitution or there were a law upon the statute-books, it would be a very simple matter for him to accomplish his purpose by merely waiting until the end of the year and then making the appointment. The report for rejection was based simply upon the one fact that no real good could be accomplished by anything of the kind being added to the Constitution.

Mr. George: In view of the action of the committee, based on the fact that this would be of no importance because the Governor might wait until the gentleman’s term expired, I want to remind him and the committee of the fact that the terms of the Governor and members of the Legislature expire the same day and he could not make the appointment.

Mr. Curtiss: That is true. In many cases where the Governor goes out of office it would have that effect. But in a great many cases, two out of three usually, the Governor comes back. More than that, there is another reason that influenced some members of the committee, and that was this: That sometimes the very best man to receive appointment for a particular position which has been established is a member of the Legislature who has been in close touch with and considering the very topic to which the appointment may relate, and by any such action as this we might cut off the appointment of the very best man for the position.

Mr. Aylward of Cambridge: I do not often agree with the gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George), but I think this is one of the fairest propositions that has been put before this Convention. It is so fair that there is a statute now which if properly enforced and never abrogated would do exactly all the time what this amendment proposes to do.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: May I ask the gentleman from Cambridge if there is not a sharp distinction between the appointment to an office created by the Legislature of which the person appointed was a member, and to one already existing? Does he not realize that this amendment goes very far beyond the present law on the subject?

Mr. Aylward: I am aware that it does, and I am willing to have it go that far. I have paid very little heed to the arguments by the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Curtiss of Hingham) that sometimes some expert is in the Legislature who for some reason is eminently desirable to fill a position on one of these commissions. It is much more desirable that the legislators always should have in mind that no act of theirs in any event shall promote them to a commission, and that we will have a situation which will be such that their actions will not be controlled by the inducement that probably in the future they may be able to benefit themselves. I can see no reason why this may not be incorporated into the Constitution and I believe if this Convention votes to submit it to the people it will be carried by a very large majority.

Mr. Delaney of Holyoke: I should like to ask the gentleman from Haverhill if this amendment would prevent a member of the Legislature from being appointed justice of the peace.

Mr. George: I think it would, and there would be no objection to his being appointed to such a position as that which has no salary attached to it, and if the gentleman thinks it would make it clearer he can move on the next reading to insert "the salary of which is paid from the treasury of the Commonwealth." But my purpose was to submit practically the same constitutional provision which prevails in the government of the United States, to submit that to the people, and allow the people to vote on that proposition, to remove every possible opportunity of trading and bargaining between the legislative and executive departments of the State.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: I should like to ask the distinguished member from Haverhill if that would not prevent the Attorney-General from appointing a member of the Legislature as an assistant in his office.

Mr. George: Of course I understand the situation in the mind of the gentleman from Belmont. If it was my case I would not hesitate to vote for a good principle and a wise provision even though it hit temporarily some member of my family. [Laughter.] Now I am not here to vote for anything to affect my interests or anybody who is akin to me. I am mighty glad that the Attorney-General has appointed the gentleman in mind, because I know him and I know he is a worthy man and an able man. But I do not think I would permit an opportunity for grave wrongs to be indulged in in the future simply because it might affect some member of the Legislature who wanted a position as assistant to the Attorney-General's office or any other office of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Benton: The reason I asked the member from Haverhill the question was so that there be absolutely no misunderstanding as far as I may be concerned. I am going to vote against this amendment. I wanted it to be perfectly apparent why I did. I do not believe in constantly smearing and slurring the members of the Legislature. I do know that there are some honest men in the present Legislature of this State and there have been a great many in years gone by. The present law is sufficient to cover all cases at the present time. I do not think the amendment is necessary and I think that constant reflection,—and I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Waltham,—the continual slurring of our General Court is something that I do not agree with at all.

Mr. Langelier of Quincy: As a member of the committee on State Administration which reported this resolution, I desire to call the attention of the members of the Convention to one clause in the amendment: [He] shall not "be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth", — any office under the authority of the Commonwealth. That is a very broad provision.

The remarks that have been made regarding the necessity for this measure, the amendment put in by the gentleman from Haverhill, are really an attack upon the sincerity of the members and the honesty of purpose of the members of the Legislature in both branches. As a matter of fact, it is also a slur on the Governors of this State, upon the last seven or eight Governors of this State, because I think in each and every case some of our Governors,—in fact I am quite sure that each one of our Governors within the last seven or eight years,—have been fit to find it advisable to make appointments to some offices from members of the Legislature because of their special fitness and because of the fact that those Governors knew those men because of their personal contact with them during their service. Now there is a statute, as I pointed out the other day, which prevents a member of the Legislature being appointed to a commission or any body which he helps to create. With that I am in hearty accord. I also stated the other day that when bills were brought into the Legislature during the period which I served, creating or reorganizing certain commissions, there sometimes would be a clause inserted in such a bill which would eliminate this provision so as to allow a member to be appointed, but in every case that clause was ruled out, the Legislature as a whole not standing for it. So that I believe with the gentleman from my committee who has charge of this matter (Mr. Mahoney) that for the present at least there is law enough, and my main argument is against that one line "to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth." Just consider how broad that one clause is.
XXX.

RECESS COMMITTEES.

Mr. Joseph J. Leonard of Boston presented the following resolution (No. 5):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution so as to provide that no person hereafter elected to a legislative department of the government shall receive salary or compensation for service on any recess or ad interim committee, commission or other office created in whole or in part by action of the body of which he was chosen a member.

The committee on The General Court reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered by the Convention Friday, June 28, 1918.

Mr. Leonard of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft (No. 389):

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2. tion by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3. No person hereafter elected to the legislative depart-
4. ment of the government shall receive salary or compen-
5. sation for service on any recess or ad interim committee, commission or other office created in whole or in part by action of either branch of such department.

This amendment was adopted, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 141 to 68, and, accordingly, the new draft was substituted; and it was ordered to a second reading, rejection, as recommended by the committee on The General Court, having been negatived.

The resolution (No. 389) was read a second time Thursday, August 1.

Mr. Joseph J. Leonard of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 7, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No member of the Legislature shall, during the term for which he is elected, receive salary or compensation for service on any recess committee, commission or other office which shall have been created in whole or in part by action of either branch of the department of legislation of which he is a member, except such committee as may be necessary from time to time to consider a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth.

This amendment was adopted and the resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading Thursday, August 1.

It was read a third time Tuesday, August 13, in the following form (No. 418), as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2. tion by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3. No member of the General Court shall receive any salary or compensation for service in any office or on any commission or recess committee which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during the term for which he was elected, except such committee as may be necessary from time to time to consider a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth.
Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution (No. 418) be amended by striking out lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No person elected to the General Court shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any office created or the emoluments whereof are increased during such term, nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 97 to 50.

Mr. Arthur N. Harriman of New Bedford moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No person elected to either branch of the Legislature shall be appointed to any office created during the term for which he is elected. No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. Clarence W. Hobbs, Jr., of Worcester moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by inserting before the words "be appointed to any office", the words "during the term for which he is elected"; and by striking out the words "the term for which he is elected", and inserting in place thereof the words "such term".

Mr. Ezra W. Clark of Brockton moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by adding at the end thereof the words ", and in no one year shall a sum exceeding twenty thousand dollars be paid as salaries and expenses of recess committees".

The adoption of the amendment moved by Mr. Pillsbury precluded the putting of the question on these amendments.

The resolution, as amended, was placed in the Orders of the Day, the question being on passing it to be engrossed, in the following form (No. 422):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 No person elected to the General Court shall during the term for which he was elected be appointed to any office created or the emoluments whereof are increased during such term, nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption.

It was considered again Wednesday, August 14.

Mr. Arthur N. Harriman of New Bedford moved that the resolution (No. 422) be amended by striking out lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No person elected to either branch of the Legislature shall, during the term for which he is elected, be appointed to any office created during such term. No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Ezra W. Clark of Brockton moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by adding at the end thereof the words ", and in no one year shall a sum exceeding twenty thousand dollars be paid as salaries and expenses of recess committees".
The withdrawal of the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman precluded the putting of the question on this amendment.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the resolution (No. 422) be amended by striking out, in lines 6 to 10, inclusive, the words "nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption", and inserting in place thereof the words "No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by call of the yeas and nays".

This amendment was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 90 to 101.

Mr. George H. Foss of Springfield moved that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "except that, if His Excellency the Governor, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall deem a proposition to be one of public necessity, there may be appointed one recess committee the members of which shall not be subject to the foregoing restrictions".

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution (No. 422) was passed to be engrossed Thursday, August 15 by a vote of 77 to 57.

The Convention voted, Wednesday, August 21, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 152,800 to 87,009.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I desire to move a substitute, which I have offered to the Clerk and which I believe is not objected to.

The substitute resolution makes only a few very slight verbal changes from the resolution which I introduced at the commencement of our deliberations last year, and which the members will find is Convention document No. 5. I call particular attention to the fact that this Convention document No. 5 was introduced very early in the history of the Convention. We have before us as a Convention certain matters to consider concerning the General Court or the legislative department of the State's government. There are two chapters in the Constitution that have to do with the legislative department of the government, and on our docket we have found from time to time very many matters that have to do with the Great and General Court. I make what may seem a very elementary statement to make, because it has seemed to me, and I think possibly to some others of the Convention, that in the last session of the General Court there seemed to be a feeling upon the part of a considerable portion of its membership that any consideration of the functions of that body was something that was not germane to our deliberations. I have no desire at this time or in the consideration of this question to engage in any controversy with the allegations that were made in the last legislative session, with the exhibitions of sarcasm, of disparagement and of alleged humor that at times were shown regarding this Convention.

Those statements in the Legislature have received all the importance that they merited; in other words, they have not received any attention whatsoever in this body. I refer to the subject at this time in order to demonstrate only that the introduction of this resolution one year ago was for the purpose of applying a remedy to what I believe has been a gross and abusive practice in our legislative department. I have not given credence at any time to some of the more radical things that have been said regarding the legislative body. I myself have been a member of that body, and this resolution was not introduced excepting in a way of meeting what I believe is an abuse that has grown up through a number of years, particularly in the last decade, and in the discussion of this matter I trust I may be entirely impersonal.

Now, gentlemen, what is the recess committee? The recess committee is a committee that is appointed by the order of either branch of the General Court or it is a committee that is appointed by a joint order of both branches. The recess committee investigates upon some well-known subject of discussion, which subject serves as a pretext, — I say pretext in the great majority of cases, — for the appointment of a committee. This committee, by the way, is not subject in any way to the executive approval or executive sanction for its creation. It is appointed by vote of either branch or of both branches.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the members of these recess committees always get their pay through the approval and sanction of the executive department, — the Governor and Council.

Mr. Leonard: My remarks have to do with the orders appointing the committees. I believe the matter of compensation receives the approval of the Governor and Council. In fact there has been somewhat of discussion even in the press of to-day regarding a controversy before the Governor's Council on that very point. The order creating the recess committee is an order that emanates either from the House or Senate, is passed by either the House or Senate or by both branches and does not go to the executive for approval. I think I have made myself clear on that point.

Mr. Sawyer: I understood the gentleman's resolution and his remarks were directed against compensation of members of recess committees, not the appointment of committees, and it seems to me his argument breaks down. The compensation is in the hands of the executive department. The Legislature can appoint the committees in spite of his resolution, but the compensation is in the hands of the executive department.

Mr. Leonard: I am very glad that the gentleman has asked that question. I am not attacking the recess committee; I am attacking the paid recess committee and I am attacking the compensation of recess committees. I am attacking the principle whereby a man who is elected to the General Court receives double the salary of the office to which his constituents returned him, and I am attacking the principle of compensation wherever and from whomsoever it comes and whether it is with executive approval or not. I wish to write into our fundamental law that there shall be no compensation paid for recess committee work. That will not in any way deprive the General Court of the power of appointing recess committees from time to time as they see fit, provided those recess committeemen serve on that committee work and give the same time and volunteer service to the Commonwealth that I think most of us are giving from time to time on various committees in our various and several communities.

Let me say that the principle of payment, in this State at least, is something of very recent origin. In the '80s and '90s the recess committees received no compensation, but were reimbursed for the expenses which were incurred in the study and investigation of their particular subjects. When I went to the committee on The General Court of this body last year I did not go there with any great array of evidence or of witnesses, and as a matter of fact I do not think that has been the practice in the hearings before the committees of this Convention. I went there and very meekly presented my case, and I supposed that those gentlemen of the committee on The General Court, — I presume they all have had service in the Legislature, — had in their possession knowledge regarding its practice, far better, perhaps, than anything I was able to give them. And yet I wonder to-day, after the committee on The General Court has voted unanimously that this resolution ought not to pass, — I wonder to-day whether in the light of the history of the General Court which recently deceased, they now would give the same report on this resolution of mine. I rather think that if the committee on The General Court had had the foresight to withhold this resolution until this year before they reported to the Convention, there might have been somewhat of hesitancy on the part of the Legislature when they appointed six committees and when the presiding officer of the House was obliged to jump into the forensic arena to protect the public against the appointment of a seventh committee. I wonder if those committees would have been appointed if there had not been upon our docket a unanimous report rejecting this proposition to abolish this principle of the paid recess committee.

I understand, of course, in these days that matters of financial consideration are not perhaps of very grave importance. I served on the Ways and Means Committee in 1905, and I recall at that time that there was a State tax of some four millions of dollars and we were very much disturbed about it and we hoped that the tax would be reduced speedily. Well, I have forgotten what the tax was the present year; I think it was somewhere near eleven or twelve millions, and the Legislature congratulated itself that it was not a million or two million dollars more.

Now during the past years for which I have the figures in which recess committees have been appointed, there has been expended by the Commonwealth something over $700,000 for recess committee work. Again, gentlemen, I am not urging the financial consideration as the chief and important matter in the discussion of this resolution.

There is another phase to this question, and a more important phase, and I think that is a fact to which most members who have served in the Legislature can testify, — that when at the end of the session there are forty or fifty men of that body appointed to recess committees, the very fact of these appointments has a very distinct influence upon legislation and upon the shaping of legislation. I wish to read to the Convention very briefly a few extracts that I have gathered from time to time from some of the Boston papers. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to read these in their entirety. If I was to do so I think I might throw a very picturesque feature into the dis-Cussion of this question, but I wish to be impersonal and I do not wish to quote the reasons why certain men were appointed to committees and other men were not; but I will quote from a few of the papers so as to show what the public sentiment is at the present time regarding recess committees. This is from the Boston Traveler. (After a pause.) I will not quote that, because I find it contains a personal reference, but I will first quote an item from one of the Sunday papers. This was before the Legislature adjourned. [Reading.]

RECESS PLUMS RIPENING.

This attachment of your representatives to the political cause of their Speaker is a natural thing, when the Speaker has been a decent sort of presiding officer. If a member is given good committee assignments, he is likely to return the favor when he has a chance to do so. If he is given a place on a recess committee, with its extra compensation and mileage and its pleasant and not often too arduous duties, he is almost sure to return the favor if opportunity is offered him.

There are four or five such recess committees in sight for this year, and the expenditure for them in the aggregate will be large. Appointments to these committees are the best plums to be given out by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House.

Here is a quotation from the Traveler:

Speaking of economy, it may not have escaped the attention of our readers that the members of six recess committees have been appointed to draw salaries from the people of the Commonwealth during the summer and fall seasons. The reporters, utterly lacking in reverence for the majesty of Beacon Hill, refer to the appointments as "plums"; for every one of the fifty-six members appointed to recess committees will receive $1,000 in addition to his salary as a legislator.

Each committee will have a clerk, and the clerk is usually a newspaper man of ability, who is expected to convince the public by means of his official report that the committee which he serves has actually wrestled with grave problems.

This year's recess committees are to consider these topics, some of which are familiar and of permanent value as pretexts for the appointment of recess committees: The fish industry, water resources, working-men's compensation, educational system, sheep and agriculture, taxation problems.

One of the greatest of our taxation problems would be solved if those who control the General Court could be made to comprehend the exact meaning of the word economy, aside from its utility in plattitudinous buncombe at the beginning of and during a legislative year.

Mr. Merrill, writing in the Globe early in the session, — and this is the ordinary political article in the press, — says:

Apparently the usual number of recess committees will be appointed unless public sentiment can be roused in opposition. These committees, as a rule, accomplish nothing except to spend the State's money. The custom is to pay each member $1,000 for his services during the summer months, and such appointments are eagerly sought by Senators and Representatives. In these days, when economy is preached on every occasion, the Legislature should set a good example. A study of the Auditor's report for the past few years will show that many thousands of dollars of the State's income have been spent by these recess committees without adequate return to the public.

And I could quote further. The opinion of the press is that this Constitutional Convention will not have accomplished its full duty unless it takes action to do away with this flagrant abuse and graft of the paid recess committee.

I wish to state this: That these recess committees frequently from time to time make a report; that report is made to the Legislature and the matter discussed, and it frequently leads to the appointment of another recess committee. There are cases in the Auditor's reports which show that that has happened from time to time. I submit to the Convention these considerations regarding this abuse, not merely from the standpoint of economy or from the standpoint of any financial saving to the Commonwealth, but I wish the members to consider the practice whereby the presiding officer can select forty or fifty members of the body and give these recess appointments from year to year, and then ask yourselves whether or not that has a beneficial effect in the direction of our legislation.

It has been argued at times that this was hardly a matter that should be written into our fundamental law. I regret that it is necessary to write it into our Constitution. I regret that the action of the Massachusetts General Court during the past ten or fifteen years has been such that it is necessary for a man to get up on the floor of this body and advocate this action. I would much prefer that the history of the Legislature had been such that if I or any other man had raised a voice in favor of this proposition we would have been met with the answer: "No, the General Court can be trusted; they will not do any such thing as that." But I submit to you gentlemen, in the light of the history of recent years, successive years, one after another, and this year, with this matter still pending in this Convention, when the country is engaged in war, with the spectacle of these recess committees being appointed, whether you can trust the Legislature on this subject. I believe the question whether this proposed amendment should be written into the Constitution should be referred to the people.

There is one other matter I should like to call to your attention. We already, on the docket to-day, have passed favorably upon item No. 184, which relates to adjournments of the General Court and allows the General Court to take a recess of thirty days. I submit there again that within that period of time there will be plenty of time for recess work. I submit further that those recess committees that may be needed to be appointed will get better service from their members, be they rich or be they poor, if they receive their appointment thereon without solicitation or because of the financial remuneration for the service. And I believe that as we, all of us, in our various communities are serving on all kinds of committees, giving work and time for the public welfare, we at least can call upon the General Court in those times when recess committees are needed to give free and volunteer service on those matters that are put before them. I submit this for the consideration of the Convention, for despite the report of the committee I feel that you will give it careful consideration. I do not regard a committee's report in this Convention as a matter of conclusive proof upon a given question. It is hardly a matter of prima facie proof, because the members here are men of such experience that we have not been influenced by the show or demonstration made in the committee-room, and the knowledge or the information brought to bear upon a subject like that is equally within the possession of all of us; and I have assumed, irrespective of the report of the committee, to move to substitute the resolution as offered on this matter.

I thank you very much for the attention you have given. [Applause.]

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: Undoubtedly there is a feeling in the community that the privilege of appointing members of the General Court to recess committees has been abused at times and that a larger number of recess committees have been created than the necessities of public business demanded. But the proposition before us to-day is a very narrow proposition. The gentleman does not ask that the practice of appointing recess committees be abolished; he asks us to write into the Constitution of Massachusetts the statement that members of recess committees so appointed shall not receive compensation. That would be a very novel thing to write into a Constitution. The Constitution does not attempt to prescribe the salary of any one in the employ of the Commonwealth. It is not the business of the Constitution of Massachusetts. It is supposed, in the ideal of those who created it and who have perpetuated it, to contain merely a statement of fundamental principles, the great underlying principles upon which a great Commonwealth should be conducted. For that reason alone if for no other I do not think that the members of this body want to propose such a trivial amendment to the Constitution to the people of Massachusetts.
RECESS COMMITTEES.

But that is not the only thing that rests in my mind. The spirit which prompted the editorials or the clippings by some of the political writers which have been read by the gentleman (Mr. Leonard) bring to my mind a sentiment which might as well be faced now as at any other time; that is, the attack by certain people upon those who are elected to public office and who come here annually trying to do their duty. If a proposition comes into a public body to increase the salary of a janitor, of an elevator man, of a clerk of a court, you can get any amount of support,—to increase the salary from three thousand to five, from five to seven, from seven to eight, and all the way up the line; and they will rise and point out that the difference in the cost of living has made it necessary for the public agency, be it the Commonwealth or the city or town, to increase the compensation of this worthy individual who has served with such distinction in this job, no matter how menial or how exalted it may be. But when they come to consider the men who have the legislative duties to perform, there seems to be a feeling that they should be overcome with patriotism to the extent that they should sacrifice their personal business, their means of livelihood, and devote their services year after year to the Commonwealth absolutely gratis. The compensation of the members of the legislative department of the government is so ridiculously low that it is within the knowledge of every one that the Legislature to-day is made up practically of two classes of men: One, a class so endowed outside of their personal business that they do not need the salary, and the other class so poor that they can live on a thousand dollars a year. And it prevents men coming here who should come here, and we find in rare cases men able to come here year after year and accustom themselves to legislative duties and to give the Commonwealth the character of service that the Commonwealth’s business demands. I think it is time that the people understood this and that men in legislative capacity should let the people understand the real value of the service which members of the legislative bodies render to the community. I think it would be very unbecoming to write into the Constitution a prohibition of such a trivial character as this, and I do not believe that the members of this Convention in seriousness, while some of them may believe there is some slight abuse of the privilege, will want to write into the Constitution of Massachusetts such a trivial question as this.
Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I want to give you a little inside information on the subject which I gained by a couple of years' experience and observation in the Legislature of the effect of this pernicious practice on the members. If you have watched, as I have, in the House of Representatives the actions of the so-called party whips and the promises that they hold out to legislators, of recess committee appointments,—I have known probably as many as seventy-five promises made of positions on recess committees when there might be not more than thirty of such possible appointments,—you will have seen the evil where representatives are approached by some whip of their side and told: "Now, look here, you are slated for a recess committee. You do this, or do not do that." And when these appointments are promised to any large group of men in the House, what effect it must have upon pending legislation! I have seen, in the last day of the session, men who have been promised by some important personage in the House that they were going to get a recess committee, when the names of committee appointments are read out and those poor fellows who had performed their part found their names were not among the favored few,—I have seen those members go out through those doors as though they had been beaten. If you had seen the effect of this practice upon the members as well as on the legislation, you would say that this pernicious practice ought to be stopped.

I have seen young members whose voices during the first year they were here were heard in advocating progressive legislation, and in their second year their voices were still, due to the promise of places on recess committees.

Mr. Kinney: I should like to ask the gentleman whether the effect on legislation which he has mentioned was caused by the efforts of those disappointed in securing recess committees or by the efforts of those gratified by such an appointment.

Mr. Carr: The difficulty is that not until the closing hour of the Legislature does anybody know who are to be the recipients of the recess committee appointments. It is by the mere promise that they are going to get an appointment,—the same promise to this man and to the other man that they are slated for a recess committee,—by that alone is the evil done. It is not the fact that they are going to get it, but the hope founded on promises to all those men, whoever they be, that affects legislation.

I have seen young men who the first year, when they were not candidates for recess committees, have stood on the floor of this House and advocated legislation that was beneficial for the people. I have seen those men the following session remain absolutely as though they were dumb. They had not a word to say and sat in their seats at times when you would have expected them to be heard in advocacy of certain legislation. When you inquired what was the reason for the silence you would be informed that they were slated for a recess committee appointment. You probably would feel sorry for them that they were tempted by that bait. And then at the end of the session, as I say, when those young men found themselves betrayed, I have seen them go out of this chamber crestfallen with the broken promise that had been given but had not been lived up to. They had given their year of silence without the reward.

Now that is one point of view. But my friend in the second division here (Mr. William S. Kinney) says that this principle is not fundamental. Could any principle be more fundamental than that no man shall be paid twice for the performance of duty that he has been elected to do? That is the principle that we are trying to engraft into this Constitution. A man who is a candidate for the House of Representatives knows that his salary is to be $1,000. He does not know or expect to receive any additional $1,000 for service on a recess committee. He takes his oath of office that he is going to do all the duties incumbent upon him as a representative for that $1,000. Is there any reason why there should not be such a limitation in our Constitution that should say that he is to receive no more than the salary that is awarded to him? If you are going to say that the salary is small, that the $1,000 does not pay the members, why should any group of forty out of 240 be the favored class to receive an increase? If it is not enough, why should not they increase the salaries so that every man will get the increase and not give it to this man who bartered his honor, and bartered his constituents for that matter, for the reward of a recess committee? It is an evil; it is an evil which has grown until now even the press cannot remain silent. There have been read by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Leonard) quotations that say there is an evil, and the duty is on this Constitutional Convention to do its part to cure it. There will be no great evil done by adopting this resolution. No man who gets elected to the Legislature seeks election with the idea of getting a recess committee. It is when he arrives here and he sees those temptations held out to him that he fails. I have known of cases where men have refused to vote for quorums or stand up for roll-calls or failed to give correct account of the vote in their division and many other ways of earning this so-called reward. Toward the end of the session those very men who sold themselves so cheap find in a great many instances that they had not received the reward that they had been promised.

Now on the practical side of recess committees. Take any one of the six recess committees that have been appointed by the last Legislature. As practical legislators you know that there are avenues of information by which the incoming House can get any information without the aid of a recess committee. Every subject that is before these present recess committees is a matter on which a commission of some sort could furnish all the information. We can instruct the commissions to hold hearings and advise the Legislature on any subjects upon which any legislation is needed. Committees of the Legislature send for those commissions and get the information. Will there be any great harm done if we stop the recess committees entirely? If you do not want to pay recess committees and if you still feel that they are necessary, with the provision that we already have passed (allowing a recess for one month during the session), the Legislature can take this recess. Let the men go into committee and do the work that they have agreed to do for $1,000 and report back to the resumed session, and thus do away with this evil of recess committees. I hope that the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Boston will be adopted.

Mr. UNDERHILL of Somerville: It is a peculiar situation that I find myself in accord with the gentleman in the second division (Mr. William S. Kinney) in words spoken in defence of his attitude on the question, and find myself absolutely unsympathetic with the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Carr) who has taken this opportunity to attack the Legislature, but, propose to vote against the gentleman in the second division and with the gentleman in the third division. There is one excuse, possibly, for the appointment of recess committees, and that is to inflict punishment upon a nuisance who happens to be elected by a constituency to that body. That is one good excuse for the maintenance of recess committees. For the Speaker, responsible for the conduct of that body and largely held responsible for the legislation, frequently can control to a certain extent those men who are not controlled by decency or by their oath of office. But the evil has grown from year to year and it should be stopped, and to my mind it can be stopped only by a Constitutional provision. Why, the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Carr) when he says that the men took a contract in the Legislature to serve for a year’s term for $1,000 and that they should not be paid twice, forgets that he himself took a contract last year for $750, and then went to the Legislature to get that pay increased, and the Legislature gave him $500 to serve on a recess committee, or what might be compared to a recess committee.

Mr. Carr: I should like to ask the gentleman if he says that I appeared before any committee and asked for $500. If he does he is very, very much mistaken. I did not appear before any recess committee and I asked no money for any attendance at this Convention.

Mr. Underhill: I did not say the gentleman appeared before a recess committee, but when the gentleman refuses to accept his salary of $500 granted by the Legislature to the members of this Convention, then I will absolve him from all blame connected with taking a double salary. Until then I think my statement holds good.

Now, sir, one of the greatest evils of a recess committee is this, that it does create a feeling of jealousy and it also creates in the House unrest on the part of some of the members who know that they cannot be appointed to a recess committee, and who for revenge and in a mean spirit work their very hardest to discredit that body.

Now that is a bad feature and offsets the good excuse previously referred to. Another bad feature is that when one recess committee is really necessary, possibly, to bring out all the information needful for the new or incoming Legislature to act intelligently upon a matter, then immediately some other members of the House try to find some excuse for the appointment of more recess committees in order that they too may serve. Why, at the last session, even after the Legislature had provided six recess committees, His Excellency the Governor kept us for two or three extra days, and the only solution he could find for the problem on which he disagreed with the Legislature was the suggestion to the House that they appoint another recess committee.

Now it is not altogether the fault of the members of the Legislature. As the gentleman in the second division (Mr. William S. Kinney) well said, men come here for pensions, for increases in salary, for the improvement, if you please, of the Merrimack valley, or for the purpose of making Boston pay fifty-five per cent of the cost of a roadway down to Lynn, and they are commended for their efforts in those directions.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Somerville, in the third division, if he ever was commended by the citizens of Somerville for any public act that he did, — ever?

The Presiding Officer: The Chair hopes the gentlemen will not indulge in personalities.

Mr. Underhill: I trust the Chair will allow me to reply that the gentleman's question, like practically all of his questions —

The Presiding Officer: It will be very much better if the gentleman will confine himself to the question under discussion.

Mr. Underhill: For three years I served as ranking member on the committee on Rules in the Legislature during the service of one of our members as the Speaker of that body. During those three years not a recess committee was appointed, and the Speaker of the House at that time is deserving of great credit, for considerable pressure was brought to bear upon him. And, sir, a great deal of the unpopularity which I enjoy throughout the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is due to the fact that as ranking member on the committee on Rules I had to fight from the beginning of the session until the end in opposition to the establishment of such committees.

Now, sir, there is another phase of the situation. The ranking man on Rules never has an easy job, but he has a harder job choosing the men for recess committees in conjunction with the Speaker than any other thing he has to do. There may be occasional necessity for the appointment of a recess committee. There has been in the past a great deal of good that comes from a recess committee. For instance, one year there was appointed a committee on Municipal Finance, and the work which that committee did during the recess was of inestimable value to the Commonwealth and to the municipalities. But, sir, ordinarily those things can be taken care of by the Legislature itself; and if occasion does arise for the necessity of a recess committee, if I were a member of that body, I would much rather serve because I was interested in the subject, because I could add something to the subject, because I could be of some value to the Commonwealth, than for a mere pittance of $1,000, which might mean six months of hard work and no credit whatever.

Now, sir, it ill becomes any member of this Convention to cast aspersions upon the Legislature and the work which it has accomplished when we realize how subject we ourselves are to criticism on the very same grounds that we are criticizing the Legislature. And I hope that the discussion of this question will be confined, as the gentleman in this division who introduced the resolution (Mr. Leonard) confined himself, to the merits of the question, without reflection on the Legislature. I should like to answer the queries of some of the members of the Convention as they are propounded to me from time to time if only parliamentary usage or requirements did not hold me in leash. The trivial questions, the attempts at humor which is only buffoonery, — such things as that have no place in this Convention, and any one who indulges in that and then criticizes the Legislature ought to be invited to come some time to its sessions and see the seriousness with which the members undertake the work which they have to do. And so, sir, I trust that this Convention may remove the temptation from the path of those who are beset on all sides, who are criticized from the beginning of the session until the end of the session, criticism which runs over and spills all over the Commonwealth, when it is not deserved, — when commendation really ought to be their reward instead of criticism. I trust that the temptation may be removed from their pathway and that in the future we may not have the necessity of paid recess commissions appointed from the House and from the Senate of the Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Mr. Glazier of Hudson: Those who have spoken before, I think, are members or ex-members of the House. They know the inside and outside. Possibly it would be well for one to speak who never has been honored by being a member of the Legislature.

I understand this question to be one of pay, and it seems to me that the committee should inform us why committees are appointed, some of their duties, what they accomplish and how much of their work is adopted by the Legislature, that we may know as members of this Convention what they are worth to the Commonwealth and why we should pay them for their duties. I have been interested in listening to the remarks of these gentlemen, the friendly spirit which has been exhibited [laughter], and the very cordial opinions which they have of the members of the Legislature. I understood the gentleman in the second division having charge of this report (Mr. William S. Kinney) to state that there were two kinds of members of the Legislature and that those outside are the parties who ought to be in the Legislature, I presume, in place of those who are in the Legislature. I have understood also from the gentleman from Somerville in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill), — and I believe I am giving him an opportunity now to qualify that statement, which I believe he will appreciate, — that those who are elected on recess committees are simply nuisances in the House. Now I have known some of these members who I have been informed have been on recess committees, and I have looked upon them as good fellows and hardly to be considered a nuisance to anybody.

Mr. Underhill: May I call to the gentleman’s attention that I said that one purpose possibly of a recess committee was that it gave the Speaker an opportunity to control certain nuisances, and furthermore that in opposition to that argument, it also did create a feeling on the part of certain nuisances who could not possibly hope to be appointed on recess committees because of their inability to fill the office, — that one offset the other.

Mr. Glazier: I felt quite confident that the gentleman would appreciate the opportunity to qualify the statement which he made at that time.

Debate on the subject was continued after the noon recess.

Mr. Glazier: At the close of the morning session I was attempting to state my opinion that the question before us on the substitute was one of compensation or salary rather than a question of abolishing recess committees; and it seemed to me that the committee having this matter in charge, or this resolution, should give to us some information showing that the work of these committees is of some benefit to the Commonwealth. I feel that some of us who are unfamiliar with the workings of legislative bodies would be interested, and better fitted, possibly, to vote on this motion, if the chairman of this committee having this resolution in charge would give us some information in regard to the workings of these committees, — not only the workings, but the necessity, and some of the conditions under which they do this work. It would be very interesting to know why they are appointed, and to learn a little of their experiences in securing the valuable information which the State pays for. It would be interesting to know how much they carry from the State, and how much they bring back from the places to which they go for this valuable information. It would be very interesting for some of us to know just how far and how deep they go into these questions; whether in securing this information they go so far as to enter into the very life, the material, and the experience of some of the questions which they are to report back to the State.

And so I believe that, this being a question, as it is, of “showing the goods” before we pay for the goods, that unless these points of information are brought to the Convention, it is for the Convention to support the substitute amendment as offered by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Leonard).

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I was not a member of the committee on The General Court, and yet the question of the gentleman from Hudson (Mr. Glazier) inspires me to give a brief statement of some of my experiences with this matter in the General Court.

I have been a member of the General Court for, lo, these many years, and have been a member of two recess committees in that time. I have watched the procedure of events from a position in the upper branch. Hence I saw something of the method by which recess committees were created and appointments made, having served for a number of years on the committee on Rules, which authorizes the appointment of the recess committees.

It would be far from my intention to disclaim all the truth of much that has been said relative to recess committees. There is no question at all but what recess committees, from the standpoint of the presiding officer, are very trying problems. The presiding officer at the end of the year, if recess committees are appointed, is faced with the somewhat trying problem of deciding which of his family he is to give favors to and which he is to turn down; and that, for a presiding officer, is always a trying and difficult question. He has to solve the question of appointments, whether they shall be upon merit or whether in accord with the needs of the individual, or whether in recompense for past meritorious service. All these questions doubtless weigh in the mind of the presiding officer. In addition to that, he is subjected to pressure from all sides, most of the members not relying entirely upon their own merits to win them places upon these committees.

Take it all in all, I have no doubt that the presiding officers of both branches would have no particular objection to the passage of this resolution, because the appointment of these recess committees probably makes them more enemies than friends, inasmuch as inevitably there are several men disappointed for every one who goes away happy.

Recess committees, however, have been felt in the General Court to be something of a necessary evil. There have been years in which no recess committees were appointed. There have been years in which it has seemed necessary to appoint recess committees, and I will endeavor to state very briefly where the necessity lies.

The General Court, as I think is well known, suffers each year from having to consider a great number of propositions. It cannot devote itself to a few segregated problems. Under its rules it must consider all matters that are brought before it; and, unfortunately, events have so shaped themselves of recent years that the volume of legislation presented to the General Court for consideration has been very large. In some years it has reached the 3,000 mark. I think in the last eight or nine years it has not fallen below 2,000 bills.

Now, 2,000 bills are a great deal for a legislative body to consider. The Convention had about 350 matters to consider, and the Convention appreciates the difficulty that we have had in considering so many propositions. Consider the position of the Legislature, sitting in two different bodies, passing upon very nearly ten times the same number of matters. It is no small task to deal with so many different problems, to deal with them swiftly, and at the same time to give them the consideration that they deserve.

It follows that a great deal has to be done in committees, and it is unfortunately the case that between committee hearings and the sessions of the General Court a member who desires to devote a fair share of his time to a careful consideration of the many matters before him finds his time pretty full. That is true particularly of the Senate, where each member is a member of at least three committees. I myself was a member of four committees last year, and I can assure the Convention that between those committees my time was very well occupied.

It follows, as a result of that, that the amount of time that can be given to each problem coming before a committee, — assuming that the committee is one that has a fair number of matters before it, — the amount of time that can be devoted to hearings and the consideration of any one problem, of necessity is limited.

The General Court does not consider solely matters that can be disposed of in a limited time. Some of the matters that come before it are matters complex in the extreme. Take the great subject of taxation, which absorbs so much of our time every year. Anybody who has dealt with the formulation of tax laws realizes the difficulties under which we labor, — difficulties not only of a constitutional nature, as has been discussed in this Convention, but difficulties of a practical nature as well. It is very difficult for a legislative committee to give the study, in the few brief months that the General Court sits, that such a complex and difficult subject requires. Many of the members come in there fresh, knowing little about the subject, and have to spend a certain amount of time becoming familiar with it. That is an unavoidable fault of our system. Our General Court changes its membership so frequently, and so much time has got to be spent in breaking in the new men, that the time, already too brief for the consideration of the various matters before it, becomes even more painfully abbreviated.

Take the subject of water conservation, which was before the General Court last year. That is a subject involving both engineering problems and legal problems of great complexity. We had before us this year a report from the Commission upon Waterways and Public Lands. They submitted a report, coupled with an engineering report, which actually was not completely printed until after the close of the Legislative session.

Now, without such information at our hands it is very difficult to see how we could have covered that problem adequately. It is a proposition that took the Commission on Waterways and Public Lands several months to formulate, and they started with an expert knowledge of the subject. The Legislature, not being experts, might conceivably take a great deal longer to consider such a matter fairly and with due regard to the effort to do it justice.

Take the subject of the fish industry. We created last year a special committee to sit during the session of the General Court upon the fish industry. It was claimed, and I think the evidence justifies it, — to some extent, at least, — that a combination existed in the fish industry which tended to raise prices unduly, and to exact an unjust toll from the people of the Commonwealth. The committee held hearing after hearing, — I do not now recall how many it was, — but it held a large number of hearings, sitting several times a week through the greater part of the session; and in that time they were able to complete the study of that part of the fish industry only, — undoubtedly the major part, — which centers in the city of Boston.

On those three subjects, to go no further, the General Court felt that it was necessary to extend the study during the recess, by recess committees. In the confusion of the session that inevitably arises from the great multitude of matters that are being considered, through the necessary changes that have to take place from committee to committee, and the time that is spent in considering other matters, it is very difficult to get either from committee or from the General Court the time that is necessary for the study of one of these very complex propositions; and it is for that reason that the recess committee has proved in the past to be something of a necessity if these problems are to be worked out in the General Court.

There are other alternatives, of course. You can commit these matters to a commission. The vice of that is that a commission starts in with a prepossession of its own importance, and nine times out of ten a commission’s report on a subject of that sort involves an extension of the function of that commission; and if the recess committee is an evil, the commission evil is probably a more pressing one.

It is possible to deal with such matters by a special commission appointed by the Governor, usually an unpaid commission. The difficulty with that is that by losing the power to control the personnel of those who are to make the investigation, the General Court loses a certain power over the course of the investigation. The executive and the legislative branches frequently are not of one mind; and unless the Legislature has pretty complete control over the means by which its investigations are conducted it loses a sensible part of its power to make investigations.

As to investigations by an unpaid recess committee, as the amendment offered by the gentleman would seem to require, this I think may be said, — and this I think ought to be said: It always is possible, either in the General Court or out of the General Court, to get devoted men who will give their time and their services freely to the State. I do not think that a member of the General Court who was asked to serve on an unpaid commission would fail to rise to the occasion and make whatever sacrifice was necessary. We have had recess committees appointed under just those conditions. At one session of the General Court, where joint recess committees were refused, the House took matters into its own hands and appointed House recess committees.

The subject of recess committees had been agitated pretty thoroughly, and the Senate had gone on record against them and declined to put through the necessary resolves which would authorize compensation to be given. As a result, those recess committees served the entire fall without compensation, although next year they fell from grace and came back to the General Court asking to be compensated for their time,—and they got it. But they served without any reasonable expectation of getting any compensation. And any recess committee expects to take its place on the assurance solely of custom,—that the Governor and Council will allow them any compensation at all; because the General Court does not fix the compensation of its recess committees but allows them such compensation as shall be allowed by the Governor and the Council.

As to unpaid recess committees, although, as I say, you always can get men to serve on such committees, and I have no doubt that they would do good work, too, yet I wish to submit these two matters for your consideration: In the first place, as a rule the Commonwealth gets just about what it pays for. The result of the labors of unpaid commissions has not been always to the greatest satisfaction. In the second place, the tendency of such a rule being made an absolute rule would be to reduce membership on those committees to those who could afford to give the time. No Speaker of the House, no President of the Senate, would feel inclined to put upon such committees men who would have to make a sensible sacrifice by serving on the committees. I think the Convention can realize how great the sacrifice has been to some of the members of this Convention who have served for no very adequate compensation, month after month, and who have been faced with the problem at the end of the last session either of serving for nothing at all, or serving with the expectation of the General Court realizing the magnitude of their services and of their deserts. It is no light thing to ask a man to neglect his own affairs, to forego the opportunity of maintaining himself, if not his family, in reasonable comfort, and to give his time to the General Court. If he can afford it, well and good. If he cannot afford it, he can do so only at a great sacrifice, which sometimes is a very painful one.

There is no question but what that sacrifice would be made if necessary. The question for us to decide is whether we want to have the Commonwealth go on record as desiring to accept such sacrifices, and whether it befits the dignity of the Commonwealth, when there is no real necessity, to demand such sacrifices. That, it seems to me, is a thing we ought to consider very seriously. As to whether this resolution goes through or not, it is of very little consequence to me. My service in the General Court is probably not for many years longer, and I certainly do not expect to be a candidate for many recess committees in the future. But it does seem to me, however, as though this was, after all, a rather petty subject for the Constitutional Convention to spend its time upon,—as to whether, after all, the evil that is aimed at is not rather a petty evil, that is much better dealt with by the force of public opinion than by constitutional enactment; and that matter I leave for the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. Bauer of Lynn: As a member of this Convention who never has been a member of either of the legislative bodies, I rise before the members advocating the amendment of the member in the fourth division (Mr. Leonard) to the document known as document No. 5, which to my mind is a simple and effective way of forever doing away with the constantly increasing and crying abuses that have been permitted by the Legislature in the appointment of recess committees. The legislators do not seem to understand what the people of this Commonwealth think of this matter; they constantly are doubling this expenditure of the State's money on legislative committees, because only occasionally a legislative committee does real good work. But the people of the Commonwealth who understand how legislative recess committees are started know that the procedure in the Legislature itself, in the conduct of starting and the receiving of appointments, and the disappointments from not receiving an appointment on those committees, has an immoral political effect in our Legislature and is against the public welfare. Every plain civilian who has not served in either House understands that thoroughly. There is a constant growing determination on the part of all the people in this Commonwealth, as I see it, to prevent, if they can, the abuse of legislative practices in this matter which the Legislature itself has not been able to prevent or curb, and which seems to be growing worse and worse as the years go by.
RECESS COMMITTEES.

I have appeared before legislative committees in this State House on matters that provoked a great deal of contention, and I have had members of those committees come to me and say: "Bauer, if you will go and see the Speaker and use your influence to have a summer recess committee appointed, we think we can solve this problem in a way that will be satisfactory to you." Now, that has been done to me within two years, and several times within fifteen years. I mention it to show you some of the immoral practices that have been permitted to creep into the Legislature, to the disadvantage of the public welfare.

I have asked members of a recess committee that has been appointed on a matter that I was very earnestly interested in to report to me what their experience was in certain cities that they visited for information; about the subject-matter that the committee was appointed for; and the most that I could get from them was their experience in enjoying "high-balls," and things of that nature, and the sociability of the evenings at those places, and they did not seem to concern themselves at all about the subject-matter. When they bring in their report, and introduce a bill to this Legislature, it is such a report and such a bill that the Legislature itself will not stand for it, and they offer from five to fifty amendments to the bill, and the bill as finally passed would not be recognized by any member of the recess committee that originally was responsible for formulating it.

I know very well that this is not a popular picture to draw. I have no patience with any men of this Convention who rise on their feet and deprecate every effort that is made to criticize unfair and immoral practices of their own Legislature, — a body that they are interested in, or should be, — that governs every movement of every citizen in this State. Neither have I any patience with some men who, when they get up, compare members of this Convention with the members of a recess committee, and the purpose of this Convention with the purpose of a recess committee.
I submit such matters as I have offered to all you men here, facing that banner over there on the wall (referring to a chart showing the annual debt of the Commonwealth) as you must have faced it some time to-day, and knowing that the recess committees appointed by the Legislature this year will entail an expense of from $75,000 to $100,000, which I regard as a needless expense upon the taxpayers of this State, for information that could be ascertained easily by going to the various State commissions and sitting down with them and asking them to find out for the members of the Legislature the information that it is necessary for the Legislature to obtain on any important subject. I say that it is high time that this practice was stopped, that the Legislature is showing its inability to even curb it, and that the men on the outside, who are civilian citizens of this State, are against the practice that has produced so much immoral atmosphere in the legislative halls of this Commonwealth. I hope the amendment of the delegate in the fourth division (Mr. Leonard) will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches on this subject this afternoon, but I think the members now are ready to vote. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: I am sorry the previous question has been moved, because this discussion will do a very great deal of good. Not many years ago junketing was an awful disgrace in this Commonwealth, — junketing committees. They would get leave to travel outside the limits of the Commonwealth, and they would go down to see horse-races in Kentucky, and various exhibitions in Richmond, and not attend at all to the business which they claimed was the reason for their going there. Now, I am not familiar with any legislation or constitutional amendment that has been accomplished through this junketing. The evil has decreased in recent years. I hope the amendment will be voted down and that the original proposition will prevail. My opposition to the amendment of the gentleman in this division is that it specifies a salary. I do not think we ought to specify a salary in the Constitution. But there is not a word to be said against the original proposition of Mr. Leonard of Boston, in this division, and I hope it will go through.

I wish somebody would inform me, — as soon as my time has expired [laughter], — I wish somebody would inform me what good it is, what has been accomplished in this Commonwealth by a recess committee. There was a proposition before this State to have the question of sheep husbandry examined into. It was to be by an unpaid commission, appointed by the Governor. Instead of that they constituted a recess committee of members of the Legislature who do not know anything about it, who cannot know anything about it, who cannot do any good because they do not know where to begin. They do not know the present conditions. I understand they proposed to go out to Colorado, on a junket, to inquire into the sheep husbandry in Massachusetts. You cannot do it that way. That is humbug, because you have got to consider climatic conditions, soil, the condition of surrounding industries, the competition of other forms of agriculture, the diseases to which sheep are liable incident to the climate, and many other things of that kind.

If they had appointed an unpaid commission, they could have got, as was originally intended, men who would have begun with a sufficient knowledge of the subject to make the necessary investigation. Sheep must be housed in this State. They must not be housed in Colorado. The conditions are entirely different. Sheep here are subject to the competition, not only of other forms of agriculture, but the competition of manufacturing, which takes the men, the labor.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I favor the previous question. The immediate effect if this is passed will be that if a Legislature passes a provision for a recess committee it will be because they think it is necessary; if they think it is necessary, then when a recess committee is created necessarily it will go to experts, somebody who knows something about the case. In that way, if we get any recess committee it will be because it is needed.

Therefore, and because of the fundamental principle that no man exercising a legislative or judicial function should be influenced in any way or by any possibility by anything he has got, or anything he expects to obtain financially or otherwise, this measure ought to be adopted in the form offered by the gentleman in the fourth division.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I certainly hope that the previous question will not be ordered on this matter at this time. I regard this as one of eight or ten of the major propositions that have been placed before this Convention, and I believe we should have ample time to discuss them. No man can arise here and feel that he is going to put forth any arguments in the limited time for debate. Now, a large number of us, and perhaps all of us, feel that we are under obligations to our constituents, perhaps to say something, it may be only to vote, but we are under obligations to our constituents to discharge our full duty here on all these questions, and especially on questions of the magnitude of this question. Now I am not one of those who regard the payment of $50,000 or $100,000 for recess committees as a matter of the greatest magnitude or importance.

The matter of the expenditure of $75,000 or $100,000 sinks into insignificance when you compare that with the demoralizing influence of the system on the Legislature, — and when I say that this demoralizing influence is felt from the presiding officers down to the members of both branches, I am not saying anything derogatory to the presiding officers or to the members of either branch of the Legislature. It is incidental to the system and to human nature, and you cannot get round it. Very important legislation, that upon which the prosperity of certain interests and of the people themselves in this Commonwealth depends, is held up by certain committees because they say: “If we do not report this this year we will be enabled to get a recess committee and get an appointment on that committee.” I have seen it when I was serving here, and it is disgusting, it is humiliating to many of the members of the Legislature, to see the scramble that is made for places on these committees.

Mr. Langelier of Quincy: I notice that this body differs somewhat from the Legislature, in which I have had the honor to serve, in that this body does not look upon committee reports with that holier than thou attitude, and that this body does not hesitate to overturn a committee report. I hope that the committee report in this case will be overturned. In my six years' experience in the Legislature, three years in the House and three in the Senate, I never was appointed on a recess committee, I never asked for appointment on a recess committee, and I refused the opportunity of an appointment on a recess committee. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Brockton in the second, division (Mr. Brown) it seems to me hit the nail on the head when he stated that there is a principle involved, and that is this: Shall we permit the legislative body to create salaried positions to which the members can be appointed? It seems to me that that is the question. I know the Legislature has passed a law to the effect that when it creates commissions no member of the Legislature can be appointed to the commission, and yet I have seen bills come in creating commissions, and some members of the Legislature take the floor and try to have that provision nullified by offering a special amendment to the bill.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I should like to call the attention of this Convention to what appears to me to be a very drastic provision of this resolution if we adopt it. It seems to me, while our debate has been entirely on recess committees, that this resolution is going very much further than recess committees. The resolution reads that "no member of the legislative department shall receive salary or compensation for service on any recess or ad interim committee, commission or other office created in whole or in part by action of the body or either branch of the body of which he is a member." It seems to me that if we adopt this resolution it means that henceforth no member of the Legislature will be eligible to any commission which is created by the Legislature of which he is a member, or concerning which any amendment is adopted by the Legislature of which he is a member, because it says "in whole or in part." Now, are we prepared, in face of the debate, which has been entirely upon the matter of recess committees, to go to the much further limit this resolution will take us and to prohibit members of the Legislature from serving on any commission in this State House which they may in whole or in part create?

Mr. Lummus of Lynn: Do not the words "recess or ad interim" modify the words "commission or other office" as well as the word "committee", and if so, does not that remove the objection that the gentleman is now making?

Mr. Sawyer: The existence of the comma after the word "committee" and not appearing again after "commission or other office" would appear to me to make it mean that the words "ad interim" and "recess" modified committee only. Now, there may be legal rules of punctuation. I remember, however, that one year we had a very noted case on the semicolon law, and so it may take technical legal knowledge to tell us just what recess and ad interim modify; but certainly as a layman it appears to me that they modify only "committee", and that we are going to prohibit members of the Legislature from serving on any commission or in any office created by the Legislature.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the gentleman from Ware (Mr. Sawyer) if such a self-denying ordinance as he says this resolution provides for, would not make members of the Legislature pass on questions of the establishment of commissions that might come before them more on their merits than they do now.

Mr. Sawyer: There is in existence already a statute to that effect, and the statute never has been sufficiently abused that we need to reiterate the prohibition in the Constitution. I believe that we are going too far if we adopt this proposition. Suppose this Convention and the people should have a State budget, and the next Legislature should create a State Budget Commission, and there is a member in that Legislature who has served several years on the committee on Ways and Means and is more familiar with the whole proposition than any other person in the State; shall we prohibit him from going upon the commission that we create?
RECESS COMMITTEES.

263

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: This is no laughing matter, and I sincerely hope that this resolution or something like it will be given another reading, so that it may be before the Convention for such modification of its terms as it may need and as I am inclined to think it does need. The Convention has an opportunity to inaugurate what has now become a much needed reform, which apparently cannot be looked for now or hereafter at the hands of the Legislature itself, as that body is going from bad to worse, until the practice of establishing recess committees has degenerated into a public scandal and an unjustifiable abuse of legislative power. [Applause.]

I wish to read to the Convention an article cut from the news columns of this morning's paper under the heading

$1,000 EACH FOR RECESS WORKERS.—VACATION COMMITTEES BELIEVE THEY HAVE WON.

Members of the six recess committees and commissions have virtually won their fight to prevent the Executive Council from establishing their compensation at $500 each instead of the customary $1,000, it was learned yesterday. They will probably draw the full $1,000.

Tremendous pressure has been exerted upon several members of the Council who were suspected of favoring the proposed cut. The idea originated with a member of the Council's committee on Finance, who figured that about $25,000 would be saved to the State in salaries.

Mr. President, my friend from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) who spoke a moment ago says that he concedes that the recess committee is a necessary evil, with the emphasis, I suppose, on the evil. I am willing to admit that a single recess committee in a season, under special conditions or circumstances of emergency, may be justifiable if not actually necessary. That six recess committees, including almost a fourth of the membership, can ever be necessary, I deny; and there is no justification or excuse for this attempt, which it really is, to prolong the session of the Legislature throughout the other six months of the year, with another salary for all who can get at it; and the plain statement which I have read of what is going on at this moment under this very roof speaks more eloquently upon the subject than I can or, as I venture to believe, even my friend from Worcester can. [Applause.]

Mr. REIDY of Boston: Why use a 75 millimeter gun to destroy a hen-coop? I regret that there was some abuse of the recess committee idea in the last House of Representatives, but this excess probably never will happen again. Recess committees have done much good work in this Commonwealth. It is an excellent way in which to thresh out complicated policies which are not well understood. The recess committee saves a great deal of time for the General Court. I believe future Speakers of the House and Presidents of the Senate, hearing of present criticism of unnecessary recess committees, will curb the tendency to create them.

On almost every recess committee ever appointed there have been at least two or three members, experts in the subject-matter of the committee's work. Among the delegates to this Convention is one of the greatest election law experts in this country (Mr. Luce of Waltham). If it were thought desirable to codify or to amend our election laws, what better method than to have a recess committee with men like the delegate from Waltham on the committee!

I served a year on the committee on Taxation. We handled the report of a very able recess committee, and I have no hesitation in saying that that particular recess committee was worth many times the expense its appointment brought about.

I trust this proposed amendment to the Constitution will fail, for it is much too petty a matter to go into the organic law of Massachusetts.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: As one who has served for three years in the House of Representatives and who knows the House from the inside, I rise to favor this amendment. I have served on a recess committee and therefore I am somewhat qualified to speak on the efficiency of said committees, and surely I cannot be accused of bitterness because of failure to secure such an appointment. I never have claimed that a Representative was paid inadequately, although in addition to my duties as a legislator I assumed (very willingly) the duties of Democratic House leader. As an incident the leader of the Democratic party is appointed to a recess committee. Perhaps it is added compensation for the arduous duties thereby entailed. I served on the recess committee on Workmen's Compensation because I felt that I could render some helpful service to Massachusetts. I accepted the $1,000 because I felt that I had given almost an equivalent, and for each year since I have addressed committees, sometimes unappreciated, because I felt that I even then was doing something to pay Massachusetts back. Soon after the beginning of my service in the House I saw what a debasing influence these recess committees had upon the legislators. I am opposed to salaried recess committees, first, because of the unnecessary and inexcusable expenditure; second, because the committees are not compelled to read their own reports [laughter]; third, because succeeding legislators are not compelled to read the reports of recess committees; fourth, because such reports seldom if ever are read; and, lastly, because about only one-third of the members of the recess committee understand that about which they seek to recommend legislation.

Several delegates who are or have been members of the Senate or House for years have argued strenuously that the salary paid a member of a recess committee is in the nature of added and deserved compensation for duties performed as a legislator, for which he is grievously underpaid. The political history of Massachusetts does not record that these malcontents made any struggle to escape such a fate, but on the contrary there is convincing evidence that each one struggled hard lest he be separated from the same meager stipend, and no evidence is forthcoming to prove that during those lean years any one of said legislators made any effort to secure other and more lucrative, if more laborious, employment.

Who will serve on an unpaid recess committee? Any public-spirited man who cares enough about Massachusetts to serve in the Legislature. And I contend if there was no salary attached to the House of Representatives we would get better men, because at least seventy per cent of the members of the Legislature are incited to serve by the thought of the salary rather than the service. Inadequately paid! I served for three years, and during that time I never saw more than twenty men in the House who were worth one thousand dollars to Massachusetts.

Now, what is the real issue here? It is not alone the needless waste of money, but there is a higher and nobler principle involved that should appeal to everybody, and it is whether we shall do away with these salaried recess committees and the money which improperly influences legislative votes. Upon being criticized for his vote upon a certain measure, I heard a Representative say: "I am going to be appointed on a recess committee. I am taking no chances. I am voting wrong, but I am not going to take any chance of losing that $1,000." That is the real fact. The serious question here is: "Are you going to have paid recess committees, or are you going to have the source of your laws in Massachusetts a pure source, unpolluted by these pecuniary, selfish, personal motives?" That is the real question.

Mr. LUMMUS: I have no reason for injecting into this discussion any of the heat which has characterized it on one side or the other, because I have been somewhat removed from personal contact with these matters. But I have observed the Legislature at work and I have listened with some interest to the remarks of those gentlemen who oppose this amendment, hoping to learn what they offer as a practical cure for the dangers that they themselves have seen in this present system of recess committees. My hope has not been gratified, because the answer that they give seems to be: "There is trouble, but it is a small matter." It is a trouble that never will be removed unless we remove it. The Legislature would have created more than six recess committees in this last session if the Speaker had not thrown his influence against them. I am not accustomed to criticize the Legislature in this body, but my belief that good government in Massachusetts depends mainly, if not exclusively, upon representative government in the Legislature is what makes me favor this resolution. The people of Massachusetts are entitled in the Legislature as in the courts to as impartial and unselfish service as the lot of humanity will admit, and they are not getting it under this system. I fail to see why if the Legislature needs a special study of a particular problem it cannot select men of experience, former members of the Legislature, or citizens who are experts, to study the matter and report, with pay or without it, as the case may be. I cannot see why such a commission appointed for a temporary purpose is not a perfect substitute for any recess committee that otherwise might be desired. And since we have that perfect substitute, and no one has denied it, why should we not remove from the Legislature this temptation?

Mr. WILLIAM S. KINNEY of Boston: I have been in public life a great many years, in campaigns of much heat, in legislative bodies and in the city council, and I never have found it necessary to make a personal attack upon any man whom I might choose for the moment to oppose. A member has chosen to make a personal reference to me in connection with this petty measure. In view of that circumstance I pass the burden of defending the committee's report to the chairman of the committee, lest the attitude of that member might lead some one to believe that my words were biased by the petty appointment to which he referred. I give my time to Mr. Luce of Waltham, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: No member of this committee has a word to say in the nature of personal defence for his share in this unanimous report. Fifteen members of the committee had all, I think, served in the General Court. Any delegate who would cast aspersions upon that body should remember that the President of this Convention was a Speaker of the House and had a share in nominating recess committees; that another of the honorable Speakers the House has had sits in the third division; and that no more honorable men in the Commonwealth live than those two men. When you criticize the Legislature you criticize those men and you criticize every man here who has had a share in the responsibility for its work. I served in the House nine years, and I am proud of every minute of that service, and I am glad of this chance to tell you that all the authorities in this country, all the men who have studied Legislatures, agree that the Massachusetts Legislature is not only the best Legislature in the United States, but probably the best legislative body in all the world. [Applause.] It does not follow that the Legislature may not be improved. There are opportunities to better its framework, to relieve it, not to hold a club over it, not to punish it, but to try to make its work easier and better and more fruitful, and those will be presented to this body; but here is a proposition that you shall put in your Constitution a reprimand, a censure. And in support of it what do we have? Libel, accusations against individual members, all sorts of innuendoes.

Do I speak with too much heat? Pardon me. Let me call your attention in calmer terms to the fact that this Convention hitherto has held up to Massachusetts traditions by recognizing that the duty of a Constitutional Convention is to concern itself with the broad, fundamental problems of government; that it is not here to legislate; that it is not here to do that which can be done by legislation; it is not here to put into the Constitution the trivial things that rise from the animosities of the moment. My friend from Lynn in the third division (Mr. Lummus) has asked how the situation shall be met. I will tell him how it shall be met. It shall be met by an appeal to the moral sentiment of Massachusetts. That appeal never has failed. A little more than twenty years ago the lobby was bringing disrepute to this Commonwealth. There were sound reasons for censuring the Legislature. Was a Convention called? Was it found necessary to interpolate into the Constitution provisions regulating the lobby? You may find these things in other States. You may go through the Constitutions of the land and in document after document you may find these attempts to meet passing evils by the force of constitutional enactment instead of in the way Massachusetts always has dealt with them, by the force of moral suasion. So here I ask you to leave this thing to its own remedy. I ask you to recognize that time after time the Legislature has purged itself, that it always has been rising, its standards of honor have been rising, its standards of integrity have been rising, until it is purer to-day than it ever was before. So I ask you to leave the remedy where your predecessors always have left the remedy, to the people of the Commonwealth, to the good sense of the Commonwealth and to the conscience of the Commonwealth.
Sir, I would call attention to the bearing of this debate and what it hitherto has chiefly implied. It has implied that the pressure of work upon the Legislature has compelled that body to have recourse to this means for additional information. For my own part I do not think it always the wisest course. I deplore the excessive use of recess committees. I am inclined to think some better method can be suggested to the Legislature and to the people. That I shall urge upon you when the right time comes; but because I think some remedy is desirable should I vote to put into the Constitution a provision of this sort, so absolutely foreign to everything that is there now, so suggestive of the patchwork, piecemeal constitutional legislation of the southern and western States that has brought them disrepute? All the shackles that have been put upon Legislatures throughout the country have done nothing but tend to make it less honorable and creditable to belong to them. You may find the cause of their downfall in such constitutional restrictions as this. Do you want to follow such example? Do you want to push your Legislature also on the downward path by imitating these States of the west and south that have made it almost disreputable for a man to be elected to office? Why not trust your own representatives? Why not trust yourselves? Many of you will serve again in the Legislature. Every man of you will vote for somebody to serve in the Legislature. Every man of you has access to the public press. You have access to all that which creates and molds public opinion. What you have said to-day, and much of it has been well said, and much of it has been usefully said, will help to curb this evil. My good friend from Somerville in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill) in one sentence said that the Legislature could not be trusted to do this, and then he told us that during the three years that he was on the committee on Rules there was no recess committee. Sir, the Legislature of Massachusetts never will lack men as bold and fearless as my friend from Somerville, men who do not worship popularity, men who do what they think is right regardless of what may be the effect on their fortunes. And so long as the Legislature contains men like him so long you may trust your Legislature. It is true that this last Legislature has exposed itself to this. And that is the reason why when we considered the matter a year ago nobody, if I remember right, presented himself to our committee in favor of this proposal. At any rate, no earnest argument was advanced. In the meantime one Legislature has forgotten itself to some degree and has done what you and I censure. Because one Legislature has carried this program to the extreme and has done the wrong thing, are you going to embody in the Constitution a paragraph that perhaps for a hundred years will tell all the people of this country that we could not trust ourselves to reform ourselves?

The amendment moved by Mr. Leonard of Boston was adopted, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 141 to 68; and, accordingly, the new draft (No. 389) was substituted; and it was ordered to a second reading, rejection, as recommended by the committee on The General Court, having been negativated.

The resolution (No. 389) was read a second time Thursday, August 1.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I desire to offer an amendment in the hands of the Clerk.
The President: The Chair will ask the member if it is the same amendment as printed in the calendar.

Mr. Leonard: The amendment I offer is practically the same as the one printed under my name in the calendar, with some slight exceptions. It was called to my attention, after I had offered the amendment printed in the calendar, that in the last line I have the wording “except such committee as may be necessary from time to time to revise the statutes of the Commonwealth”. The gentleman from Lynn in the third division (Mr. Lummus) called my attention to the fact that a committee of itself cannot revise the statutes. Consequently I have offered the amendment which I gave to the Clerk yesterday, but which has not been printed, changing the word “revise” so that it would read “consider a revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth”. The amendment which I am asking the adoption of at this time also changes the resolution in another particular. At the last debate a question was asked on the floor as to whether or not, in the event of the adoption of this proposed constitutional amendment by the people, a citizen might be debarred from being appointed to an office which had been created by a Legislature of which he formerly was a member. I think the language of the amendment I am offering now more clearly and distinctly provides that a man may be eligible to an office created by a Legislature of which he was a member some time prior to the time of his appointment. I have endeavored to be entirely reasonable in the consideration of this subject; but I believe there is one thing upon which the majority of the delegates are agreed, and upon which we feel that there should be no surrender, and that is that we should submit to the people a proposition whereby they may be able to write the word “Finis” at the end of this long chapter of legislative recess committee abuses.

At the last time this matter was under discussion the gentleman from Waltham in the first division (Mr. Luce), after the previous question was moved, and speaking under the operation of the rule whereby the gentleman in charge of the committee report gave him an allotment of time, and not allowing any interruption or questioning, made an argument with which I desire at this time to join issue. The gentleman said, as I recall it, though I am not endeavoring to quote exactly, that this proposed proposition was petty, small, and trivial; that it was a matter that was not worthy of being written into the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; that it was more characteristic of the statutory enactments that may be found in the constitutional provisions of some of the southern and western States. I desire, gentlemen, to take issue with that, and I wish to quote, not from the Constitution of any southern or western State, but from the Constitution of the United States, and to read from section 6 of the Constitution of the United States:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

It seems to me that this provision of the Federal Constitution should be sufficient answer as to whether or not this is a trivial subject. I maintain that the subject-matter of this resolution is strictly and properly a matter of constitutional limitation on the legislative powers, and that it is the duty of this body to write it into the Constitution; that it is not a matter that should be the mere subject of statutory enactment that might be amended, altered or repealed from time to time by the General Court. With most of what the gentleman said in praise of the General Court I am in hearty accord, and take no issue. With any desire to disparage or to detract from the reputation that properly belongs to the General Court I have neither motive, desire nor utterance. I agree that both of the departments of our Legislature are model parliamentary bodies, and that before the General Court any citizen may bring his petition and generally have a good, fair hearing of his cause; that the General Court has enacted legislation which has kept the Commonwealth well in the forefront among our sister States of the Nation, and that in our legislative halls men have received training for public service, from which they have gone forth into fields of great National usefulness. I think also that I am endowed with some degree of optimism as to men in public life, and yet I must confess I have seen nothing in all this line of eulogy or in anything that may be said in praise or in eulogy of the Massachusetts Legislature, and more particularly nothing in the actions of the Legislature during the past session or for the past several years, or during the time that this matter has been under discussion in this body, which leads me to any conclusion other than that this is a matter which properly should be dealt with by this Constitutional Convention.
RECESS COMMITTEES.

269

There is another phase of this question to which I would address myself briefly, not that it has been argued on the floor of the Convention, but to the suggestion that has been made to me from several sources since the matter was last debated that, in the event that the Legislature still should have occasion to have recess committees on certain subjects that might arise, if there was no compensation or payment allowed for services thereon, this would operate against the rendering of service by the man of poor or modest means. I think, gentlemen, in the first place, that a recess committee without compensation may be a possibility, but not a frequent probability. I think I may say something regarding the attitude of the legislator of moderate circumstances as to his service to the State, and I do this with a feeling of protest, a feeling of protest that there should be any prevalent idea that there is a line of demarcation or of cleavage whereby the service that a man renders follows in any parallel lines with his possession of worldly goods. I was a member of the General Court something over a decade ago, and from that brief period of service I then had, I feel that I am qualified somewhat to speak from the standpoint of a member of humble resources. In doing this let me first pay tribute to those other members who come to the General Court from session unto session, the men of means, of culture, men possessed of family tradition and prestige and trained for service to the Commonwealth. I trust that the State never will lack services such as these, and that they always will be true to the best traditions of their fathers. And when I say the fathers, may I without diverting from the channel of this discourse,—for the term "the fathers" has been used so frequently in the Convention, the fathers who signed the social compact, the fathers who wrote the word "proportional" into the Constitution, the fathers of the Revolution and the fathers of the earlier Conventions, our predecessors in office, who have been referred to so frequently by their varied progeny,—may I also say that I should like to include in that generic term the mothers, for, as a distinguished son of Massachusetts once said, he had heard enough of the glories and the suffering of the Pilgrim fathers, but for his part he wished to say a word for the Pilgrim mothers, for they had suffered and endured not only all that the Pilgrim fathers suffered and endured, but they had to endure the Pilgrim fathers to boot. And from the hardy specimens of the seventh generation of that stock that I have seen in action upon the floor of this assembly, I have been more and more confirmed in the opinion that I long have held, that that was no slight burden to bear.

May I suggest also that there are members who come here from time to time without the association of wealth or of family prestige, and whose direction and will to serve the State may have perhaps very humble foundation, but are possessed of a patriotic inspiration not less unerring than that of those who may claim kindred with the great names graven about this hall. My mother placed in my boyhood hands the tattered books that had been her companions on many a weary mile when she sought an education, the simple rudiments of a learning, which she might much more easily have acquired from a government, but from a government which her people regarded as foreign and proselyting, and which education, received in that manner, they always, with obstinate persistency or with persistent obstinacy, sometimes politely, sometimes rudely, but always firmly declined. If I, in my course as a citizen, or in such brief period of time as I may have held public office, have strayed or departed from those paths which mark the proper standards of a citizen, or an official for the time being, by so much have I strayed from her teaching, her precept, counsel and example. And I believe this: That the poor man is not asking for any exception in his case, that he is not asking for any exception for the sake of some future undefined and unascertained opportunity to a member of his class to receive compensation on a recess job, when he knows that the granting of that exception means the continuance of an abuse within the State. We all must play our part as we come to the halls of legislation, no matter whether we be rich or poor, and we can find in the roll-calls of this body men who serve the State, not in proportion to their means, but in proportion to their ability to serve, and men who have met in this assembly issues just as grave as ever confronted members in legislative halls. If the State at any time should require some slight service from any of her sons, some such service even as the little service performed by our own recess committee, done without any idea of compensation, there will be none, I trust, who will refuse the Commonwealth that service. If there should be, I think they probably would prove more poor in spirit than in purse. And in reply to the suggestion made that we should have confidence in the Legislature that they may reform this abuse and clean their house, I say, let the Convention have confidence in itself, let the delegates here assembled have confidence in themselves, let them meet this issue that is before them, and in doing that they will do nothing that in any way at any time will deprive the Commonwealth of any service which she shall merit and always will receive from her sons.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I desire simply, as a member of the committee on The General Court, which originally had this matter under consideration, to call the attention of the Convention to certain features of the proposal that may not yet have received sufficient consideration. The gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Leonard) seems to me to have thrown a stone at a sparrow and to have hit an elephant. By the wording of his resolution he has precipitated upon this body one of the great questions of political science, a question that has been discussed by countless thinkers during many generations,—the question whether the representative of the people should or should not receive compensation for his services. It has been a momentous question in England, far more than with us, because from the earliest days, and if it were a matter of interest I gladly would read to you the citations from the records of our own Colony, from the earliest days in Massachusetts it has been the belief of our people that the laborer was worthy of his hire, whether he worked in the General Court or in the field or in the shop. The opposite doctrine prevailed in England from the days of Charles II until within a very few years; and during that time was the stronghold, the very bulwark of privilege and wealth. Perhaps twenty years ago the toiling masses in England came to be of the belief that they too should be represented in Parliament. They found it impossible to secure from Parliament any wage for members. Thereupon they began paying their men, the few who were at first elected, and afterward a considerable number, out of the funds of the trade-unions. The matter was brought into court, and it was determined that this was not a proper use of the funds of the unions, whereupon the representatives of the laboring people were compelled either to forego the privilege of public service or else to expose themselves to becoming objects of charity; and the result was that in 1911 Parliament, in order that all classes in the community of England might be represented in the great National assembly, at last voted wages to members, a revolution in the spirit of English government and an innovation that was viewed with the greatest alarm by the champions of privilege and aristocracy and wealth. And now I think for the first time in the nearly three hundred years since men have been making laws in Massachusetts it is proposed to incorporate in the fundamental law a recognition of that which England has abandoned and that which we never accepted,—a recognition of the doctrine that men ought to be willing to give their services to the State, to sacrifice their own opportunities of income, through a sense of public duty, in order to remove the unfortunate effect always produced when the money factor enters. If the gentleman had seen fit to copy the Constitution of the United States, which he has quoted, and the Constitutions of many other States, simply to prevent the appointment or election to office of members of the legislative body which had passed the law creating the office, I am not sure but I would have agreed with him; for it is a fact that there have been some regrettable instances in the last few years where members of the Legislature have tried to upset the policy of the State and to amend its law, apparently with the purpose of providing places for those who had a share in creating the offices in question.
That is indeed a serious matter, as he has said. It has been greatly agitated at Washington, and there has been much dispute as to whether a member of Congress ought to be appointed to office while serving, no matter whether the office was created by the Congress in question or not. In many places in the country there have been grave reasons for anxiety over the embarkation of the State in doubt-ful enterprises, with the primary purpose, apparently, of affording salaries for those who promoted them. That evil exposes the community to the perpetration of laws which may have the most far-reaching effects, in order to gratify selfish personal ambitions. So if the gentleman chose to modify his resolution to meet only that evil, sympathy with him would be far more widespread than I believe it possibly can be with a proposal to imbed in the Constitution of Massachusetts a recognition of class privilege which, as I say, England has discarded and which we never have adopted. Therefore I would urge the Convention seriously to reflect whether it desires at this stage in the world's progress to say to those who have not independent means: "You shall in effect be precluded by your situation from serving your State while the Legislature is not in session, but the man who has been born with a golden spoon in his mouth, or who has been gifted by nature with the power of acquiring money and has reached the place where he can afford to serve without compensation, that man may serve." I doubt, sir, if the Convention has reflected upon the significance of that position, and if it desires to adopt this resolution in the present form.

If gentlemen desire to prohibit recess committees, that will be an absolutely different proposition. That might be argued upon its own merits. Thomas H. Benton, he of thirty years' experience in the United States Senate, was an earnest opponent of recess committees. And other statesmen who have reflected upon the subject have doubted either the wisdom or the constitutionality of perpetuating legislative power while the legislative body is not sitting. That proposition may be argued perchance with profit even at this late hour; but the proposition that you shall recognize money in the Constitution of Massachusetts is so novel and to my mind so indefensible that I trust no member of this Convention will support it for one moment.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I have been following the interesting remarks of the delegate from Waltham (Mr. Luce), and I think he has brought out the real iniquity and weaknesses of the Legislature very well. I do not know as there is any need of tying this proposition up with the policy of England some years ago, because I fail to see the analogy. Perhaps it is my density of mind that prevents me from understanding and appreciating the point raised by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce). I am not opposed to the General Court. I always have defended it; but after an experience of one hundred and thirty-seven years, we find that a certain system has grown up in the General Court that has been extravagant, unnecessarily so, and the members of this Convention know it and appreciate it, and I say that it is our duty to apply some remedy.

Perhaps you gentlemen have not looked up this matter, but I have been to the Auditor's office for assistance, and I find that since 1903 the Legislature has expended $650,000 for recess committees, providing they spend the $87,000 that is appropriated this year. I see there is more or less contention in the Executive Council as to whether the members of these various recess committees should receive $500 or $1,000 a year each. I understand the Governor favors giving them all that was appropriated, and as much more as the Legislature will permit.

I want to call your attention to some of the great questions that have been discussed and investigated by these committees. In 1903 we had a joint committee on compensation of State and county officials. Their expenses totaled $13,177. Now, was that committee working in the interest of the people? Does anybody remember what the outcome of that committee's work was? Why, a general increase in the salaries of all the county employees. They say that that is working for the people.

Mr. NEWTON of Everett: Will the gentleman kindly state to the Convention that previous to 1903 for five years there were no recess committees, except the committee on the revision of the Public Statutes in 1901?

Mr. GEORGE: The gentleman's statement is quite true. Previous to 1903, as he states, there were only one or two recess committees during the six or seven previous years. One of them expended $2,467, and another one expended $2,468. But I am beginning with 1903 now, where this particular committee to consider the compensation of State and county officials expended $13,177. In 1905 we had a joint special committee on railroad and street railway laws. Of course that was a new subject. That cost us $16,762. Is there a member of this Convention who can recall a single recommendation from that committee that ever amounted to as much as the paper it was written on? In 1906 we had a joint special committee on insurance. Of course that was a new subject. Insurance is a very new subject in Massachusetts. That cost us $14,200. What do you suppose the motive was in having that committee appointed? I do not recall that the insured or the policy holders were coming up here in great numbers to advocate a recess committee of that kind. But they appointed it, and that cost $14,200. The same year they had a joint special committee on the observance of the Lord's Day. Well, now, that was a tremendously important subject, because I suppose up to that time very few people of the Commonwealth really knew what the observance of the Lord's Day meant. While it cost $8,898 to investigate the observance of the Lord's Day, I do not remember any great change in the observance of the Lord's Day following the report of that committee.

Mr. LUCE: I may inform the gentleman as to the matter in question. To quote a familiar phrase, "All of it I saw and part of it I was." As a result of the report of that committee,—I trust I shall not be unduly immodest in disclosing the fact,—I myself aided in securing the initial steps in the legislation relating to one day of rest in seven, which since then has become a State wide issue and has so commended itself not only to the people of the State but of the whole country that it may be called a National issue. The legislation relating to one day in seven, I think, in its initial stages was due wholly to the report of that committee and the motion that I had the honor to make as a result of the report being presented in this House.

Mr. GEORGE: Notwithstanding the statements made by the delegate from Waltham (Mr. Luce), there are men who are working for the Bay State Street Railway Company on Sundays and every day in the week, there are men who work for the Boston and Maine Railroad every day in the week, and there are men who work in most every walk of life Sundays, and some of them are glad to do it. I know something about the subject that the gentleman mentioned, because that same question was here in my day, and the objection of the men who worked then was that they did not want to be compelled to loaf on Monday. They would rather work than loaf on Monday, for in the average family,—perhaps the gentleman from Waltham (Mr.
Luce) does not understand this,—in the average family, where a man's wife is engaged in household duties, Monday is a very busy day. Therefore there was a great opposition, and there is a great opposition, because it is impracticable. It does not accomplish the purpose for which some of those short-haired women and long-haired men who used to hang around the State House, trying to make somebody do something that he did not want to do, were striving for.

Mr. Luce: Is the gentleman aware that the proposal under consideration at the moment has been the established law of France for so many years that its utility there cannot be questioned, and that in nearly all parts of the civilized world its importance has been recognized and wherever applied it has proved of the greatest value to the health, the strength and the welfare of those who toil for a living?

Mr. George: I have little knowledge about the conditions that have existed in France, and I am rather reluctant, in view of some recent happenings, to adopt European methods. We had a com-mision that recently returned from France, and the chairman of the commission has endeavored to introduce some French novelties. You may have seen the pictures in the newspapers. I trust they will not be adopted permanently. I am an American, and still believe in American ways and customs. I believe that Massachusetts with her individual freedom and her just laws is as good a place to live in as France, and I doubt the wisdom of adopting French or English methods of living simply because we are engaged in war.

Now, let us proceed to the year 1906. After we had special com-mittes on insurance and the observance of the Lord's Day, we had another special committee,—on taxation; that cost us $15,811. I never heard anything from that.

In 1907 the committee on Ways and Means became a recess committee to investigate the financial methods of the Commonwealth.
They worked all summer more or less. I do not know whether it was more or less, but at any rate, the expense of that committee was $15,771. Do you know what that committee did? That committee, after a tedious summer, reported a bill to change the title of the Auditor of State Accounts to "State Auditor," and created the office of Deputy Auditor. Yes, that was the sum total of the result of spending $15,000. I tell you that any committee on Ways and Means could have done that much in regular session, without any expense whatsoever.

We also had that year a joint special committee on fire insurance.
That cost $13,525. I never heard anything from that; I do not believe any member of this Convention ever heard anything from it.

Then they also had a joint special committee on labor the same year.
Do you know how they start a movement to investigate labor and insurance and all these various subjects? Some one in the Legislature starts in to have a special committee appointed. Then of course some members of the Legislature frown upon it, because there is not much show for them to get on, and they make the committee as large as they can, to increase the chances for appointments. Sometimes they have to start more special committees so as to gain the votes that are needed for the first one. Then finally, in order to run the thing through without any possible hitch, they suggest that they will put on a couple of labor leaders, who know all about labor. Of course that brings the cause of labor in to help to get the thing through beyond question. This is the reason why so many of our so-called labor leaders are in favor of commissions and recess committees.

I do not understand that this special committee on labor did anything they did not have to, but it cost us $11,392.

In 1910 they got pretty well out of subjects, so just to keep their hand in, they investigated the Lyman School for Boys at an expense of $5,978.

Then in 1911 we had the usual congressional district committee, which met in the summer, and that cost us $19,000.

In 1912 we had a commission to investigate the matter of water supply for the cities of Salem, Beverly and Woburn and for certain towns. That cost $15,895. We also had a commission to investigate the holdings in voluntary associations of certain corporations. That was not very expensive; it cost only $8,246. The committee on municipal indebtedness cost $18,000-odd. Then we had a committee on transportation facilities in western Massachusetts. Well, that cost us $9,847. I do not know what was the outcome, but we had the committee, and we also had the expense attached.

In 1913 we had an investigation of circumstances surrounding the employment of women and children. When you investigate all the circumstances that surround all the women and children in the Commonwealth, it costs a good deal of money. The expenses were $20,173. I do not know as the women and children are any better off than they were before, but I presume the committee was better off, if we should use the cost as a standard of measure.

The same year, we had another committee, on pensions, not to save anything; that was not the purpose of any of these commissions or committees. Our civil pension system came into existence like the creeping palsy, and the committee made a very exhaustive investigation. I trust every member of this Convention has read that report. How many members of this Convention have read that report? I wait to allow you to rise in your place. One? You are fortunate. Two! Well, I guess they must have been members of the committee.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I assure the gentleman that I was not.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: The Governor did me the honor to appoint me chairman of that committee, and I refused to serve.

Mr. George: Well, I did not speak of that as a reproach to either one of the gentlemen; in fact, I am not speaking in a personal way against any of the men who served on these committees; it is against the system. I was a member of the Legislature six years, and we did not have them. We did not think them necessary.

That same year we had a committee to investigate the methods of checking the spread of tuberculosis. Well, that is a great question, and a great investigation undoubtedly, for the expense ran up to $20,171, but I do not know exactly what the outcome of that investigation was. I have not heard anything that came from that committee.

In 1914 we had an investigation of legislation having to do with city charters. That cost $7,230. Then we had one on the laws and rules of the General Court. Now, of course the General Court could change its laws and rules any time it wanted to, and in about every General Court a majority of the members are reflected, so that they understood what the rules were the year previous; but they had to have a recess committee to sit during hot weather. Well, that cost only $10,705. I have not heard of any substantial change in their rules. We have changed some of our rules which they had, and I think it was done in a very few minutes.

That same year we had a commission on development and extension of the transportation facilities throughout the State. That was a very large question and it cost us $9,970. I do not know of anything that that commission did in 1914 that assisted or in any way helped transportation, for shortly after that about all the transportation lines were heading for a receivership.

In 1915 we had a commission to codify laws relating to highways. We had been passing these laws for a great many years, and the accumulation was so great that people looking up any particular law in reference to highways was lost. This cost $10,069.

We had that year also a commission to investigate the laws relating to taxation, the third investigation in six years. This committee presumably investigated its predecessors, and the expenses were $10,250; and no particular result, I think, came from that.

In 1916 we had a commission on workmen's compensation, etc. I do not know what that "etc." was, but that is a very broad term. That cost $13,270. And we had a commission on special insurance again. This is labeled "special insurance." I do not know which is the most specific, a special committee or special insurance. However, their expenses were $14,662. The commission to investigate the financial condition of the Boston Elevated Railway Company cost $8,510. I think every holder of Boston Elevated stock in the Commonwealth knew about how the Elevated stood without any investigation by the Legislature. The same year we had a recess committee on building laws that cost $12,021.

In 1917 we had another street railway investigation. You will observe that the more they have investigated, the worse off the roads have been. I do not charge the committee with that, but as a matter of fact that is true. That committee cost us $17,434. The commission on special insurance, — another "special committee on special insurance", — cost us $16,245. And then we had a recess committee on taxation of corporations. While this subject had been treated by similar committees before, it cost the State $12,601. Then we had a recess committee on financial planning. Now, do you know what that was? That was a committee to find a way to spend more money. [Laughter.] This cost $11,453.

I want to tell you the Legislature has not in twenty years appointed a single committee to find a way to make government more efficient or less expensive. Not only have the committees cost $650,000 within the past fifteen years, but nobody can compute the mischief they did, or the increased cost of government that was the direct result of these recess committee investigations.

Then there was the investigation of the Boston Elevated Railway Company by the Public Service Commission. They had three investigations going on at the same time. No wonder that the road became bankrupt. It took the office force of the Elevated all the time and at tremendous expense to grind out the material first for the legislative committees and then for the Public Service Commission. The officers and employees gave more time to the investigation than they did to collecting fares. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that fares are more important to a railroad than investigations.

We had last year another commission, on plans for compensating employees for injuries. It cost us $30,937, so the Auditor reports say. I guess it was well done; they certainly made a great showing in their expense account.

Then we had a commission on uniformity of legislation. I admit it is very important to have uniform laws, but I do not know of anybody who has observed any particular change in our laws. There did not appear to be any uniformity in its expense account, for it cost the State $40,742.

Then we had another investigation. This was a great year for investigations. We had an investigation of the method of conserving and equalizing the flow of water in rivers and streams. [Laughter.]

That was a very important question, whether water will run up stream or down stream. [Laughter.] I understand that there are some very intelligent men in this country who believe that water will run up stream; in fact one of those men sat in Congress some time ago, and he thought legislation could make the Mississippi run up hill instead of down. Well, before that act was consummated his term expired. This last committee cost the State $26,322.

Now, as a result of all this we have, as I say, spent since 1903 $650,000 in investigating all these subjects, and the end is not in sight; and if this Convention fails to give the people an opportunity to apply the brakes, future Legislatures will be reinvestigating all the investigations of the past twenty years.

Mr. Lyman of Easthampton: I should like to ask the gentleman, now that he has told us about what the recess committees did not do, if he could name any important change in policies or any new policies established in the Commonwealth during that time that the preliminary study was not made by recess committees.

Mr. George: Yes. The first thing that the propagandists do is to organize, perhaps have a chairman and secretary and a headquarters. Then they start a petition for legislation, and you know if there is anything that the people of Massachusetts are good at, it is signing petitions. They seem to like petitions. Finally the petition gets into the Legislature, and when there is sufficient demand they have an investigation, and they say an ordinary committee of the Legislature has no time to investigate, so the Legislature appoints a special recess committee. Then these men, not the men who sign the petition,—they never show up,—but these men who hold the offices, the secretary and the president, come before the committee and bring a few others with them, men of leisure mostly, who live around Beacon Hill. There are not so many of them as there used to be when I was here. Finally they develop a demand for further investigation. If they find by the Governor's attitude that there is difficulty about getting this through, they then recommend a resolve creating a special commsion and allow the Governor to appoint two members and the Legislature five, and this commission usually gets by. Then this commission of course makes a report, and by and by something is done, and then the policy is changed from time to time, and the expenses mount higher and higher until the taxpayer commences to find fault, and then they appoint another recess committee to investigate why they have had to raise more taxes from year to year.

I dislike to trespass upon the question of taxation, but we have a recess committee sitting at this very time supposed to be finding some way to levy another special tax to increase our income. You know as a matter of fact we have all sorts of taxes, and if we do not get enough out of these taxes we call revenue or income, then the balance between income and the amount the Legislature appropriates is assessed on the cities and towns. I read a statement in a recent paper that one of these recess committees had saved the State $2,000,000. Do you know how they saved it? By levying another special tax to take $2,000,000 more out of the pockets of the people. They call that saving money. Now, I should say the Legislature and the recess committee that saved money would have found a way to save rather than to spend that $2,000,000. But that is not correct. As I understand the latest and up-to-date methods in financial reforms, the Legislature appropriates two or three millions more than it has money to pay with, and they meet this increased cost of government by putting on a special tax. If they get by so as not to increase the State tax they say the State has saved $2,000,000.

I have used up a good deal of time, and perhaps what I have said is of very little consequence; but when the delegate from Waltham (Mr. Luce) stands up here and repeats English history in order to cover up this iniquity, and I call it an iniquity, and when he says the spending of $650,000 of the people's money for useless work, or work that could be done by a regular committee or by some other method better and cheaper, I cannot agree with him that this is a trivial matter. Now, the Legislature will not cure this. They are going to have recess committees just as long as the majority of the members seek appointment on recess committees at $1,000 per year. That is the way to get recess committees through. In any Legislature that I know anything about within the last ten years a scheme to appoint ten committees, with ten or twelve men on a committee, would go through the same way the State built four normal schools in 1894. The State Board of Education said that we needed one normal school. Well, every city and town in that Legislature wanted that normal school, and of course every city and town could not get it. Then they said: "We won't have any. If we cannot have that school in our town we won't have any normal school." So what did they do? They got together, — my friend from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) remembers this, — they got together and brought in an omnibus bill, a sort of pig in a bag arrangement, and they provided for four, one to be located in Lowell, one in Fitchburg, if I remember right, one in North Adams, and one in an unknown location on the Cape.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: Having referred to me in this connection, I should like to ask the gentleman to state which side I was on.

Mr. George: If he was not in favor of having the normal school located in Everett, where he then lived, he was the only one in the Legislature who did not take that stand. Now, they could not get one, but they put in four. Finally they built three normal schools more than the State Board of Education said were needed, in order to get one. That is the way they get recess committees through the Legislature. I think it is perfectly proper for us to put into the Constitution this proper restriction.

In reference to the members of the Legislature accepting an office which the law says they shall not accept, in 1856 or 1857 they passed a law that no member of the Legislature should be eligible to any commission which he helped create while he was a member of the Legislature. A few years ago, as the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) pointed out the other day, three men representing a political party in opposition to the Governor were his servile tools, and when they got through doing what the Governor wanted, the Legislature and the Governor together repealed that law and the Governor appointed them to salaried positions paying from $4,000 to $4,500 apiece. Now I think that is wrong. If the law was good it ought not to have been repealed, and if it is good law let us put it into the Constitution and it will not be repealed. That is a practical way of dealing with this question.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I move the previous question.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I am rather sorry that the previous question has been moved, and yet I will not ask the Convention to vote it down, because perhaps what I have to say may be tinged with the taint of the personal interest that may come from being a member of the General Court. I think that the remarks of the gentleman from Haverhill emphasized very clearly the ease with which criticism can be uttered. It always is easy to criticize, and it always is easy to criticize unfairly. These propositions which he has mentioned are very excellent instances, some of them, of the difficulty of the Legislature in the brief space of a term dealing with the subjects that they have under consideration. Take the very one thing that he started off with, the matter of salaries. The Governor's Council took some two years to consider and report to the Legislature on the same question, and when it came to the Legislature their report was still incomplete. That report did result in legislation. On the report of the commission of 1903 to which he referred were enacted the laws which ever since have furnished the basis on which certain of our salaries have been assigned. I am going to deal with that one subject alone for the present, in view of the fact that my time is limited. The Legislature is called upon from time to time each year to pass upon increases of salaries. Conditions change. Almost everybody in the last few years has had his salary raised and it seems to be an unavoidable tendency. The Legislature can do one of two things: It can pass special bills as they come, with the net result that salaries are increased on no rational scheme at all, one man getting more than he deserves and another getting a good deal less; or it can go ahead and work out a scheme for establishing them on a uniform basis. Well, now, such a scheme as that took the Governor's Council, as I have said, two years to work out and then it was not complete. Is it any wonder that the Legislature in the term of six months cannot work out such a scheme? I do not think it is.
I might go on through that list that the gentleman has laid out before you and designate several of those subjects that absolutely cannot be worked out in the term of six months. If you want the Legislature to do anything with them you have got to give them opportunity to do it. If you do not want them to do it, if you want them to keep botching and trifling with State affairs, why, then, cutting off the means by which they have done it in the past is a very efficient way of accomplishing that result.
Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I always listen with admiration to the eloquence of my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) in this division, and I am by no means so narrow-minded as not to admire it merely because it may have no direct relation to the subject in hand. I do not think that a proper understanding of the question before the Convention required him to dive quite so deep into history or fly so high into the Empyrean. It is a very simple question. Shall we put an end to the abuse, which has now become flagrant, of the power of the Legislature to establish an unlimited number of recess committees and so practically, at an expense of many thousands of dollars, perpetuate the sessions of the Legislature throughout the entire year? That is the question and all there is to it.
When this subject was last before the Convention, it happened that in that very morning's newspapers it went out to the public that the 50-odd gentlemen and patriots who had been appointed to the six recess committees of the present year were raiding the Governor's Council in advance for $1,000 each as extra compensation, instead of $500, and this great issue then seemed to be trembling in the balance.
By apt coincidence it appears in this morning's newspapers that they have carried their point, that the Council has surrendered and they are to have the $1,000 apiece, whether they earn it or not, which they have not yet begun to earn.
I think I know as much about what recess committees have done as anybody knows, for it has been a part of my business to know it.
I am aware that they have on occasions done some very good work, and that semi-occasionally, though very rarely, something has come out of it. But this, on the face of it, is a system of public plunder, to which it was bound to come if allowed to go on.
Mr. HARRIMAN of New Bedford: I cannot believe, with the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. George), that all the work of these recess committees has been useless. I can conceive that perhaps they have not attained to all that they ought, but as he read over that list you realized that the questions of social insurance and other great industrial problems ought to be investigated and it is the only way the General Court can do its full duty. I also believe that the working-man is worthy of his hire.
Mr. GEORGE: I want to suggest to the gentleman from New Bedford, why not appoint a commission of capable men who have made a study of the insurance situation outside of the Legislature and let them investigate it? By adopting this proposal we do not prevent the Legislature from authorizing the appointment of a commission, but they cannot appoint commissions and at the same time make themselves members.

Mr. Harriman: I can conceive of cases where men particularly interested in a certain question have come into this chamber as members of the Legislature and perhaps would be the most efficient men in the whole Commonwealth to serve on such a committee. They ought to be there. I speak now as a working-man. While the system has been abused and when this first proposition came before the Convention I was inclined to favor it, I have changed my mind, if change there be, in this matter, and I can see now and I know,—and we have only to go to English history for the short space of six or seven years. Some of the brightest men in this Commonwealth, men who have the affairs of the Commonwealth at heart, are men who work for wages and who if they were obliged to serve for nothing could not serve on these committees.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I ask the gentleman what chance labor has or has had on commissions, whether paid or unpaid. When have they ever got one? [Laughter.]

Mr. Harriman: There is not a commission of the Commonwealth to-day on which a labor man is serving but what he is there by force of law. But it should be changed and labor should and will demand more; and when labor asserts its right and comes in here as it ought, the Legislature will truly represent the people. It should be possible to place their own men on boards and commissions and they can investigate these matters from the working-man's standpoint.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: There is one phase of this question which has not been presented to the Convention, and that is that frequently matters which come before the Legislature are shunted off onto a recess committee in order that the proposition may be killed. The gentleman in the first division (Mr. Harriman) talks about labor, what labor has done, and all that sort of thing. Why, sir, one of the commissions which the gentleman quoted this morning was a commission to investigate the hours of labor for children and the surroundings of women and children in industry. And what was the purpose of that bill? What was the purpose of that commission? Why, sir, it was to defeat a bill introduced by me for shorter hours of labor for women and children and for the extension of the school age of children. And who introduced it? Who offered that amendment? Why, a labor leader on the floor of the House, for the purpose of killing the proposition. And, sir, my vote against the investigation of the hours of labor of women and children in mills and factories was used later in my district to defeat me for re-election. It was camouflage to show that I was opposed to laws favorable to women and children, when the very purpose of the amendment for a recess committee to investigate was to kill a proposed law for their benefit.

Now, sir, that is the way those things are worked, and labor has no excuse to offer. They are not always without blame, and there is one instance of it, and I can tell you of a number of instances. The proposition for a commission to study pensions was put in the Legislature for the purpose of defeating a bill introduced by me for a uniform pension system which was before the Legislature at the time. Every chance you give the Legislature along that line is taken advantage of by some one. I do not blame the whole Legislature. They do not understand the questions in the Legislature, perhaps, any better than members of the Convention understand some questions. Consequently they are perfectly willing to shove them over to a recess committee.

The gentleman mentioned several recess committees and said that he did not know what they had done, and thereby showed his ignorance, for some of those legislative committees did a great deal of good. You cannot reach the evil through the Legislature; you have got to reach it through a constitutional amendment, and I believe the people of the Commonwealth are ready to vote on that amendment.
They are ready to vote favorably on that amendment and thereby remove this temptation, thereby remove this scandal,—for it has become a scandal,—from the Commonwealth. And I prophesy when this is accepted that you will have more efficient recess committees serve without pay than you ever have had with pay.

Mr. Robbins of Chelmsford: If there is any one act of this Convention that will meet with the approval of the voters of the Commonwealth, it is this chance to prevent by constitutional amendment the creation of paid recess committees. The members of the Legislature were elected to do the work assigned them, not to delegate some memers to do work which they have neglected. This proposition does not prevent the creation of recess committees, but it does take away the salary of such committees, and I think it thereby would prevent the abuse. Be honest with yourselves, be honest with the people who have sent you here.

Mr. Harriman: I should like to ask the gentleman if it is his opinion that a commission appointed by the Legislature without pay would represent the working people of this Commonwealth?

Mr. Robbins: I believe that the Legislature could delegate a commission or a committee to do work that they already have been paid to do under the salary allotted to them as members of the Legislature.

Mr. Harriman: Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Legislature would divorce themselves from the salary that they would allow to the members of the commission other than themselves?

Mr. Robbins: I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. Harriman: In that case where is the money to come to pay these men who serve upon the committee?

Mr. Robbins: I should consider the salary allotted to the members of the Legislature when they took office took care of the payment for some extra service which they might render upon some committee outside of the work during the session.

Mr. Luce: I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks I was in error in urging the committee on Ways and Means of the recent Legislature to provide additional compensation for the members of this Convention?

Mr. Robbins: I was not familiar with the action of the gentleman from Waltham.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: I desire to say one or two words on this matter. I was very glad to hear the figures as presented by my friend from Haverhill (Mr. George), with whom I had the honor of serving in the House, and also the gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett), and I remember the facts about the normal schools very well indeed,—all true, as the gentleman has stated. If Massachusetts needs anything it needs not only this, but it needs a finance commission outside of State officials, something after the style of the Boston Finance Commission, to investigate and probe leaks. Oh, there are some. I could tell this Convention of a few. I am not impugning the honesty of the men who get the money, not in the least, but the custom that has grown up. It is like the condition in small places, my own small city, for instance, where there was a little petty system of graft that had grown and no one had fought it for twenty years and everybody who came into office thought it was all right; but finally by drastic action it was stopped. Now in Massachusetts there are some things going on. I will cite only one instance. Within a week a certain commissioner,—I will not name him, it is not necessary,—drawing, I believe, $4,000 a year from the Commonwealth, put in a bill for $269 for personal expenses, and a very high official of the Commonwealth sitting with the Council was perfectly willing it should go through because such vouchers always had gone through. But one member of that Council said: "Let us look into the law; I never have seen a decision of the Attorney-General that permitted this thing." And the high official said: "Yes, I am glad to have you." So the Councillor got the opinion of the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General said: "No, he has no right to the money." That had been going on and would have gone on if that Councillor had not taken a different stand from the majority of the Council. He saved the Commonwealth by that one act alone $25,000. I believe this is a good thing to put through; I believe that the sympathies of the Commonwealth are with this measure.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I will add but a word to what I was attempting to say before. It happens, in the dispensations of Providence, that we are afforded at this opportune time the most striking illustration that our legislative history affords of the consequences to which the abuse of this power may come. And let me say a word upon another aspect of the matter which cannot be overlooked. Some public criticism has been passed upon the Speaker of the House in connection with what occurred in the recent session, some unjust criticism, as I believe, for he is a personal friend, with whose views in general I am reasonably familiar; and I do not believe that he approved the policy or sought the opportunity or that he would abuse it. But this is no personal question. Whether one man or another is in the office of Speaker or President at any particular time, think of perpetuating a system which puts into the hands of the presiding officers of the Legislature, being at the time, as they may be, candidates for other public offices, the power practically to present $1,000 apiece of the public money to 30, 40 or 50 members, more or less, of the Legislature! There is but one way of putting an end to the practice. It has come to be an abuse of legislative power, and it can be terminated only by a constitutional limitation upon it.

Mr. Lyman of Easthampton: I should like to inform the gentleman that the Speaker voted against all recess committees at this last session.

Mr. Pillsbury: I am indebted to my friend for bringing out the fact and should have had little doubt of it, although I did not happen to know it. Now, then, the occasion having arisen and the opportunity being here and the only method of availing of the opportunity being to put into the Constitution a limitation upon legislative power to do this thing, it ought in my opinion to be done. I am not satisfied with the present form of the resolution and I had prepared a substitute draft, but on looking for it in my desk I find that some appreciative friend has abstracted it. [Laughter.] I hope that the resolution will be given another reading and sent to the committee on Form and Phraseology, who probably can be trusted to put it into better form, which I think is needed.

Mr. Luce: Perhaps we could expedite matters and come to some agreement if we found out whether this proposed change is an elimination of what seems to me the very obnoxious salary provision. Does he not think it possible to meet the evil by the prohibition of the exercise of legislative functions except when the Legislature is in session, rather than by introducing this feature of prohibiting salary?

Mr. Pillsbury: The best conclusion I have been able to reach which was embodied, so far as I recollect, in my amendment, is to forbid the creation of more than one recess committee at any session of the Legislature. I would not attempt to fix a salary or compensation, but I would leave room for one emergency committee, — largely in view of the fact that a special committee has always been appointed in recent times to examine and pass upon a general revision of the statutes, in advance of the special session of the Legislature to which it is to be submitted for adoption, and this practice seems to be generally approved.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I admire the skill with which the gentleman from Waltham has tried to drive a salient into the forces that are supporting this resolution. The gentleman said that I was throwing a stone at a sparrow and striking an elephant, and immediately he brought into the discussion the consideration of an obsolete practice of the English parliamentary system. When I pointed out to the gentleman from Waltham that the Federal Constitution has a provision against the appointment of members of Congress to offices created by them, he said in effect: “Well, I might agree to something of that kind because that is a different proposition from recess appointments.” And yet when this was up before, the gentleman said there were no prohibitions as contained in my resolution to be found in any Constitution except that it was characteristic of what might be found in the Constitutions of some southern or western States. Does that mean anathema in this Convention?

Again the attempt is made to arouse opposition to this measure by saying that a man who has not been born with a golden spoon in his mouth could not afford to serve when he might be appointed to some committee in the future. Again the gentleman, in making the argument about appointments to office, says the law does not allow the appointment of a member of the Legislature to an office created by the Legislature, but that the Legislature occasionally has changed the statute so as not to apply to certain offices created by it. Those cases are bad, he admits. And yet when there are fifty or sixty appointments to be made on recess committees, those are not bad. These are not the tones of high political morality that ordinarily come from the gentleman from Waltham, and which we generally respect and pay attention to. Then he makes this inquiry. He asks: "Does the Convention approve of my going before the Ways and Means Committee and asking compensation for the Convention's sitting this summer?" All those subjects are intended to divert the attention of this body from the issue presented in the resolution. This body already has passed the resolution by a vote of 142 to 68. I just wish to conclude in my brief allotted time with this sentence from the Boston Herald of June 10, 1918:

The fact that these committees at somewhat rare intervals do work of conspicuously high quality is no reason for perpetuating a system which on the whole costs infinitely more than it is worth. If the Constitutional Convention will propose a measure prohibiting the payment of legislators during the intervals between legislative sessions the voters of the State will do the rest.

Mr. Luce: The proposition by the gentleman from Wellesley seems to me so clearly to meet all my individual objections and, I surmise, those of the committee for which I am exercising the duty of speaking, that I would express the belief if his proposal could be substituted for the one under consideration, it would come near meeting unanimous acceptance; and therefore, sir, in the expectation that it will be submitted, before final action on this matter, I would withdraw all objection to having the matter take another reading at the present stage.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I was about to reëcho what the gentleman from Waltham has said. I am far from denying that the number of recess committees appointed at the last session of the Legislature was entirely indefensible, and what I have said on the subject dwelt on the utility of recess committees as a method of investigation which in the past has proved valuable rather than an attempt to defend any such procedure as was had in the last session of the Legislature.

Now I want to add one further thing with regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Leonard) which I think has not been mentioned, and I am going to speak of this in connection with a specific case. In 1910 there was a recess commission, I believe, appointed to draft the Workmen's Compensation Act. It reported to the Legislature in 1911. One of the members of the Legislature of 1910 was on that recess commission and he was also in the Legislature of 1911. The act was passed by the Legislature in that year and that man who had lived with that proposition for a considerable time was appointed by Governor Foss, — he was appointed as a labor man, and he was a thoroughgoing and very earnest and honest labor man indeed, and he has proved one of the most valuable members of the Industrial Accident Board. I refer, — if it is necessary to mention names, — to the Hon. Joseph Parks, whose work on the Industrial Accident Board is appreciated both by labor, I think, and by capital.

Now if that amendment went through the net result would be that if conditions had been as they would be under the amendment, he would have had to serve on that board practically for nothing for six months.

Now there is no question but what he was one of the best men in the Commonwealth to be put on that board, a man who knew all about the law, who had drafted it, seen it grow up under his eyes. It was new law to be put into effect, and nobody who had not an expert knowledge of the law could fill the position as well as he could.
The amendment moved by Mr. Leonard was adopted and the resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading Thursday, August 1.

It was read a third time Tuesday, August 13.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No person elected to the General Court shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any office created or the emoluments whereof are increased during such term, nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption.

Mr. Pillsbury: When this subject was last before the Convention something was said which may have led to the inference that at the next stage I should offer a substitute, which I now do, and ask that it be read by the Secretary.

This does not wholly represent my own view of the subject, but a consensus of the opinion of several members of the Convention who have taken the most interest in it. I will say a word by way of explanation. It accomplishes two things: First, to disqualify any member of the Legislature, during the term for which he was elected, for an office created during that term. It seems to be generally desired that this feature of the original resolution, similar to the existing statute, should be carried into the Constitution.

Then we come to the recess committee feature:

nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption.

In dealing with this branch of the subject there is room for difference of opinion, and I incline to think that upon my own judgment I should have gone somewhat farther than this proposal goes. But it seems to be the prevailing thought that the door should be left open for a paid recess committee upon a general revision of the statutes when that occurs. It has been the custom in recent revisions of the statutes to appoint a large and representative committee to meet in the recess and go carefully through the revision to put it in shape for immediate adoption by a short session of the Legislature to be called in the fall, to sit only a day or two and practically accept the report of this committee. That has been done, and the practice, as far as I know, has worked well and is probably entitled to approval. It would seem that the door should be kept open for such a committee, with compensation if deemed expedient. But in doing this, it is necessary to guard the approaches with some care, for otherwise we shall be liable to have every year, under one pretext or another, a recess committee upon revision of the statutes. It is for this reason that the phraseology of the last clause has been adopted, which I will read again, in order that gentlemen may see that it confines the liberty of a paid committee, which the resolution permits, to a single committee appointed to deal with a revision of the statutes when such a revision has been made by commissioners or other proper authority, and submitted to the Legislature —
I hardly need call attention to the fact that this leaves the way open to other recess committees if the members of the Legislature think they ought to be created and are willing to serve upon them from a sense of duty, without additional compensation.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 8 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

No person elected to either branch of the Legislature shall be appointed to any office created during the term for which he is elected. No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. Harriman: When this matter was under discussion before I was of the opinion then, and I am now, that recess committees should be appointed,—that the Legislature should have the authority, and it should not be taken away from them. I believe that it has been abused in the past, but because of abuse it does not follow necessarily that such committees have not been of service to the Commonwealth nor that in the future they may not be of service. I can conceive, sir, that in the time immediately following the war it will be necessary to study some of the great problems that are confronting the people of this Commonwealth, and I for one do not believe that this authority should be taken from the Legislature. I believe, however, that it should not be made as easy to appoint them as it is at present, and I do not believe, as I said the other day, upon this floor, that any man should be asked to serve without pay. Every member should be paid for his services. A non-paid commission means that workingmen would have absolutely no chance upon commissions of this kind.

I believe that it is the duty of the Legislature to care for the legislative arm of our government. I believe it would be wrong to curtail them in any duty which they may have. If you notice in reading my amendment, it is provided that no recess committee shall be authorized except by a two-thirds vote of the various branches by roll-call. And if there are two-thirds of the members of the Legislature who thoroughly believe and are willing to go on record by roll-call that a recess committee should be appointed, I believe that that committee should be appointed, and should serve with pay.

The first part of the resolution provides that no man can hold other office created during the term for which he is elected to the Legislature. I am perfectly willing that that should be adopted,—it ought to be. But there is one thing that I want to say, and I want to close with it. If a board of directors want to investigate its corporation it should have a right to appoint a special committee. The Legislature should have that same right. I cannot conceive of any man voting for six, seven or eight recess committees by roll-call. Let me say, too, that the time is coming when the light of publicity is going to be turned more and more upon our Legislature; and if two-thirds of the Legislature believe that they want a recess committee appointed and are willing to go on roll-call, this Commonwealth ought to have it and those men ought to be paid for their services.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: Years ago when I was introduced to a subject entitled rhetoric, I recall one of the exercises given to me from time to time was that of taking an extract from some author and rewriting it for the purpose of presenting precisely the same thought by the use of other words. It was an exercise meant to give one training in the study of the dictionary and synonyms. We have an excellent example of it, sir, in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley, who has taken the words of the committee on Form and Phraseology and exercised his genius in saying the same thing in other words. This may or may not accomplish the purpose which we were led to understand he had in mind at the previous stage of the debate, when we were given to believe that an amendment would be offered permitting the appointment of at any rate one committee in case of emergency or crisis or exceptional need. I do not observe in this amendment anything of the kind, nor do I find before the Convention any opportunity to meet such a situation, except that presented by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), which ought to commend itself to the Convention.

The Convention has said that it does not desire to relieve the General Court, and now it is asked to say that it still further desires to hamper the General Court by restricting the opportunity to do good work. There are times when recess committees do useful work. They have been abused, perhaps, and it happens that just at this moment, with such an abuse before our eyes, we are tempted to forget the fact that study between sessions often has proved and often will prove to be of public utility. Is it a wise and prudent proceeding to cut off your nose to spite your face? Is it a wise and prudent thing to say that we will have no interim work, no study by men elected to serve us as representatives, unless they are well enough off in this world's goods to be able to sacrifice their time without compensation? That is the nub of the whole thing. Do you desire to throw your between-session work into the hands of only those representatives who are of independent income and can afford to give that time without compensation?

I gathered the other day that gentlemen of the Convention desired some midway proposition between the extreme measure that first met approval and the perhaps extreme opposition that some of us presented against it. If that be the case, if the Convention does desire a compromise, surely the safeguards contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford ought to commend themselves as sufficient to prevent further abuse of the evil while leaving the opportunity, in case of great need or emergency, for the Legislature by its two-thirds vote to use still this valuable method of supplementing its ordinary resources.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I wish to say a word in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley. My only regret is that the amendment has not been printed. I think it is somewhat unexpected,—it is to myself and probably to others,—that this matter has been reached again so suddenly upon the calendar. The gentleman from Wellesley showed me his amendment this morning and offered it with the expectation that it would be printed, and I see in the amendment not, as the gentleman from Waltham has said, a mere change of expression or a dictionary exercise in the use of synonyms, but rather an improvement on the amendment submitted by the committee on Form and Phraseology. The committee on Form and Phraseology did make an improvement on the amendment as it was passed by the Convention; but the gentleman from Wellesley, I think, has put it in much better language. There are also at least two changes of substance. Let me read his amendment:
RECESS COMMITTEES.

No person elected to the General Court shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any office created or the emoluments whereof are increased during such term, nor receive additional salary or compensation for service upon any recess committee or commission except a committee appointed to examine a general revision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when submitted to the General Court for adoption.

Now that is not a mere change in synonyms. In the first place, the gentleman's amendment says "No person elected to the General Court shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed," etc.

It does not leave the opportunity of a member who is elected resigning his position and then being appointed to some office. Moreover, the gentleman also has incorporated in his amendment that no such person shall be appointed to any office the emoluments of which are increased during the term for which he was elected. In that respect he follows the Federal Constitution and also changes the amendment which was passed to a third reading. Again, this present amendment offered by the gentleman provides that a committee to consider the revision of the statutes shall consider that revision only when the statutes are submitted to the General Court for adoption, which is a different proposition, I think the gentleman can see, from that which was contained in the former proposal. I say it is not a mere change of form or an exercise in the use of language. I believe that the pending amendment expresses what we desire in the best language that has yet been offered the Convention.

Now the gentleman from New Bedford has offered an amendment which the gentleman from Waltham says is a midway proposition. I hardly think that the members of the Convention who have had any legislative experience whatsoever will regard that amendment as a middle proposition. For, as was explained very well in the last discussion by members of recent Legislatures, it is more easy to have several recess committees appointed than to have one recess committee appointed. If the members of the Legislature or a certain group wish to have a recess committee appointed upon a given subject, they will find that in order to have that committee appointed they must get the support of other men, other groups who wish to have recess committees appointed upon their particular subjects. And so if the members want to appoint five or six recess committees, the chances of those committees being appointed are much enhanced over what would be the case if there were only one, two or three committees. I think that is a principle that is very well understood. Those who have had legislative experience know that it is so.

What does the gentleman from New Bedford propose? He proposes that a two-thirds vote be required,— and a two-thirds vote would mean simply that in order to have your recess committees appointed you would have to have enough recess committees to command the support of two-thirds of the members of the Legislature. So, instead of calling this a midway proposition, I would say that it was a sort of Midway Plaisance in which we have a regular summer revelry of recess committees.

Now I do not think that the Convention wants to do that. If the gentleman from Waltham believes that there has been an abuse, an abuse, as he says, of recess committees, I am at a loss to understand or to follow the method of reasoning whereby he says that having a two-thirds vote, — which I think most of us would agree would mean an increase in number of committees, — is going to meet this situation. I therefore urge upon the members the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wellesley.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: I do not agree at all that this Convention ought to attempt to abolish any recess committees. The proposition of the gentleman from New Bedford to my mind covers the whole situation and meets it very clearly and very concisely.

Now the Legislature of Massachusetts is elected for a calendar year. It is in existence to-day. It can be called together by His Excellency the Governor to consider any question. There may be many problems that will come out of this war in which a recess committee, or a committee sitting while the Legislature may adjourn after a short session, may be absolutely necessary or at least very important. This proposition to have no committee so appointed except on a two-thirds vote meets the situation exactly. I do not wish to reflect on any member of this Convention at all, but I have heard while I have been a member of this Convention constant slurs upon the Legislature of this Commonwealth. I for one do not take any stock in it at all. Whether or not you have got to log-roll to get a majority of votes for some proposition is something that has absolutely no weight with me whatever. I believe that a majority of the present Legislature is composed of honest men. I believe that they have been honest men in the past, and all this hunting around corners reminds me of the lines, —

He who looks behind the door
Hath himself been there before.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: I dislike to usurp the prerogative of the member from Somerville (Mr. Chandler), but I feel constrained to move the previous question.

There being no objection, Mr. Hobbs of Worcester moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by inserting before the words "be appointed to any office", the words "during the term for which he is elected,"); and by striking out the words "the term for which he is elected", and inserting in place thereof the words "such term".

There being no objection, Mr. Clark of Brockton moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by adding at the end thereof the words ".and in no one year shall a sum exceeding twenty thousand dollars be paid as salaries and expenses of recess committees."

Mr. Hobbs: I have only to say as to my amendment that it is intended to bring out, I think, the meaning of the gentleman from New Bedford. It is more in the nature of a third reading amendment than any change in substance. I think that it brings out his idea, which was that the man elected to the General Court should not be eligible during that term to any office created during such term; and it accomplishes that, and no more.

I have no desire to speak on the merits of the question. It has been my somewhat unfortunate experience as a member both of the General Court and of the Convention to have been called upon in both branches to speak in defence of the one which was not in session. It is not entirely a pleasing task to see any body of which I am a member subjected to criticism which I think in many respects is unfair. There is this much of justice in the criticism of the General Court,—that, on occasion, too many recess committees have been appointed. That does not do away with the fact that many of them have served an extremely useful purpose. I therefore hope that the midway proposition of the gentleman from New Bedford will be adopted rather than the one which apparently considers a member of the General Court on a basis with a candidate for State Prison,—that is, makes him ineligible for anything.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: If the Convention will pardon me for just a moment I wish to refer to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman). It has been designated as a half-way or midway proposition. I am totally unable to place it in any such position. It does not limit the number of recess committees that may be appointed. It does not limit the amount of money that may be expended as salaries and expenses for recess committees in the least. It simply places a premium upon a corrupting, demoralizing influence to secure a two-thirds vote in both branches of the Legislature. That is just what it does, nothing more. I would prefer the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), but if we are to have any recess committees, or if we are to provide for any or allow any, I wish to limit the amount of money that may be expended each year. The amendment that I have proposed limits the amount that may be appropriated in any one year for recess committees, salaries and expenses, to $20,000. I think that is ample. Committees are sitting here this summer which will sit but a few days comparatively, and they are to receive $1,000 for the same. They limited the amount of salaries that the members of this Convention should receive this summer, regardless of how long they might sit, whether it were three, four, five or six months, to $500. I commend the Legislature for that, but I do not commend them for voting $1,000 for each member of a recess committee, some of whom are to sit here but a few days. I met a man the other day, a member of one of those committees. He said: "We have just had our first committee meeting." I asked: "When do you meet again?" He replied: "Some time in the future." "Are you likely to do much?" I asked. His answer was: "It does not seem as if we were." A thousand dollars per man, and all the expenses, and $1,000 for the secretary.

I hold in my hand a report of a committee appointed by the Legislature last winter to investigate the fish business in Boston. They came in with that amount of literature. They have exposed the business of the fish combine in Boston. They came back to the Legislature. It was the duty of the Legislature to pass legislation that would protect the people against the enormous prices that we are being charged, 200 and 300 per cent more than before the combine, which took place two years ago last May,—200 and 300 per cent more in this short time. The United States Government has asked us to do without wheat, to do without beef, and to live on fish, and these men here have taken advantage of us, and the members of the Legislature refused to act on the information, full and complete, that was given them. Why? That they might have a recess committee!

The main question was ordered.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I am not surprised to see members of this Convention advocating certain radical changes with respect to certain departments with a view of lessening expenses of the government, which really adds more, when a proposition comes in here which will save $600,000 to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts within the next twelve or fifteen years say: “This is a trivial affair. Nothing so trivial as this ought to be adopted by this Convention.” I have been looking to see how much we have spent in investigating insurance. Now, who do you suppose suggested to the Legislature that insurance ought to be investigated? Did it come from the insured? No. There were certain propositions in the Legislature concerning insurance, and finally the insurance companies suggested that they have an investigation as the easiest way out of it. And since 1906, up to and including the present year, if they spend what already is appropriated, and I am inclined to think they will, they will have expended upon this one subject $58,632. Now, I want to ask any member here if he can recall that that $58,632 has brought about any decided change in insurance, either for the companies or for the insured. That has been the real difficulty in this proposition.

Certain interests may suggest that we have an investigation, and out of that has grown up a system which has cost since 1903 $650,000, with no substantial results. I do not mean to say but what there have been committees that have done some good. Of course they have, but I am saying this: The Legislature at any time can create a commission, and the Governor can appoint men who are competent to sit on that commission,—men who are not allied with the Legislature, or with any interests. And such a commission can do just as good and I believe better work than a legislative committee.

Previous to 1890 a very few committees were appointed, and when they did appoint committees the State paid only the expenses of the committee. They did not charge anything for serving. The members of those committees thought that it was their duty to serve just as they would in the city government, just as they would in many other public activities. But now the moment they get into the Legislature under the present system they are looking for the salary. They say that a member of the Legislature who meets two days a week for about three or four weeks this summer ought to receive $1,000, but those who sit in this Convention four days a week all summer ought to have only $500. Do you see the difference?

I feel that this is the only opportunity that the people ever will have to deal with this proposal. The Legislature never will submit it. This Constitutional Convention can send it to the people and allow the people to say whether they want to spend $75,000 to $100,000 a year for recess committees, when they know that it simply adds expense to the government with no substantial result.

I hope that the members of this Convention have sufficient confidence in the people to permit them to vote on this proposal as presented by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury).
Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: Very often I find myself able to agree with the conclusions on practical governmental questions advanced by the gentleman from Haverhill who has just spoken (Mr. George), but the illustrations which he has used in this argument, if he had stated correctly the full facts, would have been the most convincing argument that could have been made in favor of rather than against recess committees. For instance, he said: "Who suggested the question of investigating the subject of insurance to the Legislature?" and intimated that no one had made the suggestion. As a matter of fact, we have had an executive for the last three years who has been urging upon the Legislature the passage of certain forms of social insurance, and he has preached the doctrine throughout the Commonwealth, and a certain number of citizens has been attracted to vote for him on that issue. He has sent annual messages to the General Court on the subject, and in due deference to the attitude of the executive the Legislature has investigated the subject, and my brother says figures show they have spent $58,000 during the investigations, but they have reported adversely; whereas had the recommendation been adopted without that study and investigation, instead of $58,000 the Commonwealth would have spent several million dollars annually. While it is true that this year there probably are more recess committees than the necessities of the times demanded, there are some recess committees sitting this summer which are meeting with commendation from the public. One in particular, the creation of which has caused a little ripple on the surface of the debates of this Convention, the investigation of the fish combination, which has been bleeding the people of this Commonwealth for years, is an investigation which I believe the people of this Commonwealth commend. It has furnished information on which the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth is now proceeding, and facts have been presented and are now being laid before the grand jury of Suffolk County which undoubtedly will lead to indictments and prosecutions which may have a salutary effect upon the conduct of that industry in this Commonwealth. So after all is said on this subject, while there have been abuses the fact remains that millions of dollars have been saved to the Commonwealth by recess committees.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), as perfected by the amendment of the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs), will go as far, I believe, as any man who believes that the creation of these committees should be restrained and kept within reasonable limits, would desire. I believe those two amendments will meet the views of such a man and such a delegate in this Convention. They will prevent abuse, and at the same time they will preserve the possibilities of the system, which occasionally at least has rendered valuable and efficient service to the Commonwealth.

Mr. Waterman of Williamstown: I rise just to make a statement. This matter of compensation of recess committees has been laid to the Legislature, whereas it was left to the Governor and Council. For two or three weeks that Council wrestled with the matter to see whether they would give recess committees $500 and expenses or $1,000 and expenses, and the result was $1,000 and expenses. So you have got to blame both bodies if you want to blame anybody.
RECESS COMMITTEES.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: So far I have said nothing in this discussion, because I have been in some doubt as to what it was wise to do. I simply wish now to express my judgment in the matter.

I might preface my remarks by saying that, generally speaking, I am opposed to recess committees. I think there are too many appointed. I think that the good we get out of them is often so little as not to be worth while. I think it is fair to say that during the three years that I was Speaker, there was not a single recess committee appointed, except a committee on redistricting. That shows the attitude which I have taken toward recess committees. But we cannot deny that sometimes they are of great value. We cannot deny that it is wise that they be appointed occasionally. Any one familiar with legislation knows that well enough. Therefore it seems to me we cannot prohibit them, and if we are not going to prohibit them then we have got to permit proper compensation to be paid. Why, it is bad policy and it is bad principle to provide that the members of a committee which may sit all summer shall not be paid. It amounts to just this: That those men who can afford to sit in the summer time and come up here and attend to the business will be the men who will be appointed, and those who cannot afford it will not be appointed. That is not right in principle. I think, therefore, that perhaps the wisest solution of this problem is the solution which has been suggested by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), modified by the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs). I think that that goes far enough, and I think that it is a proper thing to do.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I want to take a moment to make one suggestion which it seems to me has been overlooked by the critics of recess committees, who have said that if it is necessary to study a problem during the summer let us have an outside commission appointed and let them be paid, and do not influence legislation by promising recess committees. It seems to me that those gentlemen overlook the necessity of having representatives of the Legislature studying these questions themselves, because all the study in the world is not of any use unless that study is crystallized into legislation. When you take the results of the recess committee's study and put it before the Legislature, those of us who have served in legislative bodies know the great importance of having men on the floor of the House and Senate who have studied the thing outside and who can explain the thing to the members of the Legislature. It seems to me that that argument alone is sufficient to warrant us in refusing to prohibit the appointment of these committees.

I agree with everything that has been said,— at least most of it,— that there have been too many committees; but I believe also that there has been more good done by committees than evil, and I honestly think that if the recommendations of most of these recess committees had been adopted by the Legislature this Commonwealth would be a good deal better off to-day. I had the privilege of serving on what was known as the Boston Elevated Railway Commission, and that commission made recommendations which, if carried out, would not have cost the public a cent, and the Boston Elevated Railway Company would have been extricated from the position that it was in. The result of the Legislature not following that recess committee's recommendation is a seven-cent fare. And so we could go on giving you some of the other examples of what recess committees have done. I think that the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman) has hit upon a very happy solution of the whole proposition. Fix the responsibility for the appointment of these committees by a roll-call, and make it appear that there is a substantial sentiment for them, and that is all that the public demand in this emergency. I sincerely hope that his amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEONARD of Boston: I just want to take the opportunity of saying, after these various amendments have been offered, that the most carefully considered, the best worded amendment, and the amendment that will carry out the desires of this Convention now twice expressed is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury). I wish to make that position clear.

Mr. MORRILL of Haverhill: All the accusations that have been made against recess committees are true, and then there has not been enough said. During nine years’ service in the House of Representatives I find that the man who votes right does not get on recess committees. I mean those who always vote for the interests of the common people. Those who vote with the political machine and vote for the invisible government or corporation interests and move the previous question frequently, so as to gag the opposition after the machine members have spoken, and do other work that the State machine wants in the line of political trickery, and in regard to amending the election laws and putting jokers here and there in other laws, get on recess committees, and a few good men, so called, are put on with them to take off the curse. [Laughter.] I am going to vote for this resolution because it will not do any harm if there are no recess committees for a while. I am going to vote for this, not because I believe it to be a solution, but because I believe something should be done to save the Commonwealth whatever amount of good reputation it still retains.

I believe the remedy for this recess committee graft lies in a change whereby the members of these committees would be chosen just as the members of a jury are selected. The jurors are twice selected men. The Legislature is composed also of twice selected men. Therefore why not have it do the same as is done in court? When twelve men are desired to try a case the wheel is turned around, the cards are drawn out one at a time and examined to see who are the twelve who are chosen. Why not have the Great and General Court, — the Legislature, — do likewise? Then all through the year the members will be able to act upon the bills before the House on their merits and vote conscientiously, instead of from ninety to one hundred of the two hundred and forty going against what they admit, out in the corridor and elsewhere, they know to be right, going contrary to that, with the expectation or hope that thereby they may be one of the twenty or thirty, more or less, who will get $1,000 extra on a recess committee or recess commission. To correct this recess committee evil by removing the temptation to stand in with certain interests all through the year would greatly purify legislation and be one of the best things that this Convention could do during the two years of its sitting. I am surprised that no one has offered a proposition to have the members of recess committees drawn as are jurors, because if there is any necessity whatever for recess committees, and there may be once in a while, then they should not be tagged in advance, as it is alleged they frequently have been, and their report forecasted or predetermined by packing the committee with a majority whose opinions are known in advance.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: Just one word in regard to the amendment I offered, as I fear many of the members did not fully understand it. It was an amendment proposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), and has been considered a part of it. I believe that if we are to authorize the appointment of recess committees we should limit the amount that may be expended in any one year. That is what my amendment proposes, to limit it to $20,000. That will pay ample salaries and expenses for three committees at least. A thousand dollars is too large a sum. The gentleman sitting right in front of me, from Williamstown, I believe (Mr. Waterman), stated that the Governor and his Council had approved of the $1,000 salary. I think that is a mistaken idea, though it is somewhat prevalent. The Legislature itself voted the funds for the six committees at the rate of $1,000 each, $1,000 for a secretary for each committee, and an abundance for expenditures going hither and thither, and I was told by a gentleman in the other end of this building the other day that the only duty really that the Governor and the Council had was to rubber stamp what the Legislature had done. It is not an approval. They did not approve of it. Some of them voted against it, and some of those at least I know who did vote for it voted for it because they believed that their duty, their function, merely was to place the rubber stamp on what the Legislature had done.

The amendment moved by Mr. Pillsbury was adopted, by a vote of 97 to 50; and the putting of the amendments moved by Messrs. Harriman, Hobbs and Clark was precluded thereby.

The resolution, as amended, was referred to the committee on Form and Phraseology Tuesday, August 13.

The resolution was reported by that committee Wednesday, August 14, in the following form (No. 422).

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 No person elected to the General Court shall, during the 4 term for which he was elected, be appointed to any office 5 created or the emoluments whereof are increased during 6 such term, nor receive additional salary or compensation 7 for service upon any recess committee or commission 8 except a committee appointed to examine a general re- 9 vision of the statutes of the Commonwealth when sub- 10 mitted to the General Court for adoption.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: This is the matter on which I asked that the amendment be printed, not thinking it would be reached to-day. As the matter is now before the Convention I move the amendment which is in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. Harriman moved that the resolution be amended by striking out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the following:
RECESS COMMITTEES.

No person elected to either branch of the Legislature shall, during the term for which he is elected, be appointed to any office created during such term. No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. Harriman: I shall not weary the Convention with a repetition of what I said when the matter was before the Convention at an earlier stage. I am thoroughly convinced, however, that simply because the Legislature sometimes has abused the privilege it should not be deprived of its use. I am emboldened also to offer the amendment because the Convention did not vote upon that phase of the matter yesterday. It voted upon the motion of the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), which precluded a vote upon the amendment which I offered. I have talked with men who were in the last Legislature at the last session, when six committees were appointed. As near as I can learn, if a two-thirds vote by roll-call had been required we would not have been afflicted with six recess committees.

Let me say in passing that I believe the privilege has been abused. If this resolution in the form in which it was passed by the Convention yesterday goes to the people, there is no alternative but for them to refuse it and place their seal of approval upon the wild array of committees, or else adopt it and forever say that their servants cannot have such a committee to work with unless its members work without pay. I believe that the restriction outlined in the amendment is perfectly safe. I do not believe that any Legislature, by a two-thirds vote on roll-call, would appoint committees unless they were needed; and I am thoroughly convinced, having talked with men who have been in the Legislature, that such committees have done wonderful work. The committee on Labor several years ago, of which one or two members of this Convention were members, compiled information which is valuable and which would not have been obtained under any other circumstances. The conditions after the war are going to make such investigations necessary, and I believe, as was said by the gentleman from Waltham, that we should not cut off our nose to spite our face. The same way to do is to say to the Legislature: "Yes, you can have committees, but you first have got to go on record and you have got to do it by the preponderance of the vote that will say that they are needed." And if you do this I believe there will be very few committees appointed unless they are necessary; and I submit to this Convention that if they are necessary the Legislature should have authority, because the Commonwealth needs such investigation and such committees from time to time. I trust the amendment will be adopted in lieu of the present form, which would debar forever the Legislature from enlarging its power to do thorough investigation, and that we shall allow men to be paid, and paid justly, for such work. I believe it will be far better than to say that they cannot have any such committee, regardless of what conditions may occur in the future.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I move the amendment which I proposed yesterday and which is in the hands of the Secretary, an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Bedford. If his amendment is to prevail I desire very much that mine shall be adopted. Hence I ask that the Convention adopt my amendment to his amendment and then do what it sees fit with his. My amendment proposes that in case committees are allowed the Legislature shall be limited to a sum not exceeding $20,000 in connection with such committees in any one year.

The Secretary: Mr. Clark of Brockton moves that the amendment moved by Mr. Harriman be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "and in no one year shall a sum exceeding twenty thousand dollars be paid as salaries and expenses of recess committees."

Mr. Quincy of Boston: I merely desire to ask the gentleman from New Bedford, in view of the differences of opinion in regard to this matter and the desire of many gentlemen to do something, without doing too much, to restrict this admitted evil, whether he would be willing to accept an amendment to his amendment which would limit the number of committees which could be authorized in one session to one committee. If he would be willing to accept such an amendment I should like to offer it and would vote for his amendment if so amended.

Mr. Harriman: In reply to the gentleman from Boston I would say that I would object to limiting the number of committees. A two-thirds vote would limit the committees to what the Legislature thought was wise.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: I feel so keenly the possibility of error if this Convention puts the dollar mark into the Constitution that I feel justified in exercising my prerogative as a member of the Convention, in contributing as I may toward the possibility of a night's calm reflexion upon this subject. I quite understand that there are members of the Convention who in their anxiety to speed the work desire an instant vote, and I quite understand that it is no popular position to take to remonstrate against that and ask the Convention to consider what it is doing. I am not certain that for one I should be seriously disturbed if this Convention decided to recommend to the people that there should be no recess committees. Personally my view is to the contrary. I will waive my judgment for that of the Convention; but, sir, the way to stop recess committees is to stop them,— to say: "We will have no more recess committees." What I object to, and what I shall insist upon calling to the attention of the Convention to the last moment, is that for the first time in the history of the Massachusetts democracy,—for this is a democratic State,—for the first time we contemplate cementing into the Constitution of this Commonwealth a declaration that men shall not receive compensation for work. It is the unfortunate wording of this resolution that ought to receive the severest strictures of which we are capable; a wording that says now, when democracy is spreading through the world and we are in arms for democracy, that for the first time we shall implant in the Constitution of Massachusetts the dollar mark,—for the first time we shall give the most solemn sanction to the theory that public service should be restricted to men of independent means. This is the theory that after centuries of struggle has been thrown overboard in England. At last England has become in this respect the pure democracy that we always have been. And now, within a dozen years after England has said that the members of Parliament shall be paid, we propose to put into the Constitution an unhappy phraseology which shall tell the world that we believe the constitutional recognition of money should be made. If gentlemen will substitute the simple declaration: "There shall be no more recess committees," then my objection will fall to the ground; but I beg of you to pause and in the closing hours of this Convention, when everything tempts us to haste, reflect what we are doing when we specify in this manner for the purpose of curing an evil which we all recognize,—when we specify a method of doing it which is absolutely contrary to and foreign to the very foundation principles of a democratic government.

I understand, sir, that there may be personal motives imputed to me in taking this attitude, and in anticipation of that criticism you will pardon me if I say that as a member of the committee on The General Court it was one year ago, and long before any personal considerations could affect my own attitude, when I joined with the rest of my committee in saying that this was an unwise step. Fate has left me the ranking man on the committee, and it is a duty falling to me in that capacity to continue my protest against this pernicious proposal.

Debate on the measure was continued Thursday, August 15.

Mr. CLAPP of Lexington: This subject has been debated pretty thoroughly and I do not propose to try to add very much to what has been said. However, I do want to support the principle of the Harriman amendment. It seems to me that we should make a great mistake to adopt the pending resolution in its present form so that under no circumstances could any compensation be paid to a recess committee. The proposed article itself recognizes one exception. It excepts the case of a committee appointed by the General Court from its own members to pass upon a revision of the public statutes. Such a committee may receive compensation. Are we wise enough, gentlemen, to foresee and to say with certainty that that is the only case in which it would be proper to give compensation to members sitting upon a recess committee? It seems to me that, safeguarded as the matter will be by the adoption of the Harriman proposal, which requires a two-thirds vote in each branch of the Legislature, we shall have nothing to fear. Undoubtedly the matter of recess committees has been worked so as to produce abuses, but it is conceded on all hands that we have had such committees that produced very useful results, and results which were much better than they would have been if the members had not received compensation for honorable and useful public service. So I say that if you limit the creation of these committees to cases where the proposition receives a two-thirds vote of all members of the Legislature, you will be surrounding the passage of bills with sufficient safeguards. I for one am perfectly willing to trust it to the Legislature with that barrier set up. But the Harriman amendment ought not to be adopted, in my opinion, just as he has proposed it, and I shall offer an amendment which the gentleman from New Bedford assures me is satisfactory to him. The pending resolution in its first half,—in its first six lines, or first five lines and a fraction,—is in admirable form. It is a duplication substantially of what is in the United States Constitution, and says:

No person elected to either branch of the Legislature shall, during the term for which he is elected, be appointed to any office created during such term.

Now the first half of the Harriman substitute does not extend the prohibition to a case of an office where the emoluments have been increased by the members of the General Court. My proposition, therefore, is to amend the resolution by striking out everything after the word "such term", found in line 6, and by adding the following sentence:

No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by call of the yeas and nays.

That sentence which I seek to add for the purpose of succeeding the last half of the pending article of amendment is exactly the sentence contained in the concluding part of the amendment offered by the delegate from New Bedford sitting on my left. As I said before, I am assured that he will ask consent to withdraw his own amendment.

Let me read in conclusion the article of amendment as it will stand if adopted in accordance with the recommendation which I now make. It will read as follows:

No person elected to the General Court shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any office created or the emoluments whereof are increased during such term.

So far it coincides with the text of the resolution as reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology. Then it will conclude with the last half of the Harriman amendment, namely:

No recess or ad interim committee shall be authorized by the General Court or by either branch thereof, except by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays.

I move this amendment, which I have just handed to the Secretary.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: The gentleman in this division (Mr. Clapp) came to me and pointed out where my amendment would be improved. My idea has been to make it workable, and to prevent there being an evil, and I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington, which does not change the wording of mine, but is a further precaution that will meet the approval of this Convention, should be adopted. And may I say also that if perchance the people of this Commonwealth should vote to adopt biennials there will be more need of recess committees and recess work than there would be under present conditions. And I would withdraw my amendment in favor of that offered by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp).

Mr. Avery of Holyoke: I just want to say a word in favor of the resolution presented by the gentleman from New Bedford as amended by the gentleman from Lexington. A few weeks ago I wanted information in regard to a certain matter and I went to Mr. Evans in the State Library and I worked with one of his assistants a long time. I could not find the statistics I wanted. I finally went to one of the departments in the State House and I found that about six years ago a recess committee had been appointed by the Legislature and had collected just the information that I wanted, and I found by an examination of what they had in the State Library that it was the finest collection of information on a very important branch of government there was anywhere in this country. That had been done by a committee appointed by the Legislature.

Now they do appoint sometimes too many committees. Sometimes these committees do foolish things, but do not let us make this remedy too drastic. Just because we have a boil on our leg, do not let us cut our leg off. Now let us show some common sense in this thing. That amendment that those two gentlemen have drawn will cure any trouble as far as it ought to be cured, and will leave us the benefit of what recess committees have done in this State and what they will do in the future.

Mr. Besse of Newburyport: I rise to ask for information. To my mind the way the resolution reads it says that no member of the Legislature can be appointed to a recess committee, and then it goes on to say that no recess committee can be authorized without a two-thirds vote of the Legislature. What I wish to inquire is, what would be the sense of authorizing the appointment of a legislative committee if the Legislature could not appoint members on the committee?

Mr. HOBBS of Worcester: I would undertake to say in answer to the gentleman's question,—although it probably was not addressed to me,—that the two sections are not at all in conflict; that a recess committee is not properly an office. It is a subcommittee of the Legislature, and is therefore not an office of the Commonwealth, but an office under the Legislature, which has the same authority to appoint recess committees as it has to appoint its regular committees.

The only reason that I am inflicting myself further on the Convention in this matter is due to the fact that certain arguments have been used in this debate which I desire to comment upon. The gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) yesterday said: "The Legislature gave us $500 a year, while they are making for some of their own members jobs of a thousand dollars a year. Do you see the difference?" I think I am quoting his language accurately.

The inference to be drawn from that, if any inference could fairly be drawn, was that he considered the Legislature had not treated the Convention fairly. I want to say something in regard to the Legislature's record in that respect. The Legislature was asked by members of the Convention at the last session to allow them $500 apiece for compensation. The Legislature gave them just that amount. I do not think you can charge the Legislature with an unfair action when they gave just what they were asked to give. There was some opposition, to be sure. There were members of the General Court who were considerably aggrieved by some things that had been said in this Convention and who carried their grudges to the extent of trying to slap the Convention in the face. The Legislature, however, did not yield to their arguments, and as the Legislature is an entirely human body it even deserves some credit for not so yielding. It always must be borne in mind, too, that they had a very plausible argument. The language of the statute under which we exist fixes our compensation at not more than $750; and the argument was used there, as the argument is used here, that by accepting office under that statute we entered into an implied agreement with the Commonwealth not to take more for our services.

The answer to that argument and the answer to the argument that has been advanced in relation to the recess committees receiving additional compensation are just exactly the same,—that the Commonwealth ought to pay a proper price for services rendered in its behalf to enable the men of small means who desire to exercise those offices to do it without a serious sacrifice on their part. I think that all the members of the Convention can see what would have been the result if the General Court had refused to grant compensation. Doubtless the result would not have occurred that was predicted there, that our sessions would have stopped. Doubtless the result would not have occurred that our deliberations would not have been carried on fairly and with due consideration of the matters before us; but I do not think anybody can deny that it would have been with great sacrifice on the part of the members. You can say the same thing about recess committees. If recess committees are needed, doubtless they will be appointed. It will be no more serious handicap to get unpaid recess committees than it is to get unpaid commissions, of which we appoint numbers each year, but I do not think it will be denied that the presiding officers will have either to restrict the membership of those committees to those who are able to serve without regard to their own financial means, or else ask men to do it at a considerable sacrifice to themselves. I regard patriotism as not entirely extinct in the General Court, and I have no doubt that men could make that sacrifice and would make it. But I think that the Commonwealth is big enough not to demand that sacrifice of men who are not able to make it.

Mr. Foss of Springfield: It seems to me that this resolution in its present form is too drastic, and in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington it seems to me that if we have recess committees enough it will not be a hard job to get two-thirds of the members of both Houses to pass it. Therefore by way of administering an anti-spasmodic I move an amendment which is in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. Foss moved that the resolution (No. 422) be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

except that, if His Excellency the Governor, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall deem a proposition to be one of public necessity, there may be appointed one recess committee the members of which shall not be subject to the foregoing restrictions.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I do not know whether my friend (Mr. Foss) from Springfield is aware of it, but that is a very reactionary proposition. Now we have had experiences like this: When the Legislature cannot work all the committees they want, and we have a Governor who is opposed, then the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House confer with His Excellency; then they fix up this measure: "You appoint three and I will appoint five," and when they do that, it goes right through.

It seems to me, if we are going to make any changes, that the gentleman from Lexington has made a great improvement on the suggestion offered by the gentleman from New Bedford. I did not intend to say anything more on this proposition. I have said enough already, but I want to say this: That I do not agree with the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) in his attitude yesterday afternoon, when he said if a man was public-spirited enough in Massachusetts to do public work without compensation it is going to defeat democracy in Massachusetts. Perhaps the gentleman is not aware of it, but the present Governor made a campaign three years ago and one of the issues was to reinstate non-paid commissions. He said that the non-paid commissions of the State did a great deal better service than the paid commissions, and we have a whole list of non-paid commissions in the State. So that if we did have a member of the Legislature who happened to serve on a committee that met once a week for five weeks, and if he did not get any additional compensation, he would not be doing any more than what the unpaid commissions are doing, and I do not think that it would prove that democracy is a failure in Massachusetts.
RECESS COMMITTEES.

303

I think that we ought to give the people an opportunity to pass upon this proposition. It is not for my friend from Waltham and myself to say. The people of Massachusetts will decide whether they want recess committees or not, if they are given the opportunity.

Now suppose that the people of Massachusetts do not want recess committees, and suppose the gentleman from Waltham does, why, it only proves that he is not in accord with the people, that is all. Now when I find that this Convention disagrees with me I do not continue to try to interpose my objections on this Convention, because I am not entitled to anything. I am in the minority. It is the majority that counts in this Convention, and when I am not in accord with the majority I simply subside. And if the gentleman from Waltham has any views that do not meet with the majority sentiment of this Convention, he ought to subside. We already have taken action on this proposition; and if a majority of the Convention thinks that the proposal of the gentleman from Lexington is the best solution, I have no objection to offer, but I should like to see it tried out for a few years and not have any recess committees. There have been a great many years in the history of the Commonwealth when we did not have recess committees, and I never have heard any fault found by the people. I never heard of any difficulties ever arising from it, and I do not think that we need them now. I am perfectly willing to trust the people to vote on a proposition that has cost the State $631,000 within the past fifteen years, with no adequate results.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: I am well assured that the people of Massachusetts have had their attention directed to this recess committee matter in such a way that they desire some relief from what we are agreed has resulted at last in an abuse of the custom of appointing paid recess committees. I want to see some measure that will eliminate the possibility of abuse, and let us place it upon the ballot in a form in which it will meet popular approval. But, sir, I am well convinced of this: That, widespread as the desire may be to cure the evil, if you go to the people with a proposal upon the ballot which says to them: "Occasions have arisen in the past, and may again when it will be necessary to appoint a recess committee, and under this scheme they will simply put on rich men who can afford to give their time for nothing, and they will bring in their report, and great weight will be given it because it has been an unpaid and gratuitous committee," the people will see the danger of that proposition, and, in my opinion, this resolution in its present form never will receive their approval when this matter is explained to them as it will be explained, of course.

Let us be frank about this thing. The resolution in its present form should be designated properly upon the ballot in some such way as this: "A prohibition to create recess committees and ad interim committees of any other membership than those whose financial resources will permit their gratuitous service to the State." That is what the thing means in its present form. I believe, sir, that every interest that has been aroused in the popular mind and in the press by a discussion of this subject will be met by the proposition as it emanates from the mind of our honorable friend from Lexington (Mr. Clapp). I hope, sir, the Convention will adopt it in that form, which to my mind will relieve the abuse and meet none of the opposition which the present form surely will arouse.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: I think that I am entitled to say a few words on this question, and I therefore move the previous question. [Laughter.]

Mr. Smith of Provincetown: I am one of those men who have been fortunate or unfortunate, sitting in the Constitutional Convention, to have been a member of the Legislature. Now there have been a good many hard things said about the Legislature and I have heard the Legislature say a good many hard things about the Convention, and I was able to keep my seat until one day I thought they went too far. Now the strongest argument in favor of this Convention receiving $500 was this: They said: “You came to the Convention for $750.” I agreed to that. I told them that the members of the Legislature came here for $1,000, but two or three years ago they were called here for a few days for a special session and they took $50 per man. They did not hesitate last year to increase their mileage fifty cents a mile. Now I think this is a proposition that should go to the people and let them settle it for themselves.

My contention on the matter of recess committees always has been this: We have about a hundred commissions in this State. Now all matters that come before the Legislature and are sent to recess committees are matters pertaining to some of those commissions. Now, sir, if the Legislature cannot handle them what is the matter with putting those matters up to the commissions and letting them make their report? Will you not get as fair, as impartial and intelligent a report from our commissioners as you would from a recess committee? I hope that we shall do something to curtail this matter in a way to be satisfactory to the people and let them do it.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) in a recent discussion of another subject called the attention of the Convention to the fact that in the Legislature amendments were offered in good faith on pending matters very often at dangerous parliamentary stages, and frequently amendments that were well intentioned entirely altered or nullified proposed legislation. If that is true in the Legislature it equally is true in a Constitutional Convention upon a matter pending in one of its final stages. In spite of the support which the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Harriman) has received on this proposition from his colleagues, largely in his own division, I think that the gentlemen who believe that they are curing this recess committee abuse by his amendment really are deceiving themselves. If they believe for a moment that a two-thirds vote is going to decrease the number of paid recess committees, I think they are subject to great self-deception, because, as I already have said, this is, I believe, the fourth time the matter has been before us. It has been passed by a substantial majority each time. The development of the practice of appointing recess committees in the Legislature has demonstrated that four or five recess committees can be created more readily than one or two. We all are honorable men when it comes to that, but the trouble with honorable men in the Legislature in this matter under debate is that each one believes that his subject should be investigated and studied by a recess committee and other honorable men believe likewise on their particular subjects. And because we want our matter investigated and studied we are not in a position to dispute the claims of the other honorable members or their contention for a study of their issues. They go before the committee on Rules as they also would under this two-thirds rule; and if there are not enough men on that committee to make a stand against it you will find recess committees appointed by the next session of the Legislature. The very next session of the Legislature, despite what has been said here of recess committees, will show what they think of this Convention and of the opinions here expressed, by appointing as many recess committees with compensation as they may deem fit, and on a two-thirds vote by roll-call, too, and I may observe that any proposition for recess committees which is approved by the legislative committee on Rules would receive a two-thirds vote on roll-call in either legislative branch.

The gentlemen have referred to the good things occasionally accomplished by recess committees, but is it not a more apparent fact that many good results might have been obtained but for the fact that they came from such committees?

Last week there were two charts which hung upon our western wall. I wish they were there now, but the gentleman from Haverhill in this division (Mr. George) secured a mortgage on the charts, foreclosed his lien and, like a harsh, unyielding creditor, removed the property. What new mischief ad hominem he next intends, we wot not of. Yet there was value in those charts, for, as he well said, by them you could prove, why — anything! If you will recall the chart which hung farthest from where I now stand, it was labeled "Chaos." Upon it were depicted circles, squares, and other figures of various sizes, colors and diameters, all in disorder, disarranged, jostling, crowding, overlapping, each the other. Let that represent our legislators as they first assemble, their various sizes, creeds, opinions. And then the other chart which was named "Proposed order." Here we find the circles and squares joined by stems to branches, these to limbs, until all are gathered in one large branch which led to the magic circle which bore the letter "G" in green. Now, here, methinks, I see the opportunity, if the biennial election system is adopted, of all the members of the General Court grouped in their recess committees leading to the magic "G", in green, and what that magic "G" in green may represent, I hardly need to specify. This paid recess committee practice cannot be amended into a logical and honorable legislative system. I will call it an historical development, or rather, a political practice which has grown up in the last few years. Let us pay the members of the Legislature an honorable salary, let them do the work that comes before them each on a par with the other. It is not a matter of saving dollars and cents to the Commonwealth. I think we ought to cast that aside. It is an indefensible system; you cannot get away from it. A majority of the members of the legislative body looking for favors and appointments from the Speaker, — you cannot defend that system in theory or in practice, and we have got to get another method of procuring information for the Legislature than by the appointment of these recess committees. I trust the Convention will stand by the action it has taken.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: I should like to say a word growing out of nine years' experience in the Legislature, five years in the House and four years in the Senate. I believe the amendment goes altogether too far and that such a restriction as this ought not to be made part of our Constitution. In the first place, I believe the evil will tend to correct itself. When I first became a member of the Legislature the scandal of committees traveling outside the limits of the Commonwealth had reached large proportions, and as a result of the agitation against that practice it has corrected itself entirely. We have no committees of the Legislature now traveling outside the limits of the Commonwealth, because the practice has been done away with by general consent.

Now, simply because there is a good deal of public resentment at the action of the Legislature of this year in creating an unusual number of recess committees, we do not want to be carried off our feet. I do not think it is right to enact a constitutional provision which will make it either impossible for a recess committee to be created by the Legislature, or if it should be created, that only members of the Legislature can serve upon it who have independent means and can give their time without compensation. I think that is a very unwise practice to establish.

We do not know what is ahead of us in the new years which are to come during this reconstruction period following the war. We may be face to face with a situation which absolutely may require the appointment of a recess committee to consider some special questions which will not come within the scope of any commission which now is established in the State. I think all that we ought to do and all that is necessary is included in the amendment offered by the delegate from New Bedford as it is amended by the delegate from Lexington. All that we have to do in this matter and all that it is necessary to do, in my judgment, speaking from my years of experience, is to surround the creation of these recess committees with a certain dignity; and the dignity which is given to the creation of these recess committees by the suggestion of the gentleman from New Bedford, as properly amended by the gentleman from Lexington, is all sufficient, in my judgment, and I think that ought to express the wisdom and good sense of the Convention.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: I think that this amendment is not coming from the friends of those who are opposed to recess committee appointments. The only thing in this amendment, this so-called Harriman amendment, is that by a two-thirds vote taken by the call of the yeas and nays recess committees may be appointed. It was pointed out before, in the other debates on this subject, that the reason why recess committees are created and are allowed to go through the Legislature and go through it so easily is that practically two-thirds of the membership of the House are candidates for positions on the recess committees. Nearly every member has a hope that he is going to get a recess committee appointment, and that hope is fostered by the so-called party whips in the Legislature, who, to keep a member in line on certain measures, say to him: "Now easy! Easy on this! Confidently, you are slated for a position on a recess committee. Easy on this proposition. Remember, you are slated for a position on a recess committee." There is your evil. When that hope is spread in this manner among two-thirds of the Legislature, how simple a matter it is to get a two-thirds vote! It is so easy that we might as well drop the subject here completely as permit this amendment. Do not insult the intelligence of the people of Massachusetts by presenting to them this resolution with such an amendment as this requirement for a two-thirds vote. Why, it is as easy as rolling off a log to get a two-thirds vote of the Legislature for creating a recess committee when there are more than two-thirds hopeful aspirants for positions upon these recess committees. If you want to have recess committees leave the Constitution alone; do not attempt to change it. If you do not want recess committees, why, kill the so-called Harriman amendment and let the amendment that this Convention already has sent along to this stage be adopted.
RECESS COMMITTEES. 307

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I wish to occupy only a minute. I am one of the members of this Convention who has felt very strongly on this matter, and I continue to feel strongly that something should be done. As I said on a former occasion, it is not the fifty thousand, seventy-five thousand or a hundred thousand dollars that is taken from the public treasury to pay the salaries and expenses of these recess committees; it is the demoralizing influence that it has on the members and on the Legislature which holds up legislation that is needed. Rather than let this matter go as it is and let the committees continue to be appointed as they are, I would much prefer that the members of the Legislature should have their salaries increased to $1,500, that they might be enabled to sit for a longer time and complete the business that is due to come from that Legislature. I hope that something will be done and that this Convention will not be put in the plight that it perhaps was yesterday, as looked upon by some outside, as having got tired of its work, as having shirked its duty and thrown everything overboard for the sake of getting out of here a day or two earlier. I admit there is considerable merit in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lexington as drafted on the amendment of the gentleman from New Bedford, and that it is much better than nothing. If there were added to that an amendment limiting the number of recess committees to two or three at the outside, I think it would cover the ground very well.

The amendment moved by Mr. Foss of Springfield was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Clapp of Lexington was rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 90 to 101.

After the recess the resolution (No. 422) was passed to be engrossed Thursday, August 15.

It was considered on its final stage Wednesday, August 21.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: I very much regret personally the form which this resolution has taken. The first part of the resolution simply seeks to write into the Constitution a provision which has existed in our general law since 1857, which is now section 21 of chapter 3, which provides that no member of the General Court, during the term for which he is elected, shall be eligible to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth created during such term, except an office to be filled by vote of the people. The provision of our general laws follows a provision of the Constitution of the United States. The pending resolution leaves out what seems to be an important exception, "except an office to be filled by vote of the people". So that the first part of the resolution, it seems to me, is open to the objection that it prevents any member of the General Court being eligible to any office created during the term for which he is elected, which office is to be filled by vote of the people, to which it seems to me there is no reasonable objection. But unfortunately, there has been attached to this resolution a provision which is in the nature of a rider, which relates to recess committees. As I intimated when I spoke upon this resolution the other day, it seems to me that the Convention has been carried off its feet by reason of the fact that the present Legislature has abused the privilege which it had of creating recess committees; and we now, if this resolution is adopted, are in danger of writing into the Constitution a provision that hereafter there shall be no recess committees created by the Legislature, except a committee on the revision and codification of the public statutes. That very exception shows that there are occasions when it is proper and necessary that a recess committee of the Legislature should be created. I say that we are providing then that if they are created they shall serve without any compensation. That simply means that no member of the Legislature can serve on any recess committee unless he is a man of independent income, for no man in ordinary circumstances could possibly serve on a recess committee under those conditions, pay his expenses, come from some distant part of the State, work here during the summer. It would be absolutely impossible. It seems to me that it is creating a very unfortunate condition of things, and that it is a very unfortunate provision to enact into our constitutional law.

Regarding recess committees, I wish simply to say this: There are occasions when a recess committee is necessary, and there are occasions when recess committees do very fine and efficient work. There are always a number of very efficient men in the Legislature who are very conversant with the subject-matters in hand, who properly can inform the Legislature of the result of their study and investigation. And there is this advantage of a recess committee of the Legislature over an outside commission made up of so-called experts, that these outside—I yield.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I was going to ask my friend from Melrose (Mr. Jones) if this Convention had not set a good example to the Legislature. We have had a recess committee sitting during the last summer without compensation. We are going to have another recess committee sit till next June without compensation, and the Legislature can do likewise if the Legislature wishes.

Mr. Jones: I do not think that it is a parallel case. This is an exceptional instance. The committee on Codification of the Constitution which we are about to set up is to do a special and particular work, and any member who is a lawyer would find it amply to his advantage to serve on such a committee without compensation by reason of the prestige which would come to him for such service.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: I sincerely hope that this Convention will refuse to submit this proposal to the people. It looks as though the one hundred and fifty-seven lawyers in this Convention were going to try to take care of the lawyers in the General Court. Of course on a recess committee to revise the statutes few would get a place outside the lawyers, and as there is no limit to the size according to this constitutional provision they might put twenty or forty or fifty lawyers on a recess committee, all of whom will be paid. It looks to me like almost a cut and dried scheme to take care of the lawyers, who already are taken care of too well, and I hope that those of us who are not lawyers will arise and refuse to submit this thing to the people.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: I hope that on the last day of this Convention we will not submit any such proposition as this to the people. I regret very much that the time of the gentleman from Melrose (Mr. Jones) was so limited that he could not have repeated more of his address of the other day. Of all of the speeches that I have heard in this Convention I think that the remarks made by our delegates from Melrose on this particular subject the other day were worthy of your careful consideration and reflection. He rehearsed to you, after many years' experience in the Legislature, his experience relative to recess committees. He called to your attention the abuse made years ago by committees of the Legislature that traveled outside of the State at the expense of the Commonwealth, and how public opinion had eradicated that evil. He pointed out in a very able way that this would rectify itself if left alone, and I think it will. But this Convention should not be influenced by a number of delegates so warped because they have got particular personal objections to recess committees, or simply because some members have been disappointed possibly because they themselves did not succeed in getting on some committee or have become aggrieved because some one they dislike did happen to get on a committee! There have been abuses with recess committees; there is no doubt about that, gentlemen, to those of us who are familiar with it. I happen to be engaged in the insurance business, and there has not been a year for the last ten but what there has been some recess committee sitting on our affairs; and that, with the Legislature sitting the other six months, has kept us busy the whole year. But there is no reason why I should so far forget myself and the dignity of my position that I am going to vote to put any such provision as that up before the people, because it is an insult to our General Court.

Mr. Ross of New Bedford: Just a word. I will not tire members. If we desire to have a dignified amended Constitution it seems to me we ought not to pass this matter at this time, prohibiting the appointment of recess committees with pay. I want to say that I served on a recess committee on Labor some years ago, and I think the information we secured and filed with the State Librarian has been very helpful ever since to those in search of information regarding the matters we were asked to inquire into. I want to say in the first place that I voted against recess committees. I know the matter has been abused in the past; I have seen it abused and I have seen it right. I have seen where the Legislature could not or dare not appoint recess committees because of the attitude toward them of the public in general. The position that this Convention will take if it passes the matter in this form will be this: That those who can afford to serve on recess committees will be those who are appointed, and those who cannot afford to serve, because of not having sufficient of this world's goods, will not be able to serve and consequently will not be appointed. If that is not class legislation I do not know what is.

Mr. Buttrick of Lancaster: Personally I am prepared to vote now and to vote against this resolution, and I think every member of the Convention has his mind made up. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Carr of Hopkinton: This matter has been fully debated, and I guess every member in the Convention here has his mind made up how he ought to vote. We have had several roll-calls on it, and now it has got to the point where the question is: Shall it be submitted to the people? The matter has been thoroughly discussed. Amendments have been offered to try to cripple the purpose of the resolution, and they have been rejected, and rejected by substantial majorities. One of the many questions you will decide by the adoption of this resolution is preventing the suspension of the statute that the member in the second division has referred to. You will notice that whenever a new commission is created by the Legislature there generally is, or there has been in a great many cases, a section in the law enacted that says that the statute prohibiting the appointment of a member of the Legislature on that commission shall be suspended. That has become such a flagrant abuse of legislative power that our papers, the principal papers in Massachusetts, have come out calling attention to this shameful practice and asking for relief by constitutional amendment. Why, you remember that not more than a month or two ago, our leading papers unanimously asked us, as one of the things that we ought to do, to prevent this continued abuse. There is no other way that you can prevent it than by sending this resolution to the people. We have heard all the doctors on the question here, and we have made up our minds there can be no way to cure this evil but by the adoption of this resolution. If you kill the resolution at this stage you permit the abuse to go on, not only of recess committees, but also the abuse of suspending that part of our statutes that says that no member of the Legislature shall act on a commission or be appointed to any office created by a Legislature of which he is a member. Send the resolution to the people and you are curing the two evils.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The weakness in the arguments in favor of turning our backs upon our own judgment and our own decisions is that it assumes that we must have recess committees, that we cannot have any government of the State without them. Many States to-day do entirely without this system. It is unknown to them. It has been practiced to some degree by Congress, but it has brought a great deal of criticism upon Congress. One of the great things this Convention is doing for the Commonwealth, or is likely to do, is to submit an amendment which will bring about a rearrangement of the executive department, including the commissions. There is where we ought to get the information for the Legislature.

At present the recess committees usually are intended to collect bodies of facts and to adjust and classify them for the use of the Legislature; but their reports do not seem to be used carefully. They make very little impression upon the public mind. It is to be hoped that in future the work now done by the recess committees will be performed in most cases by executive departments upon the request. of the Legislature, departments always in session, having the machinery for investigation. We ought to learn to depend more than in the past upon the reports of such commissions and of such executive bodies; and if the executive is properly organized, as it is likely to be under the amendment now about to come before the Convention, it will not be necessary to appoint so many, — it will not be necessary to appoint any, — recess committees in future.

One argument that I have heard upon this floor is that there will not be any more recess committees, because the people of Massachusetts are no longer in favor of them. If that is the case, let the people of Massachusetts embed their conviction in the text of the Constitution.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. Leonard of Boston: I would not inject myself into the discussion at this time if I did not feel it was necessary to reply to one or two of the statements that have been made. The gentleman refers to this being the last day of the Convention. Let me state that this resolution was presented on the very first day that resolutions were introduced into the Convention, on June 19, and it became document No. 5. The gentleman has referred also to a rider. I supposed, from his manner when he said that, he had discovered something. There is no rider. Document No. 5 refers to the appointments to offices as well as to the appointments on recess committees.

We have discussed this on the question of substitution for the report of the committee. We have discussed it on third reading, on engross-ment, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wellesley
(Mr. Pillsbury), on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. Harriman), — on all occasions. On every roll-call we have passed this by a substantial vote. I think that there is not a respectable opinion left in this body that this is not a subject-matter of constitutional limitation and restriction upon the legislative body, that this is a mere matter of statutory enactment that might be amended or repealed at any time. The gentleman admits an abuse regarding the appointment to offices created by the Legislature. Why, gentlemen, we know that the offices created and the appointments made under a suspension of the statute in that particular are immeasurably less than the recess committee appointments that are made.
I am not going to attempt in a few minutes to recapitulate the various arguments; but one that has been urged very strongly and with great force and still persists is the argument regarding a man of modest means, the possibility that he may decline to serve and cannot render service to the State. I should like to ask the Convention to look on the other side and ask how the people with modest means, or the poor, are best represented: whether they profit more by a system like the recess committee system, which has become an intolerable abuse, and we know it, or whether they are going to better profit by the occasional appointment of some individual of their class to a minority position on a recess committee. You say recess committees do good work. Occasionally they do, but their results very rarely are accepted.

At the very beginning of this discussion, I said that I had nothing to say in disparagement of the Legislative body. I have endeavored to maintain that attitude throughout this entire discussion. I have refrained from all personal references, and I have endeavored to keep
RECESS COMMITTEES.

myself strictly within the lines of parliamentary procedure. This resolution was introduced at a time when there could not be any controversy between the Legislature and this body. It was introduced with no idea of recrimination, taunt or reprisal. It was introduced at the beginning of our deliberations to rectify an abuse. And I wish at this time to express my appreciation of the members of the Legislature, the past members of the General Court who are sitting in this body and who have given plain testimony as to the working of the recess committee practice. I believe that when this is submitted to the people, — and our duty now is merely to pass on the question of submission, — and when the people accept it, the members of the General Court who are going to assemble here in the future years will bear the best testimony as to the value of the task that we are about to perform in removing a system that is a severe handicap to proper legislative work and procedure.

Mr. CLARK of Brockton: This Convention will recall that only a few days ago there hung on the wall over in that corner of this hall a chart illustrating the evils of our heterogeneous commission business in this Commonwealth. Now it is common knowledge, and no one can deny it, that several of those commissions were created for the express purpose of making places for members of the Legislature sitting and voting thereon. The first part of this resolution proposes to prohibit such work in the future. Why do not the gentleman from Melrose (Mr. Jones) and other gentlemen who oppose this measure, instead of coming here in the attitude of opposition, with their constructive forces and powers of mind do something that shall be constructive, something that shall be practical and get rid of this evil?
It is an evil. I admit that some good has been accomplished by some of these committees at times; but I want to say that the evil that has been done in the corruption of the Legislatures, in demoralization of legislators, in the waste of money drawn from the public treasury, outweighs, in my humble opinion, ten times over, all the good that has been accomplished. I have read somewhere in a book, — you young men know where it is, perhaps; it is that great and good book, — that “the last state of that man was worse than the first.” And after the discussion that we have had in this Convention, after the reports of the press throughout the Commonwealth and the information given to the people of the gross evil in the Legislature as seen and recognized by the Convention, if we go back on the position that we already have assumed, the last state of the recess committee evil will be worse than if we never had raised our voices against it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: It was not my intention to participate in this affair at all, and up to the present time I have voted in favor of abolishing recess committees. I have changed my mind.
There is no more crime in a political candidate for office seeking his reward by asking the labor men to give him their support because he voted in favor of a labor bill, than in an individual seeking his reward and asking the Speaker of the House to place him on a recess committee for his vote. It gives to the people outside the opportunity to say it is the same thing in return. I do not believe any harm would be done. I criticize the Legislature as much as any individual in this Commonwealth. I was abused as much as any man in this Commonwealth for favoring the appointment of a recess committee, and I still stand behind the recommendation I made at that time. I believe the Legislature itself is the best judge of this matter. We should send men to the Legislature who, no matter whether they are disappointed at not being appointed on recess committees or not, are ready to do their part in the fight for better representative government. During the past month what has worried me wonderfully is this: There may be some attorneys here representing people who are going to be brought before the courts for helping to bring about the high cost of living in this Commonwealth. There may be some feeling growing out of that, but if the recess committee did a good job in investigating the fish business and bringing about the prosecution of those responsible for creating the monopoly it was a valuable service to the people of this State and to all the country.

Mr. George of Haverhill: May I ask my friend in the first division if the prosecution of the fish trust was not based on the investigation by the committee which sat during the session of the Legislature?

Mr. Driscoll: By the recess committee and the special committee both combined, and the prominent work of the gentleman now in office,—if I mention his name I may be booming him for political success, so I will not mention his name at the present time, because both he and his opponent are in the Republican party. But he is deserving of as much credit as anybody else. But if recess committees will be able to do in the future what has been done in the past on many questions, such as the matter of injunctions and in the adjusting of some of our other labor problems, so that there will be a better feeling in this Commonwealth, we always shall be glad that we have not abolished the system. I am against referring this resolution to the people. I trust that the men who will be sent to the Legislature in the future will be such men as will act in the interest of the people and fight for the people, and not in the interest of any such matters as we are now discussing here.

The Convention voted, Wednesday, August 21, by a vote of 112 to 50, to submit the resolution to the people.

It was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 152,800 to 87,009.
Mr. Robert Luce of Waltham presented the following resolution (No. 269):—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have full power to authorize any department, commission, bureau, board or other administrative agency to issue ordinances which shall have the force of law until rescinded by the agency which issued them, or until annulled by the General Court.

The committee on State Administration recommended that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was considered Tuesday, August 7, 1917.

After debate the resolution was referred to the committees on State Administration and the Executive, sitting jointly, by a vote of 131 to 101.

Those committees reported Tuesday, July 30, 1918, the following new draft (No. 409), based in part on the foregoing resolution:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The Council, with the approval of the Governor, may on petition and after advertised public hearing, pass statutory orders relating to local, special, or private matters, or to the carrying out of provisions of existing law: provided, that no such order shall involve an expenditure of money by the Commonwealth unless out of an appropriation already made, or shall impose a penalty exceeding one hundred dollars. Before a petition for the passage of such an order shall be considered by the Council, it shall be reported upon by that department or agency of the Commonwealth, if any, which in the opinion of the Governor exercises functions embracing in their scope the subject-matter of such petition. The form of an order shall be approved by the Attorney-General before its final passage, and after passage, it shall be engrossed and filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and advertised and published in the same manner as laws enacted by the General Court. Unless otherwise defined by law, local matters shall be deemed to include any matter relating only to a particular political subdivision or district of the Commonwealth, and special or private matters shall be deemed to include any matter relating to one or more particular individuals, associations, or private corporations.

27 A statutory order relating only to a particular city or town shall be designated as a municipal statutory order and shall take effect only upon acceptance by the city or town in such manner as may be prescribed by such order.

31 Any order other than a municipal statutory order if passed by the unanimous vote of all the Councillors voting thereon, by yeas and nays, shall take effect upon its approval by the Governor, or at such later date as may be fixed therein; if not passed by a unanimous vote, it shall be transmitted to the General Court and shall take effect
The resolution (No. 409) was read a second time Tuesday, August 13.

Mr. Arthur H. Wellman of Topsfield moved that the resolution (No. 409) be amended by striking out lines 3 to 53, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

The General Court may delegate to the Council the power to pass, with the approval of the Governor, and under such rules and limitations as the General Court shall prescribe, acts and resolves of a local, special or private nature, and orders for the carrying out of provisions of existing law, but all such acts, resolves and orders shall be subject to alteration, amendment or repeal by the General Court.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 30 to 103.

Mr. Albert Bushnell Hart of Cambridge moved that the amendment be amended by striking out the word "special".

This amendment was rejected.

The resolution (No. 409) was rejected Tuesday, August 13, 1918, by a vote of 55 to 94.

The committees on State Administration and the Executive, sitting jointly, also reported, July 30, 1918, the following resolution (No. 410) based in part on resolution No. 269, which had been referred to those committees:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 All petitions for the passage of legislation relating to local, special or private matters shall be filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth on or before December first or such other date or dates as the General Court may require, and the Secretary shall forthwith transmit a copy of the same to that department or agency of the Commonwealth which in his opinion exercises functions embracing the subject-matter thereof. In conformity to such rules and regulations as may be established by the General Court such department or agency shall make written report thereon, and until such report has been received the General Court shall not consider such petition unless admitted by not less than a two-thirds vote of the members of each branch present and voting thereon. The General Court shall have full power to determine what petitions relate to local, special or private matters.

The resolution was read a second time Tuesday, August 13, 1918, and was rejected the same day, by a vote of 44 to 56.
THE DEBATE.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: This proposal concerns the thirtieth article of the Bill of Rights. It is a famous article. In view of its importance to our deliberations I shall ask your indulgence while I read it to refresh our memories.

In the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them: the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them: the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them: to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

It will be observed that this section is the concluding article of the first part of the Constitution. In our tortoise-like progress we are now concluding our consideration of the fundamental rights of mankind which our fathers thought to be unalienable and unalterable, and the permanence of which we in large measure have approved. We now approach the Frame of Government. We have been discussing right; we are now to discuss expediency. This article is the bridge between the two parts of the Constitution, and in theory, though not in time, we are now half way through our labors. And inasmuch as this article involves both right and expediency, with indeed the possibility that it might better have been put under the heading “Frame of Government” than under the heading “Declaration of Rights,” I would ask your indulgence this morning while I use it for the purpose of somewhat broader consideration of affairs than the simple resolution before you on its face suggests; and yet before I conclude perchance I may bring the threads together so you will see that my remarks are bearing upon the specific question.

There is danger that we may not see the forest for the trees. There is danger that in the isolated, separate consideration of these resolutions, we may forget that there is a broad, comprehensive purpose to be sought by this Convention. There is danger that in rejecting proposals for improvement one by one, we in the end may find we have accomplished no advance, or but slight advance, and may leave this hall with a feeling that we have thrown away an opportunity for constructive action to the benefit of all the Commonwealth.

In view of that danger I wish to ask this morning that you consider for a moment the broad need of the hour. We are at the moment in the very jaws of war. We see before us, when that war is finished, a renewal of economic competition on a scale never before known in the history of the world. So whether for war or for peace, the prime duty of this Convention is to improve, if possible, the efficiency of government.

Here is no question of right or wrong, here is only a question of expediency,—the question of how to make our machinery of government more adequate to the vital, the crying, the imperative need of the hour, and to this end the committees of this Convention have been considering how our methods of government may be made more efficient. Those who are concerned with the judiciary are to present to us, I understand, measures for making our judicial machinery more efficient, by a somewhat thorough reform of judicial processes. Those of our membership who are concerned with the executive are to bring before us a proposal for the organization of the executive department which contemplates making our executive machinery more efficient.
Those who have been concerned with the legislative department of our government will bring before us, next on the calendar, a proposal to supplement or to supplant the present methods of making law.

- But beyond that no proposal presents itself, so far as I am aware, which goes to the root of things, barring the very simple proposition that I am laying before you. This proposal on the face of it is brief, simple and perchance not revealing its whole significance. Let me read it to you:

The General Court shall have full power to authorize any department, commission, bureau, board or other administrative agency to issue ordinances which shall have the force of law until rescinded by the agency which issued them, or until annulled by the General Court.

Mr. Walsh of Fitchburg: Would not the adoption of the amendment proposed prevent anybody from having a knowledge of the law of the State unless they consulted not only the Constitution and statutes, but the ordinances passed by every single commission authorized by the Legislature to pass ordinances?

Mr. Luce: It would put the citizen in precisely the position in which he now stands, with the exception that a certain book for which I have sent, labeled now "Special Acts and Resolves" would probably hereafter be labeled "Statutory Ordinances," or something of that sort, as it is now labeled in England. Here comes the text of my address; it is called "Special Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts." I am urging upon this Convention to ask its committees to give further consideration to this book: "Special Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts."

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman, if I understand him correctly, is he trying to give different State commissions the power to pass ordinances, that are now called special laws and passed by the Legislature?

Mr. Luce: I am asking that the Legislature, if in its judgment at any time it ever sees fit, may authorize any or all of the administrative agencies of government to do precisely the thing that my friend in the third division inquires about.

And now, having clarified that, so that we may be perfectly frank at the outset, permit me to address myself to this volume,—disclosing the most iniquitous feature of the whole government of Massachusetts,—for which, as far as I am aware, the only proposal of remedy before this Convention is this that I have read to you. And I call it iniquitous, not because of personal bias or prejudice, or solitary conviction, but because such it has been pronounced in respect of legislative bodies in every State in the land. I must not take time even to skim the mass of testimony that can be brought upon this subject. I will cite to you simply the opinion of two men of the highest eminence in their respective political parties, whose names will command, as they should, the respect of this body. One single sentence from the second message of Grover Cleveland, delivered in January, 1884, to the Legislature of New York. He says:

Another evil which has a most pernicious effect in legislation is the introduction and consideration of bills, purely local in character, affecting only special interests, which ought not upon any pretext to be permitted to encumber the statutes of the State.

He reiterated that again and again in the course of his public life. And now, perchance, if gentlemen of the opposite political faith should hesitate to accept the views of Grover Cleveland, let me read you one more sentence, from the valedictory address of Elihu Root as presiding officer of the recent Convention in New York State. This is what Elihu Root, Republican, said of a Legislature, Republican,—and I confess it with shame:

We found that the Legislature of the State had declined in public esteem, and that the majority of the members of the Legislature were occupying themselves chiefly in the promotion of private and local bills, of special interests, with which they came to Albany, private and local interests upon which apparently their re-elections to their positions depended, and which made them cowards and demoralized the whole body.

Using the words of Elihu Root, I appeal here for such change of our Constitution as shall prevent men from making themselves cowards and demoralizing the General Court of Massachusetts; and I base this appeal upon the experience of all the States of the land. Let me tell you briefly what has been attempted in this matter.

The first great line of action concerned itself with the positive prohibition of special laws. It probably began with a provision by the State of Georgia in 1798, which forbade the Legislature to enact four certain kinds of laws. From that time on the Constitutions began to contain more and more of specific prohibitions. They prohibited laws relating to lotteries, they prohibited legislative divorce, they came presently to prohibit incorporation by special acts. In 1851 Indiana started on a new line of procedure by taking a group of prohibitions and putting them in the Constitution. State after State followed. The Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania in 1873, as the courts in their formal decisions have declared, was held primarily and almost solely to grapple with this evil of special legislation.

New York took the same step. And after those two great States, New York and Pennsylvania, had set the example, a score of others followed, until now more than two-thirds of the States of this Union attempt to meet this evil by the specific prohibition of certain classes of legislation. Only the New England States refrain from it, and the result in our own State has been this exhibition of incompetency in the handling of government,—this exhibition of incompetency known as the "Special Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts." What is the harm done by special legislation?

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I should like to ask the gentleman, through you, Mr. Chairman, if he would kindly explain what is the difference between the ordinances which he proposes to authorize and the present ordinances such as are issued by a city or town government, or by the fire prevention commissioner, or by several other public service bodies in this Commonwealth?

Mr. Luce: When I reach that subject in the due and orderly arrangement of my remarks, if my memory prove so treacherous that I do not address myself to it, I shall deem it a great personal favor if the gentleman in the fourth division will remind me of it, but meantime I ask his kind indulgence if I refrain from putting the cart before the horse.

I was about to say that in the matter of the evils at which we aim I should put first, only because it occurs to me first, the great waste of time. Two years ago a recess committee of the Legislature, entrusted with the investigation of legislative procedure, presented certain statistical information upon this point to which I have added by my own computations. I find that in the last eight years our Legislatures averaged to pass each year 308 special laws. They averaged to pass 306 general laws. The number of special laws is actually greater than the number of general laws. In the same time they averaged to enact each year 151 resolves and 121 appropriations. Inasmuch as many of the resolves and appropriations are special in their nature, it is probable that our figures bear out the aggregate experience of the States of the Union, which is that about seven-tenths of all American legislation is special in its nature.

It is safe to say that if this special legislation were treated as it is treated by every other country in the civilized world, the annual sessions of our Legislature could be cut in two.

Secondly, there is the item of expense. The Auditor recently has issued a statement to the effect that our legislative session just finished cost something more than $400,000. There were introduced something more than 2,000 measures, making the average cost per measure introduced about $200. There were enacted something more than 800 measures, making the average cost per measure enacted nearly $500. The average cost of every proposition heard, considered, debated, put into law, in this State, is about $500.

Now, absolutely at random,—because this book has only just been put in my hands,—I am going to open some of its pages, and ask you to consider whether it was worth $500 to settle the questions I shall lay before you in this way. Here is the first one:

An Act to revive the corporation of Fobes Hayward & Co. (Incorporated) for purposes of liquidation.

That was actually the first thing that my eye fell on,—"An Act to revive the corporation of Fobes Hayward & Co. (Incorporated) for purposes of liquidation." Mr. Chairman, was it worth $500 to do that thing in that way?

Mr. Reidy of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman by what rule of three or six he arrives at that kind of computation. To dispose of all the measures that were introduced into the committee on the General Court, it took less time than to dispose of what the gentleman from Waltham has so far introduced. Is he going to charge that all of these measures, thirty-one in number, cost exactly this Convention what his efforts apparently are going to cost us?

Mr. Luce: I make no charges, but attempt to continue the orderly course of my remarks.

Now, let me read the next one, Chapter 276. And this was taken entirely at random, and I would ask my good friend in front of me (Mr. Reidy), not if he thought it worth $500, but if he thought it worth $50,—if he thought it worth fifty cents,—to proceed in this manner to secure Chapter 276:

An Act to authorize the alienation for public purposes of a part of a town burial ground in West Springfield.

Mr. Reidy: Like the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with what is sought to be obtained in that act. I assume under a former act of incorporation, in days when we were extremely strict with reference to cemeteries, that there was some limitation which prevented what is now desired. But I beg the gentleman to bear in mind that there are other expensive departments of the Common-wealth besides the General Court; and these ordinances and these laws which he proposes that boards and commissions shall make,— do not let him forget for one moment that they are going to cost something. The expenses of boards and commissions mount in dollars, while the expenses of the General Court mount up in coppers.

Mr. LUCE: Again to proceed with the story in front of me, again at random I turn to another instance of using a trip hammer to crack walnuts, of asking 280 men in General Court assembled, by the deliberate processes of committee hearings, advertisement, debate at the several stages, and final consideration by the Governor,—again an illustration, as I say, of using a trip hammer to crack walnuts,—Chapter 278:

An Act to authorize the Shepard Congregational Society and the Church affiliated therewith to hold additional property.

But it would tire you if I attempted to go through this list of trivialities, with which that great body must concern itself.

As I have said, the first aim of the States was to prohibit absolutely this class of legislation. That was found to work great injustice. There are many special needs, in the way of the redress of grievances or otherwise, that ought to be met, and wherever prohibition is absolute, with no equitable remedy available, the result has been evasion of law. The courts have been crowded in these States with questions arising from the attempt to determine whether a measure was private, local, special, or not, and the result has been an aggregation of uncertainty about the law, and an interference with the proper business of the courts, that has been costly and damaging to the public welfare.

Other methods have been suggested; but we shall not reach the true remedy, in my opinion, until we try to ascertain the cause for the criticisms heaped upon our legislative processes. As soon as this measure is out of the way, if the committee that has reported the initiative and referendum proposition is ready, we are to engage in a long and interesting debate, wholly due to dissatisfaction on the part of the people with the present processes of legislation. You and I, sir, may deplore some of this criticism. You and I may suspect that we are in part being made to suffer by reason of offences committed beyond the Hudson River, that the odium which attaches in all other parts of the country to the law-making process has been unjustly reflected to the extent of casting undeserved suspicion on our own General Court.

After somewhat unusually long service in the General Court, I lose no opportunity to testify to its high purpose, to its excellent machinery, to its product, which leads that of any other Legislature of the land, perhaps of the world, in its thoroughness, in its adequacy, in its wisdom; and I should be very sorry if these remarks of mine could be construed into an aspersion on the purposes and the general results of our Legislature. But a man may see, even in his best friends, an opportunity for improvement, and he may see his best friends threatened by evils or disasters of which they are not aware. And so, in no spirit of carping criticism, throwing mud at a body which I would rather honor, but in a spirit of kindly suggestion, I desire to point out why and wherein the General Court of Massachusetts may be improved.

In the first place, it may be improved by taking out of its committee-rooms and out of its corridors about nine-tenths of the lobbying that there prevails, about nine-tenths of the expenditure of money, removing about nine-tenths of the cause for suspicion; for nine-tenths of all the expenditures of money and effort in the way of lobbying in this State House is due to this volume: "Special Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts." And therefore I ask that this institution, so dear to us, may be freed from suspicion in a very large measure, by taking out of its committee-rooms and its halls those topics to which nine-tenths of all its bad reputation, such as it is, may be ascribed. Is not that worth a little more consideration on the part of the committees of this Convention?

I do not this morning ask this Convention to say Yes or No to the proposition.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I was going to ask the honorable member, if he feels so disposed, to deal with the subject of how far delegated powers ought to be delegated; whether or not there is any danger in that line in what he suggests, or otherwise.

Mr. Luce: Mr. Chairman, once more, if my memory does not prove treacherous, I shall reach that bridge in the course of a journey that I hope will not be too long. If it be, then, that there is opportunity to improve the processes of the General Court, in what direction ought that improvement to go? Any man who will read the history of Legislatures will find that with the growth of population, with the increase in the complexity of social interests, with the development of industry and transportation on a great scale, there has come an enormous increase in the pressure on our legislative bodies. I suspect that our fathers misconstrued the sources of evils with which in the last generation they found Legislatures afflicted. At any rate, they suggested meeting a problem, then as now almost wholly due to overwork, by some very singular remedies. At first they said: "Inasmuch as the Legislature has more to do than it can do well in the time now permitted, we will meet that situation by cutting down the time during which it can do its work." In many cases States limited the length of the session; in others they limited its frequency, restricting it to once in two years, or in some instances to once in four years, — providing a very singular remedy indeed for a state of affairs due to the pressure of demands from the people. They said: "We will meet this increased pressure by cutting in half the opportunity to meet it." And so they devised biennial sessions and limited sessions and quadrennial sessions, which in every single case have failed to meet the evil at which they were aimed, and, on the other hand, have developed new evils.

It is hardly worth while spending more time on this, because in my judgment this Convention is not going to approve that particular form of remedy, for one very simple reason: Because everywhere that it has been tried our abominable rotation system has resulted in putting each new Legislature in the hands of untrained men, so that legislation in the United States under the biennial system has deteriorated into legislation by greenhorns, and Massachusetts is not likely to prefer legislation by greenhorns to the system that it now enjoys.
Other remedies have been tried. None of them has achieved satisfactory results, for they all have failed to recognize, what now is more generally and commonly being seen, that the fundamental trouble with our Legislatures and with our Congress is the attempt to do too much work, to do more work than any human being can well accomplish.

Why, sir, in the years during which I was in the Legislature there were but one or two men in the whole body who ever made a serious attempt even to read every proposal. I tried to be a faithful legislator, and I never read even once all the proposals that came before us. How can a man read, much less understand, between two and three thousand propositions, and, in the brief space of five or six months, give an adequate reply?

In Congress the situation is five times as bad. Twenty or thirty thousand proposals are coming in there each session. And everywhere the same difficulty prevails,—a difficulty due to the pressure of work,—legitimate pressure. Why, sir, when I was in the Legislature man after man, eminent gentlemen, men of standing, thoughtful men, would come to me and say: "Luce, you pass altogether too many laws up there, you ought to adjourn earlier, your Blue Book is too thick, there is too much legislation; but, Luce, there is one thing you ought to do." Every man within the sound of my voice who has been in the Legislature has had that come to him again and again. Everybody says: "There is one thing you ought to do." And if each one of us in the Legislature had secured one tithe of the things that somebody said to us that we ought to do, these Blue Books would have been five times as thick. You who have served in the Legislature know that there is nothing here that is superfluous. You know that no useless thing runs the gauntlet of a committee, the gauntlet of two bodies, the gauntlet of the Governor, and becomes law. And there are some men within the sound of my voice who know that the real reason for this Convention, who know that the real reason for the great measure we are about to discuss, the initiative and referendum, who know that the real reason for the revolution of 1912, which swept some of us off the political ladder and into political oblivion, who know that the real reason for the Progressive party, was the fact, not that we passed too many laws, but that we did not pass enough laws of the kind that the people wanted.

May I trespass on your attention by recalling some of the delays of the Legislature, some of the failures of the Legislature, to give the people what they wanted? Francis C. Lowell, chairman of the committee on Ways and Means of this House, afterward judge of one of the United States courts, wrote an article after service here in which he told how long it took to get the Torrens system of land registration in this State. Year after year the committee on the Judiciary refused to report the Torrens system, which we all now think to have been so inevitable that we wonder why it was not enacted years and years ago. The committee refused to report it, not because they objected to it, not because they thought it unwise, but solely because they did not have time to report it. I could name over to you twenty other reforms of the last twenty years that were delayed year on year on year, because the Legislature did not have time to accomplish them.

I remember very well one afternoon when I chanced to ride to the western part of the State with a man who now holds a high position in this Commonwealth, almost the highest to which the people may elect a man, and he was unhappy because that day the Legislature had postponed the Workmen's Compensation Act he had urged. You and I, sir, now wonder why we did not pass the Workman's Compensation Act thirty years ago,—at least twenty years ago. It was more than ten years ago that I rode home with this man in the train, and saw his disappointment and grief because the Legislature had put over to the next year the solution of this great problem, solely because it did not have time to act.

It postponed for year after year dealing with the inheritance tax. I may recall, in possible anticipation of what very likely will be my fate at the conclusion of these remarks, that in this hall I stood up for six separate years, in behalf of the direct inheritance tax, and six times was I knocked down, and in the seventh year I saw that measure become a law without a single vote in opposition to it. And it may be that it will take me six years, or, if my life is spared, six times six years, to make the people of Massachusetts listen. But after my experience in this chamber, after finding that constant defeat ultimately brings a hearing, I indulge the hope and confidence that some day I shall make even this "voice crying in the wilderness" heard from one end of the State to the other, until its people wake to the fact that unless this General Court of ours responds more quickly, more accurately, to the will of the people, then it must give way to other methods of putting in force the will of the people. I am here to plead for the General Court, that it may be saved, that it may have the opportunity to do good, that its machinery may not be forever clogged by hundreds and thousands of trivial measures, that its members may not be so distracted from the great problems before them as to waste and fritter away all their hours here in consideration of these petty things. So I pray that you may follow the example of the Parliament of England, of the legislative bodies of every other country in the world outside the United States, and confine your law-making to the making of laws, and not spend your time and your substance in the making of rules and regulations.

And that may bring me, sir, to the palpable, the open, the well-tried and familiar remedy,—well-tried and familiar in other lands,—untried here. And yet do I say that it is here untried? Why, no, I am wrong. It has been tried here for a hundred years well nigh, ever since we amended our Constitution and made it possible for those administrative agencies that we call cities, to make rules and regulations. No man will rise here to-day and expostulate because the administrative agency known as a city,—and it is nothing else,—is allowed to make rules and regulations. And also, so far as the Constitution would permit, we have extended this practice, authorizing our boards and departments to make rules and regulations. And I am arguing this morning that the impediment may be removed, so that this practice,—not even in Massachusetts a mere experiment, but already established,—may be allowed to bring to us all the benefits of which it is capable.

What stands in the way? There stands in the way the Thirtieth Article of the Bill of Rights, which says that the executive never shall exercise legislative power, and there also stands in the way a theory of the law which says that legislative power shall not be delegated.
These two things must be met: First, the construction put upon that article of the Bill of Rights, already liberalized in practice, must be made somewhat more liberal. And, secondly, there must be the opportunity to delegate minor legislative powers.

Now, why do we not do these things? But first, consider how far we may do them if we can extend present practice. The committee on Legislative Procedure, to which I have adverted, pointed out two years ago that in the preceding five years there had been on the average about eighty petitions a year for pensions, annuities and kindred purposes. There are about eighty bills a year for increased or special compensation. Those are but two classes of bills that should be taken out of the Legislature. The same committee also called attention to recent action in upsetting a program to which the Legislature had been brought in 1909 through the efforts of Governor Draper. Of those efforts I feel warranted in saying: "All of them I saw, and part of them I was," because as chairman of the committee on Ways and Means in the preceding year I had taken part in getting under way a movement for persuading the Legislature to make its appropriations for harbors in the lump sum of $100,000 a year. The Legislature was convinced of the wisdom of such a policy in 1909, and for a while that program, which also has been urged by President Taft for the Nation, and by Senator Burton of Ohio,—that program was accepted, but gradually men resumed coming to the Legislature for the old purpose of log-rolling, swapping votes for harbor appropriations, until the particular aim of the new policy was in large measure thwarted. Those features of legislative work, log-rolling and swapping votes, are well known by every man here who ever served in the Legislature to be most injurious and most disastrous to the public welfare. The familiar procedure was renewed in the matters of harbors and public lands, until now thirty or forty matters a year of that sort come along. We had secured and we maintained for years a decision to allow the State Highway Commission to spend the money on the highways of the State; and now, in the last few years, an invasion of that program has become so conspicuous as to alarm all those who cherish fondly the fair name of the Legislature. So these invasions, these impediments in the way of true reform, are to be discouraged, in the first place, by formal sanction of a practice already tried that ought to be developed.

But there comes a further reason for us here to act. In the year 1907 a board of embalming undertook to say that undertakers should not be licensed anywhere in this Commonwealth until they were familiar with embalming. I had the honor of being a member of the Legislature in the year the Board of Embalming was created, and I have asked others what was their impression of the purpose of that board. We agree, with somewhat hazy recollection, that its purpose was to regulate the occupation of caring for the bodies of the dead, so that in matters of concealment of crime, and evidences of crime, and in matters of health, the public would be safeguarded. The board undertook to prohibit one Wyeth of Cambridge, who had long been an undertaker, from practicing his calling, because he was not able to embalm bodies. He took the case to the Supreme Judicial Court, and there it was held by Chief Justice Knowlton, speaking for the court, that this board might not make any rules and regulations which would affect or alter what were construed by the court to be the general laws of the State. That decision is one thing standing in the way of the delegation of power.

Sir, I am looking at a very good friend of mine in the second division who adorned the office of Attorney-General in this Commonwealth (Mr. Malone). Eight years ago he was asked if it would be permissible for the Insurance Commissioner to prepare a general form of insurance policy. The Legislature had instructed that the Insurance Commissioner should so proceed; and the Attorney-General, very properly I have no doubt, said the Legislature could not delegate that power to its Insurance Commissioner.

I have been at some pains, sir, to attempt to reach the bottom of this matter of the delegation of power. I have read cases on cases on cases, for the books are full of them, until my head has become dizzy, in the attempt to understand and find out what is the rule in the matter. There is wide divergence of opinion. Only one thing is evident, after such an examination, — that it is a most uncertain and perplexing subject, and that unless we see fit to clarify it, and to say what our bureaus and departments may do, every rule and regulation they issue is put in peril; that the citizen never knows where he stands; that every act under those rules may be taken to the highest court of the land; so producing the very worst of all features of the law, — uncertainty.

It has been suggested that there is danger in authorizing our administrative agencies to exercise more power. It was a danger intimated by my friend in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), and by other members of the Convention, who propounded questions. I admit, sir, all the dangers that come from this system. But public life, like private life, is always a balance between good and evil. You cannot make an omelet without breaking eggs. You cannot make progress without incurring risks. You cannot relieve your Legislature without inviting some of the evils which come from what is known as bureaucracy. That word would have been one of great alarm three years ago. Such a speech as I am now making would hardly have been adventured at that time. But within three years we have had the greatest illustration the world ever saw of the benefits of organization, of the benefits of efficiency; and we see to-day a people hardly more in numbers than our own, standing with back to the wall and defying almost the whole world, because they organized government, because they made available every resource, because they foresaw the things to which we must open our eyes. They foresaw the economic competition of races and of nations, and, foreseeing it, they took the risk. They said: “We will have an efficient government.”

Does Germany, think you, does the German Parliament, does the Prussian Parliament, concern itself day after day with “An Act to Validate the Annual Town-Meeting of the Town of Duxbury in the present year,” or does it concern itself with “An Act to Authorize the Town of Swampscott to borrow money for Playground Purposes,” or “An Act Relative to the Maintenance of a High School for the Town of Marion in connection with Tabor Academy,” or “An Act to Authorize the Town of Holbrook to incur Indebtedness for a Water Supply”? Why, there is no German so insane, however much we may doubt the sanity of the German in some particulars, — there is no German so insane as to take a great legislative body, gathered to consider the fundamental problems of human welfare, and waste its time in determining whether an act of this sort should be passed: "An Act to authorize the Mayor of the City of Worcester to appoint Thomas J. Monroe as Police Ambulance Attendant."

Would I had voice enough to make it ring through this Commonwealth that 280 men, in their committees, in three stages of debate in either House, and then by the act of an overworked executive, decided whether the mayor of the city of Worcester might appoint Thomas J. Monroe as police ambulance attendant!

Why need I add argument to that citation? Why need I plead for opportunity for the Legislature to get rid of such absurdities?

Sir, let me once more point out precisely what I am asking. The committees on the Executive and State Administration have in hand a program for improving, perfecting, the executive department of this Commonwealth, to which some of us look with great hope. Without committing ourselves as yet to any of its details, I imagine nearly all of the Convention, like myself, view with interest, at least, these proposals for organizing better the execution and administration of our government. This particular measure that I am urging seems to me a necessary corollary to that program. In my judgment, it would be most unfortunate if we give our executive department better organization and deny to it the opportunity to enact rules and regulations. And inasmuch as this proposal is an attendant to, a corollary of, the work in hand by these committees, I am asking a chance for its consideration by them in connection therewith; and I am asking this chance, sir, with as little personal interest as ever attached to any position taken by me while in public life. I have no favors to ask, I have no rewards to seek, and no punishments to fear. But it has happened that chance has directed my studies in the last two or three years to these problems of political science, and the result of many, many hours of research and of reflection is to convince me that the remedy for the greater part of the evils of our body politic is to be found in improving the processes of administration.

Therefore it is that I view with comparative indifference some problems of the higher legislation, some problems that concern themselves with the ascertaining of the people's will on broad questions of public policy, feeling they are not at the moment the vital things. Where in contrast with the rest of the world we are failing, where after this awful war we shall fail still further in the economic contest, is in the processes of administration. It may be, sir, as has been often said, that inefficiency is the penalty of democracy. I have yet to be convinced of that fact. I have yet to be persuaded that democracy may not utilize all its resources to the common welfare. And because I believe in democracy, because I believe in representative government, because I believe in the principles handed down to us from the fathers, I am addressing myself to this one point, that seems to me the very center of the whole problem. Without attention to it our progress will have been small. Decision, not now made, must some day be made, if we are to allow our Legislature to do its best work, if we are to allow our executive to make the effort it wants to make for the public good.

[Applause.]

Mr. DUTCHE of Winchester: While the motion which is pending is a motion to commit this measure to two committees, State Administration, which heard it carefully and in full, I believe, in the first instance, and also to Executive, sitting jointly, I assume from the extensive and very interesting remarks of the proposer that he has talked on the merits of the proposition, and in the absence, as far as I have yet determined, of Mr. Waterman, who you will see is supposed to handle this matter for the committee on State Administration, I have been asked to say a few words with reference to the merits.

As was stated, and very accurately stated, this resolution does appear simple, and, as was also stated, the real purpose of it and the real extent of it do not appear in it on a first reading or a second reading. Primarily there is extreme difficulty with the measure, because it is not clear; it is entirely nebulous. You are carried into a region that you cannot define. For example, what meaning are we to give to the word "ordinance"? We have had the word "ordinance" used here, as the member indicated, accurately, as a rule issued by a city council. It does not even extend to rules of selectmen or by-laws of towns; it is confined to rules of city councils. Does the gentleman mean that these boards may pass similar rules and regulations? Apparently in conversation with him, and from his speech this morning, he intends to go much further. He says plainly, in the first place, that he intends to get rid of the special acts which are in the Legislature; in the second place, he points out that he desires to go further and take away the bar which the Wyeth case raised.

I think it quite essential that you understand what that bar is in the Wyeth case. The decision came down to this, as my learned friend said to me the other day in conversation, that the rule of the Board of Registration in Embalming in that case was thrown down, first, because it was entirely unreasonable and the court would not stand for it as an administrative rule, and secondly, apart from that, because it was a rule that purported to change the general laws of the Commonwealth for the benefit of the people of the Commonwealth. Now, what my friend desires to get rid of is exactly that bar which Chief Justice Knowlton spoke of, that you cannot have a delegation of authority to change a general law for the Commonwealth. So that you are right face to face with the question here: Do you want to give authority not merely to make rules and regulations of an administrative character, but to permit changing the general laws of the Commonwealth?

To examine this thing further, how far do we need to go? So far as strictly administrative regulations are concerned, I submit that we have plenty of authority already. I would ask you to turn now or at your leisure to page 132 of the Manual of the Constitutional Convention, which was furnished to us, and on that page you will find a considerable citation of authority on this matter of delegation of authority. I submit that an examination of those cases will indicate that there is plenty of authority to-day to delegate the making of administrative rules and regulations, rules and regulations intended to carry out the detailed application, the local application and the special application of the general laws which your General Court enacts. To show you, just think of some of the rules that are being made to-day. Take your civil service rules for the Commonwealth. An opinion of the Justices, the citation for which is given on this page, held that the Legislature did have power to provide for the commission and to delegate to that commission the power to make rules, — what? Not inconsistent with existing laws, but consistent with existing laws, yes, all the rules and regulations you need to carry out the various phases of civil service.

Without wearying you, you know that you have exactly the same situation in the State Department of Health to-day. You have your State Department of Health ordinances. Does the Legislature purport to say what are infectious diseases, what shall be the quarantine period of each disease, etc.? No. It says those regulations shall be made by the Department of Health, and they are. They determine what the diseases are, and what the quarantine shall be, etc., and the protection of health from A to Z. They are making rules and regulations of this private and special character throughout the Commonwealth, and administrative rules in the true sense, in that they must be consistent with existing law and, one further point that later I shall speak of more at length, they must be reasonable. You have pilot rules. You have the rules of the Public Service Commission. Has any one any question under the statutes that the Public Service Commission has full authority to take care of all the administrative details on our railroads? Why, they can order this thing, that thing and the other thing. You know their authority over fares. You know their authority in making a railroad put in an investment for a side track here, increase their freight facilities there, etc. The whole thing has been worked out in those cases. In other words, you have plenty of authority to-day to permit administrative rules and regulations. In what I consider and I believe you will consider the proper interpretation, administrative rules and regulations mean exactly the carrying out in detail the process of administration of the existing law. That is what they are for. That is what administrative rules are. If I have been told correctly the use of the English language, administrative rules and regulations are not intended to change existing law, they are not intended to change your statutes.

You have to-day, then, authority to go right up to that point. In other words, if the Legislature wants to provide, as it has, that machinery shall be duly protected, or a minimum wage established under certain conditions, does the Legislature say what the minimum wage is or what adequate protection of the buzz saw or the emery wheel is? No, it leaves that, it is coming more and more to leave that, to some administrative board. It makes a general declaration of policy, namely, that we shall look after the health of people, or that we shall look after dangerous machinery, and it hands over the working out of it to administrative boards and they have to-day the entire authority to carry out that mandate from the Legislature.

Now with reference to many of the special acts which the gentleman has referred to and which aroused your mirth, I submit the Legislature has entire authority to-day to make provision for most of those special cases if they choose to do so. Take all those questions of municipal authority. Take the thing that was flaunted here about the police ambulance attendant. Is there any question to-day but that if the Legislature sees fit it can say that the city of Brockton, whatever that city was, or any town, may establish a police department, with such employees as the city council shall determine? It is absolutely in the authority of the Legislature to-day. Cities and towns are the creation of the Legislature. They can be abolished by the Legislature. Their functions are changed by the Legislature. When the Legislature sees fit to hand over those detailed matters it can do so to-day, and you do not need this enabling measure, because of course that is all this resolution purports to do, to give the Legislature power to delegate. So that the very case which he wants to ring from one end of this Commonwealth to the other can be taken care of, I submit, by the existing law, which gives the Legislature the entire control over the police and fire departments, etc., of our cities. Take these other things that appear in the special acts. Take the size of school-committees. If it is desirable to let a town or a local body determine what the size of a school-committee shall be, the Legislature can do it to-day. It has not seen fit to do so. You do not need to change this organic law in a way that cannot be understood in order to bring about that remedy. And so on with your other cases.

Take your private corporations. As was pointed out by a gentleman back of me who is not here now, as long as you have private corporations established you always will have problems as to their powers, unless and until the Legislature sees fit, again, to say that these charities may hold all the property they want, or, as I believe is entirely possible, shall say that within certain limits those matters shall be checked up by the Commissioner of Corporations. The whole matter of winding up corporations to-day can be left free to be worked out between the Commissioner of Corporations and the court; it can be under the Constitution just as it stands at this time.

Now, what further? Do we want to go beyond this point? Do you want to face and put right in here a proposition which will permit and is intended to permit the alteration of an existing law?

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: That is just what the trouble is. We do not understand the point at which those powers end, I should say. That would be my difficulty. For instance, within my recollection a business corporation had to be chartered by the Legislature. Then we delegated to the Commissioner of Corporations the right to charter business corporations. If I am right, a short time ago we delegated to the Bank Commissioner the right to charter trust companies. I think I am right about that; am I not? We delegated to the Bank Commis-sioner the right to charter trust companies and savings banks. I have read that the probate of wills used to come before the Legislature, and then the change of names, and was referred to the Probate Court. That power was delegated to the Probate Court. Now, it does seem to me that this measure,—I had not heard of it before,—is in the direction of what we have been doing all these years. We delegated to the Bank Commissioner the power to charter trust companies. Is that adminis-trative? I presume it may be in a broad sense administrative. But there is just where the trouble is. That is what I think ought to be explained. If this Constitutional Convention is here for the purpose of revising the whole Constitution I think we ought to understand about that.

Mr. Dutch: It is of course difficult to define, and it would be very presumptuous of me to attempt to define, the limitations of the police power. The difficulty which the gentleman points out is the difficulty which is inherent in the nature of the matter itself, and the law cannot change that. In my opinion no definition will make that clearer.

Mr. Bennett: Then does it not leave us in doubt as to the scope of what the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) proposes here, and as to the dangers? My attention has not yet been called to any danger in what he proposes.

Mr. Dutch: I am going to proceed to point out what I believe are the serious dangers. That was the course that my argument was to take. Should we go beyond these police regulations, which are entirely established under the police power, the carrying out of which can be delegated by the Legislature, including the regulation of corporations, just as the gentleman in the fourth division suggests, and the regulation of trust companies? As you know, your police power has been extended beyond matters that concern life and limb, matters that concern health in general; it is extended now to include the welfare of the people, and you are going to have more things brought in here under that extension. We have taken care of the life and limb; we have taken care of the pocketbooks of the people, as in our regulation of trust companies and corporations, and all that, and I believe we are going to take care of the welfare of the people to a very much larger extent.

The carrying out of those general propositions has been in part and can be left, and more and more will be left, as the propositions become settled in public opinion, to administrative boards. The reference here to the delay in enacting the Workmen's Compensation Act simply meant that it took the public a long time to come to that new conception of the responsibility of an industry to pay for its own accidents which are inevitable in the conduct of that industry, in other words, to make that industry stand for itself. It took several years before people got to the point where they could grasp that simple, — what now seems a simple, — economic principle, and when they did, then your Legislature passed the bill. It always takes time to educate. And so when we get these other matters of social welfare properly threshed out and know where they land they, too, can be made the subject of general statutes and the details passed on to administrative boards.

But now suppose you go further. Suppose you go further and upset the Wyeth case, and give your administrative boards the power to change a general law, because that is what is asked for squarely and fairly. It is asked that they have power to make rules and regulations with the force of a law, which may be inconsistent with an existing general law. The first effect of that is on a doctrine which is mentioned here on page 132 and is referred to by Chief Justice Knowlton, that there is a presumption, as it is called, in favor of the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature. If the Legislature passes a law, the court is loath to say that it is unconstitutional as unreasonable or beyond the scope of the subject-matter, because it says the decision of the Legislature as to the facts and the application and the need of the change must be upheld unless it is clearly wrong. That is the so-called presumption of constitutionality. That would extend, and the gentleman who proposes this measure admits to me in conversation that that presumption automatically would extend, under his proposal, to these rules and regulations made by administrative boards. They would be put on a par with law, because this proposal says they shall have the force of a law, the force of a statute and an enactment by the General Court, so that the presumption in favor of their constitutionality, using that phrase because it is used, though I take it it is a somewhat inaccurate phrase, would apply to them.
What is the present situation? The present situation, as Chief Justice Knowlton points out, is that these rules and regulations have no such presumption,—they have no such presumption. They are not statutes. They are not the considered action of 280 men; they are the action of one, three, five, seven men, and that is all, so under our law they do not have that tremendous presumption. They are held up to a test of strict reasonableness. And so the court in the Wyeth case threw down that attempted rule of the Board of Embalming, because it said everybody knew that a man could serve as an undertaker time and time again without any knowledge of embalming. It became my most sad duty a week ago to engage the services of an undertaker on that very basis of an immediate burial, with nothing to do with embalming. And so that rule was held up to a standard of strict reasonableness by the court, and thrown down, and also the judge said right out that there was no presumption in its favor, that it was a good rule, and a proper rule. Now, do you desire to throw down that safeguard on the rules and regulations of merely an administrative board? Is it safe?

For example, take your problem of the men who spend time in so-called lobbying, trying to get through these special laws. Do you want, for the sake of protecting the people, to transfer that influential lobby from its job of influencing 280 men, to the job of reaching one, three, five or seven men? Are you going to increase the popular trust in those who make the rules, if the people find that these rules affect existing laws protecting them, affect their business, as in the case of that Mr. Wyeth, who had been in business over thirty years? Do men want their business entrusted to one, three, five or seven men when it comes to changing existing laws, rather than making administrative applications of existing laws? Do you think it will help the public any? I submit not. I submit you are transferring your evil in a way which will create greater evil.

What are you coming to? Every lawyer in this room knows that administrative law is in its infancy. Every lawyer in this room knows that one of the greatest difficulties we are facing to-day, with the tremendous increase in the business that the Commonwealth is doing, is to have our administrative boards act according to some rule and law, and not according to some whim or some personal equation. The greatest problem we are facing to-day with these administrative boards that are not bound by rules of pleading and rules of evidence and rules of procedure, is that their rules and orders shall be the reflection of a government of law and not of men, as our Constitution calls for.

Why, I am reminded of one little thing that came in my experience. I had to go to the town of Marblehead in connection with an application for a garage license. In illustration of the attitude of the local board, which refused the license, refused to hear an attorney at a statutory hearing, refused everything that the law would seem to call for and the rights of the parties would seem to call for, simply because they were everlastingly high-handed and, as an administrative board, could do pretty nearly anything without any recourse. I was told of a remark of a former selectman of Marblehead who, when he was confronted with the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, said,—and you will pardon me, because this is a quotation: "What the hell have the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts got to do with the town of Marblehead?" I have served for years as counsel for the municipality that I have the honor to represent, and I know the extreme danger of a power which already is committed to an administrative board, a board of selectmen, of passing on administrative matters in connection with fire prevention, which is partly an administrative proposition. So that I say we are not going to gain; I say we shall increase this evil.

There is an evil. Too much time is spent on special laws. There is a very considerable remedy under the present Constitution. I believe the whole thing can be taken care of if the Legislature shall see fit, in pursuance of a scheme which I believe the committee on State Administration will report, to set up a State department which shall have under it the consideration of local matters, a sort of local government board. We shall not report that one but we shall report something into which that can fit if the Legislature so desires.

And so it seems to the committee, which was unanimous in reporting this matter after consideration, that you have all you need to-day, you have all that this apparently on its face means. You do not have what this is intended to cover, you do not have the power to make rules and regulations which change existing law. And therefore the report of the committee, as I believe it will be made, will be this: That so far as the resolution provides for truly administrative affairs, truly administrative regulations, it is entirely unnecessary; so far as it goes beyond that it is inherently and necessarily dangerous. Therefore we report against it. [Applause.]

Mr. Bennett: I should like to ask the last speaker a question which is, in my mind, an amplification of my previous question. Suppose I put it this way to begin with: Is the charter of a trust company an administrative function? I should like to ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. Dutch: I think that cannot be answered as the gentleman intends, either yes or no. I take it that the enabling act for incorporation must come from the Legislature, which must set down the general rules and the general policy of this Commonwealth with respect to safeguarding trust companies. Then the carrying out of all that, the application of it to the particular trust company in question, or to the particular petition for a trust company, can be delegated to an administrative officer or board.

Mr. Bennett: Very well, then. In that case it was not a constitutional question at all, it was a question of statute, was it not? It was a question of statute. Very well, then why is the chartering of a trust company an administrative function and the chartering of an insurance company not an administrative function? If there is that difference I do not understand it. I do know that the public has been howling for years for the lessening of the work of the Legislature in the direction in which it has been continuously lessened. As I say, if a man wanted his name changed he used to go to the Legislature, now he goes to the Probate Court. It seems to me what the gentleman proposes is to refer this matter to two committees sitting jointly. If this Convention is here for anything but two purposes, namely, the non-sectarian amendment and the initiative and referendum, if it is here for any other purposes besides those two, it seems to me that this is an eminently fitting piece of work, and I do not believe that I am alone in thinking that it ought to receive a good deal of attention, whether it does so in this way or not. I think the Public Service Commission, and previous to that the Railroad Commission, were given year after year authority that had been formerly retained by the General Court;
but as we go along we delegate the authority to the Railroad Commission and to the Public Service Commission, and I am unable to see any dangers in this proposition.

Mr. QUINCY of Boston: I desire to ask the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) a question, if he will kindly enlighten me as to his views. I should like to ask whether in his opinion the Legislature possesses the power of delegating to any other authority the right to alter or amend any municipal charter.

A municipal charter stands upon the statute-book as a law. It is not a regulation, it is a law; it is a law of local application, to be sure, but none the less a law. Now, as I understand it, there is no way in which the Legislature, if it desires to do so, can delegate to any other body, whether an elective body, like the Governor's Council, or an administrative body, the right to amend in any particular the charter of a city. The gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) nods assent, so perhaps he agrees with that statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that being so, I desire to take that as a text for pointing out one very important field which would be covered by some step in the direction of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce). City government, as we all know, Mr.
Chairman, is one of the largest and most important problems before this Commonwealth. We all of us realize its magnitude, but until we look at the statistics perhaps we do not realize its overshadowing magnitude, even as compared with the direct business of the Commonwealth itself. This report of the Bureau of Statistics which I hold in my hand, the latest report, tells us that in our thirty-three cities we have a population of over two and one-half million of people, much more than a majority of all of the people of the Commonwealth. It tells us that the general revenue of those thirty-three municipal corporations was seventy-eight millions of dollars. It tells us that the cost of maintaining the departments of those cities was fifty-five mil-ions of dollars. It tells us in another place that the indebtedness of those thirty-three cities, — the net funded or fixed debt, — amounted to the staggering sum, even in these days when we are accustomed to tossing about figures running into the hundreds of millions or the billions, of $189,000,000 in the year 1914. In other words, the major part of the public problems of this Commonwealth is concerned with the government of cities and the questions connected with city government in one way or another.

Now I want to call attention to this fact: Under the twelfth joint rule of the General Court, as it now stands, there are just ten days in the year in which, without the suspension of a rule by a four-fifths vote, it is possible for any one of these thirty-three cities to bring forward, to propose and to get action upon, any amendment, no matter how small, which affects its charter, which affects one of these local laws in the form of charters now upon the statute-book. There are just ten days, because all measures, all petitions, have to be presented, under the twelfth joint rule, not later than the second Saturday after the assembling of the General Court, on the first Wednesday in January. No matter how minor the change may be, supposing it is as small and minute as the change which the gentleman from Waltham called to our attention, there is no way, except during these ten days of the year, without the suspension of a rule, by which that municipality, even if its mayor and city council and people are unanimous in desiring the change, even if there is no possible objection to it, can get that change legally made.

My interest in the general proposition of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), — and I want as one member of the Convention to express my sense of obligation to him for placing his speech upon the record of the proceedings of this Convention and for calling our attention to this most important and fundamental question, — my own particular interest in his broad proposition relates to the possibility of establishing some easier method of securing what may be called minor changes in municipal laws, in the charters of cities. Those changes can be authorized in one of two ways. We either can greatly enlarge the powers of home rule of all of our cities, or of particular cities if we choose to discriminate, — which is certainly a good way, and one with which I myself am heartily in sympathy, — or else, if we are going to change the present cumbersome method of dealing with these minor municipal questions, we can allow the Legislature, if it sees fit to do so, to vest in some administrative body, or some other elective body, power between sessions of the Legislature, or during sessions if you like, to pass these minor changes in municipal laws.

We have at the present time a situation of this sort. It is not possible, except during the session of the Legislature, and subject even then to the limitation to which I have called attention, to pass a law, even though that law is petitioned for by the mayor and city council, and even though it is made subject to a local referendum so that it cannot go into effect until accepted by the city council or by vote of the people of the municipality. I long have believed that it should be feasible in this Commonwealth to establish some kind of an administrative authority which would make it possible to deal with more freedom, with less delay, with less trouble, with these minor questions of municipal charters which now take up so much time in the Legislature. Remember that in this proposition we simply are seeking to untie the hands of the Legislature, and that to my mind is a most hopeful direction in which this Convention can bring about improvement, — not to say in the Constitution that so and so shall be done, that such and such a body shall be established, with such and such powers, but to take off of the hands of the Legislature some of the constitutional manacles which now prevent that body from doing things which it might otherwise be glad to do.

I do not say that the amendment as drafted by the gentleman from Waltham may not be too broad in its terms. We all of us realize that such a matter as this must be handled with great care and discretion. But I do say that this Convention might well take some step to make it possible for the Legislature, if it is unwilling, — and as its past record unfortunately shows that it is unwilling, — to give adequate, large powers of self-government to the thirty-three cities of Massachusetts, to have it within its power, subject to any restrictions which it may wish to impose, to allow some body, whether elective or administrative, to deal with these minor municipal questions, many of them absolutely uncontested, without compelling the city to wait until they get attention at the annual session of the Legislature, or taking up the time of 280 men to pass upon them.

I therefore hope, Mr. Chairman, that some action will be taken, I care not what it may be, which will enable this most fundamental and important subject to be further considered. It is not for me to express any approval or disapproval of the particular motion made by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce). I do not care how this subject is dealt with, whether it is referred to any committee or left on the table to be acted upon, but I do believe that this subject, this resolution of his, — which is the only basis before this Convention, as I understand it, under which such action as he has advocated broadly, and as I suggest in the case of cities, could be passed, — that in some way or other this amendment should receive such further consideration as may enable additional efforts to be made to avoid the objections which have been well pointed out by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch). We surely can avoid the possible dangers of giving this power to the Legislature too broadly and still make it possible to take some step to diminish the evils of special legislation, particularly to make it more possible for our thirty-three municipalities to secure prompt and intelligent attention to such local needs as may arise from time to time in the way of amendment of their charters. [Applause.]

Mr. Dutch: In reply to the previous speaker (Mr. Quincy), it would seem to me obvious that the matter which he suggests properly comes before this Convention under some half dozen measures which you will find on pages 4 and 5 of this docket, dealing with municipal home rule and the control of municipalities. Now, the committee on Municipal Government is the proper committee to consider that, and they have entire authority under our rules to initiate such a measure as they believe deserves the attention of this Convention. In the consideration of those various matters we have entire authority to request that committee to present to us such a measure, and the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) and the gentleman from Boston who has just taken his seat, have the right and privilege of going before the committee on Municipal Government to seek that which he has just suggested.

Mr. Anderson of Brookline: I rise more to raise a question than to offer any views. Before the committee on Public Affairs, of which I have the honor to be chairman, have come various propositions to enlarge the power of the Legislature. Therefore I am very much interested in the general proposition which is here presented; for, as has been said by the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Quincy), all that is proposed by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) is to untie the hands of the Legislature. If perchance the functions of the government of the Commonwealth, under some of the measures reported by my committee and by other committees, should be somewhat enlarged, we shall have, I fear, an increase of that great and manifest evil of special legislation or petty legislation pointed out with so much force by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce).

Now, I was not quite certain what was intended to be intimated by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) in the latter part of his statement, when he said, admitting the existence of that great evil, that some committee, — I was not sure whether it was his committee or not,—proposed to report some plan under which some State administrative board might assume some of these functions which are crippling the Legislature. But, unless there be some well-digested plan of that kind, I hope that this matter shall receive further consideration by a joint committee or some committee; so that we shall not close this session without providing adequate means by which the Legislature, if sufficiently intelligent, may free itself from a lot of the special and petty business that hitherto it has been wasting a large part of its time in doing. I may say that I shall continue to think fairly well of the Legislature, in spite of the manifest contempt with which those who have served in the Legislature continue to express themselves about that body. I therefore am not afraid that the public will suffer any great and permanent detriment from either absurd legislation or seriously unjust legislation. There always will be imperfect legislation, which will call for amendment or repeal.

But I do hope that this proposition will not be brushed one side as a matter of minor importance. I do hope that this Convention will untie the hands of the Legislature in the particulars pointed out by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), assuming that power given for legitimate purposes will not be abused.

My notion of a Constitution is that certain fundamental rights should be asserted in the Constitution, which the Legislature should not be permitted to take away or abridge; that having asserted such fundamental rights we should leave the Legislature a free hand to enact such legislation as may make for the common welfare. I believe in the proposition that the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) makes as in accord, with these general views which I shall have occasion to urge further upon this Convention in support of some reports of my own committee. I therefore hope his motion will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. Walsh: As chairman of the committee upon State Administration I feel I owe a duty to that committee to say that fifteen members considered at length this question and have reported to this Convention unanimously against the adoption of this amendment. I ought to say in justice to them that the suggestion that they should sit with another committee did not come to the attention of the chairman of that committee, or so far as I know to any member of that committee, until the motion was made upon the floor of this House. I am confident that if the suggestion had been made to the committee at any other time that the gentleman interested in this question desired that two committees should sit in judgment upon it, I, for one, and the members of the committee also, would be very glad indeed to sit jointly for the consideration of this question.

I do not rise to oppose the motion now that two committees sit and deliberate upon this question. I leave that to the Convention. I do want to point out what is proposed in this amendment. A radical change is to be made in the fundamental law of this Commonwealth. We have now one Governor. We have one law-making body. We have one judiciary, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. If this proposed amendment is adopted we shall have one Governor, one judiciary, and God only knows how many law-making bodies, because it is proposed that instead of one Legislature, one body determining what shall be the statutory law of this Commonwealth, every commission whom the Legislature may designate shall have that power, in some cases one man, in some cases three men, in some cases five and seven men. Indeed, in the months of May and June and July you will have the spectacle of a Legislature in session, the fire prevention commissioner, the Metropolitan Commissions, the Public Service Commission, and all the various commissions passing what,—laws to bind you and me, under which we may be prosecuted and punished. It is not proposed that they shall have the power to pass ordinances, but laws, and laws which, even so far as this amendment goes, will not be subject to the scrutiny of a Governor, as the laws passed by the Legislature have to be examined and scrutinized. This is a dangerous step, exceedingly dangerous.

Now, what is the evil which the gentleman so eloquently and so well points out, and which I appreciate, and some of the language of which I hope to repeat in discussing a question which later will come before this Convention? What is the evil? The evil is this: That the Legislature has too much of its time taken up in considering special acts.
But the Legislature has the power to pass general laws and permit administrative boards, city governments and town governments to assume the task of passing upon many of these special questions which make special laws. So that the remedy is in the Legislature itself, and it does not seem to me that we are prepared in Massachusetts to have an unlimited number of law-making bodies, but that we want one tribunal only, to which every one can turn to find out what the statutory law is, one Constitution, one law-making body, one public record, to find out what the law of the State may be. [Applause.]

Mr. WATERMAN of Williamstown: It is presumed that we understand the intent of the suggestion of this amendment, and as the ex-Governor (Mr. Walsh) has just pointed out it lays down a new policy in Massachusetts whereby four hundred men from one hundred commissions or more can go forth and dictate the laws under which you and I shall live. Now, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is this a democratic government, or is it going to be a government of men who have been created by the Legislature and then turned loose to do that which they see fit to do? What do you know about the personnel of these men?
How much do you trust them to-day? Only two years ago we tried to get a law through here whereby we might know what the rules and regulations were, that we might abide by them, but because of the expense of publishing the same it was turned down in the wisdom of the Ways and Means Committee. This last winter, however, though not published in a volume, those rules and regulations and orders had to be filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth and remain there three months before they had the effect of law. Do you suppose it is an easy thing when a matter is established that a body can rescind that, or that the Legislature will rescind that order, be it good or bad? I submit to you, gentlemen, it needs but very little suggestion here to see where the thing will run to. The trouble to-day is that legislation has run away in this Commonwealth of Massachusetts; that all these rules and regulations by a hundred boards or more are the law of the land, and it is very difficult when these commissions are appointed to get at them. The Governor well knows how little power he has over the administration of the matters of this State, and yet you ask him to hold down the State tax. How can he do it when he has so little power and all these commissions are creating business that they may enhance the value and the importance of their office. I leave it with you now here, and I trust this matter will not be referred, but that the committee's report will be accepted.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I desire to call the attention of this body to the fact that the evil against which the last speaker protested is not an evil which might arise only if the proposition of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) were carried out, but it is at the present moment one of the greatest evils in the government of Massachusetts. We have sixty or seventy administrative bodies, each of which has some power of legislation within its own sphere. The people of Massachusetts, through their General Court and their present system of government, have for years been tearing down that principle of separation between legislative and executive powers which was one of the things that our forefathers most cared to establish in the Constitution. They have been doing it, first of all, by tearing the executive power apart; instead of vesting it in the Governor they vest large portions in bodies appointed at irregular intervals, not responsible to the Governor, and taking from day to day a share of the executive power of this Commonwealth upon themselves. As between the executive and the legislative, the government of this Commonwealth has permitted those bodies to exercise legislative discretion in many directions. We see the same tendency in the national government. What is the Interstate Commerce Commission? 'A Legislature, a court and an executive. What is the new Federal Reserve Board? The Trade Commission? They are all of the same kind.

The suggestion of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) is phrased in a manner subject to many objections; as has been said, it is vague, it is uncertain. One purpose of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), however, is to recall to this body the fact that after two months of our sessions we are now in a sterile condition. The great committee on the Judiciary, composed of as able men as can be found in this Convention, have reported as the single positive result of weeks of deliberation that women ought to be notaries public! They find nothing else to propose or criticize in the Constitution of the Commonwealth as respects the judiciary. The committee upon the General Court has reported that the General Court ought to have power to adjourn for thirty days, and nothing else.

Continuing after the noon recess Mr. Hart said:

At the conclusion of my remarks at one o'clock I tried to bring out the great, significant, fundamental fact that after sitting two months and receiving the reports of the committees appointed by this body, twenty in number, the Convention is now dealing with a small crop from an almost barren field. Only one question of great magnitude has come before the Convention, and has been debated; and even that is not yet disposed of. Another big question, the initiative and referendum, is impending. As has been remarked to-day, if the question of a sectarian amendment and the question of the initiative and referendum are all that this Convention is going to consider it has not the right to the name of a Convention.

I called your attention to the fact that the Judiciary Committee sees nothing whatever that needs amendment in the judicial system of the country. It is perfectly true that the committee on Judicial Procedure, of which the eminent gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) is chairman, has offered two propositions looking toward changes in that department of the judicial activity of the Commonwealth which will in due time come before us; but it is equally true that the committee on General Court, including doubtless,—I have not examined the list to verify that fact,—a number of persons who have had long experience as members of the General Court, has also not seen fit to recommend anything whatever. Now, what does that mean?

Mr. George of Haverhill: Lest the gentleman from Cambridge forget, I should like to have him state how many meetings his committee has held during this session, and how much actual work it has done, while he is criticising the other committees.

Mr. Hart: The speaker is perfectly willing to answer the question, though it has no connection with the subject before the house. The committee on Amendments and Codification has had frequent meetings; I cannot say whether there were eight or ten. We considered every subject before us upon which it was possible to come to a determination and have reported two important propositions that are now in the docket, and will be duly reached in their turn. In addition several other subjects are, by permission of the Convention, now before the committee awaiting the decision of this Convention upon the important matter of the codification of the present Constitution, upon which it is impossible for us to act without special direction. If the gentleman who inquired wishes to raise inquiry whether the committee on Amendments and Codification has been equally sterile, no more productive than the committees to which I have alluded, I am happy to assure him that it has produced several measures which he will have the opportunity to discuss in due time.

The committee reports so far in general indicate that this Convention thinks that in most respects the Constitution of Massachusetts is already a satisfactory, a perfect instrument. That is curious, because, with regard to the judiciary, everybody here knows that the constitutional provisions are few and slender, far fewer than in other State Constitutions, and that as a matter of fact our judiciary department, and our judicial procedure, are to a very large degree built up on decisions of the courts, there being no articles of the Constitution that will cover all those cases. When you plead, therefore, for the sacred Constitution of 1780 and urge that that is sufficient, you are pleading in part for the written instrument of 1780, in part for an accumulation of judicial precedents and decisions, which in bulk and importance I undertake to say are quite as significant as all the text of the Constitution relating to the judiciary. You are perpetuating, therefore, or the committee on the Judiciary, so far as its power and authority and recommendation go, is perpetuating a system in which the Constitution is not the main issue. We as a Convention are denying to the people of Massachusetts well articulated articles upon the judiciary, such as other communities enjoy.

The difficulty, as I already have said from this place, is that we have such a remarkably good judiciary, pure, upright, able and impartial. We have no guarantee that that condition will endure forever, and I submit that the people of the Commonwealth have a right to a greater degree of definition of judicial power. Here is the opportunity: A great Convention, a great body of distinguished members of the bar! From whom might so appropriately come suggestions for alterations and improvements of the Constitution? Yet apparently we shall adjourn without making any systematic alterations because no systematic propositions are presented to our attention.

The truth is, this Constitutional Convention seems to me to be eaten up by its own committee system. We are dealing with the whole subject, and all our deliberations are founded upon the idea that you must have a committee report before you, and the committees can make no reports unless they are based on individual suggestions. In the great Constitutional Convention of 1787 and in many others the procedure was quite different. Propositions were made in Committee of the Whole or otherwise upon questions of general principle, sent to committees with instructions, and those propositions then came back, and were debated in detail. Out of that came an articulated Constitution. And there is no other proper or effective way.

How is it with regard to amendments affecting the Legislature? The same thing; although everybody in Massachusetts knows, by contact with the General Court or by common report, that there are many difficulties, some of which have been mentioned to-day, in the workings of the Legislature. The committee on that subject sees none. The only proposition which will come before the Convention, apparently, upon which we can have a square opinion as to whether the General Court is doing its duty, whether it is the kind of Legislature to which this State is entitled, is the proposition of the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), which is now pending and upon which I therefore am speaking.

Go a little further. Take the State Executive. There is the Council, which is an excrescence which never ought to have been perpetuated. It was carried over from the old Colonial system. It never has fitted into a system of democratic government. It destroys to a large degree, or at least it impairs, the efficiency of the executive. I have searched in vain through the documents to ascertain what has become of the three propositions to abolish the Council. It is possible that in due time they will reach us, and that there will be an opportunity at least to pay our respects to the Council. You know the custom in some countries is as you go along to lay a stone upon every grave. I hope at least I may have the opportunity to deposit a sizable pebble upon the tomb of the Governor's Council of Massachusetts.

A few days ago an eminent member of this body (Mr. McAnarney) plunged an imaginary professor of Harvard College into a very serious difficulty. The gentleman was so eloquent, and spoke with such force and energy, that even a professor of Harvard College could enjoy the humor. But did any of you remark, gentlemen, that the gentleman from Quincy wilfully and inexcusably confused the powers of government of Massachusetts? He first constituted himself both Houses of the Massachusetts Legislature, and passed an impossible statute. He then transformed himself into the Governor and signed the statute, which as Governor he had the power to veto. He next constituted himself a court of first instance in Massachusetts, and condemned the professor to an unheard-of penalty. He then, as executive, as sheriff of the county, confined him in jail for ten months. In all that process he seemed to forget there were such things as newspapers, as public meetings, or that the Supreme Judicial Court has any authority whatever to reach down and rescue a humble and suffering professor of Harvard College.

I was greatly indebted to that gentleman also for his allusion to a very distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, unhappily not a member of this Convention, namely, James Otis. That is a splendid name! It is always in order, my friends, to refer to a Massachusetts Convention to James Otis, and to Sam Adams, and to John Adams, and those other great patriots,—but it is not fashionable to follow their example. How does James Otis come into the question of the General Court of Massachusetts, and the way of improving its discussions and decisions? I will tell you. The truth is that James Otis was a firebrand. He came into the community of his period exactly as some gentlemen have come into this Convention, with blood in his eye. James Otis put forward a famous proposition with regard to the writs of assistance, namely, that they were not constitutional; but he was a century ahead of his time. He was trying to develop a principle that there was a Constitution of the British Empire which could be contravened, statutes contrary to which, though passed by Parliament, were unconstitutional. It was a great idea, but it is not yet adopted by the British nation, although within a few weeks an imperial conference in London has been looking in that direction.

James Otis founded a new political school. But gentlemen forget that James Otis was turned down by the court before which he made that argument, as was Patrick Henry in his similar argument on the same point a few years later. James Otis and Patrick Henry and those people were looked upon with affright and distrust. Why, no supporter of the initiative and referendum can be held by any respectable member of this Convention in greater terror and apprehension than was James Otis by the good people of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman, I thank any gentleman, for calling our attention to James Otis and Sam Adams as persons who ought to be respected and followed by the present Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts. What they were doing was to try to break up an old political order which had become crystallized, effete, out of date. The provincial government of Massachusetts suited most of the good, wealthy, well-to-do people in Massachusetts, exactly as well as the present Constitution seems to suit a considerable number of the members of this Convention. They wanted no change. They asked for no change. James Otis was a firebrand who came to compel people to make changes in the direction of democratic government which were excessively distasteful to them. Why, the Constitutional Convention of 1780 was made up of a set of radicals and firebrands, a set of people who could not be satisfied with the respectable government that they had. Some of those people lived out in Berkshire County, where the Reverend Mr. Adams of Pittsfield for five years was their leader. Five years the courts of Massachusetts never sat in Berkshire County.

A point of order was raised that Mr. Hart was not talking to the subject-matter under consideration. The Chair ruled that the point of order was not well taken. Mr. Hart continued:

James Otis could not have been ruled out on a point of order when he once got his blood up; and lesser men may follow his example. My point of order is, — or point of disorder, if you like, — that the Constitutional Convention of 1780 was made up of men to a considerable degree looked upon as reactionaries in their time. Why, do you think that everybody in Massachusetts thought as Sam Adams did, that everybody wanted a Constitution? Up there in Berkshire County there was one little town which passed a solemn resolution to the effect that "We want no jug but the jug of the universe." Those people demanded a Constitution. They would not obey the government until they got it. Then came in John Hancock. John Hancock, a well-to-do merchant, a wealthy man, wanted to be Governor of Massachusetts, and he could not unless there was a Governor; so he and Sam Adams came to an agreement that Sam Adams would favor a Constitution and John Hancock somehow became the first Governor. It was a good Constitution. Nevertheless there are plenty of members sitting here in this Constitutional Convention who could not conscientiously have sat in the Convention of 1780, because it was trying to upset the previous government and to submit a more democratic system for popular consideration and vote.

Furthermore, the people in 1780 never looked upon the Constitution that they were making as a kind of God-given instrument. To say nothing of that famous clause asserting the right of the people of the Commonwealth to change their form of government, they provided for a Constitutional Convention in 1795; and they expected there would be one. Other States in the Union, like Pennsylvania, had had several Constitutional Conventions. It was a mere accident that there was none in 1795, a majority of the voters having voted for it but not the special majority required. And that is the reason why Massachusetts was left without an adequate machinery for altering the Constitution.

Now, gentlemen, let us face the issue. Here we are, appointed by our constituents to do what? To sit here and sweat and finally produce two or three amendments? What is the use of it? Amendments might somehow have been forced from the Legislature. No, we were sent here if possible to make a better instrument of government, at least, in the district from which I was elected in Cambridge that seemed to be the principle. That is what I came here for, and I find myself hedged in by the declination, the refusal of the committees to report measures through which we can debate, discuss and come to some decision as to the actual improvement of the Constitution. The result will be unless this Convention has a change of mind, that in the end we shall retire to our humble abodes, our partial and incomplete work will be voted upon, and we shall be duly forgotten. I confess I looked forward with a hope that my children and grandchildren and great grandchildren might make it a point of pride that their ancestor had been in this Convention, as I make it a point of pride that my ancestor, Stephen Hart, was a member of the first Constitutional Convention in America, which framed the famous constitutional orders of Connecticut in 1639. I tell you I shall not be very proud, nor will any of us be very proud, of the result of this Convention, if we finally go home to our constituents having done nothing to furnish them a Constitution. Sixty-odd years since the last Convention, the first opportunity, and we are not taking advantage of it! After all, doubtless it will not make so much difference; for I prophesy that if this Convention sits, adjourns and goes home without meeting the demands of the people of Massachusetts, demands accumulating for many years, that within three or five years there will be a genuine Constitutional Convention, which will be sent to this hall and which will do the work which we degenerate sons have refused to do.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I speak as one of the members of the committee that heard this matter. I had intended to speak on the merits of this measure, but in my opinion the temper of the committee is not such that it desires at this time to hear further argument on the merits. I wish, therefore, to confine my remarks exclusively to the narrow question before the committee, namely, shall this document be recommitted to the committee which first heard it, namely, the committee on State Administration.

I am one of the fifteen men who voted unanimously against this measure. If it comes before us once more in the same dress I shall vote against it again. But I am impressed with the possibility that the language might be so reformed and the thought expressed in this language so modified as to meet some of the objections so ably set forth by the member from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) and the member from Fitchburg (Mr. Walsh) and still remain of use. If our friend the member from Waltham (Mr. Luce) believes that that can be done, and I judge he does, then I for one am very ready to undertake the extra labor of rehearing the matter with an open mind. I should not be so willing but for one thing. I point out to the Convention the dangerous nature of Mr. Luce's motion as a precedent. I believe, I have every reason to believe and do believe, that the member from Waltham intended his motion in no wise hostily to the committee on State Administration, and with no thought of using improper means to defeat an unfavorable committee report, but I do think that if the same thing that the member from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has done should be done hereafter, on the basis of his motion as a precedent, it would provide the Convention with endless fighting over the getting around of unfavorable committee reports, because it would leave it open to any member who found himself faced by an unfavorable committee report to move to recommit to the original committee, plus any committee he might pick out that he thought might give him a vote.

I therefore will ask the member from Waltham (Mr. Luce) if he will submit to an amendment of his motion in such a sense as to make it read to recommit to the committee on State Administration, with power to invite the committee on Executive to sit with it. If the member from Waltham (Mr. Luce) accepts that amendment, then I hope the motion so amended will prevail with this Convention in the interest of fair play, and in order to allow a still further hearing of a matter which evidently has many sides and is of more general interest than perhaps was realized before the session of to-day.

Mr. Luce: I have not the slightest personal pride in the wording of this resolution. I have not the slightest desire to win a victory over any committee. I have a very deep desire that this Convention shall not dissolve without facing the problem of special legislation, and whatever course will secure the solution of that problem will be perfectly satisfactory to me. If the Convention desires to consider further this matter, for which the only legislative basis that I know of is the resolution now before us, it is quite immaterial to me how it is done.

The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr, Dutch), with force, that the remedy is already in the hands of the Legislature; but, Mr. Chairman, my feeling that the Legislature would not let go of power voluntarily, would not voluntarily reform itself, was the chief motive that led me to speak and ask for the holding of this Convention. I felt that the existing methods of amendment might in time produce such reforms in the executive department as were imperative, might secure such reforms in the judicial department as were imperative, but in all probability would not secure reforms in the legislative department. Three years ago a joint special committee on legislative procedure sat during the summer. Its Senate chairman was Henry G. Wells of Haverhill, one of the most conservative men in the State, and I say it with due respect. Its House chairman was Henry E. Bothfeld of Newton, another man of moderation, temperate in speech and thought. The committee headed by these gentlemen reported in a document of 107 pages a programme of legislative reform, backed up with figures, part of which I have quoted this morning, and with arguments that seemed to me irrefutable, and the Legislature threw the whole thing right out of the window. So far as I know, the Legislature, perhaps with some trivial exceptions, would not adopt a single proposition that looked to the shortening of its sessions or looked to getting rid of part of this mass of special legislation. Now, because the Legislature, in three years of delay and inaction, has proved that it will not face the problem, I for one am convinced that the only hope is in this Convention.

I do not urge my resolution; I do not urge any resolution. My prayer is simply this,—that whatever committees of this Convention you may designate will consider what seems to me the gravest problem now confronting this Commonwealth.

I have in one hand the volume of laws passed in one year by the Massachusetts General Court for a population of two million and a half. In the other hand I have the laws passed by the Parliament of Great Britain for a population of between five hundred and eight hundred million people. That was all the legislation necessary for the greatest empire on the face of the globe.

Mr. McCaffrey of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham whether or not there are two large volumes of provisional laws and statutory orders which had the effect of law passed by authority of the Parliament of Great Britain every year?

Mr. Luce: That is perfectly true. These were the general laws. Upon this book was concentrated the wisdom, the study and the debate of Parliament. But the wisdom, study and debate of our Legislature was scattered and diffused over all those eight hundred and more propositions. Now the wisdom of the world says that is the right way to do and this is the wrong way to do. And because all mankind agree this is wrong, therefore I am still in the hope that by whatever process it thinks best the Convention may be willing further to consider this need.

Mr. Douglass of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham what he believes would be the volume of the laws that would be passed by these commissions or agencies under his proposed resolution.

Mr. Luce: My expectation, sir, is that many propositions which get a hearing from the Legislature will not be submitted for a hearing by the experts whom the State employs to consider these matters.
Mr. DOUGLASS: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham how he expects to get in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts better experts in a board of six or three or seven men than he does from 240 men chosen from the body of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LUCE: I have had the pleasure of serving on a considerable number of legislative committees. It is not my opinion that I personally ever brought to any legislative committee service in coping with these matters of administrative detail, that judgment, that training, that experience, which are to be found in the experts appointed by the Governor, who devote their lives to these propositions.

Mr. DOUGLASS: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham if he ever intends to run for the Legislature again after the experience he has given us.

Mr. LUCE: If I ever should find opportunity to serve this State again in the General Court, I should look forward to it as an opportunity to repeat the happiest years of my life, the most profitable years of my life, and yet years filled with the consciousness that I was part and parcel of a system capable of improvement. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DOUGLASS: I should like to ask the gentleman from Waltham if he believes that the commissions of this Commonwealth are capable of any improvement, or are they more susceptible of improvement than the members of the Massachusetts Legislature.

Mr. LUCE: I thank God that all men are capable of improvement. [Applause.] Sir, if I had not believed that all men are capable of improvement, never for one moment would I have consented to be a delegate to this Convention. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I may say. I have laid before the Convention a great evil, a crying evil, so recognized in every legislative hall in this country, so recognized in every Convention that has been held in this country for seventy-five years; in the minds of many the greatest evil needing our attention. I pray you, sir, and through you this committee, to grant me simply this modest prayer,—that you will not go to your homes, abandoning almost on the threshold of our deliberations the attempt to meet this evil. I ask simply that in whatever method you may think wisest you may further see if we in our turn may not be as hopeful, as constructive, as patriotic as were the men who framed this Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. WATERMAN of Williamstown: I am here because I was elected a member here and I have taken the oath to do my duty here as a member of this Convention, and I shall not take it from anybody that I am here to put a mass of stuff before the people which I do not support, and I doubt if there are many men in this hall who will take any such position,—that they were sent here to send a mass of stuff to the people for their consideration. They sent us here as men, to deliberate, to consider the Constitution and the questions brought to us, and not to stir up a muss. I think any reasonable man will subscribe to those sentiments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we are getting wide of the mark in stating this question, that because of special legislation the whole of our law-making system should be changed. Can you imagine what it would be if you allowed one hundred commissions and boards to go forth and do as they pleased? Where is your help, where is your protection? Will you let everybody go forth, men who have sought these positions in the Legislature, men who have pulled one way and another to hold them, and then let them go with a free hand and create laws to satisfy their own whims? The Legislature was created by the people as their representative body, to be a delegated representation of them. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the fact of the number of years that this Constitution has held forth without much change is a pretty good testimony that it was a pretty good Constitution. And I believe that the people are very loath to drop these articles of agreement that we have lived under so many years for something that we know very little about. Because a few people bring forward certain notions and work them and talk them till finally somebody thinks there is something in them is no reason for us to submit to that call. I believe we should act as men and do our duty to-day, deciding every question as its merits dictate.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Mr. Chairman, because of what the last speaker said I say a word. Yes, it is true, we are here in our individual capacity to represent the people of the Commonwealth. It is true that we have taken an oath. It is true also that all Constitutions and all governments are to a certain extent the expression of the will of the people as near as they are capable of expressing it. Therefore, it follows that whatever is going to come out of this Convention is going to be an expression of each individual from his standpoint. Each one will pass judgment on them from his own standpoint, from his condition, as he has developed it. It naturally follows, then, this,—that a man whom the world has used well, a man who to-day finds himself surrounded by all that he cares to have, is satisfied; he is laissez faire. He lets everything pass.

There is a consensus of opinion that something is wrong in this Commonwealth; that the many of the people are not prosperous, that the many of the people are not enjoying their lives and have not the liberties as it was intended. If you say that this Constitution was intended to enable them to enjoy life, then you admit that the several departments have not accomplished it. It necessarily must follow that you have got to change in some way some form of this government in order to change these conditions. Continually we have heard it from the beginning of this Convention that we are going to let the Constitution alone because it is old. Well, if conditions as they are are perfectly satisfactory let us adjourn and go home; we do not belong here. Certain things are going to be said in this Convention and they may as well be said at one time as another. The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) asks that this resolution be sent to a committee, not necessarily to report back just what there is in that resolution, but perchance that it may give us something we may need by and by.

Now what next do we discover? As was pointed out by the gentleman on the other side, we have got along fairly well; we have got through with one department and there is nothing the matter with that department. That department says so. It was made up of honest representatives of it; they viewed it from their standpoint. They saw the judiciary as they have seen it and understood it and they were honest,—of course they were,—because they saw their side of it. This Convention, if it keeps on the way it is going, is going to be much in the position of the two honest knights. They rode from opposite quarters and as they approached one said: "By my faith, that shield is silver." "No," said the other, "that shield is gold." And thereupon they fell upon each other and fought a bloody combat which ended in throwing them and reversing their positions, so that one saw that the other was right and the other saw that the first was right,—they were both right, only they spoke from different viewpoints.

Our preacher the other day pleaded fervently that we might have light. Gentlemen of the Convention, there are two kinds of light; there is the light that comes into the individual when he thinks and by thinking tries to understand his duty, when he tries as best he can to represent the truth which he thus obtains. And then there is another kind of light; it is a reflection from a looking-glass. Does the Convention divide itself into those who have got the light and those who are nothing but looking-glasses? I am led to this thought by a gentleman who spoke to me during the recess. He had very well defined views on a certain question, but somebody had spoken and he was a little tin God for him, and because that man said so he was going that way regardless of his own views on the merits of the question. He is a looking-glass. That is all there is to it. If we are going to degenerate in that way we are not going to do much.

There are conditions in this Commonwealth that need to be remedied and you might as well attack them on one measure as the other. Let us come to government. All down through the line you will find in spite of all obstacles there has been human progress, and you may find it on either side of the line of governments. So long as they served their purposes they stood; when they did not and became merely obstacles they were thrown to one side. There have been good governments, republics, and monarchies; but all were thrown to one side when they stopped human progress. You may do nothing, if you please, but you will not stop human progress. Men are coming to discover that they must either control government as an instrument or come into opposition to it as an obstacle. We are drifting there. What are you going to do in Massachusetts? When Massachusetts government commenced on the Mayflower it was a compact, the only one of its kind; the signers agreed to do certain things endorsed by the majority. It was a perfect democracy. It was carried into the town-meetings and men spoke their opinions; then came a vote; the majority ruled and the minority opposed it no longer. That was a pure democracy. The communities grew; they commenced to delegate their powers; this developed representative government, the first of its kind. When that was formed certain problems confronted it. The problems that we have got to solve did not confront our forefathers! For the problems that confronted them, the Constitution was sufficient. Now new problems are coming forward and demanding to be solved.

Returning to this particular point that we have under consideration: Representative government develops a system of administration, because administration is merely running the machinery. The Constitution is the machinery with its limitations and its powers, and it must delegate power. When power that is delegated is wisely used it serves a good purpose; all power improperly used is evil. An administrative board has certain powers that are mandatory and it has certain powers that are discretionary. Within the limits of that discretion the administrative may use its discretionary powers. In what other way may it be done except to promulgate its decisions? At the present moment there are many rules, some almost with the force of law. An administrative officer is a Governor within his limited sphere.

The reference of this particular subject of administration to the committee is not for the purpose of reflecting on the first report of the committee. It is not, as the gentleman from Waltham has said, to get the better of the committee. There is something in this resolution that we may want to use as we go through the Convention docket. We may find that the very thing that you have rejected has become the headstone of the corner. I do not say that it will. I do not favor all that is in the resolution. But at the same time I shall vote to give it a chance. I hope the motion made by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) will be adopted, that the resolution will be sent to the committee, which need not necessarily report that resolution but may report something that is needed a little while later. [Applause.]

Mr. CURTIS of Revere: I have listened with much interest to the able debate of this morning upon the main question and this proposition. I was particularly interested in the splendid arguments made by the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) and the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch). But it appears to me that as the chairman has called the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that we have departed widely from the question at issue, I should like at this time, if the gentleman from Waltham is agreeable, to have him answer one or two questions. The motion is to commit to practically a new committee. I would ask the gentleman from Waltham who makes that motion if he has any new light upon the question to put before that committee and if he believes that the committee will bring in a report different from the unanimous report against these resolutions that has been laid before us.

Mr. LUCE: A specific answer to the question will be this: The debate this morning has added to previous comments upon this proposition so that it has now presented itself to its author with new angles, new difficulties and new possibilities. I am of the belief that if this committee should take a receptive attitude toward the end to be accomplished it may be able to work out a method of accomplishing the end which will be satisfactory to the Convention, and to that end I would very gladly contribute what little I could in the way of conference, discussion and consultation. Whether the committee would make a different report or not it is beyond my power even to conjecture. Unless working together we can meet some or most of the objections that have been raised this morning, I should presume that we could not, but I am still of the hope that this all-important question may yet receive a solution commonly acceptable.

It has been called to my attention that in my previous remarks I did not directly answer the gentleman from Boston now sitting at my right (Mr. Balch) who asked if I would accept the suggestion that this matter be referred to the committee on State Administration, which originally considered it, with power to invite the presence of another committee. I am quite willing to accept that suggestion if thereby the committee on State Administration and myself can reconcile differences that are on the surface rather than go below the surface, and if we can confront this question again with new interest and fresh opportunity. If, however, his committee should not agree that that is a wise course, I suggest the committees on Executive and State Administration, for the reason that these committees are now at work on a comprehensive and thorough reorganization of the executive, to which some proposition of this nature would be a useful adjunct. That was my sole reason for suggesting it go to those two committees, but personally I have not the slightest desire to upset the opinions and wishes of the committee on State Administration in the matter of the reference.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: With those answers to the questions before the Committee of the Whole it seems to me that it is only fair play,—because there is a principle involved here that may be of benefit to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,—it seems to me only fair play that this matter should go back again to the committee. Thus far on the main proposition from the arguments I have heard pro and con, I am against the main proposition as embodied in the gentleman's talk this morning. But he states now practically that he has great hopes,—without using those precise words,—that he may be able to put before this committee some new matters and that they may be able to get together and come in with a report that may be for the benefit of our Commonwealth. For those reasons I believe as a matter of fair play it should go back to the committee.

Mr. Douglass: It does not strike me as one member of this Convention as a matter of personality or fair play at all. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), with whom I served many years in the Legislature. Resolution No. 269 is as plain as words can make it. The proposition is thoroughly understood by every man in this Convention. It is merely a proposition to take away from the Massachusetts Legislature the practically sole right which it now has of making penal laws and to give that right to delegated commissions. That is the whole question before the committee, and the gentleman from Waltham in his last answer has not thrown any further light upon the question than he did in the debate this morning. There is no man in this Convention but what has his mind made up on that essential proposition. The question of commissions in this State is understood not only by us men here but by every man who follows politics in this State. We know the corruption of some of these commissions; we know that we are trying to keep away from them powers or take back from them powers that we have given in the past. It is not a question of special legislation, it is not a question of the executive; it is a question of taking away from the hands of the Massachusetts Legislature the scepter of Israel, the passage of penal laws, and in that Legislature of ours that subject belongs, because there is no higher power given to men than the power to make laws with punishment. The scepter of punishment, the scepter of Israel, belongs in the Massachusetts Legislature, and there, men, let it remain. [Applause.]

Mr. Bryant: There is only one thing that I want to add to what the last speaker has said, and that is this: He has said that this proposition is to take away from the Legislature certain of its powers to pass penal legislation. To whom is the power to be transferred? It is to be transferred to commissions. And by whom are those commissions appointed? They are appointed by the executive. Are we going to have the executive pass our laws, or are we going to have the Legislature pass our laws? [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have all heard the extremely eloquent debate on this topic. We are all fully informed. There is nothing, I believe, that the gentleman from Waltham can add, as he himself says. We have spent one entire day on this important matter and if we refer it are we again going to be in the same advantageous position that we are in to act upon it? Are all these arguments to be repeated two or three weeks hence? Are we going to have them all fresh in our minds when we come to act upon it? This matter has been debated as well as any matter that has appeared before this Convention. I think the Convention is read to act upon it, and I for one hope that they will act upon it.

[Cries of "Question."]

Mr. Balch: I hear calls on all sides for the question and I believe myself that the time has come, and in fact came some time ago, when we should face this question. To my belief all the talk on the merits of this resolution was out of order at this time. As I understand it, the merits are not now before us. If I thought the merits were before us my vote would be the opposite of what it is going to be. On the merits I stand solidly with the fifteen members of my committee who voted unanimously against this resolution. Nevertheless, I repeat that I shall vote, and I hope the Convention will vote, in favor of the motion of the member from Waltham as amended by me and accepted by him.

The motion that the resolution be referred to the committee on State Administration and the committee on the Executive, sitting jointly, prevailed, by a vote of 131 to 101.

Those committees reported, Tuesday, July 30, 1918, the following new draft (No. 409) based in part on the resolution (No. 269) which had been referred to them:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The Council, with the approval of the Governor, may on 4 petition and after advertised public hearing, pass statutory orders relating to local, special, or private matters,
5 or to the carrying out of provisions of existing law: provided, that no such order shall involve an expenditure of 6 money by the Commonwealth unless out of an appropriation already made, or shall impose a penalty exceeding 7 one hundred dollars. Before a petition for the 8 passage of such an order shall be considered by the 9 Council, it shall be reported upon by that department or 10 agency of the Commonwealth, if any, which in the 11 opinion of the Governor exercises functions embracing in 12 their scope the subject-matter of such petition. The 13 form of an order shall be approved by the Attorney-General before its final passage, and after passage, it shall be 14 engrossed and filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and advertised and published in the same manner
15 as laws enacted by the General Court. Unless otherwise 16 defined by law, local matters shall be deemed to include 17 any matter relating only to a particular political sub-18 division or district of the Commonwealth, and special or private matters shall be deemed to include any matter relating to one or more particular individuals, associations, or private corporations.

A statutory order relating only to a particular city or town shall be designated as a municipal statutory order and shall take effect only upon acceptance by the city or town in such manner as may be prescribed by such order.

Any order other than a municipal statutory order if passed by the unanimous vote of all the Councillors voting thereon, by yeas and nays, shall take effect upon its approval by the Governor, or at such later date as may be fixed therein; if not passed by a unanimous vote, it shall be transmitted to the General Court and shall take effect three months after the date of such transmittal, or at such later date as may be fixed therein: provided, that if it is transmitted within less than three months before the date when the General Court shall be prorogued or adjourned, it shall, unless specifically confirmed by the General Court, only take effect three months after the convening of the next session of the General Court; and provided further, that no such order shall take effect if within such period of three months either branch of the General Court shall pass an order annulling the same.

The General Court shall retain full power to pass or to repeal any law or statutory order relating to a local, special or private matter, or to the carrying out of proposals or plans or visions of existing law; and the General Court may authorize any city, town or village, or the Council, with the approval of the Governor, to pass statutory orders under other conditions or relating to other matters than those herein set forth.

The resolution (No. 409) was read a second time Tuesday, August 13.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: The story is told of the children who wrote and produced a play to which the fond parents of the neighborhood were invited. It told of the noble young man fleeing abroad to seek his fortune and returning after ten years, bearing to his deserted wife and child the fruits of long delayed success. It was very touching and very beautiful, but those young authors had imbibed also that spirit of service which to-day so actuates the gentler sex, and in the concluding scene the young wife proudly cried: "In your long absence I too have not been idle. See the children I have borne you!" and in trooped eight youngsters of assorted sizes. [Laughter.]

I am well aware that this Convention is looking with suspicion upon these belated reports of its two committees sitting jointly.

But one thing at least is sure. These two measures which I present are of no doubtful paternity. Their origin is in the Convention itself. More than a year ago, the committee on State Administration unanimously reported adversely against a resolution permitting various State agencies to enact statutory orders which should have the effect of laws as to certain local special and private matters.

Without minimizing the faults of the almost universal American practice we felt that to spread such authority broadcast would offer a cure far worse than the disease.

When that report was debated, the Convention by a large majority sent it back to the joint committees, mainly upon the argument that good government required that the size of the Blue Books should be reduced and the Legislature in some way relieved.

Is that contention sound? It certainly is, and it is ancient. I once read in a copy of the Springfield Republican printed in the '40s an editorial complaining that the miserable Legislature was hanging on, dallying over worthless things, while its members should have been at home planning for the crops. That cry has been continuous for three generations.

Judge Lowell's statement, printed I believe in the Atlantic, that it would be for the eternal welfare of the Commonwealth if any Legislature would at once refer to the next General Court nine-tenths of the matters before it and proceed to legislate concerning the remainder, has been quoted often.

But sitting in this very seat more than 21 years ago I heard him make the rest of a very important statement, — that he "well knew that if such action were taken, a few, probably a very few, of the members would be again elected."

What would he say now when the annual business of the General Court has more than doubled since his time? When its work was less than one-third what it is to-day, a distinguished member told me that we ought to be astonished that so little poor work was done and so much good, because the Legislature always was overworked.

Upon such testimony, with the recent action of the Convention before us I cannot conceive it necessary to debate the wisdom and necessity of doing something. The legitimate demand for special, private and local legislation is urgent and compelling and must be satisfied. Struggling under the avalanche of petitions it is amazing that our legislators produce Blue Books so small and adjourn so early. The fault is with the system. They must do the job that is set before them. With honor or credit to themselves they can neither shift nor shirk the burden. To their glory be it said that they are too busy with the days' works to evolve any well-ordered scheme for bettering their own condition. If there is to be substantial improvement, it must come from some such body as this.

Therefore, our first question is, What is the trouble? Why do the States of America, alone in civilization, have such enormous Blue Books? Surely the answer is plain. Everything, big and little, is ground through one hopper. No matter what the material, no matter how great the haste, the same machinery and the same stones must do for all. Is not the resulting flour bound to be of only average quality? In no other business except legislation would we persist in using the same machinery and the same tools for everything.

If the Legislature is to be relieved of some of the detail work which can be done just as well elsewhere, is it not fair to assume that some subordinate tribunal must be established or certain duties shifted to some other already existing governmental agency? A year ago we refused to recommend any indiscriminate shifting; but we do believe that in the Governor's Council we already have a body which, sitting throughout the year, adequately and easily can relieve the General Court of much of the minor detail work which otherwise will come increasingly before it.

If you will examine document No. 265 you will realize how varied is the present work of the Council and that this addition should not embarrass it. Fifteen pages in that document recite only a part of the recent duties of the Council.

The Legislature is and forever should be the sole fundamental law-making instrument of our State. Even over detail work its negative should be absolute, complete, sure and quick, and we have endeavored to so draft this resolution.

We regret that it is long, but it is probably necessary to have it precise. It does not deal with principles so much as with closely restricted methods.

Our objects are twofold: First, to dredge a channel down which minor, practically uncontested orders relating to private, local or special matters, or details of existing laws, may flow readily and unobstructedly in the hope and expectation that with the passage of the years it regularly will take care of the multitude of questions and details which are wholly unworthy of the annual consideration of the 280 members of the House and Senate; second, to provide a means by which, as surely and quickly, similar contested orders of which neither branch of the Legislature seasonably disapproves will float automatically down the same channel.

If the members will read the resolution they will observe that the first 26 lines carefully limit the extent and character of the absolute constitutional rights and duties conferred upon the Governor and Council. Full power to enlarge and broaden is granted the Legislature at the very end. Provision is made that the Council shall not act without public hearing, without the advice of some department, without the approval of the Attorney-General or without the proper formality and solemnity of law-enacting.

Then there is a provision relating to the acceptance of municipal statutory orders by a particular city or town affected, and all the rest, residue and remainder of the resolution is intended to state correctly and adequately the reasonable rights of such statutory orders and the complete sovereignty of the Legislature whenever a majority of either branch chooses to seasonably assert its prerogative.

The resolution as written is intended to give to statutory orders having unanimous approval of the Governor and Council an immediate life and authority; therefore it is conceivable that a measure unsatisfactory to one or even to both branches of the General Court might get a life of a few months before adverse action could be taken.

We regard the exact rights to be given such unanimous statutory orders as a mere question of detail; and while the risk seems to us small compared with the probable benefit, we do not expect to press our view if any substantial number of the Convention are disturbed by it. At this reading we, perhaps vainly, hope the merit of the proposition may be considered as a whole.

In view of the political whirlwind which enveloped us last Wednesday and Thursday you will bear with me a moment while I state the attitude that I and some other members of our committee hold upon the underlying political question involved.

When they asked Abraham Lincoln how long a man's legs ought to be, he said: "Long enough for his feet to reach the ground."

The poet says: "Hitch your wagon to a star;" but sitting here these long months, I have thought that some men whose sincerity and ability I very greatly admire have got hold of the tails of some great ideas which are yanking them through space in a mighty parabola and they never in this life may touch really solid earth again. On the problem of adding authority to the Governor and yet preserving every right of the Legislature I am trying to keep both feet on the ground.
and in the middle of the road. The ancient maxim was that there lay the safest place. To-day it is the most uncomfortable; the rushing automobiles come from both directions.

The cry is: "Give the Governor authority and hold him responsible." So far as that applies to purely executive duties, I agree, but that is not the real purpose of the cry. The real desire is to make him a power in pure legislation. When a President, a Governor or a mayor goes into office for four years I can see how he may make personal appointments which will be both political and efficient. When he takes office but for one year his personal representatives will average to be solely political.

The sole fountain of legislation should be the General Court. We are old-fashioned enough to believe that, and that is the reason why we are urging this resolution here. It is a middle-of-the-road position, and the riot of misunderstanding hits us from both ways. We wish the Constitution to relieve the General Court, purely for its own benefit, of any work that can be properly shifted. The mere fact that the Governor's Council happens to be the suggested instrument is of no importance.

Perhaps we do not realize what the Legislature already has done in the way of delegating its authority. The ordinances of every city and town are a delegation of this authority, and I defy any man here autoing through my own city to know his rights upon the public streets with less than 30 minutes' special study of our ordinances and then a visit to his lawyer. Delegated power to legislate is found in almost every State department. At present it is chaotic in its exercise. Last year I wished to see the auto headlight rules, and they told me down-stairs they hoped to have copies for distribution in two or three weeks. And people were being fined for not obeying them!

Not long since the Legislature delegated the power of making rules for storage of explosives to the chief of the State Police, and he soon issued pages about the construction of garages. They overlapped the building ordinances of every city. One of my clients got whatever benefit there was in an entirely unnecessary expenditure of five or ten thousand dollars extra of the other fellow's money to obey both State and city requirements. These are but three samples affecting only a single interest.

Is it unreasonable to suggest that if the carefully guarded provisions of the proposed amendment become usual practice, there will be much more care and wide-visioned scrutiny of the provisions of all these minor rules and ordinances which afflict our daily lives?

It is not for me to assert that this resolution is either a cure or a panacea for all the evils that center around our ridiculous output of laws, orders and ordinances. My opinion is not very valuable, but nevertheless I personally believe this resolution to be a proper palliative and I hope it may develop into a cure. It would be folly for this Convention, having so clearly recognized a progressive disease (the work of the Legislature apparently is more than doubling every twenty years), to suggest and attempt no remedy. Some believe that a small charge as an entry fee for petitioners would reduce their number. Personally I should think it fair to try it, but from previous debates it is apparent that the Convention would not approve. In fact the trouble is not wholly with the number of petitions. The basic charge is against the size and scope and nature of the Blue Book. That is true throughout America.

We rapidly are nearing the point when something in our time-honored Massachusetts system must be abandoned. We have a Massachusetts theory that the Legislature must deliberate and act in both branches upon every matter brought to its attention and adjourn by June. That meant in 1917, with five sessions a week, a continuous average output of between 20 and 30 final decisions per day.

Can any sane person believe that really good legislation will continue to come when congestion already has reached this point and rapidly is growing greater?

Personally I should hate greatly to see any lessening of the determination of the Legislature to fully finish its work before it asks to be prorogued.

Some may fear the Council will be burdened unduly. It is not necessary that a majority should sit. One member could attend to the formalities and the rest act upon reported arguments and briefs. In any event there will be no burden except as the Legislature gets compensating relief. Are we to strike down the recess committees through which the Legislature has sought its own relief and propose no other?

A word as to the short and broad substitute amendment of the gentleman from Lexington:

Firstly, of course, it is better to conserve words in the Constitution, to enunciate merely principles and not to prescribe methods, when that is possible. But this resolution which we are considering is intended to define and limit certain rights. It is within the frame of government and any words necessary should not be spared.

Secondly, his amendment has no teeth in it; it is purely permissive; or to use the simile of the stream, our proposition digs a channel and keeps it open by sending something down it. His does not.

One of Bairnsfather's cartoons shows the war-swept plain of Flanders, bleak, dismal, horrible. Star shells are climbing, death and destruction wait upon the slightest movement. Mighty explosions dazzle the eye. The only sign of human life is in the foreground. The heads of two British Tommies, up to the ears in mud, project above the edge of a great shell crater, and a voice says: "Well, if yer says yer knows of a better 'ole, go to it."

It seems a long, long time since I was privileged to serve under you in this room, Mr. President. I am oppressed with the feeling that I have not such recent experience as to present adequately the compelling need of this resolution; but something must be done, and these are the reports of your committees upon the problem the Convention put before them.

If yer knows of a better 'ole, go to it.

Mr. Tatman of Worcester: The present Constitution gives to the Governor's Council both executive and judicial powers. For example (chapter II, section III, paragraph VI), in case the offices of Governor and Lieutenant-Governor shall both be vacant, the Council succeeds to the full powers of the Governor. And it has several executive and administrative powers which it exercises together with the Governor, the most important of which is the appointment of judges. The Council has various judicial powers which the Constitution provides. According to the Constitution, it has complete jurisdiction of all matters of marriage and divorce. It is also the supreme court of probate, to consider all appeals from the Probate Court. Both of these provisions are subject, however, to the action of the Legislature, and of course the Legislature has provided otherwise; but if the present statutes in regard to those matters should be repealed, the Governor's Council would sit as a court in divorce matters and as the supreme court of probate. The authority of the Council as to pardons would seem to be a judicial power.

And now the proposal is to give it also legislative powers, so that it may include in its august dignity the complete combination of executive, legislative and judicial functions. According to this resolution, the Council not only would rival but might far outstrip in this respect that most versatile of bodies alluded to by the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Bosworth), to wit, the Massachusetts Highway Commission.
That body, as every one knows, makes the laws, tries the criminals, and hangs them.

This resolution would introduce in this Commonwealth the celebrated or notorious Orders in Council of England. The plain fact is that this scheme is patterned after that glorious old British plan, and if adopted we might find the Council aptly described by Lord Coke, who, writing several centuries ago (4 Coke's Institutes, 53), described the King's Council as follows:

This is a most noble, honorable, and reverend assembly of the King, in the King's court or palace; within this Council the King himself doth sit at his pleasure. These Councillors are called concilium regis privatum, concilium secretum, et continuum concilium regis.

That is to say, the King's Privy Council, the secret council, and the permanent council of the King. Coke goes on:

To these Councillors all due honor and reverence is to be given, for they are incorporated to the King himself, and bear part of his cares; they are his true treasures, and the profitable instruments of the State.

Such is the Privy Council of England to-day, as it was described by Lord Coke centuries ago. It has executive, legislative and judicial functions, just as now provided in this resolution and proposed for this Commonwealth. One especial charm, I think, of the English system is that after a case has been decided, "no publication is afterwards to be made by any man how the particular voices or opinions went." It is surprising that those who drafted this resolution did not include this admirable feature, but they probably rely upon the sound discretion of the Governor's Council to obey this as an unwritten law.
For in the language of Coke, is it not to be a private and secret council?

Bear in mind that we are dealing with the Governor's Council, just as in England it is the King's Council. What an influence the Governor would have on legislation by the Council! An adroit politician in the Governor's chair would be able to get from the Council any legislation within its jurisdiction. In this way we virtually should accomplish the result which now obtains in England, where, as a prominent writer (Burgess, Political Science, vol. II, p. 199) says, through the Orders in Council the Crown still retains a fragment of its ancient powers to legislate. The Governor of Massachusetts has no ancient or modern power to legislate, and I am democrat enough to hope he never will have such power, either direct or indirect, beyond the negative of the veto.

Now what is the specific measure before us as appears by document No. 409? The title is "A Resolution relative to the passing by the Council of statutory orders relative to local, special, or private matters." This is misleading. It is really a resolution to provide for the establishment of a third House or legislative body. The correct title would be "A Resolution authorizing the Legislature to delegate all its powers to the Governor's Council."

The first fifty lines of the resolution might just as well be omitted, for the last four lines are the ones that have the teeth. I am sure I could write in thirteen words all that needs to be put into the Constitution, if the Convention really means to do what this resolution intends. We have too much verbiage, too many statutory details woven into the Constitution. Let us boil down No. 409 to its true essence, and it will read as follows: "The Legislature may delegate any or all of its powers to the Council." Thirteen words,—an unlucky thirteen if ever adopted.

Do you want to abolish the Senate and House of Representatives? Do you want to encourage them to delegate their duties to another body with full authority to act? Do you want the Senators and Representatives to be able to shirk their duties, to dodge the issues, to pass over to the Council all troublesome or difficult matters? I do not believe it, and I feel sure that the people never would agree to such a proposal.

What is the theory of our government? It is that the deliberate will of the people shall be expressed through laws passed by two fairly numerous representative bodies in concurrence. Even the Senate has forty members, and the House has two hundred and forty. When a bill or a resolve has endured all the scrutiny it receives through committee hearings and the several readings in both branches, it is very much more likely to be sound than a measure passed by a star chamber of eight mutual back-scratchers.

Talk about log-rolling in the Legislature! It is not a patch on the log-rolling and wire-pulling that you would have in a select little coterie of eight men. You all are practical men of experience. You know, and I know how much easier it is to "put something across," as the boys say, in a small body than it is in a large one.

But they say the first part of this resolution relates only to local, special, or private matters. That is a small part of the effect of the proposal. But take that part alone. I answer that these are the very subjects that most need the light of day.

I am not criticizing the present Councillors. I believe they all are honorable men. I am acquainted with several of them and regard them most highly. But their successors will be human.

What is a "local" matter? It is a matter relating only to a particular district of the Commonwealth. That is, for example, the metropolitan district, or Hampden County, or that portion of the State east of the Connecticut River, or the city of Leominster, or the town of Brookline.

Take it home to your own community. You have your local problems which may or may not need special legislation. Do you want such matters dealt with by the Council, or would you rather take your chances in getting a square deal from the Legislature?

What is a "special or private" matter? It is a public matter relating to one or more individuals or corporations. All matters of legislation affect the public,—even special or private matters, so called; otherwise there would be no need for laws to be passed concerning them. For example, under this provision the Council would deal with a law affecting John Smith, or Patrick Connors, or the Boston Elevated Railway Company, or the Webster Gas and Electric Company, or the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company. Do you want such matters dealt with by a body of eight men, through "orders in council"?

General laws affecting everybody might much better be passed by the Council, for then the eyes of the people would be more directly upon them. But local laws and special laws would get attention only from those who were specially interested, and injustice, favoritism and dangerous precedents inevitably would result.

The resolution provides that "no such order shall involve an expenditure of money by the Commonwealth unless out of an appropriation already made," but no prohibition exists in relation to a city or town or other district, and it would be entirely possible for the Council to order the city of Boston to construct a boulevard at an expense to the municipality of a hundred thousand dollars.

Nor shall such an order "impose a penalty exceeding one hundred dollars." Nothing is said about other punishments for disobeying the mandates of that august tribunal. So it would be in order to impose a punishment of any length of time in jail, disfranchisement, or imprisonment in the State Prison for life.

And the dear old commissions are nicely taken care of, for it is provided that the Council shall not even consider any matter until it has been reported by some commission to be selected by the Governor. This, of course, gives the veto power to such commissions, for all they would have to do would be to pigeonhole the matter, and

All the King's horses and all the King's men Could not get it back to the Council again.

Another interesting provision is that "the form of an order shall be approved by the Attorney-General before its final passage." The mandate to the law officer of the Commonwealth is to approve. Nothing is said about the possibility of his disapproving. But assuming that under this resolution the Attorney-General could disapprove it, why, again we have another officer with the veto power, which, after all, would not be such a bad idea if we have got to put up with the thing in any way. Bear in mind, however, that the present Constitution expressly disapproves of the Attorney-General meddling with legislation, by prohibiting him from membership in the Legislature while he is Attorney-General.

I believe that the second paragraph of the resolution, lines 27 to 46, means something definite. I have read it over a number of times and have had spells when I thought I understood it. I think it means that there is an open season and a close season on the game in the Council's preserve. At all events, it is too complicated to exist in the Constitution, and if we are going to pass the last four lines of this resolution, the rest of it is wholly unnecessary.

I will not characterize this resolution as a crazy-quilt. I have too much respect for the multitude of hands which put it together. I dare to say, however, that it is a patchwork; it bristles all over with evidence to that effect. You all have noticed that all these complicated propositions usually have had very simple beginnings. Some man has an idea, either good or fanciful, and he tries to put it into language. Now it is a difficult thing to draft any provision for a Constitution, and it is much easier to criticize, I admit. But criticism is bound to come, and the Constitution-maker tries to meet this criticism with a sentence, and that one with a paragraph. He takes out a word and adds a dozen. He trims and prunes, he adds on and builds over, until at last he has something which looks about as much like his original proposition as document No. 409 looks like its original, No. 269.

Now document No. 269 was a very simple resolution of seven lines which anybody could understand at a single reading. It provided only that the Legislature could delegate its power to make laws to any one or all of the hundred and more commissions, departments, boards and bureaus.

In spite of the multiplicity of words employed, the only essential difference between these two resolutions is that the new one gives to the Council what the old one gave to the commissions, and that is the power to legislate, the power to make laws.

I listened to my friend from Springfield (Mr. Bosworth), who thought it was an evil that all these different commissions should be making now what are called administrative orders, which are more or less in the line of laws or ordinances, and he deprecated the fact that they were making so many. It makes me wonder why he wants to make another law-making body to add to the confusion. Nothing in this resolution takes away any power of the Highway Commission or any other commission to make the rules to carry out the law as given them by the Legislature.

The more law-making bodies we have, the more laws we shall have. We have altogether too many laws now. It has got so that you scarcely can carry on any kind of business without having a license from some board or other. And if you have the license you are so surrounded with rules and regulations that with the best of intentions you are certain to violate some law. The fact is, there are so many laws that nobody knows what the law is, and it is pretty hard to find out. What we need is a rest from legislation rather than an addition of more law-making bodies.

The chief argument for this proposal as expressed by my friend from Springfield is to save the time of an overworked Legislature. I do not agree that the Legislature is overworked. The sessions are no longer than they were twenty years ago, and there always are plenty of men yearning for the opportunity to serve.

It is said that the time and attention of the Legislature ought not to be taken up with such trivial affairs as local and special bills and resolves. Again I insist that these are not trivial matters. If they need legislation at all, they are of importance to the whole people and to every section.
In this connection I call to your attention an anecdote of the great Chief Justice Shaw as narrated by Judge Chase in his recent biography:

He was giving his decision in a small case involving the question of whether a calf was exempt from attachment. The contrast between the weighty words of the Chief Justice and the trivial question he was discussing seemed to provoke the mirth of some of the lawyers present. The old man paused and said with much emotion: "Gentlemen, this may seem to you a trifling case, but it is a very important question to a great many poor families."

And so I say that local, special, and private matters are not only important to those whom they may affect directly, but they are important to the whole State and especially so as precedents for future action in regard to others.

It is not a question if the Legislature sometimes has passed what now seem to be foolish laws. Surely a small body like the Governor's Council would be more likely to do the same and much worse.

It is not enough that the Legislature still has the right to repeal. Great and irreparable damage may be done between the time the order in council takes effect and the time when the Legislature can meet again and consider it.

I have great respect for the Massachusetts Legislature, and I trust that it may preserve its old-time authority and distinction.

What has been the policy of the American Commonwealths with reference to the delegation by the Legislatures of their power to make laws? That policy has been well expressed by Judge Cooley (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 7th Ed., p. 163) as follows:

One of the settled maxims of constitutional law is, that the power conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. . . . The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been entrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

Of course I realize that we are engaged in making over a Constitution, and it is within the province of this Convention to recommend to the people an abandonment of the principle which is recognized now in every State in the Union. I venture to predict that if so recommended, the people will reject this idea upon the reasoning so well laid down by Judge Cooley, and will not permit the Legislature to abrogate its own powers or dodge its own duties.

The principle laid down by Judge Cooley was founded upon a long line of decisions by our own and many other Supreme Courts, and was stated shortly by Chief Justice Knowlton in the Massachusetts case of Brodbine v. Revere (182 Mass. 598-600), as follows:

It is well established in this Commonwealth and elsewhere, that the Legislature cannot delegate the general power to make laws, conferred upon it by a Constitution, like that of Massachusetts.

If I may ask your patience for a minute or two longer, I want to call to your attention some specific instances which our court and some other courts have dealt with with reference to assumed delegation of legislative power.

Where our Legislature undertook to bestow upon a Board of Registration in Embalming authority to make rules and regulations governing the care and disposition of human dead bodies, and the board issued an order that no undertaker could carry on his business without an embalmer's license, issued by the board, the Supreme Judicial Court held that this action was wholly unconstitutional and void as an assumption to delegate general legislative authority. (Wyeth v. Cambridge Board of Health, 200 Mass. 474, 481.)

In the State of Maine it was held likewise that the Legislature could not delegate to the Governor the power to create the office of special attorney for the State to prosecute infringements of the liquor laws, because the creating of offices is a legislative function, while appointments to the same may be executive. (Young v. Butler, 105 Me. 91.)

So it has been held repeatedly that the Legislature cannot grant law-making powers to the courts, as in Nebraska, where the Legislature undertook to shirk its duties by delegating to the courts the power to regulate or prohibit the liquor traffic. (Re Phillips, 52 Neb. 45.)

In Wisconsin, the Legislature passed a dog law and attempted to give county commissioners authority to suspend the law or put it in force in their respective counties at their discretion. Held, that this was wholly void, and the court remarked that the Legislature "could no more confer such a power than to authorize the board of supervisors of a county to abolish in such county the days of grace on commercial paper, or to suspend the statute of limitations." (Slinger v. Henneman, 38 Wis. 504.)

There is one notable exception to the rule, which exception permits cities and towns to make ordinances and by-laws of a purely local nature in the way of police regulations, limiting personal rights and the rights of property in the interest of the public health, public morals, and public safety; also, strictly defined, for the general welfare. Such a delegation was made to the Commission on the Height of Buildings in the city of Boston, whose action in prescribing the lawful height to which buildings might be erected in districts delineated by them was held as a police regulation by duly constituted authority. (Welch v. Swasey, 193 Mass. 364.)

This exception, the courts say, is founded upon the immemorial practice of this country and of England. It also has constitutional authority in our own State, as construed by some. Upon this theory also rests a numerous line of instances of the delegation of similar regulating powers to such boards as park commissioners, as in Brodbine v. Revere (182 Mass. 598), where the board was held to have received a valid grant of authority to make rules and regulations for the government and use of the boulevards under its care; also to police boards, as in Commonwealth v. Plaisted (148 Mass. 375), where the board of police of the city of Boston was held to have been given valid authority to make rules and regulations concerning itinerant musicians.

There is also another line of cases which look very much like the delegation of power to legislate, where the courts hold that the powers given are only administrative in their nature, and not legislative. Such are the instances of State and local boards of health in making rules and regulations, for the disobedience of which the Legislature has prescribed penalties. Another instance is shown by the case of Codman v. Crocker (203 Mass. 146), where the Legislature had determined that a subway should be constructed by one of two routes, and left to the Boston Transit Commission the decision as to which would be the better. The court held that this decision was administrative and not legislative, and that the power given to the commission was valid.

There are many cases of this sort which are very near the line, and the courts of the various States are not wholly in accord in deciding what is legislative and what is administrative.

It is fair to say that the tendency of the times is in the direction of a pretty liberal treatment of the subject in favor of upholding the Legislature in giving what are held generously to be administrative powers.

But no State yet has set up another little Legislature, such as this resolution proposes in behalf of the Governor's Council. Let us not do so here. Let us leave the Legislature with its ancient powers and duties, which it is bound to exercise, and for the proper and complete discharge of which its members are held responsible to the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The delegates may recognize in this resolution the fruit of efforts in which I have shared, to meet conditions that have brought to all the other States of the Union the same perplexities and the same evils that they have brought to our own State. I recognize that in the closing hours of this Convention, — or at any rate when approaching the closing days, — I have the difficult task of getting the attention of men who, like myself, already are weary of these problems. I realize, sir, that I also have the difficult task of confronting that spirit of conservatism which my friend from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) has so admirably illustrated. I have listened with the utmost care to what he has said. I have hoped as he went on from sentence to sentence that I might see in his remarks some ray of hope, some suggestion of advance, at least some realization that there is any evil in the world with which to combat; and I have failed to hear from my friend a single constructive sentence, phrase or word. What help is there from destructive criticism of this sort? There has been no measure in this Convention that could not in the same way have been dissected, in the same way have been excoriated; and is it true that the sentiments he conveys shall deaden us to the point where we shall go forth and tell the people that we have no remedy to suggest for the ills under which they suffer?

He repeated the frequent declaration: "We pass too many laws." Sir, the laws that are passed are in response to the appeals of the people. The laws that are passed are to redress the grievances of between three and four million human beings who constitute the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. These petitions come from the great masses of humanity in this State. They are not, save in very small degree, instigated by members of the Legislature. The business is brought to the Legislature. There most of you have served, and there you have done what you conceived to be your duty in trying to redress grievances.

Let me ask the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) if in his term of service in this State House or if since then he ever raised his voice in protest against these laws. Has he as a citizen come here and in any specific instance said: "This ought not to have been done"? Let him take the Blue Book. Let him run through it page by page and point out a single law for which he will say there was no demand or that ought to be repealed. If he admits the facts, he will recognize that the Blue Book is made up of answers to the people which have been given by their representatives and approved for the most part by their Governor.

On previous occasions I have taxed the patience of the Convention by detailing the evils that are to be met, and at this time I will not weary you by undue repetition thereof, but simply summarize the situation. I will point out what gentlemen who have served in the Legislature years ago find it very hard to realize, — the enormous growth of business. Why, sir, a generation ago, in the year 1880, there were presented to this General Court but 648 measures; in 1914 there were presented 3,439. Think of that growth in one generation, from 648 measures to more than 3,400 measures, a fivefold growth of business in a third of a century! When my friend from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) and I were together in the General Court in the year 1899 there were 1688 bills; in 1914 there were 3,439, an increase of more than double since he and I here began to share the making of laws.

In the first place, sir, the volume of business is, — shall I say an evil? — not an evil, but a problem which we this morning are to face, if you choose, or to evade, if you prefer. The growth of this business, other gentlemen at previous sessions have pointed out, is due to the enormous growth in the activities of the State. There is no prospect of the stopping or even of the lessening of this growth. Year after year there will be more and more grievances of the people to be corrected. More and more will the problem burden, perplex and harass our representatives.

With that problem have come everywhere certain admitted evils, and they are due almost wholly to three classes or bills, those that are local, special or private. To them may be traced practically all the venality that curses American legislation, not our own to anything like the degree found elsewhere, yet everywhere local, special, private bills bring in their train the temptation to use money. To these bills may be traced practically all the work of the lobby, which we have attempted to combat. To them may be traced nearly all the logrolling which every man who ever served in this chamber knows to be its greatest abuse. To them may be traced much of the burden that now is imposed upon the executive, who must pass judgment upon an enormously larger number of measures than ever before. To them may be traced the failure of the Legislature to accomplish its work adequately in the time at its command. Will any gentleman say that it can handle 3,400 measures in the same number of weeks that it formerly gave to 600 measures, and perform the task with equal efficiency? If you increase your work fivefold and do not increase the length of your sessions, — they are not now appreciably longer than they were a generation ago, — is it not manifest that each one of these measures can receive only one-fifth of the attention it would have received a generation ago? Is it not, as the first speaker said, astonishing that our Legislature under these conditions does such admirable work? Is it not marvelous that a system of government so strained at every turn can meet the demands of the people with as little criticism as this may justly receive?
Other States long ago began to attempt to meet these evils. Georgia started the struggle in 1789, with a constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of certain special laws. Louisiana in 1845 led in taking out of Legislatures the passage of special acts of incorporation. With these examples before them, other States have sought a remedy in specific prohibition and now have in some cases twenty-five or thirty classes of measures that are constitutionally forbidden. This remedy has proved worse than the disease. Everywhere it has produced a great volume of litigation. It has rendered the law uncertain. It has led to evasions which of themselves prove that the prohibitions are unwise. It has shown itself a completely inadequate remedy. The method of attack is based upon a wrong assumption. It is based upon the assumption that all special, local and private laws are bad, which is not true. These laws are but exceptions to general rules, and general rules must have exceptions. Go to your courts of equity. They exist for the purpose of making exceptions. Equity, sir, justice, the redress of grievances, demand these opportunities to meet evils resulting from the impossibility of forecasting all situations and adapting general laws to meet all needs. I should deprecate very much any proposal to imitate these other States in following that line of remedy.

What remedy may we seek? Shall we invent? Shall we try something new? Shall we sit down with a clean slate and attempt to create new methods, new policies, new devices? That is not the Massachusetts habit. That is nowhere the right course. All useful things in political science are growths. They are developments. They go from precedent to precedent, and thus broaden slowly down. And so here let us seek the remedy in building upon that which exists.

A hundred years ago our fathers found it was no longer possible for the General Court to make all the laws for the growing centers of population, and they said: "We will create cities and to them we will leave matters of local detail, transferring to them the ordinance-making power." So an amendment to the Constitution was adopted, authorizing the charter of cities, and thus relieving the General Court of a not inconsiderable burden of detail. Again, with the spread of the activities of the State the time came when it was apparent that their detail no longer could be handled wisely by the Legislature itself, and it began to create commissions and transfer to them the enactment of rules and regulations, what I may call "lawlets" for want of any better name, the minutiae of government.

These matters are in the twilight zone between that which the Constitution permits and that which it refuses. My friend from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) has admirably set forth the doctrine of the delegation of powers and the attitude of the courts thereon. Every lawyer knows that delegated power cannot be delegated. The moment the General Court began delegation it invited danger. The courts began to pass judgment, and had my friend pursued his studies still further he would have found a multitude of cases throughout this country where the courts have been perplexed by the difficulty in discriminating between the delegations of power that may and those that may not be justified. However, we proceeded on the assumption that to a certain degree we might delegate to boards, commissions, and like agencies. Furthermore, we turned to another body that could relieve the Legislature in some measure. We began delegating to the Governor's Council. Let me reiterate what the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Bosworth) called to your attention. In document No. 365 you may find 15 pages of powers delegated to the Council in three years,—15 pages, nearly 50 instances a year, of such delegation. Therefore in recognizing what already is and in building upon it there is nothing novel, nothing strange.

It must be manifest upon a moment's consideration that to impose on 280 men the necessity of passing judgment on all the minutiae of governmental work could not long be endured. In the case of cities, commissions, the Council, we have transferred much of this minutiae to small continuous bodies. Only in this direction could there be relief. We all know that such has been the conclusion of the business world. Every board of directors illustrates the thesis. Small bodies sitting at frequent intervals throughout the year are found wise to handle the details of commercial enterprises, yes, and fraternal, philanthropic and religious enterprises. All the social activities of mankind are handled now by small bodies in continuous session or sitting at frequent intervals throughout the year, except in this one respect where we still forget the world has moved. In this one matter of law-making we still refuse to accept the inevitable. We of Massachusetts still say that a body of 280 men should handle many little as well as big things.

Other bodies might have been created. I admit I came here with the hope that it might be possible to alter the Senate so that it should be transformed into a small body sitting continuously, but the suggestion met with slight approval. It was too novel. There might have been suggestion, also, as has been urged in many of the western and southern States, that the commission form of government be substituted. Several Governors already have committed themselves to that policy, and it may be that after the war you will see the commission idea extended to State government in many parts of the Union. This I confess is abhorrent to me, for the commission idea of government so intermingles the powers of government as to be fraught with danger. It might have been possible to direct that a small part of the Legislature itself, a subcommittee, be intrusted with handling the minutiae, but this, too, is a novel thing that would have met with no acceptance. It might have been urged that a new body be created, a new outside body, and here too novelty stood in the way. But at hand was found the Council, which already was doing some of this very work, and which by its constitution meets all the requirements. It is small. It sits the year round. It is representative. It is elected by the people. It contains members of both political parties. It is composed of honorable, upright men, of high standing in the community. And I regret even the suggestion that the delegation of power to it would result in its deterioration, for I am of the conviction that at least during our time the Council will continue to be the type of body that may be intrusted with the little things in government.

I realized, sir, from the very moment this was suggested, that it would encounter a prejudice against the Council which has been fostered by nearly every man ambitious to be Governor of this Commonwealth for more than a generation. The favorite attack of many a candidate has been to assert that if he came into power he would try to abolish the Council. But what has happened? Instead of abolition we find the Council given more and more power. Is not this a proof that the Council meets a want, that it fills a need, that your representatives, and your people, who control your representatives, recognize here an opportunity for much needed relief? The Council is not to be abolished. This Convention gave that program no attention whatever. You threw the proposal out of the window summarily, for it was evident that as conditions were, with the permanent tenure of office on the part of our judiciary, the Council would be preserved as a ratifying body. And so, sir, this Convention has decided that the Council shall live; and having decided that it shall live you are asked now to consider whether the duties intrusted to it by law by the Legislature shall be approved and the range of those duties shall be somewhat extended.

I realize another impediment in my path this morning, and that is in the length and the elaboration of the resolution before you. I fully agree with gentlemen whose views doubtless are expressed by my friend from Lexington who ordinarily sits on my right (Mr. Clapp), who will urge upon you a provision that shall simply authorize the Legislature to delegate power. I am as reluctant as any other man to put detail into the Constitution, and again and again have attempted to exercise what little influence I might have against that procedure. But, sir, here is a proposal dealing with the frame of government, of precisely the same nature as that which you may find now in the Constitution and its amendments, a proposal that carefully restricts in order to protect the rights of the people, a proposal that contains no superfluous words. It has received the earnest scrutiny and careful study of a large number of men experienced in public life; and their judgment, matured, ripened, well considered, may at least secure from this Convention, I am confident, that advantage which would put upon the somewhat unpremeditated and unconsidered amendments that may be urged the need of clearly proving their case. In the Legislature itself nothing is so dangerous as amendment. No harm ever is wrought comparing with that which is inflicted upon legislation by well-meant attempts, without due study and deliberation, to alter work that has received weeks and perhaps months of discussion and reflection from those intrusted with the duty. So, sir, I deprecate changes in this resolution, for the reason that it is the fruit of the best efforts that two of your committees have been able to command.

It has been urged by the previous speaker that we are giving dangerous powers. I wonder if he can have reflected upon the care with which this resolution has been guarded. Would he say that a measure which met the approval of the Governor, of the Lieutenant-Governor, and of every member of the Council who heard the case was a dangerous proposition, at least so dangerous that it ought not to have the force of law during the brief interval until the Legislature might repeal it? Let me point out to you the type of matters that we would want to handle in this manner.

Take the very first measure coming before each of several committees in the last Legislature.

Here [reading from the bulletin] is a petition of the selectmen of Wellesley that the town be authorized to increase the rate of interest to be paid on a water loan. Do gentlemen suggest that there would be danger in permitting the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor and every member of a majority of the Council in attendance to allow the rate of interest to be changed? And this is also an illustration of the need of sanctioning delegation of power, because no lawyer would pass bonds where the rate of interest had been changed by a body not authorized under the Constitution to make such a change.

Or take the first matter before the committee on Public Health, the petition of Edward Dahlborg that the time for registration of chiropodists be extended to March 1, 1918. Here was a measure that required the attention of 280 men in two branches, the advertising of a hearing, the attendance of the public at that hearing, the report of the committee, six readings, three in each house, finally the attention of the Governor. Do you mean to say that it is rash, dangerous, useless, to try to take such little things out of the Legislature?

Or here is the first measure before the committee on Counties, the petition of Charles L. Gifford and another that admission to the Barnstable County Infirmary be restricted to certain patients, and that certain improvements be made at the said infirmary. Or the one before Cities, a petition for a change in the charter of North Adams.

Or take an illustration from my own experience as a member of the Teachers' Retirement Board. When that board came into being I found, with my associates, probably the best law written on the subject. It seemed as if every contingency had been foreseen. There was in it a provision requiring that in case a teacher died before her retirement the money that she had paid toward her annuity should be refunded to her legal representatives. Does not that seem reasonable, natural, proper, right? Who could have expected trouble? Well, inside of three months a mother came to us. Her daughter had died, leaving $15 that she had paid into the annuity fund, and no other property. It would have cost $25 to $50 to take out administration. What were we to do about that $15? Finally we said to the secretary: "Go ahead and pay the $15, and if there is ever any question we will pay it out of our own pockets." That was not right, but the emergency, charity, sympathy, interest, whatever it may have been, prompted us to that promise. Inside of a year we found we had obligated ourselves for four or five hundred dollars, simply because the men who wrote the law did not foresee that in this one little detail trouble would come. There was nothing for us to do but to go to the Legislature for a bill. We had to take this ponderous machinery, we had to take all the methods that are used to alter the law, to secure the trivial change that would allow us to pay any sum under $100 to the person whom we might think entitled to it.

I pointed out to you that this measure simply proposes that if some trivial detail of the law, or indeed important detail if you wish, should receive the unanimous approval of the Council and the Lieutenant-Governor, who is ex officio a member, and the Governor, it may have the force of law until the Legislature sees fit to repeal it, provided, in case it is a local matter, that it is accepted by the municipality, which is the very acme of the principle of home rule. The resolution also declares that if any one man objects, — there is always a Democrat in the Council, and there is always some man who will render ready ears to any objector, — if any one man of the ten says this thing ought to be held over, it cannot go into effect until the Legislature has had an opportunity to reject it, — either branch of the Legislature. The House may annul it. The Senate may annul it. Either branch separately may annul it, thus giving the ampest opportunity. Sir, this measure does not take away one atom of power from the Legislature. It merely permits the Legislature to be relieved if the Legislature chooses not to exercise its control.

The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) likened this to the Orders in Council. It is true that the origin of this principle is English, but it is not to be found in the Orders in Council. His reading of history has gone far astray. This has nothing to do with the Orders in Council, either in historical or political relationship. The origin of this idea is to be found in the provision order system, begun in 1845, a system which has proved so admirable and so successful in its working that it has practically the unanimous support of all the thinking men of England. And just see what it has done, what this system has accomplished there. Why, in 1916 the Acts of Parliament for more than 400,000,000 human beings numbered 142. In Massachusetts for less than 4,000,000 the acts numbered 846. Parliament has succeeded in confining its discussions and its considerations to those broad questions of public policy that affect the fate of peoples. It has abandoned the attempt to use the ponderous, clumsy machinery of law-making, in order to determine whether the man who has been the second assistant driver of the patrol wagon of Worcester shall be reinstated in the public employ. It has abandoned the foolish attempt to handle little things by the ordinary processes of a huge law-making body. And that is a thing for which I plead, sir. I do not plead alone for the relief of the Legislature. I appeal for the relief of the people, for I believe, sir, that the people of this State desire that the attention of their representatives shall be freed from petty distractions in order that it may be centered upon the great problems of legislation.

Once before I have expressed the belief that the revolt of 1912 was not due to such impressions as my friend from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) may entertain, that there are too many laws, but it was due to the fact that there are too few of the big laws. The little things so choke the channels of legislation that the current cannot flow. The little things so disturb and distract the attention of the Legislature, members are so engrossed in advancing the particular interests of their own constituencies, they so forget their duty is first to the State, that they find no time left in which to answer the great complaints of the people.

It is true that this is a new step, it is a step in advance; but that, sir, if I conceive right, was the purpose for which this Convention was called.

New times demand new measures and new men;
The world advances and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' day were best,
And doubtless after us some better scheme
Will be worked out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.

We do not embody all wisdom, we are capable of error; but taking the line of normal progress moving in the natural direction, shall we not advance safely, reasonably and wisely toward better things? And if in this particular matter we have taken but this one step forward, we may go home to our constituents with the satisfaction that we at least have tried to do our duty. [Applause.]

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: I move the amendment printed under the name of the member from Lexington (Mr. Clapp). I do this at his request, as he is necessarily absent.

The amendment was to strike out lines 3 to 53, inclusive, and insert in place thereof the following:

The General Court may delegate to the Council the power to pass, with the approval of the Governor, and under such rules and limitations as the General Court shall prescribe, acts and resolves of a local, special or private nature, and orders for the carrying out of provisions of existing law, but all such acts, resolves and orders shall be subject to alteration, amendment or repeal by the General Court.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I have been listening to the interesting address of my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce). In fact, his addresses are always interesting. If my memory serves me right, this is the second edition; we heard the first edition at the last session, and now we have heard the second edition at this session, and it is equally interesting. He has called attention to various difficulties with regard to legislation. He has called your attention to certain special laws, and he has told you that it required so much time of the Legislature, it had to have six readings, etc. Now, I venture to say that if he would look those cases up he will find that a great many of them were passed under a suspension of the rules, and that it did not involve thirty minutes' discussion in both branches of the Legislature.

The object for this special legislation, or the object for coming to the Legislature, is perfectly plain and perfectly proper. Of course the General Court provides general laws wherever general laws are admissible,—general laws applying to all municipalities. Now, then, a municipality wants to do something beyond the scope of the general law, owing perhaps to local conditions. For illustration, some five or six years ago the authorities of my city went to the Legislature and asked for the right to borrow some $500,000 outside the debt limit to construct a whole litter of school-houses. That matter was presented to the Legislature and referred to the committee on Municipal Finance, if I remember correctly, and there was a public hearing and two people appeared before the committee to oppose it. They had the facts and figures, and they showed the committee that it was not necessary, that they did not need four or more school-houses, and that the city had plenty of resources to construct needed school-houses within the debt limit. That committee gave perhaps three hours' consideration to that proposition, and reported adversely, and the adverse report of the committee was accepted by both branches of the Legislature without debate. Since then the mayor and city government of Haverhill have found it was unnecessary to come to the Legislature to borrow money outside of the debt limit, for since that time they have constructed at least three school-houses and kept within the debt limit.

I remember some time in the early 90's that the town of Fairhaven wanted to put in a sewerage system. You know Fairhaven is opposite New Bedford, and whenever a town is near a city of course the town wants all the things that cities have. Well, they wanted a sewerage system. So they came to the Legislature and obtained the right to issue notes, bonds or scrip to meet the expense. After they got under way a crisis came over the country, as you remember, between 1892 and 1896, — a financial crisis. Business people were borrowing money at the bank and paying 10 and 12 per cent interest. The sewer commissioners and the selectmen of the town of Fairhaven found that they could not issue their bonds for twenty or thirty years at less than 7 or 8 per cent, and they very wisely took the other course and issued notes at 7 per cent, thinking that when the conditions were right, they would convert those notes into bonds. They discovered that they could not do it, and they came to the Legislature. Now, that matter went before the committee on Towns, I think, or Public Health, — I think that was in 1895, — and the Legislature granted them the right to refund their debt. They could not do it without that permission, because the Attorney-General had ruled that they had to issue notes, rather than bonds or scrip, and that they could not carry on a banking business. This was a proper solution.

There is nothing wrong in a city or town coming to the Legislature for special legislation. When the selectmen of a town or the mayor and board of aldermen of a city come to a Legislature and ask for extraordinary powers it gives its citizens an opportunity to come in and explain the reasons why their request should or should not be granted. In almost every instance these special laws that my friend has spoken of use up very little time in the Legislature, never, — hardly ever, — use up half an hour.

Of course, he says that there is an evil, because so many matters get into the Legislature. Well, now, certainly those matters do not come from outside of the Legislature. If he will look up the records he will find that out of the 3,000 matters introduced in the Legislature in 1914 nearly 80 per cent came from members of the Legislature. The people are not asking for these laws. It is the members of the Legislature. A man goes to the Legislature, it may be his first year, and he may have some prospects before him if he is not in a district where there are ten to fifteen towns. If he is in such a district he has to postpone his prospects for ten or fifteen years; but if he is in a district where there is an immediate future, he feels he ought to do something, so he commences to introduce bills, and I think I have called your attention to the fact that there have been members of the Legislature within the last ten years who have introduced anywhere from 75 to 150 bills, all printed at the expense of the Commonwealth. Of course they are worthless bills, nobody knows that better than the man who introduces them, but his name gets into the home papers every time he introduces a bill. People never read bills, they read the titles. Now, what happens? This happens: The legislative wheels are clogged with a mass of this worthless stuff.

When there is a proposition put in here to have the Legislature meet once in two years and cut this legislative grist in halves, where is my friend from Waltham? "Oh," he says, "we must give the people an opportunity to be heard every year. It is much better to have them come here, because it is a great thing to have this legislative mill working six months a year." And yet how quiet it is after the Legislature adjourns. Why, we have a recess from the Legislature now. People are not excited about it. There is no movement on foot for convening the Legislature that I have heard. The people are not up here demanding us to pass any of these proposals either; they are attending to their own business, and they want us to attend to ours, and they do not want us to trouble them with foolish and expensive propositions.

Permit me to call your attention to this provision: The Governor and Council are to pass a law when everybody seems to believe that it ought to be passed, that is, the petitioners, — mayors and selectmen, — and the Governor and the Executive Council all think that it is a wise and necessary thing to do, and after you provide for this you provide later that when the General Court come in they can repeal the statute that the Governor and Council and the petitioners agreed unanimously was right and proper. Yes, they can repeal it. If there are any people from that city or town who did not happen to get into the hearing before the Governor and Council, they can come to the Legislature and ask to have it repealed, and the Legislature can repeal it. I submit that there are a great many undertakings that mayors and selectmen might start, might get under way, and legislative interference of this sort might cause tremendous expense and a lot of inconvenience to cities and towns.

We are told that something must be done; we ought not to adjourn without doing something. Now, I do not think we ought to do something unless that something is worth while. What is the use of trying to do something that is worthless? Why, in 1902 we revised the statutes, and we had 226 chapters, two volumes of 1915 pages, with an index, with 570 more pages. Since then, and up to last year, we had passed 12,400 additional laws. And yet my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has introduced a proposition that we not only should extend the legislative authority to the Governor and Council, but we should give the right to the numerous commissions to do their own legislating.

What a proposition! To my mind, the proper body to pass laws is the Legislature, and the Legislature will be made up of the kind of men that the people choose. Now, that may not suit me, it may not suit the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce), but it will suit the respective districts that elect them.

I confess that there are difficulties. In the first place, we unfortunately have confined our efforts to get rid of a certain kind of quack doctors. I have observed during my lifetime that the quack doctors are not all limited to the medical profession, and yet the Legislature never has taken any interest in any other kind of quack doctors except the doctors of medicine. Quack doctors you find everywhere, — the A.B.'s, and the LL.D's, and the D.D.'s, and above all the Ph.D.'s, have their share, — and sometimes they get into the Legislature and they introduce all sorts of laws.

I do not want to cast any reflections upon my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce), because I am very fond of him personally, and I have a very high regard for his ability, but I do not have that same regard for his judgment. The gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) came into the Legislature I think in 1900. That year it cost $7,600,000 to run this State. He stayed in the Legislature nine years, and the year he left it cost $12,400,000 to run the State, and if I remember correctly he did his full share of introducing a lot of expensive things that helped increase the cost of government. His argument was just the same then as now: "We want something new." He did not say then that we wanted new men; he was not then an aspirant for Congress, but: "We want new men now, and we must do something."
Now, that has been the trouble with the Legislature for the last fifteen years; it has been after something new. They changed over all of our primary and election laws, and that added $1,000,000 a year to the current expenses of our State. I do not remember a single instance while my friend was in the Legislature in which he took any solid ground toward curtailing the expenses of the Commonwealth. I submit that men who have been in the Legislature a long series of years, and who have been doing what everybody else has been doing, spending money, trying new and expensive ventures, impracticable, many of them, ought not to come in here and set themselves up as leaders to those of us who come from the country. I think that a man ought to serve time somewhere, — I mean to good advantage. If, while in the Legislature, he has shown that he has helped produce something, that he has helped make this government efficient, that he has helped curtail the expenses of government, then I say that I extend to him the right hand of fellowship; but if he has been voting for all these notions, and has been responsible for all these laws, and has helped cause all these extra expenses, and then comes in here and asks us to let down the bars and to take on some other legislative body, like the Governor and Council, and then let all the departments legislate for themselves, why, I do not think that we ought to accept that sort of condition.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: In this last week of the session [laughter], as I hope it is and shall contribute so far as I can to make it, I do not propose to discuss anything; but I feel bound to give the Convention in a word my view of this resolution, which in my opinion has already answered its only useful purpose in bringing my friend from Springfield in the fourth division (Mr. Bosworth), from whom the Convention ought to have heard a great deal more, out of his self-imposed obscurity, and in being the occasion, if not the cause, of another burst of the eloquence of my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) for which he is so remarkable, and which one of these days will contribute so much to illuminate the pages of that American classic the Congressional Record. [Laughter and applause.]

Let me say first, that I extremely dislike to criticize a measure in which intelligent men, men who are entitled to respect, appear to have faith, though I must say that their attitude reminds me of the Sunday-school boy's definition, that faith is "believing what we know ain't so." The situation out of which the resolution arises, familiar to everybody, agreed on by everybody, is the intolerable, insufferable uisance of perpetual petty legislation, from which I believe the Commonwealth of Massachusetts probably suffers more than any other community on the face of the earth. There is no doubt about the evil. Now, what is proposed as the remedy? For the evil of too much legislation, it is proposed to create another Legislature, and have two whereas now we have but one, — to establish a little pocket Legislature, so to speak, a Legislature which can be and will be in perpetual session at all seasons of the year, and in session behind the door, for you can never concentrate public attention upon the proceedings of this pocket Legislature, this Governor and Council sitting to make little laws.
There is one thing, and there is but one, which possibly might make such a scheme of some practical consequence and effect to reduce the legislative nuisance and shorten the sessions of the Legislature, and that is to delegate, if you please, to the Governor and Council the sole and exclusive power of dealing with local or special legislation. If you do that, I agree that you will do something toward abridging the sessions of the Legislature. But nobody would think of that for a moment. Even my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) in his most exuberant moods would not propose that. And so long as you leave the door still open to the Legislature as a court of appeal for every one of these measures which it is proposed to send first to the Governor and Council, you have made the matter worse instead of better. Every interest that goes to the Governor and Council and gets what it wants will be appealed against to the Legislature by its opponents, and every interest that goes and does not get what it wants will then appeal for it to the Legislature. That is the way it is bound to work.

If I could select one thing to say here which I should like every one of the three hundred members of this Convention to remember and reflect upon it is this: Having had to watch the process of legislation in Massachusetts for many years, both from the inside and the outside, as closely perhaps as any man now living, I have come to the fixed conviction that there is but one way of abridging or reducing the legislative nuisance, as I may fairly call it, of which everybody admits that our long-suffering Commonwealth is a perpetual victim. You can cut it in half at one stroke by establishing biennial sessions of the Legislature, and you cannot materially reduce it by any other known device. Every Legislature of the last generation has been trying to invent schemes to curtail the volume of legislation and cut down the length of the legislative sessions. They have all failed, as they are bound to so long as the Legislature tries to hear everything and everybody, and the more of them attempted, the bigger the Blue Book grows year by year and the longer the legislative sessions. But the procession of the seasons has fixed a natural limit beyond which a session of the Legislature is not likely to extend. It will never run very far into the heat of the summer, and it will not run any farther into the summer in every other year than it now does in every year, as the biennial States have proved. The only remedy for the evil which this resolution cannot cure is to hasten the day of biennial sessions, and upon that remedy the Convention in its wisdom has already turned its back and thrown away the opportunity of doing one thing that would have gone far to justify its existence.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: When the original proposition came before the committee on State Administration last fall that committee was unanimous, I think, against the proposal, and it happened that I was selected to be in charge of the adverse report. At that time the Convention saw fit not to accept the adverse report, but to recommit the matter ultimately to the two committees sitting jointly, in order to see if something might come out which would remedy the evils which have been admitted on all hands. When this final proposal came before those committees I found myself opposed to it in its present form. It did not seem to me, however, that the matter ought to be smothered in committee, and so I did not formally dissent, but did what I was told was the other course to pursue, and that was reserve my rights. It seemed to me that a matter should be reported to this Convention that, as the previous speaker has demonstrated, has had very serious consideration by very many people and is carefully intended to cure an evil. As it lies in my mind now, I am opposed to the proposition. I think there is sufficient merit in the suggestion of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp's amendment), so that the Convention, perhaps, may well pass on that amendment as a substitute, so that the subject can be considered further, because I think we should not lightly throw out on a second reading a serious proposal calculated to take care of a serious evil. It may well be that there is sufficient merit in the Clapp amendment, simply as it is, so that it will permit the Legislature to hand over purely administrative matters, not controversial matters of legislation in the ordinary sense, not matters of real legislation, but purely administrative matters. Now, as I take it, the Clapp amendment permits the Legislature to hand over simply that type of thing, and it may be that that will prove wise. I think we should be careful, therefore, not to throw this whole thing out of the window. And so, as I say, having reserved my rights against the main proposition, I shall vote for the Clapp amendment on this stage and see if we cannot get something out of it.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge moved to amend the amendment moved by Mr. Wellman (printed in the calendar under the name of Mr. Clapp) by striking out, in the second line, the word "special".

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I have only one word to say, namely, that "special" may be a legal term, understandable by all the members of the Convention. It certainly carries no particular meaning to my mind. I am not aware that we have a system of special legislation in this State. I speak under favor, subject to correction by a legal mind. The amendment of Mr. Clapp is an excellent amendment and a capital substitute for the long, involved and difficult main question. It seems to me it would simplify his amendment. If he were here I presume he would accept it.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: With a very large portion of everything that has been said this morning I entirely agree. To certain propositions I cannot assent. During the past twenty years everybody has been satisfied that the Legislature was overburdened, and during those years the Legislature has passed as many general laws as it has thought wise. How is it possible for the Legislature not to be overburdened now, when it must do twice the work in the same time, because, as has been suggested, the seasons determine the date of adjournment?

One of our most learned members seems to be scared for fear we are setting up here an English privy council. How can that be possible when any act passed even unanimously by a Governor, Lieutenant-Governor and Council, any minor statutory order, is to be subject to annulment at the next session of the Legislature by one mere vote in either branch? I frankly suggest that some members simply object to the length of this proposal, yet all that we intend, all that we hope, is to provide a channel down which it will be possible to pass many matters that take up much valuable time. Perhaps most of them need only a few minutes, — a few half hours. We know such periods add up here. They add up in the same way in the months from January to June. That is all that we intend to do, — merely provide another channel.
The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Tatman) clearly showed us how serious is one feature of the problem. The Legislature cannot to-day delegate any of its legislative powers, as such, to anybody. We want it clearly permitted to delegate minor, immaterial, legislative powers, but not made to surrender any right that it chooses to keep for itself. That is all we recommend.

Now with regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp). It has no teeth in it. If there was a "shall" in it somewhere, I personally think, —I will not say the committee thinks, because I must speak solely for myself on this suggestion, — that something might be worked out of it that would be excellent; but as long as it reads merely "may" it cannot be made very valuable.

Now I do not speak solely for myself when I say one thing more. The committee has reported an amendment which gives immediate life to all matters that are voted unanimously by the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor and the acting Councilors. But such life is purely temporary. It ceases instantly upon an adverse vote in either branch of the Legislature. Though this grant seems to us wise, we have no objection to its elision. The committee understands perfectly that I will not defend upon this floor any measure that to any substantial number of this body seems to lessen or take away from the Legislature any real right.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Hart) would modify a phraseology familiar in Constitutions and to lawyers, and therefore would expose whatever the Convention may decide upon, if anything, to unfortunate dangers. Retaining the customary phraseology, the amendment of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) gives permission, which may or may not be exercised. The Legislature of 1914, in an attempt to meet the situation, created a special committee headed by the President of the Senate, Mr. Henry G. Wells, known as one of the most conservative men in the State, and the House Chairman was Representative Bothfeld, equally a man of caution and prudence. It recommended thirty-eight moderate changes. About one-third of these proposals,—the trivial and unimportant ones,—have been accepted. No important change has been made. The Legislature will not lose its grasp on power. Such bodies always want to hold petty power more than they want to hold big power. The Legislature will not let go of petty power if it can be avoided, and therefore a merely permissive measure such as that of the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) is a tolerably innocuous and harmless sop to Cerberus.

Mr. friend from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), for whose pleasant words I am ever grateful, has once more urged the Convention to consider matters that it already has rejected. Biennial sessions as a remedy seem to me as unreasonable a proposal as can be made, a proposal to meet a situation caused by pressure of work with a remedy that shall lessen the opportunity to do the work. As if the board of directors of the Boston Elevated Railway Company, when it began to find itself in straits, said: "We will meet this distressing situation by having our sessions only once in six months instead of every day," or whatever increase of interval might have been favored. The absurdity of that remedy, already proved in every State that has tried it, by the testimony of the most serious and thoughtful men, throws us back upon this simple question: With a Legislature overburdened, shall relief be permitted?

My friend from Haverhill (Mr. George) has gone very far astray in his declaration that nearly eighty per cent of the measures before the Legislature come from the members themselves. Careful, scientific analysis shows precisely the contrary to be true. The great bulk of the petitions come from the people for the redress of grievances and for the granting of other perfectly legitimate demands. This increase in the volume of law-making simply attests the increase in the complexity of society. The great changes of the last generation are reflected in this desire for attention from the makers of law.

Sir, because the world has changed, because the demands of the community have changed, because the needs of the time have changed, your committees have urged upon you a remedy. This remedy is so carefully safeguarded, so completely restricted, that safety is spelled all through it. If there is danger in change in and of itself there is danger in this; but pray where can there be danger in taking a practice already established, in elaborating a practice to which the General Court now resorts on the average fifty times a year, in giving it the stamp of constitutional approval, and permitting its reasonable, moderate extension to meet the demands of the times?

The amendment moved by Mr. Hart was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Wellman was rejected, by a vote of 30 to 103.

The resolution (No. 409) was rejected Tuesday, August 13, 1918, by a vote of 55 to 94.

The committees on State Administration and the Executive, sitting jointly, reported, Tuesday, July 30, 1918, the following new draft (No. 410), based in part on the resolution No. 269 which had been referred to them:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2 tion by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 All petitions for the passage of legislation relating to 4 local, special or private matters shall be filed with the 5 Secretary of the Commonwealth on or before December
6 first or such other date or dates as the General Court
7 may require, and the Secretary shall forthwith transmit 8 a copy of the same to that department or agency of the 9 Commonwealth which in his opinion exercises functions 10 embracing the subject-matter thereof. In conformity to 11 such rules and regulations as may be established by the 12 General Court such department or agency shall make 13 written report thereon, and until such report has been 14 received the General Court shall not consider such 15 petition unless admitted by not less than a two-thirds 16 vote of the members of each branch present and voting 17 thereon. The General Court shall have full power to 18 determine what petitions relate to local, special or 19 private matters.

The resolution was read a second time Tuesday, August 13; and it was rejected the same day, by a vote of 44 to 56.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: I have had the misfortune to address the Convention a number of times, and on this particular matter I feel moved to address it very shortly again on the phenomenon which the Convention developed immediately before the recess. Here is a condition. It is admitted by everybody, as I understand it, that the present condition of things is intolerable, that it is impossible to maintain this present condition permanently, because the conditions are so bad and growing so much worse that the affairs of the State will stop unless we do something. There have been made various suggestions as to how these conditions can be remedied, and the Convention will have nothing to do with any of them.

That I take to be the position which the Convention has held ever since we met, practically on every subject excepting one,—except one subject, and that is the question of the handling by the State of our natural resources. That was a distinct step forward. It prepared the way for this step. To take a plunge forward. That is the condition that the State has got to face.

Mr. EDWIN U. CURTIS of Boston: Do not forget the I. and R.

Mr. ADAMS: I do not think anything ever will be done with the I. and R. I think that is a perfect negation.

Now, here we are. Ever since we have come into this Convention I have been intimating gently to the Convention that I thought that this war was bringing matters to a point where, not only to this State but to the world in general, a stimulant was about to be applied which it would find very difficult to resist. That is to say,—the world in general was going to be projected forward with a violence which would cause it to wake up. In other words, I always have believed that the condition has got to be met somehow. It is useless for us to hang back; we cannot do it.

This situation reminds me, if I may be permitted to refer to such a matter,—it is rather a light story, but it is a story of Mark Twain. Mark Twain related that in Michigan one day toward nightfall he stumbled upon a loggers' camp. The loggers were at their supper and he sat with them to take their supper, and the loggers' were talking about various things, but particularly they were boasting about their dogs. One logger absorbed attention as he explained what a remarkable dog he had, and how that dog one day in a field found an otter. A river ran through the middle of the field and the dog was close on the otter, and the otter jumped into the river and swam across the river, and the dog swam after him. When the otter got to the other side of the river the dog was close upon him and it opened its jaws to devour the otter, whereupon the otter climbed a tree. Some one of his hearers objected that an otter could not climb a tree. Said the logger: "By God, he had to." [Laughter.]

That is the position that you are in. By God, you have got to,—you have got to climb your tree. We all in this State have got to climb our trees. There is no get out, no escape; it is that or be devoured.

We sit here and debate as to whether or not we are going to have this thing or that thing or the other thing, whether we are going to take this mode of escape or that mode of escape or the other mode of escape. But we have got to come down in the end; we have got to get rid of all this old, elaborate, complicated theory of representative government with its dry-nurse of courts and lawyers which everybody knows is exploded. Everybody knows that the thing is dead; we cannot get along with it. It will not move, it cannot march. It is like the otter which declines to move. All the same, he must move, he has got to move or he goes. You have got to get rid of your representative government. We are put in that position where we have got to have these measures passed and they have got to make law. And I ask you, Mr. President, and I ask this Convention, to watch how the world is doing it. What do we care for law? We do not care one button for law, not one straw for law. All the work that the world is doing is lawless. There is not any part of it but is lawless. Here in the United States we are doing a mass of legislation of all kinds and we are making a great revolution in the condition of property, and there is no law in it, none whatever, and there never will be. There is no law in it but force, — absolute brute force, and we have got to recognize it, and the sooner we recognize it the less we shall suffer in the end. Every nation about once in, — oh, well, a century or two, — all the nations of the world, come to a point where they have to recognize a great revolution in the condition of property and in the condition of classes. And if I may be permitted to indulge in reminiscence for a moment, I very well remember when that great truth was first brought home to me. It was, as well as I remember, about five-and-twenty years ago or more, when I happened to be in France, and I happened to be in Angers in France. Wandering about the city I walked up the central hill in Angers. A lane leads or led to the top of the hill, and at the top of the hill there was a very charming chapel which was dedicated to the Virgin, with a statue of the Virgin at the west door looking down the lane. On each side of the lane there flowed an open sewer, an open drain, and the weather was very hot and I sat down in the shadow of the Virgin and I looked at the Virgin and I looked at the drain. And gradually the idea dawned on me that in the beginning of the fourteenth century, when that chapel was built, pretty nearly all the liquid capital of France was invested in chapels to the Virgin, on the theory that the Virgin was going to protect them from disease. Well, it was about a century before that that in Jerusalem, or the kingdom of Jerusalem at least, the Crusaders had fought the battle of Tiberias and had been defeated, and the Virgin had not been able to protect them and had not been able to protect anybody else or herself, and the Saracens had captured the true cross and had taken Jerusalem and they had knocked on the head the whole theory of the miraculous power of the Virgin to intervene in behalf of mortals. All this vast investment of capital depreciated, exactly in the same way that now we are going through a process of depreciation.

Now no human being could stop the disaster to the Crusaders. It came. It was one of the things that were inevitable, and having come it had to be accepted; and we have got to accept the position that we are in, and we have got to accept the change in our property, and we have got to accept the change in the holding of our property, and we have got to accept the change, the manner in which those holdings are legalized. That is to say, we have got to accept the whole process of the revolution of law which underlies all revolutions in property.

My business in this Convention has been to try to point out that revolution in law, and how we have got to face that revolution. We cannot escape it. The courts must be gotten out of politics. They cannot be allowed any longer to obstruct the movement of the world. We were talking this morning of this very thing, how the courts were sitting here, the courts were sitting there, and the courts were saying that the Legislature could not do this, and the Legislature could not do that, and the Legislature could not do the other thing. The Legislature has got to distribute its powers. It has got to distribute its powers as the necessity of the moment demands, and we have got to reconcile ourselves to it, let the courts say what they will.

Now, the common-sense thing for us to do, if we can reconcile ourselves to it, is to put the executive in such a position that it can do this legislation, and that we stop messing with all these questions about how we are going to help the Legislature do it. The Legislature is like a dying animal. Representative government with grandmother courts is like an agonizing animal, and it has got to be replaced by something with vitality in it.

Now I suppose it is perfectly absurd for me to say to you, put in a government like Wilson's government. It does not make any difference what you think about it. It does not make any difference whether the courts are going to stand up and tell you that you cannot do that thing. Throw the courts over, — you can! Do it without the courts. That is what Wilson has done. Go ahead without the courts and do it, — but do it, do it! Get an apparatus which will work, and it will cost you less in the end. [Applause.]

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: So far as I am concerned but little time will be taken in discussion of resolution No. 410. It is offered as another aid to the overburdened General Court. Many members here should have opinions as to its probable practical workings which I should value much more highly than my own.

Among the 2,000 to 3,000-odd petitions that annually afflict the Legislature are very many relating to local, private and special matters which never should be filed. If the petitioners knew that they would undergo automatically the scrutiny of some department they would be less enthusiastic and their number would be reduced. On nearly all local, special and private matters some department already has at hand fairly full information.

Now the individual committee-man digs it out as he is able and the General Court listens while he imparts his version thereof.

This resolution contemplates two things: The giving of this information direct to every member and the probable reduction in the total number of petitions. It gives to all legislators directly and authoritatively any knowledge of the subject that may be in any department, and the only substantial requirements are that petitioners shall file their bills early and the General Court shall withhold action until the departments have had reasonable time to report thereon.

The Legislature has absolute control of the whole amendment, even to the right to suspend it by a two-thirds vote. It is planned for its convenience and not for its annoyance.

Some one may object that this getting of information from the executive branch tends to executive interference with purely legislative functions. This point is not well taken. We have learned from the professors who claim to be experts upon such things that some gentleman, presumably not a professor, preceding De Tocqueville, nearly wrecked American civilization by discovering and loudly proclaiming something that is not so, — namely: That the success of the English government came from a complete separation of the executive, legislative and judicial functions.

That was believed fully in 1780, and we almost can recite the ringing admonition of the last sentence of the Bill of Rights. We ninety-nine per cent believe it to-day. Yet all that it says is that the powers of one branch never shall be exercised by another.

Truth, justice, human nature, and common sense change very little either through the ages or in 140 years. John Adams never intended to put a premium upon ignorance or to bar the General Court from any source of correct information.

It would be just as wise to urge that legislators should not read the opinions of the other coördinate branch, the Supreme Judicial Court, lest their minds be corrupted.

One point remains: Why should this be in the Constitution rather than in the joint rules of the two Houses?

Two controlling reasons occur to me. First, the resolution purposes a slight curtailment of our ancient traditional right of petition; second, it puts upon one branch, the executive, the duty of giving information and perhaps advice to another, the legislative branch, and I respectfully submit that in their essence both these propositions are for this Convention and for the people.

In this experienced gathering it surely is not necessary to plead either for the lightening of the work or for the enlightenment of the minds of the legislators. If the resolution seems to your experience likely upon the whole to produce either of these desired results, I assume that you will vote for it; otherwise the sooner it is forgotten the better.
Mr. Horace I. Bartlett of Newburyport presented the following resolution (No. 88):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the following

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The Forty-second Article of Amendment of the Constitution is hereby annulled.

The committee on Initiative and Referendum reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted. It was rejected without debate Thursday, June 13, 1918.

On the following day Mr. Bartlett moved that the vote by which the resolution had been rejected be reconsidered.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Bartlett of Newburyport: No. 107 on yesterday's calendar is a matter providing for the referendum by the General Court, but in fact repealing the 42d Amendment, which allows referendum by the General Court. Yesterday I was absent unavoidably at the first part of the call, and on account of the error in the title it was not recognized to be what it is. I move to reconsider the action of the Convention whereby the proposal contained in document No. 88, being the matter numbered 107 on the calendar of June 13, was rejected. I would say that if it is desired not to interrupt the debate that was going on last night I would agree that this motion of mine might lie on the table. I desire simply that it may hold a place to get that reconsidered. If it is in order I would move that that motion be laid on the table.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: This proposal to amend the Constitution concerning which the motion was made provides that "the 42d Article of Amendment to the Constitution is hereby annulled." That provision is in the amendment for the initiative and referendum which the Convention already has voted to submit to the people next November. Under these circumstances I feel called upon at this time to question the policy of establishing a table. The Legislature some years ago reached the conclusion,—or rather the House of Representatives reached the conclusion,—that expedition ought to discourage laying matters on the table; and my impression is that since that time the table has not been used, at any rate to any considerable extent, in the House of Representatives, the whole purpose being the expedition of business. Once again taking my position in behalf of this cause, which I trust may not prove unwelcome, I will urge the gentleman from Newburyport to present reasons why we ought to revive and put on the table a proposal that already has passed in the amendment that we have voted to submit to the people.
Mr. Bartlett: One reason why I do not want to take up the discussion now is that Mr. Thompson of Attleboro, who was the originator of the amendment which was put in the initiative and referendum measure, is detained unavoidably in Providence. Another is that I do not want to stand in the way of going on with the discussion of the judiciary matter at this time.

Mr. George of Haverhill: As I understand it, the gentleman from Newburyport (Mr. Bartlett) was not here yesterday, and it was an unusual thing for this Convention to go through the calendar. In his absence we accepted the report of the committee. He asks practically to have it considered as passed. We can save time by reconsideration and restore it to the calendar. When we reach it we then can treat it on its merits. I think it ought to be done for a man who was absent. He was not aware that there was going to be any call of the calendar. We shall save time by doing as he suggests without debate at this time.

Mr. Bartlett: The reason why it was not passed yesterday morning was this: I was detained from being here at the early part of the call for a reason most imperative. I was here probably within ten minutes after it was acted upon, and I have been here as consistently and often as any other member of this Convention. The matter is this: It is a proposal to repeal the 42d Amendment, which allows the legislative referendum. It was passed by this Convention as an amendment to and is in the present initiative and referendum measure to be submitted to the people. It went into that measure after it had been voted upon three times, and there is no question but that it is the will of this body that that should be repealed. But it should go also as a separate proposition, and that is the reason why I wish to have this reconsidered and have a debate.

The motion to reconsider was negatived.
XXXIII.
TITLE OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley presented the following order July 10, 1917:

Ordered, That the committee on Form and Phraseology consider the expediency of substituting for the words "General Court", wherever they occur in the Constitution, the word "Legislature", and for the words "Supreme Judicial Court", wherever they occur therein, the words "Supreme Court".

The committee on Form and Phraseology reported that it is expedient to substitute for the words "General Court", wherever they occur in the Constitution, the word "Legislature", except where the context makes the word "General Court" necessary; and that it is inexpedient to substitute for the words "Supreme Judicial Court", wherever they occur therein, the words "Supreme Court".

The report was considered by the Convention Wednesday, July 24, 1918.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the report be amended by the substitution of a "Resolution to make the designation of the Legislature uniform throughout the Constitution," as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:
Wherever the words "General Court" or "said court" are used in the Constitution or articles of amendment thereof as designating the Legislature of the Commonwealth, the word "Legislature" shall be substituted therefor.

This amendment was rejected.

The recommendation of the committee was rejected.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I move the resolution which appears in print at the middle of page 2 of to-day's calendar, according to notice previously given, and I will say a word in explanation after the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment cited above.

Mr. PILLSBURY: This is somewhat interesting though not a very important matter. The resolution which I move is in line with the report and recommendation of the committee and might very properly have been submitted by them, but they did me the honor of asking me to draw a resolution, and I have done so at their request.

The question is simply whether we shall discontinue the words "General Court" as the designation of the Legislature. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the General Court was a court and these words were appropriate to describe it. It had some functions of a court as well as of a Legislature, and for that reason the old Colonial term was carried into the Constitution, although it is a curious thing that John Adams, who is supposed to have made the draft, uses the word "Legislature" almost if not quite as often as the words "General Court" in the Constitution itself. But the Legislature is no longer a court in any proper sense of the word. It has ceased to have any general judicial powers or functions of a court. Indeed, since the adoption of the Constitution it has been nothing but a Legislature.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: The gentleman from Wellesley says that the Legislature is not a court, that its functions as a court have ceased. I recall the instances where a man by the name of Swig and a man by the name of Foster were tried by the General Court and courts were practically abolished by the General Court in trying two members of its own body. Now, how does he reconcile that action of the Legislature and then at the same time say that the Legislature is not a General Court?

Mr. Pillsbury: Unfortunately I was not able to hear all that the gentleman said, but it does not make the Legislature a court that it acts in a quasi-judicial capacity upon the right of members to their seats. I repeat what is common knowledge and what all the members of the Convention know as well as any of us,—that the Legislature has ceased to be a court in any proper sense of that term and is solely a law-making body, a Legislature, as John Adams called it about half the time. He appears to have used the word which was nearest the point of his pen at the time without attaching any importance to the distinction. "General Court" is two words instead of one and it does not accurately describe a Legislature. Indeed I remember once hearing a Justice of the Supreme Court at Washington inquire from the bench what a General Court was that was talked about in the briefs in this Massachusetts case, and he had to be told that it was our archaic description of the Legislature. There is no reason why we should not discontinue that obsolete term and make the designation of the Legislature uniform throughout the Constitution, by calling it in all cases what it is now called about half the time, and what it is all the time,—the Legislature. That is the only point involved in the resolution.

The question may suggest itself to members whether a formal amendment of the Constitution is necessary for the purpose. I am not absolutely clear that it is, as a practical matter. If the Legislature should enact at any session that in all future editions of the Constitution published by the Commonwealth the word "Legislature" should uniformly be used to designate the Legislature and the words "General Court" discontinued,—I think the executive officers of the Commonwealth might carry that into effect, so that the term "General Court" would disappear. But a Constitutional Convention may speak with somewhat more authority upon a question even of the form of the Constitution, or its phraseology, than the Legislature and the Legislature is not likely to assume the power. I think it quite possible that if this Convention should ordain, without submitting it to the people, that in all future editions of the Constitution the word "Legislature" shall be substituted for the words "General Court", that might be done, but the only certain way of effecting it seems to be by formal amendment. I have only to add that if the Convention favors the amendment on its merits, I should hope it would adopt the resolution, leaving to be considered hereafter, perhaps by the committee on Amendment and Codification or some other appropriate committee, the question whether it needs to be submitted to the people.

Mr. PARKMAN of Boston: I am old-fashioned enough to hope that the words "General Court" may be retained. It is perfectly true, as the gentleman from Wellesley has said, that the Legislature or the two branches have no longer the functions of a true court. But just as to the courts of the Commonwealth the individual goes to redress any grievance which he may have against some person, so the people of Massachusetts go to the General Court to redress any grievances which they may think they have. We call ourselves the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I believe there are only two or three other States of the Union which are called Commonwealths. I understand that we have the peculiarity of calling the Legislature the General Court. As I said, I am old-fashioned. I hope there may be others who like the term "General Court" where the people of the Commonwealth may go to redress their grievances. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of Lancaster: I am entirely in sympathy with the gentleman that we retain, especially in our Constitutional language, the phraseology of the past in which it had its origin. I am in doubt what in fact would be accomplished by the proposed change suggested by our honorable colleague from Wellesley. I understand that the most that could be attained by this improvement of phraseology, if it be such, would be to change the phrase of the Constitution itself. In other words, by this subsequent, ex post facto interpolation, we shall provide that wherever the term "General Court" appears in this ancient document of our faith it shall be read to mean and be the "Legislature." What avail is it for us by this retroactive process to change the phraseology of our original Constitution? If it were suggested that hereafter our legislative body, in all official documents and statements, should be referred to as the Legislature, so that we may have that definite and final terminology, something might be attained. But why should we attempt to better the phrases of the fathers of the Constitution, speaking only to an instrument of their creation? [Applause.]

Mr. PILLSBURY: I rose to ask my friend from Lancaster if he did not hear me say that the fathers of the Constitution themselves used the term "Legislature" in the Constitution itself about as often, perhaps quite as often, as they used the words "General Court". The proposition is not to make the designation of the Legislature different from theirs, but to make it uniform, and to make it that designation which is accurately descriptive, while the words "General Court" are not. And I greatly regret to see my friend from Boston (Mr. Parkman) and my friend from Lancaster (Mr. Parker) so unwilling to follow a progressive member of the Convention in truly progressive legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN of Brockton: I want to echo the contention of the gentleman from Wellesley. The fathers knew why they used both terms,—Legislature and the General Court. They always could have said "Legislature" if they had desired. I am opposed to the resolution.
Mr. Louis F. Delaney of Holyoke presented the following resolution (No. 103):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Every grant or franchise, privilege or immunity, shall forever remain subject to revocation, alteration, or amendment.

The committee on Public Affairs reported that the resolution ought not to be adopted (Mr. George W. Anderson, dissenting).

It was considered by the Convention Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Mr. Walter H. Creamer of Lynn moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 4, 5 and 6, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

Every act of incorporation, charter or franchise shall forever remain subject to revocation and amendment.

Mr. Robert P. Clapp of Lexington moved that the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "by the General Court".

The amendment moved by Mr. Clapp was rejected, by a vote of 77 to 88; the amendment moved by Mr. Creamer was adopted.

The Convention refused to reject the resolution, as had been recommended by the committee on Public Affairs; and it was ordered to a second reading Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Without further debate, the resolution was ordered to a third reading Friday, July 26, was passed to be engrossed Wednesday, August 7, and the Convention voted, Thursday, August 15, 1918, to submit the resolution to the people in the following form (No. 414):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Every charter, franchise or act of incorporation shall forever remain subject to revocation and amendment.

The amendment was ratified and adopted by the people Tuesday, November 5, 1918, by a vote of 161,833 to 79,787.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: My only reason for rising at the present moment, and I confess myself without any preparation, is the resolution recommended by Mr. Anderson of Brookline. It reads: "Every act of incorporation, charter or franchise shall forever remain subject to revocation and amendment." An attorney of the standing of Mr. Anderson would not have indorsed this resolution unless he thought there was some necessity for it.

It seems to me that the matter is an important one. There was a day in this Commonwealth when of course charters could be construed as in perpetuity, and up to the time of the decision in the Dartmouth College case they were subject, I think, to that construction. After that time most of our charters and grants do contain the provision "subject to any laws now in force or that may be hereafter enacted in relation to the same."

It must be that this provision now is discretionary, that it may or may not be inserted by the Legislature; but the intention of Mr. Anderson may well be that it should be placed in our Constitution as a fundamental principle that no corporation, no individual, shall obtain from the people an act in perpetuity. I again assert it is an important provision. Are you going to leave with the Legislature the power to grant to a corporation some privilege in perpetuity? Are we to be confronted with vested rights against the people's rights? I want to be corrected if I am wrong, and I am quite likely to be, but it is for the attorneys to correct me. My assumption, you will see, is that as the Constitution now stands the Legislature, acting for the people, may enact a privilege in perpetuity, it may omit the customary phrase in Massachusetts acts, — "subject to all laws that are now in force or may hereafter be enacted in relation to such corporations." It may omit that. Then if that is omitted, so far as I can understand the law, by the decision in the Dartmouth College case, there is a consideration, you have entered into a contract, the people have entered into a contract, and those who possess the charter, the grant, or the privilege have got it in perpetuity; you cannot take it away from them.

If this be true, I assert that it is quite essential that all members of this Convention, labor men and others, who call themselves progressive, and who are trying in some way to provide conditions for the uplift of humanity, should vote for this resolution; charters carrying privileges never should be granted in perpetuity. If some one else had asked recognition to speak on this resolution I certainly would have remained to listen to it, but I cannot remain silent here and see these matters gone over so rapidly and acted upon, with merely a reading of the title. One naturally supposes, when he sees a resolution in the calendar with a delegate's name attached, that when it is reached he will at least rise and say why he took up our time and the time of this Convention at the State's expense to have the matter go into the calendar, and then permit it to be killed without a word of explanation. Lo and behold, we find matters here that have been coming down in printer's ink during all the months that we have been here, passed for debate by some one down to the present time, and now being rapidly buried without anybody saying a word of grace over them!

There are members of this Convention, including myself, who would allow some resolutions to go without question; but when you come to an important principle printed in the calendar, one that Mr. Anderson has felt important enough to submit favorably for the consideration of the Convention, a recommendation that a provision ought to go into the Constitution, I think some member of that committee ought at least to say why it should be killed, as, apparently, it was going to be when I asked for recognition. Is it true that if this provision is not enacted corporations may have privileges in perpetuity, including natural resources? We have said so much about the Legislature, and we have said so much about the power of the lobby, and so much about the ability of these corporations to get things when the people are not looking, there is danger unless we now vote for this restriction. Now is the accepted hour. If you do not pass this restriction, then corporations may induce the Legislature to give them privileges in perpetuity. I do not know then where the people's rights would begin or end.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: On this matter the committee on Public Affairs was divided, as the Convention will note by the calendar, the division being in the proportion of one for the resolution and the rest against. The Dartmouth College case, to which the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) has alluded, established a rule with regard to corporate franchises which at the time threatened to place the creatures of the State above the State's power to change or alter. The Dartmouth College case was decided about the year 1819. In 1831, in Massachusetts, the following statute was passed, and it appears as section 3 of chapter 109 of the Revised Laws:

Every act of incorporation passed since the 11th day of March in the year 1831 shall be subject to amendment, alteration or repeal by the General Court.

It is not necessary to read the rest of that section, but that principle was enacted into law at that time, in the year 1831, and has remained the law of the Commonwealth ever since. It has been adhered to consistently, except in a very few cases. At present I do not recall a single case, with the possible exception of the so-called contract between the State and the Boston Elevated Railway Company relative to location for tracks for the elevated structure in Boston, which I believe was for a definite time. Apart from that I do not know of a single case, and I have been referred to no case where a franchise perpetual in nature has been granted, and that franchise that I mention was not perpetual in its nature.

Mr. Brown: If I do not interrupt the gentleman, I should like to ask him if it is not now within the power of the Legislature to pass an act in perpetuity by placing in that act that it is not subject to the Act of 1831, which the gentleman has quoted. That is, is it within the power of the Legislature to pass an act in perpetuity notwithstanding the statute quoted?

Mr. Hobbs: It is possible for the Legislature to do so, but as a matter of fact it has not been done. The policy is one of so long standing, and has been maintained so consistently, that the danger would seem to be a very slight one and one which there is very little need for a constitutional proviso to guard against.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester what his objection would be to putting this in the Constitution. If the Legislature has not used this power for eighty-odd years, and is not likely to use it, what is the harm of having a safeguard against some Legislature in the future trying to use it?

Mr. Hobbs: My objection is to the resolution before the Convention rather than against the principle to which the gentleman refers, of enacting into the Constitution the provisions that now appear in section 3 of chapter 109, which I have read. The resolution before us allows the General Court to grant only one form of franchise; that is to say, the indeterminate franchise, a franchise that can be wiped out at any moment by the order of the General Court. It debars the General Court from the possibility of granting a franchise for a definite and limited time, which on occasion might be a valuable right for the Commonwealth to possess. As to whether in the future an occasion might rise which would call for the granting of a right in perpetuo I cannot tell. The likelihood that questions of a right to grant such a right would be abused seems to me so slight that it hardly is necessary to cumber the Constitution by an additional proviso.

Mr. Creamer: I should like to move as a substitute the resolution which Mr. Anderson of Brookline is recorded in this calendar as recommending, namely, that "Every act of incorporation, charter or franchise shall forever remain subject to revocation and amendment."

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I consider this a very important matter, and I do not think it ought to go by without a little further discussion. The point is this: If a corporation ever sees its chance to get one Legislature to give it rights which will bind future Legislatures, it may avail itself now of that chance. As the matter stands now, it is merely a statute that stands in the way of a perpetual franchise, or a franchise for a great many years. The mere fact that a later statute grants such perpetual franchise or a franchise for a great many years pro tanto repeals the earlier act. It has been the well-established policy of this State for a great many years to grant to all our public service corporations franchises that are changeable or revocable at any time. There was great fear that we could not get money for our public service corporations under those conditions, but experience has proved that public service corporations have a great deal more secure tenure in Massachusetts with the indeterminate franchise than they have in other States with a fixed time when they shall expire. There always is a great deal of uncertainty in investments in corporations when the time for the expiration of the franchise draws near. Every man who has invested in stocks of public service corporations knows that full well. It is the custom in many States to take advantage of the expiration of a franchise to put such conditions on the renewal of the corporate franchise as to make it very difficult for the corporation to go on and earn the money necessary to pay interest on bonds and dividends on stock. Any one who is familiar with investments in public franchise corporations knows that full well. The indeterminate franchise is therefore, in my judgment, not only the Massachusetts policy, but the wisest policy. I do not like to see the matter so left that a corporation, whenever it happens to have a majority in the Legislature, will be in a position to obtain in one way or another irrevocable rights which bind future General Courts. That is the situation to-day. I did not know that this statute, passed eighty or ninety years ago, had been changed only once or twice since it was passed. I am surprised if that is so. I take the gentleman's word for it. That is an argument certainly of the strongest kind that it is a proper thing to incorporate in our Constitution. Therefore it seems to me that the proposition printed under the name of Mr. Anderson is a reasonable, proper, conservative proposition. In the long run it leaves the corporations themselves in a much safer situation than they are in now.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I should like to ask the last speaker a question, not in any way opposing him. I should like to see this incorporated in the Constitution. But I should like to ask him how he can reconcile this resolution with that part of the United States Constitution which says that no State can abrogate a contract.
Mr. Walker: The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the Legislature of Massachusetts cannot make a contract. If the Legislature of Massachusetts does make a contract the United States Constitution protects that contract, and the next Legislature of Massachusetts, or the Legislature that meets twenty-five years later, cannot change that contract. It is binding, hard and fast. The Massachusetts Legislature and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are tied for all time by a Legislature that granted a franchise perhaps fifty years ago. I do not like that situation. Now, if we make this amendment to our Constitution no such contract can be made, and therefore one Legislature cannot bind the State and all future Legislatures. I think it is a proper provision.

Mr. Richardson of Newton: Assuming that the language as recommended by Mr. Anderson had been a part of the Constitution at the time of the recent negotiations and the contract between the Commonwealth and the Boston Elevated Railway Company, I should like to inquire what the gentleman's opinion is of the effect of this language on that contract.

Mr. Walker: In my judgment it would be an immensely safe provision. The Governor of this Commonwealth objected to certain features of that contract. He objected to the State tying itself up, putting itself under the domination of the Elevated Railroad even for ten years, and very wisely, in my judgment. I do not believe that it is good for the State and I do not believe that it is good for the corporations or the investors in corporations to make a contract with a public service corporation. They are doing a public service business, and I do not believe in the State making contracts with them that cannot be changed by subsequent Legislatures. I do not believe it makes for greater stability in the corporation or for greater confidence in their securities. On the other hand, I believe they are less stable. As I say, any one who is familiar with investing in public service corporation securities knows that full well, and therefore I think that this resolution should pass.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: I have at this moment the somewhat unique experience of finding myself to a considerable extent in accord with the views expressed by the last speaker and with the delegate from Lynn (Mr. Creamer) who preceded him. It is perfectly true, as the last speaker has said, that those who have devoted themselves to a consideration of the franchise situation, the franchise reformers if I may so call them, and the corporations themselves, have come to an agreement finally that the best and safest and wisest policy for any State to adopt with reference to franchises,—using now the term in the sense in which it so often is used on the street, i.e., to mean the location of poles and wires and street railway tracks,—should be upon what is called the indeterminate basis. Wisconsin, as we all know, led off in a way in this matter, and established what is called the "indeterminate franchise," which allows a corporation to occupy the streets of a city during good behavior, you may say. That really was an outgrowth of what had been worked out by judicial decision here in Massachusetts.

I think I am in position to explain to the Convention just the attitude of the chairman (Mr. George W. Anderson) in this matter. He and I did not find ourselves in accord upon very many propositions, but we were pretty nearly agreed in respect of this one. We were agreed that so far as "franchises" were concerned,—using the word now in its loose general sense,—the law leaves us in pretty good shape just as it is; and there really is no need of putting anything into the Constitution. I felt that myself, and Mr. Anderson at one time agreed with me; but finally he said: "I think we should put something in the Constitution as affecting charters, and while we are about it we might as well cover the other point too." And so while the committee as a whole reported against the resolution found in document No. 103, the chairman dissented and recommended that it be adopted in the form now moved by the delegate from Lynn (Mr. Creamer).

Now with regard to charters of corporations. As has been said, it has been provided by statute for many years that any corporation organized since March 11, 1831, should hold its charter always subject to alteration, amendment or repeal. That principle has become so ingrained in the mind and in the policy of the State that it really is unnecessary to touch it. The mind of man cannot conceive, it seems to me, that any Legislature of Massachusetts ever should grant an irrevocable charter. It is true, however, as the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) has pointed out, that it is possible theoretically for the Legislature at any time to repeal that statute, or possible, I think, when granting a charter to put in a special provision which shall have the effect of avoiding the statute in the particular case. While I personally would be satisfied to let the thing stand as it is, I say now, as I said on the floor here last year in answer to a question from the delegate from Lynn (Mr. Creamer), that I am willing to see this provision, now found in the Revised Laws, securing the right of the Legislature to alter, repeal or amend charters,—perfectly willing to see the provision transferred to the Constitution. But if you do it, gentlemen, there are three or four words that you want to add to the form of the resolution proposed by the delegate from Brookline (Mr. Anderson), and I feel authorized to say that here, on his behalf. He said that what he meant by his language was, that charters always should remain subject to alteration, amendment or repeal by the General Court, and said that if he should be in the Convention when the matter was reached he would ask to have those words added. Therefore, I want to move an amendment.

Mr. Clapp moved that the proposition as submitted by Mr. Creamer be amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "by the General Court."

Mr. O'Connell of Boston: It seems to me that if this Convention, out of abundance of caution, thinks that this provision should be put in, there is no logical reason for not doing so. Some say: "Oh, it may never be invoked," but we all know that legislative machinery gets working pretty rapidly at times and the steam-roller process is not infrequently used. Just think of it! If in a Constitutional Convention such as this, the previous question is invoked for the purpose of choking off important debate, as has been done, and unanimous consent for making a brief statement in explanation of an undebated amendment is denied, it might be that in the closing days of a legislative session, when the heat is excessive, when men are anxious to get home, when the day of adjournment has been postponed and a lot of things have come up, a little word in a bill, one word that might mean perpetuity, very easily could get by in the rush and in the confusion of those hours, and once in never could come out. I submit that, such being the case,—and we all are familiar with these facts,—all you gentlemen of legislative experience know that I am not exaggerating when I say that mistakes can be made honestly and those mistakes can confront us permanently in a measure that cannot be changed. I submit that in all fairness, in all wisdom, we ought to accept the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Lynn (Mr. Creamer) in order that error, chance, fraud or trickery may not foil the people. I hope that the experiences of the past, where errors have been made through inadvertence, through neglect, through artifice, may be stopped forever by this brief amendment which makes such a thing impossible.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: With reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lexington (Mr. Clapp), this query arises: Whether the word "franchise" means a franchise granted by a Legislature or may mean a franchise granted by a municipality. There are many instances,—take the case of laying private tracks across a street,—where a franchise, a right to maintain those tracks, is given not by the Legislature but by the municipality and is subject to revocation and amendment at any time by the municipality. My query is whether putting in the words "by the General Court" does not throw that matter into the hands of the Legislature and prevent the municipality's acting. I have no opinion about it, but it seems to me that question may arise and ought to be considered.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: The point raised by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) I think is out of place, for the reason that our courts in at least two well-established cases have held those rights granted by municipalities to lay tracks in the street, or to lay water pipes or gas pipes in the street, to be licenses and not franchises; that is to say, mere revocable rights which could be taken away at any time and which of course the General Court has always a superior right to take away at any time. I do not think the amendment as drafted would affect those so-called franchises in the least.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: It seems to me that it would be a wise thing to incorporate this provision in the Constitution. It already has become a part of the Constitution by the enactment of the Legislature. It was the establishment of the principle which was to be regarded by all subsequent Legislatures and has been so regarded. To enact it into the Constitution seems to be perfectly proper. We all know there are a great many customs that have the effect of law, and that it is a wise provision when those customs do have the effect of law to enact them into law and declare them to be the law. Now, here we have a provision which is substantially a constitutional provision, and which has been regarded so for eighty years. I think it would be wise to enact it into the Constitution.

Mr. Jones of Melrose: While we all may agree as to a certain definite line of policy, a certain general principle, being enacted into the Constitution, and while I agree perfectly with what has just been said by the delegate from Beverly (Mr. Loring), it does seem to me as the result of my legislative experience that there are arising frequently special occasions where enterprises of great public moment could not be carried on unless there were a certain perpetuity of tenure. Take, for instance, the development of the great Boston Elevated Railway system. We all realize what it has been for Boston and for the metropolitan district. As a member of the Legislature during the time when the Boston Elevated Railway bills were enacted into law, I remember it was conceded generally that the vast sums of money which were necessary for the building of the elevated railway structure, the assuming of the cost of the subway and the Washington Street tunnel and the East Boston tunnel, to carry them on as the enterprise is to-day, would not be forthcoming unless there were a certain perpetuity of tenure accorded, and the only question before the Legislature at the time was as to what the length of that tenure should be. In the great enterprises in New York city the franchises granted were practically perpetual franchises,—for ninety-nine years. That was impossible in Massachusetts and the tenure which was given was a limited tenure; but with the tenure that was given it was possible for the Boston Elevated Railway Company to secure the vast sums of money which were necessary for the development of that great system. Now, that may be a special, an isolated case; but while I agree in general with the principle that has been stated by the delegate from Beverly (Mr. Loring) I think we ought to have here an opinion from him and from other members of the Convention who are more in touch with the great financial interests as to whether or not, if we proceed to enact this constitutional provision, it might stifle in time a development which was of the greatest moment to the community, such as the Boston Elevated Railway system has been to Boston and the metropolitan district and to other communities, possibly different sections of the State where great enterprises are in process of construction. There may have been a change in the feeling of the financial world in that respect. If there has been, I think we ought to be informed regarding it.
FRANCHISES.

393

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: I should like to ask the delegate who is speaking if he conceives that the Elevated Railway Act to which he refers and the recent Elevated Railway Act constituted exceptions to the Act of 1831, so that in those two instances at least he would say that the Legislature has gone back on the Act of 1831.

Mr. Jones: It seems to me it was an exception. Of course in return for the franchise and privileges that the Boston Elevated Railway Company received they in turn agreed that only a five cent fare should be charged for a continuous ride,—one ride in a continuous direction. That made a certain contract in connection with that franchise. The only difficulty has been that the Elevated Railway management have been obliged to assume too much and practically have been crowded out in that.

Mr. Reidy of Boston: I am familiar with the five cent fare guarantee to the Boston Elevated Railway Company. I do not remember that it was a guarantee to the people. On the contrary it was a guarantee to the Elevated Railway Company, which did everything possible to secure the guarantee for a period of fifty years. At that time, in 1896, an active member of the Legislature, who since has occupied the Governor's chair, and myself joined hands in shortening the period of the guarantee.

Money was growing in value in those days. The advocates of a single gold standard felt sure that money was destined to grow progressively more valuable, and the Elevated Railroad financiers wanted to be guaranteed against a possible demand for three cent fares or a week’s tickets at a much reduced price.

New gold discoveries, the McCleary banking bill, asset currency and other reasons conspired to make money less valuable, and now the Boston Elevated Railway Company wants the State to relieve it from the performance of a contract that the corporation insisted should be a condition precedent to the leasing of the subways built in this city to facilitate rapid transit.

Of course had money increased in value so that five cents appeared an excessive street car fare, and the people of the metropolitan district made a demand for a decrease, the Boston Elevated Railway people would have stood behind their contract, or would have demanded millions in compensation for agreeing to abrogate the contract or agreement.

I think the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker) is right when he says the indeterminate form of franchise is the best. It will not do us any harm to put the indeterminate form in our Constitution. During one of my years in the House Worcester became indignant over inadequate street railway service and all her Representatives fought for the 20-year franchise. Then the whole matter was discussed thoroughly by able lawyers and first-class financiers of National reputation, and all agreed that the indeterminate form of franchise was better for the public, the investor and the corporation. I trust we shall propose to the people this provision as now amended by the delegate from Lexington (Mr. Clapp).

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) says that an exception was made in the Elevated Railroad charter. If that is so the condition of that road and its property to-day should cause us to take favorable action on this measure. The Elevated Railroad practically has ruined property in many sections of this city, and, worse than that, it has controlled sources of legislation. It has raided one of the most important trusts of all,—the savings banks of the Commonwealth. It secured the legislation that permitted the savings banks of the Commonwealth to invest in its securities, and the bank officials invested the money of the poor in their securities; and what is their market value to-day? I do not say any of those gentlemen did it wrongfully, but that it was done, no one will deny. What individual could come up here and get the State’s credit and money on the junk that the Elevated Railroad now has on hand? Not one, sir, could do it. Talk about their being benefactors! Why, in the first charter secured, it provided distinctly that the Manhattan system never should be constructed in our streets, and, with that proviso in, Boston’s business men laid down; but when the speculators who purchased the charter from those who put it through the Legislature secured it, they came before that honorable body and had the provision that was to keep the Manhattan system off our streets taken out of the bill. They never submitted that important amendment to the people of Boston. Of course not. And what is the consequence? Look at the property in the south end. Look at it in Charlestown. Look at it in the north and the west end. Ruined! And who has benefited? The bankers who promoted the enterprise and unloaded the stock on the people, and now, after milking and operating it for twenty years, they come in on their bended knees and say: “Break this present contract.” It has only four or five years to run, but still they said: "Break it. Save us from ruin." And who backed them up? The savings banks officials. They called on the men whose money was invested by permission of the Legislature to back them up, so as to save the savings banks from ruin in these war times. It seems to me it is a good thing to put this resolution into the Constitution now.

The Boston Elevated Railroad has hurt the city of Boston. No doubt it has operated well for the suburban districts. We do not want to stop the people of the outlying districts from getting their ride, but we ought to have some regard for the people in the city of Boston who have property, because all the wealth many of them have is in that property. And, sir, in no case did the Legislature force the Boston Elevated Railway Company to build these important additions. Its promoters forced through the Legislature the Cambridge tunnel; they forced through the Legislature the elevated structure in the west end that ruined the property there. The property there had increased in value from $2 and $3 a foot to be worth $15 and $20. You could not get any one who would sell it for less in certain parts of it then. You could not give it away to-day. There are foreclosures all around. And then they come up and break all their promises and secure permission to violate the contracts themselves, and they get the Legislature to give them more money in a so-called public control bill.

I submit that this resolution is a good protection for property; it is a good protection for the people, because the railroad deliberately repudiated its contract. It said: "If you will give us a chance to operate our road, if you will give us a chance to go to savings banks and get their money, if you will give us all these different privileges, we will guarantee to carry for twenty-five years to and fro for five cents per ride the persons who go to the suburban districts and purchase homes." Now it breaks that contract itself. What would happen if you were to say to the Elevated Railroad Company; "Give us something not in the contract"? Why, it would protest, and talk about the sacredness of a contract, and about the justice of its claims,—but no justice for the people who bought their little homes in the suburban districts on a five cent fare basis and who now will have to pay the increased fare. What has caused it all? It has been bad management. You know it. Fifty thousand dollars a year salary for one individual who now is walking around the streets without anybody asking for his services. Thirty or forty thousand dollars for a private car to carry these great magnates and their friends around, so as to exhibit them to the people. Extravagant salaries to favorites. And whose money was it? Why, the money of the people, who put it in there upon guarantees.

I suggest, sir, that the amendment is a good one, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: I do not agree with all that has been stated by the two previous speakers, but I do believe that they have demonstrated that a contract between the Commonwealth and a traction company is apt to be about as profitable to the Commonwealth as your bet with your wife is to you. The Commonwealth has maintained as its policy, apart from these two exceptions, apparently, that franchises and incorporations shall be under the control of the Commonwealth whence they came; and it would seem that it is a proper thing to put into an organic law, the Constitution, a declaration of policy the wisdom of which has been so long demonstrated. Therefore I trust that the proposition as amended by the delegate from Lexington (Mr. Clapp) will be adopted.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: The Convention might notice that it already has taken some ground upon this general question in the 46th amendment to the Constitution of this Commonwealth, adopted last November, in which occurs the phrase: "And to carry out legal obligations, if any, already entered into." We cannot forget that one of the difficulties in passing the constitutional amendment with reference to grants of public money to institutions of learning and benevolent institutions was that the Commonwealth appeared to have made a contract under which it was bound to pay certain sums of money to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and to the Worcester Polytechnic Institute. We were confronted by the fact that the Commonwealth somehow had incurred an obligation which must be provided for in equity by the form of the amendment; and under the suggestion of one of the most respected members of this Convention this clause was adopted in order to make it clear that the amendment, which otherwise might have wiped out a contract, should be expounded in future by the courts, presumably in such a way as to save any moral obligation into which the State had entered. That is to say, we recognized the right and the desirability in the constitutional amendment of making a clear statement as to the relations of that amendment to previous legislation.

I have been informed for the first time to-day that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is protected in such a matter as this by statute. We all know the history of the legislation upon this subject, the Fletcher vs. Peck decision of 1810, in which the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that a grant of property made by a State was a contract and could not be repealed, the subsequent Dartmouth College decision of 1819, in which it was held that a grant to a corporation to exercise educational or other functions was a contract. What was the result? A considerable number of the States thereafter put into their Constitutions provisions prohibiting any permanent grants of that nature, and that has protected those States. That Massachusetts should not have followed in that trend is astonishing. The need of some such action was felt by the Act of 1831, with the text of which I am not familiar. We have been told upon the floor of this Convention, however, that that act protects us against later action by the Constitution because it was an act of a peculiar nature and the Legislature never would think of going contrary to it! Let me ask my legal friends and colleagues upon this floor whether the courts of this Commonwealth ever have set aside any act of the Legislature upon the ground that it was in conflict with the Act of 1831.

The whole matter comes down to two propositions: (1) The Act of 1831 is a proper act, expressing a policy which the Commonwealth ought to follow. We are so assured by those who are opposed to the pending amendment. They say we have got all we want. If that is the proper policy, then why not put it where there can be no question that it is the policy of the Commonwealth? If we believe in the Act of 1831 we ought to believe in this amendment. (2) If the amendment is not sufficient to protect us, then we ought to raise that issue right FRANCHISES.

397

d here. If this motion never had been made, if no amendment ever had been proposed to this Convention, this is the time to act affirmatively, because the experience of our sister Commonwealths, the experience of a century throughout the United States, shows that it is not safe upon such a subject to trust simply to the discretion and the good-will and the good sense of the Legislature.

We listened yesterday to a very eloquent and in many ways a very convincing speech upon this floor to the effect that this was a constitutional government, that it is a constitutional government. Personally perhaps I could get along with less Constitution than we have. If it is a constitutional government, and it is, if we are going to improve this Constitution, and we are, let us make the Constitution as safe as it may be on this highly important subject.

Mr. Cox of Boston: Without wishing to engage in the debate or to express any opinion upon the advisability of adopting this amendment, I should like to ask the preceding speaker, who so violently and vehemently declared that the experience of the United States and its several Commonwealths indicated that this amendment was necessary, to give one specific instance where a State has been ruined by the failure to have this clause in its Constitution. I know of no suffering which has come to this Commonwealth or to any other Commonwealth because of the fact that such a provision is not in the Constitution of such Commonwealth.

Mr. Hart: The illustration that instantly occurs is that of franchise grants to surface corporations, traction corporations, which have been granted in many States, commonly by the municipal authorities under State authority, grants without termination, perpetual grants. Everybody who is familiar with the business of street cars throughout the Union is aware that in a number of cities those grants have proved exceedingly difficult to deal with. They have given privileges which turned out to be contrary to the public interest. They have allowed terms which could not be safely continued. And in some cases the only way that relief could be had was to hold a club over the companies; that is, to refuse the renewal of grants which had expired unless the companies would give up their hold upon grants in which they had a perpetual right, and that of course is not a legal method nor a safe method.

Mr. Collins of Amesbury: I will admit without argument that it may not be good form for any delegate in this Convention who has possessed neither a corporate interest nor a legal training to inject himself into the discussion of a matter which is so fundamental as this may be. I have listened in vain, sir, for any delegate to state here why the people of Massachusetts should not be given an opportunity to decide whether or no they believe that it should be right that any man or any set of men, any corporation or any individual, should acquire forever in perpetuity the easement upon the privileges of this Commonwealth. If this thing is right, if there has been any well-defined, concrete proposition affecting the fundamental law of Massachusetts, to my mind it is this; and the least that we can do, whether the thing has or has not happened, whether it is or is not for the best interests of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that it should grant to any man privileges which are of inestimable value and which reach to eternity, is to give the people an opportunity to pass upon this proposition. I have been a member of this Legislature for quite a few years. My experience goes back to the time when this railroad proposition was brought up, like that of my friend in the third division (Mr. Jones of Melrose) and my friend to the immediate right (Mr. Lomasney of Boston); and I know and every man knows who has had any legislative experience that in the closing hours, with two thousand matters or more before any Legislature which has sat here for the last dozen years, it is mathematically impossible to give to these questions the time that they should have. Very often matters have gone through here half-baked, if you please to allow the slang, sometimes under the pressure of the executive in the other end, who wishes matters to be closed up, that he may take a vacation, or for some other reason. But in any event, sometimes things have gone through here which are far-reaching. With this amendment through, no corporations, however much they may choose to enhance their capital, however much they may choose to approach a few men here, can acquire in perpetuity the privileges of the Commonwealth. The people should say whether any man or any set of men should have an opportunity to get a life grip upon these privileges, which are the people's. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson) and taken by the gentleman in my immediate front (Mr. Creamer of Lynn) will be passed.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: The debate on this resolution has been very thorough. It seemed to be all on one side and I believe that everybody here now is ready to vote and wants to. I therefore move the previous question. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I am taking the floor just for a moment because I am glad that I was moved to get up at a time when this thing seemed to be going on the toboggan to be lost; and thus to start this very interesting discussion. I would have kept my seat if it had not been for the challenge of the young man over in the third division: "Can any one cite any reason why the people of Massachusetts should not be given an opportunity to have something in perpetuity?" I am surprised, sir. For when I was a young man, a boy, I paid toll at the toll-gate for crossing Charlestown bridge. If that franchise had been in perpetuity that highway and every highway held by charter, including a most important highway into Essex County, the one going down to Lynn, could be traveled by no one to-day unless he paid that toll to somebody who had obtained the right by charter to charge toll. I am surprised that a gentleman who is in the Legislature should defend charters and grants in perpetuity. The gentleman from Melrose (Mr. Jones) asks how the financial interests would feel if this resolution is adopted. Well, let us hear from the people's rights first. How would the people feel? The great mistake in Massachusetts, to my mind, was made when there was a failure to discover that a railway track in our highways is a highway, a hardened highway; therefore no charter for a railway should be in perpetuity; control never should be alienated from the people. Therefore we should not consider the possibility of moneyed men investing capital in such utilities because the tendency now is to place great developments in the hands of the people.

Mr. Bosworth of Springfield: I also was a member of the Legislature of 1898. At that time one of our chief troubles was transportation in Boston. I remember the facts somewhat differently from the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Reidy). As I recall it, we voted, by roll-call, only as to whether the term of the Elevated Railroad fare privilege should be thirty years or twenty. With him I was one of those who voted for twenty years, and we prevailed. Shortly after, by general consent of the members, it was determined that, on the whole, twenty-five years probably would be fair to both State and investors. That time nearly has expired and we know what has happened. There is no use discussing it here. I do not wish to oppose this amendment. But, gentlemen, you should consider this: You are completely tying the hands of the Legislature. You are preventing any authority in Massachusetts from making any agreement whatsoever of the nature of a franchise for two years, for three years, for five years, for ten years or any time whatever, no matter if there is substantial agreement on the part of all that it should be done. Now we must not think of the Elevated Railway as it is to-day. We must put ourselves back in the position that we were in twenty years ago, when we were then all acting as best we might for the interests, as we thought, of the whole people. At that time we thought it was wise that the great principle of the Act of 1831 should be modified somewhat, and it seems to me that we now are proposing a dangerous thing. Are we to treat the Commonwealth as if it was a minor, as if it was not twenty-one, as if it does not even have a guardian fit to represent it, and say that no matter how wise the act may be, no matter how completely all may be agreed upon it, nevertheless the great fundamental law of the Commonwealth shall forbid it?

Mr. Lomasney: I think the fact that this condition exists should cause us to enact this proposal. When there was a proposition before the Legislature in 1900 for the lease of the Boston and Albany Railroad, Mr. Garfield of Brockton offered an amendment that it might be revoked at any time by the Legislature whenever the New York Central Railroad should discriminate against the interests of the port of Boston. It was rejected. We all recall how the service of that railroad fell off. It is doing better now, but the revocation clause would have been a good thing for the State. In my opinion you can depend upon the Legislature elected by the people to revoke something that they find is absolutely wrong. You never can revoke in the Legislature anything that is right, and you know it. I trust we shall adopt this amendment.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I do not believe there is any necessity of arguing further the main question. I believe the Convention understands now that when we grant a franchise to a public service corporation we grant it as we appoint a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, during good behavior. I think it is perfectly obvious that this proposed constitutional amendment is intended to prevent one Legislature from tying the hands of the other Legislatures. One Legislature cannot look into the future and know what is wise or what is necessary; and therefore this is a very wise provision to insert in the Constitution, one, I believe, that will strengthen and not weaken our public service corporations. But I am sorry to say that I must inject another question into this matter. I should like to ask the gentleman from Lexington why he asks to have the words “by the General Court” added to the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Anderson).

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: To make it plain that no one ever can contend that a city or town, if it grants something that may be termed a franchise, will be able to revoke it. I said when I was on my feet, — further answering his question, — that Mr. Anderson and myself were both in accord as to the advisability of adding those words.

Mr. Walker: If that were the only effect of those words I should not oppose them, of course. That they are wholly unnecessary, it seems to me, is clear. But unfortunately they do have another effect, as everybody in the Convention is aware. Moreover, the same question will occur in regard to other resolutions; it has occurred already in regard to a resolution before the committee on Form and Phraseology; it has occurred in another matter which will come up, I think, next or very soon on the calendar. There is an attempt made here to put in the words "by the General Court" for the purpose of shutting out any attempt to act under the initiative and referendum. I am sorry to introduce that question again, but it seems to me clear that we ought to leave the words out in this case and in the others use the words "by legislation." For we do not intend, I take it, to fight the initiative and referendum question on every resolution that is to be put before the people on the next ballot, and that will be the result if attempts are made here to restrict the action of the people under the initiative and referendum and to provide that nothing shall be done of this nature except by the General Court.

Now as it is utterly, — in my judgment at least, — utterly unnecessary to put it in for the reasons which the gentleman from Lexington suggested, it seems to me extremely wise to leave it out here and leave it out in the future and let this question requiescat in pace.

Mr. Clapp: I rise simply for the purpose of disclaiming any such intention as the gentleman from Brookline seems to attribute to me. It was not at all in my thought that by the use of that language it would prevent the operation of the initiative and referendum. My purpose simply was to make it clear that these franchises, if that term may be applied to street railway locations and the like, should not be subject to the control of the municipalities, but should reside where they belong, in the General Court or in the general source of legislation.

Mr. Creame of Lynn: I should like to ask the delegate from Lexington if he will change his amendment from the phrase "by the General Court" to the phrase "by the law-making power of the Commonwealth."

Mr. Quincy of Boston: The gentleman from Lexington has explained that he does not desire, and did not intend, the effect which has been pointed out clearly by the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker). Why, therefore, would it not be much better for him to withdraw the amendment at this stage, now that the effect has been pointed out to him, and propose it on the next stage in some form of language which will accomplish the object which he has in view without adding, in effect, to the list of measures excluded from the operation of the initiative and referendum. I entirely agree, after some little study of the matter and consultation with the gentleman from Brookline, that the effect of adding the words "by the General Court" probably would be to exclude the operation of the initiative and referendum in the case of an amendment adopted by this Convention subsequent to its adoption of the initiative and referendum amendment. Why, therefore, raise that question? Why not avoid it by proposing a form of words which will not raise this disputed question?
Mr. Clapp: I should like a little further time in which to consider that question before committing myself definitely. I repeat, as I said before in perfect good faith, that I had no purpose to imply by the use of the words "by the General Court" that if the initiative and referendum is adopted, it shall not be effective in this matter. It seems to me this is only one of several cases that have arisen or may arise raising precisely that question, and the proper way to deal with it ought to be worked out carefully at some subsequent stage. I think it is fair to ask that the language be adopted now, "by the General Court," and then have in mind the general question how those matters should be taken care of.

Mr. Walker: I trust the amendment will be killed on this stage. Probably the words "by law" would do. Some such words as those could be put in, but in the opinion of some of the words "by the General Court" would exclude the initiative and referendum. There is no objection to putting in the words "by law" in this case. Most of these provisions have been drawn inadvertently where they say, such and such things may be done "by the General Court." Just say "by law," and there will be no trouble. Thus the question will be avoided. If this amendment is killed we can fix it up very easily on the next stage, but this amendment ought not to go in; that is obvious.

Mr. James H. Brennan of Boston: Coming from a district that has seen a great deal of destruction and ruin of property values by the presence of the elevated structure, I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted. I have had the experience of witnessing property values in Charlestown decrease almost 60 per cent during my career, and I am a young man. On Main Street alone in my district the presence of the elevated structure has caused a decrease of over one million and a half in property values in ten years. In 1911 and 1912 I was a member of the committee on Banks and Banking of the Legislature and at that time proposals of the Boston Elevated Railway Company, through their agents, to make their securities legal investments for savings banks were rejected by that committee because they considered the investment unstable and unsound for savings bank investments. But in the last few years those securities have been made a legal investment for savings banks of Massachusetts. When we came to the Legislature from Charlestown, asking relief from the presence of the elevated structure, the contract with the Commonwealth was held up as a stopgap in order to prevent us from obtaining relief, and we were told that that sacred contract could not be revoked or abrogated. Yet we witnessed last year the Boston Elevated Railway Company coming to the Legislature and saying that the contract ought to be abrogated because they themselves wanted relief. The people of my district could not be afforded relief because of this contract, and yet the Elevated Company themselves offered that argument as their defence and as their plea for relief last year. Coming from a district which has suffered much from that structure and from the existence of a 25-year lease with a public service corporation, I sincerely trust that other districts may be protected from the ravages of greedy public service corporations and that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: This matter has been discussed at some length. It is very pleasing to me to hear the old elevated proposition discussed again in these halls and by the same lips from which I have heard it on many previous occasions. The woes of the Boston Elevated Railway Company and the woes of the people of Boston from the Boston Elevated Railway Company have been rehearsed so frequently that perhaps it is hardly necessary to state that at the time when the elevated structure was authorized there was a definite issue made between elevated structure and subway, and the popular feeling at the time ran strong in favor of an elevated structure. The people of Boston wanted their elevated structure, they got it, and they have been kicking about it ever since. The question involved by this amendment I think has been summed up very well by the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Bosworth), who gave a very definite argument as to the effect that this amendment would have upon debarring the Commonwealth from granting privileges for a limited term of years. Such privileges seldom are granted, as a matter of fact, but at any time may become highly advantageous.

With regard to the question of public service corporations it seems hardly possible that at present it would be easy to tempt private capital into the financing of large public service enterprises. A time may come when the conditions will have changed; and at such a time, being mindful among other things of what the Boston Elevated Railway Company has met with in the city of Boston, leaving out of consideration what the city of Boston has met with from the Boston Elevated Railway Company, private capital well might pause at putting money into a public service corporation without some guarantee as to the future. And if this resolution goes into effect, why, that guarantee could not be given. It would become a question at that time as to whether you wanted your public service enterprise constructed by private capital or by public capital. Of course public capital, I presume, might be available if private capital was not; but in the absence of a power to give a definite guarantee for the future such as was given in the Boston Elevated Railway case, it might be practically impossible to finance those enterprises with private capital. Apart from that I do not know that there is any objection to the proposition.
XXXV.

HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

Article XLIII of the Amendments of the Constitution is as follows:

ART. XLIII. The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens; provided, however, that this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.

Messrs. Arthur N. Harriman of New Bedford, John A. Donoghue of Boston and Dennis D. Driscoll of Boston presented resolutions numbered, respectively, 100, 236 and 237, which were referred to the committee on Public Affairs. That committee reported the following resolution (No. 320):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out the forty-third amendment and substituting the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth and the cities and towns thereof to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease and sell the same for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens.

Consideration of the resolution was begun Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Mr. Josiah Quincy of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 4, the words "General Court shall have power to authorize the"; and by inserting after the word "thereof", in line 5, the words "may be authorized by law".

These amendments were rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 85 to 108.

Mr. James R. Ferry of Northbridge moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 6, the word "lease".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. John L. Kilbon of Springfield moved that the resolution be amended by the substitution of the following new draft (No. 324):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have power to authorize cities and towns to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell, and, under such provisions and regulations as the General Court may establish or approve, to lease or rent the same, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 52 to 48, and, accordingly, it was substituted for No. 320. By a vote of 60 to 51, it was ordered to a third reading Thursday, June 20.

The resolution was read a third time Friday, July 26, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology as follows (see No. 391, page 3):
Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution, by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

For the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens, the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein shall have power to take land, and, under such regulations as the General Court may adopt, to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease, rent or sell the same.

Mr. Augustus P. Loring of Beverly moved that the resolution be amended by substituting the following new draft (see No. 391, page 5):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution, by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Section 1. For the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens, the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein shall have power, upon payment of just compensation, to take land, and, under such regulations as the General Court may adopt, to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease, rent or sell the same.

Mr. Lincoln Bryant of Milton moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Loring be amended by inserting before the word "the", in line 6, the words "", when authorized by the General Court, ".

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Francis J. Horgan of Boston moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Loring be amended by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words ", lease, rent".

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 78 to 41.

Mr. Robert Walcott of Cambridge moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Loring be amended by striking out the words proposed to be inserted, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting after the word "Commonwealth", in the second line thereof, the words "or the cities and towns therein", — so as to read as follows:

Article XLIII. The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth or the cities and towns therein to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens: provided, however, that this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 88 to 32.

The amendment moved by Mr. Loring, as thus amended, was adopted and was passed to be engrossed Friday, July 26, by a vote of 89 to 56, as follows (No. 406):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution, by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting after the word "Commonwealth", in the second line thereof, the words "or 7 the cities and towns therein”, — so as to read as follows: —
8 Article XLIII. The General Court shall have power
9 to authorize the Commonwealth or the cities and towns
10 therein to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, 11 build upon and sell the same, for the purpose of relieving 12 congestion of population and providing homes for citi-
13 zens: provided, however, that this amendment shall not 14 be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings 15 at less than the cost thereof.

The resolution (No. 406) was placed in the Orders of the Day Tuesday, August 6, and on the following day it was reported by the committee on Form and Phraseology in the following form (No. 417):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitu-
2 tion by the adoption of the subjoined article of amend-3 ment: —

4 ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.
5 Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution
6 is hereby amended by substituting the following: Article
7 XLIII. The General Court shall have power to make 8 laws whereby the Commonwealth or the cities and towns
9 therein, for the purpose of relieving congestion of popula-10 tion and providing homes for citizens, may take land and 11 hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same; 12 but such land or buildings shall not be sold for less than

The resolution was rejected Wednesday, August 7, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 90 to 94.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: The wording of this resolution raises the same question which we have just discussed in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lexington, through the use of the term “the General Court”. This resolution doubtless was formulated before the Convention had acted upon the initiative and refeerendum resolution. But I think that the lawyers in the Convention will agree that the passage subsequent to the initiative and referendum resolution of an amendment using the express term “the General Court” may be held to exclude the operation of the initiative and referendum in that particular case. That is not the intention, presumably, and in order to remove the doubt, I desire to move to strike out in document No. 320, in line 4, the words “The General Court shall have power to authorize”, and insert in line 2, after the word “thereof”, the words “may be authorized by law”. If we use the term “law”, as the gentleman from Brookline has suggested, everywhere in this and other amendments in place of the term “the General Court”, it simply avoids the raising of this question and leaves the operation of the initiative and referendum exactly as it is in the amendment as adopted, instead of adding to the list of excluded matters.

Mr. Clapp of Lexington: It seems to me, gentlemen, that the phrase which the gentleman from Boston in the second division (Mr. Quincy) suggested a few moments ago is much more apt than the words which he now proposes. The words “by law” obviously are too narrow and might mean something which you do not intend them to mean. Every by-law passed by a town or an ordinance passed by a city government is a law. I think, therefore, we had better say “by the law-making power of the Commonwealth.” As I understood him, that was the phrase which he suggested before. I should like to ask him if he would not accept that phrase in place of the more narrow expression "by law."

Mr. Quincy: My only object, of course, is to arrive at the best terms to use in these various amendments. I do not see any objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Lexington, "the law-making power of the Commonwealth," because I think it is perfectly clear that the law-making power of the Commonwealth under the initiative and referendum amendment resides to the extent there set forth in the people as well as in the Legislature. It seems to me that the term "by law" answers the purpose and I do not feel offhand like accepting the suggested change, but I would be entirely satisfied with whatever form of words the committee on Form and Phraseology may decide finally to be desirable.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I am convinced that this should be in its broadest sense, for there is no more important question before this Convention in preparation for after the war, no more serious phase than that of providing land for the citizens and particularly for those who return from the front. The English Government, the French Government and, so far as we have been able to learn, the German Government, are laying plans along this line. This is vital and it should be left to the law-making power, so that if cities and towns want to provide for those of their own who return to them and send them back to the soil and give them all the opportunity, they should have it and it should not be construed in a narrow way. If you do not do this these men will become paupers, for there is absolutely no way to keep a man from pauperism if you keep him from the soil.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: The last statement of the gentleman is more or less ridiculous. To think that Massachusetts or any city or town or the great United States Government is going to allow its brave defenders to become pauperized because you do not allow the people of the various communities to vote on such a question as this is positively preposterous. Now if there is one place where the words "General Court" are necessary, it is in this resolution. There is not a man who has an equity in a home, there is not a man who has a share in a cooperative bank, there is not a man who has a deposit in a savings bank, but who ought to vote that this matter should be in some responsible hands, even as bad as some of our members would make out the Legislature to be. If you do not do that, you do not know how far the Bolsheviki of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or any of the municipalities may carry this thing. You do not know where you are going to get off. Some restraint is necessary on this proposition. I did not object to "the law-making power" on the previous proposition because I thought if there was possibly a field for the initiative and referendum it might be in that. But this is another proposition; it should be safeguarded, and I believe the author and the man in charge, Mr. George W. Anderson, who was a strong initiative and referendum man, intended that this resolution should carry the words "the General Court".

Mr. McLaud of Greenfield: I discussed this very question with Mr. Anderson last summer before his appointment to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if my recollection serves me correctly it was the consensus of opinion and unanimous vote of the committee on Public Affairs that the chairman, Mr. Anderson, should revise every resolution submitted by the committee on Public Affairs to this Convention, so that it would be possible for the initiative and referendum to apply to all those resolutions. Why that was not done I do not know.

Mr. Underhill: I may be unduly alarmed. The initiative and referendum are not in operation in Massachusetts as yet, and possibly the recent publicity given to the chief backer of the initiative and referendum, Mr. Hearst, and his newspapers, may cause the people of Massachusetts to pause and consider whether anything advocated by that gentleman or his newspapers is for the best interest of the community, and it will be defeated. But, sir, if it should be adopted, I should like to remind you that since the Convention passed the initiative and referendum, we have had an illustration of the will and rule of the majority, in Russia. We have had an example of popular government without restraint and without restrictions, which could occur in Massachusetts as well as in Russia. And, sir, it seems to me that if we are going to open the doors wide, we are going to have every demagogue from Cape Cod to the Berkshire Hills telling the people: “All you have got to do now is to vote for a homestead, and the Government, the State or the municipality, is going to give it to you.” That is a plausible argument to put up to the voter and he is going to vote for the proposition. It ought to have some discussion. They ought to know where the money is coming from, they ought to know how far they should go on this matter, and it cannot be done through popular legislation, because, of course, if somebody is going to get something for nothing, or thinks he is, he is going to vote for it. The advocates of the initiative and referendum said they did not wish to supersede the Legislature,—what they wanted to get at was the corporations, the evil influences that were surrounding the Legislature. What evil influence, what corporation, is going to object to a decent proposition of providing homesteads? You may find the cooperative banks objecting, you may find the savings banks, trustees of the people’s money, objecting.

Mr. Mancovitz of Boston: I desire to ask the gentleman if he recalls the restriction in the resolution that we passed last fall prohibiting the application of the I. and R. to legislation by which appropriations are made, and if he can conceive of any building operation which would not carry an appropriation?

Mr. Underhill: It has been some time since we passed some of those amendments and rejected others. I am not positive that the gentleman is right in his assertion that we excluded all appropriations from the operation of the initiative and referendum. But even if we did it is only a matter of two years before that can be knocked out by the I. and R. and we can have appropriations under it. The Legislature established a budget system last year and it worked well,—it worked beautifully. We kept the expenditures down so that the tax levy of the State this year is the same as last year, notwithstanding the millions of dollars we have spent in war work. You cannot do that under the initiative and referendum, particularly if you are going to build homes or if the people think you are going to build homes for them.

Now, sir, if we have one thing that should go as it is reported,— referring these matters to the General Court, — if there is one thing that we can trust the General Court with, if you are not going to abolish and abandon it entirely, it certainly would be this measure, which is a pretty good political proposition for any man who may be a member of the General Court. But he has some responsibility; he has an opportunity to listen to the arguments; he hears both sides of the question, and then if he wants to go wrong, all well and good, — it is up to him. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Boston will not be adopted.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: An inquiry. Somehow this topic seems to have got before two committees and I find on page 5 of the calendar a resolution of the same purport reported by the committee on Social Welfare. There are slight differences between the two resolutions and I make this inquiry not with the desire that it shall be answered on the spot but that gentlemen of the two committees may inform us after the recess, if a vote should not be taken before the recess, as to these variations and as to which form the friends of the measure prefer. I would call their attention to the somewhat unusual phraseology in the resolution under discussion: "The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth". Offhand it seems to me singular—that we should say: "The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth" to do anything. Possibly the phraseology carries out the intent of the friends of the resolution, but an explanation on that score might be illuminating. But particularly I would be glad to be informed whether these two committees are in accord in preferring this wording to one that has been recommended by the committee on Social Welfare and is found on page 5 of the calendar.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: The language to which the gentleman from Waltham refers is the language that is found in the forty-third article of amendment, which this resolution is supposed to replace. The forty-third article of amendment contains that same language, — "the General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth", — and if we have committed a fault it is in adhering to the language of the present Constitution. The difference between this article of amendment and the forty-third article of amendment is twofold. In the first place, it gives the General Court power to authorize not only the Commonwealth but the cities and towns to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease and sell the same, for the purposes designated in this resolution. The second difference is that it strikes out the proviso contained in the forty-third article of amendment that the amendment should not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land and buildings at less than the cost thereof. The first amendment, I think, needs no explanation. We already have adopted a provision which has gone to the people relative to the advisability of cities and towns providing shelter for their inhabitants. As to the other part of it, the striking out of the proviso, it seemed to the committee that the language of the forty-third article of amendment might very possibly result, in case the Commonwealth had dealt unwisely in its real estate operations, in leaving the Commonwealth with property on its hands that it could not sell at cost and not being able to sell at cost would not be able to get rid of it at all, which was a decidedly unpleasant prospect to contemplate.
It was for that reason that the committee suggested striking out that proviso and adopting the resolution in the form in which it now is.

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: I simply want to call attention to one other difference. As a member of the committee on Social Welfare, though not in charge of the measure, I have some acquaintance with the situation. The two committees have acted entirely independently. There is another difference to which the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) has not referred. This proposed article both in the form in which it comes from the committee on Public Affairs and is now before us, and in the form in which it comes from the committee on Social Welfare, authorizes the leasing of such real estate as the Commonwealth or cities and towns might take under this authority. There is no such provision for leasing in the forty-third amendment, and the difference, the chief difference to my mind at least, between the two forms in which it is coming now to the Convention is in the provision regarding the leasing, which the committee on Social Welfare desired to guard somewhat more carefully than simply by authorizing the leasing.

The debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Quincy of Boston: On account of the remarks of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), it may be worth while to take a moment to refresh the recollection of the Convention as to the action which it already has taken in regard to the exclusion of certain matters from the initiative and referendum,—particularly as the memory of the gentleman from Somerville himself this morning seemed to be somewhat uncertain.

We had a long debate, as the Convention will remember, as to what ought to be excluded and what ought not to be excluded. The result was compromise action, as it may be called, in which a list of the excluded matters was drawn up. It was too long for many members and too short for some other members, but that stands as the action of the Convention. Now, among the classes of laws which are excluded are these: "Measures the operation of which is restricted to a particular town, city or other political division, or particular districts or localities of the Commonwealth." In other words, you cannot have special local legislation under the initiative and referendum as it stands. Also, a measure that makes a specific appropriation of money from the treasury of the Commonwealth by initiative petition is excluded. Now, I think that those two exclusions should remove largely, or partly at least, the apprehensions of the gentleman from Somerville.

Mr. Underhill: Will the gentleman please read the balance, the rest of that paragraph of exclusion?

Mr. Quincy: I am glad to do so. The rest of the paragraph reads:

But if a law approved by the people is not repealed, the General Court shall raise by taxation or otherwise and shall appropriate such money as may be necessary to carry such law into effect.

But note that the General Court has the power to repeal that law in spite of the fact that the people have passed it. If the General Court thinks it is a bad law and the appropriation ought not to be made it can repeal the law; it would be a law and not a constitutional amendment.
Mr. McLaud of Greenfield: I have forgotten the number of the initiative and referendum resolution. If there is an exclusion, that the initiative and referendum shall not apply to local measures, and then this measure is passed giving authority for the Legislature, as it is proposed, to pass a bill for cities and towns to buy, sell, subdivide, rent and lease land, then there is right off a conflict. I should like to ask the gentleman how, in his opinion, that would be construed? Would the initiative and referendum govern or would this one govern?

Mr. Quincy: I am glad to answer that question as far as I am able to do so. I suppose that legislation passed under the proposed article of amendment contained in document No. 320 restricted to a particular city or a particular town would not be subject to the initiative and referendum; but I am certain also that legislation, general in form, and giving all cities and all towns in the Commonwealth the proposed authority, namely, “to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease and sell the same for the purpose of relieving congestion,” etc., would be subject to the initiative and referendum as it now stands. I am sure also that the authority of the Commonwealth itself, meaning the executive government of the Commonwealth, to do these things named in this amendment, would be subject also to the initiative and referendum.

So that there is a real and a substantial difference, and the use of the words “General Court” may operate to effect a real and substantial restriction upon the scope of the amendment in relation to the initiative and referendum amendment as it stands.

Now, I merely want to suggest, in conclusion, that the Convention will save a great deal of time by standing to our decision in respect to the matters excluded from the operation of the initiative and referendum. Whether we have acted rightly or wrongly, let us stand by our decision and not have the question reopened as to what ought to be excluded and what ought not to be when we come to the specific amendments which we now have under consideration. The course suggested by the gentleman from Somerville, if I understand him correctly, certainly would tend to reopen the question of what ought to be so excluded and what ought not to be so excluded in connection with the further specific amendments which we now are considering and are to consider.

Mr. Underhill: In addition to the subject-matter contained in No. 142 on page 3 of the calendar, by the vote of the Convention this morning, we are discussing also No. 157 on page 5 of the calendar, a resolution empowering the General Court to authorize cities and towns to take land for providing homes for citizens.

Now, in discussing both of those questions, I suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Boston would be applied, if the Convention saw fit to apply it, to the second proposition, on page 5. It does not require a vivid imagination, nor extend it to a breaking point, to conjure up such a proposition as the city of Brockton buying land down on Cape Cod and providing summer homes, or Pittsfield buying up a tract in the Berkshires and providing autumn homes for their people, under the provisions of that resolution. I do not want to bring into the Convention or reopen the discussion of the I. and R.; but the whole tenor of the argument during the debate of that question was that the proponents did not wish the corporations, or individuals or companies, to misuse the people by influencing legislation in the House or in the Senate, and that there was no intention on the part of those who believed in the I. and R. to interfere unnecessarily with the prerogatives, activities or privileges of the Legislature; that that was not their intent or purpose.

Now, this is a legislative function. It can be left safely with the General Court, and I do not believe, with all deference to the various cities and towns of the Commonwealth, that you safely can leave such a proposition as the one on page 5, wide open. I do not mean to discriminate or to cast any aspersions upon Lawrence, but just to take it for an illustration. Lawrence, under a general proposition, such as is contained in this resolution, practically could bankrupt its treasury, and could do it through the votes of the people of that city under a general law. I do not mean to scoff at Lawrence, for I could mention a dozen cities or towns which I have in mind that might take such action as practically would drive from their borders every industrious, every provident and thrifty citizen, because the taxes would be so great that they would not be able to stand it, and, although their property were to be sacrificed, it would be better than, besides sacrificing their property, to go into debt in addition.

I hardly know how to get over this problem, except that we leave to the General Court such matters as this. The previous matter had to do with franchises, and I think the gentleman in this division who led the fight stated that perhaps it was necessary to adopt the amendment offered, and supported by him, in order that the people's rights under the initiative and referendum, if it is adopted, might be protected, in order that those who have large combinations of capital and were seeking franchises could not debauch,—if that is the right word,—or influence the Legislature.

But here is another proposition, and I say that in many cities or towns, and I do not know but that in the State as a whole, a demagogue of sufficient force and magnetism could influence the majority of the voters who would vote on the question, to place the Commonwealth in a very embarrassing financial position.

I referred this morning to the budget system. It was adopted and put into operation last year for the first time. There has been no better work done by the Legislature in the history of Massachusetts than the establishment of that budget system. It has saved the people of the Commonwealth a great deal of money, directly and indirectly, and should be extended to include the executive. I think it is recognized generally that if there was any waste or mis-expenditure of money this last year, it has been in another branch of the government rather than the Legislative, and if we can extend the budget system to the executive department, we are making another forward step. Then if we can establish a State wide budget system for municipalities we are making another step forward. But we cannot do it if you are going to leave such popular propositions as this might prove to be, to the votes of an irresponsible majority of the voters, and so I claim that there must be some distinction. This question necessarily must come up in some of the matters we are to consider later on, whether you are going to leave them wide open to the uninformed electorate, or whether you are going to safeguard them so that the rights of the people themselves may be conserved by a deliberative and responsible body.
Mr. Waterman of Williamstown: I trust that we will consider these two propositions very seriously, because I believe they are against the public welfare and against the individual welfare. If you remember, last summer we adopted or recommended to the people the Amendment XLVII, to provide in cases of emergency the right for the cities and towns and the State to act in those emergencies. Under that provision the Legislature during the winter enacted a law, Chapter 205, to carry out the provisions of the amendment that we submitted to the people and which the people accepted; and the Legislature was very careful and particular to see that the law that they should pass should be in harmony with and not exceed that designed by the Constitutional Convention, and they passed it and safeguarded it in the first section. I am sorry that this is not in print so that you could all get it, but I did secure this copy:

Cities and towns acting under the provisions of Article XLVII of the amendments to the Constitution of the Commonwealth for the purpose of maintaining, distributing and providing at reasonable rates, during time of war, public exigency, emergency or distress a sufficient supply of food, other common necessaries of life and temporary shelter for their inhabitants, shall proceed according to the provisions of this act.

They provided also, in section 2, that the purchases should be made and paid for in cash. They established also, in section 3, a form of accounting that should be satisfactory to the Bureau of Statistics, and that these accounts should be kept separate. They gave them also the extraordinary power of borrowing money to carry out these purposes beyond the debt limit or any obligation which they had for other purposes.

So that it seems to me as though the Legislature was conservative and met the question carefully and to the people's interests. Now we come down to these two amendments and we have a far different proposition. Under the amendment that was accepted in 1915, Amendment XLIII, they allowed the State to go into this business, but all their costs of buildings and of the enterprise, when sold, should not be sold for less than the cost thereof. The amendment suggested today cuts that out entirely. You can go as far as you have a mind to. It allows not only the Commonwealth, but the cities and towns, to go ahead and do all these matters. It leaves it open for a nice real estate scheme all over the Commonwealth, and you know how easy it is to say to somebody: "Why, I will help you get a home if you will vote for me for so-and-so." It is easy for some people to fall for that sort of thing and vote themselves into trouble.

Now, the history of this municipal ownership is that government supervision has been to its loss. It has thrown people out of homes rather than given them homes. The very people you want to give homes are deprived of it because of the exceeding great cost when the municipality or the State goes to work to try to provide homes for them. That has been the history of several countries which have gone into public ownership, to furnish homes for their citizens. Not only that, but it immediately segregated a section of the public in such way that they say: "There, that man is living in a place that is furnished by the Commonwealth," contrary to all our principles of pride and thrift encouraging people to strive for themselves. So that when you stop to think how serious this proposition is I think you will kill both measures.
Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I listened this morning with attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), when he assured us that there was no agency in the Commonwealth that would do anything that opposed what I conceive to be one of the most feasible ways to provide land for the people.

I hold in my hand a copy of a paper called "Industry." It is a bulletin issued by the Associated Industries of Massachusetts for the information of its members. I want to call it to the attention of this Convention, in view of the fact of the words of the gentleman that there is no organization that would oppose any remedial measures such as are proposed. I want to call attention to its heading, and it is very peculiar, because we sat here last year and heard considerable said about pressure on the Legislature. This is what the heading says,—it is not a long document and I am only going to read a few lines:

Legislative Lobby. No laws hurtful to industry passed by this year's General Court. Personal attention by manufacturers to legislative matters proves effective.

Listen to this:

Facts presented by direct method make strong impression on committees.

Now, what were some of the things that they were opposing? We are assured that there was no one who opposed these things by the people. Here was the most powerful organization of industry in Massachusetts, representing practically all kinds of industry, and millions upon millions of dollars. What did they oppose? They opposed the fifty-hour bill, the "three-tour" bill for workers, the weavers' bill, and they opposed the petition of the American Federation of Labor that cities and towns might be permitted to provide homes for their citizens.

What was submitted last year by this Convention was adopted by the people along this line. Into the Legislature came a measure providing for homes for its citizens in line with that amendment, putting it squarely up to the Legislature of Massachusetts. That bill was passed in the Senate and came into the House, and was killed in the last days of the session of the Legislature through the efforts of some of the men who have spoken on this floor, who assured us that there was no influence or no force that would deprive the people of this State of an equal chance and an equal opportunity. The labor organizations, and others who ask for this, ask not charity. They simply ask that land be put where it can be made available and useful to the citizens of this Commonwealth.

I cannot conceive how any city or town could wreck its finances by buying homes for its citizens, if they shall not go beyond the debt limit. I do not think the argument is good. It will be necessary to do this to get homes particularly for those who return from the war. Those men come from the different cities, and it may be possible that the men in each city do not want to be separated from the ties that always have bound them, and they do not want the State to provide homes for them away from the homes of their families. It should be right and proper for the city that takes a landed interest to take it with due process of law.

I trust this measure goes to the people, and there will be no hobble or any strings upon it, as has been attempted with other measures.
which already have been adopted. There is no man in this Convention, and no man in the Legislature, who understands the conditions that surround it, but will say that the measure providing for fuel is better than what we have had. The people voted for the right to use their own money to keep them warm and take the industry of furnishing fuel out of the hands of private speculators, where it has been and still continues to be, even under the present law which has been passed by the Legislature, and which goes where all remedial legislation goes,—to the mercy of the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: I think it is only fair to say, for the committee on Social Welfare, on behalf of Resolution No. 157, that there was a long hearing, in which many persons appeared before the committee in favor of this measure, particularly the chairman of the Homestead Commission, who explained at great length to the committee how the Homestead Commission is constituted at the present time, and under its powers and duties was hampered somewhat in carrying out the spirit and purpose of the homestead law; and, for that reason the provision that appears in Amendment 43 of the Constitution, requiring that the sale of land or buildings shall be for not less than the cost thereof, was struck out, because of the fact that many persons who desired to take advantage of the homestead law of this Commonwealth were unable to pay at once the amount of money required.

It was for that reason the proposal was incorporated in No. 157 that the land might be leased, or that it might be subdivided, in order that all persons desiring to do so might take advantage of the homestead provision. There were a large number of public-spirited, philanthropic citizens, who came in and represented the conditions that existed in the various cities and towns, and, after a careful investigation, represented that this was a necessary measure. It was so safeguarded by our committee that I may say to the gentleman in this division from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) that he need not have any apprehension of financial ruin to the cities or towns; that the city or town judges for itself whether it shall take advantage of the act,—there is nothing obligatory upon them; so that it hardly makes any difference whether this law is one which is enacted by the Legislature or whether it is enacted by the operation of the initiative and referendum.

It is a good law, it is along lines of progress, along lines of real helpfulness,—a method adopted by the State or by the municipality to assist its citizens. Call it paternalism if you wish to, but it is a good thing. It is a good thing for this State, and we ought to adopt it.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I have favored the initiative and referendum and objected to any limitations being placed upon that measure, but I voted with Mr. Clapp of Lexington to amend with "the General Court." I favor the same with this matter.

Why? Because two distinctly different matters are mixed up in this resolution. One is fundamental,—a principle; that is, shall the Commonwealth and its towns and cities be permitted to engage in furnishing homes for the people? Now, that issue being put directly to the people, easily may be comprehended by them, and they may vote Yes or No on that. One step beyond that and you go into the legislative details, a deliberative field, and those who believe in homes may be led very easily to vote against it, if they listen to the Virginia-Massachusetts voice of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) shouting "Bolsheviki". But his voice would be silenced if it could be said: "The one thing we want to determine at the polls is: Shall this great principle of the people owning homes by the aid of the Commonwealth be established as constitutional by legislation?"

Now, we ought not to be disturbed by the suggestions of the gentleman just behind me (Mr. Waterman) as to what is going to be the effect of such a principle. That great State that was founded by the exponent of brotherly love, William Penn, was built upon this self-same principle of furnishing homes to those who came to settle. It not only invited and welcomed the persons but it loaned the credit of the State, so that they might own a home, pay for it in instalments and thus build up the State; and it was built up along that principle.

Benjamin Franklin, standing before the British Government before the time of the Revolution, was asked about the currency which the Colonies were floating at that time. When asked if the Colonies were using British gold, he told them No, that the Colonies were using bills of credit issued by the people. The currency emitted by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was founded upon land, founded upon the homes; and he, in common with Jefferson and others, believed and declared that there could be no better currency, no better exchange medium, than that founded upon the homes of the people and finding redemption in the credit of the people who issued it.

Well, this new coming democracy will be founded on a system that will give homes to the people. In our little city of Brockton, which we hope at some time to rival that of Brookline, we have schools which teach citizenship to the "Bolsheviki," or what apparently would pass as such to the eye of the gentleman from Somerville,—at least some of them come from Russia and some from every other country you can speak of. They know little of our language; sometimes we have to give them numbers in our factories when they first come because we cannot pronounce their names, for fear sometimes we might be charged with circulating improper literature. But these people come readily to learn and Brockton citizens lend effort so far as they can to instruct those people in citizenship. We graduated 192 last year out of the Young Men's Christian Association's efforts, fitted for citizenship. The Chamber of Commerce furnished a part of the money to carry on that school of citizenship.

When they talk to Brockton about sabotage, about Americanization, we answer them in this way: The city of Brockton pays the best wage of any city in this Commonwealth; we have the best organized,—not "Unionized"; I did not say that, I said organized,—city in the United States. We have not got any of these unpatriotic outbreaks because we are paying the men a living wage. What has that got to do with it? Why, the foundation of all Americanization, the way to humanize America, to Americanize America,—because the terms are synonymous,—is to pay a man a wage that represents the product of his toil. It gives him an American living. With that wage we want a man to have a home. Away with these sugar box tenements, these three, five or six-deckers, with everybody's children quarreling, with the families quarreling over the children's quarrels. That is un-American.
Was it Pitt or Burke who said at the time of our Revolution that we were unconquerable because the man took a musket in his hand, placed his feet on his own land, and defended his own home? That was true then; it is true now; it is working out that way in this great war. Where to-day is it that men have done and will do their best? Where does he say: "You shall not pass"? It is on the line where the French and Italian homes are being defended. There the enemy meets slaughter; it is where the homes are, where the men and the women are defending them; there they go down to death willingly because it is in defence of their homes.

A true democracy arises where men have an interest in the soil; and men cannot get an interest in the soil under present economic conditions. Men did not get an interest in the soil of Great Britain until it passed an act by which the great landed estates could be taken and subdivided; thus the people could get a foothold and become better citizens.

It must appeal to the friends of the initiative and referendum and to the labor men. This is to provide for the taking of land for homes for the people. The principle should be kept clear from the details which need deliberative legislation. You should want it so if you wish to carry it at the polls. If you want to kill it, all you have got to do is to send it out loaded with details; then it is subject to attack through the details.

You ought not to be so particular, you friends of the initiative and referendum, in limiting legislation by the General Court. Deliberation on details should be by the General Court; fundamental principles, a change in the Constitution that they can comprehend, by the people.

It should not be a proposition for taking land in one city by one way, and in another city by another way. The general proposition for the ownership of land, for the purpose of giving the people homes, is a distinct proposition and will be adopted.

Who rides through this Commonwealth, in any part of it, who cannot see places where he might say: "I wish I owned a home here?" There are beautiful places, overlooking streams, overlooking valleys. Suppose we carry out the principle of operating street railways to connect these lands with our factories. Suppose we renew the natural initiative in a man by putting him back on the farm for a part of his time instead of stifling his initiative by putting him up against a factory machine, making him a cog-wheel, so to speak, and destroying the true American spirit of leadership and self-confidence. Suppose we could connect these factories with farm homes in the country lands. Are you not going to raise better children out under the shadows of the trees on the hills bordering the streams than you are under the cursed darkening of the influence of the factory and the squabbling of the tenement-houses? For a new democracy people must be raised who are worthy to propagate it. You cannot raise them until you place the family in its own home, the American home, the home that has land about it, in which one can quarrel without letting the whole neighborhood know that one had a quarrel. Home quarrels once in a while may be necessary to show who is boss; and it develops some good principles on which the home ought to be run.

Let us, in all these matters that are coming before us, try to distinguish between the fundamental principle which can be made clear, and which can thus be passed upon "Yes" or "No" by the people; and leave the details to our deliberative bodies because they belong to a representative democracy.

An expression of the people on this great question: "Shall the Commonwealth by itself or through its subdivisions take over land and provide for the building of homes?" is what we want. That would include the very laudable suggestion of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill). I disagree with his suggestion that it is ludicrous to suppose the city of Brockton might provide for summer homes. We who can have it get it; and we who have it, are we so narrow in our conception of the brotherhood or the fatherhood that we would not to God that it could be so ordered that everybody could enjoy just what we are enjoying? [Applause.] Are any of us so deaf to the vibrations of suffering that surround us that we have enjoyed something without having our enjoyment greatly nullified by the remembrance that arises in our own mind that there is suffering somewhere? It is the duty of society to relieve that suffering. It is just as feasible to take fathers and mothers out on a summer outing as it is to take the children, and God knows the fathers and mothers need to commune with nature occasionally quite as much as the children.

I thank the Convention for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. James R. Ferry of Northbridge moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 6, the word "lease".

Mr. Ferry of Northbridge: The subject of State homesteads has been given serious consideration for the last two years by the Legislature, and especially the Social Welfare Committee, of which I have been a member, and in drawing up the first bill the committee, with the Homestead Commission, thought that it would be unwise to lease or to rent any of the property so purchased or built by the State. Our bill therefore prohibited this leasing and renting.

It seems to me that the members of the Convention do not realize that we have a homestead proposition now. We have something like nine buildings built by the State, nearly finished at this time I presume, and I am somewhat surprised at the statement of the member in this division (Mr. Flaherty) stating that the commission wished to have the law changed so that they could sell them for less than cost. Now, it seems to me that this would be a very unwise proposition. It does not seem to me that any commissioner or any official should be allowed to dispose of property that the State owned for less than cost or at whatever price they might see fit to charge. This would be the same with renting or leasing. This commission or a commission in the cities and towns might be influenced,—and a great many of them are influenced more or less politically,—thinking it would improve their position with the people if they sold or rented the property of the State, city or town for less than what the city or town could afford to rent or sell for.

This is a large question, and should be gone over very thoroughly. It seems to me that this whole housing problem, both of the United States, and of the State and the individuals carrying it on today, is all wrong. The houses they are building are not large enough. We say that we want to have houses that will house our foreign population, and most of them that are married have large families, three or four, five or six, and how in the world are you going to put a man and his wife and five or six children into one of these small coops with four small rooms and a bath? Now, this is the proposition. The men who are back of this housing problem do not realize what the people need, and it is up to us here in Massachusetts and our State commission to build something that is appropriate, something that is going to do some good, that is going to relieve the congestion that we are talking about; but you never will relieve it by building a small shack, at the cost of $3,000, that the poor people cannot afford to purchase because they cannot get their family into it.

I know what I am talking about. I have studied this subject for three years. I have charge of over 700 tenements, with some three or four thousand people living in them, and I know what it means. I know that if you are going to please the people, if you are going to have them live right, if you are going to bring them up to our standard of living you must have homes for them, and they must be decent homes, and large enough to accommodate the whole family, so when the children grow up they will be glad to invite their friends and neighbors to come in and visit them. But you never will do it on the lines on which this housing problem is being conducted today. I hope my amendment will be accepted.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if No. 157 does not cover that. It says: "The General Court shall have the power to authorize cities and towns to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell, and under the provision of such regulations as the General Court may establish or approve, to lease or rent the same for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens." Excuse me just a moment. I merely will ask: Would the provision for regulation by the General Court cover that?

Mr. Ferry: I understand the scheme is now that the Legislature shall not have the privilege of regulating. That is what I object to. I object to giving the people the right to legislate on this matter. It is all right to say we trust the people,—I trust them,—but when we come to a matter like this, where someone, some commission or committee must study this thing out, decide what is the best to do, how much it ought to cost, how much of the taxes of the State or city or town should be expended for that purpose, the people do not get together; it is impossible for them to get together. Somebody has got to make these regulations, and I think it would be a very unwise policy if we do not allow the Legislature to regulate the building of homesteads.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I hope the amendment will not pass, and my reason is that it is covered fully in document No. 324. The gentleman from Somerville in this division (Mr. Underhill) said that the co-operative banks of this State would be opposed to this measure. Why, this is a line in the way of co-operative banks. The co-operative bank was formed for the purpose of giving to the laboring people a home, and this is merely in the same line. In Lowell they have started to build a few homes and to sell them to the people of Lowell. Well, no doubt but what they have made a mistake in the building of them. There is no question but if the Commonwealth take this matter up they will build homes large enough for any family, that is, a home with about six rooms and a bath. It would cost only the difference of about $100 more for the addition of the two or three rooms. So I say that this matter should be passed. Either one of these measures is all right. I do not care which one of them is accepted, but I myself think the one that was reported here by the chairman, the ex-Governor, Mr. Brackett, who was the originator of, and introduced the first bill in the Legislature of Massachusetts for, the co-operative banks, is the better one. I do not think there was a better authority on co-operative banks in this State than ex-Governor Brackett and I am satisfied that he would not have had his name attached to anything that would not be right. If any resolution is to be passed I should like to see the one with the name of ex-Governor Brackett passed by this Convention.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: I rise in order to correct any misapprehension that might be in the mind of the delegate on my right (Mr. Ferry) as to what I said concerning the incorporation of that portion of our resolution relating to leasing property. He quoted me as saying that the members of the Homestead Commission said to our committee that it wanted an opportunity to give land or homes to persons for less than cost, in other words, at the expense of the Commonwealth. I did not intend to be understood as saying that. If my language is susceptible of that interpretation I wish to withdraw it. What was said by the member of the Homestead Commission, Mr. Sterling, who appeared before our committee, was this: That under the present rules or under their present authority and power they were rather restricted, first, because of the fact that they were required to get the full price from a person whom they desired to aid; and that the Legislature and the Attorney-General rather felt that they needed more power, more authority. The purpose and design of this amendment is to relieve the Homestead Commission of any restriction that might now exist, in order that they might have full power and authority to relieve admittedly bad conditions existing in the State, not, however, for the purpose of making a gift to any person, not for the purpose of gratuity, but rather along the lines of aiding persons who desire homes and to give them an opportunity to acquire them.

Mr. Kelley of Rockland: It seems clear to me that a further word of explanation will be very apt at this point. We must start with the fact that the people already have passed upon this question fundamentally, as suggested by the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown). We have the 43d amendment now; the first resolution under consideration here repeals the 43d amendment and makes what change? It simply inserts the word "lease", which is not in the 43d amendment, and strikes out the provision against selling property for less than cost. If you adopt the first resolution here you change the 43d amendment simply by inserting the word "lease" and striking out the provision relating to the sale below cost.

Now the resolution next in order considered with this is No. 324, reported by the committee on Social Welfare. And by the way, my name is mentioned there as in charge of the measure only because Governor Brackett has passed from us. That committee gave careful consideration, and the whole matter turned upon the additional power of leasing. The committee, as you will see, in No. 324 carefully provides that cities and towns under regulations and provisions of the General Court, may lease, and there it stops, so that No. 324 does not repeal the article which the people already have accepted and made a part of the Constitution; it is supplemental to it. Now, then, I submit to the Convention that if the Convention wishes to repeal the 43d amendment, which the people already have adopted, they will pass the first resolve. It adds simply the power of leasing and strikes out the provision the people adopted,—that no sales can be made for less than cost.

If you adopt the second resolution you give the added power to lease, but that power is given under such regulations and provisions as the General Court may establish. And that need not be, as you will perceive, a general regulation and provision. The city of Pittsfield may have conditions unlike the city of Lynn. My town may have conditions unlike the conditions in other towns. If my town or the city of Lynn see a way in which they may establish homes and establish them right, I assume that the General Court some time, if ever, acting upon this, will see that the work is done right. Now, the power given to the city of Lynn to do this work and to lease may require different provisions and regulations than would be imposed upon the town in which I live, and so the committee on Social Welfare believed in starting with the present amendment, which the people have adopted, and then adding power to lease, subject to the provisions and regulations imposed by the General Court.

Mr. Waterman of Williamstown: I just want to say that last winter, upon the application of the Homestead Commission, these extra powers that they desire in order to carry out their scheme were adopted and given them. They had an appropriation of $50,000, and they bought a tract of land in Lowell, and they have spent $43,000 for twelve tenements. You can figure up and see how much each of those cost and how much rent you ought to get for each tenement. Now they are paying in, those that are sold or arranged for, certain sums of money, and that money, with the balance left in the treasury, can be used for the furthering of the scheme. Also they can insure the building, which they could not do before, because it was State property. So that those matters were taken care of by the Legislature this winter.

Mr. Brown: I should like to have it made plain how much of that available money that Homestead Commission felt called upon to invest in land before they commenced building homes.

Mr. Waterman: I think they paid $8,000 for it.

Mr. Brown: Was it not $10,000?

Mr. Waterman: Whatever the sum was. Of course I suppose that is taken into account with the $43,000, but that will be proportioned according to the number of tenements that are put on the land. At any rate, it is a costly experiment for a small house. As I am credibly informed, in order to turn round in the kitchen they hang the hot water boiler on the ceiling.

Mr. Underhill: The gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) has given you this afternoon an illustration of the dangers which I tried to point out, for the members of this Convention listened to his fervid oratory and at his conclusion gave him a round of applause. But sir, just let us analyze a few of his most rounded periods, which the crowd, or the voter, if you please, the all powerful, would not stop to analyze. He says: “Where are the words emblazoned, ‘They shall not pass’? At the doors of the homes of the French and the Italian.” But he does not say that the French and the Italian built their own homes; they did not ask the government to do it for them, or the State or municipality. Nor did he say that what is worth having is worth working for and earning yourself, and that if you are going to get it through political pull, as most of these people would get the homes that were built by the municipality, it would not be worth staying in or worth fighting for.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to inquire from the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) if he contends that a man without a home has nothing worth fighting for.

Mr. Underhill: I hardly catch the drift of the gentleman’s question. If he will put it again I will try to answer it. To continue, the gentleman also said that in Brockton they paid a living wage, and that is what made the Bolsheviki of his own city so happy, contented and satisfied. Now, if they pay them a living wage,—and, sir, I have a deposit and a life insurance policy in one of the Brockton banks, and know there are cooperative banks there,—why, if they are paying them a living wage, cannot they go to their cooperative bank, and why cannot they build their own homes and save their self-respect, and not have to get into a political mix-up in order to get a home? They would have to be heelers, they would have to be political workers, in order that they might get the first chance at the first home or the hundredth chance at the hundredth home. His argument was all along that line of fervid oratory, to use a kindlier expression than I did this morning, that is going to affect the mass of the people. Does any one in this Convention believe that if that gentleman went before the voters of the city in which he is so popular and gave voice to the expressions which he has given this afternoon that they would consider for one moment the cost to that municipality? No, they would vote unanimously, practically, for the expenditure of any amount of money for the buying of summer or winter homes. And who would have to pay for it? Why, the very people who are provident, the people who have saved and who have money in the cooperative banks against the day that they may start their own home. The man who already has saved and has started his little home, and as his home is taxed by the municipality, would have to pay for the establishment of a home for somebody who spends his time between Brockton and Boston, having a good time, going to the theatres, spending, spending rather than saving, saving.

Now, sir, I know what I am talking about. My first efforts at saving were through the medium of a cooperative bank. I have been a depositor in the cooperative bank ever since I was fifteen years old. I paid off the mortgage on my first shop, where I learned my trade as a blacksmith, through the cooperative bank. I paid off the mortgage on my first home through the cooperative bank. I paid off the mortgage on my summer home, a modest little place down on the Cape, through the cooperative bank. I had no better opportunities, I had no more favoritisism shown me than any other individual in this Commonwealth, and my wage when I started to save in the cooperative bank did not begin to compare with the wage they pay in Brockton.
What I object to, sir, is this giving power to the people and not giving with it responsibility. It is giving to the people who come to our shores the idea that they need not conform to the laws and the rules and the regulations and the living of the majority of our people, but they can have special laws passed for their special benefit, and that we must make the country fit them under special law. That is not the right way to bring up good citizens. For years we have had the Irish, the French and other immigrants coming to our shores, who have had the greatest incentive to progress,—that of ambition,—and they have proved themselves worthy of that incentive and that ambition. From being the ditch diggers, the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, today the descendants of those nationalities fill our highest positions of trust and responsibility. They are lawyers, teachers, doctors, the professional and the business men of this Commonwealth, and they have well repaid the Commonwealth for the opportunity which the Commonwealth gave them. Are you going to treat another race of people who come here differently from those races that already have come here and made good? I say there is no reason for it. It is educating them along the line of poverty or pauperism, to do everybody rather than to do for themselves and for the government.

I am at the head of an organization which for 25 years struggled for existence. Why? Because, in the generosity of its heart, it was giving daily, weekly, monthly and yearly to applicants that aid which they thought they needed. It was a failure. It was down and out. I established a different policy, not the policy of financially aiding those people continuously when they came for relief, but of finding what they could do, what best they were fitted to do, and helping them to help themselves,—reestablishing, maintaining and developing their self-respect. That, sir, prevented them from becoming paupers, from becoming public charges, and where we used to have man after man come to this organization and receive temporary aid, and then drift gradually from our aid to accepting aid from the State and the municipality, for the last two years there have been very few people who have come to us who have not been able to reestablish themselves through our suggestion, through advice, and through making up a budget system for them to follow,—teaching them to save rather than waste.

What is the use of taking the money away from those who have been provident, those who have been thrifty, those who have been self-denying, those who have been careful, and spending it, as you are going to do under this proposition if you leave it in the hands of the people, for those who have been thriftless? That is what I am objecting to. I am not objecting to the fundamental principle of aid and assistance which this resolution may give, but I am objecting to giving the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) or any one who has the flow of language that he commands, the opportunity of fooling the people into the belief that they are to have anything they want by voting for it rather than by working for it.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: My friend from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), who we know is the watch-dog of the treasury, is always very much averse to spending any kind of money. He started very early in the life of this Convention to save all the money possible.
He did not want the speeches reported. And now I understand he is advertising co-operative banks. The trouble with the gentleman from Somerville is that he has not got away from the atmosphere of the Legislature, and he intends that every member of this Convention should be stretched on the Procrustean bed of that Legislature. Now, if he kindly will get away from the Legislature and get out into the broader fields, broader lines of political economy, he will find that this is a Convention and not a Legislature. His mind is so provincial that he cannot get away from Somerville. He forgets that the great city of Boston is still on the map.

Gentlemen, I want to read to you, if you will spare me just a moment, from Mr. Delos F. Wilcox's book entitled, "The American City, a problem in Democracy," and edited by Richard T. Ely, Director of the School of Economics and Political Science at the University of Wisconsin. I come from perhaps the greatest congested ward in the city of Boston. I know what this tenement-house district is. I know the sufferings of these poor children who are born of foreign parents, and who had no choice in coming to our shores. These children did not elect to come to America; they were brought here, and these children have got to be taken care of. If it was their father's or their mother's fault in leaving the other side, these little children ought not to be sentenced and punished because of the foolishness of their parents. This author says,—it may be illuminating to my friend from Somerville:

Herein lies perhaps the deepest tragedy of civilization, namely, ... that in the slums and among the poor we have swarms of children pinched and dwarfed by conditions that make home a nightmare; while all through the slums the multitudes of homeless men and women who fall a prey to vice and are dedicated to race degeneration, multiply. Some of the conditions leading to immorality are bound up with the housing problem. Thirty years ago Mr. Charles Loring Brace described evil conditions of life in the tenement-houses of New York city. These conditions have since borne an abundant harvest of vice. Said he: "If a female child be born and brought up in a room of one of those tenement-houses, she loses very early the modesty which is the great shield of purity. Personal delicacy becomes almost unknown to her. Living, sleeping, and doing her work in the same apartment with men and boys of various ages, it is well nigh impossible for her to retain any feminine reserve and she passes almost unconsciously the line of purity at a very early age."

And so all through the reports of the social welfare committees of the large cities. The attack which my brother has made on the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown) is simply camouflage, talk that may go in the Legislature but not talk which should enter into a Constitution which is bound to last a century. Gentlemen, do not allow this man to put your minds on the Procrustean bed of the Legislature, but think as you should think in a Constitutional Convention. We have this great problem in the city of Boston. Thousands upon thousands of poor unfortunates are dwarfed in our tenement-house districts. What has London done? London has made great parks, called the lungs of London. What has Buenos Aires done? Spent thousands of dollars in making great avenues, boulevards and plazas. What have the cities in the west done? And Boston, through its narrowness, through following the leadership of men like the delegate from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) and his provincially minded place, through such cranks as he, is a dead city, the dead sea of Sargasso of our civilization.
Mr. Johnson of Worcester: We have two measures here which are much alike and yet somewhat different. We may not pass either, and yet the principle we may approve in both. I move that these two measures be recommitted to the committees on Social Welfare and Public Affairs, sitting jointly, with instructions to report one resolution.

Mr. Bullock of New Bedford: I cannot see that any good is going to be served by recommitting these measures. While it is a large question, it is a simple one and I believe that every man in this Convention is capable of understanding the principle involved. While the two are very similar, it is true also that every man in this Convention is capable of deciding which is the proper one to pass. Therefore I trust that recommittal will not occur on either of them.

And while I am on my feet I want to say that I also trust that the amendment striking out the word “lease” will not prevail. The committee on Social Welfare took particular pains to insert the word “lease” because the Legislature in its wisdom may see fit to make such provisions governing the regulation of this very thing that the money received from the lease can be applied to the extinguishment of the debt, the same as the coöperative banks now do. And while I do not quite agree with the first resolution, No. 320, for the simple reason that it repeals that entire article of the Constitution, yet I believe that this Convention will make no mistake if it kills No. 320 and adopts No. 324, which will establish all that is necessary and will safeguard the interests of the State and the municipality, because each city or town will be obliged to come to the Legislature and state its needs and state its financial condition and operate under such regulations as they may provide. Therefore I believe that with the discussion which we have had on this subject there is no necessity for a recommittal of either resolution, and I trust that such will not be the case.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: I desire to call the attention of the Convention to the last three lines contained in the proviso of the 43d amendment. The 43d amendment, as has been explained to you, provides that the Commonwealth may take land, hold, improve and subdivide the same, but the proviso states that “this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.” You will see readily that the effect of the proviso is to make the other provision practically nugatory. Take conditions as we find them today in cases of exigency, where we need to develop large tracts of land, and put buildings upon them perhaps in congested districts. In my own city, for instance, where the Fore River plant is located, we need hundreds of houses for homes for laborers, but at the same time we are faced with a tremendous increase in cost for labor and materials. Now, if we should start in under the 43d amendment as it now is to take the land and build the houses at a high cost, unless we were able to sell every one of them at once, we never might be able to sell the balance at all. If the war should stop tomorrow or next year it would be absolutely impossible to sell the remaining houses in competition with lower cost prices. What are you going to do with them if you have this proviso in here that you shall not sell any of those houses or any of that land for less than the cost thereof? The community might go bankrupt, as the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) said, because it might have $100,000 worth of land and buildings on its hands which it never could sell, in competition with other buildings, built two years or five years from now.

Mr. Ferry of Northbridge: I should like to ask the gentleman if, in case the commission built houses and afterwards the price fell, there is any objection to the commission going to the Legislature for further instructions as to what to do with those buildings, rather than sell one for $3,000, another for $2,500, another for $2,000, just as they saw fit.

Mr. Blackmur: If I understand the gentleman's question correctly, I am dealing with one matter and he is dealing with another matter. That is to say, I am dealing now with the constitutional amendment as it is. You could not go to the Legislature and get authority to sell the houses for less than cost in the face of this constitutional amendment, containing the proviso in the 43d Article of Amendment. But if the gentleman means if we left this whole question to the Legislature to determine without any proviso, why, I say yes, you could go to the Legislature and get a change of law from time to time. And so I say that this proviso in this 43d amendment as it is now makes this 45d amendment practically worthless. No city, or town, not even the Commonwealth, would be justified in going ahead to engage in any such proposition.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU of Lowell: Those of us from Lowell who have seen the cottages built by the Homestead Commission are surprised to see that authority is demanded for more cottages. If I understand correctly, the cottages that have been built in Lowell are now called race suicide cottages. They are so small that a family cannot be lodged in them. And they happen to be in my district, so I have had occasion to look at them. Now, I know of one individual who builds cottages within 200 yards from these particular cottages. He builds a cottage of six and seven rooms of a better quality than the State cottages, and he sells it at a lower price and on better terms than the State cottages are sold. So it seems to me that the experiment so far has been a total failure, and that there is no demand, especially in Lowell, and no necessity for further amendments to the Constitution to give more power and authority to the Homestead Commission, and that these amendments, both of them, ought to be rejected.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I just wish to say one word on the question of recommittal. I see the chairman of the committee on Rules is not here. Yes, he is here. Well, I am sure that what I say will have his approval, — I trust it will, — and that is that it is unnecessary to recommit. We have spent nearly all the afternoon here on this matter. If this resolution is passed it can be amended, and the members of these two committees can talk it over and decide on what amendment is desirable. If recommittal is refused this matter will come up again in due course, and amendments can be made. It seems to me we will have lost half a day or more if we recommit, and especially if we recommit to a joint committee, where they will have to get together and spend some time in threshing the matter out. So I trust recommittal will not prevail.

The motion to recommit was negatived.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I would say to the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) that I did not say that we had Bolsheviki in Brockton; he used the word. Before I plead to his charge of Bolsheviki I should first wish to discover whether it was in the nature of a condemnation or something in the nature of a virtue. If it is a virtue, we have it in Brockton; if it is a vice, we have not got it. [Laughter.] So it all depends upon his definition of the Bolsheviki, because it was he who charged the Bolsheviki upon Brockton. Let me say, also, we have many nationalities in Brockton. We take into our labor-unions these men who cannot speak the English language; we teach them the elements of citizenship. We have the cooperation of our manufacturers and business men. We are trying there to build up a city. The gentleman asks: "Why don't they get homes, with their large wages?" I answer: For the same reason that men do not get homes in almost any village or city. It is because the far-sighted capitalists, large and small, capture all the land available and thereby force the man who builds a home to pay tribute to the foresight of such individual. It is a profit without rendering service. It is the use of a natural resource. I know of no other practical system by which land can be held than that in which society finally has settled upon. I am not a single-taxer, although I believe in the principle of taxing the value of unearned increment. I urge that the resources of the State be energized to provide homes for the homeless. The keynote of my address, if there was anything in it of oratory or worthy of the other commendations of the gentleman from Somerville, was because I pleaded for a Nation of home builders and home owners. I call his attention to the fact that a social democracy, in its broad term, in the United States lasted up to about 1845 or 1850. In the years previous in the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts land was divided fairly evenly. In the Convention of 1820 and also the Convention of 1853 you will find allusions to that condition. Daniel Webster held the idea that a man could acquire a home if he tried and that he should acquire it; and that he was not holding his place in society until he did acquire property. It was from this viewpoint that he claimed society was controlled by wealth.

I want a nation of home builders. These men cannot now get these homes because they have to pay too much for the land. The Homestead Commission, for a reform commission representing organized labor, perhaps paid too much for their land. Cheap land is essential to provide a home such as many wage-workers can afford to own. That is what I am urging. The gentleman from Somerville must have recognized that there was some foundation in the remark that I was making, and he was not justified, as I see it, in saying; that I was misleading either this Convention or Brockton.

It is a vital subject. Did the French hold their territory? Yes. Did the Italians? Yes. Who broke in the recent Hun drive? The British. Who saved the day? The owners of the French territory, the French soldiers marching day and night to get there; and they did get there and joined the lines and saved democracy. What were they marching for, night and day? For their homes,—that their men and women and children should not be expatriated; they passed the old and the young, those who could escape, trudging along down through the lines where they could be free from the reach of the Huns. Who broke in our American Revolution? The Hessians, the Huns, the hired troops. They could not stand against the home owners. We drove them to disastrous defeat. If the Nation is to live free it must be in homes. If there was no other thing in this Convention, and you could provide a proper system to use the credit of this Common-wealth for building cheap homes for the people, it would be a monument to those who devised it. I ask the gentleman from Somerville, what difference does it make where "Home, Sweet Home," comes from,—whether it comes from our fathers by descent, although indeed that is more dear, or whether it comes from a cooperative bank or whether it comes through the State, or in any other way; it is the home; that is what I advocate,—a system to facilitate the building and selling of homes.
HOMES FOR CITIZENS. 427

It is very clear what we are trying to do and I hope the gentlemen of this Convention will amend this proposition if it is not in proper form, and finally adopt a proposition to go down to the people to provide homes for the homeless in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I would not take the floor at this time on this matter if I did not think I could be of a little assistance to the Convention in telling the circumstances under which the amendment under discussion came to be adopted. I happened to be House chairman of the committee which reported Article XLIII of the amendments to the present Constitution in its present form. The gentleman from Worcester in the second division (Mr. Hobbs) was Senate chairman of that committee and the matter under discussion with us today, as I conceive it, is whether Article XLIII, which we were pretty fairly proud of at the time we submitted it to the people, should be changed or should be supplanted by something else. The gentleman from Worcester and myself wrote the forty-third amendment in its present form advisedly and the three questions which the gentleman from Brockton has just raised were all debated seriously by our committee, and in the form that it takes at present, if my memory is correct, it passed the House of Representatives with not more than six or seven dissenting votes, practically the unanimous judgment of the House of Representatives, and, as you remember, passed the Senate and was adopted by the people.

Now let me briefly give you the reasons as they lay in our minds at that time as to why we reported the resolution in its present form. We did not authorize cities and towns and counties to have this power. We did advisedly retain that power in the Commonwealth solely, for this reason: That we thought it was a tremendous power to give to a small town or to a town of sparse population which had large areas within its jurisdiction; that it was safer on the whole to authorize the Homestead Commission to take by right of eminent domain whatever land the Homestead Commission or other State agency should deem was wise to be taken and wherever it might deem it wise to be taken, rather than vest the power in the 350 separate municipalities of the Commonwealth. Now if that appeals to you as a reasonable precautions, as a reasonable restriction of this tremendous power of eminent domain, I think we today shall vote to retain it.

Now on the question whether the Commonwealth itself or any other authority should have the right to lease land, we felt that that was too nearly a return to the old feudal system which held men in subjection and which led to so much abuse in the Middle Ages; that if the Commonwealth was to provide a home for its citizen let it give it to him; let not the Commonwealth be in the position of landlord over any man; let not the Commonwealth, when once it has provided for a man an opportunity to own his own little home, hold any power over him in any way or shape whatever. Therefore we deliberately struck out the word "lease", because we felt it was a bad thing to establish,—the possibility of the Commonwealth or any municipality holding the position of landlord over any of its citizens. And to me that objection is as strong today as it was then.

Now those last three lines were put in there for a distinct purpose and I want to call to your attention, as probably it already had been made plain to you, that the principal purpose of this whole amendment is to prevent and circumvent the manipulations of real estate speculators. I think my labor friends and my capitalistic friends, if you want to put it that way, will agree that the greatest cause of trouble today and one of the great troubles of the body politic is the evils that are caused by holding land out of use, by the bringing about of a situation which the single-taxers seek to remedy, by raising the tax on land so that it will be unprofitable for any man to speculate in land and keep it out of use. Now this amendment was aimed to get around that very trouble so that the Commonwealth, in the exercise of a wise discretion, could take that land and pay for it. How? Pay for it not the exorbitant price that the land speculator wanted for it, but pay for that land only the exact value of it. Now if we proceed on that assumption, and if we say that the Commonwealth as it acts by means of this great power of eminent domain is to pay not the price which the owner thinks the land is worth but is to pay the price that a jury of our fellow-men say ought to be paid for it, then it follows that the Commonwealth should not turn around and make a present of that to any other citizen for a less amount than what a jury of the courts have said it is worth.

Therefore, following out to some extent the reasoning of the gentleman from Somerville, we have said that this amendment was not intended to pauperize people, it was not intended to make a present to a man of something he was getting for less than he ought to pay for it, but it was an amendment simply and solely to give a man an opportunity to buy land for what that land might fairly be said to be worth. That applies to the value of land. With regard to the cost of buildings a specious argument can be made today that the cost of building materials is very high; that if the Commonwealth goes into the business of building buildings it ought not to be held to a point where it would have to receive an amount equal to the amount it put into them. Our position on that is this, that the Commonwealth would not conceivably be in the position of selling hundreds of houses unless it knew that there was an immediate market for the sale of those houses; that the Commonwealth could buy the land and hold the land for the purpose of building homes and selling the property to the working-men, and in the ordinary case the Commonwealth would not build a house upon the land unless it knew that there was an immediate market for the sale of that house. And therefore we felt that the restriction holding the Commonwealth up to the point where it must secure on some terms or other from the prospective purchaser of the house the value which it paid for it was reasonable. That proposition, I submit, is a fair proposition. A person buying a house or land pays only what it is worth. On the other hand, he does pay what it is worth and he does not get something for nothing. The real estate speculator's profit is taken out of the proposition. On the other hand, the man who has been depicted by the gentleman from Somerville, the thrifty man, the man who has saved, the man with whom we all sympathize, is not discriminated against in favor of the shiftless man by giving the latter something for nothing. I am not so bold as to stand here and say that these reasons which applied in 1914, when our committee considered this, apply necessarily today. But I do think it is fair and proper to submit to this Convention the reasons why Article XLIII was recommended in the form in which you now find it, having been adopted by the people of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: The argument to which we have just listened is an argument which undoubtedly would have carried the assent of the Convention were it not for the fact that the matter has been tried out and that the representatives of the Homestead Commission who appeared before the committees succeeded in securing a unanimous report from each committee on the ground that the points that have been spoken of hampered the work of the Commission in actual practice. I make that remark simply as a preface to a motion which I wish to make,—that document No. 324 be substituted for document No. 320.

Mr. Cummings of Fall River: I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Bates), who, as I understood, was House chairman of the committee that reported the resolution that now appears as Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution. I understood the gentleman to say that it was the intention of the committee to draft an amendment that would limit the authority to take land and construct or build homes to the Commonwealth itself and not to give the power to municipalities. May I ask first, if I understood him correctly?

Mr. Bates: That was my statement as I recall it.

Mr. Cummings: Why should not Article XLIII be construed as Article X of the Declaration of Rights was construed, giving authority to take by right of eminent domain? Apparently the authority in Article X was the authority of the Commonwealth, but it has been held repeatedly that the Commonwealth could delegate its power to municipalities. Article X provides that the Commonwealth, by right of eminent domain, may take private property for public uses. But it has been held, in a long series of decisions, that that power may be delegated to cities and towns. I wish to ask the gentleman if his committee considered the fact that notwithstanding the apparent limitation in Article XLIII the actual fact is that the authority may be delegated to cities and towns?

Mr. Benton of Belmont: As long as the Convention voted not to recommit, and we have given nearly a whole day to this subject, and have such a fine attendance and as the question has been argued so ably on all sides, I move the previous question.

Mr. Ferry of Northbridge: The question that I asked the gentleman in the second division (Mr. Blackmur) was to bring out the fact that in the amendment that we were discussing, No. 320, no provision was made for any arrangement or any restriction of any kind governing the sale of the land or the houses so built; and I wish to bring out the fact that if we are to pass either one of these amendments we must arrange somehow to have the Legislature make these regulations. In Resolution No. 324 such arrangements were made, but if I understand the temper of the Convention correctly it seems to me the members wish to knock off all provisions whereby the Legislature shall make arrangements for the sale or leasing or renting of this property. Now it seems to me very fair to consider that if we are going to go into this proposition as a State wide proposition, allowing towns and cities to go into the furnishing of homes, we must have some central source of regulation; and if that is done, then it does not make so much difference whether the Constitution as it now reads should be amended or not, because we shall have some source where we can go to present our case and have it examined into and reported on.

I am very much surprised to learn that when our committee of the Legislature was considering the further regulating of the powers of the commission at the last session no mention was made of the fact that they wished further powers in the matter of the sale of the property the State owns. We did pass one bill giving them further powers as to regulating mortgages and other matters.

Mr. Blackmur of Quincy: I should like to answer just one phase of the argument of the gentleman in the first division (Mr. Bates of Boston) in reference to the sale of houses, one at a time, or only to meet the immediate demand. Now let us analyze his explanation from a practical point of view. What is the practical method of selling houses under conditions such as exist today? Take, for illustration, the situation at Fore River in Quincy. There would be immediately a demand for a thousand houses; there is today demand for a thousand houses. Would those houses be sold for cash? Of course they would not. The workers would not have the cash to pay for them. They would be sold on easy terms. The man who bought a house would give his note perhaps to the municipality or he would make some provision to pay the purchase price on easy terms. Now if the war should end tomorrow or next month or a year from now and the industries shut down or be curtailed, there would be thousands of men out of employment and hundreds of those men who purchased their houses, being without work, probably would default on their agreements. In such a situation the Commonwealth, if it was the Commonwealth, or the municipality that sold the houses, could not sell them again except at cost. If there was a falling market on houses and real estate in that vicinity, and there certainly would be a falling market on such real estate dependent entirely upon the success of one industry, how would the State or city ever get rid of its investment?

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I want to ask the previous speaker one question, and that is, assuming that there is a falling market and these houses are sold for less than was paid for them, who gets the benefit of the difference and who pays the loss?

Mr. Blackmur: I remind the gentleman that there is a provision in the Constitution at the present time that says you shall not sell them for less than cost, so it is futile to ask who will profit if you cannot sell them at all.

Mr. Bryant: My question has not been answered. If the gentleman kindly will assume that that is taken out of the Constitution, as this amendment suggests it be taken out, who then would stand the loss and who would receive the benefit?

Mr. Blackmur: I do not think I understand the gentleman's question or its application to the subject-matter under debate. If the proviso is stricken out, why, then there is no further difficulty in this connection, and that is why I advocate striking out that proviso, because with that proviso the forty-third amendment was nothing more or less than a gold brick.

Mr. Bryant: I do not want to insist too much, but I have not yet received an answer to my question. Perhaps it was my fault for not making it clear enough. I understand the gentleman from Quincy to desire to have this proviso taken out of the amendment in order that, if necessary, land and houses may be sold at less than cost. Assume he is successful in getting that amendment made and that it becomes necessary to sell at less than cost and the sale is made at less than cost, who gets the benefit of the difference and who pays the loss?
That is, if a municipality pays $5,000 for a house and land and sells it for $4,000, who pays the loss and who gets the benefit?

Mr. Blackmur: If the municipality sells the property for $4,000 and it otherwise could not sell it at all, it saves $4,000 by selling it.
[Laughter.]

Mr. Bryant: In order not to lose $1,000, if I understand, — in order not to lose $5,000 they save $4,000. I do not know whether the gentleman from Quincy is purposely refraining from answering my question or not, but I think the answer to it really is perfectly obvious.
The taxpayers of Quincy, of course, lose $1,000 and whether that is made by the man who buys it I do not know, but the taxpayers of Quincy lose $1,000 on that deal. Now there is one point that I should like to bring briefly to the attention of the Convention as to the difference between the present amendment, Article XLIII, and the suggested amendment, and that is this: Under the present amendment the power to control these activities of providing houses is given to the Legislature, the General Court. Under this amendment please notice that the power is given direct to the towns and that the General Court has no power of regulation over how the towns shall apply that power. If you will compare document No. 324, if that is the one, you will see it is even clearer in that document, because it says:

The General Court shall have power to authorize cities and towns to take land,
. . . and under such provisions and regulations as the General Court may establish or approve, to lease or rent the same.

In other words, the only case under No. 324 in which the Legislature has any power or any control after it once has granted the power to cities and towns, — the only case in which it has any power is the power to lease. That it can control after it is granted. But over the power to buy and sell, the Legislature will have no control, once the power is granted.

Mr. Stober of Adams: The gentleman who sits in this division from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau) has told us that a contractor in his city is able to build cottages better and sell them for less money than the city of Lowell can do. It is not very hard to figure out the answer to that riddle, and the only answer that I can see is that some land shark or contractor is getting a big rake-off in his dealing with the city. So it seems to me that the fear which apparently is lurking in the minds of those who are opposed to this resolution,—namely, the fear that some land shark or contractor will not be able to get the rake-off that he is getting at the present time under the present system,—will be done away with if the resolution under discussion becomes a law. It seems to be unfounded, at least as far as the city of Lowell is concerned.

The gentleman from Brockton in the second division (Mr. Brown) has told us about the small tenements of four or five rooms and a bath in which families in his city are compelled to live. That is nothing at all. I can tell you of tenements in my town, the town of Adams, that have not got four rooms, never mind speaking of a bath. There is a four-tenement house not two hundred yards away from my little cottage where I live, where one morning by actual count twenty-six people were seen to leave to go to their work out of that four-tenement house. That was not counting the women who stayed behind or the children that these families had. And as for these people having a bath, if they want a bath they have got to take it out in the river. That was two years ago and I have no reason to believe that conditions have changed to any great extent since then. In fact I know that at the present time it is not possible to get a tenement up that way for love or money under any condition. Therefore I hope that the matter under discussion will be passed favorably by this Convention.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I think it is wholly a matter of co-operative bank system, and no doubt when the State makes a contract it will make the contract with the individual who wants to buy a house and they draw up a contract and what they want, as you might say, is a lease that they will pay in a certain length of time. In this State there have been coöperative banks for the last thirty-eight years. The coöperative banks in this State have met with but two failures, and in those cases one bank paid 90 per cent. and the other paid 94 per cent. If the coöperative banks of this State can do that why cannot the State do it? It brings the matter before us clearly by calling Massachusetts a large coöperative bank willing to lend to the working-man a certain amount of money to build a house. Some people will tell you that it will cost the State a good deal more than it will the individual to build the building. No doubt about it, because the State will put in better work. I have been in the contracting business and I speak as an individual and I tell you that. I have been associated with coöperative banks and I tell you that the greatest blessing in the world for the poor people has been the coöperative bank. I tell you if you pass this Resolution No. 157 it will do away with the amendment of which there has been a good deal of argument made, Article XLIII, which says:

provided, however, that this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.

Now you know as well as I do that when a workman makes a contract with the State he pays so much down and so much a month. He may buy a house for $4,000 and he has to pay off $15 a month, which would be $180 a year. He pays that $180 a year and sometimes pays on the principal and in that way reduces it. If reverses come, then he will have to give up and then the State can sell that building and he really can get back what he put into it. In regard to that amendment to the Constitution that is put in, I really do not think it will affect this amendment at all and I think if we pass a measure of this kind it will be one of the best that we have passed in this Convention.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: The forty-third amendment obviously makes it impossible to improve slums, because so much of the old construction has to be removed before there can be new construction. This will make the new construction so expensive that you cannot sell them at cost.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I rise to ask a question which the chairman of the committee in charge doubtless can answer. Is it understood that if either one of these propositions is passed it supersedes Amendment XLIII? If that be the case why may it not be stated in the form of submission of the amendment,—the form which the amendment shall finally take? Otherwise the Constitution will have two rival provisions in part covering the same subject.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I rise simply to say that I trust that the amendment suggested by Mr. Quincy will prevail in order that the I. and R. may not be injected into this debate and future debate that we shall have on amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: In reply to what the gentleman from Cambridge asked I will say that the amendment as drafted by our committee did supersede the forty-third amendment. The amendment that is moved as a substitute does not.

I want to endorse what the gentleman from Beverly has said as to the value of the proviso contained in document No. 320, the report of the committee of which I am a member. The present provision of the Constitution, Article XLIII of the amendments, is of no value at all so far as relates to the eliminating of slums. Eliminating slums is a very costly proposition and when you have got your slums eliminated you cannot make that land available for homes for working men or frequently for any purpose at all except by writing off a staggering loss. The city of London has abolished some of its slums but the cost of doing so was enormous. Unless the proviso relative to cost is stricken out there is very little relief as far as the amendment goes, in regard to the slum problem. For that reason No. 320 is far preferable to No. 324, which is moved as a substitute.

Upon the question of the sacred I. and R. I do not desire to manifest any views except that I think the General Court is a good tribunal to take these matters to.

The amendments moved by Mr. Quincy were rejected, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 85 to 108.

The amendment moved by Mr. Ferry was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Kilbon was adopted, by a vote of 52 to 48, and, accordingly, resolution No. 324 was substituted; and it was ordered to a third reading, by a vote of 60 to 51, Thursday, June 20.

The resolution was read a third time Friday, July 26.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I desire to offer the amendment printed under my name in the calendar,—inserting after the words “Commonwealth and," in lines 5 and 6, the words "when authorized by the General Court".

I desire to call the attention of the Convention to the resolution as it passed to the third reading, and to the resolution as framed by the committee on Form and Phraseology. As we passed this resolution at the last hearing it read: "The General Court shall have power to authorize cities and towns to take land," etc. As framed by the committee on Form and Phraseology it reads: "The Commonwealth and cities and towns therein shall have power," etc.

Now, it seems to me that there is a real difference between those two phrases; that is, between whether you are giving the General Court power to authorize the cities and towns to act, or whether you are giving the powers directly by the Constitution to the cities and towns. As the committee on Form and Phraseology has put it the power is granted directly to the cities and towns. The Legislature has no control over the question whether cities and towns shall go into the business, although they may have some power of regulation afterwards.

I do not think that that method of granting powers to cities and towns appears in any other part of the Constitution. The other provisions in our Constitution invariably empower the General Court to do that thing and the powers of corporations, whether municipal or of individuals, come not directly from the Constitution, but through the General Court.

It seems to me proper that cities and towns should not go into this business unless the Legislature has decided first that it is feasible for them to do so. If we leave the amendment as it is recommended by the committee on Form and Phraseology, it means that any city or town in the Commonwealth, of its own motion, might take land for the purpose of improving, etc., to relieve congestion. Any single city or town in the Commonwealth might take land, whether or not it was deemed advisable by the Legislature for them to do so.

I do not think that was the intent of the Convention when it passed this resolution to a third reading. I have consulted with the chairman of the committee on Form and Phraseology, and I understand that he does not object to my amendment. I think that with the addition of these words the resolution will be in the same form as it was when it last was passed upon by the Convention, but if left as it is by the committee on Form and Phraseology I think an essential feature of the resolution really has been altered. Therefore, I hope that this amendment will be accepted by the Convention.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: The committee on Form and Phraseology endeavors to ascertain what it can of the meaning of the Convention and then to crystallize it into words. We had some doubt as to the actual meaning of the Convention, after giving careful attention to the debate. In the second section of our report we call attention to the fact that we were in doubt on this very point, and that we had resolved that doubt in the way in which we thought the Convention meant it should be resolved. The Convention, as the measure was passed originally, did not give the Commonwealth itself any power to take land, and if the meaning of the Convention was that in each case in which the city and town was to act in such matters, that is, take lands for providing homes, it should be discussed first by the Legislature, then the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) is appropriate and should be inserted. If, however, the Convention meant the cities and towns to act directly, on their own initiative, then the draft as submitted by the committee is correct.

We supposed that we had interpreted the meaning of the Convention correctly; that is to say, that the cities and towns were to be authorized directly. If we were mistaken in that, then the amendment suggested by the delegate from Milton should be adopted.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: May I ask the last speaker if he has in mind the wording of the resolution as it went to the committee on Form and Phraseology, which was as follows: "The General Court shall have power to authorize cities and towns to take land"?

Mr. Loring: I had that in mind, but the delegate from Milton will notice that the General Court had authority to allow cities and towns to take it, but gave no authority for the Commonwealth itself to take it; and in the course of the debate the impression was left very strongly on the minds of the committee that it was the Commonwealth that was expected to take the land, and not the cities and towns.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: May I ask the previous speaker (Mr. Loring), if in view of the fact that municipal corporations are considered generally as creatures of the Legislature, it would not be better in his personal opinion, as distinguished from his attempt to interpret what the Convention already has done, if it would not be better to incorporate the amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), — have this power go through the General Court rather than to have the power in the municipalities direct?

Mr. Loring: In my personal opinion the amendment is justified.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: May I ask for the reading of the resolution which is the basis for the bringing of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant)?

The Secretary read the amendment moved by Mr. Bryant.

Mr. Kelley of Rockland: I think in justice to the committee on Form and Phraseology it will be well to review the situation as it was when No. 324 was substituted for No. 320. Members will remember that we now have the forty-third Article of Amendment of the Constitution, which provides that the Commonwealth may take land, and build and subdivide, etc., — do all but lease or rent. And therein is a further provision that the Commonwealth shall not sell for less than cost.

Now, the committee on Public Affairs reported a resolution which expressly repealed the forty-third amendment. If this resolution is passed as it now reads we will have a repetition in the Constitution, giving the Commonwealth authority, unless we take some action relating to the forty-third amendment.

Mr. Loring of Beverly: I am afraid there is some confusion in the discussion of this matter. The committee on Form and Phraseology reported back in document No. 391 the measure as it came from the Convention. That is the first report. They then recommended a substitute, which is on the fifth page of document No. 391, which I think is the one that we have been discussing, although it of course could be adopted only on motion. The resolution that we recommend be substituted is as follows:
HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:—

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

SECTION 1. For the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens, the Commonwealth and the cities and towns therein shall have power, upon payment of just compensation, to take land, and, under such regulations as the General Court may adopt, to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, lease, rent or sell the same.

SECTION 2. Article forty-three of the Amendments to the Constitution is hereby annulled.

Now, that is the form, not that we reported back, but the amendment that we thought ought to be adopted. Therefore, I move that that be substituted for the draft as reported back by the committee.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: I hope that the substitution will prevail. I dare say the Convention will recall when the report of the committee on Social Welfare as document No. 324 was under discussion, at that time objection was made to No. 324, relating to two phases of it. First, that No. 324 made no provision that the Commonwealth should have power to take land; and, further, that it impliedly, at least, annulled or repealed Article XLIII.

I dare say the Convention will recall that in that debate much point was made of the fact that under Article XLIII the Homestead Commission, as created and working under Article XLIII, were more or less hampered by reason of that proviso in Article XLIII, which limited the powers of the Homestead Commission to carry out the functions for which they were created. In other words, the Homestead Commission found it impossible to do the work for which they were created, because under it they were unable to provide a home for a citizen unless that citizen was prepared or able to pay a sum equal to the cost of the home.

The purpose and design of this article of amendment is to give greater freedom of action on the part of the Homestead Commission. It is not, as some gentlemen say, to give cities and towns a chance to provide homes without any charge whatever to citizens; but its purpose is to enable properly constituted authorities to take upon themselves the duty of seeing to it, on the one hand, that worthy citizens are helped; and, on the other, that the municipality or the Commonwealth shall not suffer unduly because of the doing of such work.

This movement is one of progress and one which is pretty largely along the spirit of the times. It is the duty of the State to help its citizens, and no greater function can a State exercise than to help worthy citizens to be able to stand up and face the world as householders, in the true sense of the term, to become real citizens of the community. To reject this proposal it seems to me would be reactionary in the extreme. Every enlightened community and government worthy of the name has such a provision as this, not by way of constitutional amendment, but by way of inherent governmental function. The criticism that this will open the door to corruption or fraud seems to me to be narrow. The broad, general scope and purpose of the law is an answer to such a suggestion.

I therefore hope that the motion of the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) will prevail.
Mr. Bryant of Milton: I desire to offer my motion as an amendment to the substituted motion of the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring), if that is the proper procedure to bring it before the Convention.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I think, perhaps, in justice to the committee on Public Affairs, some statement ought to be made from them at this time relative to the reasons for presenting this amendment.

The amendment, Article XLIII of the Amendments of the Constitution, lodges power in the Commonwealth to provide homes for its citizens under certain restrictions, an important one being that they should be sold at not less than the fair cost thereof. The subject of providing housing facilities for the inhabitants of our municipalities is one that is perhaps a novel proposition in this Commonwealth, but elsewhere has formed a normal part of State policy. It has been found necessary, for reasons of sanitation and reasons of fire protection as well, to take some steps which ordinarily would not be taken on individual initiative, to relieve the congestion of crowded districts in our great manufacturing cities, and establish homes that should be healthful and desirable places for the inhabitants of the city to live in. There is no great question as to the desirability of the result, whatever you may think about the method.

Mr. Dean of Fall River: I should like to ask the gentleman to tell the Convention where the plan has been tried and has worked well.

Mr. Hobbs: The plan has been tried out in a number of places. I am not prepared at this moment to give the gentleman definite and accurate information as to the way in which it has worked. It is claimed it has worked satisfactorily in some places. It has resulted in some places in the abolition of particularly noisome sections of large municipalities.

The problem of dealing with this matter has a number of practical difficulties. In the first place, it requires the taking of land, usually in a congested section of a district, and that is a very expensive proposition. The city of London, I think, has attempted that and has found it extremely costly. It has torn down sections of thickly settled tenement districts and replaced them with model tenements. Financially it is not a success. From another standpoint, however, it does abolish districts that have been eyesores to the community, and the sources and seats of infectious disease and fire hazard.

In considering the financial benefit, the relief in those matters must be taken into consideration; for we are only just beginning to come to a realization of the enormous losses to the community by fire, and the equally enormous burden to the community that the residence of large numbers of our citizens in unsanitary surroundings entails. The Convention has only to glance over the list of our State expenditures and see how much we are spending for tuberculosis, for instance, and it is in those crowded districts that tuberculosis flourishes; they have only to look over the report of the State Police, and see how great the burden is that we pay for losses by fire; it averages something like $10,000,000 a year throughout the Commonwealth and has gone a great deal higher than that on occasions.

Within easy walking distance of the State House there is at least one municipality whose building laws, at the last time at which I was informed, which was about two years ago, permitted wooden houses to be built within two feet of the lot line; that is to say, within four feet of each other. There is another large manufacturing city that allows them to be placed even closer than that. It does not take any argument to see what is the fire risk of building combustible structures so near together as that, and what the sanitary conditions must be that are entailed by the crowding so closely together of a nest of human habitations. That is the situation that the housing law is designed to reach.
HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

It is fair to state at this time that it is a problem which the great governments which are now engaged in war have found it necessary to take up for the purpose of building up the physical strength or stamina of their inhabitants; that is to say, for conserving their human resources. The Federal government even now is engaged in the same work and has invited the cooperation of our municipalities in this experiment. I mention this merely to indicate what the original amendment was undertaking to reach, and I wish to adduce a few reasons as to why the committee on Public Affairs drafted that amendment.

The requirement that buildings should be sold at not less than cost entails two possibilities. In the first place, it is quite possible that the Commonwealth might find itself, by some ordinary course of events, in a position where it had got more in than it could get out. In such case what would be its position? Under this constitutional power it would be unable to sell them, it would have to hold them and carry them at a loss, which of course is a very undesirable result.

In the second place, if the Commonwealth desired really to abolish slums and replace the buildings torn down by model tenements, that could not be done ordinarily on any cost proposition, nor could it be done as a selling proposition. The normal way of managing tenements would be to lease them, and that is the only practical way in which that sort of property could be made available. It is for that reason that I should deprecate the amendment which is printed in the calendar under the name of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Horgan), because if it is desired to have the Commonwealth undertake that function, which other nations and municipalities have undertaken, it is desirable that the power to lease should not be omitted. The emphasis, however, of housing legislation is now laid, not on the building of tenement-houses, but on providing homes for citizens, with enough space for a garden, and enough space so that families can be raised in comfort and under healthful conditions.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: Would it be held to be constitutional under the present amendment, Article XLIII, to lease property incidentally, as an attribute of ownership? That is, the government having taken the property for purposes of sale, would if be constitutional,—without this, it seems to me, dangerous amendment, about "lease and rent",—would it be possible to lease the property temporarily, incidentally, in the process of changing over?

Mr. HOIBBS: The forty-third Article of Amendment gives no express power to lease. Possibly it might be included as a necessary incident of the power given by the forty-third Amendment. I am not prepared to say what the courts would find upon the subject. Municipalities, of course, even without express power to lease other property they hold, do lease it, and no objection is raised or likely to be raised.
Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: Has the committee made any estimate of what the rental charge would be? That is, if they charge a just and fair rate on the investment, and enough to cover repairs, in case people move in and move out, and the payments for collectors? Has the committee made any estimate of that?

Mr. Hobbs: The committee made no estimate of that. That is a problem that I think the gigantic intellects of the General Court are perhaps as well competent to deal with as those of the Convention. It is an entirely proper subject to be considered with regard to what the meaning of the amendment is if the words "at cost" were retained.

Mr. Curtis: Did the committee consider whether a house built in the suburbs, as it would have to be built in order to have gardens and all these things, — did they consider what additional cost it would be for the tenant to get to his place of business, pay his additional car fares, etc., especially under government ownership? In other words, does the gentleman think that a man working in a place in Boston would move to a suburban town, where he could have this beautiful house and garden, and pay the additional travelling expenses he would have to pay every day to get to and from his business?

Mr. Hobbs: I assume that some would and that some already do. That many would object to moving out of easy range of their work unfortunately is true. We are creatures who tie ourselves pretty closely to a definite routine and hate to make even the sacrifice of an additional nickel or an additional fifteen or twenty minutes of time. The result has been the intense congestion of certain limited areas, both in the metropolitan district and elsewhere, which has produced conditions which I think all will agree are extremely lamentable.

Mr. Adams of Quincy: May I ask the gentleman if the committee has any plan by which this system is to be administered?

Mr. Hobbs: I have not got as far as that. The desirability of the power, and the machinery by which the power should be carried into effect, are entirely different propositions. The first is properly for the Convention; the second is properly for the General Court.

Now, as to the amendment which is moved by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring). I see no objection to the amendment. The question as to whether the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) should be adopted or not is a question which the Convention must settle ultimately for itself. The bald language of the resolution as it was before us, probably would lodge in cities and towns a power independent of the Legislature, though probably we would reserve the power of the Legislature to regulate the method whereby they should exercise that power; but until the Legislature had spoken they probably would have a constitutional power to go right ahead with the work. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), as I understand it, the General Court must act first, before they can engage in such undertakings.

As to whether it is wise for cities and towns to engage in this business until the General Court has made some provision as to the method in which the power shall be exercised, perhaps may be questioned. It is desirable that there be some uniformity in the action of cities and towns in this matter, and upon that side the amendment of the gentleman from Milton carries with it considerable force. On the other side, question of course may be raised as to the desire of the General Court to act decisively in this matter. That proposition, I think, having stated briefly the argument both pro and con, I will leave to the decision of the Convention. Offhand, I am inclined to approve the amendment of the gentleman from Milton.

Now that, I think, is the story of this resolution. I trust that I have indicated that there is some basis of sound reason as to why the General Court should have this power, particularly in the fact that an important work upon this line is being undertaken by the Federal government, and the Commonwealth ought to have full powers lodged in it to join in this work.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I think we should pause and go slow on this matter. In the first place, talking about slums, it was my privilege to have been a health inspector for 10 or 12 years. The board of health now has the power to remove any slum in the city if, in the judgment of the board, it is injurious to the public health. And it is removing slums right here in Boston every day. There is no necessity of talking about additional legislation to clean out slums. It is not necessary at all. The city council can appropriate money for street purposes, land can be taken by right of eminent domain to put a square through a slum, if necessary, and the board of health can order buildings taken down, and it does these things daily.

It was my privilege to be in the Legislature when this matter first came up, and that body passed the forty-third amendment for the reason that it did not want to have the cities and towns engage in the real estate business at a loss. This amendment, if adopted, would inject the real estate business into the politics of the cities and towns, and would give the mayor and city council the opportunity to give away public property, which was paid for by citizens, in any way these officials desire. The provision of the Constitution which was adopted provided that they should not sell the city's lands and buildings for less than the cost thereof. The Legislature was charged at that time in the committee on Ways and Means with the management of the State's affairs. And why should a city or town sell its lands and buildings for less than cost? The Homestead Commission is erecting houses now in some part of the State under that great act that was passed dealing with the creation of homestead rights. Why not wait and see how that act works out before you start to extend its power? I can imagine if I was mayor of a city or had control of a town where I could pass out houses and buildings to friends at less than cost, it would put a great burden on the ordinary taxpayer. Do you want to start piling up taxes at this time, when the cost of everything is increasing, upon the theory that cleaning out the slums is necessary? Why, when people talk about slums, I presume the district that I have the honor in part to represent is one of the districts which they talk about. Let me tell you that the deaths in that section from preventable diseases are the lowest of any section in the city (applause), — and the population of part of it exceeds that of any city by the acre, I dare say, outside of London. I submit, sir, that this is the situation here, and that the records of the board of health will prove it.

Do not be deceived and deluded by the talk indulged in here. If you want to give the right to the cities and towns to do what the Constitution now limits to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that is, to build homes and sell them to citizens at cost, I am with you on that proposition, — because then the working-man is given a chance to purchase a home at cost, and I am not objecting to that proposition. But if you are going to allow the cities and towns to go into the matter of selling houses below cost, and leasing and renting them, I think that is socialism, and we should not do it.

When the gentleman talks about what the United States government is doing now, let him remember that the government is doing it in time of war. It is going to build, I do not know how many, houses in Quincy and other places. What do you suppose that it has done down there? It has built houses just where the Fore River Ship Company down there told the government to build them, right up under the walls of the factory. Now, then, where will the men who bought land and houses and have mortgages in Quincy be in competition with the United States government? If the United States government is doing it, let it do it. It is now war time. It is building houses over on Cambridge Common. It also is putting houses on Boston Common. But we are making here a Constitution that is to last beyond the war.

I say that you should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), and also the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Horgan) and strike out the leasing and renting part, and also put in the proviso, as the gentleman said, that before the cities can undertake the business they must go to the Legislature, present their petition, and show that they have investigated the subject and prove that it is going to be a good proposition for all the people of that city or town, as the case may be. Otherwise, it would be too much power to give to them.

We have in Boston a city council of nine men elected under our new form of government, who never would vote against building houses under this proposition. Why? Because they are elected at large, and everybody would say: "Why not have houses, since we can purchase them cheaply if we have a friend of ours at city hall?" Now, that is the way this matter may work out. You may say that you do not intend to have it that way. Hell is paved with good intentions. Therefore, you must provide a proper restriction in this matter. Men to-day do not do the things that you think they should do, but do what the law says that they can do, and what the court says is permissible under the law. Consequently, when the present law was passed it provided that any honest, decent working-man who wanted a chance to get a home should be given a chance to get one. But it provided further that he should pay what it cost. There is no objection to that, but when you let down the bars and allow cities and towns to pass these houses out as favors and below cost, I say, sir, look out for squalls. Why, there are men here who can remember the days in the city of Boston when the public lands of the city were given away and can remember the scandals that were created thereby. Those of you who remember these things know how people were said to secure lands that were worth tremendous figures. Men who have read anything about city affairs know what the situation in New York is, where the docks are leased frequently at less than they should be, and you are asked now to put our cities and towns into that line of business.
I suggest that there has been no sound reason advanced for the passage of this amendment. People who simply are carried away with fads do not put up the money to pay for them. It comes out of the taxpayers, who must take it out of the rent payers. It seems to me we should go slow in this matter. I trust we will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), also the amendment of the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Horgan). Then you add to and improve the present law, because, though you now allow the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to do it, yet this amendment will allow the cities and towns to do it if the Legislature, in its opinion in each case, says that they should do it. For instance, if Cambridge wants to do it, then it comes to the Legislature and gets permission. If Boston wants to do it, it also comes up and gets permission. And with the tax rate the way it is now, why not adopt such a safe and prudent resolution?

Mr. Horgan of Boston: I offer the amendment which is printed under my name in the calendar,—to strike out, in lines 9 and 10 of the new draft offered by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring), the words "lease, rent".

I oppose this resolution because I believe that it goes too far, and I offer my amendment to remedy what in my opinion is a most unwise provision, for, although I favor a reasonable State control so far as necessary and freely admit of a restricted government ownership within certain well-defined limits, namely, to realize public well-being and private prosperity with particular regard to the interests of the poor, I protest against opening the door so wide that State control degenerates into State paternalism, and when, like an excessive government ownership, it rightly may be called socialistic. In such case, and this resolution in its present form is an extreme sample, it no longer contributes to the common good, which ever must be the one object of governmental activity. In fact, it then is to be regarded as socialistic, not, I admit, because in any way it has become identified with socialism, but solely because it expresses a tendency in that direction, and thereby it helps to prepare the way for socialistic ideas, even though State control and State ownership, no matter how excessive or absolute,—I emphasize this point because repeatedly the statement has been made in this Convention that State ownership, even in its most limited sense, is socialistic, an obvious fallacy if the tenets of socialism are properly understood,—never in themselves can constitute socialism. They still differ essentially from it. The very idea of the State itself as now understood must be abolished first before socialism in the proper sense of the word can make its beginning.

In justice, private ownership, whether in the name of consumption or production, is to be fostered and protected, though no quarter should be given to abuses that may spring from it. This principle does not prevent the introduction of government ownership where the common good actually may require it, and could be established upon the supposition only that due compensation was made to private owners. The State does not exist for the purpose of undertaking by itself what can be accomplished equally well, or far better, by private enterprise when duly regulated. Nor is government ownership the first step in the economic process. If intended to remedy abuses it should follow only where State control is incapable of attaining this end. It certainly is wise, yes, even necessary, where self-help proves unavailing to meet the economic evils of the day. Such is the case when the rapaciousness of private capitalists cannot be curbed otherwise; when just prices, fair wages and similar conditions, essential to the public welfare, can be brought about by government intervention alone. State control, so conditioned and so limited, is in no sense socialistic. For this was the State instituted, that it might provide adequately for the common good without interfering unduly with individual enterprise. To confuse such measures with socialism is to dress the latter out in borrowed plumage.

Is it necessary, in solving the problem under consideration, to take that step which may commit this Commonwealth to socialistic ideals and policies? I think not. If the Legislature does not enjoy now the power to solve equitably our housing problem within reasonable restrictions, let us confer it on them, but do not do it under the form or guise of the resolution under consideration. Let us beware lest we overstep the bounds of prudence and break down the barriers of reason and justice.

Personally I am of the opinion that it is unwise, unjust and dangerous to force the State into the real estate business in all of its ramifications. Is it necessary? While the dangers of State control itself are no less real when it is employed heedlessly, without prudence and without restraint, yet history teaches us the lesson that only at their peril can citizens permit such control to degenerate into State paternalism. The latter, as past experience shows, readily may become little less tyrannical than socialism itself would prove to be. Is not that danger now present? If we pass this resolution in its present form it at least degenerates into State paternalism. As suggested, by eliminating the lease and rent provision we largely eliminate that danger, but at the same time it seems to me that we must not lose sight of the fact, if we study the resolution which was submitted to the people and adopted in 1915, the forty-third amendment, that that resolution goes as far as, in justice and fairness, any resolution dealing with this question ought to go, and that we ought not to proceed to the extreme by setting up a business, a real estate business, either in a city or in the Commonwealth itself.

We are in perilous times. The exigencies of the moment and the criminal greed of individuals and of some corporations may lead to a false solution of our difficulties in this as well as in other matters. As Senator Newhall, chairman of the committee on Interstate Commerce, recently said in the United States Senate:

I wish to call attention to the fact that almost all of us have been wrenched from our own moorings by the extraordinary exigencies of this war, and that our reasoning has been driven into unaccustomed channels.

But that does not justify the extreme, which spells socialism, as a remedy for our difficulties. We must remember that while we owe a duty to individuals we owe a greater duty to the State. We must not jeopardize its stability by worshipping false gods. We will not bridge our difficulties but we will open the door to the excesses of radicalism if we adopt this resolution in its present form. Hence I urge my amendment which modifies the resolution and emphasizes the fact that "reason still holds sway."
Personally, I take this position without fear of misunderstanding, because I always have advocated equitable treatment of all classes, with special regard for the poor man, and in the firm conviction that the remedy suggested by this resolution is worse than the disease that they desire to remedy. I believe, with all respect to the members of the housing commission, who unquestionably have done good work from their viewpoint, who have endeavored, as far as they believe they have authority and as far as authority was vested in them by the Legislature, to solve problems from their viewpoint, that as far as the power of this government under natural law and in justice will permit they have gone, and that if we give them authority which permits them to do what is sought for under this resolution, we will be confronted, under the provisions of the initiative and referendum and the other method of direct appeal to the Legislature through this opening wedge, with dangerous fallacies and policies. Consequently, personally I feel that we ought to padlock the door now, when in sober thought and judgment, after considering this problem in all its phases, we realize what possibly may result. And I say advisedly with all respect to the judgment of the gentleman on the committee on Public Affairs from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs), who spoke a few moments ago with enthusiasm, probably accentuated by the hypnotic influence of the chairman of the commission in question, that they have overstepped the bounds, and that that not only does not justify us in adopting this resolution in its present form but that this weakness of the committee in accepting and reporting the resolution ought to warn us to beware of specious and fallacious pleas which jeopardize our social structure.

And I want to say, further, that I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant) is beneficial and strengthening, and combining that with the amendment which I have offered, if any resolution is to be adopted, our difficulties are solved and a proper and reasonable restriction is placed upon this unwise, even though unconscious, attempt to turn our government over to the devotees of socialism.

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: As a humble follower of the leaders here I have naturally made a careful study of the position of the leader of the Convention, my friend from ward 5 in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), and I have some difficulty in finding out the standards by which he selects socialistic schemes for his support and differentiates between those and the socialistic schemes which come under his disfavor. As nearly as I have been able to work it out, my friend is a socialist on Tuesdays and Thursdays, while on Wednesdays and Fridays he sets his face like a flint against any scheme having the slightest socialistic flavor. [Laughter and applause.] Perhaps I ought not to make this comment upon his general attitude in view of the fact that on the present occasion I am entirely in accord with him, which greatly strengthens my confidence in my own judgment. But what I rose to say was this:

A few minutes ago my friend from Fall River in the fourth division (Mr. Dean) put a question to my friend from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) which I understood him to disclaim his ability to answer, which at any rate he did not answer so far as I could gather from his remarks, and a crumb of information which tends to meet that question has been put into my hand in the interval, which I think may be worth the Convention’s hearing. The question was how this government housing scheme has worked elsewhere. It appears that in Ontario, Can., the loss on the government’s dwellings for workmen, as found by a legislative investigation, was over $100,000 a year, and in England the voters cast enormous majorities against such undertaking after an experience of it covering twenty-five years. I cannot guarantee the authenticity of this information, although it appears to be official, but it is entirely in line with what my general impressions have been upon this subject, and for this and other reasons I am against all these socialistic schemes, whether made in Germany, as most of them are, or elsewhere.

I will only detain the Convention to add that if there is any prospect of the adoption of the resolution, which at present I do not apprehend, of course the amendment of my friend from Milton (Mr. Bryant) should go into it. It is true in general at present that cities and towns have only the powers which are delegated to them by the Legislature, but here in so many words is an express and direct constitutional delegation to them of this power, which apparently they may exercise without let or hindrance if the resolution should be adopted in its present form.

Mr. Walcott of Cambridge moved to amend the resolution moved as a substitute by Mr. Loring by inserting in place of the article of amendment the following:

Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting after the word “Commonwealth” in the second line thereof the words “or the cities and towns therein”, so as to read:

Article XLIII. The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth or the cities and towns therein to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same”, etc.

Mr. Walcott: The purpose of this amendment is to prevent an unnecessary duplication. The speakers have pointed out here the inadvisability of passing an entirely new amendment to the Constitution when the present amendment, with the introduction of two or three words, will satisfy, it seems to me, the wishes of a majority of this Convention. From the discussion which we have heard it seems to me that what the members of this Convention want to do is to give the cities and towns the power that the Commonwealth already has, that is to say, to buy land, build upon it and sell, but to preserve the restriction that the sale shall not be for less than cost. Now, there are also the new words put in the provision that authorization from the Legislature shall be given to those cities and towns which desire to go into this business, so that power will not have to be specially delegated. That is, it incorporates the suggestion made by the gentleman from Boston in the first division (Mr. Horgan) and the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) and the gentleman from Milton in the fourth division (Mr. Bryant), and does it by the introduction of only four new words to an existing amendment of the Constitution instead of having an entirely new amendment to produce that desired effect. I hope, therefore, that if this meets the wishes of the majority of the Convention it will be adopted instead of a new amendment of eight or ten lines in substitution for the existing one upon the same subject.
Mr. Underhill of Somerville: If all the members of the Convention could have heard the gentleman from Lowell who sits in the first division (Mr. Charbonneau) when he spoke on this subject, and if they would remember his words, it would be perfectly plain what to do with this resolution. Accept all of the amendments that have been offered thus far and then throw the whole thing out of the window. Experience has shown that from the barracks which the government proposes to build down at Quincy to the race suicide cottages which the State has built in Lowell, the government, neither National, State nor municipal, can go into the real estate business and satisfy the people to whom they are trying to cater. I trust the gentleman from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau) will take a position in front of the Convention and repeat what he told us regarding the conditions which surround the building of the cottages at Lowell.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: Some weeks ago when this matter was first brought up I called attention to the fact that we had in the South Cove district in Boston a sample of the plenary power of the Commonwealth to do about everything that it was proposed to do advantageously in this amendment under the sovereignty of the Commonwealth. If my recollection serves me right, precisely the same thing occurred in the old Fort Hill district. Fort Hill was an exceedingly populous community. It was cut down, and the hill was used to build Atlantic Avenue, and the square which was on the top of the hill is now Fort Hill Square, on the surface of the city, and the population, the close, dense population of Fort Hill almost all moved over to South Boston and furnished the basis of the population of that salubrious section of the city. It was built up in that way.

This Amendment XLIII, which was adopted in 1915, gave no new power so far as health is concerned, but it broadened the power of this homestead movement to a certain extent. Here is a tremendous extension of the power given in 1915. I am somewhat surprised at the unanimity of the committee in support of this proposition when we had so radical a proposition in 1915. Now, this proposed amendment amends 1915, Article XLIII, in three particulars. First, it extends that power to the cities and towns to provide homes; second, it takes away the provision of the amendment that the property should not be sold below cost, and third, it proposes that the commission may lease and rent.

I asked a question here which I think is somewhat basic, as to whether I have been answered in my desire to have lease and rent stricken out some time ago. I have been told that the reason they want to put in lease and rent is not the purpose of going into the wholesale business of leasing and renting, but in order that they may lease a little piece of property temporarily while they are taking it for purposes of selling or for other purposes. While it remains idle they want to rent it until they can turn round and do something else.

Now my question is: Can they not do that at the present time? As near as I can make out, they can. The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) answered not only that they can but they do at the present time. Incidental to their taking property for other purposes they lease and rent it. Therefore, in order to enable them to proceed economically by temporarily leasing or renting it is not necessary to read into the fundamental law of this State that not only the Commonwealth but cities and towns may enter into the business of building property, taking land and building houses for purposes of lease and rent. You make this tremendous innovation for the purpose of accomplishing a supposititious difficulty which does not exist.

I would prefer to see this whole matter killed. I do not see any necessity for it. It is visionary. It is proposed by people who see something way off in the future, they think. It is not proposed because of difficulties which have been found to exist at the present time; it is proposed because they want to go way off farther.

I am surprised, I say, at the unanimous report of this committee, apparently, and I hope that if we cannot kill this thing we shall leave it just where it is. There is power enough, there was power enough before the forty-third amendment, under the general sovereignty of the Commonwealth, to look after the health of its inhabitants. You notice I do not use the words “police power”, they seem to have been worn threadbare, but under the general sovereignty of the Commonwealth health can be taken care of. Now, we have gone further than that in the forty-third amendment. We have extended it enormously. If we are not willing to rest right there and be conservative, I certainly hope that these amendments will be adopted. Why, the idea of giving the town of Saugus, the town of Lynnfield, the town of Webster, the right to go in and build houses to lease, is preposterous. It is preposterous that this Convention should entertain such a notion for a moment. But what may come out of it? If we cannot adopt those amendments and strike out lease and rent and put back that it shall not be sold for less than cost, and leave it wholly to the Commonwealth, then I hope the whole proposition will be killed.

Mr. Charbonneau of Lowell: There is much that is objectionable in the proposition before the Convention now. It is supposed to be presented for the purpose of relieving congestion. There are two kinds of congestion. One is to have too many people in one tenement, and another to have too many tenements in the same locality. In one case I suppose both kinds exist, and in the other but one.

The city of Lowell has had its troubles with congestion, but it is a condition that has been remedying itself for the last twenty-five years. I have taken the trouble to find out what has been done privately to remedy the conditions that existed, and I have discovered that in twenty-five years more than 2,500 single houses and two-tenant houses have been built by private parties in the suburbs of the city. So that a situation was reached before the war where large blocks easily could be found without a single tenant. People gradually were moving out in the suburbs. The men who have built these houses have developed large organizations of trained men, skilled labor, and have invested a large amount of capital in the business. They sell a cottage of six, seven or eight rooms with as little as $200 cash down, and they give a deed. The bank takes a first mortgage, and the builder takes a second mortgage payable in monthly instalments. Under this system the conditions in Lowell have been remedying themselves to such an extent that people found that it did not pay to build large blocks immediately before the war. At the present time conditions are abnormal. There are many war workers who have come in, and tenements are taken up. But under normal conditions there is no need, absolutely no need, of State help. Things will take care of themselves normally under private control.
It does not follow that building houses by the government will relieve the second kind of congestion, that is, having too many people in the same tenement. We have an experiment in Lowell by the Homestead Commission, and it has built there some ten or twelve houses. I inquired of the neighbors, — these houses happen to be in my district, — what the general opinion is of them. I asked a civil engineer. He said: "They are toy houses." I sent one of my office clerks to inquire from residents of the neighborhood what they think of the houses erected by the Homestead Commission. The neighbors say these houses are a disgrace to the locality. As a matter of fact, they have become known in the community as race suicide cottages, and one of the reasons for that is their size.

The Homestead Commission has published a pamphlet that gives some illumination on the subject. I have here on page 9 a plan which shows a parlor 8 ft. x 8 ft. 6 in. Then on another page I have a bedroom. The floor space of the bedroom is 10 x 9. This is in a pitch roof, and the roof pitches quite sharply, so that when you get to the ceiling the space cannot be very large.

The Boston Herald of a week ago Sunday had an article covering this subject, and it practically substantiated the name that has been given to these cottages by saying that they are adaptable to young married couples without children and who do not expect to have any.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will answer it. What is the frontage of that house on page 9, the frontage of the house? Also, you gave the dimension of the second floor, which practically calls for 10 feet 6 inches across and 9 feet in length. Is that right?

Mr. Charbonneau: That is as I understand it.

Mr. Mahoney: Then the width of that building is 26 feet; is that right? The front of the building?

Mr. Charbonneau: I have not the width of the building. It does not seem to appear in my plan.

Mr. Mahoney: I will say that if you look at page 3 it says 26 feet, that is the high priced house, and the lower priced house is 22 feet.

Mr. Charbonneau: Possibly the gentleman is right about the 22 feet, but that includes hallways, stairways, and other necessary spaces in the building. But the dimension as given here on page 9 is for the parlor 8 ft. x 8 ft. 6 in.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: I wish to ask the gentleman from Lowell if the United States government were not in possession of these facts that he has given us. Has not the United States government now appropriated $1,000,000 to relieve congestion in the city of Lowell, notwithstanding what he said?

Mr. Charbonneau: I understand that the United States government is now investigating the situation in Lowell for the purpose of providing homes for war workers, but the question before the Convention is of a permanent policy for the Commonwealth and cities and towns to engage in the building of houses, and not a temporary experiment to relieve war conditions. The United States government now has full power to erect houses for war workers and that phase of the situation is not in issue here.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: I should like to ask the gentleman if his objection is merely that the houses are too small, if his objection is really not against the building of houses but the failure in this instance to build houses sufficiently large to accommodate the tenants of those houses.

Mr. Charbonneau: I object to the building of houses by the State and by any municipality. I refer to the experiment in Lowell as tending to show that it is very difficult, if not impossible, for the State or a municipality to compete with private capital to build as good and as suitable houses as private persons can do. I do not desire to criticize the members of the Homestead Commission. I think that they individually are good people, but it is the scheme. It seems that this Commission does not understand the need of a working-man. It is stated that these houses are for working-men. Assuming that a working-man and his family can be lodged in a house that was built by the commission, the expense of paying the interest on the purchase price and paying the taxes and keeping his property in repair has been figured to be something like $30 a month for four rooms. It seems to me that is wholly unreasonable. These houses will be occupied during the period of the war, during the present shortage, but I have been assured by men of many years' experience in this line that they will fall back on the State just as soon as conditions become normal again; that there will be absolutely no demand for them.

The most objectionable part of this resolution is the one which provides for leasing and renting. I have had occasion to investigate houses similar to these, only larger and suitable to accommodate a working-man and his family. These were built in Centreville, R. I., — I think the name of the town is Arctic Center, — and these houses were let and leased to tenants. The owners found it necessary or convenient to lease these houses originally at $2 a month, and subsequently the rent was raised to $4.60 a month. The cottages in Lowell are on a basis of cost, actual cost, including interest on the purchase price, taxes, repairs, etc., of something like $30 a month, so that it seems by considering conditions elsewhere and in Lowell that the scheme is impracticable, and that it must fail because it cannot work out.

There are other objections to this scheme. One is that it has a tendency to segregate working-men. If the city or the State attempts to build a large number of houses, and sell them or lease them to working-men, it has a tendency to draw only working-men in that particular section, and it depreciates the surrounding real estate and is very undesirable to any community. I do not know how things are in most cities of the Commonwealth, but in our city of Lowell there is very little distinction between working-men, business men and professional men. As a matter of fact, I was much surprised to find here men who pretend to be solely representatives of labor. We seem to have no such men in our city. We have what we pride ourselves on, a democracy where every man who is honorable and lives well can meet every other man, whether he works or not.

Another great objection to this scheme is that it does not help the man who really needs help. The man in our city, at least, who needs help is the working-man who has eight or ten young children, too young to work. It is obvious that he would need probably three of these cottages to lodge himself and his family.

In view of these facts, I submit to the Convention that this resoolution ought not to pass in any form, that conditions in the Commonwealth will relieve themselves naturally by private capital, by private enterprise, by means that we have now, and that there is absolutely no need for this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: As a humble member of one of the committees, there having been two which considered the substance of this resolution, and both of them having presented a unanimously favorable report, I wish to rise under the bombardment of heavy guns which has been going on for the last half hour or so to express certain ideas that still remain unshattered in my mind. The gentleman who just spoke and most of the gentlemen who have been preceding him for some little time past have acted on the supposition that we were proposing to adopt a law whereby full authority was given to the Commonwealth and to any city or town therein that had any notion of doing it, to buy up all of the real estate it could lay its hands upon, build houses at wholesale and give them away to anybody who came along. What actually is proposed is this: That in cases where there is congestion of population, when the desire of the people of any community runs in that direction, the Legislature may have authority to allow them to go as far as the Legislature thinks it is wise and good for them to go in the direction of an experiment, or, if you please, a project that actually is carried into effect, for helping the situation in which they find themselves.

I suppose that every member of this Convention is as well aware as I am that there is no business in the country that is so wide open to the charge of profiteering as the business of developing real estate for homes on the edges of cities. We all of us know people who are interested in that kind of work, and I never have known any of them who did not have plenty of cash in their pockets. They make money out of it in very large sums. Now, it is possible that the State is not able to do that business effectively or economically. It is possible that the State will lose money every time it tries to do a thing out of which private citizens make a pile of money. I am not at all sure that the State does not generally do that sort of thing. I am not very much of a government ownership man, but I am firmly convinced that the constitutional power of government ownership, with the threat, if you please, that something of this sort may be done, may be done wisely and economically and effectively, serves at least to a small extent as a curb on the profiteering that is going on in this kind of business, and it is with that view that I have given my support, and will give my support very heartily, to the amendment in the form in which it has been moved now by the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring).

I am inclined to think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Milton (Mr. Bryant), while it does not make quite so good English of the proposition, is to its advantage. I thought at first that it was not, but some things have been said in the debate which would lead me to support it. I do feel that the thing which is before us should be held clearly in mind in this form: May the Legislature be empowered to allow an enterprise of this sort to be carried on? May the Legislature be empowered, if the people desire it, to have a class of enterprises of this kind carried on? May the Legislature, if it finds an exigency arising, allow, under some circumstances, the leasing or renting of property which for some reason or other has not come to be handled advantageously in the ordinary routine of bargaining, so that it could be sold at cost or something more than cost? May it, in such unusual cases, allow a parcel here and there to be sold at what it will bring? That is the proposition that is before us, just that and nothing more. It is not a proposition to enact a law allowing all our cities, or any of our cities, or the Commonwealth, to go into the real estate business in a large degree or in a small degree. It simply lays open to the Legislature the power to grant certain advances which it seems to me the exigencies of the situation clearly require. I hope that the members of the Convention in casting their votes will recall once again that fact to their minds, and that we shall not fall, as I think we sometimes have fallen, into the error of thinking that because a power was granted to the Legislature it therefore of necessity would be supposed that every bit of the power so granted was to be used in the most reckless and ruinous fashion.

Mr. Waterman of Williamstown: I believe that we are thinking that the remarks of the last speaker are certainly along the lines of the dreamer. Here we are in Massachusetts, with taxes soaring every year, and we have in this Convention by the budget system, as we have recommended, proposed that our financial outlook for the future shall be so guarded that we will not run into excessive debt without knowing it. Now that is a measure as a stop-gap for the expenditure of money by people, reformers, dreamers who come before the Legislature constantly and ask for appropriations for this thing, that thing and the other; and the consequence is that our annual State taxes have gone up to $30,000,000 or more. Now here is another chance to increase that, to run away with the control of the moneys that we wish to use for the State's benefit. That is why we have taxation, and the idea of selling or leasing property for less than cost is the idea to put it into taxation, and that has been the constant error. When the amendment was passed taxing intangibles at a different rate than other property, that was forced upon the Commonwealth of Massachusetts because of the increased necessity of getting funds to meet all these schemes. That is it, and nothing more. So that a great proportion of our citizens who are not able to get into schemes whereby they can have an easy income are taxed almost to desperation. And to-day, with the prospect of this country in the next fifty years having a debt that will make many and many a citizen groan, to say nothing about the great debts of the world, some of which may be repudiated, and the government of the United States and the people of the United States will suffer from that repudiation, — the business basis that we should stand upon, the same as the three bills that went through the Legislature this last winter for the rehabilitating of the street railway systems, — it was only a matter of putting them on a business basis so that they could go on and live and not become a public charge through taxation. And I leave it to you if that is not the fact. We are getting away from business principles and these schemes coming on make it so that people become helpless through the power of the Commonwealth to exist. And that is the reason that they have asked for these reliefs so that the people may not move out of the Commonwealth. That is why we passed the amendment providing that intangibles might have a different rating, so that those people may stay in the Commonwealth with their money we wish to use. So I trust that these dreams may be only dreams and that this matter may be killed here and now.

Mr. Ross of New Bedford: I am not surprised that the gentleman from Saugus (Mr. Bennett) should say that the Commonwealth and cities and towns should not be trusted to lease or rent homesteads to people who live in the houses that would be built under such a proposal as this. I am doubtful if I would want to trust the people of Saugus, knowing that the largest farmer in Essex County resides therein. The gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) is at his old tricks. He usually waits until amendments have been offered, and then he asks the Convention to adopt all the amendments and kill the measure. And I think about one of the first things I heard when serving in the Legislature,—and it is a good many years ago,—was that old trick, and it is as old as the hills.

Now, I am going to tell you something about homesteads and the cleaning up of your State land. I have had some little experience with that sort of thing in the Legislature. Ten years ago I introduced a bill looking to the reclamation of the wet lands of Massachusetts for the purpose of making farms and building homes thereon. I remember about the last fight I had on this matter before my retirement was with the chairman of the committee which had the matter in charge, and that gentleman now serves as the second highest official in the State (Lieutenant-Governor Coolidge), and he came in with a committee report adverse to appropriating moneys for the purpose of investigating methods whereby the lands could be cleaned up and rented out as farms or homesteads for the people. Of course the old question of constitutionality was raised. I am somewhat surprised to see this great difference between the attitude of the gentleman I have referred to and several delegates to this Convention. In that case I was met with courtesy after the first day's fight. After that we got together and a bill was framed and money was appropriated for the purpose of investigating the conditions of our wet lands and to provide for their reclamation. And when I inquired later with regard to the use of this money I was told it had been used for some other purpose.

I want to say that the intent of this measure,—and every delegate knows it,—is not to go into real estate business like a real estate man; that the intent is not to do the things that a city, a town or the Commonwealth should not do; that the sole purpose is to relieve the congested districts and take our people out in the country and build homes for them fit to live in, not like those that have been referred to by the gentleman in the first division, I believe, from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau). I want to say that if the truth were known I will warrant that somebody else rather than the Homestead Commission is responsible for those houses, the way they are built and the size of them, and so forth.

When the matter was up in the Legislature some time ago we tried to clean those meadows,—the Neponset meadows, so called,—4,000 acres of land. Had that proposition been adopted and had the State acquired those lands, it would have held them to-day at a value about twenty times or more greater than their cost then. In other words, they have been cleaned up in large measure under the health law, not as a reclamation by the Homestead Commission, and the result is, I am told, that one-half of those 4,000 acres were bought for $7 an acre and sold by the same people for $200 an acre after reclamation by the State. Now if you want that sort of thing to continue, why, kill this measure, of course; adopt all the amendments and throw it out through the window. How much better it would be if we could throw the gentleman from Somerville through the window! [Laughter.] To the north of us there lie some 10,000 acres of wet land that easily could be secured. I know one individual who had an invention, which was offered to the State at cost, that could be used on those lands, by which for all practical purposes they would clear themselves so far as surface water was concerned, and thus render them fit for reclamation by the State. The very scheme of the Homestead Commission is to lease and rent. How can any person acquire property otherwise? How can a person who has not got the money acquire a home? Are you going to give it to him? Are you going to turn it over to him? In what other way can you permit him to move into a house with land, owned by the State or municipality, and stay there without having either a lease or renting it to him? That is the intent, and when you take that out it seems to me you in large measure have nullified the resolution.
HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

The idea of the Homestead Commission is to permit the cities and towns to do this work. I do not think it would be wise to limit it to the Commonwealth, and I will tell you why. The cleaning up of these lands will be known; the parcels of property will be known to the real estate dealers, and I am as much afraid of them as any delegate in this Convention, and by the time a city or town has secured authority from the Commonwealth the land would have been bought and the said city or town would have to pay several times more than it would have if the fact had not been known.

That in my opinion is just what would happen. The Homestead Commission, if it is permitted, — and if the resolution moved by the gentleman from Beverly is adopted without amendment it will be, — can prevent this in large measure. It is much better to do that than to pass all the amendments and kill the measure. Then you are doing something that will enable the Homestead Commission to do the work which has been done successfully in Australia, in New Zealand, in the South American republics and in various countries of Europe. And in not one solitary instance, — and I have made some inquiries about this, — has one country that has tried this scheme gone back on it. I trust the amendment moved by the gentleman from Beverly will be adopted and all other amendments killed.

Mr. Whittier of Winthrop: I have been a real estate agent for twenty years and I want to say that I am in favor of this resolution in spite of what the last speaker has said in his reference to real estate agents. I want to give you one or two reasons why I am in favor of the resolution. Incidentally I will say that I am chairman of the Winthrop Planning Board. Some ten years ago we were face to face with a very serious problem in our town. In the center part of our town there was a large marsh area of about a hundred acres. Now Winthrop is, next to Nahant, I believe, the smallest town in area in the Commonwealth. We have only about 800 acres available for development and we have reached a considerable measure of congestion. This area had been purchased by outside interests who had absolutely no civic interest in the community, and was in the process of being sold to Tom, Dick and Harry at exorbitant prices, and we were in danger of a development which would be not only prejudicial to the town but prejudicial to the persons so developing it. It was, as I say, a low, marsh area, without streets, sewers or any public service, and the character of the buildings that were being erected was such as not to be fit for human habitation. We realized that there was a fearful menace there. How were we to meet it? I want to say further that in proportion to area the town of Winthrop has more park space than any other town or city in the Commonwealth.
HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

Mr. BAUER of Lynn: Except Lynn.

Mr. WHITTIER: I will not make any exception. The only way that we could meet that situation was to take that enormous area for park purposes and tie our hands for any possible way of developing that property in a way which would be a credit to the community and give us taxable property for decent development. And there it lies to-day, a waste area, and it will be years and years before the town will be in any position to develop it as a park, and as a park we do not need it.

Now I say that this power should be extended to cities and towns. I have not very much time, but I want to say one or two words why I am not opposed to the Commonwealth or cities or towns renting or leasing. I think that situation is going to take care of itself. As I say, I have been in the business of taking care of other people's property for the last twenty years. In that time I have gained some experience. If I had a tremendous autocratic power and could regulate how people were to live in a house, I think that I might be able to work the thing out to a satisfactory solution. But my experience shows that the average person prefers to live as he or she pleases, without dictation.

Mr. HERBERT A. KENNY of Boston: It seems to me that this resolution will wipe out two great evils in our Commonwealth. One is the slum evil and the other is that great distressful thing which we see in times of strikes, where the corporations of mills owning these large apartment-houses throw out the strikers and intimidate them in that way by eviction. Now it is all very well for the gentleman from Williamstown (Mr. Waterman) to say that we are dreamers. Gentlemen, we must do a little dreaming in this Convention. We must deal with probable expectancies. The Legislature can handle the business problems, but this Convention is to reach out, to anticipate what the future will do, a little bit at least.

Are the landlords of this country so altruistic as to wipe out the slums? Have they done it in any of our large cities? Is it not incumbent, therefore, upon the Commonwealth to wipe out those slums? Is it not incumbent upon the Commonwealth to give the laboring men a fair chance in their houses, and not have them evicted under the lash of the employer? Is that fair?

Now, gentlemen, all the large cities of the world have found that they must deal with the slum problem direct. They may do it under their police power, but they must do it in order to conserve the health, the strength and the energy of the people. As I said before, there are coming back to our shores probably one million men who will be steeped in new socialistic ideas. I have been trying very hard to find out what is the problem to meet the trend toward socialism. How are we going to meet this spectre of socialism or what is termed socialism which is appearing before us? I want to quote no less an authority than President Eliot of Harvard College. President Eliot, in his late thesis on dealing with this labor and capital problem, states that the only way, the only method for America to do and for the various Commonwealths of the United States to do is for the employer to form some coöperative plan with the employee, and not only that, the greatest measure offered by President Eliot is that the citizen of the Commonwealth, the citizen of the country, should have in his country some interest, and if the alien comes here and has no interest in this country, if he has not a Liberty Bond, if he does not pay even a poll-tax, he is nothing but a liquid commodity that moves from place to place. For instance, a hundred thousand Italians have said that in the event of prohibition they will move to Buenos Ayres or elsewhere in South America. They have no root in this country. Now let us take President Eliot's advice in this matter. Let the Commonwealth say to the soldier who has come back or to the struggling workman: "We will give you a home; we will give you a home much as the English government has given the agricultural laborer a home." By following President Eliot's advice in the matter it does seem to me that we shall dissipate this spectre of socialism which already is frightening the very ablest sociologists and publicists of our country.

Mr. Mahoney of Boston: I hope that this resolution reported by the committee will be accepted by the Convention. In 1911 the Legislature created the Homestead Commission, and on that commission were such men as Mr. Gettemy of the Bureau of Statistics, a member of the Board of Health, the President of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, the Bank Commissioner, and three other persons appointed by the Governor, one of whom was a woman and another a laboring man,—with instructions to report to the following Legislature a bill under which mechanics, factory employees, laborers and others might be assisted by the Commonwealth in acquiring a homestead for small houses with a plot of land. The commission reported a bill in 1912, but the Supreme Judicial Court handed down an opinion in answer to an inquiry that the use of public funds or any funds over which the public had control for such purpose was unconstitutional. An amendment to the Constitution to make such appropriation constitutional, being adopted by the Legislatures of 1914 and 1915, was submitted to the voters at the State election of 1915 and was ratified by a majority of three to one, every county in the State voting for it.

Now coming down to the question why we want to pass this amendment, you all know that in this State it is pretty hard for any man to get a mortgage from a savings bank. We have in this State about 196 savings banks with a total of $1,350,000,000 deposits, and out of that there is about $500,000,000 loaned on mortgages on real estate. As you know, the savings banks were created to give the people homes, but now they have gone away from that principle to a great extent and they are investing more and more in stocks and bonds. In 1916 the loans on real estate by savings banks increased to about $32,000,000. Last year the increase in loans on real estate by savings banks in this State was only $19,000,000, making a falling off of about $13,000,000. What have the owners of real estate done for that $13,000,000? This is a question that vitally concerns the laboring people. I do not know what the laboring classes would do except for the coöperative banks in this State. The coöperative banks have increased their loans $4,000,000 on real estate in this State during the last year. We must have some additional means of helping the laboring people.

In 1917 the Legislature took the first definite step in this direction by passing the following act (General Acts, 1917, Chap. 310):

AN ACT TO AUTHORIZE THE HOMESTEAD COMMISSION TO PROVIDE HOMESTEADS FOR CITIZENS.

SECTION 1. The Homestead Commission is hereby authorized, with the consent of the Governor and Council, to take or purchase in behalf of and in the name of the Commonwealth, a tract or tracts of land for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homesteads, or small houses and plots of ground, for mechanics, laborers, wage-earners of any kind, or others, citizens of this Commonwealth; and may hold, improve, subdivide, build upon, sell, repurchase, manage and care for such land and the buildings constructed thereon, in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be determined upon by the commission.

SECTION 2. The commission may sell land acquired hereunder, or any parts thereof, with or without buildings thereon, for cash, or upon such instalments, terms and contracts, and subject to such restrictions and conditions as may be determined upon by the commission, but no tract of land shall be sold for less than its cost, including the cost of any buildings thereon. All proceeds from the sale of land and buildings or other sources shall be paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth.

SECTION 3. The Homestead Commission is hereby authorized to expend a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars for the purposes of this act.

SECTION 4. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. John W. Daly of Lowell: Since my colleague from Lowell (Mr. Charbonneau) addressed this Convention I have heard some comment that impels me to arise and correct an erroneous impression that he has created, namely, that there is no laboring class in the city of Lowell. At the present time the city of Lowell is choked with men, women and children who are laboring in relays 24 hours every day, producing materials to help the country in its present crisis. Furthermore let me say that the reason the Homestead Commission selected the city of Lowell as a place of experiment in housing problems, and the reason that the Federal government, after investigation, authorized an expenditure of over $1,000,000 to build houses in the city of Lowell, was because the investigation showed and proved that from a humanitarian standpoint it was absolutely necessary to provide adequate housing facilities for the laboring people of the city of Lowell.

[Applause.]

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I was considerably interested in the question asked by the gentleman from Fall River in this division (Mr. Dean) of the gentleman from Worcester in charge of the measure (Mr. Hobbs) which to my mind was not answered, although the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) did say a few words with regard to the experiences of Ontario, Canada, on this housing proposition. I have a few facts here which I am going to call to the attention of the delegates and let them draw their own conclusions.

In the first place, the early experience of England in providing homesteads is seen in the report of the London Metropolitan Board of Public Works, dated December 21, 1883: Up to the previous September, at a cost of a million and a quarter pounds sterling (equal to about $6,000,000 in our money at the normal rate of exchange), it had unhoused 21,000 persons and provided homes for 12,000, the remaining 9,000 to be thereafter provided for, being meanwhile left houseless. London expended in the year ending March 31, 1905, over $19,000,000 to house 31,339 persons in 5,929 apartments and 1,147 sleeping places in dormitories, and in England after 25 years' experience the English people voted against the proposition by enormous majorities at the polls in 1906 and again in 1907. The exact figures of the vote are available in the reference library here in the State House.

The gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) spoke about the situation in Ontario. Ontario's annual loss on the housing business was $131,113 on the working-class dwellings such as we have been talking about. That information is contained also in a legislative report on file in the State Library.

Here is another rather significant fact that after 20 years' experience but little wisdom has been gained as shown by Lord Rosebery in these figures of workmen's dwellings at Shoreditch, England: 533 persons displaced, 472 persons provided for. He said:

This is a curious way of housing the poor; dishousing would seem a more appropriate expression. It is evident that the more poor are housed the more would be houseless,—they turned out 533 poor people and housed 472 people, many of whom were richer and better off. There would have been in those buildings none at all of the class for whom they were intended, if the Borough Council had not exercised a wise discrimination in refusing tenants who offered much more than the rents which you are prepared to accept; that is to say, a wise discrimination in letting them below their value. Inspired by German example, socialistic schemes transplanted into England and her Colonies have weakened them by piling up enormous debts, and loading down the taxes, making more easy the Prussian subjugation of her enemies. England was blind to the game.

Socialistic homesteads may be one act of the same "blind" game in Massachusetts. Rent under this lease provision in this measure will be a gratuity, in part, because interest and depreciation will not be considered. Fictitious profits on paper will deceive voters, and the illusion will spread from city to city and from town to town, until the total cost may rise to $200,000,000, the amount stated by the Homestead Commission's secretary, who is the leading sponsor of the movement in Massachusetts.

The Prussian method is State Socialism by which the government contributes nothing but cost of administration. The democratic method requires that the taxpayers through the government shall largely support the undertaking.

John Stuart Mill in his Essay on Liberty argues that if houses, markets, insurance offices, coal yards, lines of communication and transportation, were departments of the government and all their employees appointed and paid by the government, "Not all the freedom of the press and popular constitution of the Legislature would make this or any other country free otherwise than in name."

The impracticability of the undertaking of adequately meeting the need by municipal provision of workmen's dwellings was brought out in the annual report of the London County Council for the year ending March 31, 1905, p. 128, report of the Housing Committee:

The total sum which has been expended on capital account under the Housing of the Working-Classes Acts up to March 31, 1905, is 3,922,086 pounds sterling (about $20,000,000 in U. S. money). Result: 31,339 persons housed on the basis of two persons per room, 5,929 tenements of 1 to 6 rooms each in block dwellings and cottages and 1,147 sleeping places in dormitories in Parke Street and Carrington Houses.

Now right in our own country the New York State Tenement-House Commission says in its latest report:

At the most such public buildings would better the living conditions of a favored few at the sacrifice of self-dependence.

Here is the opinion of one of the gentlemen who frequently was quoted in the initiative and referendum debate last year by some of those who were in favor of that irresponsible and reactionary amendment, Mr. Perley Morse, who wrote in the Forum:

My experience as a certified public accountant has shown me that government enterprises always cost more than private enterprises.

Herbert Spencer says:

Injury to property and check to business results where municipal bodies turn house builders because they inevitably lower the values of houses otherwise built, and check the supply of more.

Lord Avebury makes this significant comment of the English housing system:

To provide 16,000 rooms in 25 years is only dealing with the fringe of the question. If we are really and thoroughly to carry out a policy of housing, it is easy to see what a gigantic sum would be required.

In conclusion, Henry Holt in his book, "Late aspects of government regulation," says:

From the chaos of statistics regarding municipal housing two facts stand out in unquestioned clearness: Taxation and debt have enormously increased.

Mr. Donnelly of Lawrence: This resolution that is before the Convention at this time,—that is, assuming that we accept these amendments proposed and especially the amendment of the gentleman from Cambridge in the third division (Mr. Walcott) which covers this matter pretty broadly,—is far more progressive than the mere act of leaving it to the cities and towns themselves. We all know the favors to be granted in city politics if cities and towns are to dabble in real estate. When it is in the Constitution, and we all know that the General Court has full authority over the matter, then the cities and towns that want these dwellings built, and placed within their confines, will have to come here and show their plans, their facts and their figures. I say to you that in the city of Lawrence,—a city of 105,000 population, a city that has grown largely and steadily since the year 1900, and it has not grown over night,—we have been in a very congested condition for the last ten years in regard to tenements and housing, especially since the beginning of this war. We are making practically the bulk of the khaki uniforms that are worn by the National Army and the regular army to-day. Since the American Woolen Company has broadened its field in Lawrence, it has built a great number of cottages and a great many three-tenement houses there, and if it had not been for the building of those houses by the American Woolen Company the city of Lawrence would be in a very serious predicament to-day as far as housing people is concerned. And as you want to see your own city or town progress, I also want to see the city of Lawrence go forward also and not back. On the outskirts of your cities and towns you have placed signs inviting people to “Come to Live In Malden”, or Boston, or Lowell; or some other place, stating on those bill-boards the water-power, the tax rate, the schools, and so forth. If you want to develop one of the best valleys in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, one of the best valleys in the country, I ask you to give this resolution careful consideration. As you know, without a doubt, the city of Lawrence is bordered by two splendid towns and the new city of Methuen. We have a vast area; its resources are very great, and if we have not the facilities to house our people, how can we hold out open arms and extend an invitation to come and live within our confines? We want the city to progress. It is the biggest manufacturing city, as you all know, not in the State or in the country, but in the world. New mills have gone in there every two or three years since 1904, and only lately two more new mills have been added. We have the best artificial dam anywhere in this region, and we have very valuable water-power for inducing new industries to come to our city, but still with increasing population we have no place to house them. So why not give this resolution ample consideration if we are to have a city that is to progress like the city of Lowell, which has not been choked in population over night, because I believe it is like my own city, that has progressed for the last ten, twelve or fifteen years? Our valley is a textile and industrial centre, and we are bound to grow steadily and normally and abnormally. In conclusion, let me say that if you give us laws that will permit progress and let us develop our cities and valley in that section, and also give us a navigable Merrimack River from Lowell to the sea, we can develop a wonderful valley, and bring more commerce and business to Massachusetts than it now has. We shall be able then to ship our goods from our back door to the most extreme corner of the globe. It would mean also a great reduction in freight rates on all imports to our section, thereby greatly benefiting the people.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: To my mind it is not a question in this Convention between socialism and individualism. It is a question between the real estate interests and the mass of our people. Land is as necessary for human existence as water or air, and around every city where vacant land is to be found you will find those who will exploit it. It is almost impossible for the workmen to acquire that land. And I believe, sir, that people even in the so-called “race-suicide” buildings that are alleged to be in process of construction in Lowell, are more healthy and that the children they bear will be better citizens than those who are reared in the private tenements of our cities in this Commonwealth.

The gentleman in the second division (Mr. Waterman) has referred to the fact that we cannot pay for these things. Let me say if the debt in the future is to be paid it has got to be paid by the people, and the health of the people should not be measured by dollars and cents. The people cannot be healthy and cannot be moral and the highest character of citizen cannot be obtained when men and women are crowded together as they are in our industrial centers. And I trust, sir, that this amendment will go to the people as it is drawn by the committee, for I can see nothing more reasonable. This amendment if it is adopted will make it more feasible for the workmen to get out into the open air and have homes of their own. I believe that is one of the most fundamental matters of government that can be prescribed by the will of the people and I trust that the resolution as reported by the committee will be adopted.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: I simply wish to call to the attention of those members of this Convention who dislike to see the government go into business for itself, the fact that under the forty-third amendment, now a part of the Constitution, the government can do this thing now; that under this amendment the government is empowered if it so desires to lease or to rent land and let private individuals go into the business of building. Is not that a healthier condition than the present one where, in order to have land of this kind used for homestead purposes, the government cannot only build, but must go into business? Pass this amendment, and the government does not have to go into business, but it may act simply as the landlord. Is not that an advantage?

Mr. Morrill of Haverhill: Twenty-five nations among the leading civilized countries of the world, in one form or another, provided homesteads for their citizens. New Zealand, for illustration, cited more because it was the first to adopt that method of meeting a troublesome situation than because of any bearing the fact may have on Massachusetts' problem; took the first steps in that direction as long ago as 1893.

A discussion of New Zealand's reasons for embarking upon such a policy would be idle for purposes of this debate, but I may remark that to some degree they were similar to those which have impelled economists in this State to think seriously of discovering a method of dealing with the land question. The New Zealand government now, in any event, provides 22,000 homes to its citizens, showing at least that the State's participation in the real estate business has not been a failure, whether it be regarded in point of results achieved or merely in point of popularity.

Now, it so happens, that the success or the failure of any policy is determined by its relationship to the fundamental interests of the people governed, and the New Zealand homestead act, tested by that precept, justifies itself. For instance, only 2 per cent of the entire population was unemployed in 1911, to use the figures of a single year which I happen to have before me, while in Massachusetts the rate was 8 per cent. The death rate in New Zealand in that year was 9.4 per 1,000 persons; it was 15.4 per 1,000 in Massachusetts. The significance of the first comparison lies in its application, for a Nation which has attained to a productive capacity of 98 per cent of its man power, surely is prosperous enough to be happy. The second comparison points to an equally hopeful era,—for certainly the elimination of slums, and, through that, the extension of life and health among the people, is an end worthy the effort of any State.

Then again, the eight-hour day is universal in New Zealand and wages have increased more rapidly than the cost of living,—and this, gentlemen, in a country where most of the inhabitants are land-owners and actual producers. Does not that sound strange to us in this country? In regard to infant mortality, quoting from the figures of 1911, the death rate among infants under one year of age in New Zealand was 56 per thousand, in Massachusetts 119 per thousand. In 1912 it was 51 per thousand in New Zealand and 117 in Massachusetts. These are all reasons, gentlemen, why Massachusetts should go forward and grapple constructively with a problem which is becoming more and more pressing. Our opponents, however, rather than adopt conditions that exist as the yardstick with which to measure the importance of the policy, stand aghast and point to the cost in money. I do not concede the justice of such an ideal, but, viewed even in that light, New Zealand's experience should beckon us onward, for, if the expenditure of money by government be an evil, as has been insinuated here, then its acquisition by government must be a benefit, —a contention most economists refuse to admit, but, for the sake of argument, worthy of consideration by this Convention. What then are the facts? There has been an actual profit to the New Zealand government of half a million dollars, all of which is returned to the public treasury and all of which plays a part in reducing the public taxes.
HOMES FOR CITIZENS.

In 1915 the voters of this State approved an amendment relative to homesteads and this present amendment is simply a change, the people having voted for the general principle empowering the General Court to authorize the taking of land to relieve congestion of population and provide homes for citizens. The vote in 1915 was 284,588 in favor and 95,148 against, approving the proposition by a vote of more than three to one. In Saugus the vote was 786 against 236. In Wellesley it was approved by a vote of 457 against 337. In Suffolk County it was approved by a vote of 650,214 against 150,355, more than four to one. It was approved in Boston also by a vote of more than four to one. Now is it not reasonable to suppose that, from that vote, the people have given us a mandate to pass this resolution to-day? I leave it to you to decide.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: Some years ago, when it was proposed that cities and towns be permitted to take over the plants of water companies and electric light companies, the same arguments that have been advanced here to-day against this measure were advanced against that measure. The same criticisms largely of organization by cities and towns of a business proposition or management of them were made. The criticisms here by the gentleman in the third division from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) and by the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) are criticisms not of the soundness of the principle but rather of the practicability of it. The criticisms are directed to the men who may administer the law which the Legislature sees fit to pass under this amendment. The principle is not challenged or impugned. The very criticisms that were offered by the gentlemen from Salem in this division (Mr. Sullivan), of the cost, the expense, the difficulties, the disappointments experienced by other communities, should have no weight when we come to regard the soundness, so to speak, of the principle itself and the overwhelming vote of the people of this State in favor of this principle.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: Is it not true that the overwhelming vote of the people in favor of the present forty-third amendment was based on the policy so ably described by the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), namely, that the property should not be sold at less than cost?
Mr. Flaherty: I do not believe that is so, sir. That phase of the matter was not discussed in the campaign, nor was it called to the attention of the people. The practical politician's view of what a politician in office might do was not considered and surely ought not to be an argument against the adoption of this very wise principle. It is a governmental function and ought to be adopted without the necessity of resorting to a constitutional amendment, and unquestionably would have been adopted years ago but for the fact that the Constitution was held to prohibit it. All of these things are in the line of progress.

Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: I find myself in somewhat a strange position with both the ultra-conservatives and some of the ultra-radicals combined in opposing this proposition of which, unfortunately, I happen to be in charge. Such a combination of the two extremes is always a joy to witness except when you behold it at your own expense, because unanimity ordinarily is a delightful thing. And yet it often happens when you touch on the problem of housing legislation, no matter what the reform is, you have at once a combination between the men who own the houses and the men who are supposed to represent the people who live in them. The one group are afraid of the value of their investment; the other, as a rule, are afraid of changing the character of their district. They do not want changes, they want things kept as they are, and that sort of conservatism is a natural trait in humanity. I do not say that in criticism; it is a thing that is so natural that it may be that some may have observed it even in myself. But it is a striking thing indeed which brings those who have lifted their voice in defence of the vested interests with the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) who has been somewhat inadequately described as the greatest reformer in the State.

Now the chief argument against the housing proposition has seemed to come on the matter of dollars and cents. Dollars and cents are a very important thing and I want to say right here that I have no doubt whatever that on a strictly financial basis housing reform does not pay. I do not believe you can make a profit out of it. But on the other hand it never was started with the idea that a profit should be made out of it. The State does not go into these businesses for a profit; it goes into them to better conditions, and the dividends it seeks on the money are dividends in increased health and better conditions of the persons whom it seeks to care for. If those are secured it may swallow even a considerable expenditure and still claim that the money was well expended.

Something might be said even on the money matter, because in making up these figures no respect is paid to what the State pays for conditions arising out of bad housing,—the money that it pays for fire, loss of property, the money that it pays for the care of the tubercular and those afflicted with other diseases that thrive in the noisome overcrowded districts of our great cities.

Mr. Sanford Bates of Boston: I should like to ask the member before his time has expired if he thinks it is wise or safe or proper as a constitutional matter to authorize the town of Chilmark or the town of Granby to put an unlimited investment into homes for the citizens of Boston?

Mr. Hobbs: I believe in each municipality paying its own bills and I think the gentleman's caution is entirely unnecessary. No city or town nor the State itself can go into this matter to such an extent as to prejudice its financial condition. There is a natural law which operates as a very satisfactory brake, and that is one over which the Legislature has no control.

Mr. Hobbs continued his speech after the recess.

I regret the interruption in my speech. When I stopped I was attempting to develop the proposition that the value of housing legislation was not measurable properly in money alone. I have not had time to prepare an extensive set of figures and facts to show wherein the other side of the column must be taken into consideration, nor have I the time, had I them in hand, to place them before this Convention. I shall confine myself, however, to three pieces of evidence. The first is a statement of the chief sanitary inspector of the health department of the city of Cleveland, which is:

Our city has prepared a set of pin maps that show where the cases of tuberculosis, of contagious diseases, of gastro-intestinal diseases, of infants' deaths and all deaths that have occurred during the year are marked. It has prepared another set of pin maps showing where the family plumbing, the faulty yard closets, the dark rooms, the overcrowded lots are, and in either map the pins have gone into practically the same places.

Now, I take it that if mortality statistics show a decided difference in one community with the average of the State, that is a fair indication that there is something wrong with that community. Now I want to read as an indication some figures as to infant mortality in some of the cities of our Commonwealth, and I think that in one case at least they will be fairly significant. During the period from 1910 to 1915 the infant mortality of the State ranged from 133 per thousand live births in 1910 to 102 in 1915. Those figures I will ask you to remember.

In Fall River in that time the maximum was 186, the minimum was 151, and in 1915 was 168, over 50 per cent higher than the average. In New Bedford the maximum was 180, the minimum was 143. In Lowell the maximum was 231, the minimum was 147, and in 1915 was 156, again 50 per cent, and we have had expert testimony from Lowell as to the housing conditions there. In Lawrence the maximum was 168, the minimum 128, and in 1915 138. In Holyoke the maximum was 213, the minimum 163, and in 1915 169. In Taunton the maximum was 212, the minimum 123, and in 1915 158. In Chicopee the maximum was 177, the minimum 137, and in 1915 138. That is what is happening in some of our cities. In some of them there is a death rate of children 50 per cent in excess of the birth rate. Does more than 50 per cent mean nothing in the consideration of this subject? Every one of those cities is a big manufacturing district, with a big tenement population.

Take children under five years of age. Out of each 100 deaths, average for the State in 1914 24.6,—out of 100. What was the average in some of those cities that I have mentioned? New Bedford 39.6 per cent, Lawrence 41.4, Holyoke 39, Fall River 44.5, Chicopee 48.6, Lowell 32. That is what is happening in some of our cities to-day, and yet in the face of those figures it still is maintained that there is no need of State activity in the matter of providing better housing facilities.
Let me read a further citation, and this will be the last citation I shall read, as to what has happened in some of these places where it is has been claimed that public housing is a failure.

In 1913 Col. G. Kyffin Taylor, chairman of the Liverpool housing committee, reported to the Tenth International Housing Congress at the Hague that

In the model tenements built in Bevington and Burlington streets, London, there was a mortality rate as follows: From 50 per 1,000 to 27 per 1,000, a saving in life of nearly 50 per cent. At one time typhus fever was never absent from the slums. In an epidemic year it claimed its victims by thousands. During 1910, for the first time in the sanitary history of Liverpool, not one single case of typhus was reported. In 1895 the number of cases of typhoid was 1,300. There has been a remarkable falling off, until in the year 1911 the number of cases was only 200. In 1901 154 people died from typhoid, and this number fell to 42 in 1910. The diminution in the disease runs with the diminution in unsanitary property. The average death-rate from phthisis has fallen from 4 to 1.9 per thousand. During the past year, out of the 2,601 cases of phthisis which have been under observation at their own homes only 33 were found to reside in the dwellings erected by the housing committee of the city council.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bryant of Milton was adopted.

The amendment moved by Mr. Horgan of Boston was adopted, by a vote of 78 to 41.

The amendment moved by Mr. Walcott of Cambridge was adopted, by a vote of 88 to 32.

The amendment moved by Mr. Loring of Beverly, as thus amended, was then adopted; and, by a vote of 89 to 56, it was passed to be engrossed Friday, July 26, in the following form (No. 406):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

4 Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution is hereby amended by inserting after the word "Commonwealth", in the second line thereof, the words "or the cities and towns therein", — so as to read as follows: —

8 Article XLIII. The General Court shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth or the cities and towns therein to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens: provided, however, that this amendment shall not be deemed to authorize the sale of such land or buildings at less than the cost thereof.

It was restored to the Orders of the Day Tuesday, August 6, because it had not been referred to the committee on Form and Phraseology, and on the following day it was reported by that committee in the following form (No. 417):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

4 Article XLIII of the amendments of the Constitution is hereby amended by substituting the following: Article XLIII. The General Court shall have power to make laws whereby the Commonwealth or the cities and towns therein, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens, may take land and hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell the same; but such land or buildings shall not be sold for less than the cost thereof.
Mr. LORING of Beverly: This resolution has been amended, but the amendment as now submitted means nothing more than the original amendment of the Constitution, No. XLIII. This amendment has been put into good English by the committee on Form and Phraseology, but in our opinion it adds nothing whatever to the former amendment in substance. It seems to me that it is a great mistake to put meaningless amendments on the ballot, and I hope that the measure will be killed on this stage.

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL of Boston: Will the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) allow me a question? The question I should like to ask is this: As this amendment now is, having been adopted by the people, does it not give to the cities and towns power that they never had before according to the Constitution?

Mr. LORING: I think that the Commonwealth could act through the cities and towns before by getting authority from the Legislature, and that is all they can have by this amendment.

Mr. DENNIS D. DRISCOLL: Would it not clear up the doubt as to the legislation if there was a constitutional amendment adopted by the people to give the cities and towns that right? It would not need any legislation.

Mr. HOBBS of Worcester: I feel that I can concur in what the gentleman from Beverly (Mr. Loring) has said as to the effect of the proposition in its present form. Of course that was the intention of the substituted proposition, to make it mean as little as possible, and the only effect of the adding of those words, so that the amendment shall read: "The Legislature shall have power to authorize the Commonwealth, and cities and towns thereof, to take land," is perhaps to clear up the question as to whether a taking by eminent domain must be in the name of the Commonwealth or can be in the name of the city or town. I do not think that it makes a very radical difference in the situation. There is very little question in my mind but what under the preceding amendment the Legislature could have delegated the essential function of taking land to the cities and towns, with the one exception that possibly the takings, if any such were made, would have to be made in the name of the Commonwealth, which is, after all, not a very great difference. If, however, there are any persons interested in this matter who consider that it does add anything of value I am perfectly ready to vote for it. It is not my proposition any longer, and I do not feel any responsibility for the proposition in its present form.

Mr. PILLSBURY of Wellesley: I see no reason to doubt that my friend from Beverly (Mr. Loring) is right, and that the amendment makes no change in the legal effect of Article XLIII as it now stands. It is familiar doctrine that the cities and towns are mere agencies of the Commonwealth, and that the Commonwealth can exercise its powers through the cities and towns so far as it sees fit. There is nothing here worth saving, and the resolution ought to be rejected.

Mr. BENNETT of Saugus: I certainly hope this resolution will not be rejected. There are a good many of us who were opposed to the leasing proposition, and we were opposed to selling the land for less than cost. Now, those objections have been made. I think we have a good amendment here. A lot of time has been spent upon it. The Convention was absolutely in favor of it; there is no question about that. The Homestead Commission is doing good work. I think they went too far when they wanted that leasing proposition and when they wanted to sell for less than cost. Those provisions have been stricken out. We have got a perfectly good amendment. It is something that has been striven for all the session. It cannot do any harm; I believe it will do good, and I hope it will not be rejected.

The resolution was rejected Wednesday, August 7, by a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote of 90 to 94.

Mr. Samuel Ross of New Bedford presented the following resolution (No. 114):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

Cities and towns shall have power to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell, lease or rent the same for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens.

The committee on Social Welfare reported, July 16, 1917, the following new draft (No. 324):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

The General Court shall have power to authorize cities and towns to take land and to hold, improve, subdivide, build upon and sell, and, under such provisions and regulations as the General Court may establish or approve, to lease or rent the same, for the purpose of relieving congestion of population and providing homes for citizens.

The resolution was taken up for consideration Thursday, June 20, 1918.

Mr. Frank P. Bennett of Saugus moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 6, 7 and 8, the words "and, under such provisions and regulations as the General Court may establish or approve, to lease or rent".

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 27 to 82.

The resolution (No. 324) was rejected.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Kilbon of Springfield: As this resolution, No. 157, is the resolution which has just been adopted by substitution and passed to its third reading, I ask: What is the proper proceeding?

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: Let me ask whether No. 157, in its order as it is upon the calendar here, is left for any further action to-day. I understand, as the gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Kilbon) has just said, that we have substituted that resolution for No. 142 in the calendar. Does that not dispose of it on this calling of the calendar?

The President: The Chair understands that a resolution in the same form as No. 324 has been substituted for document No. 320. It becomes an amendment to that resolution, and is now a part of the resolution that was presented originally as document No. 320. It is no longer, so far as the previous action of the Convention is concerned, document No. 324, but is an amendment to the other. The present resolution is properly before the Convention, and has not been acted upon as such.
Mr. Hobbs of Worcester: In order that there may be no difficulty, I would move that No. 157 be laid upon the table.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: No advantage occurs to me from establishing the precedent of the table in this matter. We already have adopted this resolution, and if there is occasion to amend it on the next stage that is much easier, it seems to me, than by keeping this form alive. I trust the motion will not prevail, and that we will reject this resolution.

Mr. Pillsbury: I rise only for the purpose of seconding what my friend from Waltham (Mr. Luce) has said. It seems to me clear that the thing to do is to reject this resolution, and I ask my friend from Worcester (Mr. Hobbs) if he does not concur in that view.

Mr. Hobbs: It is possible that some traces of the practice in the General Court remain on me, but in that tribunal it is more customary to lay matters of identical nature on the table than to reject them, in order that there may be no question as to whether unfavorable action on one might not bar action on the other. If it is perfectly clear that that is not the rule in this Convention, and that unfavorable action on this matter will not preclude the Convention from still further considering the matter which previously was acted upon, I would have no objection to withdrawing my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. Bennett of Saugus: I desire to amend the resolution by striking out from the word “and”, after “sell”, in the 6th line, the remainder of that line, the next line and the first part of the 8th line until the words “the same”, so as to cut out all reference to leasing.

I should like to vote for this resolution, but I shall not vote for any proposition to have the Commonwealth go into the business of leasing property. I think we are making experiments enough. I should like to vote for this resolution, but I cannot vote for the leasing part of it, and I move therefore that that be stricken out.

I certainly hope that amendment will be adopted. I do not believe that this Convention, the conservative element in this Convention anyway, is ready to ask the Commonwealth to go into the business of holding and leasing property. To engage in the business of providing homes or improving property, why, there is nothing new about that. The whole South Cove in Boston, if my memory serves me right, was improved and put into condition in that way as a health proposition, and there have been many cases of that kind. There is no doubt about that, the Commonwealth can do it now without any new constitutional amendment. But when it comes to going into the business of leasing property we are creating a new industry in this Commonwealth, and I think we are going beyond anything that heretofore has been proposed. I hope we will strike out the leasing feature. Then I shall be very glad to vote for the measure, but I cannot vote for it with that leasing proposition in it.

Mr. Kilbon: I think it is proper to say that the idea of the committee on Social Welfare, as it appeared to me, in regard to the matter of leasing is of this sort. I may illustrate by a condition which arose in the city which I have the honor to represent. We are widening one of our main thoroughfares in that city. In the taking of property for that widening the city got possession of a number of parcels of property on one side or the other of the street that was to be widened, several months in advance of the time when the widening work was actually to be done. It was proper and lawful for the city to rent that property until it was required for demolition under the laws existing with regard to street widening, and that was done. The city gained thereby the rental value of that property for the time when it was waiting for further action. The case which would arise with regard to a homestead operation would not be precisely similar, but it would have something of the same character. The idea that was in the mind of the committee with regard to leasing was purely temporary, to avoid greater loss than otherwise might happen, and the form in which the resolution now has been put before the Convention leaves to the Legislature the power to regulate the leasing of such property, the idea of the committee being that in all probability, with the public sentiment as it is and with the outlook for building as it is, the only possible use that the Legislature would allow of this right would be the leasing of property which, for the time being, might require to be held at a financial disadvantage. If the Commonwealth has paid $5,000 for a homestead and can sell it for only $4,000 at the present time, but hopes within two or three or even five or ten years to be able to sell it for its cost or a sum exceeding its cost, it certainly would be better for the Commonwealth to rent it than to hold it idle. It is with that idea in mind that the committee has desired to open to the Legislature the possibility of granting the right to lease to those who are handling homestead matters for the Commonwealth or for the cities or towns.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: Either some of the members of the Convention or myself have got the wires crossed, and we are wasting considerable time. If I am right in my contention, this document No. 324 has just been ordered to a third reading by the Convention. The proper way to amend it is on its next stage, when the amendment of the gentleman from Saugus might well be offered, but at this time to discuss this measure, which already has been adopted, is wasting a lot of time. Therefore I move the previous question.

Mr. Bennett: I hope the main question will not be put until I have an opportunity to say that we are voting upon this, and when we vote we take a stand, we take a position, and the amount of time required to take a position on this is not half as long as my friend has taken in some of his speeches here. Now, we either are going to adopt this, or we are not. If we do not adopt it, if we vote it down, we put the Convention on record.

As to the opportunity to save money if legislation should be limited to the modest proposition which my friend from Springfield (Mr. Kilbon) has made, we would not need any Constitution, but we have a Constitution in order to guard against those very contingencies of taking action far beyond the original intention. I see no reason why, under this leasing proposition, the Commonwealth may not in future go into the business of owning all the property in the Commonwealth and leasing it. I think it is a very dangerous proposition, and I hope that it will be amended. I hope it will be amended right now if we are going to adopt this, but if not I certainly hope it will be amended, as is suggested, on the next stage.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bennett was rejected, by a vote of 27 to 82. The resolution (No. 324) was rejected, Thursday, June 20, 1918.
XXXVI.
OFFICIAL PENSIONS.

Mr. Samuel George of Haverhill presented the following resolution (No. 67):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments; but when any person ceases to be a public employee and returns to private life he shall not receive further remuneration on account of services already rendered from the public treasurer, except for injuries received in dangerous and hazardous employments.

The committee on Bill of Rights reported the following new draft July 13, 1917 (No. 308) (Messrs. Curtis of Boston, Coolidge of Milton, Barnes of Weymouth, Anderson of Newton, Pelletier of Boston and Walcott of Cambridge, dissenting):

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments; and no person holding public office, position or employment shall be entitled to receive from State, city, county or town any pension, gratuitous payment or emolument upon his retirement in amount exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum. This amendment shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the civil war, nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law.

The resolution was considered Thursday, June 20, 1918.

Mr. Samuel George of Haverhill moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 4 to 17, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments; and no public official or public employee upon retirement, excepting soldiers and sailors and those receiving injuries resulting from dangerous and hazardous employments, shall receive any pension, gratuity or annuity for services already rendered, unless and until a system of civil pensions has been approved by a majority of the voters of the Commonwealth voting thereon at a regular State election.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 4 to 10, inclusive, the words "In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments; and”.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 59 to 85.

Mr. Charles L. Underhill of Somerville moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words “one thousand”, and inserting in place thereof the words “six hundred”.

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Edmund G. Sullivan of Salem moved that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word “town”, in line 12, the words “or any other politcical subdivision of the Commonwealth”.

This amendment was rejected.

The same gentleman moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 14 to 17, inclusive, the words “This amendment shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the civil war nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law”, and inserting in place thereof the words “This amendment shall not apply to those who have actively and honorably served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war, nor to pensions for which applicants have contributed according to law”.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 49 to 88.

Mr. Frederick P. Glazier of Hudson moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words “in amount exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum”, and inserting in place thereof the words “, except as may be provided by a contributory system established by the General Court”; by inserting before the word “veterans”, in line 15, the words “nor to”; and by striking out, in lines 15, 16 and 17, the words “nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law”.

These amendments were rejected.

Mr. Charles Frederick Dutch of Winchester moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 4 to 17, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following paragraph:

In order to prevent the granting of special privileges and the creation of class distinctions, pensions or other like emoluments shall be granted to those who have served the Commonwealth or any political division thereof, only by general law, and, except in case of persons who have contributed toward said pensions or who have been permanently injured in dangerous or hazardous occupations, only when and to the extent that they may be dependent thereon.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Walter L. Bouvé of Hingham moved that the resolution be amended by inserting before the words “war pensions”, in line 15, the word “existing”;
and by striking out, in the same line, the words “veterans of the civil war”; and inserting in place thereof the words “to war pensions hereafter granted by the General Court”.

These amendments were withdrawn.

The resolution (No. 308) was ordered to a third reading, Thursday, June 20, by a vote of 135 to 12.

The resolution was discharged from the Orders of the Day Thursday, July 25, was read a third time and was recommitted to the committee on Bill of Rights.

That committee reported, Friday, August 9, that it ought not to be adopted.
It was considered by the Convention Wednesday, August 14, in the following form, as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology (No. 392):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

4 In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at 6 such periods and in such manner as they shall establish 7 by their frame of government, to cause their public 8 officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant 9 places by certain and regular elections and appointments, 10 and no person upon his retirement from public office, 11 position or employment shall be entitled to receive from 12 the State or any civil division thereof any pension, 13 gratuitous payment or emolument in amount exceeding 14 the rate of one thousand dollars per annum. This 15 amendment shall not apply to those who have actively 16 and honorably served in the army or navy of the United 17 States in time of war, nor to pensions or retirement 18 allowances for which applicants have contributed ac- 19 cording to law.

Mr. Charles L. Underhill of Somerville moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 14, the words "one thousand", and inserting in place thereof the words "seven hundred and fifty".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Martin M. Lomasney of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, the words "upon his retirement from public office, position or employment", and inserting in place thereof the words "who shall hereafter be elected or appointed to public office, position or employment, upon his retirement therefrom,"

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 100 to 26.

Mr. Albert E. Pillsbury of Wellesley moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words "in amount exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Joseph Zoël Boucher of New Bedford moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 14, the words "one thousand", and inserting in place thereof the words "fifteen hundred".

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Robert Walcott of Cambridge moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 4 to 19, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

Except to soldiers and sailors honorably discharged from active service in the army and navy in the time of war, and to their dependents, to those persons now in receipt of pensions and those persons holding offices for which pensions are provided, no pension or gratuity shall be granted to any employee or official of the Commonwealth or any political division thereof except by general law upon a contributory basis.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 97 to 55.

The resolution (No. 392), as amended, was rejected Wednesday, August 14, 1918, by a vote of 99 to 67.

A motion to reconsider the rejection of the resolution was made Thursday, August 15; and this motion was negated.
THE DEBATE.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I now move the amendment printed in the calendar. I am informed by a great many people that this is a very ticklish question, that when you come to speak about pensions there is something about it that has a very bad effect on any person who undertakes to oppose a scheme of civil pensions. I think there is something in it, and I think we ought to be perfectly frank in considering the situation.

We have more than 100,000 employees of the State. Some of them are pensioned already, and the rest of them expect to be. They already are getting unionized with respect to their future. We all know what it means for any large body of citizens to be united in political matters. I believe that the various organizations of employees in the Commonwealth are getting to be about as strong as the Bar Association, which I think is the strongest union in the State.

Up to the year 1885 the Commonwealth had no civil pensions. We had adopted pensions now and then for those who had been injured in the public service, who had held dangerous or hazardous positions and in the discharge of their duty were injured, and therefore it was thought by the Commonwealth that they were entitled to some compensation. I am not opposed to that sort of pension. I believe that a pension is to be given to those who need it for certain reasons, and the reason may be because they have held some public position and in the discharge of their duty have become injured and therefore, like the soldier and the sailor, they are entitled to different treatment than an ordinary citizen. But in 1885 it occurred to the legal fraternity that the judges ought to be pensioned, that is, the man who has had the greatest and probably the most favorable opportunity in life and has secured an appointment to the bench with a salary of $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000, after he had served a period of twenty years and retired ought to be pensioned. I think they first began to give him a pension of one-half or one-third, and then finally they have increased it up to three-quarters. While the ordinary citizen or the ordinary public functionary can draw only one-third or one-half as a pension, if he only belongs to the legal fraternity he can draw three-quarters. I want to say that that is not unusual. I well remember in the customs service that a similar condition prevailed. If the Appraiser of the Port of Boston went to New York or Philadelphia or Washington he was allowed $5 a day for his travelling expenses, but if an attaché of the legal department of the customs service he received $6 a day. That is, he had to appear before the Board of General Appraisers in the morning, and, as they said, had to get shaved and to have his boots blacked and pantaloons creased and go through several other things in order to make a presentable appearance before the board. In other words, if he belonged to the legal profession he received $6, but if he was only an ordinary Appraiser of the Port he received only $5.

They started in in 1885 to pension the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court. Then it drifted along, and they extended it to the judges of the Superior Court. Then they began to agitate the question of extending it still further, and in 1900 they wanted to extend it to the judges of probate. Just why the judge of probate needs a pension
I never have understood, but they say that the judge of probate needs a pension like the judges above him. Finally they adopted the scheme of pensioning the probate judges, and then of course they had to take in the judges of the district courts, the men who appear in court once or twice a week and get anywhere from $1,800 to $4,000 salary. One of the judges who lived in a near-by city and received $2,800 a year for many years used to hold his court at 8.30 o’clock in the morning so that he could get through at half-past nine and attend to his regular practice in Boston. If that man only held on long enough to be seventy years of age he would retire on three-quarters pay for holding a position that required an hour a day and then attending to his private practice during the remainder of the day. Then finally it dawned upon other people in the public employ that the pensions ought to be extended. I have looked over the list of pensioners that adorn the annual reports of the Auditor. In the first instance I want to read from the Constitution, so that you may fix in your mind what our forefathers started out with so as to show you how we have drifted. Article 7 says:

Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men.

Now I turn to the Auditor’s report and I see four pages under the heading of pensions paid to preferred classes, and these preferred classes receive all the way from $300 up to $7,750. We have judges who have retired, and they are appointed as masters, and they receive $100 a day for sitting as masters. I cannot see any virtue in a pension law that gives a man $5,000 or $6,000 or $7,000 a year and then allows him to sit as a master and draw $100 or more a day. Then we have other pensions, — $4,000, $3,000, $1,750, all the way down to $300. I presume the fellow who draws $300 had a very few friends, — at least, it indicates it.

This condition has grown until it is costing the people of this Commonwealth one million dollars a year, — and in five years from now it is going to cost nearer $5,000,000 than $1,000,000; and the people are perfectly helpless.

Now, how did this begin? In the first place, to be perfectly frank, it began with the legal profession, and then it kept growing. Finally they would get a bill through the Legislature affecting some city; of course it would not take immediate effect, but they would say that this would “take effect upon its acceptance by the city council.” Well, now, you can see what a thousand police officers, and a thousand firemen can do, and two thousand other employees can do in a city election. Why, they simply elect a city council that will accept that act of the Legislature. Then of course they take their place on the pension roll, and the result is what I have given you.

I read from the Boston Herald of December 30, 1917. I am not going to call any names, because this is not a personal matter. I find that one official in Boston is pensioned at the rate of $1,500 a year, and he is drawing $7 a day from a commission in the metropolitan district. I find that another man is drawing $1,000 out of the city of Boston, and he is holding a position in one of the largest corporations at a large salary, more than he is drawing from the city of Boston. I find another citizen of Boston who is drawing a pension of something like $900 a year, and he is holding a similar position in another city at $1,200 a year.

I find another man who retired some years ago on $600 a year pension, and he is in the detective service of the United States drawing another salary. I have thirty or forty other cases of people who are drawing substantial salaries from the city of Boston and they are holding places in public and private employment and undoubtedly are receiving full pay as able-bodied citizens.

Now I cannot understand the virtue of a pension system that will permit a man to draw $1,200 or $4,000 from the State and then go out and perform the same amount of labor in other employments that he would if he did not receive that pension.

Now my proposition is this, — and I am not going to take up much time: My proposition is to substitute my amendment for the report of this committee and let it go into the calendar and let these delegates for the next two weeks have an opportunity to investigate this subject, and then put this thing up to the people and say: "Do you want this unequal condition to exist? If you do, kill this proposition; on the other hand, if you do not, adopt it." And then if the people adopt it the Legislature, if it is necessary, can devise a scheme of pensions and submit it to the people, and then the people can vote on it, and if the people want anything of this sort they will vote for it; if they do not want it they certainly will vote against it. I am fully aware that this is one of the dangerous propositions, but what danger is there in putting before the people a situation that cannot be corrected in any other way? It is for the people to say whether they want this condition to exist.

Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston: I noticed that the first nine lines of this proposed amendment already are embodied in Article VIII of the Declaration of Rights of the present Constitution, therefore I move to amend this resolution by striking out the first nine lines of the proposed amendment,—not of the amendment moved by Mr. George but of Resolution No. 308. I have no especial interest in this proposed amendment. I moved this amendment because the language used is a verbatim copy of the language of Article VIII of the Declaration of Rights in the present Constitution and I can see no reason for reenacting those words, neither can I see that they have any connection with the subject of pensions, so I move to strike them out of this resolution.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Just an inquiry of the gentleman from Boston in the second division. Is he not in fact striking out lines 4 to 9, inclusive, and not the first nine lines of the resolution No. 308?

Mr. Kinney: That was my intention,—lines 4 to 9; and I ask unanimous consent to have that considered as my amendment.

Mr. Webster of Haverhill: It having happened in the deliberations of this Convention that many times I have been in disagreement with my honorable friend from Haverhill in the fourth division (Mr. George) I embrace this opportunity to say a word in behalf of the measure which he has suggested and with which I may say I find myself in complete accord. I have no objection to the payment by the Commonwealth of a suitable and appropriate pension to those of its officers who, by long and faithful service, have deserved such a recognition.
But I do feel that we have gone about that matter somewhat hastily. I was a member of the Legislature when it passed the legislation giving pensions to judges, and I must admit candidly of all votes which I cast in three years' service in the Legislature none has caused me more regret, I will say frankly, than that vote. Not that I wish such compensation withheld from any man who deserves and needs it, but because I feel that it was a precipitate action. Now, sir, it strikes me that the proposition of the honorable member from Haverhill, embodying as it does (to my understanding, as far as has been suggested) the only method of dealing with this matter in a way which is in line with modern and accepted practice, should receive careful attention from the members of this Convention and deserves their approval. His proposition is that the matter of pensions should be left to such action as may be taken by the voters upon submission to them of a carefully digested plan. I think that is in line with all practice which has for its object the relief of the Commonwealth from the burdens of excessive and ill-considered appropriations and also with the budget system and all our up-to-date attempts to administer the financial operations of the Commonwealth upon a better plan. And I bespeak the members of the Convention for the measure suggested by the honorable member from Haverhill, their earnest and favorable consideration.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I offer an amendment striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words "one thousand", and inserting in place thereof the words "six hundred", — so as to read: "No person holding public office, position or employment shall be entitled to receive from State, city, county or town any pension, gratuitous payment or emolument upon his retirement in amount exceeding the rate of six hundred dollars per annum."

I wish that every member of this Convention might have had the privilege during the past fifteen years of serving at least one year in the Legislature. I think if there is anything for which the Legislature can be particularly censured, it is its good-fellowship and its freedom with the money of the people in giving emoluments or pensions to various public officials. Always the same plea is offered, that for the best years of a man's life he has given the best there is in him to the service of his State, municipality or county, — never for a moment stating that the man has been well paid for his service, never for a moment stating that he has received regular employment and got his pay envelope every week, never stating that if he were sick or out for a week he rarely was docked, rarely stating that the pay he received was far in advance of any money he could have received in any other line of employment, but the same old sob stuff given to the Legislature each year, that this poor old man has given anywhere from ten years upwards to the service of the Commonwealth or the municipality. Why, we had an instance only last year where a man, seventy-six years of age, came here and asked for a pension, and they said he had given twelve years, the best years of his life, to the service of the Commonwealth. The man was seventy-six years old; he had worked for twelve years for the State preceding his reaching that age of seventy-six years, and those were the best years of his life, — and the man had property in the Commonwealth which was giving him an income of close on to $8,000 a year.

I have been fighting this thing vainly for many years in the Legislature. I can quote man after man, by name, if you please, who has been employed in the fire department or the police department of the city of Boston who today is drawing a pension from the city of Boston for total disability and at the same time holding a position of responsibility and activity such as a young man with all of his faculties would find it hard to fill. In my own city of Somerville a police officer was retired fifteen years ago for total disability,—and he has been the chief of the Wakefield police department ever since. Man after man, man after man, in the Commonwealth has retired. Why, just for one illustration, because I know he is a good fellow and will not mind it, there is Chief Watts. He has been pensioned by the city of Boston and look at the business he does outside, while drawing his pension every month. He is only illustrative. There are so many lieutenants and captains and privates in the police and fire departments drawing pensions that it has become a scandal and today the Auditor of the Commonwealth will tell you that we are spending almost a million and a half of dollars for pensions to persons who are no more deserving of it than are you or I.
PENSIONS.

Furthermore, these are not contributory pensions. Money is paid out of the pockets of the people of the Commonwealth to those who need it less than those who pay it. Where we have a contributory pension,—as an illustration the teachers' pensions in the city of Boston,—the limit of the amount that any one can receive is $600. Now that includes the principals who are receiving $6,000 or $7,000 a year, just as it does the elementary teacher who is getting only $600 or $700. It is true she does not get the maximum of $50 per month or $600 a year, but she has put her little mite into that fund every year, and when she retires she gets a good return from her contribution. The principals have tried over and over again to raise the limit and get one-half of their salary of five or six thousand dollars, which would almost deplete the treasury of the fund in three years if such a thing should occur. The United States government pays a major in the service $600 a year pension when he is retired. Now we are paying at least one judge $8,000 a year pension. Why are we paying him that? Because he would not retire until they made the pension two-thirds of his salary.

Mr. E. U. Curris of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman of what court that gentleman is a judge.

Mr. Underhill: I will find out and let the gentleman know a little later. Two years ago we were paying three judges in this State $18,500 pension. We have gone down the line of public employees and when a few years ago I made the suggestion that we had begun at the wrong end and that we ought to have pensioned the laborers first, it was seized upon immediately by friends in the Legislature and they went to work and pensioned the scrubwomen employed on part time in the State House under the sentiment that on their bended knees they cleaned up the dirt which was brought in on our feet. Now perhaps they were entitled to a pension in addition to their pay, but at that time I had a concrete proposition before the Legislature giving to all employees a pension under a contributory plan. And if my plan had been adopted by the Legislature at that time, those same scrubwomen would have been better treated than they were under the special bill. Each year pensions are asked for,—pensions from Boston, Brockton, Lawrence, from every city and town in the Commonwealth, — for some fellow who has got a political pull with the mayor, the city solicitor or the board of aldermen, who come up here asking the privilege from the Legislature to pension this employee. Last year we had the city solicitor and mayor from the city of Brockton asking for a pension for a man who had been discharged three years before because of crookedness in his office. What do you think of that! And the Legislature gave it to him! — with this restriction: that it should be subject to the approval of the mayor and the board of aldermen of the city of Brockton. Almost every man in the Legislature with whom I have talked is opposed to this proposition, but they say: “You can’t discriminate; you already have established a principle and you must continue.” Continue how long? Indefinitely. I tried to compile figures of the amount of money that was being paid in this Commonwealth in pensions to those who had held good jobs for years, and I found as well as I could figure from the sources from which I could obtain information that the people of this Commonwealth were paying a grand total in the vicinity of twelve million dollars. You do not realize when a pension bill comes into the Legislature for $1,500 or $2,000 or half of a man’s salary, what it means. It is only $1,500, a drop in the bucket. But that multiplied and multiplied and multiplied, as it has been, has reached the enormous total which I have stated. And now some such measure as this is absolutely necessary. There are dissenters to this resolution, but, sir, they could not have investigated the question and then objected to the principle. I personally would like to vote for the proposition offered by the gentleman from Haverhill cutting out entirely the pension evil, and I think it might possibly have a chance of getting by with the people. But with every police officer and every fireman and practically every public employee in the State to oppose this proposition or electioneer against it next fall when this goes before the people, you are going to find it pretty hard work, because those who are receiving less than $600 are people who really need the money and the sympathy of their neighbors is going to be enlisted in their behalf. If you place a maximum of $600 you eliminate the opposition of those who are receiving $50 a month and less, and you then have the opposition of those only who have grafted themselves upon the public treasury. It is not altogether their fault.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: Does the gentleman think that the adoption of such an amendment as he advocates would wipe out the pensions which already have been granted by the General Court?

Mr. Underhill: I should sincerely hope so. If there is a possible way that any legal mind in this Convention, — and we have the best in the State, — can bring about such a thing, I think it is the duty or the combined duty of those gentlemen to bring about such a solution if possible. If it is retroactive and will not work, then let us stop its advance now. Some time or other these pensioners are going to die but if you continue to give pensions to new ones the few that die will make very little difference. I cannot conceive of a man who comes from an industrial center where the workers do not begin to get as much in the way of wages as these people receive from pensions, who can support the system. There is not a shoe worker, there is not a cotton mill worker, there is not a man who is employed as a laborer who begins to get the amount in wages that most of our public employees get upon their retirement from a pension. It is all wrong and it is up to this Convention, if it does nothing else for the people of the Commonwealth, to relieve them of the burden, which is becoming unbearable with the other taxes and the high cost of living which will continue to prevail if you do not stop establishing a favored class in the community. They are those who have had good jobs at good pay, with vacations, Saturday afternoons, short hours and a pension of one-half or two-thirds the salary they have been receiving. It is a gift from the pockets of the people of the Commonwealth who cannot afford it. [Applause.]

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Last summer if this matter had come up I should not have taken part in the debate because I should have considered myself a beneficiary in this way. It so happened that under the system of the Board of Retirement I became eligible to a pension, but I was obliged, as the law has been interpreted by the Attorney-General, to apply within two years. I knew that and I have not applied, on the ground, if I want to assume a virtue, that I could earn my own living and was not entitled to a pension. But I would have liked to remain on the Board of Retirement, having contributed to it, to the end that when I have attained the age of 95 or more,—which I hope God Almighty never will allow me to attain in this life,—I might then feel probably that I would be glad, having lost all my friends and relatives, to have a place to get boarded at the expense of the Commonwealth. But I am free now and I want to speak for those who in some way have contributed under the Board of Retirement Act and thereby are entitled to pensions more or less large, as the case may be. I hope that we shall not take any action that will affect the rights that have accrued to the employees of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Underhill: I would call the attention of the member to lines 14, 15, 16 and 17 in this resolution:

This amendment shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the civil war nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law.

I never have made a fight against contributory pensions and never will.

Mr. Brown: I understood him to read "such person," and I suppose that connects with the words which precede, which are "veterans of the civil war." I think I am right in that particular although the gentleman from Somerville is right so often and I am wrong so often that I hesitate to consider that my judgment is superior to his. The argument of the gentleman from Somerville is a condemnation of the acts of the Legislature. He says the Legislature has granted pensions improperly. He cites a case in the city of Brockton; but if it came to the Legislature for such a pension and the Legislature granted it possibly members of the Legislature are so educated that if a fellow is a little crooked he has not gone really out of their pale of recognition.

Possibly those who voted for the questionable pensions to judges were willing to get a judge out of the way. Some men may not be adverse to granting a pension to get the judge out of the way so they possibly could get the appointment themselves.

Mr. Underhill: I wish to correct the gentleman's supposition because it is nothing more than a supposition. The true facts are these, that unfortunately, — and first I beg the pardon of the legal talent of this Convention, — unfortunately a majority of the House each year, or very nearly so, are lawyers. They have not the inclination to oppose pensions to those judges before whom they have to practice [applause] and I do not blame them. It is human nature for those men who have been associated with these judges for many years not to oppose a pension proposition. And that is the reason judges’ pensions have been granted.

Mr. Brown: I am pleased that the gentleman apologizes to the lawyers for what he said. I do not complain that the gentleman did not apologize for taking my time to interject something of that kind into my argument. I have no doubt it is as he says; it is human nature. In the last analysis we must consider a man’s environment and the effect it may have on his acts. It is up to them to determine how far their environment places them either in harmony or in conflict with their duty to the whole people. I myself challenge no man’s vote here on account of his profession, although at some times I have had something to say about the lawyers. At the present time the matter pending before us is the amendment of the gentleman from Haverhill among the other amendments, and it plainly provides that there shall be no pensions until the people have passed upon a system of pensions. That would take a long time and surely we ought not to adopt it. If the Convention rejects that, we come then to a proposition to limit pensions to a certain sum. With that principle I am in harmony. If a man has mentality enough to command five or six thousand dollars a year, if he needs five or six thousand dollars to live upon, he must be living under such physical conditions that nature can furnish to his mentality and to his physical structure a sufficient amount of energy to earn a reasonable living. I feel that a pension should go to one who is not able mentally or physically to support himself; and from a humanitarian viewpoint, if he is that way, he has a right to become a charge on his relatives or the community. There ought to be some way to provide that if a man is drawing a pension,— and I call this to the attention of the labor members here,— he has no right in our ranks as a worker. He has no right to offer his services, which are subsidized by all the people, to compete with a part of the people and thus possibly reduce their wages. The pension act should so provide. The labor people cannot ask pensions for themselves, and deny pensions for others. I should not object to some one who has been accustomed to a certain way of living getting a little larger pension than a man who has had a different way of living. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Haverhill, cutting out all pensions until the people act upon the question, will not be adopted.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I have spoken to the gentleman in the fourth division who has charge of this report (Mr. W. H. Sullivan of Boston) and by agreement with him I shall try to state the position of the committee on Bill of Rights. We had one very hard subject to settle in that committee and it left us very little time to properly consider other subjects which had been referred to us. When this subject came before the committee I think I can say fairly that every man on the committee thought that something should be done in regard to pensions. That was my own belief and I believe I am safe in saying every one else thought that the pension system had gone too far. But speaking now for myself I felt that we had not time to study out and present a proper remedy to this Convention, and therefore I signed with the minority.

Since that time I have found that the Legislature authorized the Governor to appoint a commission on this subject, and accordingly Governor Foss appointed James E. McConnell, Magnus W. Alexander and Henry S. Dennison as members of the commission on pensions. They filed their report on March 16, 1914, and it is a very interesting report, containing a great deal of matter which requires much time to digest. I shall read you one statement here which I think shows the magnitude of the question back at the time of their report:

The complete returns show that on August 31, 1913, there were 1501 pensioners in the Commonwealth who were drawing $721,264.03 in annual pensions. Of this amount the city of Boston paid 931 pensioners at the rate of $450,955.70 per annum.

Since the date of this report the Legislature, if I am correctly informed, has passed additional pension acts, which of course would make the amount much larger than it was at that time.

If the Convention will pardon me I will read just another little section of this report:

The large number and variety of pension and retirement laws now on the statute-books of Massachusetts, some of which have been repealed in part, while others are effective in full, are startling; their proper understanding by the beneficiaries or the public is possible only after exhaustive study.

And I agree with that statement.

These laws differ in features of administration and application, as well as in fundamental principles; in some cases members of the same branch of the public service come under entirely different provisions for old age incapacity, as, for example, teachers, whose pension provisions vary according to whether they are teaching in the public schools of one city or another, or in the normal schools of the State.

In regard to the judges I think there are nine separate acts.

Why I asked the gentleman from Somerville a question this morning was this: I do not think that any retired judge is drawing $8,000. The justices of the Supreme Judicial Court are authorized on retirement to draw three-quarters of their pay when in active service, and I think that does not equal quite that sum.

Now this commission proposed certain legislation,—several bills. One, I think, was the contributory pension, and that the Legislature did not accept. I think there were one or two of their recommendations that were adopted.

The point I wish to bring out is that this subject is so great a subject that we ought to move carefully, while we all agree that something should be done, and not create an injustice or an inequality. Of course there are examples of people who have obtained a pension and who are now serving in some other capacity, and that, of course, we all admit and know, but that exception may not condemn the whole system. I know that pensioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are working for the United States government; I have seen them in my own experience. But, for instance, we would not want to shut off the pension from a fireman who has been injured in the performance of his duty. We would not want to cut off the pension of a police officer who has been injured in the performance of his duty. Now it may be that that would be a fair limitation for pensions in those two employments, namely, that one should not receive a pension unless he were injured in the performance of the duties of those dangerous or hazardous employments. But if you pass a general clause limiting the amount to $600 I do not believe it would be fair to-day to a police officer who in the performance of his duty lost an arm or leg and had a family to support, to give him $600. I do not think it would be a fair pension. I say so fairly here now; I doubt if a thousand dollars would be enough under the present way of living. Now I say that while I agree there should be some change the doubt comes in my mind whether this body sitting here can hope to bring about a proper and effective change in the limited time that is allowed. us when the commission appointed by Governor Foss spent so many months and produced something which the Legislature did not accept.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I should like to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion any good would be accomplished by a provision in the Constitution to the effect that the pensions should be granted only under general law and that special pensions should not be granted to individuals?

Mr. Curtis: I would say in answer to the gentleman from Brookline that he has had a wide experience in the Legislature and that if he thinks that would bring about any good result I should be glad to see it done, but I should defer to his long experience in the Legislature.

Mr. Walker: I wish to say that I know very little about this subject and shall not express any opinion, but it has occurred to me that if we provided in our Constitution that pensions should be granted only under a general law, it would then compel the Legislature to frame a general law according to principle, and would not allow the Legislature from year to year without principle, often without good reason and always inconsistently, to grant pensions to special individuals.

Mr. Curtis: Not wishing to criticize the amendment offered by the gentleman from Haverhill I would call his attention to five words, — "a system of civil pensions," — and say to him that I believe that would bring about endless controversy as to what is meant by a system of civil pensions, and suggest that some other word probably would save a good deal of legal complication.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Would not the amendment of the gentleman from Haverhill, if adopted, cut off even the pensions of the Board of Retirement?

Mr. Curtis: As I recall the amendment of the gentleman from Haverhill I should say it would cut off all pensions except those of persons who have been engaged in a dangerous or hazardous employment,—if those were the words. That is my conception.

Mr. George: With reference to the words to which the gentleman from Boston referred, I had in mind possibly what the gentleman from Brookline said, and that was that a system of pensions would be in a general pension law. Perhaps it was worded unfortunately. It was not my purpose to repudiate anything that the Commonwealth had done, and if I may be permitted to say, if this proposition is accepted for the time being, I think that we can present a resolution on the next reading which would be agreeable to the members of this Convention.

Mr. Curtis: I had one other suggestion to make to the gentleman from Haverhill. If I understand the amendment he leaves it open so that by initiative and referendum or any other means this system can be gotten up, and if somewhere in that amendment he would put in the words "by the General Court" or "by law" so that it could be done in either way, I think perhaps that might help; but I only offer that suggestion.

It has been suggested to me that in the principal amendment the following words might be added: In the article of amendment which the gentleman from Boston (Mr. W. H. Sullivan) has charge of, strike out everything after the word "retirement", in the fifth line, and insert the following words: "unless and except as he may be dependent thereon for the necessities of life," which means that nobody would get a pension unless he needed it. I do not think the gentleman from Boston heard what I offered. Strike out after the word "retirement" everything down to "This amendment", and insert in place thereof, "unless and except as he may be dependent thereon for the necessities of life."

Mr. Underhill: I would ask the gentleman if he can inform the Convention if that is not discriminatory in its nature, and, consequently, would be unconstitutional.

Mr. Curtis: I can answer that question very easily and I am glad to get the opportunity. It would not be unconstitutional because it would be in the Constitution. Now, why I am glad to answer that is this: The trouble with a great many resolutions before this Convention is that we are writing legislative matter into the Constitution, and not constitutional matter. That is, we are not making a great many of our resolutions simple, broad statements or enunciations of principles on which the Legislature or the initiative and referendum can make legislative acts, but we ourselves are making legislative acts in the Constitution. That is why I think that even this resolution here ought to be on some broad term, leaving the Legislature or the people by the initiative and referendum, if adopted, to write in the specific thing.

Now, Mr. President, just one more word. I want it understood that I am not in opposition to the principle of making some restrictive change in the present pension laws, and that I do not believe there was a man on our committee who did not think something should be done. The only thing is, if anybody here, any of the great lawyers here, can find something on which we can agree, some broad statement of a principle, by which the Legislature can correct the system, I think it would make our entire committee satisfied.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: In my opinion this is a very important subject and I think we should look at it very carefully. The thing which I think should be adopted in some form or other, if it is possible, is that there should be no pension granted to which the pensioner had not contributed.

Now let me instance, in the first place, the pensions to the judges. They were granted in the first place, as I understand it, for the reason that it was considered, — it was granted first to the Supreme Judicial Court judges, — it was considered and rightly considered, that they were underpaid. Instead of giving them a handsome increase in their salary, which they deserved, the Legislature made the place more attractive by giving them a pension. In those days it was not quite as well understood as it is now what danger that entailed. There is no reason, in my opinion, why the judges of the Supreme Judicial or Superior Courts or any other court should be given a pension if they have not contributed.

Now, we have here in this State four systems of contributory pensions. One is the retirement system for State employees, which has a very considerable number of members, — I have forgotten the number, — and nearly two million dollars in the fund, or something of that kind. Another is the teachers' retirement system, which applies to all teachers except those of Boston, and that has a large membership and a very considerable fund. The third is the county employees' retirement fund which I believe has been accepted by three counties, I have forgotten which ones they are. Fourth is the city and town employees retirement fund, which has been accepted by nobody.

Our State retirement system is based, as many of you gentlemen know, on the amount of salary. It is quite complicated in the various provisions as to what shall happen in certain cases, but the general idea is that every State employee who comes under its working shall give not less than three dollars or more than seven, — I think those are the figures, — of the amount of his wages, and I believe it has been settled that each man shall give five per cent of his wages. Then when he comes to a certain age he retires and gets a pension, which is made up of two parts. In the first place, he gets an equivalent based on his expectancy of life, — the equivalent of what he has put in, — a pension which is calculated to amount to his being paid back what he has put in, so much a year. That is one part of it. The second part is that the State just duplicates that. So that he gets a pension of what he would get if he had bought a certain annuity, at a certain age (those things are way beyond me and up in the higher mathematics), but the State then gives to him just the same amount, so that he gets twice the amount.

That system, it seems to me, is a very excellent one and it is working extremely well, in the case of State employees and of certain teachers.

It seems to me that that is the way that we should act as regards all pensions. This system might be extended to the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court, or some other system invented, whereby they would pay say 5 per cent, or 10 if you wish, or 7, or something like 5 per cent, from their regular salary; and then when they retire they would get that back in the form of an annuity, and the State would just double it, as it does in other cases.

That is a system which is a just system. The scandal, if it is a scandal, at any rate, the great inconvenience and gross extravagance which the gentleman from Somerville has told us about, is becoming an evil, or even a scandal. We should say, in my opinion, that it is the sense of this Convention that there should be nothing but contributory pensions. This idea has had a great vogue, especially in the last two or three years. We all are familiar with the tremendous sum which has been raised by the Episcopal Church on this same idea of contributory pensions; also the sum which the Methodist Church has raised; and this is something which is coming to the front. People are seeing that it is a sensible, practicable, statesmanlike way of dealing with a very difficult proposition.
The same thing is true in our National government. We are now insuring our soldiers who are fighting for us. That is an insurance plan, but it is along the same idea as this. We are getting away in many cases from the idea of gratuities. When I was in the Legislature we had a great fight which was fathered and carried along by the gentleman from Ipswich, Mr. Schofield, for the granting of a gratuity to the veterans of the civil war. Now, Mr. Schofield made the point with great emphasis,—and it was a point, too, to be talked about,—that this giving to the men who had fought in the Grand Army a gratuity was all right, because we did the same thing for the judges of our courts. That was a hard point to answer. The only way we people who did not like the idea had to answer it was by saying it was illegal, it was unconstitutional. That suffered the fate of all such arguments, or most of them, in the Legislature, and they laughed us out of court and passed the act amid great shouting.

But Mr. Schofield had a good idea about it. His criticism in my opinion was just. We should not give anybody, high or low, in my opinion, a pension unless he has contributed to it according to his means, five per cent, or a certain percentage of the salary or wage which he has drawn.

Personally I am against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Haverhill, because that cuts out of this thing the very basis, the solid foundation, which this thing should rest upon, namely, the question of contribution. Under his amendment, as I read it, it is not a question of contribution at all, but that we should not give pensions until the State at large votes that certain civil pensions should be granted.

Now, that is wrong, in my opinion. The point is, as I said before, and will say once again, that you should not grant pensions unless the pensioner contributes. I am therefore more in favor of this document No. 308, and I am in favor of the amount which the gentleman from Somerville has offered. I should be more in favor of it, perhaps, if we cut out entirely the minimum amount; but I realize, as the gentleman from Somerville has stated so clearly, that that very likely would endanger the passage of the whole thing before the people.

So it seems to me that the proper thing for this Convention to do is to pass this amendment. It would be an improvement over the present situation if we had the kind of an amendment which the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker) on my left has suggested, namely, the general law. That, however, I criticize also because there is nothing in that about contribution. I will say that I am not wedded to the wording of this No. 308; perhaps you can get a better wording. But if this Convention sets before the people its careful conviction that pensions should not be granted unless contribution has been made by the person who drew the wages during his term of office, I think we shall have done a great thing for the future of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: It is obvious from the remarks of the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights that this very important subject received scant consideration in the committee. It is evident, too, that some available material was not called to the attention of the committee at the time it dealt with this question. I think it ought to receive the most careful attention on the part of the committee which has reported it. The amendments which have been. reported seem to me somewhat obscure. I find some difficulty in understanding precisely what they mean. They seem to me to be loosely drawn.

For example, take the final clause of this Resolution No. 308.

This amendment shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the civil war nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law.

Well, now, what persons? There is a distinction made between war pensions, apparently, and civil war pensions. Does "such person" refer back to veterans of the civil war or does it include those who have received war pensions? That is only one instance.

The amendment of the gentleman from Boston in the second division (Mr. William S. Kinney) shows further that we are asked to reënact something in part that already is in the Constitution. Because of all these things, I move that this document No. 308, and all amendments thereto, be recommitted to the committee on Bill of Rights.

Mr. W. H. SULLIVAN of Boston: Mr. President, I oppose the recommittal of this measure and I resent the suggestion of the learned and astute gentleman from Middleborough (Mr. Washburn) that we were not informed about the existence of certain material evidence.

Mr. WASHBURN: I intended to cast no reflection on the gentleman from Boston. The gentleman from Boston in the first division held in his hand that legislative report, and said that was something that had come to their attention since the committee had made its report.

Mr. SULLIVAN: He spoke for the minority of the committee, but the member of the committee who has charge of the report was fully acquainted with the commissioners' report. There is no occasion to recommit this measure to the committee. The way to defeat a measure of importance to the people of this Commonwealth is by amendments and recommittals, but it is not the proper way. What more information can we get if it is recommitted to the committee? We gave time, we advertised the hearings. What man is here who is competent to tell us any more than we know about this report? The majority members of our committee were fully acquainted with the report of this commission, — an able report, — and everything said here to-day is in entire accord with the report of that committee. The gentleman from Newton has said very well all that was in the minds of the majority of that committee; also the gentleman from Somerville. Every statement he made can be commended, except the amount he suggests as the proper limit of a pension.

No change can be made except perhaps the phraseology, and we have a committee on Form and Phraseology which will take this resolution, eliminate the unnecessary words, or correct the words, if necessary, so that it can be referred without question to the Convention. It seems to me entirely unnecessary, an entire waste of time, to recommit this measure to the committee.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: I hope we will not recommit this matter. It seems to me this is one of the most important matters coming before the Convention. The Constitution contains these words, Article 7:

Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honor or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men.
That kind of government is just what the early settlers intended to build up in this Commonwealth; but starting, as the gentleman from Newton well said, with the best idea in the world, to do something for the Supreme Judicial Court judges, the Legislature established pensions for them and the precedent was established. Then came these other different officials who had the judges’ pensions to refer to, and with the opportunities they had to invoke the aid of their friends. The Legislature extended the system until the cost to-day is surprising.

The people most entitled to pensions have a hard time getting them. There are two or three classes of pensioners that are absolutely entitled to it. No one would question that a person injured in the performance of his duty ought to have it. In that class naturally would come the firemen and the police. We also have another class. Take the school teachers. What element in this community does more for the State than the teachers in our schools, men and women who take the youth of our country and put ideas into them, so as to make them good citizens, whom we shall have to depend upon and look up to in times like the present? And many of these teachers are working overtime, with forty or fifty school children in each room. Let us go back to the days when we were all youngsters, raising “the dickens” in school, and recall how these men and women tried to educate us so as to bring us up to do what was right. Still these people were the only ones who had to save out of their salaries enough to contribute toward a pension so as to make it a means of taking care of them in their old days; and they did not ask, nor did they receive, from the Legislature, more than an amount equal to what they had contributed; and I say we all will admit they have done a great deal for our country.

Now, where do we stand on this matter? We are taking steps that affect us more than we realize. How can any gentleman here who votes for these pensions say a word against the requests of the laboring man, as presented by the gentleman from New Bedford who is trying to assist him to get a home for his family? Where is the justice of your system, when you say he shall not have a chance to purchase it with money loaned out of the public funds, and yet by legislation you permit these pensioners to walk up to the State treasury day after day and take the public funds under the present pension system?

We all will agree that the police, the firemen and the laborers are entitled to what they get. The laborers came last. They come last, but they get the least pay. They came last because they were poor and not powerful enough to be considered before. They did not have the means to speed up legislation here. When the Legislature put through the pension act for the judges, the police came with their friends. Then came the firemen, because their duties are similar and more dangerous. Then came the court officials.

Mr. Balch of Boston: I trust the motion to recommit will prevail. It seems to me there is not the slightest reason to doubt that the committee did its work properly in preparing its report for us, but there is, I presume, at least one important point on which they certainly must know more now than they did then. That is the attitude of this Convention.

It has been perfectly clear throughout this morning’s discussion that the temper, the opinion of this Convention, was not crystallizing properly and clearly about either of these proposed amendments. And why? Because they do not present two clear contrasted proposals or alternatives. Neither of them presents a clear system or intelligible scheme for meeting the situation. That has appeared in the course of the debate. The preliminary work of threshing that matter out, in the light of what has been done here this morning, — the work of producing two texts which shall present the two contrasting views, one or the other of which we should choose, — properly should be done in the committee, in order to save the time of the Convention; and I trust that the committee, with the benefit of this morning’s debate, will be given an opportunity to put these in a form about which our thought may properly and clearly crystallize.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: The committee on Rules has determined in every way it possibly can to expedite the business of this Convention. We all want to get through and we must attend to business and not pass any motion which will cause delay. Unfortunately, the chairman of our committee on Rules is in Cambridge attending Commencement, and has asked me if I would attend to this matter in his absence.

I simply wish to say if we begin to recommit matters we certainly will be unable to adjourn within a reasonable time. Let us thresh out all matters as they arise. We can pass this question now. It has two or three stages. It will not be reached again for weeks. The men who are interested can get together informally, the committee can get together informally, and they can come to some conclusion; but to recommit the measure seems to me would amount to nothing but delay and will accomplish no real good.

The motion to recommit was negatived.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: As the member of the committee in charge of the measure, I may be indulged a few moments while I discuss briefly some of the suggestions which have been made. I am in entire accord with everything which the gentleman from Newton in the third division (Mr. Lowell) has said; but he has made the same mistake as was made by the chairman of our committee, in contending that in this Convention we must prescribe a specific amendment. A broad and liberal resolution should be submitted to the people.

I agree with him that every pensioner should contribute to his pension, and this measure makes for the contributory system. The chairman of our committee spoke representing the minority, and undoubtedly the minority never had heard of the report of this commission. Unfortunately, too many commissions and recess committees are appointed by the Legislature whose reports never are read. The chairman of our committee, as I said, expressed the fear that we had not been specific enough, and as he reads the different recommendations suggested by this commission he is worried as to which one he ought to favor. But that is just the thing we should not do here. We should not pick out a specific resolution; we should frame a general resolution.

This measure, which I favor, in behalf of the committee, is a general resolution. It is one which encourages the retirement system. I commend the gentleman from Somerville because, during his career in the Legislature, he has fought consistently unlimited and unnecessary expenses. I cannot approve the amount suggested in his amendment because it would not be accepted by the people.

The gentleman from Haverhill (Mr. George) has introduced an amendment here which is very like himself, — much good in it, but it is not all good. The most delightful thing about his address was his statement that he believed in giving the people a chance to speak upon this matter, a hopeful change in one who opposed the I. and R. most consistently and somewhat aggressively. But I suppose he thought this was a time when they could be trusted to vote on this simple proposition. Perhaps his amendment is friendly, because he is one who is opposed to undeserved pensions. However, his amendment proposes that only those who are injured while engaged in a dangerous or hazardous occupation should receive a pension. The question would arise: What is a dangerous and hazardous occupation? Is the judge's a dangerous employment because he may try an anarchist some day? And how about workmen receiving injuries? Under the Workmen's Compensation Act it is possible to pay a workman injured in a dangerous or hazardous occupation much more than he ever can hope to receive from a pension. He suggests doing away with the retirement system, so we cannot take his amendment very seriously. (At this point Mr. George of Haverhill passed the speaker on his way out of the Chamber.) I am glad to see that the gentleman from Haverhill appreciates that there is no hope for his amendment after my eloquent exposition of its weaknesses. [Laughter.] He goes, retired but not pensioned.

I realize that there has been no hostile criticism of the resolution suggested by the committee, that every comment has been friendly, wherefore I do not feel inspired to do my very best in its behalf. [Laughter.] This occasions me great happiness, because I have in my pocket the stenographer's report of one of my so-called speeches, made the other day, and when I read the first two pages I was almost deterred from saying anything today. I hope I shall not have to read the report of this speech for a long time.

There is a serious pension evil in this Commonwealth. The gentleman from Haverhill said that the Auditor had told him that we pay now in pensions one million five hundred thousand dollars. This is a conservative estimate, and with wages going up every day, and the Legislature getting more generous every year with the people's money, you are going to pay greater pensions. The chairman of the committee read the report of the commission appointed to investigate the pension system, in which it was stated that in 1913 Boston was paying its pensioners $450,000, and it was predicted that in the near future the amount would be much greater. Well, in 1917 Boston paid more than $630,000, almost fifty per cent increase within four years.

In 1913 we were paying the judges of the State in pensions $14,779; in 1917, $35,610. The Metropolitan Park Commission in 1913 were getting $1,738 out of the treasury; in 1917, $4,598. The district police in 1913, $750; in 1917, $1,213. The prison officers in 1913 were getting $7,293; in 1917, $16,100. The veterans in 1913 were getting $58,000; in 1917, $63,000. The total amount paid the same beneficiaries in pensions in 1913 was $82,867; in 1917, $121,114.

In 1913 we were paying in pensions to judges, State and metropolitan police and State employees, $100,443; in 1917, $256,805. In 1915 the State, cities and towns paid in pensions, $1,171,626.17. So the total today is over $1,500,000, and constantly going up.

Now, as I said before, this measure encourages the retirement system, because one who contributes to his pension can get more than $1,000, the limit in non-contributory pensions.

Mr. Douglass of Boston: May I ask the gentleman if I correctly understand him? Did I understand the gentleman in charge of this measure to say that the only object of the introduction of this resolution from the committee was to limit the amount that should be paid on any pension?

Mr. Sullivan: The purpose of the committee in the introduction of this measure was to provide that no pension exceeding in amount $1,000 should be paid to any pensioner who did not contribute toward said pension. So far as I have been able to learn in my investigation this resolution will affect only judges, police captains, captains in the fire departments, and the higher officers and chiefs in the police and fire departments.

Mr. Douglass: I would ask the gentleman, if that is the only contention and desire of the committee, why is not a matter of a pure financial question like that a proper question for the Legislature and not for this Constitutional Convention?

Mr. Sullivan: It is a proper matter for legislation, with a limit fixed of $1,000; and that is why I should like to see the Convention adopt this resolution, because it would limit the generosity of the Legislature to $1,000.

Mr. Douglass: Can the gentleman conceive of a case resulting from an injury from a hazardous occupation, where the pensioner might be entitled to more than $1,000 a year?

Mr. Sullivan: From my experience with the Workmen's Compensation Act, I would say that if the injury arises out of and in the course of his employment, the injured person would get much more than he ever would get from a pension. The injured person in a dangerous and hazardous employment is well taken care of by the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Now, as I said before, a smaller amount would commend itself to me, but the committee felt that we ought to present to this Convention a measure which not only would meet with the approval of the Convention but would be endorsed by the voters. With the amount fixed at $1,000 you eliminate as antagonists the State employees and all the other recipients of a pension. If this measure is approved by this Convention and submitted to the people there is no question it will pass unless the judges develop greater strength with the people than they ever have had before.

Mr. Douglass: I will just put another supposed case, outside the Workingmen's Compensation Act. Suppose a judge sitting on the bench was wounded, as might have happened in this accident here in the Suffolk County court-house recently. Suppose a judge was wounded, incapacitated for his duties, would he not be entitled to a pension of more than $1,000?

Mr. Sullivan: It is a question in my mind, — and I think I will answer it favorably, — if he would not be entitled to workman's compensation.
Mr. Douglass: He is not entitled to it under the Workingmen's Compensation Act today, is he?

Mr. Sullivan: I do not see any reason why a judge would be denied the benefits of the Workingmen's Compensation Act to-day. But without any quibbling, without any hesitancy, I will say that, even if a judge was injured and could not recover under said act, for the sake of the financial welfare of Massachusetts it would be better to have one judge suffer individual hardship than to have the whole pension system the prey of a crowd of pensioners, and the system of pensions at the mercy of an incompetent Legislature. Moreover, under this resolution, any judge or other favored party, if he desired an adequate pension, could come under it by the voluntary retirement system or he could contribute to the pension,—and no one can have any objection to that. Let each contribute an equitable part. As I said before, perhaps the strongest and most potent argument in favor of this measure is that it would bring all under the contributory pension system, which is the only scientific system and the one that is inevitable in this Commonwealth, unless we wish to be financially embarrassed by reason of the ever-increasing number of pensions.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I notice that lines 11 and 12 of document No. 308 read in part: "shall be entitled to receive from the State, city, county or town."

In talking with the gentleman from Boston, the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights, in the first division (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis), I asked him if it was not true that the metropolitan park division or system, the metropolitan water system, etc., really were not political subdivisions of the Commonwealth, and he said they were. Therefore I move an amendment to document No. 308, to insert in line 12, after the words "or town," the words "or any other political subdivision of the Commonwealth," so as to cover any such districts that may exist now or exist in the future in the Commonwealth.

Mr. Douglass of Boston: Without intending to enter upon any debate on this question, in order that I may inform myself, or be informed how to vote intelligently on it, I should like to ask the committee in charge of the measure,—the majority,—if they contend that this report or resolution now before us enforces or will bring about contributory pensions; and, if it does not, is the committee willing to go so far here and now as to recommend that an amendment be adopted to the resolution now before us?

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: The Convention has a condition before it and not a theory. I was saying before, that after the judges came the police and firemen. Then came the prison officials, and they told the same story, that they took charge of the prisoners after the police had convicted them, though of course they were unarmed. They hired eminent counsel, and they presented their claims in a masterly manner, as they always can when they organize throughout the State to do something of this kind. It is a pretty hard thing to resist the pressure when a personal friend appeals for a personal friend, and they all have personal friends, and of course you are not taking the money out of your own pocket, and you think: "After all, what is the use of my standing up against such a fair proposition?"

It has been my privilege to vote for one or two of them, although I had opposed them many times. But what is the use of saying it is justice, what is the use of saying it is not creating a class in this Commonwealth, when you compel the operatives of the mills in Lowell, Lawrence, Fall River and New Bedford to work and contribute taxes to support a class of people through the State with money, for doing no work? What are we trying to do, honestly and fairly? We are trying to make a start and stop this thing now. We want to pass this resolution which will put a restriction upon the power of the Legislature. And I am willing to go further and make the amount $1,200 rather than $600, because that would save thousands of dollars yearly. If you restrict them to that extent you say to the Legislature: "So far and no farther can you go with the people's money." What will that do? That will tend to bring about the contributory system, which is the proper system, and which would be the system that any honorable, fair-minded man would be glad to adopt if he felt he was not getting something, which he was just as well entitled to receive as the other fellow.

Mr. Douglass: I should like to ask the gentleman, who I understand is a member of the committee on Bill of Rights, if he is willing to amend this resolution as now before us so that it shall compel the contributory pension?

Mr. Lomasney: I believe in meeting a condition as you find it. I believe there is a growing evil in this Commonwealth, and I believe this is the proper way to meet it. Why? Because you bring about a great reduction by this restriction.

Mr. Douglass: I should like to ask the gentleman why he is not willing now to go the full distance? Why stop along the road?

Mr. Lomasney: If the gentleman had restrained himself a moment, he would have got the balance of his question answered. I was telling him that in my way I was trying to restrict this proposition to a certain amount. That will bring about a demand for the other situation. I do not believe that the great majority of these people want to take this money for nothing. I do not believe they are a class of people who want to do nothing for the money. I believe the trouble comes in that one class sees another class getting it, and then they want to get it themselves. But if you pass this resolution to stop and restrict, and say that no one shall get a pension over $1,200, what do you do? You leave it to the Legislature to go up to that amount and no more. And what will that do? That will bring about in my opinion the contributory system, because these men are not all men who want something for nothing. In other words, it will do the greatest good for the greatest number of people, and they will come together and say: "Let us contribute something;" and that will apply to people pensioned hereafter, probably. But if you do not, if you start and try to cut it all off at once, you will incur, and properly so, the hostility of these gentlemen and their friends; and they will say, with some degree of right in that claim, that they have a contract or a kind of promise made by the State or the city when they relinquished a place for the remainder of their days, with the understanding that they were to be given a certain stated sum as a pension.

Now, Mr. President, pensions are getting to be a crying evil. It stifles ambition. It does not bring out the best in a man. Take a crowded community, where one boy has to go out of a tenement-house at half-past six o'clock in the morning and work until five, and he gets the salary that he agreed to work for, say $10, $12 or $20 a week, whereas, when the son of a pensioner wakes up in the morning at ten o'clock, and with a cigar in his mouth and his shoes shined he laughs at the son of the laborer. Is not this the result of class legislation? Of course it is, and it is for the benefit of the few against the many. Read our Constitution and see how it has been evaded. How do they get around it? They say the pensioner has rendered service to the State. I submit this system is wrong and it should be changed.

Mr. Bouvé of Hingham: Before the gentleman sits down I should like to have him make clear to myself and some other members of the Convention the expression in line 15: "shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the Civil War," etc. It is a question in my mind where the distinction comes in. And, in addition to that, what will he say, or what will the members of the committee say, about the veterans of the Spanish War and the present war if the Legislature shall see fit hereafter to grant them pensions? In other words, the resolution is not clear in those respects to myself and I think to some others.

Debate was continued after the recess.

Mr. Lomasney: I hope the Convention will pardon me. I do not like to take up its time, but this is a very important question. There is no contention on the part of the committee that this resolution is absolutely the best thing, but we have to make a start somewhere.

You know in some of these places when a man is about to be retired on a pension he first asks for an increase of salary. That is done a year or two or three years before his time comes to retire. He is raised $500 or $1,000, and of course he gets the benefit of that when he is pensioned.

Now, this starts by restriction. Some gentlemen have said to me that they hesitate to put into the Constitution a restriction in amount, and they suggest that this matter be left to the General Court. I sat in this State House as a member of the General Court, and I saw the wife of the Chief Justice of the Superior Court come in here asking for the balance of his year's salary. He was a veteran of the civil war, one of the best judges we ever had in this State, but that lady had to come in here, and she did not get it, although some of the most conservative men in the body fought for it. That man worked until a few days before he died. He could have retired with two-thirds of his salary; he could not afford to do it and maintain his family and when they came here as petitioners, the Legislature said no. I have seen some other people who did not have half the case, not a hundredth part of the case, granted relief. I cannot see, and I say it with due reflection, why we should leave it to the Legislature. We should start now and restrict the amount.

No one here knows what his financial condition will be when he is old. I say if any official has a wife, who has gone through life with him and they have not been able to save any money, at the end of their days, after he has given his life to the public service, we should not open the almshouse door to them. We should give him something substantial and proper to help keep them in their old age, and that is why I said either $1,000 or $1,200 a year would be about right.

One of the men in our city who held an important office, where by a stroke of his pen, if he had been a dishonest man, he could have looted the treasury of half a million dollars almost at any time, did some things by endorsing his brother's notes, and he, being a poor man, had to take a pension from the city at the end of his days. He was honest. He was financially embarrassed. But it was a great gratification to us in the city to be able to say that we helped him to secure it. I am not in favor of turning the old employee out and claiming that he can go to the almshouse, but I claim that with a pension of either $1,000 or $1,200 a year in these days, he can take his wife and live decently on that amount, and not be a subject of charity. In my experience no one knows, no matter how much he has had in the past, how he is going to end his days.
OFFICIAL PENSIONS. 493

That is my position. It is not to strike at the laboring man, it is not to strike at any necessary pension, it is to establish an amount where justice will be done to the person who has rendered honest public service, and no great injustice done to the community. But as this thing operates today, there is an injustice done to the community. We have men who get retired prematurely. They say they are sick, they get doctors' certificates that they are lame, that they are blind and unable to work; but the minute you put them on the pension roll they get cured by specialists at once, and they appear in another city, drawing a salary, shutting a man out of an honest day's work there and getting money both ways. Is that a proper system? I suggest it is not.

Now, the Legislature has built up this system. It was brought about by special acts of the Legislature. But they never were submitted to the people. I admit that in the matter of increase of salary the act generally provides that the city government and the mayor shall give their approval. I believe if we put this in the Constitution we shall reduce materially the amount expended.

There is a great deal to be said that some contracts, implied or otherwise, may exist between the Commonwealth and the cities and the towns, made when these people were retired. If that be so then let us say as in the anti-aid amendment, if there are any contracts in existence, protect them. The State cannot afford to break a contract. If you believe that there were contracts made with the persons who have been retired on pensions, protect them. But let us start somewhere to reduce the amounts paid. Do not allow this class to be created in the Commonwealth and have an overpaid pensioned class. I do not want to violate any secrets of the committee-room, but you, sir, heard arguments made why we should have an educated class created in this Commonwealth. Now we come to a pensioned class. Why, sir, what becomes of our good old Constitution, that says all men are born free and equal and entitled to equal rights and opportunities?

If we are going to have these classes doing nothing but taking money from the people, who is there to support them but the men and the women in the community who labor? Is labor going to bear all? I suggest it is not fair. And by this method you also open the treasury to a great many other attacks, because people point at these things when it is said they are trying to get something they should not get. But, they say: "Look at these pensions," and of course in many cases the men who receive them do not need them. One plan has been suggested, — I am not trying to enforce it, — to compel an individual to go before some board, put his hand on the table, and if he did not have enough money to carry him through life properly allow it to him, just as we do State aid and other things. But they say that might be charity. Charity or no charity, it all comes out of the pockets of the people, and the taxes come out of the pockets of the masses, and that is not fair.

I believe this is a common-sense proposition, but it took some deliberation to have some of us agree to it, because we realized that it is a very unpopular proposition to take from an individual something which he receives and has been receiving for doing nothing. Of course it is unpopular; but we must do unpopular things if we are going to do right. We must make a start.

I say, we must realize also that we must submit this to the people. You cannot put through a measure, in my opinion, that strikes down all these pensions at once. I do not believe the people would indorse it, because there would be a great many arguments against it, and every community would see the injustice of it and the people would say: “Well, it may be right,” and the people would give you this reason and give you the other reason. But if you say, and it comes before the people of the State, that any person the Legislature endorses should have a pension not exceeding $1,000 or $1,200 shall get it, I believe they would consent to leave it to the Legislature. I believe that the people would say: “Take it all in all, that is a pretty fair adjudication of the matter;” and the common-sense feature of the proposition would assert itself and it would go through the State and be approved, and it would be the basis for future legislation.

I have no personal interest in this matter; I am trying to strike no class. My sympathy naturally is with all these men. But I submit, we always must recognize that we have something else to consider besides too much sympathy in this proposition. We should do absolute justice in this case, I claim, just the same as if we were rendering a verdict as members of a jury. We should decide what is justice in this case. There is not a man who, if he were seeking a pension fairly and squarely, did not have his health, and were offered $1,000 or $1,200, would not say that was pretty decent treatment and that the State was doing something for him that was absolutely fair, because he had been paid his salary yearly and this was a pension for services rendered. I trust that we shall adopt some restrictive amount. I am not binding myself, but I believe any restriction is better than no restriction, because the time has come when you must limit the amount you are to expend if you want to save the treasury and the people of the State who have to contribute these funds. Now, sir, you may say: “Trust the Legislature.” I am making no reflections on the Legislature. Many of you gentlemen have served in it. You know how it is. You know how you yield, and not improperly, to the sympathy with the individual cases for pensions. You cannot refuse, because if you do they say you are mean, they say you are narrow, they say you are illiberal. You say: “After all, what do I care? The act is passed,” — and $10,000 more is expended. Then $50,000, then $60,000, and in ten years millions are spent. The time has come, it seems to me, to call a halt, and I hope we shall do something in that line.
Mr. Glazier of Hudson moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words "in amount exceeding the rate of $1,000 per annum", and inserting in place thereof the words "except as may be provided by a contributory system established by the General Court"; and by striking out, in lines 15, 16 and 17, the words "nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law".

Mr. Douglass of Boston: I did not intend to have a single word to say upon this subject. In fact, I came here to be instructed upon it this morning. But there has been a great deal of camouflage thrown about this problem, and I think that my questions to some of the gentlemen interested in the report of the committee have brought the question squarely before this body. They admit that there was dissension in the committee, that they were not agreed upon this proposition, but that the resolution which they report to us means merely that the only restriction you shall place upon the pension system is in the amount of the pension. We have heard argument here this morning, and we have come down to this simple proposition. I asked the gentleman who just concluded, how far was he willing to go? Will he go to the limit of having no pensions at all? Will he put a barrier such as a contributory pension? Will he stop this whole crying evil that he talks about, or will he not? Is this vast and intelligent body assembled from all parts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts gathered here on this auspicious occasion to discuss the question of a $500 pension, or a $600 or a $1,000 pension, when we do not know in twenty years from now what the value of a dollar bill is going to be, and whether a pension of $1,000 is going to be a fair pension for any man who is injured in service or grows weak in the service of the public? The committee that reports this resolution will not go the limit. The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) will not go the whole way. If he is on the right road let him travel to the end of that road. Let us decide this question now and for the generations to come on a fair, intelligent, common-sense basis. I heard in the great debate on the anti-aid in this body a great problem put forth: "Let us settle this nefarious question. Let us get religion out of politics for all time." An appeal was made to this body to act for all time. Well, if this question is so important a question as the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) says it is, if it is thoroughly understood,—and it is thoroughly understood by every member of this Convention,—then do not let us go part and parcel about it, but let us decide here and now, once and for all, according to the best of our light as we see the light. The position of the gentlemen on the committee reminds me of a doctor treating a case who does not know just what to recommend, or if he does know is not willing to go the limit with his remedy. The committee on Bill of Rights in the majority conclusion is in the position of a doctor treating a patient, and they say to the poor patient: "Mr. Massachusetts, you are suffering from cirrhosis of the treasury. We know you are in a bad state. We have diagnosed your case. We know you need a final remedy, but we won't go any further than No. 308. We send you to a future generation, hoping that some good Doctor Bill of Rights will give you a final medicine that will cure you forever."

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: There is no question, perhaps, that interests the working people of this State so much as pensions, and I have been amazed somewhat by those gentlemen who so eloquently defended the judiciary the other day in saying that it must be well guarded and be well taken care of in the future, and then who oppose old age pensions on the ground that it would make men slothful and would take away from them their initiative to do well. To my mind those two arguments do not agree, and these gentlemen I do not believe can be consistent in making them. I want to say, in reply to the remark from the gentleman who has just preceded me, that the labor movement is opposed to narrowing the system of pensions to make them contributory or non-contributory. I am somewhat in accord with limiting the amount of money that shall be given, although I recognize that it perhaps would be unwise to have a specific sum named in the Constitution, for no man knows what the value of $1,000 may be a few years from now. The condition that has grown up where State employees, particularly the judiciary, can get a pension of $7,000, $7,500, $7,850 per year, and after they have retired receive remuneration for services outside and be appointed to positions here or there and earn a living and get something for their work, is not fair to the taxpayers of this State. If there was any reason why these men were given pensions, — if there is any reason why any man is given a pension, — it is because they have done their work well and have reached a point where they ought to have rest and ought to be taken care of. All the odium that has been cast upon the pension system should not be thrown upon the shoulders of the poorer class of our community; it ought to be as well, where it fits, upon those who have received good salaries during their tenure of office. I have inquired and I know some of the reasons why the pensions for judges have been made. They have gone through Legislature after Legislature at the behest of lawyers who presumably might have wanted to make themselves good with the judges and have a fair salary and pension for them should the omnipotent power of appointment ever shine upon themselves and they should ascend the tribunal. It has not been an altogether altruistic idea that has made our pension system what it is, with particular reference to our judiciary. I believe that the fairest thing is the figure of $1,000, and I shall support that, unless something better appeals to me. I think that the amount ought to be limited. And I am glad that some other man besides those representing labor has stood here and at least has been rather fearful of the wisdom and good judgment of the Legislature. Some of the gentlemen who have talked about the lack of wisdom of the Legislature upon this question said during the initiative and referendum debate that they were almost infallible, and equal, perhaps, in wisdom to our judiciary.

Mr. Dutch of Winchester: The debate has opened up a great many different angles, has brought forth a good many amendments. In the midst of the morning debate I was asked to attempt to draft some recast of these propositions, and with assistance from about me I have suggested, largely due to that assistance, an amendment which I would ask to have read, and then I should like to explain it. It is to strike out lines 4 to 17, inclusive, and insert in place thereof the following:

In order to prevent the granting of special privileges and the creation of class distinctions, pensions or other like emoluments shall be granted to those who have served the Commonwealth or any political division thereof only by general law, and, except in case of persons who have contributed toward said pensions or who have been permanently injured in dangerous or hazardous occupations, only when and to the extent that they may be dependent thereon.

In the first place, it seems to be agreed that lines 4 to 9 should not be in this resolution because they already are in the Constitution. The proper arrangement can be left to the proper committee to deal with later. In the second place, I think we should recognize that we are not here dealing with the general proposition of old age pensions. As I take it, this does not bear on that matter. We are dealing here only with those who have been employees or officers of the Commonwealth or some political division thereof, so that we are not considering the proposition of old age pensions. In the next place, I take it, — as already recognized by some one who has made an amendment, — that we should have the words "Commonwealth or any political division thereof", instead of the language which occurs in these resolutions, because we should include such political divisions as now recognized, the Metropolitan Park Commission, etc. That is a detail. In the next place, I should say that an amendment of this sort should not be retroactive. The amendment as I have drafted it says nothing on the subject, but it is the expectation of those who approve it here that it would not be retroactive. As has been suggested, we should stand by the contracts of the Commonwealth. We can act for the future, but we shall abide by what has taken place.

The debate seems to have brought out the feeling that the abuse of the pension system has been confined to non-contributory pensions and has been due largely to the fact that pensions have been paid which have been of large amount and have been paid to those who were by no means dependent upon them. If I judge aright the argument of the gentleman from Boston in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), it is that we should keep the pensions down to a basis where they fairly will take care of the obligations of the person who retires, and he suggests that we should have enough so that it will take care of the man and his wife and those dependent upon him, and that seems to be proper. There is the suggestion that we should limit pensions entirely to contributory pensions. I doubt if we are prepared to take that step. Certainly, as one who has not studied this question particularly, I am not prepared to make such a proposal. But it does seem fair that we should make the distinction that a contributory pension may well rise above ordinary support, and we may accept his suggestion, and that of others who have spoken, and say that it is bad policy to keep on giving non-contributory pensions, pensions not contributed to, which are not needed or go beyond what is needed. And so the words of the substitute are calculated to bring about these results. Necessarily they have been drawn hastily. There is no pride in the exact language, which may be amended later if you see fit to adopt it today. But the intention is, and I think it is at least roughly expressed, that non-contributory pensions should be confined to the amount which is necessary to take care of the pensioned person.

It is suggested that a fixed amount should be put in, — $600, one man says; $1,000, another says; $1,200, another says, — and that very difference of opinion points out, I believe, that that is an attempt to go beyond Constitution-drafting into the realms of statute-drafting.
I believe as far as possible we should confine ourselves to Constitution-making, which I conceive to be the declaration of fundamental principles,—general propositions, keeping out legislative details. If it is wise policy,—and that is what I gather from this debate,—it is wise policy to keep non-contributory pensions, with one exception which I have forgotten to mention but which I will mention in a moment, down to the fair amount to support a man and his dependents, why, let us say that, and not attempt to be the jury, and not attempt to read into the Constitution, crystallize there, a figure which, as has been pointed out, will differ greatly from generation to generation.

Mr. Lomasney: May I ask the gentleman a question? By his amendment does he not make the distinction? Does he not permit the General Court to give away the people's money by vote to any man, and does he not limit the amount that is to be paid to the people who contribute their own money,—a bad distinction at once?

Mr. Dutch: If I understood the question the answer is that I attempt to do quite the contrary. There is no limitation on the contributory pension. There is a limitation on the non-contributory pension. And I guess I had better mention the exception lest I be misunderstood again. The two exceptions on limitation are the contributory pension and the person permanently injured in a hazardous or dangerous occupation. Apart from those two exceptions there is a limitation to dependency. But let me say that that will include the man, it will include the wife, it will include legal dependents on that man, which is a fair proposition, but the amount will be fixed by the Legislature, or, we will say, by some retirement board or commission, to which it ought to be delegated, and it will have to be done by general law.

Mr. Lomasney: I hope the gentleman will pardon me, but that is the way I understood him. May I repeat, sir?

Mr. Dutch: Certainly.

Mr. Lomasney: In your amendment you said, "Only by general law." That means the Legislature by general law can give any amount they wish to any individual. Now, you go down and you say, "except in case of persons who have contributed toward said pensions or who have been permanently injured in dangerous or hazardous occupations, only when and to the extent that they may be dependent thereon." In other words, you have allowed the Legislature to give the people's money by law whether they need it or not, and you limit a person who puts in his own money, and the hazardous occupations; in other words, you give the Legislature the opportunity to do what they have been doing in the past by adopting this amendment.

Mr. Dutch: I am sorry if the language is by any chance capable of that construction, but I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, just as he has read it, there is an "and" in there. That is conjunctive. It does not say "or". So that in order to grant the pension it has got to be both by general law and, unless it is within those two exceptions, limited to the dependents of the man. If it is not clear as a matter of English, that is certainly the intention, but I rather think on reflection that that is the proper interpretation of the language.

Mr. Creed of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman, when he speaks of dependency, would that not put a premium on thriftlessness? Would not the judge, for instance, who saved some of his salary and showed that he had goods, when the time came for retirement, be disqualified by the board of retirement, while the judge who lived up to his salary and had nothing would get a pension?

Mr. Dutch: I think that matters of that sort will be under the control of the Legislature or the initiative and referendum, the law-making body, whatever it is, under this provision. You have got to leave that amount of discretion in the law-making body.

Mr. Hart of Cambridge: I desire to ask whether the amount of pension which may be drawn by a person who has contributed is in any way proportionate to the amount which he has actually paid in? The text would appear to bear the construction that if a man had contributed any amount defined by law he might then be entitled to a pension to be determined by law without reference to the amount of his contribution.

Mr. Dutch: That is correct, and I think is a necessary possibility under a constitutional provision. It is not for us to put in the safeguards here in the way of the proportion, one-half or three-quarters or ten per cent of his contribution, or all of it plus ten per cent, or anything of that sort. That is, I believe, what we should keep away from. I believe that should be left, and properly may be left, to the General Court or the law-making body, because it is provided here that this is going to be done by general law. You are going to get rid of the log-rolling on special pension bills. That is one great evil. The second great evil is the overloading of the pension.

Now, as I say, we have no pride of language; it may be that we have slipped in our haste; but it is the opinion of several that this gets together the points which are desired, avoids a good deal of clumsy language and avoids a good deal of statutory language. I might say also that this has no effect whatsoever, I believe, on war pensions, but that they would be taken care of automatically, so that we need no exception on that ground.

Mr. Bouvé of Hingham: I desire to offer an amendment, as follows, — to strike out the words in the 15th line “veterans of the civil war”, and in the 15th line insert after the word “to”, the word “existing”, and after the word “pensions,” the words “to war pensions hereafter granted by the General Court”, so as to read in the 14th and 15th lines as follows:

This amendment shall not apply to existing war pensions, to war pensions hereafter granted by the General Court nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law.

After inquiry of members of the committee I am totally unable to ascertain the value of the words “veterans of the civil war” after the words “war pensions”, and it has not been explained either after my inquiry this morning or my inquiries outside, of members of the committee. Again it seems to me that there should be no possible amendment to the Constitution on the subject of pensions which, by any interpretation, could make a distinction between veterans of the civil war now receiving pensions, veterans of the Spanish War for whom such provision is or may be made, or soldiers of the European War or of future wars for whom the General Court shall think proper to provide. It has been said that the general government will look out for veterans of the present war, but of that we know nothing; and the time never will come that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will not make some special provisions for her veterans as she has in every war of the past. And when those matters arise they should not be confronted by a failure in the Constitution to provide for that which we now foresee and I believe that the amendments which I have offered will clarify this part of the subject.

Mr. Sullivan of Salem: I tried to offer an amendment this morning somewhat in line with what the gentleman from Hingham (Mr. Bouvé) has just offered, but was not recognized. I have an amendment, somewhat in line with what the gentleman from Hingham has offered, but still I think an improvement on what I wished to offer this morning. I move to strike out everything after the words "per annum," in line 14, and to substitute the following:

This amendment shall not apply to those who have actively and honorably served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war, nor to pensions for which applicants have contributed according to law.

The only real change which I have made is to take out the words "war pensions, veterans of the civil war," and to insert "those who have actively and honorably served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war". I put in the word "actively" because I do not consider that the dollar-a-year men or those who are serving in certain government departments at nominal salaries are actively in the service of the army or navy, and I should like to have this statement go down in the record as far as this amendment is concerned. I inserted the word "honorable" because I do not want a man who is dishonorably discharged from the army or navy to come in for a pension on account of having served at some time or other in some branch of the service. Furthermore, my amendment puts the veterans of all the wars of the United States on an equal basis.

Mr. Luce of Waltham: My justification for taking part in this debate is the fact that I have the honor to be a member of the Massachusetts Teachers' Retirement Board and as such a fiduciary duty presumably devolves upon me as having undertaken in part to look out for the interests of something more than ten thousand teachers who are now members of this organization. So far as I can now see, should the amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchester prevail, this whole system of teachers' retirement would be completely paralyz ed, practically destroyed, and the efforts of the teachers of the State to protect themselves and those interested in education to protect its welfare would be wholly thwarted. Therefore, in behalf of these ten thousand teachers for whose interests I am officially somewhat responsible, I must protest against this amendment. The amendment says that in the case of a pension system, unless the petitioner has contributed thereto, the pension shall be dependent upon infirmity, or something of the sort. Let me explain the teachers' retirement system. The teachers contribute to an annuity fund. They do not contribute toward their pensions. They contribute to an annuity fund and they receive from that annuity fund an amount relating to or dependent upon the contribution which they have made. In addition, the State furnishes pensions but the teachers have not contributed in any way to the pension fund. That is a distinct fund related to the annuity fund only by the statute. The teachers have not contributed to the pension.

Mr. Dutch: I should like to ask the gentleman if that is not a pure question of name. The resolution speaks of pensions or other like emoluments, and by a shift of name in your statute would you not come immediately within the scope of the resolution?

Mr. Luce: I will read the words of the statute:

"pensions" shall mean pensions for life derived from contributions by the Commonwealth.

And under the present wording of the statute I call attention to the harm that would be done so disastrously by the amendment in its present shape.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman if the amount contributed in any case by the teachers to the annuity plus the pension equals or exceeds $1,000?

Mr. Luce: I do not recall that so far it has. Up to the present time the system is not in full operation. It has been at work only three or four years and the retiring allowances will be greater later on than at present. It is quite possible that later on this $1,000 limitation might interfere with the operation of the system.

Mr. Curtis: Then in the future, if the resolution offered here were adopted by the people, the teacher might have contributed to her annuity or his annuity, and then, plus the pension, exceed $1,000?

Mr. Luce: I would not commit myself positively to an affirmative answer, but such is my impression.

Mr. Curtis: Then in that case the teacher would have contributed in proportion more than she would get from the State if the State were limited to $1,000?

Mr. Luce: If that were the case, yes.

While I am on my feet, I should like to call the attention of the Convention to the unamended resolution that is before us in the matter of the exclusion of veterans of the civil war. It happens that the presence of that clause in the amendment saves me from having to ask to be excused from voting by reason of personal interest,—not that I am receiving a pension, but one very near to me is receiving a pension, and yet the injustice of a provision which said to one judge who had reached the age of 85, as was the case with the person to whom I am referring: "You shall receive a pension because you served in the civil war," and to another judge of 85: "You shall receive no pension because you did not serve in the civil war," must impress itself upon any one who gives the matter a moment’s consideration. And further, sir, I am tempted to add one suggestion to this debate from close observation of the matter. The pension is part of the emolument and is so viewed by the man appointed to office at the time of the appointment. I have failed to hear any suggestion yet made that the inevitable result of putting in a $1,000 limit would not be the increase of salaries in order that the same inducement might be offered to men hereafter that is now offered. If that is the case the situation is just as broad as it is long. If you pay less in pensions you pay more in salary, therefore no financial gain to the Commonwealth is visible if the matter goes through in the manner in which it has been submitted. But certainly, sir, I trust the Convention will exercise the
OFFICIAL PENSIONS.

Greatest care and not interfere with this magnificent teachers' retirement system which is now so great a boon to ten thousand teachers, which already has more than a million dollars in its annuity fund and which bids fair to be of the greatest help to the educational interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to ask the last speaker another question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under the wording of the last clause of this resolution a man who was a civil war veteran can draw his civil war pension and in addition would be entitled to a pension as a judge, whereas a man who had not served in the civil war and was a judge could not draw his pension?

Mr. Luce: My reading of the sentence is to the effect that a veteran of the civil war is to be wholly excluded from the operation of this amendment.

Mr. Chandler of Somerville: It seems to me that this question has been debated about long enough. [Laughter.] With the number of amendments that we have, if we do not vote on them pretty soon we shall forget what we are voting on, and I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Reidy of Boston: I think the Convention is in a hopeless state upon this matter, and I trust we shall defeat the proposed amendment. It has been settled that the Commonwealth has full control over all its employees, and directly or indirectly over all the employees of every political subdivision of the State. The Legislature may increase, decrease or even abolish pensions, as it may deem to be for the best interest of all concerned. We have paid no pensions in this Commonwealth that we should regret. Perhaps in thousands of cases a few unworthy may be pointed out.

This amendment should be entitled: "A proposition to reflect upon certain of our judges and a few police officials in the larger cities of the Commonwealth."

We have allowed pensions to our judges in order to facilitate the retirement of men too old and infirm to stand up under the arduous labor of the bench. I am glad that we have assured our judges that in their old age, after years of high class service, want is not to be their lot.

With reference to the police let us not forget that during the past few weeks in almost every police precinct in Boston the man in uniform has worked from 25 to 40 hours a week more than his allotted hours of duty. For this there is no extra compensation, or even time allowance.

Firemen in Boston are retired at a comparatively early age because an old man no longer can do fire duty in a city with buildings up to 125 feet in height. The firemen were all picked men physically and mentally when they went on the department. They are forced to retire before the average man's working life is ended. Then why not liberally pension these men after their years of danger from explosions, falling walls and exposure.

Many of our large corporations now are seeing the benefit of liberal pensions to faithful employees. Why should the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and her political subdivisions change at this time?

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: There have been so many amendments offered here that I think the minds of some of us at least are somewhat confused. I should like, therefore, to make the motion that this matter lie on the table until to-morrow morning, with a request that the amendments may be printed so that all the delegates may know what they are voting upon.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: I should like to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that the question is on ordering this measure to its third reading. We can pass it to a third reading today and debate it ad libitum later; let the proponents of amendments give notice that they are going to offer said amendments and ask to have them printed in the calendar. It will save much time because, from our experience with the calendar, apparently all these matters which are contested are going to be fought at every stage of their passage.

Mr. Creamer: I hardly can see how we can vote intelligently on many of the amendments that have been offered unless we see them in print, and I do not believe we should vote unintelligently even on ordering to a third reading.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I trust this matter will not be laid on the table in spite of the apparent neglect of the gentleman (Mr. Creamer) to follow the debate. Every one of these amendments either can be accepted or rejected. It does not hurt the resolution or amendments in any way, shape or manner; it goes to another reading and the same amendments can be offered again. If we put the matter over we have wasted a lot of time unnecessarily.

I would not take a minute’s more time of the Convention if it were not for the fact that probably there has been no man in Massachusetts who has been so intimately in touch with this situation as myself for at least fifteen years, and I want to say that the resolution as presented by the committee, with a few minor changes, seems to be about the best solution of the problem at the present time. I am heartily in favor of my amendment for a limit of $600, because, if we do not make that limit $600, those who retire in the future are going to ask for the full $1,000, and it also seems to me that $600 ought to be the maximum. If we are going to accomplish anything we have got to accomplish it through the Constitution because, with the sympathetic sob of the gentleman in the first division who lately addressed you (Mr. Reidy) and the great influence of the gentleman who has spoken so ably in behalf of this measure (Mr. Lomasney), whom I have seen personally put through the Legislature more than one pension bill,—why, you are not going to get anything at all. You cannot get it through the Legislature. You have got to do it through the aroused indignation of the people.

Mr. Glazier of Hudson: I should like to inquire if the question is now open for general debate.

The President: The only question open at the present time is to give reasons why the matter should or should not be laid upon the table.

Mr. Glazier: I believe that the matter ought not to be laid upon the table because I should like an opportunity to say a few words, as follows [laughter]:

I have listened with a great deal of interest here today to this discussion. I have failed to hear anything in regard to any definite plan for procedure in the Legislature. I have noticed the unanimity of the members and ex-members of the Legislature. I also gathered from what they have said that in recent years this question of pensions has run away with the members of the Legislature; they are not equal to its control. I believe that we should have a uniform system and I believe that the contributory system, as mentioned by the member from Waltham in regard to the teachers, should be broadened and spread out for other departments of this State. I believe it a wholesome system to work upon, and therefore I wish to suggest that the amendment offered here for a contributory system should be adopted.
I am not so much opposed to the general law as suggested by the member from Winchester, only in this: I fear that there would be not general law but general laws enacted by the Legislature and we should fall back into the same position we are in at the present time.
Again, I believe that the contributory system will take out the element of charity in much that has been paid heretofore and may be paid in the future, that there will be that uniformity, there will be that fairness, that all will be treated alike. It has been mentioned that this is not in accordance with the ideas of labor, that they are opposed to any contributory system. Let me say that this is not proposed in any such spirit, that I believe a system of this character can be adopted not only for those who are working as scrub women but those who are working in any department, and there will be that fairness, there will be that consistency in it which will appeal to the members, and I trust it may be supported.

Mr. LUMMUS of Lynn: I desire very much to support the action of the committee upon this matter. In one class of cases I have long had a conviction. I have been for years a consistent opponent of judicial pensions. At one time I think I was the only lawyer in the city of Lynn who refused to sign a petition for the extension and enlargement of the system of judicial pensions. If a man holding public office is not receiving adequate compensation for his labors, and for that reason is unable to provide for his old age, his compensation ought to be increased. If he is receiving adequate compensation for his labors, then any pension is in the nature of a gratuity, and he is no more entitled to a gratuity than the citizen in private life who helps equally to provide the public funds. I am anxious to support the report of this committee, but amendments have been offered and divergent views have been expressed that make it impossible for some of us to vote intelligently at this time upon issues many of which have been thrust upon us suddenly. If this matter were to be laid upon the table the committee, in whom I have the fullest confidence, could consider these various amendments and perhaps incorporate such of them as might meet with the approval of the committee, into one amendment which I hope the members of the Convention could find a way to support. It is with a view to being able to support the committee and not in any spirit antagonistic to its work, that I hope the motion of my colleague from Lynn (Mr. Creamer) may prevail and this matter may lie upon the table.

Mr. HARRIMAN of New Bedford: I move as a substitute motion that the matter be laid over as the second order of business tomorrow. I do that because this Convention has voted to place No. 159 in the calendar (Resolution to provide for the regulation of advertising in public places) as the first business after unfinished business tomorrow, and I think there will be ample time then to take up this matter.

The President: The Chair rules that the motion is not in order.

The motion to lay on the table was negatived.

Mr. Wellman of Topsfield: We are trying to do an almost impossible thing. This assembly apparently believes that this is a very important matter, and certainly many of the assembly believe something ought to be done. We are trying in the midst of a debate to write a constitutional provision, and that is a very difficult thing to do and to do it wisely, and we are forgetting certain very simple problems and principles. We are not legislating, and much of this debate has been wholly a debate on matters of legislation and not on matters of constitutional provision. Take, for example, the suggestion which has been made by my friend from Waltham. He proposes that a constitutional provision shall be set aside because, forsooth, a certain bill has been passed by the Legislature that conflicts with it. When we state the proposition it is apparent that it ought not to be considered. If there is any conflicting legislation the legislation ought to be modified and give way to the constitutional provision, if we decide that such provision is wise. Of course, as he put it, it is a pure technicality. Nobody desires to interfere with the arrangements for the benefit of teachers. But if this is a wise constitutional provision it is perfectly clear that after we have passed it the legislation should be made to conform to it and not the Constitution made to conform to some legislation which was passed without any regard whatever for the general subject which we are now discussing. I hope, therefore, that the amendment which has been suggested by the gentleman from Winchester will be adopted and that then, on the next reading, we may consider carefully whether any further changes are required. We certainly ought not to put into the Constitution, either in this or in any other case, a lot of details of legislation. If we do, the work of this Convention never will meet the commendation of the future.

Mr. Bryant of Milton: I think enough has developed in this debate to show that our difficulties are partly that we are trying to legislate, and I should accuse even the gentleman from Winchester. One of the difficulties with his amendment is that he really is trying to legislate. The difference between $500 and $600 and $1,200 is obviously a legislative difference.

Now there is a great general principle which relates to pensions and which we can act upon at this time and which can be understood by the people if we choose to put it before them, and that is the great general principle of contributory pensions as opposed to non-contributory pensions. That question is simple. I do not know that it ever has been before the voters of the Commonwealth. Most of these pension bills, as I remember it, are put up to the voters. Under the practice in our Legislature, a system of pensions for town employees goes into effect only when accepted by the various towns and the question on the ballot is whether a pension system shall be established for the firemen and policemen, for instance. But the voter when he goes into his voting booth, I think, never has the alternative: "Will you establish a system of contributory pensions or will you establish a system of non-contributory pensions?" The alternative is not offered to him.
The alternative offered him is: "Will you have this system or will you have no system of pensions?" Every voter thinks it is fair to pension the firemen and police, and if they have a non-contributory system and nothing else offered to them in the voting booth they will vote "Yes." But I should like the general principle put up to the voters of this Commonwealth: "Do you want contributory pensions or non-contributory pensions?" And if I understand the eloquent argument of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) he is opposed to the non-contributory pension, but he says that an amendment to that end will not be accepted by the people. I am not sure but if it were put up to them they would vote for the contributory system, which to me personally appears to have a great many advantages. But if they do prefer the non-contributory system of pensions, why, they are the people to pay for it, they have adopted it with their eyes open and the Legislature will know how the voters of the Commonwealth feel upon that principle. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Hudson (Mr. Glazier) will prevail. It is a perfectly simple, understandable amendment, involving a general principle which can be understood in a minute by every voter, and I hope that this Convention will adopt it if it thinks contributory pensions are proper; and as I followed most of the speakers, they do feel that way; they simply are afraid to put it up to the people. Why will not your constituents feel just that way? Are they not just like you? Are they not people who have the same point of view that you have, most of them? I think they are. Now if you feel that way, that contributory pensions are better, or if you feel that the question ought to be decided by the voters, here is the opportunity to put it up to them. And I hope very much that the amendment of the gentleman from Hudson will be adopted.

Mr. DEAN of Fall River: I trust that we shall not write into our Constitution any one plan or scheme of legislation dealing with pensions. What we want to put into our Constitution is some such amendment as was offered by the gentleman from Winchester in the first division to incorporate the principle upon which we must act. If, later on, it seems advisable to make some specific limitation in regard to the amount to be expended we could add it. That again, however, is legislation and what it seems to me we must guard against here is a tendency to legislate rather than to set out those principles which should guide us in dealing with a question of this kind. As the matter now stands, while I regret we all shall not have an opportunity to read the Dutch amendment, that amendment incorporates the principles; that gives you an opportunity to make provision where the pension really is needed, and that is the first thing we are trying to meet in this situation. I trust that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. GEORGE of Haverhill: I hope that this Convention will adopt either the amendment of the delegate from Winchester or the amendment offered by the delegate from Hudson. Either one will give a framework for a substitute proposal when we have an opportunity to see it. And I purpose to ask general consent to withdraw my amendment, with a view of offering it on the next stage in definite form.

We have heard a great deal here during this discussion about the officials holding office and how they ought to be taken care of; various classes of officials, from those who are drawing $10,500 down to,— well, they do not get down much below $1,000. You have not heard anybody talk about officials getting less than $1,000; it is hardly dignified. Now what are you going to say about the seventy-five per cent of the people of the Commonwealth who under normal conditions earn less than $750 a year and who have got to pay a large share of the increased expenses? Here is a man who holds a public position for 20 or 25 years. He wanted it; he always has tried to stay there, and after drawing twice the remuneration he could get in any other place, then when he retires the State pays him over half of his present salary for life. But Mr. Ordinary Taxpayer, when he gets old and feeble, — what are they going to do with him? They are going to skip his taxes about once in three years and send him up to Tewksbury. The Constitution does not provide for any such inequality as this and I am inclined to the opinion that I would not permit this system to continue. I would hesitate to put into the Constitution a system that takes care of a person who has had a good position during his lifetime and spent all of his earnings with the expectation that the government was going to take care of him afterward. Now I think it is a reproach to any public official who holds a position in Massachusetts and receives anywhere from five to ten thousand dollars a year for twenty years, that he does not have a sufficient amount of money to take care of him when he gets to be 70 years of age. I remember in 1900 the proposition came in here to provide a pension system for all the judges below the Superior Court, and the distinguished gentleman from Everett in the second division (Mr. Newton) was chairman of the committee on the Judiciary and the flower of the Boston bar came up here to appear in favor of that bill to pension every conceivable judge whom they could think of. And when he asked them how it was going to affect other people in the public service, — “If you give pensions to these judges, these men of education, what are you going to do with the man who works on the street and in the sewer?” — one of the distinguished wallflowers of the Boston Bar Association said: “I don’t think you ought to call these pensions for judges; you ought to call them annuities. Pensions ought to be paid to those people who hold ordinary positions.” Annuities should be paid only to men of education and those holding the higher positions in the public service. That is the opinion some people have, and, mind you, there were scores of members of the Boston bar who left that meeting and were ashamed that they had come there to advocate a system of pensions that would take care of a certain class of people because they were educated and because they stood high in society. I think that principle is wrong. I think there is nothing in our Constitution that warrants it, that justifies it, and I believe that when any man holds a public position of any kind, if he draws $10,500 while he is holding that position, it is because the Legislature says his services are worth it; and I do not dispute it. Another man holds a position where he draws $1,500. Why? Because the Legislature says that that sort of talent is worth $1,500. Now, when they retire, when they are not in any position to render public service, why should the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have any more desire to take care of one person than another when they are simply private citizens? I hope this resolution will take another reading, and in the course of ten days I think this Convention can adopt some sort of workable proposition.
Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I do not rise to make any extended discussion of this matter but simply to say that I think the amendment offered by Mr. Dutch of Winchester should prevail, for, as I understand it, it is more nearly in accord with the almost unanimous findings of the committee on Social Insurance, which dealt not only with this question but with all kindred questions.

Mr. Bouvé of Hingham: I desire to withdraw my amendment for the purpose of offering it at a subsequent stage, as so many amendments have been offered that I do not believe the Convention will be able to pass upon them intelligently this afternoon.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: It seems to me at the present moment that it is a parliamentary situation that confronts the Convention.
I do not know, and I suppose that other members of the Convention do not know, exactly how to vote on these various amendments. I have not studied the amendment of the gentleman from Winchester.
Obviously, however, this proposition must take a reading. Now what is the best thing to do under the circumstances? Let us remember that we have the favorable report of the committee here and that is entitled to consideration. It seems to me that the best thing to do is to have those gentlemen who have offered amendments, as has been done in certain cases, withdraw their amendments and ask leave to have them printed to be offered—at a later stage. Those amendments which are not withdrawn should be voted down at this stage.
It will clear the parliamentary situation if we follow the advice of the committee, pass the resolution as it is and let members give notice of amendments to be offered at the next stage.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: It has come to my notice that here is the only opportunity, so far as I can see the rest of the calendar, to send down to the people of this Commonwealth that broad question: Shall they authorize the Legislature to grant pensions? We have here restrictions on the Legislature that they shall not do certain things, but you have not granted the Legislature the broader power that they may do certain things. I am speaking something after the line of the gentleman in the fourth division from Milton, — if I may call him by name, Mr. Bryant, — who felt that there ought to go down to the people, — and so do I, — this broad question: “Shall the Legislature be empowered to grant non-contributory pensions, — yes or no? Shall the Legislature be empowered to grant contributory pensions, — yes or no?” And you will then have before the people of the Commonwealth that great broad question which has agitated our labor conventions.
We are on record; we are opposed to narrowing down pensions so that nobody may have a pension unless he contributes. Now the broad division is “contributory” or “non-contributory”? With all these amendments we are not sending down to the people the basic question: “Do you want any pensions at all, and if so how far shall you have them?” Let us have that go down to the people,— do they want a contributory or a non-contributory system of pensions?
Let that go to the people of the Commonwealth,— the details can come later. [Applause.]

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: Following the advice of my old chief I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment at the present time.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.
Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: The gentleman from Winchester has offered an amendment. I have looked it over very carefully because I recall the amendment he proposed to the I. and R. about the power of judges, and I oppose with great pleasure the amendment offered by him. I wonder if he seriously has considered the effect of his amendment. "Pensions shall be granted only by general law." That is the first provision. Then: "and, except in case of persons who have contributed toward said pensions or who have been permanently injured in dangerous or hazardous occupations only when and to the extent that they may be dependent upon them."

What a mockery! And what is the purpose of it?

What is the question here? My distinguished friend from Milton (Mr. Bryant) arose and sagely criticized the delegates because they are seeking to legislate and then he makes a proffer of legislation. What does the resolution of the committee do? It limits legislation in the granting of pensions to $1,000. It does not legislate, it just limits legislation.

The gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Glazier) seeks to establish a system of contributory pensions. That is legislation for the legislator. What is the committee's measure? To limit legislation, not to specify a contributory or non-contributory system. I am an enthusiast for contributory pensions, except old age pensions. What a mockery in an old age pension system which compels a man who never had a decent job, to contribute for twenty-five years! The contributory system is all right for a man who has a soft job; non-contributory is all right for the poor and unfortunate. And if you adopt some of the amendments offered you cannot give a non-contributory pension to the poor and unfortunate. There is a strong sentiment in Massachusetts for non-contributory pensions for the poor and the amendments, if adopted, would invite the bitter opposition of all who so believe.

The delegates who offer amendments seek to impose a specific pension system. They are seeking to legislate here. Why? Because they know it will not be accepted. Your committee on the Bill of Rights has tried to evolve an amendment which not only will meet with the approval of the Convention but which will be ratified by the people.

Now, this amendment of the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) antagonizes, in the first place, all the present pensioners, the firemen and policemen, and many of the State employees, who are not contributing to their pensions.

The gentleman from Waltham is concerned about the teachers' retirement system, and well he might be, because that apparently is a good system, but under the committee's resolution that system is not touched. Under the committee's resolution that system really is commended, because if we limit all of the holders of soft jobs to $1,000 pensions they will adopt the retirement system or they will adopt the system of contributory pensions.

What does this substitute of the gentleman from Winchester mean? It means the defeat of all pension legislation. If it is adopted you will submit an amendment to the people which will be opposed by all who believe in a non-contributory old age pension; which will be opposed by all firemen, policemen and members of the State Employees Association, and by every recipient of a pension, and every possible recipient of a pension in the future. Such is the resolution which some of the drafters, distinguished and skilful drafters though they may be, desire to submit to the people,—one that will be defeated, so that there shall be no limit to the pension system.

Were it not for the fact that there will be another reading of this measure, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Winchester will be printed, I would be glad to acquiesce in a continuance until tomorrow; but undoubtedly his amendment will be offered again, and I will reserve some of my strongest comments for the next reading. As was said by the gentleman from Brookline, this committee, at least the majority of the committee, has given serious thought to this resolution. Perhaps it is not perfect in phraseology, but that is a defect which easily can be remedied by the committee on Form and Phraseology.

Here is a measure which has been thought out carefully by this Bill of Rights Committee, the same committee which rendered acceptable service on the anti-aid amendment. We offer it to you. It has been scrutinized carefully by friends and by enemies, and we look forward with confidence to the action of this Convention. We sincerely hope you will approve of the resolution we have offered you and then perfect its linguistic imperfections at the next reading.

The amendment moved by Mr. William S. Kinney of Boston was rejected, by a vote of 59 to 85.

The amendment moved by Mr. Sullivan of Salem,—inserting after the word "town", in line 12, the words "or any other political subdivision of the Commonwealth";—was rejected.

When the amendments moved by Mr. Glazier of Hudson were stated, Mr. Lomasney of Boston asked for a division of the question.

Mr. LOMASNEY of Boston: In accordance with Rule 43, any member may call for a division of a question which is in its nature divisible. My view of the situation is this: That the motion to strike out the rate of $1,000 and to substitute such sum as shall be established by the General Court is one proposition and it should be submitted by itself. Further on the amendment starts with another subject-matter. What is the first question? Shall we limit it to $1,000 or shall we let the General Court say what they shall do? With that passed upon, we come to the second question. It seems to me that it is clearly a question that is divisible and we should be allowed to vote on each question separately.

The President: The Chair rules that the amendment is not divisible in the way in which it has been offered.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Sullivan of Salem,—striking out, in lines 14 to 17 inclusive, the words "This amendment shall not apply to war pensions, veterans of the civil war nor to pensions for which such person has contributed according to law," and inserting in place thereof the words "This amendment shall not apply to those who have actively and honorably served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war, nor to pensions for which applicants have contributed according to law.";—was rejected, by a vote of 49 to 88.

The amendment moved by Mr. Dutch was rejected.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading, by a vote of 135 to 12, Thursday, June 20.
OFFICIAL PENSIONS.

Mr. Luce of Waltham moved, Thursday, July 25, that the resolution be discharged from the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Luce: There are sixteen amendments offered to this proposal. The prospect of attempting to sift out those amendments in full Convention is appalling. In the hope that if the committee should take them and confer on the subject again they might secure some common basis which will save the Convention itself perhaps two or three days of deliberation, I am going to move that the matter be recommitted to the committee. This motion I make after consultation with the chairman of the committee on Bill of Rights (Mr. Edwin U. Curtis) and with his approval. The motion is made wholly in the hope of saving time by securing concession and adjustment of the conflicting views.

The motion to discharge from the Orders of the Day prevailed and the resolution thereupon was read a third time. On further motion of Mr. Luce, it was recommitted to the committee on Bill of Rights. That committee reported, Friday, August 9, that the resolution ought not to be adopted; and it was considered by the Convention Wednesday, August 14, in the following form (No. 392), as changed by the committee on Form and Phraseology:

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined article of amendment:

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

1 In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments, and no person upon his retirement from public office, position or employment shall be entitled to receive from the State or any civil division thereof any pension, gratuitous payment or emolument in amount exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum. This amendment shall not apply to those who have actively served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war, nor to pensions or retirement allowances for which applicants have contributed according to law.

Mr. Underhill of Somerville: I move that the Convention amend the resolution by striking out, in line 14, the words "one thousand", and inserting in place thereof the words "seven hundred and fifty".

This is the same resolution that was substituted by the Convention by almost a unanimous vote two weeks ago. Since that time there have been some occurrences, which I shall explain to the Convention this afternoon, and I assure them they are of a very sensational nature.

The discussion was resumed after the recess.

Mr. Underhill: I understood the gentleman from the Fifth Suffolk district (Mr. Lomasney) had an amendment that he desired to offer, and if so I am willing to yield to him at this time.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I intend to prepare an amendment, but the gentleman can go ahead.

Mr. Underhill: I believe when the Roman gladiators marched around the arena in the Colosseum they stopped before the populace and bowed low and exclaimed: "We who are about to die salute you", and I feel about as they must have felt at that time. Although I know, almost to a certainty, that I am licked before I begin, I remember the expression voiced by the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) last year, when he exclaimed: "God hates a quitter", and the Convention arose to him as a man and gave him enthusiastic applause. So my continued fight on this proposition is because I do not believe in quitting, especially when it is a question whether the vigorous political organization in the city of Boston known as the Russell Firemen's Club is going to dominate the whole State or whether it shall confine its activities in the future to the city of Boston.

The members of the Convention remember well that when this question came up at a previous session there was almost a unanimous sentiment in the Convention for the proposition, or for the principle contained in the proposition. It is true many amendments were offered, and in good faith the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) asked that it might be referred back to the committee, and in spite of the fact that several of the members of the committee spoke for the proposition when it was up before, it comes back now with a unanimous adverse report. Now, why this change?

The gentleman from Boston in this division, from the Roxbury district (Mr. William H. Sullivan), with tears in his voice, ever since the Convention assembled has been telling of the evils of outside, sinister influences on the Legislature. If he had been content to restrain himself for a little while concrete evidence would have been presented to the Convention, and he would realize, as the Convention probably realizes now, that a great deal of legislation is influenced, either adversely or favorably, by personal friendships, or political pressure put upon members of the Legislature. That same influence and that same pressure has been exerted in this body, and no one rises to accuse all of the members of the Constitutional Convention of being susceptible to sinister influences. Why, sir, we hardly had passed favorably upon this measure, when out in the corridors we began to see the blue uniformed men of the Boston Fire Department. They were here every day for two or three weeks, and I knew that they would be here, for I had been approached by one of the members of the Somerville fire department, and warned that if I persisted in my course I should have active political opposition; that they would do what they could to defeat me for public office. They have a right to do that and so I took no issue with them. But I did argue the question, and I found that their opposition was due to a supposition voiced by the officers of the department, that, under this resolution, they would be deprived entirely of their pensions, to which they felt they were entitled. When I explained to them that my amendment called for a maximum of $600 they said that there were very few of the rank and file of the department who would be affected, but that there were some getting $1,400 or $1,500 a year and they thought they were entitled to half of their pay. And so, sir, to-day I have offered an amendment making the maximum amount of a pension $750. I did not do that as a concession to the firemen, but because I wanted to get something, and felt that if I had the active opposition of the firemen and policemen in all the big cities nothing would be done. I went to my friend and explained my plan and what I intended to do, and he said: "Oh, we don't care anything about that now. We have got it all fixed." He knew what was going to take place; and how did he know? He knew because the political forces, particularly in the big cities, had got busy.
He knew that a lot of men who voted for the proposition before were going to reverse their action. He knew that others who did not have the courage to do that were going to be absent. A member from Lynn who has voiced time and again the most virulent attacks upon the Legislature for being susceptible to such influences, I am sorry to say, is not present, and I am willing to bet a good dinner that he will not be here this afternoon. That is not a reflection upon his character, and I have a right to defend the Legislature for succumbing to influences to which he himself is susceptible.

I want to tell you as briefly as I may some of the pension evils, and in order that I may be emphatic, and that you may know I am not talking generalities but facts, I am going to use names.

Capt. Melvin P. Mitchell is a pensioner of the Boston fire department. He is chief of the Hudson fire department and drawing the salary that goes with that position:

Former Chief Coulter has a pension of $1,500, and he earns $7 a day from the Fire Prevention Commission of the metropolitan district.

Capt. Michael J. Nolan, pensioned at $1,000 a year, is now chief of the Fore River fire department, and has a force under him in that plant which is far superior to that which he commanded as captain in the fire department of Boston.

Thomas W. Gowen served in the Malden fire department for fifteen years while he was a pensioner of Boston's fire department.

Martin A. Kenealy was injured in the big fire in the leather district and was retired on a pension of $1,000. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, continued in practice until the Mexican trouble, when he went to the border with the Ninth regiment, commissioned as a Captain. Last August, when the regiment was absorbed in the new 101st, he passed every necessary physical and mental test, and now, to the glory of himself and his country, he is over across. That may gain sympathy against my position, but, sir, while he is a perfect man physically and mentally he is drawing a pension from the pockets of the people of Boston. That is what I object to.

Daniel T. Callahan was a fireman a number of years ago. Ever since, he has been drawing a pension of $600 a year. He served for a long time in the United States secret service, and in more recent years has been at the head of a private detective agency.

Samuel Engler and John C. Holton each draws a pension of $600 from the city, beside his salary as United States customs guard, a position which requires some strength, not only of character but of physical manhood.

Henry F. Brady enjoys a pension of $700 a year. He is special officer at the International Trust Company.

The Commonwealth Trust Company pays a salary to John F. Reynolds, who formerly was pensioned at $800, and to Joseph W. Wood, also, who draws a pension of $700. They are both special officers.

Frederick W. Hayes' pension of $600 does not interfere at all with his duties as guard at the Bay State branch of the Old Colony Trust Company.
Solomon Aaron, pensioned at $700, is vice-president of the S. E. Aaron Company of 60 State Street.

Patrick Garrity, drawing a pension of $650, is connected with a plating concern in Roxbury.

Charles M. Griffin and Edward J. McIntyre each draws a pension of $600 and serves a company at 84 State Street.

William McCarthy gets $600 a year, and is special officer at the Bijou Theatre.

Joseph Silva, with a pension of the same amount, serves as a clerk for the Adams Express Company.

In addition here are a few of the men who are employed in other businesses. I will not take the time of the Convention to state where they are employed.

Daniel J. Coffey, liquor dealer, gets $600.

Thomas F. Carey, real estate dealer, gets $933.

Andrew R. Hines, special officer, and George C. Swift, special officer, each gets $700.

Joseph C. Barrus, superintendent of halls, gets $600.

Coleman E. Clougherty, machinist, $700.

Murdock D. McLean, blacksmith, $750.

John E. Donaghue, elevator operator, $700.

John T. Weston, time keeper, $700.

William P. Colpoys, insurance, $600.

John J. Murphy, insurance, $800.

These are the amounts of their pensions, not the amounts of their salaries. And so I can go through a long list of names.

Here is another peculiar thing about this pension situation. A number of these men call for their pensions when they are due at the city hall and receive them in person. Some of them have an address which they furnish to the city, to which their checks are forwarded. Many of them are not on the voting-list of the city of Boston or the towns where they have their checks sent, nor are they in the directory, and when you inquire at those addresses for those men you cannot get one particle of information as to where they are or who they are or what they do. In some cases the pensioner lives at the house where the pension is sent. In other cases he is supposed to live there, but he never is seen there, the neighbors know nothing about him.

To sum it all up, 72, — those are just in the Boston fire department alone, — are employed at present in gainful occupations, 82 profess to be dependent upon their pensions, while 75 are not listed at the addresses which the city treasurer's pay-roll furnishes. Now they are drawing these pensions, as they feel, in full compliance with their legal rights.

Mr. Flaherty of Boston: May I inquire if the information from which the gentleman has read here came by a personal research as the result of his own efforts, or was it furnished to him by some one?

Mr. Underhill: I cut this from the Boston Herald, published about January 1, 1918. It was taken from the records of the auditor of the city of Boston, so the figures are absolutely authentic, and can be substantiated.

Mr. George of Haverhill: I wanted to suggest to the gentleman from Somerville, with whom I am in sympathy, if he does not think it would add dignity to that list to call attention to the fact that a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court was retired on $7,500 a year who afterwards received $15,000 a year, as I understand, for holding another public position.

Mr. UNDERHILL: I was coming to that. It seems that the members who took the most active part in the debate previously on this question wanted to get the judges, and that is all they saw. They wanted to get the judges. But, sir, when it came to a point where they had to jeopardize their political future they had a conversion. Things changed. Or perhaps as I heard my friend the Mahatma (Mr. Lomasney) say with a great deal of emphasis one time when asked why he voted "No" on a question: "I know that the bill is right, I should like to vote for it, but it is too d——d much trouble to explain." So it is with these propositions as they come before the Legislature and before this Convention, it is too much trouble for some members to explain. Now, sir, the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) is looking after the interests of his people, as he should. He always has done so, and I suppose he always will. He forgot, perhaps, in his early enthusiasm that this reached further than the judges and affected the police and the firemen, the members of the Russell Fire Club of Boston, which I said before was the biggest and most powerful political organization outside of his own Hendricks Club in the city of Boston. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, let me give you something in contrast. Let us drop the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) and Weeping Willie from Roxbury, and politics, and let us turn to something serious. I hold in my hand an act passed by the 65th Congress. On page 8, article 3, it reads "Compensation for Death or Disability." Without going into the details, let me say, as probably all of you know, that those who enlist in the United States service for this great war for democracy are obliged to take out $10,000 worth of insurance. This applies to privates as well as to the officers, and is to be, as I understand it, in lieu of a pension. Ten thousand dollars, and out of their allowance of $30 a month they have to pay approximately $6.50, as a contributory part of that pension.

Now, sir, what does the United States say? That "death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty by any commissioned officer or enlisted man shall be compensated as hereinafter provided, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own wilful misconduct", something that we eliminated from our law when we passed the Workmen's Compensation Act. Now, these are the amounts. If a man is killed it provides that his widow shall have $25 a month, for a widow and one child $35, for a widow and two children $47.50, and $5 for each additional child. If there be no widow, for one child $20, for two children $30, and so it goes through the families of various sizes. It says in section 302 that, if disability results from the injury, while the disability is total the monthly compensation of the man injured shall be as follows: If he has neither wife nor child living, $30 a month, the same pay he got as private in the army; if he has a wife but no child, $45; if he has a wife and one child living, $55; if he has a wife and two children, $65, and if he has a wife and three or more children, $75 a month. Seventy-five dollars a month is the maximum. And that man gave up a good job and went to work for the United States government for $30 a month and laid himself liable to death, to pay the last full measure of devotion to his country, and if he is disabled, comes back a care upon his family, he is going to get $75 a month.
Contrast that, if you will, with this proposition. I have been liberal.
I have taken the United States Government as my guide, and have allowed $75 a month whether the man is an “old bach” or whether he has a wife and one child, two children, three children. It makes no difference, we put them all on the same basis,—$75 a month.
The objection which some raise to that is that “Some time I may be a Lieutenant, I may be a Captain, yes, there is even a possibility that I may be Chief, and I may draw down from the city,—of Boston, or Lynn, or Somerville,—$2,000, $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 a year, and in that possibility I want half my salary.” In other words, he has been getting double what the private has been getting, sometimes treble, sometimes four and five times as much, and yet when he retires, because he has had that big salary,—I do not know any other reason,—he must have an equivalent, half his salary. The private who has not had a chance to save a dollar, because he has a wife andour or five or six children, can retire on $75 a month, according to my proposition,—he has been retired heretofore in many instances at less than $600 a year,—but the man who has received a big salary, who ought to have saved a lot out of his pay, is going to get $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 a year after being retired, and then, because he has held a high position in the department, and made a reputation, he is going to have a chance to go down to the Commonwealth, or the Exchange, or the Metropolitan, or the Old Colony Trust Company, and get a job for $600, $700, $800 or $1,500 a year, or he is going to establish a detective agency, or become chief of the Hudson fire department, or chief of the Fore River fire department, or chief of a police department, or leave the city of Somerville with his pension and get a job as the chief of the police department of the town of Wakefield. Is there any justice, is there any equity, is there any right, in so absolutely wrong, in so absolutely unfair a proposition as this?
I want every member of this Convention to bear in mind that when this matter was up before, the members who advocated some restriction, men who had served in the Legislature and had seen the evil, men who knew of many instances where men who had been pensioned were filling positions which should be filled by others who really need the money,—I want you to remember their words of that day, and their words are just as true to-day as they were when they spoke them. Every word they said was gospel true. And I want to ask you if you are so interested in whether they are elected to Congress, the Senate or whether they are returned to the House, whether you are going to help advance their political ambitions or whether you are going to stand for once with the “peepul”. We have heard a lot of talk for the people. You are going to give them a chance to vote.
Yes, they want that when they are hungry! When they are hungry or cold it is a great privilege to go and cast a ballot on some initiative and referendum proposition! Oh, it is grand! Are you going to give them a chance to put in an extra loaf of bread? Are you going to give them a chance to have pork chops once a week, or take the last dollar they have to pay pensions? Because, gentlemen, this thing is becoming so serious, not only in Boston but in every large city and in the Commonwealth, that the poor people, the people for whom I have stood here day after day, and the people whom I have considered in every vote I have cast, the unorganized, those who do not belong to the Russell Club, those who have not the police association of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts back of them, those who have not the close cooperation and organization of the employees of the State, those people are paying the bills, they are paying them to-day out of pockets that do not jingle with the sound of money. They have to go down in what little reserve they have created in the past few years, and spend it for the high cost of living, and this is one of the most unnecessary additions to their burdens that can possibly be allowed to continue.

The gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) has an amendment. His amendment provides, as I understand it, that this shall not be retroactive, that those who to-day are enjoying pensions shall continue to enjoy them. I will not oppose that amendment. I may have personal objections to it, but what I want is to get a start. I have tried, and tried, and tried again in the Legislature, but I cannot get a start there, for the same reason that so many of you here to-day are going to change your votes because of personal friendship for some one affected. Not for my sake, not to help me,—because success will hurt me politically rather than help me,—but to help my people and to help your people, will you not come across, put this thing over now and stop this abuse right here?

Mr. WILLIAM H. SULLIVAN of Boston: Before one o'clock we were promised by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) some sensational disclosures at 2 P.M.; yet it was long after that hour before the delegates reassembled. Then striding to his place like the gladiator that he confesses to be, and "about to die" he saluted us. The fact that he realized he was about to die and that his resolution was dead already, justified his ante mortem statement. I am curious to know what all his ranting was about, because he spoke not about the merits of the measure, he spoke not against free and unlimited pensions, he attacked the Russell Club, and every other organization which was powerless to harm him politically,—this brave, unterrified leader of the people. And then with a tearful voice he besought us not to sacrifice the poor working-man, whom the other day he branded as the greatest profiteer in the world. This consistent leader from the people! A few days ago he offered an amendment for a pension limit of $600, not being aware at that time that any of the firemen in his district received a larger pension than $600. But when one or two firemen, less fearful than the others, approached this superman, this self-confessed leader, this blatant representative of the people, this opponent of all pensions, and set forth their opposition, and that the reason thereof was that they received more than $600, this incorruptible representative of the plain, unorganized people compromised with his incorruptible conscience and raised his limit from $600 to $750, to include all his constituents and escape their wrath. He is very responsive to the wishes of his constituents, this man who would not compromise for a vote, this man who opposed the scrubwomen because they had no votes, this man who has seen fit not to oppose anyone.
in his district but seeks a little political capital, a little notoriety in the Boston newspapers, by an attack upon the Russell Club.

I am not here to make political capital, I am not here to appear for newspaper notoriety, but I am here to serve Massachusetts, and, if possible, to save her from a horde of pensioners. Alone, practically, in the committee I conceived and fought for that measure, limiting the non-contributory pensions to $1,000. That resolution would help Massachusetts to the extent of $50,000 to $75,000. That resolution was not designed to reach merely the judges; it was designed to reach all men receiving a salary of more than $2,000. I should like to eliminate all pensions in Massachusetts except old age pensions, but the time has not yet come for such commendable legislation. So the measure which I favored, for which I fought with all the aggressiveness I possess, was a measure simply to admonish the Legislature that hereafter no non-contributory pensions should be given in excess of $1,000. That was not all I wished to do, but that was all I felt could be done, and it received a large majority of the votes in this Convention partly because the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Walker) had said: “Let us pass this resolution to a second reading and the amendments can be considered at the next reading.” Were it not for the fact that our self-appointed leader from Somerville has so many greater cares on his mind, has so many other great things to remember, he would realize that with greater unanimity the resolution was referred back to the committee, because the gentleman from Waltham (Mr. Luce) and the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) wished to amend it. The resolution was recommitted and our committee now submits a unanimous report recommending its rejection. I feel that it is no breach of confidence to say that when the vote was first taken on that proposition mine was the only vote cast recommending that it be rejected, and why? You will know when you hear the amendments soon to be offered, amendments which breathe not of solicitude for Massachusetts but for her office holders. This fearless friend of the people from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) says he assents to and accepts the amendment. What of the amendment of the delegate from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney), — that hereafter no pension legislation from the Legislature shall affect those holding office, appointive office, at the present time? Do you realize what that means? It postpones any relief to Massachusetts from pensions for twenty-five or thirty-five years. The friend of the people, the man who claims to have made so many glorious fights in the Legislature, assents to that amendment, an amendment which offers up Massachusetts as a sacrifice to her present office holders.

In this Convention there are friends of the judges, sincere friends, eloquent men, who will argue to you with great force that the judges accepted their positions under a contract with Massachusetts to receive a stated salary and a substantial pension. There may be addressed to you similar arguments in behalf of the firemen and policemen. As the member in charge of this measure I sought to learn why we should favor the firemen and policemen, and I found by investigation that the average life of a fireman after he receives his pension is about six years and of a policeman about seven years. Many firemen are sent to the psychopathic hospital because of the strain on their nervous systems. Getting out of bed at all hours of the night and exposed suddenly to all kinds of weather makes them susceptible to such influences as would disturb a man's mental poise and physical vigor.

Mr. Underhill: I ask the gentleman how, if the average life of a fireman or policeman after his retirement is seven years, he reconciles that with the statement that if we accept the amendment of the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Lomasney) Massachusetts will not receive any relief from the pension graft for over twenty-five years.

Mr. Sullivan of Boston: The men at present appointed to office receive pensions at the end of fifteen or twenty years' service. There will be no relief from the men in office for fifteen to twenty-five, thirty years, as they retire one by one to receive their pensions. That is my answer. When we stop to think of the wages now paid for unskilled labor, we must concede that the firemen and policemen are inadequately paid, and as one eloquent delegate has said the pension is a sort of a deferred payment for services rendered. Moreover they are picked men. Before being appointed they have to pass a severe mental and a physical test. And if any pensions are to be given, I believe they should be given to firemen and policemen. I represent a district in which many firemen and policemen live. Now, it may be criminal for a man who represents or tries to represent his people to get in touch with them and find out how they feel about the different resolutions. I have been criticized by the gentleman from Somerville because I have conferred with my constituents and find that they are opposed to this resolution. Did I possess the rare intellect, the superhuman astuteness and the sustaining nerve of the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) I never would talk with the plain people, and thereby I would escape his denunciation.

If it were possible to pass a resolution here providing that in the future no pensions should be granted, why, notwithstanding that it meant my political death, I would favor it. It would save Massachusetts from the $2,000,000 that she is paying at the present time and the $5,000,000 which she must pay in the very near future.

I am opposed to any action by this Convention, because any amendment submitted by this Convention will be friendly to the men drawing the largest salaries, will be an amendment which will perpetuate pensions for those in power.

Various resolutions were submitted to our committee. What was my duty? I favored a resolution like the one submitted by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), with the limit of $1,000, but that resolution, after favorable action by the Convention, was recommitting to our committee, which had become hostile to it. It was my duty to do the best I could in committee, and if not able to obtain the report of a helpful resolution, to at least kill all hostile recommendations, and so my actions, my arguments and my votes in the committee were inspired by the hope and determination for a unanimous report by our committee that all resolutions be rejected. Such a report was made and there was no dissenter. It is most unfair to the committee and to the member in charge of the committee's report if any member of that committee offers a resolution here to-day which is against the report of that committee, because only the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Anderson) reserved his right in that committee to dissent. Personally I am opposed to all pensions; instead of a pension at the end of many years' service, I would favor a letter of congratulation to the person who had been fortunate enough to have obtained a good position early in life and to have held it so many years. I compromised with my committee because I felt that our report would bring no harm if it could bring no great good to the people in Massachusetts, and that committee has reported unanimously in favor of a recommendation that no pension measures be submitted.

If the resolution suggested by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) passes unadorned, it is simply a limitation of the power of the Legislature, and it says that hereafter, Mr. Legislator, no money shall be given away in pensions exceeding $800 unless it is a contributory pension; that resolution would help Massachusetts but it is to be qualified by the amendment which soon is to be suggested and was submitted to our committee by various leaders in this Convention, to wit: That the amendment shall not apply to present office holders. So qualified, it takes away from the Legislature the power to limit the pensions. It is inevitable that some day the judges will receive larger salaries, and incidentally larger pensions, it is inevitable that some day the firemen and policemen will get substantial increases in pay, and under the Constitution as at present written the Legislature then can say to the judges, policemen and firemen: "We have entered into a contract with you to serve for a stated salary and a substantial pension. Your salary is about to be raised, and we now make a new contract with you. From this increase in salary you shall contribute to your pension." Then there will be engendered a system of contributory pensions. To those who argue in behalf of the judges, who say protect the judges, I say that all the judges of the municipal court of Boston took their position for $4,500 a year, or $5,000 a year, not more than $5,000, and last year their salaries were raised to $6,000. Was there any outcry then about a contract between Massachusetts and the judges? If no amendment is submitted by this Convention, some day,—some day,—we may get a fearless and an honest and efficient Legislature, which will say to these judges, to the firemen and policemen, to all these pensioners: "You are about to get an increase in your salary. Now is the time to start a contributory pension system, which shall apply to you and all who come after you." I entreat you, for the sake of Massachusetts, to rescue her from the horde of pensioners who are infesting her and will infest her in greater numbers, to pass no resolution here which will affect the power of the Legislature to some day stifle this pension evil.

Mr. Morton of Fall River: I suppose, so far at least as I know, I am the only member of this Convention who at present is in receipt of what would be called, I suppose, by most members of the Convention, a pension from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but which the statute under which I receive it describes as a salary. Therefore, I think I may conclude from that statement, I am very specially interested in the resolution which is now before the Convention, and because I am specially and privately interested in it, in the manner in which I have described, I respectfully ask that I may be excused from voting on the resolution or taking any part in its consideration.

Mr. Morton was excused from voting.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: I am in the same position on the pension question to-day that I was the first day when it arose here, and I voted in the committee, although I myself do not like to talk about it, in favor of the original amendment. I was the only man in the committee who voted against this report in its present form. I do not need to say to a committee that I reserve my rights. A man never gives up his rights until he votes for or consents to a report. But that was my position in the committee on this question. There was a great difference of opinion there. At times we were evenly divided. There were several different amendments proposed, but alone I voted against referring this matter to the Convention in its present shape.

On July 24 I offered this amendment: "I move to insert after the word 'person', in line 10, the following: 'who shall hereafter be elected or appointed to public office, position or employment.'" I offered that amendment not after talking with any policeman or fireman, but after talking with members of this Convention who convinced me that there were a great many men in the State who had taken their positions while the pension system was considered a part of the salary that went with the office. I felt that, although there was really no written contract with these men, there was a certain moral obligation resting upon the State in this matter, and further, I felt that the adoption of my amendment was the best way to meet the situation which would start the reform and which would affect the next generation in decreasing the amount paid out just as it would affect the present generation in paying out of the treasury what it now does. That was the reason I offered my amendment, and you will find it in the calendar of July 24th.

Coming to this question, I do not believe it is fair to attack the policemen and the firemen of the city of Boston by reading aloud their names. There are many others receiving pensions besides firemen and police officers in Boston. I could call the names of pensioners in Somerville if I wanted to be so unfair, but I do not believe in mentioning men's names in that manner, and particularly the names of men like policemen and firemen who of all those receiving pensions I believe are entitled to them because of what they do. The policemen and the firemen are on duty all the time to protect your life and your property, and they always are ready to die, if necessary, in the discharge of their duty. Now they are singled out and their names mentioned here, I do not know why. If I were not more charitable than those who resort to such tactics I could allude to Somerville and say: "You have police officers in Somerville who were so poorly paid that they were arrested for breaking and entering." I could say further that in Somerville you had a man running for mayor who objected to retiring and taking his pension. But that is not the question here. The question is: Can we do something to benefit Massachusetts? That is the proposition. I believe in the original measure.

I offered my amendment in good faith. No fireman ever spoke to me, no police officer ever spoke to me, or requested me to offer this amendment. A man asked me: "Do you believe that when men have come into the service of the State with the pension law on the books as it is now, they should have the pension taken away from them in this way?" And when you consider it, it is a fair question. It is a debatable question and I have decided that it would not be fair to do so and I desire now to exempt the men who took their positions under those conditions.
If we adopt this amendment, what do we do? We relieve from opposition to this proposition all that large class of people throughout the Commonwealth who will say: "Now, we know just where we are". And then I believe if we do that we will encourage employees throughout the State to get together and join in a contributory pension system. There is not any intention on my part to strike at any special class of pensioners under the Constitution. Judges are just as much entitled to their pensions as anyone else when the pension is provided for them by law, because when the Legislature passes it and they take their positions with that provision in our laws and with that understanding, why should they be excluded any more than any other class in the community? I do not propose to reveal committee secrets. There were a great many different views expressed there. But on the main question in the committee as to the form in which this matter should be referred back to the Convention, my position was just the same, with this exception, — that I was willing to raise the $1,000 to $1,500 in order to get a unanimous report, upon the theory that if there was one decent, deserving old couple in this Commonwealth who had lived, worked hard, and found themselves in the latter days of their life on the verge of suffering because of sickness, if the extra $500 would keep that old couple in happiness I was not going to say that the pension under these circumstances should not be raised from $1,000 to $1,500. With that exception, my position coming out of the committee was the same as it was going in. I think the Convention can make no mistake if they submit such an amendment as this before the people, because there is no doubt that there is a tendency to take the government of this old State of ours away from the people. I mean that certain elements in the community are in favor of creating classes among the people. However, the pension class is one that we never should have in a free country. You will find certain men talking for a pension class, others for an educated class, and if you start any class legislation where are we going to stop?

I hope that my amendment which is in the hands of the Clerk will be adopted by the Convention.

Mr. Lomasney moved to amend the resolution (No. 392) by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, the words "upon his retirement from public office, position or employment", and inserting in place thereof the words "who shall hereafter be elected or appointed to public office, position or employment, upon his retirement therefrom".

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: This is an extremely hot day, and the gentlemen who have spoken on this resolution have displayed the fact that they feel it. Now, I am probably as uncomfortable as they, but I do not think there is any necessity of injecting heat into this debate.

When this resolution was reported to the Convention there were six dissenters, and I was one of them. After the resolution had been on the calendar for several days it appeared that there were at that time some three or three and one-half pages of amendments, and the Convention saw fit to refer the matter back to our committee. I can assure every gentleman in this Convention that not one member of that committee wanted the job thrust upon him, and I least of all; but the Convention sent it back to us in the midst of the greatest heat, except this, that we have had this year.
OFFICIAL PENSIONS.

523

Now, they talk of influence. After it was referred to our committee, a committee of firemen asked to meet me, and I met them, and was glad to do so. I deemed it my duty to meet them or anyone else interested in any matter before a committee of this Convention. I took them into the room of the committee on Rules, and they gave me the reasons why they thought the resolution was not fair to them. One of the reasons was that they considered there was a moral obligation on the part of the Commonwealth to carry out the understanding that they entered into when they took their positions, namely, that if they were injured or disabled in the performance of their duty or reached the retirement age they should receive a pension.

They used no improper methods with me. They stated plainly and frankly what their reasons were, and went away. I then talked with policemen whom I saw in the same room, openly and publicly, and listened to their story, and think they had a right to express their views, and I am glad I heard them, as by so doing I saved the committee the trouble of giving a hearing when we met as a whole. The judges did not appear before us, and I am sorry they did not; because I do not believe that because a man is a judge in this Commonwealth he gives up all his rights, as a great many people seem to think he should. As the judges did not appear before me, or before the committee, I considered it my duty to do as well by them (although they had only three or four hundred votes in this Commonwealth) as I would do for the firemen or policemen, who have thousands of votes, and I think, gentlemen, it is your duty here to give the judges as fair a treatment as anybody else, notwithstanding the fact that they have not the voting power.

We held a meeting of the committee. It was a hot day. I said: “Gentlemen, this Convention wants you to agree on something.” We talked the matter over and adjourned for a week. During that week several very good lawyers in the Convention undertook to draft a measure which they thought might meet the approval of the committee. Several members of the committee drew resolutions. I attempted one myself. When the committee met we talked over all those different forms.

The pension business, gentlemen, is a large subject. It is no subject to consider in a few minutes, or in a few hours, or in the time allotted to this committee in the middle of a heated period. There are conflicting laws. The gentleman who drew the original resolution (Mr. Sullivan), and the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), who now offers a resolution himself along the same lines see no loopholes in them, but I will point one out to you. “This amendment shall not apply”, etc., “to soldiers and sailors, nor to pensions or retirement allowances for which applicants have contributed according to law.”

Now, gentlemen, I do not know what it means by “retirement allowances.” There is a retirement board, and the statute says that the payments derived from money contributed by the employee is an annuity. I presume therefore by the words “retirement allowance” he means an annuity. The statute further says that the part contributed by the Commonwealth shall be called a pension. Under the provisions of this resolution, if a man contributes a reasonable amount, we will say $50 or $500, there is nothing to prevent the Legislature from giving him $10,000 as a pension on the part of the Commonwealth, and that is one of the defects in that resolution.

There was some defect in almost every resolution that was put before us.

Let us go back to the pension business as it was first understood.
I presume that originally a pension was granted to a policeman or a fireman because of the danger, or supposed danger, of his employment. There is no doubt that there have been abuses, but do you say that a soldier who returns from the war because he gets a pension from the country shall not try to do anything else? I do not doubt that some of those men mentioned may have been retired wrongly. That is the business of the man who was at the head of the department, who allowed a doctor's certificate to pass when he should not have done it, but do you want those retired firemen or policemen who draw $600 or $800 and possibly have large families to support, to do nothing? Some have gone ahead and secured other jobs. I do not think they should have them in the public service, but the civil service laws do not prevent it. When I was connected with the Port of Boston, a retired fireman came before me, and under the civil service laws I was obliged to appoint him to a position against my wishes. When the committee met the last time and discussed all these resolutions after sitting in the heat and having vote after vote on different propositions, it was said by one that if we put in the amendment offered by the gentleman in the third division (Mr.
Lomasney) no saving would be made. Another said: "We do not want contributory pensions." Another said: "We want all pensions contributory." Now, before you hurry too much to think of the condition the police department would be in to-day in this great city of Boston, if we did not have any pension law at all. In a few years men would arrive at the age of 62, 63 or 64. They would be decrepit. They would not be able to do a day's work. Yet not a man who has been in the police commissioner's place, or who has been mayor of Boston, and I include my friend here (Mr. Quincy) and myself, would put those men out on the street without any pay. The result to the police force would be that it would consist of a body of old men incapable of performing the work required. The same way with the firemen; they should have a pension, and they should have one that is reasonable and proper. If they do not, the fire department in a few years will be made up of old men, who could not climb a ladder or who could not slide down a rope. You want to think of those things.

I have not time here to bring attention to every little detail. There were a great many resolutions before the committee on which it voted time and time again. I will not discuss who voted this way or that way, because I do not think those matters are proper to bring before the Convention, but the committee disagreed. I could have broken the tie, and I would not break it. Why? Because this Convention said we were to bring back something, just as we did on the anti-aid amendment. We stayed there, and we perspired, and we thought, and finally we agreed to the best thing. We asked you to reject the whole subject and let the Legislature take it up in its own time. Of course, there are abuses, but before you write a legislative act into the Constitution that will be as long as the one in my hand which we do not want and which we do not think is right, before you write that into the Constitution I advise you to reject the resolution and all substitutes and just put this whole subject aside or else you will be here three or four more days discussing this proposition and end up with a poorly drawn bad piece of legislation.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: It is not my purpose to debate this question. It seems to me that it has been debated enough. I do not believe the mind of a single delegate now here can be changed by anything more that may be said upon the subject. I do not rise, therefore, because I want to debate the question, but because I understand that during my absence in the early part of the Convention I was highly honored by my absence being noticed by the delegate from Somerville (Mr. Underhill).

Mr. Underhill: Following parliamentary custom I did not name anyone in my remarks. I referred to the gentleman from Lynn "who had so frequently attacked the Legislature of Massachusetts." Had I been referring to the gentleman who comes from Lynn, who now is upon his feet, I should have said the gentleman from Lynn who sometimes criticizes the Legislature. [Laughter.]

Mr. Creamer: Apparently there is nothing for me to do except to accept the very humble apology of the delegate from Somerville (Mr.
Underhill).

Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley: I offer an amendment which I send to the desk, and after the reading of it I desire to make some comments upon the resolution.

Mr. Pillsbury moved to amend the resolution (No. 392) by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, the words "in amount exceeding the rate of one thousand dol-

Mr. Pillsbury: I have felt constrained to offer this amendment, as I cannot vote for the resolution, even as otherwise proposed to be amended, because it puts into the Constitution a civil pension system, which I do not think should be done, nor can I with any satisfaction vote to reject it, because I think if properly amended it affords the Convention an opportunity to do what ought to be done upon this subject. In general I regard any system of civil pensions, payable out of public moneys raised by taxation, as vicious and mischievous, for various reasons some of which lie deeper than any money reason. I do not think the system ought to be extended, and I think it ought now to be put an end to except so far as the Commonwealth is already committed to it.

In my view of the matter, the only public pension which rests on justifiable grounds is the military pension, the grounds of which are, first, that the service is in the highest degree hazardous and liable, if not likely, to be disabling; second, that the soldier's pay is hardly more than nominal, never having any necessary relation to his earning power, and third, the only ground, in my opinion, upon which any public pension can justifiably stand, that the service is compulsory, or at least is rendered under a power of compulsion, and of course you cannot confine the military pension to the actually conscripted man, since every volunteer, to say nothing of his merit, fills a place which might otherwise have to be filled by compulsion. For these reasons the soldier has a claim to be pensioned which no other man or citizen can ever maintain, at least unless and until other governmental service is made compulsory. No man in this country is compelled to hold office, even as a policeman or fireman.

But we are confronted here with a practical difficulty, which must be met and which, if I understand the amendment offered by my friend in the third division (Mr. Lomasney), is taken care of by it. There is now a substantial number of men,—I have in mind more particularly the judges but it is not confined to them,—who are already in the receipt of pensions promised them by laws in force at the time of their appointment. If I may say a word about the judicial pension, it rests, I suppose, upon the theory that judicial experience is so increasingly valuable that a man who goes upon the bench ought to stay there so long as he is fit to serve, and that a man fit for the judicial duty cannot be expected to turn his back upon all prospect of private gain and devote himself to that service for life without some reasonable provision for disability or old age in addition to the salary.

I have always doubted the soundness of that theory, and to my mind it goes pretty far toward proving its unsoundness that neither Massachusetts nor any other State, so far as I know, has ever had better judges than those who took office without the inducement of any pension or retiring allowance. The best judges go upon the bench from a sense of public duty and in view of the permanence and distinction of judicial position.

Mr. W. H. SULLIVAN of Boston: I should like to ask the gentleman a question. If I understand his amendment, it says that hereafter no pensions shall be given to anybody upon retirement from public life. Now I should like to ask the gentleman this question: If his amendment does not prevail, would he then be in favor of recommending no legislation upon the pension question?

Mr. PILLSBURY: What action I shall hereafter be in favor of I am at this moment unable to say, but we must keep our promises already made, even if made unwisely. To finish what I was about to say,—judges have gone upon the bench, and other men may have entered public employment, with the States' promise of provision for disability or old age. And to cut off or greatly cut down these pensions already established and existing would be a breach of the pledged faith of the Commonwealth that is not to be thought of for a moment.

Now let me answer, so far as I can, the question of my friend in the fourth division (Mr. Sullivan) by saying that I do not think the principle that the people may be taxed without limit to pay civil service pensions or disability or old age pensions ought to find a place in our Constitution. The effect of my amendment in connection with the amendment of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney) as I understand it, would be this: It leaves the existing civil pensions as they now are but puts an end to other civil pensions hereafter, and it leaves the military pension where it finds it; in other words, it does not operate at all upon any person actively serving in, and honorably discharged from, the army or navy of the United States in time of war. Perhaps the door might properly be left open for some cases of emergency or disaster, but if we make public pensions at the public expense an established feature of our governmental or social system, we have gone far toward making our Constitution a socialistic Constitution and Massachusetts a socialistic State.
I think the occasion calls for something more to be said here. If civil pensions in any form get into the Constitution they will be made the entering wedge for a general system of disability or old age pensions, social insurance, or what not, the floodgates of State socialism will be opened, and we shall have to meet, in one form or another, the whole brood of socialistic schemes hatched out of the vicious principles that those who take care of themselves shall be made to take care of everybody else. We all agree that charity is a virtue, but charity does not put her hand in her neighbor's pocket. There is no such thing as compulsory charity. It is no virtue for one man to give away another man's money, or for a majority at the polls to indulge their benevolent impulses at the expense of the minority. Professor Sumner once observed that organized philanthropy usually consists in A, B and C getting together to decide what D shall do for E. There is no element of charity or benevolence in this process. It is spoliation, pure and simple, in which good impulses are perverted to an end that is economically unsound and morally wrong. There is so much confusion of thought and feelings and motives on this subject, so much socialistic sentiment masquerading as philanthropy abound in Massachusetts, and so many socialistic schemes now taking shape here, that it is time to interpose against them a few unpleasant but inexorable facts.

In the common struggle for existence every man has a natural right to employ his own faculties for his own benefit and enjoy the fruits of his labor, subject only to such laws as the State has to impose for its own security. So long as one man is wiser, stronger, more prudent, or more industrious than another, men can never be made equal in condition by law, or if made equal they could not be kept so for a day. Every man must stand upon his own feet and take the consequences of his own conduct. The only aid the State can afford him is to help him to help himself by seeing that he has a fair chance in the race; in other words, to provide just and equal laws under which he may work out his own welfare in his own way, without unjust interference by any other man or men and enjoy the proceeds undepoiled by any other man or men. The moment a free government attempts to go beyond this, and to favor one man or class of men at the expense of another, it is sowing the seeds of its own destruction, for no government can permanently stand, except by despotic force, on any other ground than every man's freedom to work and security in the product, and this excludes the idea that the product can be taken from him and given to another.

The fatal flaw in all the socialistic schemes is that they ignore the distinction between the natural ills which are inseparable from the natural inequality of men, and the artificial ills which are due to the imperfection of the laws or the government, in short, of human institutions. These can be regulated and corrected by law, and of course they ought to be, from time to time, so far as they can be. The natural inequalities among men cannot be, and the attempt to correct them will destroy any government which undertakes it, for the reason, if no other, that society cannot exist upon any basis that involves the general and permanent suspension or reversal of natural laws. The general law of nature that every man shall take care of himself can no more be permanently interfered with by Constitutions or statutes than the law of gravitation. The people must be made to understand this, and to accept the fundamental fact that government cannot be maintained on the principle that some men or classes shall be compelled to take care of other men or classes. This would make government a mere device for robbing one man to give to another, and no such government can stand unless the favored class is powerful enough to maintain it by force. The victims of such a system would flee the robber State as they would flee any other robber.

More vicious and destructive even than the legal spoliation of one man to provide for another is the tendency of every pension system to pauperize the pensioner. It saps the fundamental virtue of self-reliance, which lies at the center of character. Free institutions can stand upon nothing but the character and independence of the individual citizen and the constant effort of every man to improve his own condition. They must be shaped so as to stimulate this effort, not to suppress it. Let the average man understand that he is bound to be taken care of and he will no longer take care of himself. He will cease to be a contributing member of the community and become a burden upon it, a mere drone in the hive. This is not the stuff of which democracy is made. The whole socialistic philosophy has been summed up, by the clearest thinker on these subjects ever produced in this country or perhaps in any country, in the new maxim that "poverty is the best policy", since if you get anything you will be made to take care of somebody else, while if you get nothing somebody will be made to take care of you.

It is fashionable and popular to denounce the rich, and appeal to sympathy with the poor. There are no classes in this Commonwealth of ours between which such a line can be drawn. Barring a few plutocrats at one end of the scale and a few paupers at the other, the people of Massachusetts are neither rich nor poor. The vast majority of them are indeed capitalists, for they have some property, even if but little, and all property is capital. The socialistic schemes cannot be executed at the expense of the rich. They can be executed only at the expense of all who have anything which the hand of the taxgatherer can reach, that is to say, at the expense of all the contributing members of the State. This is not merely a penalty imposed upon industry and prudence; it is a bounty directly offered to sloth and improvidence, upsetting and reversing all the elemental precepts for the conduct of life that every child is taught from infancy.

We hear much in these times about making the world safe for democracy, but not so much about making democracy safe for itself. We have heard a good deal in this Convention about social unrest, which is said to threaten democracy. The danger to democracy is popular ignorance, under the arts of the demagogue who plays upon it for his own purposes. Among all demagogues the most mischievous is the one who deceives the people by false theories of their condition and false promises of relief, impossible of fulfillment. The people are told and made to believe that if they are not so well off as some of their neighbors it is the fault of the government and the laws, which need only to be changed. The demagogue has undermined and destroyed every democracy in the past history of the world. He is always at work undermining our own, and it will never be secure until the people realize that they must depend upon themselves, and not upon the State, for the welfare and happiness which come to every man in proportion to his own efforts, to which the State can contribute nothing but the equal opportunity and equal protection which it must extend alike to all.

Mr. Clark of Brockton: I desire to ask your indulgence just for a few minutes, for the reason that I feel very strongly on this matter, and I believe that in these closing days of our work, after sitting here more than a year, the test is presented in this resolution of our ability for constructive work in the line of Constitution making. I believe, gentlemen, that the manner in which we handle this proposition and the condition in which we leave it when we have taken our final vote upon it, will be in a measure the acid test of the ability of this Convention to grapple with great and troublesome questions.

What do I believe in in regard to pensions? The evils of our multiform systems, with their multiplicity of pensions, have been pointed out, and the graft that has been engrafted upon some of them has been noted. I am not going to regale you with any oratory along those lines. But I wish to say, I believe we should do something. — I believe we must do something, — if it takes another 24 hours beyond what we anticipated.

What do I believe in regard to pensions? I would have a policy established and incorporated into the organic and fundamental law of this Commonwealth, on which any and all pension systems hereafter shall be based and to which they shall be made to conform.

Now there should not be, in my judgment, more than two systems of pensions, — civil pensions, I refer to. I would not object to a pension system for persons injured while engaged in specially hazardous work for the Commonwealth or any of its subdivisions; for instance, firemen and policemen. That would be one pension system.

Another pension system, if we are to have it, would be a retirement system, and I would make that dependent upon a contribution by every beneficiary. What does the Commonwealth do in regard to the teachers, a large number of whom are receiving salaries hardly commensurable with the demands upon them to-day, who are hardly able to feed and dress themselves, and many of them have dependents, — aged mothers; some of them children, — and we compel them to contribute to a pension fund. For long years every teacher who enters our schools now must contribute each year to a pension fund. If this Convention is to work out anything in this direction in which it may take pride hereafter, it must mobilize thought, it must concentrate constructive action, and do it rapidly. We have only a few hours in which to do it. I am most heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman who used to be known as the gentleman from ward 8, — I think he has come down to ward 5 now (Mr. Lomasney). I believe the Commonwealth should keep faith with its public servants. It has an implied contract to pay a certain pension to every man in its service at the present time who retires from an office to which there is attached a pension. We should keep faith with those men. But beginning with 1918, or on the first of January, perchance, of 1919, we should begin a new system based on an established policy, established and engrafted upon the Constitution by this assembly, and we shall have something to our dying days that we shall be proud of, something that our children and our children’s children will honor us for, I believe.

Now, gentlemen, I want you to remember,—pardon me if I call him by name,—I want you to remember Mr. Lomasney’s amendment. I hope you will adopt it, because I believe it is the right thing. It enables the Commonwealth to keep faith with its employees. Then I hope that you will fix up the remainder of the resolution so that we will at least cut down the amount of the annual pension bill. I would wipe it out entirely except by contribution. There should be a contributory element in every one.

Mr. Walcott of Cambridge moved to amend the resolution by striking out the article of amendment and inserting in place thereof the following:

Except to soldiers and sailors honorably discharged from active service in the army and navy in time of war, and to their dependents, to those persons now in receipt of pensions and those persons holding offices for which pensions are provided, no pension or gratuity shall be granted to any employee or official of the Commonwealth or any political division thereof except by general law upon a contributory basis.

Mr. Walcott: I feel strongly in sympathy with the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Clark of Brockton), that the Convention expected the committee to report some action that the Convention could agree upon, limiting the pension scandal; for it seems to me that we are almost all agreed here that at present it has become a scandal in the Commonwealth. The purpose of this amendment which I have asked to substitute is to stop that. If adopted it does not stop it immediately, and the objection taken to it by the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Underhill), as I understand, on that ground, is fully justified. But, gentlemen, it is almost impossible to cut off long-standing abuses in a minute or a day or a year, or sometimes even in a few years, without doing more damage to the unfortunate people who immediately will be hurt than the good which eventually will result. At least, that is my personal opinion, and I believe the opinion of all members of the committee to whom this matter was referred.

Now those having actual rights, in receipt of a pension, and those having moral rights, as you might say, by the expectations which were aroused by the pending laws when they took office, are protected in this proposed substitute amendment, but it is not intended in this substitute amendment to make any money limitation. I think nearly all the members of our committee are opposed to a money limitation. One member said at our last meeting that he would be opposed to any amendment which carried a money limitation. There is no money limitation in the Constitution, either as drawn or as at present amended. It would be a silly thing at this stage to put a money limitation into our Constitution. A dollar now may mean twenty cents in two years or it may mean twenty dollars. It depends entirely on developments which we have no means of judging at the present time. It is a trivial, transient, passing matter, which has no business in a State Constitution anywhere in any of the United States. Furthermore, the amendment I propose is a step in what I believe to be the right direction: It puts pensions on a contributory basis. That is what the commission appointed by the Governor in 1914 recommended as a means of doing away with the system which has received such harsh and, in my opinion, entirely justifiable criticism in this Convention. It was a commission of experts, men who gave their time to it and had a competent secretary to help them. Mr. Henry S. Dennison was the chairman of the commission. They tabulated all the pension laws of other States and the names of all persons receiving pensions in this State, and their report of 1914 is the charter of information on this subject in this Commonwealth.

This amendment would allow the passage of a bill which that commission strongly recommended and which I believe should have been adopted. From their bill judges were exempted. The judges of the Supreme Judicial Court were not to be put upon a contributory basis. That was because their tenure was established by the Constitution. No need of that exception, however, exists under this proposal, which is a constitutional amendment that would override the present provision in regard to the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court. Accordingly a simpler bill could be drawn now under this amendment than the one proposed by the commission of 1914.

I sincerely hope that instead of trying to patch this leaky, mouldy, worn out hulk of an amendment [that introduced by William H. Sullivan and referred to the committee on the Bill of Rights] which never was well drawn in the beginning, we can take something new and short which is more suitable for a constitutional amendment and not all plugged up with amendments which cannot possibly make a good amendment.

Mr. Curtis of Revere: I have no desire in what I have to say to cut off the rights of any gentleman to offer an amendment, but I do not know as there are any more to be offered. And, as it is a very warm day, the temperature has been rising gradually, we have had a great influx of "hot air" and we are all anxious to finish up next week, and I believe it is possible to do it, I move the previous question.

Mr. Anderson of Newton: When this matter was first reported to the Convention I with some others was a dissenter, because I did not believe in putting a specific amount in the Constitution, and I hold to that at the present time.

When the resolution and its proposed amendments were recommitted to the committee on Bill of Rights we faithfully attempted to agree on some proposition to report to the Convention, and many of us were very sorry that we were unable to agree or to get a majority for any one of the very numerous amendments which were put to vote in the committee. In the end we despaired of doing anything in the committee and consequently made the report which is before the Convention. The only member who voted against it was the gentleman in this division from Boston (Mr. Lomasney). I felt a great deal as he did, that something ought to be done, and consequently I reserved my rights to dissent from this report. I do feel that something ought to be done if the Convention can possibly do it.

Since the time that the report was made the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott) has drawn this amendment, which is brief, which makes the exception of all those who are now drawing pensions, which makes the exception of all those who have served actively in the army or navy of the United States, and which demands merely a general law and a contributory pension. Now if we are not willing to go as far as the gentleman from Wellesley, abolishing all pensions, I think that this amendment of the gentleman from Cambridge is a very reasonable proposition.

Mr. Boucher of New Bedford: I am sorry the gentleman in the fourth division (Mr. Curtis of Revere) has moved the previous question in this Convention, for the simple reason that I have an amendment in the hands of the Secretary which I should like to have the Convention act upon. I rose several times, but was not recognized, and I ask the gentleman from Revere if he will withdraw his motion. I ask unanimous consent to move my amendment.

Mr. Boucher moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "one thousand dollars", and inserting in place thereof the words "fifteen hundred dollars".

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: Until the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is willing to adopt some scientific plan for pensions, I am opposed to any action. I realize there have been abuses; I realize there are abuses. I realize that where one man can get $7,500 a year pension from the Commonwealth when right beside him may live a man and his wife who have brought up a family and through misfortune those two people must go to the poorhouse, there is injustice, and there will continue to be injustice until some equitable system of pensions comes in vogue. But I do not feel that any measure offered before this Convention in this debate meets those conditions. Something ought to be done, but I believe the wiser way is to vote the whole business out and leave it until some scientific method can be arranged so that the pensions can be upon an equitable basis and follow somewhat the scheme that has been adopted in England, Australia and New Zealand, working far better than anything that we have proposed will work in Massachusetts and until this or some future Convention is willing to consider and adopt a universal non-contributing pension system it is much better left as it stands to-day.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: The previous question has been moved; I will take only a few moments of your time. But this is one subject with which in some ways I have been familiar, because my life work has been thrown in connection with the firemen and the police. I can say I am associated with one of the largest insurance concerns in America and am familiar with the fire department of Boston and with the fire departments of all of our suburban towns and cities and with those throughout the Commonwealth. The judges always can be defended, and properly so, by distinguished representatives. Some of them are the most able and eminent men who have served in any capacity in the Commonwealth. I would not wish to say one thing against the pensions that go to our judges. But mind you, they can adjourn their courts at four o'clock and go to their hammock or their shady nook if they wish. But the firemen and the policemen cannot do that. When there is a strike or a fire they must be ready. When there is a strike in Lawrence or Westfield you send out the metropolitan park policemen to aid in protecting the community and sharing in the dangers with the local policemen; and will you say that those men should not be pensioned?

Now you who are familiar with the subject, vote on it; you who are not familiar with it, do not vote at all. You had better reject all these amendments and go with the committee. [Applause.]

The main question was ordered.
Mr. Underhill of Somerville: We have heard the siren song this afternoon:

Some day! Some day I shall meet you,
Love, I know not when or how.

That is the way with this pension proposition. Unless we act upon it now it still will be “Some day,” — some day 25 years from now. If 15 years ago some action had been taken it would not take 25 years to eradicate the pension evil. Regarding the amendment to raise the limit to $1,500, if you adopt that every man who retires, instead of retiring on half pay, if his salary is over $1,500, will have a pension of $1,500.

Regarding the amendment of the gentleman from Cambridge, it is better than nothing; but, sir, the amendment I offered does away with practically every objection raised here this afternoon, for it gives, — mind this, — it gives $75 a month at least to those who are getting over $1,500 a year. It gives to others half the salary they are getting below that figure, and $75 a month is the amount which has been placed by the United States government as adequate pay or pension for a man who, in the performance of his duty, his patriotic duty, a duty which he is obliged to perform because he has been drafted, has lost a leg, both arms or is totally blind, helpless, a man who, to a certain extent, outside of the love the people bear him, would be a burden to his people financially. It gives him $75 a month for the maintenance of himself and family.

Now, sir, perhaps that is not adequate, but we will make a start. We are not singing the old song “Some Day,” but we are acting, trying to do something which will relieve us eventually from the evil which threatens to overwhelm us unless something is done right soon.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I will say just one word. I have been asked my opinion in regard to the proposition that has been offered by the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott). I simply wish to express my opinion that that is the proper solution of this question and I trust that it will be adopted, for it provides especially that pensions can be granted only by general law, which in itself is a good thing, and then only on a contributory basis, which is the sound way to do it.

Mr. Edwin U. Curtis of Boston: I should like to call attention to what I said before. All these amendments have been offered, and some of them by members of the committee. I myself drew a resolution that I thought might pass, — a long legislative act. I did not deem it fair to the committee, having agreed unanimously to recommend rejection, to offer anything afterwards, and I do not think it is right for other members of the committee to do so.

I want to call attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cambridge. He says this provision shall not affect any pensions now in existence. It shows right off an error. He should have said: “in existence or payable at the time of the acceptance of this amendment by the people.” Are you going to stop the people from receiving pensions who are appointed to office between the day of the passage of the amendment by the Convention and the day of its acceptance by the people? This is an example of the careless way of drawing these amendments. Gentlemen have offered amendments that will have to be corrected hereafter. I should like to ask you what you think of the condition of affairs under this amendment. You are living in a house. A burglar enters it. This amendment does not make any allowance to the family of a policeman who is killed in the performance of his duty. The burglar is in your house with a gun and the policeman (with a wife and eight or ten children) is called to arrest him. Is he going to take the same chances with his life if he does not get a pension or if there is no provision for his family in case of his death, that he would if there were such pension? I think you had better reject the whole proposition.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: Does the member in charge of the committee report have any time?

The President: The member is entitled to ten minutes.

Mr. Sullivan: This ten minutes would afford me opportunity to have much fun with the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), but I prefer to use the time seriously and point out to the Convention defects in the many amendments presented. I am permitted to address you because I have charge of the Committee's report, which was unanimous, with the exception of the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) and to which no member of that committee of fifteen dissented; yet several members of the committee attacked the report and only one, the chairman (Mr. Curtis), has assisted me in its defence. However, the merit of the report is such that I expect the good sense of this Convention will appeal convincingly for its indorsement.

One member of the committee, a judge from Cambridge (Mr. Wallcott), submits an amendment, a new work of art, after voting with the majority that all resolutions be rejected. He brought an amendment to our committee over which he had worked for about two weeks, and some of our members who were not versed in the law read it over with rare enthusiasm. One look at it was enough, and I suggested that there was no provision against special laws, and the judge, who is a very fair man, admitted that it was defective and no longer pressed it. We had numberless propositions before our committee, in print or in writing, in which we discovered many defects, and because we could not suggest a perfect measure we made this recommendation.

Now the conscientious judge from Cambridge, and the gentleman from Brockton (Mr. Brown), who is equally conscientious, want us to do something. They say the people want something done, and for that reason they are in favor of any old thing, perhaps, in order to have something submitted. However, I am one of the delegates who believes if we cannot do a thing right, if we cannot submit a proper resolution, we should do nothing and face our constituents with this explanation.

An amendment is offered by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) which puts the question squarely up whether you will recommend non-contributory pensions with a limit of $750 or not. That is his proposition. He accepts the amendment of the gentleman from ward 5 (Mr. Lomasney) which reads: "No person who shall hereafter be elected or appointed to public office, position or employment, shall receive a pension," etc., so you see that his resolution, so amended, offers the State no relief; it protects all the present office-holders. What is the defect in the amendment offered by the astute statesman from ward 5, — "No one hereafter appointed to public office"? How would this affect the judge in the municipal court who is promoted to the Superior Court; the judge of the Superior Court who is promoted to the Supreme Judicial Court, the fireman who is promoted to Chief; the policeman promoted to sergeant; sergeant promoted to Captain? Each promotion would entail such substantial contribution as to deter one from accepting the appointment. The difficulty is, our mentors have tried to devise a legislative act. They have tried to provide a system of pensions. As I have said, and as our chairman has said, our committee considered all these amendments, — they all were defective, — and, rather than submit a defective amendment to the Convention, voted to report that no action should be taken.

The gentleman from Somerville who concedes that he is the people's champion contends that he has given the pensioner $75 a month when he offers a yearly pension of $750. This glaring inaccuracy must lead us to the conclusion that the delegate is so intoxicated with his own eloquence that, in his delirium, he defies the immutable law of mathematics.

The gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury) who never has posed as a friend of the plain people, who never has come in contact with the plain people, offers the most helpful amendment of all, because the gentleman from Wellesley suggests that hereafter no pensions shall be granted. He eliminates the $1,000 exception and the resolution would read, — if it was not read in conjunction with the amendment of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Lomasney): "Hereafter no pensions shall be granted." Fine! But he does not want it passed save in conjunction with the amendment of the gentleman from ward 5. He wants his resolution to affect only those "hereafter appointed." The gentleman from Wellesley is in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from ward 5 which, as I have said, is fatally defective, because under it the judge promoted, the policeman promoted, the fireman promoted, would forfeit his old pension and must contribute substantially to the new one.

The gentleman from Belmont (Mr. Benton), expert in insurance, has well said that we have not any real resolution here to offer to the people. We do not want a hodgepodge resolution in which, just as soon as it is submitted to the voters, we would find defects. No matter how able or gifted he may be, the man who can pass upon a resolution by hearing it read in a low tone by the Secretary, and indorse it without having looked it over, is possessed of an ability which few can hope ever to possess and an assurance which ought to condemn him in the minds of all the thinking people of the Commonwealth.

We are voting in the dark on these amendments. One member suggests a limit of $1,500. That limit undoubtedly would be more popular, because it would discriminate only against the judges. If we make the limit $1,500 nobody suffers but the judiciary. I seek to make no attack upon the judges; they are my good friends. As I explained to one judge: "Your contribution toward a pension will be taken care of by a raise in your salary."

Now I want to reiterate, — I want to say for the last time here, — I want to make this point, that our committee originally reported a resolution which limited the power of the Legislature only to give away money. It sought to protect the Commonwealth. There has developed now in this Convention a desire to save, not the Commonwealth but the office-holders, because instead of limiting the amount of a non-contributory pension to $1,000 some now seek to take away from the Legislature the right it now has, to change the status of these pensioners, the right to enact a contributory pension system for those who hereafter may profit by an increase in salary. And it seems to me that the common sense of this Convention ought to advise the delegates to accept the committee’s report, which was practically unanimous, and which is the best solution of this problem. Let, as I say, an intelligent and a fearless Legislature in the future enact a system of contributory pensions which will be acceptable to all the people.
I give the rest of my time to the Convention.

Mr. Pillsbury asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment; but objection was made.
The amendment moved by Mr. Lomasney of Boston was adopted, by a vote of 100 to 26.
The amendment moved by Mr. Boucher of New Bedford was rejected.
The amendment moved by Mr. Underhill of Somerville was rejected.
The amendment moved by Mr. Pillsbury of Wellesley was rejected.
The amendment moved by Mr. Walcott of Cambridge was adopted, by a vote of 97 to 55.
The resolution (No. 392), as amended, was rejected Wednesday, August 14, 1918, by a vote of 99 to 67.
On the following day, Thursday, August 15, Mr. Walcott moved that the Convention reconsider the vote by which the resolution had been rejected.

Mr. Walcott of Cambridge: I trust that the vote we have just had [on another proposal] will not be considered a precedent for preventing any reconsideration. This is rather a different situation from that on which reconsideration has just been refused. That was a question which was debated at three stages very fully and has another stage, on the submission to the people, before it, when the question may be raised again. The resolution proposed and voted by this Convention to be substituted for resolution No. 333 yesterday, however, had only a matter of some fifteen or twenty minutes debate. Unless reconsideration prevails at this stage any dealing with the pension system by this Convention is at an end. It seems to me, and to a number of gentlemen here present, that it would be a pity if this important subject were not treated by this Convention. It is for that reason that I move reconsideration.

Mr. McAnarney of Quincy: When the Convention yesterday decided not to further amend the Constitution by adding an amendment giving civil pensions I believe it did the proper thing. In the first place, I do not believe that is a proper subject for a constitutional amendment. It is purely a legislative proposition, and should be so dealt with. In the second place, if this Convention is to have a constitutional amendment dealing with that matter it should be an amendment which would reflect the sound and careful consideration by the Convention of the subject.
I am of the opinion that there has not been offered to this Convention any proposed amendment dealing with this matter worthy of being written into the organic law of this Commonwealth as a part of our Constitution. The very amendment that the gentleman proposes that we now reconsider the rejection of in itself bears upon its face sufficient earmarks of haste and lack of careful thought. It provides for the exemption of all persons now holding a public office to which is attached a pension from the operation of that constitutional amendment. What does that mean? A policeman to-day is a policeman. He holds his office, and that office has attached to it a provision for a pension under certain conditions. If he ceases to be a policeman and becomes a fireman would he still have an exemption guaranteed to him by this constitutional amendment? A strict construction of the amendment would provide that he is exempt from its provisions, even though he changes the class of his employment or enters another branch of our public service, but beyond that it probably is merely a matter of wording. There is at the base of this amendment a fundamental objection. In the future it says that Massachusetts shall grant only such pensions as are on a contributory basis. Now, that may be all right for the judges, it may be all right for clerks, it may be all right for department heads and officials, but do we want to write that into the law as a prohibition against granting pensions to our firemen and our policemen, who daily face risks, not equal perhaps but sometimes almost on an equality with the soldier on the battlefield? What lies back of the thought that the fireman should receive a pension? It means that the fireman, when they go into the discharge of their duties, should not be deterred in performing those duties by any thought of what may happen to themselves or those who may be dependent upon them from any injury which may come to their person. Shall you say that the Commonwealth shall not be able to grant a pension to firemen, save upon a contributory basis? The same is true of a policeman. All those classes of pensions stand upon a different basis, or should stand upon a different basis, from the pension to the clerk, to the man who is doing the work of a judge or many of the other occupations to which pensions are now attached.

This amendment, if adopted, would tie the hands of the Commonwealth. This proposition should be left where it belongs, to the Legislature. I am astonished that there has been heard from the lips of men in this Convention the charge against the Legislature of this Commonwealth, that we cannot trust the Legislature to deal with this proposition. You cannot trust the Legislature of Massachusetts to deal with a simple civil pension proposition, and yet you men last year exhausted months of our time and gave us hours of your eloquence to prove that representative government was not a failure in Massachusetts. You told us that Massachusetts representative government was not a failure, and to vote against the initiative and referendum, and now you say it is a failure because you cannot trust representative government to give you a proper civil pension law. What an absurdity! What an argument you are advancing from your own lips to-day and furnishing to those men who are going out to fight you on your initiative and referendum proposition next fall. Let us be consistent on this. If we cannot trust Massachusetts to give us a proper and a reasonable civil service pension, then let us abolish Massachusetts representative government entirely and have a wide open straight government by the people under a broad and comprehensive initiative and referendum. I do not believe in that, though. I voted for the initiative and referendum because I believe it will serve a useful purpose in this Commonwealth, but I believe also in the representative form of government. I believe that when there comes to the Legislature the voice of the intelligent, thinking people of this Commonwealth, in the form of a strong public sentiment, that sentiment will be heard in the halls of our Legislature, and it will be feared and it will be followed. Let us leave this proposition where the Convention left it yesterday.

Mr. Lowell of Newton: I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail. It was not until the very end of the debate yesterday that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott) was offered, and that amendment has not had proper consideration from this Convention. The question is a very important one, and one which is eminently proper, in my opinion, to be put up to the people. We started with pensions to the judges. In my opinion it is all wrong that the judges should be singled out from other classes of the community to be given a pension without contribution. The only objection which is made, which at least has been mentioned, is regarding the pensions to firemen and to policemen. There is no question in my mind that they should be on a contributory basis also. You cannot draw the line and say policemen and firemen should not contribute to their pensions while everyone else should contribute. It is a great big question. The gentleman from Quincy (Mr. McAnarney) says that they shall be encouraged to do their duty because they know that they will be taken care of if anything happens to them during a fire or a riot. Almost all of the policemen and firemen are or easily can be included in the workmen's compensation system, which covers just that, which gives them just that very thing of which the gentleman speaks. It is not that we distrust the Legislature, that we wish to put this thing through and have it put on the ballot, it is to bring up before the people of this Commonwealth at the next State election the thing which in my mind is one of the most important matters which we possibly could bring before them. There is no end to pensions if contribution is not made necessary. England has gone into it with a proposition which was calculated seven or eight years ago, whenever they started it, to cost them two million pounds, I believe the figure was,—to cost them two million pounds. The last time I saw the figures, they had risen to twelve million pounds. The argument there made was that it would decrease the rates, as they call it, in other words, it would decrease the amount spent for poor relief. It has not decreased it at all. Now, that is one of the most important questions which has been before this Convention, and I submit that reconsideration should prevail, so that we may pass this thing and let the people vote on it.

Mr. Underhill: I appreciate the effort of the gentleman from Cambridge (Mr. Walcott) and the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Lowell) in behalf of the principle which is involved in this question, but, sir, they do not know what they are up against. They have not a Chinaman's chance. We heard labor through the voice of its representatives here a few weeks ago demand this proposition, and yesterday saw every one of them vote against it. We heard Boston's representatives with tears and sobs in their voices pleading for this thing in behalf of the people, and Massachusetts and the city of Boston, and yesterday saw the representatives of the city of Boston fighting it tooth and nail. The organized firemen and policemen of the city of Boston are stronger, — and you have got to acknowledge it right here, — than this Convention. They are stronger than the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. They are stronger than the Legislature. It is not a question of whether you can trust the Legislature or not; it is a question of political expediency, and it is followed by the members of this Convention just the same as that is followed by the members of the Legislature. That is all there is to it. We might just as well save our time right here and vote down this attempt at a useless reconsideration.

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston: Yesterday the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill) addressed us as a dying gladiator; to-day he addresses us as a "dead one." The delegate has insulted the members of this Convention, but while the gentleman has brains enough to conceive the insult, he really has not brains enough to realize what he has done. He says, gentlemen, that you are not considering the propositions which are submitted to you, from the common-sense viewpoint, that you are not listening to argument. We will eliminate from the discussion the Boston representatives; the majority of you are from outside of Boston; yet the Convention's vote yesterday was against this proposition. Insult will not induce reconsideration. In the later days I have conceived a great admiration for this Convention. In this second session, this year, the members have listened to argument, the members have not followed the self-appointed leaders, and it is delightful to follow the roll-call now because one cannot foretell, as he could in the days of the I. and R., how anybody will vote. I believe all the delegates vote conscientiously.

Now let us consider the resolution calmly, let us not decide hastily, let us not amend it thoughtlessly. Yesterday the gentleman from Wellesley (Mr. Pillsbury), an able man, submitted a resolution somewhat hurriedly and before the vote was taken he had changed his mind, he wanted to withdraw it. The gentleman from Cambridge, the judge (Mr. Walcott), as I said yesterday, brought to the committee a resolution over which he had worked two or three weeks, and then he needed an hour more in which to prepare it properly; on one of the hottest days we have had this summer, we waited for him to bring in his resolution; one look at it was enough to show that it was a joke resolution which he readily admitted when its imperfections were pointed out. He voted to recommend that no further action be taken on this question and I was chosen to take charge of the committee's report, to which there was no dissenter, as I have said; yet the chairman and I are the only ones who stood by our report. The judge (Mr. Walcott) comes in with his hodgepodge resolution. Has the gentleman from Newton (Mr. Lowell) read it over? Has anybody read it over? No. It provides that anybody who has a pension now shall keep his pension undisturbed, and anybody hereafter appointed to a position for which a pension is provided shall not contribute. Now the real thing here, as I said yesterday, — and it can bear repetition, because to my mind it is important, — is this: That at the beginning of this discussion we sought to save the Commonwealth, and now my friend from Newton and my friend the judge from Cambridge are solicitous about saving the office-holders. The incorruptible and the fearless advocate from Somerville, too, at first sought to make a greater saving for the Commonwealth by making the limit $600 for non-contributory pensions. He now accepts an amendment which would save all those at present appointed to office and who may be appointed to office before the Constitution is changed, and would increase the pension burden. We have had numerous hodgepodge resolutions and some would prefer to submit them to the people rather than do nothing, reasoning, perhaps, that the people will not criticize and will not appreciate the meaning of the resolution any more than does the gentleman from Somerville.

The question is: Shall we be intelligent enough and fearless enough to say to the people that we do not here seek to legislate, we do not here seek to present to the people a pension bill? We have shown how we feel about pensions, because everybody who has spoken has said that our present system is the source of great discontent. Nobody feels that more keenly than I do. Two million dollars is the burden under which we are struggling now. Nobody is more strongly in favor of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Somerville unadulterated than I am. But as he says, knowing that it is about to be killed, he presents it. What is the use of presenting something that we know cannot pass? At the present time the Legislature has the power, if at any time it possesses sufficient fearlessness and intelligence, — and the gentleman from Somerville is in the Legislature and has been for a number of years, and he never has made a struggle, — and can so revise our pension system as to make it the fairest flower in our legislative exhibit.

Mr. Lomasney of Boston: If the members from Boston were here attending to their duties and listening to the criticism of their city by the gentleman from Somerville, their presence would have prevented the present situation. Coming down to the question before us, what are the facts? A minority of the committee on Bill of Rights opposed this pension amendment. The gentleman from Cambridge was on this committee and in the minority. When the members of the committee were trying to do something to restrict the payment of pensions throughout the Commonwealth he was opposed to doing anything in the matter. What did he do? He dissented from the report of the committee and fought it bitterly in the Convention; and then when it was recommitted by the Convention and many of the committee were in favor of doing something for the State through the pension system, was he in favor of doing anything of a constructive nature on this measure? No. He was against the committee all the time. After being against the original amendment he now springs his substitute at the last minute. I do not want to take up too much time, but it seems to me that the most reasonable offer of compromise was the one suggested by the committee in the first place with the amendment that the Convention adopted yesterday at my suggestion. Then we had a good amendment. It gave you a sound basis to start with. It limited the amount to be paid out and affected only persons entering the government service after its adoption by the people. You cannot stop it all at once. You have got to begin at a certain point. When the gentleman from Wellesley desired to withdraw his amendment, he was refused the necessary unanimous consent. Thereupon the Convention killed the whole proposition. It is better to kill the whole proposition than take the substitute of the gentleman from Cambridge. There is nothing in it at all. It will not work and it never was presented in proper shape to the committee.

You must recognize that the men in the service of the Commonwealth and the cities and towns have certain rights, because certain conditions existed when they took their positions, and I yielded to the justice of the argument in their behalf because it seemed to me that it would be unfair not to protect those persons who took office with the present pension laws on the books. But, sir, when you start to go before the people with this substitute for the original amendment, in my opinion it would have no chance of being adopted by the people. Consequently, if you are going to reconsider this matter at all, — which I do not favor, — I shall insist upon the passage of the original amendment. I hope, however, that we shall kill reconsideration and proceed with other business of the Convention.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I think there is no man in the Convention who is more deeply interested in pensions than I am. I doubt if any have given more attention to this question in every phase than I have. When the Convention refused to give any relief to the situation which now prevails, as the committee on Social Insurance recommended, when the Convention refused to allow the Legislature to have power to make compulsory workmen's compensation bills, — when they refused to allow the Legislature power to deal with the question of relief by substituting a proposition of old age pensions for the present method of pauper relief, — I thought the Convention had determined then that they would leave things where they were. When this matter of pensions for the purpose of preventing special privileges and class distinction was recommitted to the committee I thought the matter was ended. When the report from that committee came back recommending rejection I felt sure that the matter was disposed of. And yesterday I remained silent during the debate, because I felt that the Convention already had passed upon this matter. But, if this matter is to be reopened I propose to reopen it along the entire line, and I have prepared an amendment for that purpose. I do not believe, however, that it is going to be reopened on this, which is simply a trivial and transient proposition, a matter which will cure itself in the Legislature itself. What an attack it is upon the Legislature that the gentleman from Somerville made! — a man who rose here in heat because some one had attacked the General Court, because some one had said that the people should have a right to correct and supplement the work of that august body; and now he comes before us and says that the Legislature cannot be trusted to deal with this trivial, transient matter. Comparatively speaking, it is trivial, it is transient. It has nowhere near the far-reaching effect and the far-reaching necessity for action that we find along many lines which the Convention has refused to consider. And I trust that the matter will not be reopened in these latter days of the Convention but that it may be allowed to die.

Mr. Benton of Belmont: I desire just for a moment to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that although this subject may not have been debated to the great length to which some other subjects have been debated, it apparently was debated intelligently enough so that the members of the Convention understood what they were voting upon. It had a fair vote yesterday in a full Convention and when the gentleman from Cambridge who offered his amendment asked for a roll-call he could not secure 40 votes for a roll-call.

Now these insinuations that have been thrown out are all right enough, but they have no effect upon me or on any other delegate to this Convention. The Convention desires that this subject be left as it is now and this whole subject be defeated. I hope that reconsideration will not prevail and that we will go on with the calendar.

Mr. UNDERHILL: I cannot let pass without a reply the charge of the gentleman from Roxbury (Mr. W. H. Sullivan) that I never tried in the Legislature to correct this abuse. I want to repeat, I want to reiterate, I want to emphasize the fact that for many, many years I have struggled for legislation along various lines; but, sir, a part of the people, who have the sympathy of many of the rest of the people,—the firemen and the policemen,—believe that my efforts are directed against them. They are very much mistaken. I am not directing my efforts against the rank and file of those men, but against the officers who obtain large pensions to which they are not entitled. Yes, Mr. President, I am willing to acknowledge defeat when I meet it. I do the best I can and I am not afraid to make a good fight, but when I am a "dead one" politically I should prefer to remain dead than try to break into public life again, when my constituency does not want me, through favors to firemen or policemen. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Roxbury reminds me of a story about a couple of Irishmen who had come over from that green isle where they have no reptiles, and who found a turtle going along a country road. They were very much surprised at the attitude of the turtle when disturbed in drawing its head and feet into its shell, and when let alone, putting them out and starting on again. They could not understand it. One of them took a knife out of his pocket and the next time the turtle poked his head out he jabbed the knife down so quickly that he cut the turtle's head off. His companion said: "The poor beastie! Ye've kilt him." Just then the turtle stuck out his feet and started to paddle along, and the other man said: "No, I haven't at all." "Yes, ye have; he has no head; shure he's dead." "Go on," said his friend, "how could he walk if he was dead?" So they argued over it and were about to come to blows, when along came a Yankee and they said they would leave the question to him. He sized up the two fellows (they were pretty good sized scrappers), and as he did not want to get into any trouble, he said: "Well, boys, you see it's this way: "He's dead, all right, but the durn fool don't know it." [Laughter.]

The motion to reconsider was negatived.
XXXVII.

SOCIAL INSURANCE.

The committee on Social Insurance submitted the following report (No. 327) July 17, 1917:

The committee on Social Insurance has had referred to it twenty-five resolutions and petitions, as follows:

Doc. No.
12. Resolution relative to the providing of non-contributory health insurance.
13. Resolution relative to the providing of non-contributory old age pensions.
35. Resolution relative to providing for contributory old age insurance.
36. Resolution relative to providing for contributory unemployment insurance.
37. Resolution relative to providing for non-contributory accident, sickness and invalid insurance.
38. Resolution relative to State pensions.
39. Resolution authorizing the Commonwealth to insure persons or property.
52. Resolution for a special tax to provide pensions for the aged and needy.
54. Resolution providing for a State fund for workmen's compensation.
107. Resolution to provide for social insurance by the Commonwealth.
108. Resolution relative to creating a State fire insurance fund.
109. Resolution authorizing compulsory insurance of employees.
110. Resolution authorizing State insurance of workers against accidents, sickness, invalidity, old age and unemployment.
111. Resolution providing for compulsory death benefits for dependents of persons engaged in the public service in times of war and National or State emergency and of persons engaged in hazardous employments at all times.
112. Resolution giving the General Court power to enact laws for the protection of the lives, health or safety of workers.
113. Resolution relative to creating a State fund for workmen's compensation insurance.
251. Resolution relative to the establishment of a system of non-contributory health insurance.
252. Resolution relative to the establishment of health insurance for working-men.
253. Resolution relative to establishing a system of non-contributory old age pensions.
254. Resolution relative to the establishment of a system of old age pensions.
255. Petition of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor, accompanied by resolution providing for the establishment and maintenance of a system of old age pensions.
256. Resolution to empower the General Court to make absolute the liabilities of casualty insurance companies to persons injured by accident.
257. Resolution relative to pensions to dependents of those suffering from cancer or tuberculosis.
258. Petition of the Massachusetts State Branch of the American Federation of Labor, accompanied by resolution providing that employers shall insure in a public fund for the benefit of injured employees.
259. Resolution relative to the establishment of a State fund for workmen's compensation.

Of these, twenty-two may be described generally as dealing with some kind of social insurance or the machinery incident to its administration. One resolution, No. 52, providing for a system of taxation to provide pensions for the aged and needy, would more appropriately be referred to the committee on Taxation, and this committee has been discharged from its further consideration. Another resolution, No. 108, relative to creating a State Fire Insurance Fund, would more appropriately be referred to the committee on Public Affairs, and this committee has been discharged from its further consideration. Another resolution, No. 256, will be the subject of a separate report. This report deals with the twenty-two remaining resolutions upon the general subject of Social Insurance. The committee does not consider that it is in any way charged with the duty of considering these propositions upon their merits but rather to determine if there is any doubt as to the constitutional power of the General Court to legislate upon all or any of them, and, if so, to consider the expedience of conferring such power upon the General Court, and if that question be decided in the affirmative, then to suggest such amendment or amendments to the Constitution as may be necessary to effect the purpose.

First.—As to the power of the General Court under the Constitution to legislate upon any of these propositions.

The committee is not disposed to argue this question; indeed, any conclusion it might reach would, of necessity, be inconclusive. The committee, however, is unanimous in believing that doubt does exist and contents itself, upon this point, with quoting from Bulletin No. 18, pp. 22, 25, prepared by the Commission of the Convention, as follows:

Without inquiring too curiously whether the Massachusetts Supreme Court would uphold the constitutionality of a compulsory Workmen’s Compensation Act in the absence of a constitutional amendment, it seems proper to state that social insurance legislation, if compulsory, would be best safeguarded by an express constitutional amendment.

In view of the recent Federal decisions referred to in this Bulletin it is obvious that “constitutional rigorism” is at an end and that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not stand in the way of State legislation respecting health, unemployment and old age insurance. Of course the question still remains as to whether such measures are in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of Massachusetts. That doubt could be removed by the adoption of an amendment expressly conferring upon the Legislature authority to provide for the several forms of social insurance herein considered.

Second.—The committee is unanimously of the opinion that the Legislature should have the power to deal with these subjects in such manner as, in its wisdom, it may see fit.

The “police power” has in recent years been greatly enlarged to meet changing conditions. As the Supreme Court has said:

“Of course, it is impossible to forecast the character and extent of these changes, but in view of the fact that, from the day Magna Carta was signed to the present moment, amendments to the structure of the law have been made with increasing frequency, it is impossible to suppose that they will not continue, and the law be forced to adapt itself to the new condition of society, and, particularly to new relations between employers and employees, as they arise.”

The Legislature has for many years shown a disposition to deal with the questions involved in the resolutions that are before us. In 1887 it passed the Employers Liability Law, the first to be enacted in the United States. In 1903 a commission was appointed to investigate the relations between employer and employee. The commission reported in 1904 with a draft of a compensation act which was not enacted into law. In 1907 a joint special committee was appointed to sit during the recess of the General Court to consider workmen’s compensation among other questions. As a consequence, a voluntary law was enacted in 1908 and amended in 1909. In 1910, a commission was created “to determine upon a plan of compensating employees for injuries received in the course of their employment.” This resulted in further legislation.

Chapter 127 of the Resolves of 1907 provided for a commission to investigate and consider the various systems of old age insurance or old age pensions or annuities proposed or in operation in this Commonwealth, or elsewhere, and to report upon the advisability of establishing an old age insurance or pension system in the Commonwealth. This commission made its final report on January 15, 1910. It is very voluminous and is House Document No. 1406.

Chapter 106 of the Resolves of 1913 provided for the appointment of a committee to investigate the subject of pensions. The commission was known as the Commission on Pensions, and was to report in detail on the various systems under which pensions were then paid by the Commonwealth and by the counties, cities and towns therein, and to what persons and the amounts thereof. The commission recommended, among other things, the advisability of a service pension plan under which the persons to whom pensions should be granted should make payments from their salaries or wages, and should consent to deductions therefrom as contributions to the fund from which pensions should be paid, and made a very voluminous report under date of March 16, 1914, House Document No. 2450.

Chapter 120 of the Resolves of 1914 provided that, for the purpose of securing information for the General Court for a proper consideration of the subject of old age pensions, the Director of the Bureau of Statistics be required in connection with the taking of the decennial census in the year 1915 to transmit certain statistical information to the General Court including the number of persons 65 years of age and over within the Commonwealth, and their length of residence, the number of dependent persons of all ages being supported in the various public and private institutions throughout the Commonwealth, the number of persons of all ages in the various cities and towns of the Commonwealth who are receiving aid from any public source; also the number of persons aided from private sources, and any other information which, in his opinion, might promote the purpose of the inquiry. This report was made December 15, 1916, and is full of detailed information on this subject.

Chapter 157 of the Resolves of 1916 provided for the appointment of Special Reecess Commission on Social Insurance, to study the effects of sickness, unemployment and old age in Massachusetts, to collect facts as to actual experience with the several forms of insurance therefor, and to recommend to the General Court such legislation as it might deem practicable and expedient to protect the wage-earners of the Commonwealth from the burdens of sickness, unemployment and old age, or any one or more of these. Subsequently, the duty of making a further special investigation was laid upon the commission by Chapter 164 of the Resolves, approved June 2, 1916; namely, the subject of reasonable restrictions in the hours of labor in industries operated continuously for twenty-four hours, and to make such recommendations and drafts of proposed legislation as it might deem practicable. The report of this commission, which was very voluminous, was presented to the General Court in January, 1917, and is known as House Document No. 1550.

A Joint Special Committee on Workmen's Compensation Insurance Rates and Accident Prevention was appointed under joint order of the Senate and House of Representatives, adopted June 2, 1916.

The purpose of the Legislature in providing for the appointment of the committee was outlined in its order as follows:

... to investigate the subject-matter contained in the message of His Excellency the Governor, printed as Senate Document No. 444, with special reference to the problems of rate making and accident prevention under provisions of chapter 751 of the Acts of the year 1911, known as the Workmen's Compensation Act, and acts in amendment thereof and in addition thereto.

The committee made its report in February, 1917, Senate Document No. 370.

We next come to the address of His Excellency the Governor, of January, 1917, in which he urged upon the Legislature the consideration of certain forms of social insurance, and specifically recommended the establishment of a compulsory system of health insurance which should include members of the family and also urged that an annuity should be paid by the State and its subordinate governments without contribution to its deserving citizens seventy or more years of age who do not have children able to support them nor an income of more than $200 a year, and who have been residents of the Commonwealth at least ten years.

Under Chapter 130, May 25, 1917, a special commission was appointed, which is now sitting, known as the "Commission on Social Insurance," for the purpose of further investigating the extent to which poverty occasioned by sickness may be alleviated, medical care for wage-earners and others of limited means may be provided, and measures to prevent disease may be provided, by insurance. The commission is to undertake such investigations as to the health of wage-earners and the conditions under which they work, and as to existing systems of mutual, stock, fraternal, State, and other forms of insurance in this Commonwealth and elsewhere as may be necessary to provide a sound basis for its recommendations, and is to submit a report, including drafts of any legislation which it may recommend, to the next General Court, not later than the fifteenth day of January next.

The committee has referred, perhaps, at too great length, and perhaps inadequately, to the investigations, past and present, of these subjects by the Legislature, not for the purpose of proposing any inquiry into the merits of these propositions, but to make it clear that through many years and at great expense, the General Court has provided for a careful study of the many intricate questions involved in the general subject of social insurance. It would, therefore, seem highly inexpedient that the suggestion of unconstitutionality should be permitted to attach to any measure the General Court may see fit to pass as a result of its prolonged and repeated investigations of the subject.

In Chapter I, the Legislative Power, Section I, The General Court, Art. IV, is found the following language:

And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time to make, ordain, and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, . . .
This article has been amended as follows:

In 1821, Art. 2, by giving the General Court power to create municipal government.

In 1912, Art. 41, giving the General Court the power to prescribe certain methods of taxation for wild lands. In 1915, Art. 44, giving the General Court the right to impose a tax on incomes at different rates on different kinds of property.

It is not easy, and perhaps is not wise, in the absence of knowledge of what may be done with other parts of the Constitution, to attempt more than to follow, in a general way, the form of the amendments above referred to. The committee submits to the Convention, first, a general amendment which is believed to cover the various propositions referred to it; and, second, different amendments, each dealing with a specific subject.

GENERAL AMENDMENT.

1. The General Court shall have power to establish systems of social insurance including old age pensions or insurance, pensions for physical disability arising from any cause, health insurance, maternity benefits, insurance against unemployment and compensation to workmen or their dependents for injuries incurred by work men in the course of or arising out of their employment. It may provide for medical care as well as a money payment and may require that the cost of any such system or systems shall be borne in whole or in part by the State or any civil division thereof or by the insured or by the employer. It may provide that a contributing employer shall not be liable to any other claim for loss or injury that claims may be adjudicated with or without a jury and that employers contributing to the compensation of injured workmen or their dependents shall not be liable to any other claims for loss or injury.

WORKMEN’S COMPENSATION.

1. The General Court shall have power to establish a system of compensation to workmen or their dependents for injuries incurred by workmen in the course of or arising out of their employment. It may provide for medical care as well as a money payment and may require that the cost of such compensation shall be borne in whole or in part by the State or any civil division thereof or by the employer. It may provide that a contributing employer shall not be liable to any other claim for loss or injury that claims may be adjudicated with or without a jury.

HEALTH INSURANCE.

1. The General Court shall have power to establish systems of health insurance, including maternity benefits. It may require that the cost of such pension or insurance shall be borne in whole or in part by the State or any civil division thereof or by the insured or by the employer.

INSURANCE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT.

1. The General Court shall have power to establish systems of insurance against unemployment, and may require that the cost of any such insurance shall be borne in whole or in part by the State or any civil division thereof or by the insured or by the employer.

OLD AGE PENSIONS AND PENSIIONS FOR PHYSICAL DISABILITY.

1. The General Court shall have power to establish systems of old age pensions and of pensions for physical disability arising from any cause, and may require that the cost of any such system shall be borne in whole or in part by the State or any civil division or by the beneficiary or by the employee.

Charles G. Washburn, For the Committee.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable submitted the following minority report:

While I concur with the majority of the committee in all other respects, I feel bound to dissent from its recommendations and so it becomes my duty to state my reasons therefor.

The members of our committee were unanimous in the conclusion that if there is any doubt about the present power of the Legislature to act fully and freely in the field of social insurance, then we ought to recommend an amendment or amendments which would remove such doubt. We were also unanimous in the opinion that we should not include in such amendment or amendments any detail or specific matter which changing conditions might render of temporary application only. The power of Congress to deal as broadly as it has with interstate questions under the Federal Constitution is found in the absence of such detail and specific matter, and in the broad, general language of that instrument. Changing needs are most easily met under such a Constitution.

Therefore concurring as I do with the expressed opinions of the majority of the committee on these points, I must be consistent and make my recommendations accordingly, so I recommend the adoption of the following amendment to the Constitution:

AMENDMENT.

Full power and authority is hereby vested in the legislative department to establish any system or systems of pensions, compensation or insurance for the reward, relief or protection of any person or persons and to make any provision for such fund or funds as may be required therefor.

Respectfully submitted,

John D. W. Bodfish.

The report of the committee was considered by the Convention Thursday, June 20, 1918.

Mr. Charles G. Washburn of Worcester moved that the report be amended by substituting the following resolution (No. 382):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 The General Court shall have power to establish systems of social insurance, including old age pensions or insurance, pensions for physical disability arising from any cause, health insurance, maternity benefits, insurance against unemployment and compensation to workmen or their dependents for injuries incurred by workmen in the course of or arising out of their employment. It may provide for medical care as well as a money payment, and may require that the cost of any such system or systems shall be borne in whole or in part by the Commonwealth or any civil division thereof, or by the insured or by the employer. It may provide that claims may be adjudicated with or without a jury, and that employers contributing to the compensation of injured workmen or their dependents shall not be liable to any other claims for loss or injury.

This amendment was adopted, by a vote of 98 to 41; and, accordingly, the resolution was substituted; and it was ordered to a second reading Friday, June 21.

Mr. E. Gerry Brown of Brockton moved that the above amendment be amended by striking out, in line 4, the words “social insurance, including”.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Frank F. Dresser of Worcester moved that the report be amended (in part) by substituting the following resolution (No. 383):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 Full power and authority are hereby granted to the General Court to provide, through money payments, pensions, medical and surgical attention or otherwise, for losses caused by personal injuries or death arising out of and in the course of employment, for losses caused by unemployments, for losses otherwise arising and caused by accident, maternity, sickness, invalidity, old age or death, to any portion or all of the residents of the Commonwealth or alien dependents, payable from or provided by any fund or funds of the Commonwealth or else on systems of insurance created and administered by public or by private agencies, and 14 consisting of contributions or premiums paid by the Com-
15 monwealth, by any civil division thereof, by employers, 16 by the persons to be benefited or insured, or by any com-17 bination thereof.
18 Contributions or premiums shall n. be required from 19 employers to meet losses arising otherwise than out of the 20 employment and employers contributing to the compen-21 sation of injured workmen or their dependents shall not 22 be liable to any other claims for personal injury to them.
23 Any remedy so provided hereunder may be compulsory 24 upon the persons affected by it and claims thereunder 25 may be adjudicated with or without trial by jury.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. E. Gerry Brown moved that the above amendment be amended by striking out, in lines 11 to 17, inclusive, the words "payable from or provided by a fund or funds or system or systems of insurance created and administered by public or by private agencies, and consisting of contributions or premiums paid by the Commonwealth, by any civil division thereof, by employers, by the persons to be benefited or insured, or by any combination thereof.”

This amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. William H. Sullivan moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Dresser be amended by striking out, in line 7, the word “and”, and inserting in place thereof the word “or”.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 51 to 74.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish moved that the report be amended (in part) by the substitution of the following resolution (No. 378):

1 Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution
2 by the adoption of the subjoined

ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT.

3 Full power and authority is hereby vested in the legis-4 lative department to establish any system or systems of 5 pensions, compensation or insurance for the reward, relief
6 or protection of any person or persons, and to make any 7 provision for such fund or funds as may be required
8 therefor.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 42 to 100.

The resolution (No. 382) was read a second time Friday, July 26.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 18, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the fol-

The General Court shall have power to establish by general law any system or systems of pensions, compensation or insurance of persons for the benefit of any of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth.

This amendment was rejected, by a vote of 28 to 109.

Mr. Francis N. Bailey of Boston moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words “old age pensions or insurance,”.

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Charles G. Washburn of Worcester moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 8, the word “incurred”, and inserting in place thereof the word “received”; and by striking out, in line 10, the words “medical care”, and inserting in place thereof the words “curative treatment”.

These amendments were adopted.

Mr. Ralph L. Theller of New Bedford moved that the resolution be amended by striking out, in line 10, the words "a money payment", and inserting in place thereof the words "money payments".

This amendment was adopted.

The resolution (No. 382), as amended, was rejected Tuesday, July 30, 1918, by a vote of 43 to 107.

THE DEBATE.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: The report of the committee on Social Insurance, document No. 327, is in the hands of the members of the Convention. It considers in some detail the conclusions reached by the committee and the reasons that led to them. It will be noticed that this report deals with twenty-two resolutions, suggested to the committee, covering almost every phase of this question of social insurance.

It seems to me that a good deal of time may be saved in the consideration of this somewhat complex subject if we confine our attention to the points which are involved, and they really are only two. First, is there any doubt as to the constitutional right of the Legislature to legislate upon this class of questions? And, second, if any doubt exists, should it be removed?

It was to these two points that the committee confined itself in its deliberations, and it is to these two points that I shall confine myself in my opening statement. Upon the first point the committee reached the conclusion that doubt exists. I do not mean to enter too minutely into a discussion of each branch of this subject, as to some of which it may be conceded that the Legislature now has the right to legislate, and as to others of which it may be contended that there is doubt. But, broadly speaking, the committee reached the conclusion that there is doubt, and also the conclusion that such doubt should be removed.

It may be somewhat surprising to the members of this Convention,—it certainly was to me,—that this subject has received such exhaustive consideration at the hands of the General Court, extending over many years. Without wearying you with the details, let me briefly state the facts that, as to the subject of workmen's compensation, there was legislation in 1887, in 1903, in 1907, in 1908, in 1909 and in 1910. In 1907 a commission was appointed on old age insurance and kindred matters. The conclusions of that commission may be found in House Document No. 1400. In 1913 a commission on pensions was created. The conclusions reached may be found in House Document No. 2450. In 1914 the director of the Bureau of Statistics was required, in connection with the decennial census of 1915, to gather certain statistical information, in order that the subject of old age pensions might be considered intelligently. In 1916 a recess commission on social insurance was appointed, which reported in House Document No. 1850. In 1916 a joint special committee on workmen's compensation, insurance rates and accident prevention was appointed, whose conclusions may be found in Senate Document No. 370. In 1917 His Excellency the Governor in his Address to the Legislature urged certain forms of social insurance and recommended compulsory health insurance. And, finally, in 1917, a commission on social insurance was appointed, which confined its deliberations to problems of ill health. Its report is found in Senate Document No. 244.
I mention these various investigations for the purpose of impressing upon your minds the fact that the subject is one that frequently and seriously has engaged the attention of the Legislature and, at least in one instance, has challenged recommendations from the Governor of the Commonwealth for legislation. It seemed to the committee that it would be in the highest degree unfortunate if any conclusions reached by the General Court upon this subject, after so many years of deliberation, should be clouded by any suggestion of unconstitutionality.

The committee was not in entire accord as to the best way of expressing that conclusion in the form of an amendment to the Constitution. Some of the committee, with whom I found myself in accord, believe that one amendment, general in its scope, should be adopted, — the amendment which I have just moved and which has been read to the Convention. Others of the committee thought it would be wiser to have a separate amendment for each branch of the subject; and those of you who care to read the report will find the comprehensive single amendment which has been read from the desk, and the separate amendments, there printed. In this way the committee is able, as comprehensively as possible, to present the results of its deliberations to the Convention.

In Chapter 1 of the Constitution, dealing with the legislative power, Section 1 of Article 4, certain general powers are given to the General Court. That article was amended in 1821, Article 2, giving the General Court power to create municipal government; in 1912, giving the General Court the power to prescribe certain methods of taxation for wild lands; and it is more properly to this part of the Constitution that the amendment proposed by this committee would attach.

This is as concise a statement as I am able to make of the results of the deliberations of the committee, and its reasons for reaching them; I at this time refrain from any further comment.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: I should like to give notice of two amendments and ask that they may be printed. They deal, one with the general authority which is referred to in the resolution, and one is addressed to the special authorities; and as it is a matter of phraseology perhaps it will be convenient if they might be printed.

The only amendment moved by Mr. Dresser is cited at the beginning of the chapter.

The debate was continued Friday, June 21.

Mr. John D. W. Bodfish of Barnstable moved the amendment cited at the beginning of the chapter.

Mr. Bodfish: I would not rise to discuss this question if I did not feel that I could contribute some information to help you in determining what should be done. Yesterday we listened to the discussion of pensions under a report submitted by the committee on the Bill of Rights. That committee was concerned primarily with the anti-aid or sectarian amendment, and such attention as it gave to the question of pensions was given from the single angle of the effect of pensions upon creating special privileges and class distinction. The discussion showed that there were many phases of the question which that committee had not considered, and rightly so, because that committee was not charged with inquiring into this subject in the broad way, as has been done by the committee on Social Insurance.

As the chairman of the committee on Social Insurance pointed out to you yesterday, our committee considered the question of pensions, insurance and compensation, covering the whole field, and the result of our examination of the question ought to be of interest to you. I assume that most of you have been busy about the matters of your own committees, just as I have, and that you have not given much attention to this matter; and I trust that in the discussion I may have your attention to the end that you may get what information I am able to give. I shall not waste your time; I simply shall discuss the facts as I understand them.

Our committee came immediately to the conclusion that it was not necessary for us to consider these different propositions upon their merits. The very fact that there have been so many investigations by special commissions and recess committees of the Legislature at a great expense to the Commonwealth, and the further fact that there is more or less satisfactory legislation upon our statute-books along these lines, we took to be conclusive that legislation of this character was desirable. The first question, therefore, that we took up was whether or not the Legislature now has sufficient authority under the Constitution, as it now is, to deal with these questions in the broad way that it may deem expedient for them to be dealt with. We decided that the Legislature has not now that authority; that there is doubt as to whether such legislation, especially if compulsory, is constitutional. Accordingly we decided there was need of an amendment. You all are familiar with the constitutional argument of the right to contract freely, of taking property without due process and of exercising the taxing power for private ends. Because of the attitude of our courts and the judgments rendered by some of them and the discussions which we find in the opinions of our judges, it seems certain that there is grave doubt as to whether the Legislature can deal with these questions as changing conditions may seem to require.

Then on the question, Is it proper, is it desirable to give to the General Court, to the legislative body, this full power? our committee decided that it was; that the General Court should have full power to deal with these questions as in its wisdom it might see fit. You will find the exact language of the committee on which we were all agreed on page 3 of document No. 327. We have more confidence in the General Court than some of the members of that body who are present with us. It may be that the General Court has not done what it should have done in the past, but we are willing to trust the General Court of the future. We cannot understand the intimation made, I think by the gentleman from Somerville (Mr. Underhill), that members of the Legislature who are also members of the bar would allow themselves to be unduly influenced by our judges who but a few days ago were paragons of virtue and now are making cowards of the lawyers who happen to be in the Legislature.

So our committee came to the question of what manner or form of amendment we should offer. There were those in the committee who believed that we should offer a single amendment. There were others who believed we should offer separate amendments dealing with the various phases of this subject. I am one of those who do not believe we should submit several amendments to the people dealing with four different groups of social insurance which we now know about. Within the life of the amendments there may be a score, and why should we attempt now to limit the constitutional amendments to what we know at the present time? Besides, it seems to me that this is legislative detail, and perhaps I may be pardoned at this point if I say that I do not believe that this Constitutional Convention has been called together for the purpose of enacting or writing into the body of our fundamental law legislative matter which has failed to get by the General Court. It seems to me that that is not a constitutional function.

I call your attention now, as I have on one previous occasion, to the definition of a Constitution as laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in the opinion in the case of McCulloch v. State of Maryland, reported in 4 Wheaton, 316, which opinion is reckoned as one of the great State papers of America. In that opinion Chief Justice Marshall said in substance:

A Constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. (4 Wheaton, 316, 407.)

Keeping that in our minds let us come to the consideration of the different propositions of our committee.

You will notice that in making our report we came to no definite conclusion. We reported that we ought to do this thing or that thing, but we did not report that anything specific should be done. It was partly because of the way that the report was left by the committee that I filed a minority report recommending something definite; recommending the resolution that you find in document No. 378.

Let us consider the resolution that was moved yesterday afternoon by the delegate from Worcester, the chairman of our committee (Mr. Washburn). I call your attention to it:

The General Court shall have power to establish systems of social insurance, including old age pensions or insurance, pensions for physical disability arising from any cause, health insurance, maternity benefits, insurance against unemployment and compensation to workmen or their dependents for injuries incurred by workmen in the course of or arising out of their employment. It may provide for medical care as well as a money payment, and may require that the cost of any such system or systems shall be borne in whole or in part by the Commonwealth or any civil division thereof, or by the insured or by the employer. It may provide that claims may be adjudicated with or without a jury, and that employers contributing to the compensation of injured workmen or their dependents shall not be liable to any other claims for loss or injury.

What is social insurance? Who knows? Why invite litigation by using a term that has not been defined when a broader term will do? Why should we specify six kinds of social insurance when in the lifetime of the amendment there may be, as I have said, a score? It seems to me, that this is going into legislative detail.

On this point I call your attention to the Federal Constitution, Article 1, section 8, the commerce clause: "The Congress shall have power" (among other things) "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" — just a few short words, and yet see what has been accomplished under that commerce clause; everything from regulation of the railways to the white slave traffic. Suppose the men who drafted the Federal Constitution had undertaken at that time to define the term "commerce among the States," how far short the most far sighted of them must have fallen of what actually has developed. The very strength of the Federal Constitution lies in its simplicity and brevity. Why, then, should we, in amending the Constitution of Massachusetts, write it full of legislative detail, write it full of definitions which to-day may be correct and to-morrow not? Why should we talk about medical attendance as well as money payments in a constitutional amendment? Why should we attempt to say that claims may be adjudicated with or without a jury in an amendment dealing with social insurance? That is essentially a question of judicial procedure. Why do we deal with it here? It seems to me that that amendment cannot prevail; it seems to me that it ought not to.

Now I call your attention to the amendment which I have offered, — only a few words:

Full power and authority are hereby vested in the legislative department to establish any system or systems of pensions, compensation or insurance for the reward, relief or protection of any person or persons, and to make any provision for such fund or funds as may be required therefor.

It seems to me that something like that is what we want. It clearly will be evident to you that in drafting this resolution I have taken my committee at its word when they say in almost exact language on page 3: "We believe that full power should be given to the General Court to deal with these questions as in its wisdom it may see fit." I have taken them at their word. It is my conclusion, it is the conclusion of the full committee. Why not, then, draft a resolution as broad as that conclusion? That is what I have aimed to do, and the form is the form which is followed in article 4 of section 1 of chapter 1 of part second of our Constitution, where powers are conferred upon the General Court, and the same form that is followed in the amendments of that article, amendments 2, 41 and 44. I have used the words "legislative department" tentatively because I did not know whether the term "General Court" was the proper one at the present time with the initiative and referendum amendment pending as we have reported it. I have used the terms "pensions," "insurance," "compensation," for those cover every phase of the question. And I have used those terms without qualification or restriction.

You will notice that I have used the words "reward, relief or protection." Protection is of course the object of compensation, such as is provided in the Workmen's Compensation Act. Relief is of course the primary object of pensions.

Mr. Washburn: I notice that the resolution reported by the committee is limited in terms to some form of social insurance, whereas, as he says, the amendment which the gentleman is now advocating is unrestricted. It provides for any system of pension or compensation. Does he not think that his resolution is repugnant to the resolution which was passed yesterday to its third reading, the resolution reported by the committee on the Bill of Rights?

Mr. Bodfish: It was my intention to deal with that point in a few moments. If I fail I wish the gentleman would call my attention to it again. I was discussing the terms used in Convention Document No.
378, in the resolution which I have moved as an amendment, and I had got as far as the words "reward, relief or protection." I had stated that the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act was protection. The purpose of a pension primarily is relief.

It may be well for us to consider at this time a matter which was raised yesterday when we were discussing document No. 308 and the amendments to it. It was evident that the purpose, the primary purpose, of pensions, has been exceeded by the General Court, and they have gone beyond the province of relief into the province of gift. In the case of Lowell v. Boston, reported in the 111th Massachusetts Reports 454, the statement is made that "an appropriation of money raised by taxation by way of gifts to an individual for his own private use exclusively is clearly an excess of legislative power." If that be so it may well be that the pensions which we now are paying to our judges, and perhaps to some others, would be found to be unconstitutional, if the cases ever were tried out. But it is well for us to remember that pensions are given primarily for relief, and that is the reason why, I take it, the committee on Bill of Rights in its report has attempted to limit pensions, — because they have gone beyond the province of relief.

I favored the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Winchester (Mr. Dutch) because it recognizes this character of pensions, just as did the report of the committee on Bill of Rights. It seemed to me, however, that one of the provisions in his amendment was better than the provision in the amendment of the committee on Bill of Rights, namely, leaving the amount of such relief, by way of pension to which the beneficiary had not contributed, to be fixed according to the needs of the person, and not attempting to name an arbitrary figure, which to-day might be adequate and to-morrow inadequate. But I concede that there is some danger in this; and I am ready to concede that pensions which the beneficiary gets without any contribution on his part, whether he has been a careful and thrifty man or whether he has been a spendthrift, — should be limited. I am willing to concede perhaps that he ought not to receive anything more than the necessaries of life, while the man who, perhaps, has been more thrifty, and who has provided for the future by way of contributing to some sort of insurance, ought to be allowed to have more. I can conceive that it would be a tremendous burden upon the Commonwealth if pensions were given to everybody in excess of his actual needs.

I call your attention to the fact that now society is charged with giving to all of its unfortunates, and those who may be in need, sufficient for their needs. That is a duty which society long has recognized. That is not a duty which we can avoid in this Convention. It is a duty which every Christian Nation, and every other nation that is at all humane, recognized long ago, not only because it is a duty to do it for the persons who need it, but it is the best safeguard for society itself; for so long as any in our society receive less than their needs they to that extent are less efficient, and can contribute less to the public than they otherwise could. So it is a matter of self-preservation for the public to give to those in need and see that they have their needs met.

I am quite ready to concede also that the Convention may think that it is wise to fix an arbitrary sum and not leave it to the General Court; and if that seems wise to the Convention I submit that we can do that easily by taking this great general proposition which is embodied in my amendment and attaching to it a limitation to that extent. For instance, something like this: But no such system shall be established providing for the payment of more than $1,000, if you choose to fix the amount, or more than what may be needed to meet the necessities of the beneficiary, if you choose to leave it open, to any person who is in the public employment, except perhaps your war veterans and those who have contributed. That is what the gentleman from Boston in charge of the report of document No. 308 (Mr. W. H. Sullivan), had in mind, and that could be effected without repeating nine or ten lines from the Constitution. There is no need for that. We know the purpose of our constitutional amendments, and of our Constitution. It is to get justice between man and man and to prevent class distinctions, and we do not need to repeat it more than once in our Constitution. It seems to me that could be handled easily by attaching a limitation of that kind, if the Convention sees fit, to the proposition which I have put before you.

The only limitation which appears in the resolution which I have offered is simply this: . . . “of any person or persons.” It excludes property, and insurance of property is not in the province of social insurance, and should be excluded. It leaves the provision for establishing a fund entirely to the Legislature. What is the use for us to say that the Legislature may do it in this way or that way or the other way? Why not leave it to them to do it in any one of the ways they see fit, without naming those ways?

Last of all, I avoid any reference to the adjudication of the claims, with or without a jury. It does not seem to me that it is wise to deal with this question here.

One other word I wish to call to your attention, and that is the word “reward,”—“for the reward, relief or protection.” It seems to me that it is important that we give the General Court power to reward those who have given good service, either on the bench, in time of war, or in conflagration, or in any other dangerous position. If they have given good service to the Commonwealth it seems to me that we ought to leave the question open as to whether or not they have been fully paid. It may be that such people, as they advance in years, may be without the means of support, or they may be in need of more than they have. It seems to me only fair and proper that the Commonwealth should continue in the future, as it has in the past, in rewarding those who have rendered good service to it.

So I trust that the amendment, worded as I have worded it, in the main may be substituted for the report of the committee, which recommends nothing, as you will notice; and then changes may be made to make it meet our desires. I do not for a moment consider it to be perfect; but I submit to you it is a hundred times more perfect than the other proposition,—the other general proposition, submitted by the chairman of our committee. I do not think we want to go into all that detail. But it seems to me that we must adopt some amendment of this kind.

It would be exceedingly unfortunate if the Convention failed to recommend some broad and simple amendment for adoption by the people, covering this great field of social insurance, which daily is becoming more and more complex and as to which more and more problems are being raised every hour because of the conditions incident to our industrial centers. It seems to me, when we consider that our population is moving rapidly into the cities and rapidly leaving the farms, rapidly becoming dwellers in tenements rather than in their own homes, that we ought to leave the Legislature free to act upon these questions as changing conditions from time to time may show is wise and expedient.

I am deeply interested in every subject before this Convention, but naturally enough perhaps, this is one of those subjects which lie nearest to my heart; for I know by personal experience and actual contact something of the suffering and the sorrow of the unfortunate and the poor. I know many times they are not to blame, as some contend. I know there are those among us who contend that every man is the architect of his own fortune or misfortune. That is not true, and we ought to give our General Court the necessary power to help those who need help, so they may save their self-respect. I recall the words of the gentleman from Quincy (Mr. Blackmur) who, speaking on another question, said that not one in ten could meet the added burden of sickness and pay the expenses. He said they would promise to do so to keep off the poor books, but they could not do it.

Therefore it seems to me, if not one in ten can look out for the future, that we ought to leave the General Court with power enough to meet any such situation. Therefore I hope the substitute I have offered will prevail. I thank you. [Applause].

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: The chairman of the committee on Social Insurance and the member who last spoke have outlined very clearly the subject which is before us for discussion. This is not a matter of legislation or discussion of the details of any of these supposed insurance matters. The report of the committee shows how vast that subject is. It has been in the minds of the Legislature and of special committees for some years, and neither in Massachusetts nor in any other State of the Union have any of these proposals as yet been adopted.

There are two questions, as the chairman has said. In the first place, is there any doubt as to the constitutionality of any of the proposed schemes? And, if there be doubt as to any of them, should that doubt be removed? I should like to address myself, if I may, to each of those questions.

In the first place, we have under our system a written guarantee, protected by the courts that we have established, of security to life and liberty and property; but the man’s liberty is controlled, and his property is held at the disposal of the State for its public uses, and of the State for its public welfare, under the police power. The constitutional doubt concerning any one of these questions is found in the midway, if I may say so,—the balance to be preserved,—between a valid exercise of the police power, or of the taxing power, on the one hand, and the security in the private rights of freedom of action and of property, on the other.

We have seen, very rapidly in the last few years, an extension in the view of what is a public use and what is a proper exercise of the police power. This power has been defined and its flexibility stated, perhaps as broadly as possible, by Mr. Justice Holmes, in the Noble State Bank case, and I should like to call that to your attention, because that definition seems to me to lie at the basis of the constitutionality of all of these proposals. He said:

It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare.

Now, adopting that idea as an existing and proper constitutional basis, I should like to test the validity of these different forms of insurance, which cover all the vicissitudes of a reasonably active life, from a few weeks before the cradle to a few days after the funeral. They are these: Maternity benefits, sickness insurance, accident insurance, invalidity insurance, old age pensions and death benefits. I leave out in that enumeration two other things which are not social insurance. Workmen’s compensation is not social insurance, and unemployment is not social insurance. Those are systems of law or of regulation applying solely to rights attaching to a status in a community,—the status of employer and employee.

Mr. Bodfish: Will the gentleman tell me where there is any authoritative definition of social insurance?

Mr. Dresser: There is no such definition, and that is one reason why I object both to the member’s amendment and to the amendment proposed by the committee. We must not enact here so vague a phrase as “social insurance,” which varies in all our minds.

Mr. Bodfish: I should like to ask the gentleman where he finds any reference to “social insurance” in my amendment.

Mr. Dresser: Perhaps I am misinformed; I have not the amendment before me. I beg the member’s pardon; he did not use “social insurance.” He used “systems of pensions, compensation or insurance.” The committee, however, did so.

Now, perhaps it will be necessary to describe a little bit what have been thought to be the proper schemes under these different insurances. Let us take the first one, of maternity insurance. The proposal there has been generally that a woman should receive proper medical care before and after childbirth, and that if she is of small financial resources some payment should be made to her for a few weeks, to allow her to take the rest necessary, and to give her and to give the child a fair start in the world. At present we have adopted two statutes which are along that line. One is the provision that no woman shall work,—be employed,—for a period before and after childbirth. The other, which is along the line, is our system of mothers’ pensions. We have declared as the policy of the State, so far as we can, that a child shall come into the world under proper conditions and shall be protected. I have very little doubt that if it were desirable to provide that the woman in such condition should have medical attention, and should have a payment which would allow her to give up her occupation, it may be done now as incidental to the protection of the public health and of the children who are the wards of the State. So far as maternity insurance, payable by the State or by the municipality, as widows’ pensions now are payable, is concerned, it is incidental, I think, to the protection of the public health and does not require an amendment to the Constitution to permit it.

Next is the vexed subject of health insurance, or sickness insurance, which has been debated before two recess committees, in 1917 and 1918, and which has been argued vigorously in California and in New York and some other States. That proposition, as it has appeared in this country, is this: That employees suffering or disabled by any illness or by any accident, for a limited period of time,—twenty-six weeks, I think,—shall be compensated, or, rather, not compensated, but shall receive a proportion of their wages, and shall receive medical care. That has been proposed generally through the means of a fund made up of contributions by the State, by the employers and by the workers. It has been adopted in England, with a little different proportion of contributions. It took its rise in Germany, where the State contributed nothing. The cost of that, as it has been proposed in Massachusetts, is $24,000,000 a year.

The effect of it is to provide care and payment for illness, however caused, or accident however caused. The man whose illness is caused or increased by venereal disease, whose injury is caused by slipping or by a trolley car or by falling down the cellar stairs, draws upon the fund. That proposal has not been adopted anywhere in this country. Some of those losses can be compensated to-day; some of them cannot. Losses through illness or accident which occur in an employment and which arise out of the employment can be compensated; and in Massachusetts alone, of all the States in this country,—with the exception I believe of California, which lately has passed an act,—such illness losses to-day are compensated. So that whatever illness, sickness or accident is due in any traceable degree to the employment is now compensated here.

But the proponents of health insurance wish to go further, and provide not only that whatever loss is due to the employment of a cook or a farmer or a machinist or a bank clerk shall be compensated, but that all their losses shall be. Now, when you pass beyond the connection between cause and result, when you say that a payment shall be made by anybody, State or city or employer, for a loss for which there is not a responsibility traceable to him, you are then offering the property of the individual and the property of the State, as it is collected from the individual, by way of vicarious atonement for all the ills of the community. That cannot be done, in my opinion, under our present Constitution. And therefore so far as health insurance is concerned, or accident insurance is concerned, for which an employer now is not responsible in some degree, as he now is responsible in some degree,—so far as that is concerned, there must be, to permit it in this State, a constitutional amendment.

One form of health insurance is called invalidity insurance, and the same considerations apply to it that I have just stated as to health insurance. The distinction is simply between the acute and the chronic disease. A man who is suffering from an incurable disease would go on the invalidity pension fund. A man with cancer or crippled with rheumatism, from whatever cause, would go to this other fund for invalidity. But the constitutional considerations are the same. If that invalidity was occasioned by his employment, or occasioned by any cause, any traceable cause, it is compensated now; but if it is not traceable to any cause for which an individual or a municipality is responsible, it is not compensated now, and if it should be, an amendment is necessary.
There is one consideration about these proposals: The attempt, of course, is to distribute the losses which are common to all persons, high or low, rich or poor, employed or unemployed, through the community. All losses are not so distributed under any proposal, because they say that is impracticable, and therefore a limit of earning power, a class of wage-earners must be created, who shall be so protected. They select wage-earners,— by "they" I speak generally of persons who advise the English scheme or the German scheme or the scheme proposed here,— they select wage-earners because no other group can be reached and regulated and checked up. People in the same economic condition who do not happen to be employed, the small farmer, the shopkeeper, the truck man, the charwoman, anybody who is running his own business and is not an employee, is not protected; with the result that in England, where 65 per cent of the population are in the same economic condition, only 30 per cent have the benefits of health insurance. The number in Germany is a little over 30 per cent. In Denmark it is 30.5 per cent, in France it is 10 per cent, and in Belgium it is 6 per cent, who have the benefit.

Who pays the cost? Any one of these insurances comes back in taxes, either direct taxes or indirect taxes, to the individual consumer.

Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester if, in giving these figures of the percentage of people who benefit, it is compulsory in those countries or whether they go into it of their own volition? Is it compulsory for the workers or those who are beneficiaries, or can they go into it of their own will? If it is not compulsory a smaller number might participate in the benefits.

Mr. Dresser: It is not compulsory in France, where there is 10 per cent, though there are some funds which I understand are aided by the government. In Belgium it is not compulsory, where the proportion is 6 per cent, where also there is some outside aid. In England and in Germany and in Austria, and, if I recollect at the moment, in Denmark, though I am not quite certain about Denmark, where the proportion of the people benefited is 30 per cent, it is compulsory, but it is limited to wage-earners.

Now, the attempt is made, in the proposals in this country, to allow also voluntary insurance, so that the small farmer or the self-employed or the worker of high earnings can come under the scheme; but the administrative difficulties of that are very great, and whether it would result in a larger proportion or not cannot be told.

The point, however, is this: That in attempting to relieve or to distribute the loss of one group in the community you are making, through the indirect cost, another group in the same economic condition pay the bill. If the farmer, under health insurance or under invalidity insurance, is required, as he would be required, to contribute two-fifths of the cost for his two or three employees, that is bound to reflect itself in the price of milk. He passes it on, as any industry passes on such costs as it may; with the result that the quart of milk, which thus costs a bit more, is purchased both by the insured and by the uninsured, and you have one section of the community bearing the burdens of the other, so that the total amount of poverty or loss is not relieved. It is not primarily a question of reaching the rich man.

Death benefits stand also on the same constitutional basis as health insurance or invalidity insurance. So far as death is due to any traceable cause, responsible cause, it can be paid for now. So far as it comes from natural conditions it cannot be paid for. And there, again, is the change in the social viewpoint which must be reflected in a constitutional amendment if that change is desired.

Mr. Herbert A. Kenny of Boston: Does not the community now, in the way of pauper institutions and almshouses,—in that form are they not indirectly taxed, and do they not already pay for the infirmities of this group of which you speak, and would not this system of insurance make it less humiliating to them, to hand them that money, rather than put them into pauper institutions and almshouses?

Mr. Dresser: That is a rather difficult question to answer. If I remember, in Arizona two or three years ago there was presented and carried by the people an initiative petition establishing a system of old age pensions, based on the theory that thereby the almshouses would be emptied, and the initiative petition accordingly provided that the almshouses should be sold. That was carried by the kind-hearted people of Arizona, and as a result they started to sell the almshouses, when they discovered that the almshouses were not filled by the old people who were going to be benefitted under the pensions. They were filled by deserted children, they were filled by incompetents, and, the question being tested under the Arizona Constitution, the court held the law was invalid. That, I believe, is the only attempt to pass an old age pension in the country, so far as I am aware.

But it is not true, I think, that there is any substitution of the people now cared for. We always have got to care for our poor. We do. We always have got to make certain that the person whose resources are such that he cannot carry his own weight shall be cared for. We must give him medical care through our hospitals. We must provide for his existence.

But the question is not a question of pauper legislation. Pauper legislation is constitutional. We do not treat this as pauper legislation. It is aiding the person who does not have perhaps quite enough, but who is not a pauper, and thus is a redistribution of property, and that is, I think, the real question.

Now, with reference to the old age pension, that is an entirely distinct subject from what was under debate yesterday. The questions that we debated yesterday were service pensions.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: Will the gentleman, before he passes to the topic which he now is taking up, enlarge a little bit upon what he means by redistribution of property?

Mr. Dresser: I mean this: That if one penny is taken from me, or if my liberty of action is controlled in any degree, for a cause for which I am not measurably responsible, traceably responsible, then that is distributing my property to somebody else.

Now, it becomes a question of responsibility. Perhaps we all are our brother’s keepers. If that is the principle of our social system, then it follows that there is no distribution of property because it is not mine. If we are not, if it is our theory that we shall be permitted to guide our own lives, to acquire if we can a competence and to pass it on, so long as we interfere with the rights of no other, so long as we pay for what we cause, then I think there is a distribution.

Mr. Brown: I should like to ask the gentleman if the opposite of the proposition is true, in this way: If society has taken something from somebody without rendering an equivalent, has that somebody a claim on society to be reimbursed?

Mr. Dresser: Well, that is an assumption which I am not sure that I follow, — whether society has taken anything from anybody. It seems to me that the view is that society has given things to people. It has given the individual a chance to make his way, it has given him a chance to live his life. That is a very great boon; and thus it seems to me to be perhaps that the grantor is not the individual.

The service pension may be desirable in order to attract men to the employment, in order to keep them, and in order to retire them. That is a purely business proposition. The old age pension is not that. It is either a pauper measure or, as the gentleman who last spoke would say, a restoring to the man of something that during his life had been taken from him. Or it may be a third thing, a reward. I will not take the time to follow out those theories, but any one of them it seems to me requires a constitutional amendment to make possible, unless it be the pure question of pauper relief.

What I have tried to set out is that to-day, so far as these systems of so-called social insurance are concerned, there is a need for a constitutional amendment if the theory of personal responsibility is to be forsaken, and if instead there is to be a community fund collected from all sources and distributed to a portion of the people.

The workmen’s compensation system and the system of unemploy-ment insurance, however, have a definite basis of responsibility and affect a certain legal relation, and that is why they have been held valid. I think some time ago I stated to the Convention my belief that under the Constitution of Massachusetts as it stands to-day a compulsory workmen’s compensation act is valid, and I will not go into that argument further. If it is constitutional, and if the payments which are made under it are, as I believe them to be, a license or a tax, then the agency which shall distribute those payments, whether it be the employer himself, whether it be a private insurance company or whether it be a State fund, is at the will of the Legislature. It can direct what shall be done with that tax. Therefore there is in my opinion no reason and no need for a constitutional amendment to make a compulsory workmen’s compensation act, or even a State fund under it, valid to-day in Massachusetts.

Mr. Bodfish: If the compulsory workmen’s compensation acts would not be constitutional under the Constitution at present, would not the pending amendment permit them to be made compulsory?

Mr. Dresser: It would, but that suggests one of the virtues of our system of government. I believe that the fairest way and the best way to get any law is to try to work it out, retaining and within our constitutional guarantees, until we find we cannot. It may delay, it cannot be done in a year, it may not be done in three years, but if one tries and tries again perhaps it may be done. Take the income tax legislation, for example. It went, if I recall at the moment, three times in different forms to the court before it was certain that a constitutional amendment was necessary. Now, let us work this out, and if we can we shall be as sure as possible that all rights are protected. If we find it cannot be done then is the time to ask for constitutional change. We never have tested a compulsory workmen’s compensation act in Massachusetts, but a compulsory workmen’s compensation act has been held valid in some other States and by the United States Supreme Court.

There was one other insurance, that of unemployment. It is a loss to the community when business conditions close down mills and throw workmen out of employment. It is a thing which comes without the fault of the workman, which comes without the fault of the employer. It has in it the basis upon which insurance can be built, and being purely a master and servant hazard I see no difficulty, no constitutional difficulty, in adopting a plan if it could be worked out practically, which should distribute or insure that loss which both parties to the relation suffer. I speak simply of the constitutional question. That limits the need, if my reasoning is sound, of constitutional change to a grant of power to provide for losses for which there is no definite responsibility; that is, where all property theoretically is turned into a fund to be distributed to a part of the community. Now, we must preserve the theory of responsibility, for this reason: You cannot cure an evil unless you find who is responsible for it. Preventive work in health or in accident or in any other way is not accomplished unless you first find the human agency that is doing harm and then assess it, and that is the theory on which we have proceeded hitherto. The mass of health regulations, of safety regulations in Massachusetts are all directed toward the person who, in violating them, may be responsible for the loss, and that has been one of the reasons why our death rates, our sickness, even our accident rates in well-conducted mills, have been decreased. So that there is the practical objection in this community insurance, if I may so phrase it, that it does not work as a matter of prevention, because responsibility is obscured.

Mr. Harriman: Before the gentleman leaves the question of unemployment, I should like to ask if he has any particular theory as to the cause of unemployment. What is the cause of unemployment?

Mr. Dresser: I have no theory about it. I have tried to show in what respects the proposed amendment is unnecessary and in what respect it changes our principles. It is said frequently in the Convention here: "Well, let us pass the resolution and leave it to be acted upon or not in the wisdom of the Legislature." I protest against that attitude. These amendments are enacting a new social theory. They should be adopted only if we understand the theory and are willing ourselves to adopt it. We might just as well present a resolution that the Ten Commandments be abrogated, altered or repealed, in the judgment of the Legislature. We might say: "Why, the Legislature won't do it, and perhaps the people won't pass it," but we certainly have attacked one of the cornerstones nevertheless. Therefore the suggestion of the committee, that there may be doubt and that possibly that doubt should be removed, is, it seems to me, of critical importance and danger in dealing with this type of question, which changes so substantially our social theory.

I have moved an amendment which is document No. 383 in substitution of the amendment of Mr. Washburn of Worcester, which is No. 382. The differences are very slight, but I think they are important. In document No. 382 the draft is to establish "systems of social insurance," including various things. I have left out the phrase "systems of social insurance," which seems to me to be too vague for constitutional action, and have tried to list the losses, all the losses, that have been suggested that we should care for. It seems also to be desirable that there should be open in the amendment the possibility or suggestion that public or private agencies may conduct these funds. Undoubtedly some of this business can be done better by a private agency, by mutual insurance or stock insurance, than by city insurance or by State insurance. I do not know. Let the field be open.

I think, for the sake of clearness, it ought to appear, as in the 16th and 17th lines of my suggestion, that there shall be possible a combination of contributors, so that the Legislature shall be free there. Also it ought to be made certain that the cause, that I have spoken of so frequently, should be defined, and therefore there is a change between the chairman's draft and my draft in this respect. Instead of saying "accidents arising out of or in the course of employment" I have adopted what is now the law and what hereafter should be the law: "arising out of and in the course of employment." In Japan their compensation act allows recovery for a person who may have felt the pains of approaching illness outside the mill gates but actually became sick when he got within the employment. To adopt the words "arising out of or" instead of "arising out of and" uses the fact of employment merely as a pretense on which to hang liability where the employment as such has nothing to do with it, — has no responsibility for the loss.

Those I think are the only changes; but it seems to me that in so serious a matter as this, if any amendment is to be adopted, — and perhaps I need hardly say that from my view of the law and of what we ought to do no amendment should be adopted, but if any amendment is to be adopted, — it should be as clear, perhaps, as possible. [Applause.]

Mr. Lynch of Milford: I should like to ask the delegate from Worcester if, following the explanation he already has given, he will not go on and explain from line 23 to line 25. As I understood you, it was your opinion that there was no need of any further delegation of authority to the Legislature for the compelling of the workmen's compensation law; that the Legislature now has that power. I want to know whether or not there is anything of that nature in your last three lines.

Mr. Dresser: It is my opinion that the Legislature has now that power, but those last three lines are put in to give it the power in case my opinion should be wrong. That is, document No. 383 is an attempt to wipe away every barrier to working out systems for the various insurances, but to preserve the suggestion that they may be carried by public or by private agencies, and that employment as such shall not be a pretense for payment.

Mr. Walker of Brookline: I should like to have the gentleman elucidate a little more fully just what effect the change of the word "or" to "and" has. What class of accidents would be eliminated by putting the word "and" in that would not be eliminated if the word "or" were left in, in line 7?

Mr. Dresser: The "course of employment" means simply the period during which a contract of hiring exists. I go to work at seven o'clock in the morning and get through at six o'clock at night, and during those hours I am in "the course of the employment." Now, anything may happen to me during that time! I am struck by lightning, I am stabbed by an employee with whom I have a quarrel. In Massa-husetts, where disease is compensated, I drop from heart failure. Each one of those things has happened in "the course of the employment," and therefore, if the law so read, would be compensated. But no one of those things "arose out of the employment." The employment did not send the lightning. The employment did not weaken my heart. The employment did not cause the fellow I was struggling with to stab me. Therefore those particular things, not arising out of the employment, are not compensated to-day,—I speak broadly;—and of course ought not to be. Industry did not bring the lightning. And therefore it is necessary, in order to fix responsibility, that the thing to be paid for, whether it be disease or accident, be something that industry has had a part in causing; that it happened, not only during the period of the employment, but that to a measurable degree it was caused by the employment. That is the reason for the change from "or" to "and," and it is an important reason.

Mr. Mansfield of Boston: The gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) appears to have been very careful in the choice of his phraseology. I should like to ask him to address his attention to lines 20, 21 and 22 in Convention Document No. 383, and to suggest this possible example to him as bearing upon the meaning of the language which he so carefully has chosen. Suppose that an employer either during business hours or after business hours should be making his way home through the streets of the city in his automobile, and should run over and cause personal injury to an employee or to a minor child, a dependent child of an employee. Or suppose that during any time, during a strike or otherwise, or during working hours or out of working hours, an employee should enter into a personal altercation with an employee, or the dependent wife or child of an employee, and during the course of it should cause personal injury to that employee. Is not the language contained in those three lines so comprehensive that it would debar and prevent a workman, or the dependent of a workman, from making any claim on account of the personal injury caused in that manner?

Mr. Dresser: It would not. The employment ceases, the responsibility of the industry ceases when the hour of work is over. To take one of the examples, because I think they all rest on the same basis, if the employer driving from his mill runs over his employee in the street, the relationship at that moment of employer and employee does not in law exist. It is the act of one individual as against the other.

Mr. Mansfield: My suggestion, or possibly my criticism, if it may be so regarded, is based upon the fact that nothing is contained in line 22 which refers to the matter of employment or which necessarily is correlated to the relationship of employment stated in the earlier part of this resolution, but the language is so broad that it might include a claim for personal injury of any nature. The language is: "shall not be liable to any other claims for personal injuries". It does not say "arising out of the employment", and it seems to me that that inference is not necessarily attached to that phrase.

Mr. Dresser: I hardly think it would be so construed. The word "workman" is there, but if there were any chance of such construction it certainly should be corrected. That is not the intention, and any amendment which would save the point which has been raised certainly should be made. I have not assumed that there was any doubt about it, and do not now, but it should be taken care of if there be a doubt.

Mr. Coleman of Boston: I think we all understand that this whole subject of social insurance is one that is relatively new to legislators, and to the people as well, and that this is a matter on which no one as yet is very much of an expert, because the conditions already are intricate and complex and they are changing constantly. When we look over the field of thought and activity in relation to this subject concerning the last ten years, we see how public opinion has developed with reference to it and how the machinery and methods for meeting the necessities also have been developing. Certainly one looking into the future in the light of the great changes that are taking place in the world to-day must realize that during the next ten years a great many more changes will take place in the development of public opinion and in the invention of machinery for meeting these needs that are coming more and more clearly to light. It seems to me that it would be a very great mistake to attempt to write into the Constitution at the present time the details that are attempted in the amendment which is reported by the committee. It evidently is not altogether satisfactory to themselves, for they already are making amendments to it. The proposition presented in the minority report by the delegate on my left (Mr. Bodfish) is so simple, so comprehensive, so sound and so definite that it provides for the situation as it is to-day and for the situation as it may become in the next ten or fifteen years. It seems to be wholly in line with the general principle that should govern us in all our deliberations with reference to amending the Constitution, namely, to stick as closely as possible to broad and general principles and to avoid as much as possible details and intricacies. It seems to me that we would be on very much safer ground if we stuck to the simple, broad, general principle outlined by the delegate from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish).

Mr. Cox of Boston: In the resolution moved by the chairman of the committee I find the words “to establish systems of social insurance”, and also the word “insurance” is used in other places in the resolution. At the same time the resolution provides for the establishment of pensions, old age pensions and pensions for physical disability from any cause and pensions on account of health, covering, it seems to me, all cases for which pensions can be conceived. In the minority amendment offered by the member in this division (Mr. Bodfish) we find the words “any system or systems of pension compensation or insurance for reward, relief or protection of any person or persons.” Relief or protection! I call attention to those words. I think at least one of the amendments offered by the member in the third division (Mr. Dresser), I refer to Convention Document No. 383, —strangely enough has the caption “To establish systems of social insurance”, although I understood the author to protest when he was upon his feet that he objected to writing into the Constitution so broad a phrase as the term “social insurance.”

The point which I wish to call to the attention of the Convention at this time is that we have here in all these propositions inextricably involved the idea of pensions and of insurance. Now, it occurs to me that they are subjects which should be kept apart. Insurance involves a totally different set of principles and ideas than do pensions. In furtherance of that point, I submit for your attention Convention Document No. 319. I do not know whether or not all the members here are familiar with that. I presume the members of the committee on Public Affairs are familiar with it. But no attention has been called yet to that document, although it is on our calendar for to-day under the number 150. The member who has in charge No. 319 is not present, and I presume is not likely to be present during our deliberations on this matter, and I do not know,—I did not know,—to what other member of that committee to apply to obtain their opinion with reference to that document. But by referring to that document you will see that it is a constitutional amendment to provide for the State taking up any system of insurance, and it is very broad and very comprehensive and would cover, except for the limitation which is provided therein, anything which possibly could be provided by the resolution offered by the majority of the committee or the minority of the committee on Social Welfare with regard to insurance, for it says definitely that, the sharing or equalization of risks by means of insurance being a matter of public interest, the General Court may provide for insurance of any and all kinds by the Commonwealth; but the liability of the Commonwealth for risks and losses shall be limited to the funds derived from such insurance.

Without taking up the time of the Convention this morning to urge the Convention to adopt any ideas of mine with reference to insurance or with reference to pensions, it seems to me that the Convention should have in mind when acting upon this matter the resolution to which I have called your attention, No. 319, and there should be some consideration paid to the question of pensions on the one hand and of insurance on the other, and the views of the members should be ascertained as to whether you are going to permit at this time the State to go into any and all kinds of insurance without any limitations at all as to how the funds for that insurance shall be demanded and collected by the Commonwealth or its subdivisions, or whether you are going to leave that wide open so that insurance may become a gratuity in every sense to any particular class or division or group of people whom you may select for your gratuity, as you may for a pension. Pensions, as we understand it, usually are given for some reason closely allied with the police power or the social welfare power of the State, and not with merely business and economic reasons, upon which insurance can depend wholly for its function.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: I desire to offer an amendment to document No. 383, to strike out the words "payable from or provided by", and also lines 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18; in document No. 382, offered by Mr. Washburn of Worcester, to strike out, in the fourth line, the words "social insurance, including", and in document No. 384, offered by Mr. Dresser, to insert after the word "may", in line 9, "or may not."

The Presiding Officer: The Chair does not understand that document No. 384 has been moved yet.

Mr. Brown: Very well, sir, then I cannot attempt to amend something that is not before the Convention. But there are two documents which I assume are before the Convention, Nos. 382 and 383, and I would say the effect of the amendment is to strike out the suggestion that pensions or gratuities or rewards are to come through a system of contribution. The amendment opens that whole question as to whether we shall provide that pensions may be given either with or without contributions.

As an explanation of my stating yesterday or the day before that the only opportunity you would have to introduce this question was in the matter then pending, I would say that I did not discover anything about pensions on the calendar. I was misled by this word "social" insurance.

I want, in what little time before adjournment I have got, to address myself to this question which I asked the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser): Is a pension a gratuity? Does it take something from the wealthy and bestow it upon the working-man as a gratuity? I think I speak for the working-men that in that case they do not want it; it is undemocratic, it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. Pensions must be granted on some other theory than that, and I think the theory of labor men is plain. I ask anybody in this Convention, all are conversant with the history of Massachusetts,—was there not a time in this Commonwealth when there were no millionaires and no paupers? Was there not a time when the suggestion of a poorhouse carried with it unmistakably,—and it did all through the old New England days,—that if a man went to a poorhouse it was a direct reflection upon him; that he himself had been responsible for his condition? I say that period extended over quite a number of years, and what we ought to discover here is: Has there been such a distinct change in conditions that we have got to engraft something new on our system? And, secondly, if there is a change, who is responsible for that change? Is it the individual working-man, or is it society? My contention would be that it is society, and that society, having committed an injury, is called upon to make good in the shape of a pension.

Now for some authority. Adam Smith, writing in 1776, said that only three men out of a hundred men failed to make a success in business. That is in his "Wealth of Nations." He goes so far as to explain that at least two of these three were in some way responsible for their failure, and brings down to the very small minority of one in one hundred who failed in business. Well, if you examine the records, which any one can do, you will find that a certain amount of industry and frugality led to the certainty that a man could pass from being an employee to being an employer. Statistics show that 75 per cent of our American people up to the time of the civil war were their own employers; they were so far independent of others that they were not obliged to bend the knee in any way in order to get a living. Examine to-day and you will find the situation is reversed. The number of our American people who are their own employers, who are free and independent, who have got that freedom which undoubtedly is contemplated in our institutions, the freedom which was contemplated by the founders of our government, is not 25 per cent of the whole.

Now, something has happened, and it is because that something has happened that you have the prevailing unrest; the possibility of remedying that seats us in this Convention. Let us suppose, for instance, that all the people are employed in the old-fashioned way. Each man is practically a producer and his own distributor. He manufactures his article and he carries it to the consumer, and he obtains the product of his toil. Under such a system, which once obtained in our Commonwealth, the able lawyer, the respected squire, was a man who not only studied the law but he also was obliged to labor on his farm. It was the same with the good old minister; he often was farming; and it was so with the village doctor, who would saddle the horse and with medicine bags ride out to minister to those who had called him. You might enlarge that picture. But I am presenting an example of the social democracy which once prevailed in this country, especially in Massachusetts. It was the outgrowth of such a direct expression of the institutions which our forefathers sought to found. All the way from the beginning down to 1820, 1830, 1840, down through to 1845, and almost up to the time of the civil war,—there was depression, of course,—but all through that period you saw coming out of our system of government such a system of social welfare, such a system of distribution of wealth in proportion to its production that the producer who earned it received the proceeds of his creation. It certainly was socially beautiful. It is worthy of study. A man can have a peaceful few minutes if, in passing through the roadways of our good old Massachusetts, he can turn back, and in fancy see the conditions under which a summer afternoon like this would be passed by the great number of the people of this Commonwealth. Why, even our mill towns had no such conditions as you have now. Our mill towns and our mills were made up largely of sons and daughters of New England families coming to earn their living in the mills. While there the evening lyceums and other educational institutions and lectures found them in attendance. The conditions contributed to their uplift. It was not in the slightest degree contrary to their dignity of position. Why, some of the good old names in this Commonwealth, which now are found by the initials on the most expensive autos of their sometimes recreant descendants, belonged to plain tradesmen and artisans,—and honorable men at that! They were not aping aristocratic ideas which now are used to dissipate the wealth they created.

My assumption is this: That while this peaceful system was in progress there came forward a new system of production; we will say, for instance, a labor-saving invention. Well, now, if society adopts a labor-saving invention and thereby secures a large benefit in the way of a cheaper production, and as an incident to the use of it people who otherwise had had a peaceful course of employment are thrown to the scrap-heap, is society under any obligation to reimburse those people who thus have been thrown out? If we accept that as a question we commence to get somewhere near the basis upon which labor can claim that because of certain benefits which society has obtained by the sacrifice of hand labor it is called upon to restore a portion of the loss to certain individuals who have not received the large benefit from the new invention which society as a whole has received. That is a proposition that can be laid down as a basis upon which pensions should be granted. I am not speaking, of course, of the working-men's compensation; but I am speaking of this idea that an old age pension is necessarily a gratuity if the beneficiary has not contributed.

And again comes another theory. If society is going to be interested in the individual, if we are going to build up a new democracy, is not society justified in creating a system whereby a large amount of selfishness is eliminated from the individual and thereby the best efforts of that individual are given to the common good? That is to say, by establishing a system of old age pensions the individual may know that, no matter how much of his life he may give to the welfare of humanity in one way or another, when old age or want comes he will not want. Will any one contend here that an individual would not make then a larger distribution of his personal efforts in behalf of the brotherhood than he does at the present time? Cannot we assume that the individual's human nature is all right, but confronted as it is with the conditions which surround it under our present social system a man becomes selfish? Without intending it, we have established a social system where men walk on others because they fear if they do not that they may at some time come to want. Now, it is along those lines that I think we should act here for the common welfare, and we should act for nothing else. It certainly is along those lines that you will find that persons are writing and speaking and trying to exercise influence in our labor-unions. First, that men should associate and pay their money into the labor-unions, for the purpose of helping those who are so unfortunate that they cannot help themselves. By banding together as a union they raise their wages. By investigation, and a close investigation at that, they commence to discover that the wealth production of the individual is such that he does not receive in exchange for it the purchasing power which he ought to receive. The cost of distribution and the various costs which society has thought advisable to impose by our social system are such that the man does not receive the full product of his toil. He does not receive it in wages nor does he receive it in his share of the benefits of the system under which he is living compared with what the distributors receive. He sees others receiving larger benefits than he receives. He sees others, because of this social system, receiving a large amount of profit for a small amount of endeavor compared with him. Do you need any better example than that of our farmers? Is it not true that the most honorable employment should be that of our farmers for farm products or for the dairy industry? Is it not beyond denial that the farmers and farms have been falling into the discard because there is little or no profit? Distribution absorbs it. It is wholly because of the social system,—a mushroom growth,—that the farmers do not receive the remuneration which will induce them to remain farmers.

On this question you either must declare that the cause is in the social system or in the deterioration of the individual; and because he does not measure up mentally or physically with the forefathers he is where he is. It is only by taking that side that you estop the possibility of claiming that it is something beyond him; otherwise the deteriorating cause is in the system, and that the system is so contrived that the wealth that the farmer creates flows elsewhere than into his own pocket. The farmer once had a profit. There came a time when the productive and distributive system changed. It was at the time it was beginning that Webster used that memorable phrase that that Nation cannot long endure where the tendency is to accumulate all wealth in the hands of the few. That was the phrase he used, and the truth of it is unquestionable. Seeing that danger, that the danger was in the accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few, he naturally would undertake in every way that he could to establish some system whereby that tendency would be stopped; and hence you find Webster in the Massachusetts Convention of 1820, and in his acts and words through his life, holding as a cardinal principle the danger of permitting all wealth to accumulate in the hands of a few. Upon that he based his actions.

The debate was continued after the noon recess.

Mr. Brown of Brockton: At the time that the Convention adjourned I had moved several amendments to the substitute resolutions that are pending, and the effect of those amendments was to provide that pensions could be granted without contributions being essential for them. Those resolutions, as I see them, are limited and are governed by their title,—insurance; in other words, a pension after a man has put something in for it, but he gets no pension unless he has put something in. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish), a member of the committee, to my mind is what should be adopted. It deals with the subject as a broad principle and gives to the Legislature power to do anything in the matter of pensions, rewards, gratuities, insurance that it might see fit. I endeavored to make it clear that the whole subject is in a formulative stage; that at the time the Constitution was founded it is doubtful if anybody could have been found who would have suggested the idea of an old age pension, because the social conditions which then prevailed made it unthinkable. I endeavored to demonstrate that the reason pensions are called for now is not because the individual is inefficient compared to what he was in the days when the Constitution was founded, but because his efficiency for a profit is destroyed by a system which has grown up, known as our social system; that our social system is at fault in so far that by the privileges exercised by the distributing agencies it permits wealth to be taken from those who create it without rendering an equivalent; and society having permitted this for purposes of its own convenience, it leaves some individuals so far stranded at the age of sixty-five that an increasing number of them are coming constantly to the point where they are obliged to be supported. My argument was that inasmuch as society has created these conditions society should remedy them. If that argument is not sound, why, then I have little ground upon which I would champion a pension system. As a gratuity I would not. I have held also that by providing a pension, society could guarantee to a man that if he led a proper life he need have no fear of old age; that he may help his brother by the wayside as often as he pleases and feel that because he has helped him he will have at least enough to support himself in his closing days. I have gone that far. If we take up the one question whether or not the Legislature should have the power to create a pension system, we can make more rapid progress.

I think the address of the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) was able and one listened to with close attention. There was much instruction in it. But in it is the fear that there is to be a redistribution of property. He used that phrase and I asked him what thought he intended to convey by it. This Convention, a portion of it, has that fear. There is no doubt that those who fear to give the Legislature power fear that wealth which has been accumulated and is in the hands of certain individuals is to be taxed for the purpose of paying it to somebody who has been imprudent; that that is an unjust tax; that there is no claim there and therefore that the Legislature ought not to have any such powers. I think if time could be given they might be made to see that such a danger is not there. The fear of an unjust distribution of property is no new fear. All through our government from the beginning some people have had the idea that if the majority are given a chance they immediately will walk in and take away the wealth of those who have it. But we have got along thus far without any such exhibition of unjust force.

I hope, therefore, that when we come to vote we shall be enabled in some way to get before us in a few lines the subject of pensions, insurance, compensation, and similar matters, giving the Legislature power to act constitutionally. The subject is in a formulative stage and always will be; you cannot prevent the changes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Clinton: Before we vote on these various substitutes I think there are one or two points of difference between the proposals which have not been touched upon and which we should have clearly in mind at the time we decide which one is best for us to adopt. Without expressing any great preference for one over the other I do wish to point out to this Convention some of the differences which hitherto have not been clearly stated. In the first place, in reference to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish), the difference between that substitute and the proposal offered by the committee, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) and also that offered by the other gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) is that the resolution of the gentleman from Barnstable opens the subject of gratuities,—I might say wide open. Under his language "for the reward . . . of any person or persons," I think there would be left little restriction upon the Legislature in regard to gratuities which it might see fit to extend to citizens of the Commonwealth for one cause or another. It does not seem to me that, under the guise of health insurance or social insurance or old age pensions, any of us, or many of us, want to go to the extent of giving authority to the Legislature to grant gratuities to all persons whenever they may see fit.

Mr. BODFISH: I should like to ask the delegate if I should insert the words "by general law" after the word "establish," whether that would meet his objection. It has occurred to me that that should be done and I had in mind to do it at the proper time.

Mr. SAUNDERS: That would minimize to some extent, I think, the danger which exists in the resolution, but it would not take it all away, because I do not think we want to open the subject of gratuities to certain classes even by general law. The question of gratuities should not be left wholly in the Legislature.

I was very much interested and followed very closely, as every one else did in this chamber, the very lucid explanation of this subject and of the proposed resolution from the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser). I was waiting for him to explain the language which is included in lines 8 to 20, and unfortunately in his discussion his attention was not addressed to those lines. They are to me the chief difference between his substitute and the resolution as offered by the other gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), and except for these lines I will say that the language seems to me preferable to the language of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn). But beginning with line 18, provision is made that "Contributions or premiums shall not be required from employers to meet losses arising otherwise than out of the employment." I think I am correct in the statement that in most of the bills which have been presented to the Legislature in this State for health insurance and for old age pensions there has been a provision that the employers should make certain contributions toward the fund which was to be provided for the payment of those pensions, and I think that most or many of the laws in foreign countries are based upon the relationship of the employer and the employee in so far as to provide that certain percentages of the fund raised shall be contributed by the employers as employers.

Now the difference in this respect between the resolutions presented by the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), and by his colleague in the third division (Mr. Dresser) is that the resolution as presented by the chairman of the committee (Mr. Washburn) leaves the question of contribution, by whom made and in what manner, open for legislative action; and I think without doubt those various bills which have been presented in this State upon these subjects would be constitutional under the resolution as presented by the chairman of this committee. On the other hand, if I construe the language of these lines correctly, no old age pension bill, or health insurance bill, would be constitutional, after the adoption of this resolution, if it had in it any provision for contribution to those funds by the employers of this State.

Now I am one who does not follow to the full extent the lucid reasoning of the gentleman in the third division (Mr. Dresser) in regard to the constitutionality of the proposed measures along these lines. It is my opinion,—and I shall not enter into any lengthy discussion for the reasons,—that under our present Constitution bills properly and carefully drawn for the provision of old age pensions and health insurance will be found to be constitutional. I am very certain,—and I think in that I shall be upheld by the gentleman who presents the resolution,—that any measure which might be enacted, after the adoption of this resolution in its present form, providing for contributions by employers to the funds from which these pensions and insurance moneys should be paid, would be unconstitutional, and for that reason I hope this substitute in its present form will not be adopted.

It seems to me that without discussing,—and I shall carefully avoid it,—the merits of the proposed measures, which have received more or less discussion for several years in this State, for health insurance and for old age pensions, it would be unwise when the time comes, if it does come, that it seems best for the people of this Commonwealth that there shall be established systems of old age pensions and health insurance,—that after that period has been reached and that conclusion has been formed, it would be unfortunate if the matters should be held up upon any question of constitutionality.

It seems to me it would be unfortunate for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with its liberal history upon legislation for the social welfare, to find that after most of the foreign countries had enacted systems of that nature, and, after a thorough discussion and consideration by the people of this Commonwealth, they had decided to enact the same, their Constitution was so limited in scope that it could not be done. And for that reason, while believing that properly drawn bills would be held constitutional now, I am in favor of the report of the committee, which will remove from the minds of those gentlemen who do not agree with me the doubt as to the constitutionality of such an act. But I am vitally opposed, if any amendment is to be adopted, to the passage of such an amendment as shall restrict further the action of our Legislature and of our people upon these questions of social insurance. [Applause.]

Mr. Bauer: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) on this matter and the argument of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) on this matter, and I am inclined to favor the amendment of the gentleman from Barnstable for this reason: I believe that he approaches the entire subject in a more humane way. I believe he takes into his amendment the vision that few men have of what is likely to happen in this country in the next twenty-five years. I believe he takes into consideration also the fact that these problems of social insurance that have not been solved yet by the large States as a community can be solved only in a humane and a liberal way. I am absolutely opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Worcester. It is complicated, it lacks simplicity, it provokes litigation and to my mind it is cold blooded. I believe the delegate from Brockton (Mr. Brown) was perfectly right when he said that many of these ills have been caused by our social institutions as they now exist, and our social community, and that it is up to them to do the contributing that will remedy a great many of them.

Take, for example, the maternity benefits for mothers in employment during times of pregnancy. The State Department of Health statistics show that in the mills in New Bedford, Fall River, Lawrence and Lowell there are a thousand children born every year from mothers employed in time of pregnancy, in spite of our laws, first, because of the indifference of the employer to such laws, and, second, because of the fact that the mother gets no financial return if she stays away from employment. This proposition is well known to us. Every medical man in Massachusetts is familiar with it. And what is the result? Statistics show that nearly four out of every ten babies born under those conditions are either born dead or die within four weeks of their birth, and we permit that to go on without any let or hindrance. We are absolutely indifferent to any remedy for that great social injustice.

Can it be that the contribution necessary to remedy those conditions shall be limited to acts resulting from the employment of the person or anything contingent thereon? I think not. I think society as a whole is absolutely responsible, and whatever contribution is not made otherwise to remedy those conditions should be made by society. I do not know of any more awful waste of human life in any one part of our industrial existence than the statistics show here,—that four hundred out of every thousand babies so born either are born dead or die within four weeks after birth, and because of the fact that the mothers, on account of some home tragedy or calamity, are forced to seek employment and be in employment at a time when their whole attention and whole life should be given to bringing the new citizen into this world.
I think that the delegate from Barnstable in his amendment offers an opportunity to this Commonwealth to correct abuses of that kind as they may happen in the future. It offers an opportunity to this Commonwealth to go through its social evils and reform and remedy the defects that society itself has been responsible for; and I believe, as men sit here and regard this proposition from a human point of view, and throw out entirely the profit-making part of the proposition, that they can vote for no other amendment except that offered by the delegate from Barnstable. [Applause.]

Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston moved that the amendment moved by Mr. Dresser be amended by striking out, in line 8, the word "and", and inserting in place thereof the word "or".

Mr. W. H. Sullivan: These words, "arising out of and in the course of employment," are copied from a Massachusetts act, and that word "and" has been the cause of all the bitter controversy in the Workmen's Compensation Act. Many efforts have been made in the Legislature to change that word "and," and substitute therefor the word "or." The present Workmen's Compensation Act could be changed if the appeal is strong enough to the Legislature; but if this amendment to the Constitution is ratified, this power is taken from the Legislature, and never, until the Constitution is amended again, can the workman get his rights.

This amendment, changing the word "and" to "or", is not a simple amendment, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Worcester in the third division. Under the law at present great injustice is done to the working-man, as is illustrated by Harbroe's case, the case of the night watchman, who in protecting his employer's property was killed, and his dependents could obtain no compensation because, under the critical interpretation of the law, it was held it did not arise "out of" his employment, while it did occur "in the course of his employment." Another case was where a man was driving a team home to the stable.

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: I wonder if the delegate is mistaken in his remembrance of that case, or if I am. As I remember, the night watchman was allowed to recover because he was protecting his master's property.

Mr. Sullivan: As I remember the case, it was decided exactly the opposite to what my brother contends. Another case was the Milliken case. The teamster was driving his team home, and, overcome by a fit, he drove into a morass and died as a result of the exposure. It was held that although driving the team was his duty, and the accident occurred in the course of his employment, his employment did not carry him into this morass and he was not entitled to recover, because the injury did not arise "out of" his employment.

All the cases he has cited to my mind show the injustice of this law. But that is not the question. If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Worcester is adopted the Legislature never can change that law, or remove the hardships of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Now, my amendment, I hope, does not convey the impression that I am friendly to his amendment, but there is no certainty as to what might happen. His amendment might be adopted. If that is so, it would be productive of greater good to the working-man if this amendment suggested by me were adopted.
Mr. Harriman of New Bedford: While our people have two views as to health insurance and old age pensions, there are no differences upon accident insurance and compensation that affects the laborers of this State. While the law so far has done well, there have been vital defects. It is because it has been placed in the hands of private insurance companies instead of being administered by the State, as it should be, and there has been allowed to creep into it the making of money out of the crushed bones and sufferings of the workers of this Commonwealth. While I have no doubt that the gentleman from Worcester is absolutely sincere, I want to say that we rather look with suspicion upon the Greeks bearing gifts upon this great question which is so agitated among the working classes of this Commonwealth.

The attention of the Convention should be called to the fact that probably nothing has caused as much unrest and bitterness in this Commonwealth as has the attitude of the courts upon this very same question. I want to call attention to one or two particular phases of it which cannot be controverted and which I think ought to be in mind when you vote upon this question. For instance, take the decisions of the courts in the matter of fellow-servant, assumption of risk and contributory negligence, the obstacles that have been placed in the way by the courts; then contrast, if you will, and see what they have done when the stockholders and the other men who have violated, and openly violated it, by criminal negligence, get by without any liability at all. It caused this entire burden to be placed upon the shoulders of the working people and their families. The Massachusetts Legislature sought to pass an act which would prevent this. It has been said, and I think it is perfectly fair to say, that there was a determined lobby and effort made to prevent it from becoming a State company, and there was spent, so far as we know, a large amount of money to make it possible for private insurance companies to do business under this act.

After that was passed, and after these three, — the assumption of risk, fellow-servant and contributory negligence, — were supposed to be done away with, we were thrown on the courts of the Commonwealth, who ruled again in favor of the corporation in their interpretation of the law against the true meaning of the bill, again throwing the burden upon the working class.

I refer to the case in the Supreme Judicial Court of Ashton v. the Boston & Maine Railroad, which tells us that:

It is well settled that where one is employed to perform manifestly dangerous work, there is no liability where the risks growing out of the work are assumed by the laborer by his contract of employment.

Thus the Supreme Judicial Court in 1915 ignores the law of 1911 which abolished the doctrine of assumption of risk, and it assumes the existence and force of that doctrine, as though the Legislature never had spoken. Again:

The removal of such defence has no application to a case of this kind where the evidence shows that the deceased assumed the risk by virtue of his contract of employment.

And the reason for the enactment of the compensation bill was to do away with that, and practically it has been nullified and put back into the law, and again become the law of this Commonwealth. The gentleman who just preceded me struck the keynote of the entire situation. The attitude of the people of this Commonwealth ten or fifteen years hence is going to be entirely different as to what constitutes police power and reward for merit from what it is to-day; and this Convention, in my opinion, ought to adopt some resolution which will give to the Legislature unquestioned authority upon this matter, and not tie it down either to contributory or non-contributory, but simply make a clear and plain proposition that is within the reach of the people, as a means whereby they, when they so desire, can administer their internal affairs in regard to old age pensions, insurance, and protection in industry, as they at that time see fit; and let us not do anything that will prevent it. And our duty here is simply to arrange so they can do it when and in such a manner as they may see fit; and they will do it in the interest of humanity, and not in the interest of property.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: It seems to me that I may perhaps appropriately say at this time a few words in regard to this pending matter. There were twenty-two or more propositions submitted to the committee, touching all phases of this question. I am violating no confidence, nor am I reflecting upon any member of the committee, when I say that upon the merits of these propositions we held widely divergent views. But we were able, after some weeks of communion, to reach a unanimous judgment as to the wisdom of removing any doubt as to the right of the General Court to legislate upon this class of subjects. There are fifteen members of that committee, and they are unanimous in this conclusion.

It is true that there is a minority report, signed by my friend in the fourth division (Mr. Bodfish), in which he proposes an amendment considerably broader in its scope than that agreed upon by the other fourteen members of the committee.

•Mr. Bodfish: I should like to ask the member if the proposal submitted by me is any broader in its scope than the conclusion reached by the committee that we ought to leave the Legislature free to act as in its wisdom it may see fit?

Mr. Washburn: I will answer the question of my friend in due course; and as I have but a few moments at my disposal I will ask to be allowed to finish my statement, and then if there is any time left I shall be glad to answer any questions.

I carefully abstained yesterday, in opening this matter, from making any remarks whatever upon the merits of these various propositions for social insurance. My friend from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) this morning read some observation made by Mr. Justice Holmes upon the police power. Let me read to you a statement on the same subject, made by the Supreme Judicial Court not many years ago, that I think ought to be kept in the mind of every man who wishes to keep abreast of the times. This great court said:

Of course, it is impossible to forecast the character and extent of these changes, but in view of the fact that, from the day Magna Carta was signed to the present moment, amendments to the structure of the law have been made with increasing frequency, it is impossible to suppose that they will not continue, and the law be forced to adapt itself to the new condition of society, and particularly to new relations between employers and employees, as they arise.

It was with this conception of public policy that this committee has acted in presenting its report to you. It is true that we have not presented in our report a recommendation of a specific measure in terms, because of the fact that part of the committee believed it would be better to cover this subject-matter in four or five amendments rather than in one; but it is true, also, that fourteen out of the fifteen members of that committee agreed that if we were to have any amendment in general form it would be the one that I have here presented under my name; so that in considering this matter you must understand that so far as this amendment of mine is concerned it is practically the unanimous judgment of that committee.

Mr. Donovan of Springfield: As one of the members of that committee, I should like to make just a word of explanation before the impression goes out that I did not agree, or that I among others did not agree, with the broad amendment as submitted in the minority report of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish). It was on the understanding that the report of this committee was sufficiently broad to cover all contingencies that I agreed with the fourteen or thirteen other members upon that committee. If I felt that there were any restrictions made by this report, as submitted by the fourteen members, under our chairman, I would have signed a report with the gentleman from Barnstable.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I will read to the Convention the amendment proposed in the minority report of the gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish). It is this:

Full power and authority is hereby vested in the legislative department to establish any system or systems of pensions, compensation or insurance for the reward, relief or protection of any person or persons, and to make any provision for such fund or funds as may be required therefor.

You see the enormous breadth of this proposed amendment, an amendment too confessedly imperfect, and stated to be so by my friend who proposed it this morning.

Now, coming to the amendment which I have proposed, and which, subject to the limitations suggested by my friend in the first division, a member of the committee, is practically the unanimous judgment of the committee, I want to say that it is the result of prolonged consideration. It was the contribution of many minds. Certainly I disclaim any credit for its draftsmanship. It stands as nearly as possible as expressing the judgment of this committee. We did not rely exclusively upon counsel and advice from those in the committee and immediately related to it, but we sought advice elsewhere among those whom we thought capable of giving it. I think I may be in some measure responsible, perhaps, for the speech made this morning by my friend and colleague from Worcester in the third division (Mr. Dresser), to which we all listened with so much profit and pleasure, because at a very early day I consulted him in regard to these measures, and was very glad to seek his advice upon a subject on which he is so well informed. I have no apology to make to this Convention for having talked freely about this important matter with a great many people, and I have been glad to receive from any quarter any suggestion which I thought contained a contribution of value in the investigation of so important a subject.

I have but one or two words to say in closing, because I hope that this matter may be brought to a vote to-day. I trust that all amendments will be rejected at this stage, that the amendment proposed by the minority member of the committee will be rejected, and that document No. 382, representing the general amendment submitted by the committee, will be adopted by the Convention.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: We have spent all of to-day and much of yesterday afternoon in the discussion of this matter; we never can vote so intelligently upon it as we can to-night; it would be disastrous for the matter to go over to next week. And as under the rules it may be a full hour from the time of moving the previous question to the end of the roll-call, it is to be seen that unless we move the previous question now, and order it, why, we cannot get a vote to-night. Therefore, I move the previous question.

Mr. Ferry of Northbridge: I have tried to follow the arguments of the different members of the Convention in reference to the different amendments proposed, and while I could understand some of them, yet not being a lawyer of course I could not understand a great deal of the arguments that each one has in favor of a special pet scheme; but it seems to me that the wisest thing we can do at this time is to defeat all of them. I am opposed,—I presume you can understand that form of statement,—I am opposed to this scheme of social insurance. I do not believe it is American. I do not believe we ever can make it work. I do not believe that it ever will improve the position of the working people, and it certainly would not make the condition of the manufacturer any better.

Now, this scheme must be debated and investigated from a German standpoint. Especially up to the war all of the argument in favor of social insurance was taken from Germany. We were referred to Germany, and told what a beautiful success this scheme had there; that it was a paradise for the working people, and they were having everything; that the government was giving them everything, and that everything was working so nicely, that the working-men were in a very comfortable and happy condition. Also, the claim was made that the health of the people was conserved, and that the time lost by sickness was reduced. As far as Germany is concerned, that has been just the opposite.

Mr. Theller of New Bedford: I should like to ask the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn) if, in moving this as an amendment to the report of the committee, he is moving the general amendment on pages 7 and 8 of document No. 327, or whether this is an original amendment by the member from Worcester?

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: The amendment that I have proposed under my name is the amendment printed on pages 7 and 8 of the report of the committee, marked "general amendment."

Mr. Theller: In that case I would suggest that in document No. 382 one sentence has been omitted from the general committee’s draft of the amendment. I refer to page 8, lines 6 to 10 inclusive.

Mr. Washburn: If so, that was a mistake of the draftsman, because the amendment which I intended to move, and did move, is the one on the pages of the report of the committee, and it will be found upon referring to the secretary’s files that I cut that amendment out of the report of the committee and presented it to him as my amendment. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for calling attention to the matter.

The President: If there is no objection the amendment as offered by Mr. Washburn will be considered the amendment which is printed beginning at the bottom of page 7 of the committee's report, being Convention document No. 327.

Mr. Creamer of Lynn: Do I not understand that the amendment offered by Mr. Washburn of Worcester, under No. 382, is the same as the one in No. 327, at the top of page 8, the report of the committee? I can see no difference in the language at all in the copy I have; I find nothing omitted.

Mr. Washburn: All difference of opinion on this point can be avoided by considering as my amendment the amendment as it is stated in the report of the committee.

Mr. Bigney of Boston: As a member of that committee, my understanding is that the report of the committee takes in the general amendment, and also the four other amendments on page 8 of document No. 327. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Worcester, if he does not mean, when he says that the committee report is practically unanimously agreed to by the committee, the general report covering those five headings?

Mr. Washburn: The gentleman is in error if he thinks that any amendment in the report is now before the Convention excepting the general amendment, beginning on page 7 and running over on to page 8. There are four remaining suggested amendments on page 8, one headed "Workmen's Compensation," the next "Health Insurance," the next "Insurance Against Unemployment," and the next "Old Age Pensions and Pension for Physical Disability"; but no one of them has been moved as yet by any one.

Mr. Bigney: I wish to inquire of the chairman, the gentleman from Worcester, if those four subjects: Workmen's compensation, health insurance, insurance against unemployment, and old age pensions and pension for physical disability, were not a part of the report which was accepted practically unanimously by the committee on Social Insurance?

Mr. Washburn: The exact point is this, as I stated it to the Convention yesterday. The committee reached this conclusion: That it would include in its report a general form of amendment which the Convention, if it chose, might adopt, and that is the amendment that I have moved. The committee also included in its report four separate amendments, intended to be suggestive to the Convention, if the Convention should prefer to deal with the matter through four separate amendments rather than in one omnibus amendment.

Mr. W. H. Sullivan of Boston: I should like to inquire if it is not the fact that the whole of document No. 327 is before this Convention for consideration, on the report of the committee, without the separate items being separately moved?

The President: The entire report is before the Convention; but the committee does not recommend the adoption of any resolution of amendment to the Constitution. It merely suggests the form of amendments. Therefore those resolutions of amendment must be moved if they are to be acted on by the Convention.

Mr. W. H. Sullivan: I did not understand the last statement. Is it the fact that they must be moved, — these different subheads?

The President: The Chair so rules.

Mr. Sullivan: Must be moved?
SOCIAL INSURANCE.

The President: The Chair so rules.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable: I think I have a few minutes of time left. I do not want to intrude unduly upon the Convention. It seems to me that the discussion which has taken place this afternoon and this morning shows clearly the futility of the members of this Convention attempting to write into the Constitution of Massachusetts their preference for any specific kind of pensions, insurance or compensation. We are all at sea on those points. The committee was at sea on those points. We reached a unanimous decision on certain points, but when it came to the question of what we would submit to the Constitution we said we did not know what was best; we would leave that perhaps to the Committee of the Whole, or the Convention itself, to decide; we simply would make suggestions. So there is nothing before you except our suggestions, and when it comes to the form we were not agreed, as you can see plainly. I hope that at this stage you will not adopt that omnibus amendment setting forth a half dozen kinds of different insurance, dealing with the jury question and with detail all the way through. Let us have the simple amendment that I have suggested, which is in keeping not only with the report of the committee, that we should leave this matter to the Legislature to enact legislation which in its wisdom it sees fit, but which is in keeping also with the constitutional character. On the question of leaving it to the Legislature, I call your attention to the statement by the gentleman from Worcester, the member of the Senate, made the other day when we were discussing the question of natural resources. He told you that you could trust the Legislature, for in his long experience it always had been conservative. I think you safely can leave these details to the Legislature. Who knows whether we want private companies to do the insuring or the State to do it? We might want private companies to-day and the State to-morrow. Let us leave all that to the Legislature. Let us adopt the simple amendment, and then modify it wherever it may need to be modified. I do admit that my amendment is not perfect. I do not claim it is perfect, and I do not think that is anything against it. The gentleman from Worcester, the chairman of the committee, also admits that his is not perfect. I do not think there is anything in that argument. I am willing to have the amendment corrected, but I do not want to see the Convention writing into the Constitution of Massachusetts a lot of legislative details.

Mr. Washburn of Middleborough: I wish very briefly to devote myself to a single phase of this discussion. The gentleman from Barnstable (Mr. Bodfish) claims for his amendment the virtue of simplicity. If I understood the gentleman from Lynn who spoke in the second division (Mr. Bauer), he objects to the committee report because, as he says, it is too complicated.

Some years ago the State of New York passed a compulsory Workmen's Compensation Act. That act was held, in the celebrated Ives case, which was so much criticized and which was, I believe, an issue in the campaign of 1912, to be unconstitutional. Subsequently, New York amended its Constitution. I hold this amendment in my hand. It was adopted in the election of 1913; and under this amendment, another case arose which was sustained by the Court of Appeals of New York. The case I think is "In the Matter of Jensen," and it was upheld subsequently by the Supreme Court of the United States in another case. In other words, a case arising under the existing New York amendment has been held neither repugnant to the State Constitution nor to the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution.

That amendment is much more complicated than the pending committee amendment. I think we safely can follow the committee in this instance. I find, too, on examining the committee's report, that the objection raised by the gentleman from Boston in the fourth division is obviated, because this language occurs: "In the course of or arising out of their employment." I shall support the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. Sawyer of Ware: If we accept the so-called Washburn amendment it will go to the foot of the calendar, and perhaps we shall have two months, certainly it will be a long while; and our radical friends who are dissatisfied with it may labor with us in the meantime and point out where it can be improved. We are not in a position this afternoon to approve it intelligently. So I hope we may accept the Washburn amendment, vote down the others, and those who are interested in the others, then having something to work upon, in the six weeks before we come to it again, may point out where it can be improved.

The amendment moved by Mr. Brown of Brockton to the substitute resolution (No. 382) proposed by Mr. Washburn of Worcester was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Bodfish was rejected, by a vote of 42 to 100.

Mr. Brown of Brockton withdrew the pending amendment to the substitute resolution proposed by Mr. Dresser of Worcester.

The pending amendment of the same resolution (No. 383) moved by Mr. William H. Sullivan of Boston was rejected, by a vote of 51 to 74.

The proposed substitute, moved by Mr. Dresser, was rejected.

The amendment moved by Mr. Washburn of Worcester was adopted, by a vote of 98 to 41; and, accordingly, the resolution (No. 382) was substituted for the report of the committee and was ordered to a second reading Friday, June 21.

The resolution (No. 382) was read a second time Friday, July 26.

Mr. John W. Daly of Lowell: The chairman of the committee on Social Insurance, the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Washburn), in his opening remarks upon a former stage of this resolution said that certain things had to be considered, among them whether or not the General Court had the right under the Constitution to legislate upon these various propositions, and whether such a power should be granted. My interpretation of his second query is that if it be determined in the negative, that is, that the General Court has not such power, then the question comes: Does the necessity exist, or is it likely to arise even in the remote future, that would warrant granting such a power? It is upon this phase of the question that I should like to present my views.

It seems to me quite proper at this point to say that I have been identified with the insurance business for the past eight years. I do not intend to make this business my life work, as I have other plans in view. So that anything I may say will be without prejudice and from a practical working knowledge of conditions.
I am not opposed to the fundamental principles of certain forms of compulsory, contributory, non-contributory, unemployment, health insurance, old age pensions, nor to any individual or collective thought or action formulated with the intention of aiding and improving the condition of the wage-earner. While I believe in a gradual extension of the principles of public ownership of certain public utilities when it is shown conclusively that private efforts fail to create and maintain a condition of justice and equity and such social relationships as are responsive to the need of the times, when government shall demonstrate ability to conduct public utilities for the public good with better results than they are being conducted by some of our private enterprises, when private efforts fail to achieve certain required results, then has government in a democracy justification for stepping in with its own machinery and replacing private action? Under such circumstances would a movement for State control be sound and within the range of practical achievement?

My experience has shown me that there are some, — a great many in fact, — who, because of indifference, prejudice, or a misconception of their duties to their families, do not take advantage of the many splendid opportunities offered them in the most convenient form to provide protection for their dependents, for themselves. In this respect I firmly believe that a thorough, constructive campaign of education, pointing out the essentials necessary for the maintenance of good health and their rightful relationships to the community's well-being, and making the application to the conformity with such teachings voluntary, will be far more effective than to have the State step in and say this or that must be done, when in the opinion of those affected it should not be done unless so dictated by their own conscience.

I am well aware that we are not considering a legislative enactment; that this is not a legislative body. If it was a question of allowing the people to decide whether or not they should have health, State or social insurance, I would favor it, but it is not such a question. It is a question of conferring upon the General Court the constitutional right to legislate upon such matters should it in its wisdom and judgment consider it necessary for the convenience and safety of the public. Furthermore, I believe that any action of this body that might influence legislation in behalf of State or social insurance is unnecessary, because the State already has that power. Assuming that the question at issue is: Has the State such authority? the committee on Social Insurance in its report, quoting from bulletin No. 18, makes this significant statement:

In view of the recent Federal decisions, it is obvious that constitutional rigorism is at an end, and that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not stand in the way of State legislation respecting these various forms of insurance.

It further states:

Of course the question still remains whether such measures are in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of Massachusetts.

In view of the fact that there is no restriction prohibiting such legislation in the Constitution of Massachusetts, when it is believed by so many that if there was such a restriction it would not be operative, because it would be in direct violation of the fourteenth amendment... to the Federal Constitution, designed to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace and happiness of the people, the provisions of this amendment are broad and specific, its interpretations in opinions by Justices of the higher courts, by decisions of the Federal Supreme Court itself, are clear and definite. When you realize that these economic theories have the sanction of law, that the police power extends to all the public needs, that the courts recognize that public sentiment must make law and that courts must interpret the law in accordance with the spirit of the times, it must be obvious that the States have such power.

As I understand it, in the States where there are no constitutional provisions, the matter may be regulated entirely by statute. The claim is made by the advocates of social insurance that a great amount of sickness and a high death-rate prevail among American wage-earners, that existing agencies cannot provide adequate relief. If this was true, and it was found upon investigation that State operation and compulsion is necessary as a remedy, then any measure intending to permit such legislation merits serious consideration. However, the available statistics and every reliable health survey and sickness estimate made in this country indicate that health conditions here without social insurance are as good, and in many instances much better than in countries where such laws have been in force for a number of years. The United States Commission on Industrial Relations, the American Association for Labor Legislation, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company of New York, the Social Insurance Commission of California, in their sickness survey in different sections of the country, including Boston, estimated an average of 6 to 8.56 annually for sickness disability. In Germany and Austria in 1913, after more than twenty years of social insurance, sickness disability averaged 9.19 and 9.45 respectively. Statistics show also the mortality of those countries without health or social insurance to be lower than in countries where such laws have been in operation for a great many years. When you consider the recent rapid strides made in so-called social insurance by private enterprise, you can see readily how great the improvement has been.

Take, for instance, the more recent and modern system of protection. It is known as group life insurance. It is a development of American insurance, whereby a number of lives are covered by a single blanket policy. It may be regarded as wholesale insurance, with decreased overhead expenses, and eventually will stabilize labor and capital. It is intended and expected to establish employment on a more permanent basis, and to promote more friendly relations between employer and employee. It is either contributory or non-contributory. The contributory plan brings about an automatic saving of money, enabling the members thereby to systematically and easily accumulate savings and to provide for their old age by creating a pension fund. It provides protection for the dependents of members, and it may be so written that the pay envelope will continue to come to the family in whole or in part for a number of years following the death of the wage-earner. This form of insurance covers all employees of any person, firm or corporation. It may be used to create endowments for churches, colleges, etc. And it provides further that in case of an insured life becoming totally and permanently disabled before attaining a certain age the premium charge will be waived and the amount of insurance on such life paid to the insured in installments. Although this plan is somewhat new and still in the experimental stage, a great many manufacturing concerns throughout the country, recognizing that the success of their business to a very great extent depends upon the efficiency and the loyalty of their employees, and after careful study and investigation as to the best and proper method of showing their appreciation for such loyalty, are taking advantage of this opportunity and are providing their employees with this form of protection.

When you analyze this question fairly, impartially, without prejudice, you must recognize the fact that the growth, development and achievement of our American insurance companies and their concern for the welfare of the public are consistent with the principles of American ideals and democratic institutions. One company in particular, the largest in this country and perhaps in the world, has entered a great field for the benefit of its policy holders, entirely beyond any obligation implied in their policy contracts. It has taken place among the foremost agencies for the conservation of human life, having carried on a campaign of education in the interest of improved health, established a free nursing service for its policy holders whose circumstances are such that they need it, and engaged systematically in welfare work along the lines of modern thought among the millions of industrial workers who are its policy holders.

A wonderful change has taken place within the past twelve or thirteen years in the development of American insurance. Since the purification of American insurance in 1905 by the Armstrong investigating committee of the New York Legislature the highest point of efficiency in agency and financial management has been reached. The legislation enacted in New York upon the recommendations of the Armstrong committee was revolutionary and drastic. As a result of that investigation, upon the findings of the committee, upon the recommendations of the committee of fifteen appointed by the Insurance Commissioners of various States, the companies doing business in Massachusetts are operating under as good, if not the best insurance laws of any State in the Union. There can be no doubt that the committee entered upon its labors intending and expecting to put an end to so-called industrial, now known as social, insurance, as well as to tontine assessment insurance. An elaborate statement of facts, which for the first time analyzed and made plain the system of American insurance, and which the committee admitted as deserving of special investigation, was submitted by the vice-president of this great American company. This statement was made the basis of extended cross-examination. The testimony taken by the committee left them without facts which would warrant prohibitive legislation, and in their report they declared that such legislation would be unwise. The real conclusion of the committee was that the alternative seemed to be presented either of prohibiting altogether so-called industrial (now known as social) insurance, or of permitting its continuance substantially on the present basis, subject to regulations designed to secure economical conditions applicable to the present situation. The report of the Superintendent of Insurance of New York at that time showed that the question was decided by the good showing made by this.
company. In the report of a recent examination, that is, a comparatively recent examination, of this company by the New York Department of Insurance, the document was prefaced by a memorandum in which laudatory reference was made to the activities of this company in several of its departments. Particular stress was laid upon the desirability of encouraging and extending in this country the writing of so-called industrial insurance, for which this company was chiefly noted.

The question of whether private enterprise should be left much longer in control of supplying the masses with insurance upon a large scale considerably puzzled the Department of Insurance, as it did the Armstrong investigating committee. However, whatever doubts existed on this point were dispelled quickly by the showing which this company made under an examination which was searching in the extreme and which in the first instance had been undertaken in no spirit of preconceived approval of the company methods and purposes. It is three years since that examination was complete, and to-day, notwithstanding the fact that the world is steadily growing more radical in its attitude toward private enterprise as a suitable agency for the accomplishment of quasi public purposes, the question of permitting companies like the one referred to to continue to supply the great social service of providing insurance to the masses unchallenged by interference or competition from the State itself, is not being agitated to anything like it was a few years ago. In other fields the socialistic ideal of State control has been making much headway during this time, while in this field it has shown a distinct tendency to abate. If this means anything it means that in the field of American insurance, however it may be in other directions, private enterprise has been splendidly justifying itself by its works. Upon no other ground is it possible now for private enterprise engaged in any quasi public fields to escape the challenge of the new spirit that is abroad in the land.

From a business conducted solely for profit it has become, as conducted by this great American institution, the most widespread agency for social uplift the world ever has known. That its growth has involved no sacrifice of efficiency in the handling of administrative details, but on the contrary has been the direct result of increasing efficiency, is shown by the comparatively small losses sustained by this company in proportion to the large investments made by the high earning power of the company’s securities, and by the steady decrease which has been taking place in the percentage of managerial expenses to the company’s premium paying income. The fact that the percentage of lapses due to the abandonment of their insurance by policy holders is continually decreasing speaks eloquently to the same effect. This last mentioned development is perhaps the most convincing evidence which could be offered that the policy holders are very well satisfied with what they get in return for the premiums they pay. This great showing can be explained very largely, it seems to me, by the fact that those in control of such organizations realize to-day that such institutions must shoulder responsibilities to the public at large of a somewhat different order from that which confronted them when engaged in business in only a small way, and that the affairs of such companies simply cannot be administered in a spirit which takes only the business side of things into account. Having recognized what the public rightfully might require from such institutions, having in fact been largely instrumental in educating the public to a full realization of what it rightfully might require from insurance companies, this company waited for no change in existing laws before striking out as a pioneer among insurance companies along the pathway of social service on a high scale. Leaving out of consideration the mere numbers of those who have been benefited by this company’s activities, the example which it has set to other great business organizations by its early recognition of the new responsibilities attaching to all organizations which have attained a certain size is one of the most beneficial of recent occurrences in the field of American business. I have neither the time nor the inclination to weary you with a detailed account of the many things these companies are doing in the social field, but I assure you a careful perusal will show the extent to which these companies have recognized the great modern truth that organized wealth under private management, if it is going to be allowed to exist at all, must assume certain public responsibilities which never were dreamed of under the old régime.

I am not making this statement nor giving these facts for the purpose of praising this company or its management. It just happens that this great American institution presents so many admirable illustrations of what an efficient and highly enlightened modern business organization can do in the way of keeping abreast of modern thought that it can be used properly as an illustration favoring my argument, namely, that certain forms of initiative and enterprise are at their best still capable of doing the finest possible work in fields from which latterly all the talk has been that they should be compelled to retire.

Those of you who have been more or less closely connected with the work of the State during the past few years have been in a position to realize better, perhaps, than many others, the extent of the tide that is setting nowadays in the direction of what is commonly called socialism, by which I mean, of course, the taking over by the State at the earliest possible moment of nearly every form of productive activity. You have been in a position, too, where you can see plainly some of the evils that creep very insidiously into all public administrations of large and complicated affairs. Upon many the effect of the experience has been a disinclination to see the movement toward State control proceed a bit faster than it must. Is it not fair to assume that the better plan would be for the people to pause now and then before such an example of private enterprise as I have described, and decide soberly whether in the long run good is going to come from substituting political administration in place of the kind of private administration which apparently can be secured for such companies nowadays, and which can be safeguarded to any extent the State may desire by a system of efficient governmental supervision? This company is only one of several such companies of which substantially the same things I have said with particular reference to this one might be said generally. It is by no means a unique example among American institutions or among American insurance companies of enlightened and improved modern business methods. Institutions like this constitute the most effective barriers we have to-day against the too rapid spread of socialistic ideas.
Mr. Wonson of Gloucester: I should like to inquire of the distinguished gentleman from Worcester, chairman of the committee on Social Insurance, if the words "systems of social insurance" would include or be synonymous with "any system," so that they would be broad enough to admit of compulsory insurance in any form that the Legislature might want to enact.

Mr. Washburn of Worcester: I can answer that question, I think, in the affirmative.

Mr. Wonson: I am glad that the answer was so short and to the point, and so unequivocal. We heard from the insurance companies a minute ago. We know that we all have been lobbied by them and asked not to allow this thing to go any further, and their viewpoint has been very ably expressed.

I want to call to the attention of the Convention this afternoon in a few minutes what the situation is in the district where I have the honor to be a resident at the present time, and let you judge for yourselves whether you will allow anything like the present conditions to go on when it is within your power to do something to remedy them. The war has taught, among other lessons, that very many and varied industries are necessary to the upkeep of that war. Every workman cannot be engaged in a safe employment, and we know that very many and varied employments are necessary to keep up the war machine and the people back home, and we know that some work that must be done is very dangerous and hazardous, and some people are called on much against their will to do those things which must be done and assume these risks which have been placed upon them.

I state as a general proposition that no system of accident insurance is any good unless it is compulsory upon all industries to accept that system. It is not fair for a worker on this side of the State to be insured when one on the other side of the State engaged in the same industry, or, perchance, a more dangerous one, is not insured. Our laws are wrong when they allow employers to choose and discriminate for the well-being of large groups of workmen and their dependents. Conditions for workers should be as uniform as possible. The trouble with our present system has been that there exist great loopholes. There is a hiatus created, so to speak, in the whole system, which allows a certain group of people to be taken care of advantageously while others are not taken care of in any way. Representing in part, as I do, the city of Gloucester, which is the seat of the great fishing industry of this country, I want to call to your attention a situation under the Workmen's Compensation Act which you do not know exists.

If there was a proposition here before us which would compel every employer to insure his employees I gladly would support that proposition as it would remedy my difficulty, but this resolution under discussion to make it constitutional for the Legislature to enact a compulsory act is the best thing we have here presented to us. I urge a favorable consideration of it, and strongly appeal to you to give it another reading and pass it on to the next stage.

Some critics will say to me, if I am engaged in an industry that does not accept the Workmen's Compensation Act as it is at the present time: "All right, stay out of it if you want to, and when there is an injury in your establishment if you do not accept it all the three defences at common law are taken away from you, and what chance will you stand to get a verdict for the defendant?” Well, I admit that is the inducement to bring employers to accept the act in land or ordinary industries or employments, but in the fishing industry every accident and every loss at sea is “an act of God,” which is what the law terms it, and is a defence to an action at common law. In such cases there is no possible way of proving negligence on the part of the employer, because there is no negligence on the one hand and no evidence can be procured on the other. If the employer does not accept the act and the injury occurs on shore, why, the three defences are taken away from him, but we still can prove that the employer is negligent and a heavy recovery may be had. But with a loss by reason of a storm at sea or by some other thing like being lost in a fog or being washed overboard by a heavy sea, where is the possibility of proving human negligence, where there are no witnesses, perhaps, or no element of negligence on the part of the employers present? And so that leaves one entire industry beyond the reach of the compensation act because the employer elects not to come under it, and beyond the reach of any recovery at common law under section 1 of the act.

We have reports from the Industrial Accident Board at different times, and if we turn to their recommendations of January, 1917, we will find their call for a compulsory act. Time prevents me reading it to you, although I have it before me. They say in closing that “the remedy for this situation will probably be found in the action of the Constitutional Convention rather than by the Legislature.” In other words, the specialists in workmen’s compensation insurance in our State have put it up to us and expect us to do something along relief lines at this session.

What is the fishing industry, if perhaps we do not know whether it is important enough to legislate for? I do submit and admit that it has received but scant attention from our law-making bodies in times past, and especially during recent times, but it is the oldest industry in our Commonwealth. We recognize it as a sort of a patron saint by the image of the “Sacred Cod” which is extended above our heads here. The value of the landings of fish in the ports of Massachusetts in a year amounts to more than $25,000,000, and at the prices prevailing at the present time that figure will be greatly increased. One hundred and thirty-two million pounds are landed in the port of Gloucester alone, and that quantity is worth approximately $7,000,000 at last year’s prices. Now, what do we do for our other industries? There is a $7,000,000 industry in one of our cities alone, and bear in mind that Boston and a score of other cities and towns are likewise objects of this unjust discrimination.

Now, what are we doing for workers in the other industries? Well, a figure or two might suffice to show. During the fourth year of our present act 135,000 injuries and deaths were reported, and the board received 21,274 agreements for compensation. Settlements were effected in 18,152 cases, and there were 93,825 benefits paid by the insurance companies direct, amounting to nearly $5,000,000. I might go down and quote other figures, but it shows that that amount of compensation has been paid by insurance companies to workers in other industries, and industries not as hazardous, mind you, as the fishing industry. Even in cases where there was no compensation in-insurance taken out by employers there was also a large number of benefits paid. Of the 93,825 cases during the year above-mentioned 463 were fatal, 366 of which were insured, 97 not insured. In 80 cases out of the 463 there were no dependents, and in 383 there were 954 dependents left. In other words, each death had 2.49 of dependents, and in 21 per cent of the fatal cases not covered by insurance 47 per cent of the 21 per cent got insurance from the employer direct, and they averaged $1,590 per person and totaled $38,175, whereas workmen insured under the act got on an average on the fatal cases $3,053.53 apiece and the total was $155,730. That is an indication of what is done ashore. In the cases where there were compensation policies over $3,000 per person is paid to the dependents, and where there is no insurance the firms voluntarily paid nearly $1,600 per person. None of these "philanthropists" is in the fishing business.

All the pay earned by workers in this industry concerning which I am telling you is uncertain. There is not so much per week; it is contingent upon the catch of fish. Each one of the crew gets a share of what is left after the fish are sold and after the expenses have been deducted. The figures show that the average number of persons in each family of workers in the fishing industry is greater than the average among the shore employees injured under the act. I will come to some figures later to prove that. The work is hazardous, more so than is the case in most of the industries that now have insurance under the act. How important this industry is at the present time, and how it needs cherishing and assistance is testified to from several sources, and one is the fact that an international commission has gone up and down the coast and has held sessions in different places, and all restrictions in the way of free intercourse between Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and American ports have been wiped away. Secretary Redfield was chairman of that international commission. The United States Food Administration has promulgated rules and regulations recently, so that every State law in the Atlantic outside waters has been suspended for the duration of the war, and you and I now can take our nets and go to any place where there have been restricted waters and fish anywhere in said waters with any kind of gear. This has been done simply because the United States government has realized that this industry must have something under it to keep up maximum production to supply the war needs of the Nation. Gloucester shipped to the Italian armies and to other allied governments last year very large amounts of cured cod and herring. Local consumption could get very little of last winter's cure. This shortage should not have been allowed to occur.

Another thing. It has been declared by Provost Marshal General Crowder so important that a mariner should be kept at his work that he has been placed in Class 4 in our draft, and the Gloucester fishermen of draft age are at their employment, while the fellow ashore, curing the fish, has been called to war. The fisherman has been classed as a mariner and if he is as important as these instances show he is then we ought to follow out the policy of the National government with respect to him.

The average earnings of the fishermen are much less than the earnings of laborers ashore. They average less than $1,000 a year. Put against that the great risk, mind you, that there is. The greatest stock in the history of the fishing industry, the stock of the vessel which was the high liner last year, amounted to about $85,000 for the vessel, and each man shared $2,200. And yet I was taken into the Fishermen's Institute the other day and shown one of a crew who averaged $74 during last year's fishing. One made $2,200, the other made $74 for the year. Now, there are the extremes, so that it is hard to find a level which will be an average for all. One-quarter and oftentimes one-half of a fisherman's time is lost to him; he cannot work the entire time. Then the question of going out and coming back in debt brings the average down; and this frequently happens.

Now let us take up the losses of life. Here is what I am coming at, primarily. At least one-third of the losses are in families where there are a wife and children, — that is, where there are dependents, — and the average of our losses amounts to a wife and three children per man, that is, four dependents to a fatal loss at sea as against 2.49 which is the average of dependents for the loss of a land worker who is insured under the act at the present time. Practically none of the fishermen has any personal life insurance. What there is, if any, is the simple industrial policy, $100 or $200, — just enough with which to bury the person if he should die ashore.

Pringle's History of Gloucester tells us that between the years 1830 and 1892, 576 vessels, with 3,224 lives, had perished, an average of 52 losses of life a year in the industry in one port. We have 10,000 engaged in the industry all over the Commonwealth, but I simply am quoting figures for the one city I am familiar with, although I plead for the brave workers all over our State. That man power loss to one city from 1830 to 1892 was 3,224 lives. From 1892 to 1913, 1,251 men were lost, leaving 340 widows and 823 children. A further idea of the dependency may be gained from this figure. Take the whole period from 1860 through 1913, and there were 1,121 widows and 2,960 children left out of the one city alone. So that since 1830 5,000 deaths have resulted in the attempt of the people engaged to eke out a living and to supply us with a part of our sustenance. No records are available to give the number of dependents or the extent of the suffering during those years.

You ask me what happens if any one is lost at sea. Well, there are two words that sum it up. Public charity is the only thing. And I will tell you that that is a tremendous burden on the city, and on the State too. You would be surprised if you knew the amount of money which is coming out of our taxpayers to go to meet the demands of this form of public charity, something which should be spread all over the Commonwealth. The industry should bear the burden the same as other industries bear their burdens and then those who use the product will pay in its cost the infinitesimal amount which would be necessary to pay the premiums for some such sort of accident and death insurance. That kind of democracy is being preached in our draft and other war activities. The annual report of Gloucester industry shows that there is one charity which can be applied to for help, and what do you suppose the income from that fund was last year? Two hundred and eighty-three dollars, and aid was given to 13 families, — $22 apiece!

In the frontispiece of the Gloucester Fishermen's Institute Bulletin for the current year appears this simple statement. It portrays a picture we see painted very often down there, and I hope it will make an impression on your minds:

In Provincetown, on Labor Day, September, 1917, a procession of 72 fatherless children were carrying a large American Flag through the streets. A few days before in a wild storm that swept along the coast their fathers had all been drowned. When only one or two men are lost on a trip, an event of frequent occurrence, it is considered as one of the inevitable and unavoidable risks of a fisherman's life. The death is recorded "Lost at Sea" and the widow and children, if any, are left to struggle on as best they may. For be it known by all who read this that the protection afforded wage-earners on land, known as Employers' Liability and Workingmen's Compensation Acts, does not apply to seafaring men.

When 72 children are deprived of fathers in one day, we rub our eyes. The newspa-papers consider it news, and some generous minded people start a subscription for the care of orphans. In a few days some new sensation covers the front page of the papers and the orphans are forgotten. For the Provincetown orphans something over $20,000 was given. It costs $20,000 to educate one boy at West Point. Apparently then, we value the services of 19 brave men who died that we might live, as much as we value one young man who may die in our service or who may live all his life at our expense. Or consider it another way. We are willing to give as much for the education for four years of one boy whose service can be little more dangerous than that of our fishermen, as we are for the education of 72 boys and girls, some of them for 14 years, who will when large enough, give themselves to work of feeding the world and we have not the wisdom to do this by taxation, we do it by appealing to the well-to-do and generous. We honor our fishermen by telling them how brave they are, how necessary they are to the life of the Nation, and then when they die in our service, leave their widows and children without adequate protection! It is not misinterpreting the feelings of these men to say that their wish is more evidence that the State, as well as individuals, appreciates their work. It is ture that the fact that many of the fishermen work on a co-operation plan makes some difficulty in giving them the protection which is now given to wage-earners.
But a little thought could easily devise some method to give their families the protection they need and deserve. Looking at those 72 children marching behind the American Flag one wonders whether, when they become old enough to realize that the Nation it represents had seen their fathers die in its service, without giving them the protection that was their due [and which it gives others], they will still look upon it with loyalty and devotion. Is it not time that the people of the United States awoke to the fact that the way to make a loyal and united Nation is to give a proper care to the men and women who make the Nation? The bravest men we have, engaged in our most dangerous occupation, deserve at least an equal protection with all other workers.

Until as a Nation we do justice to those who "go down to the sea in ships," as individuals we must do all we can to make the life of our fishermen as pleasant as possible.

Now, what did we try to do? We brought a case for the fishermen under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and we were awarded a verdict by the Industrial Accident Board and by the courts of $10 a week for four hundred weeks, or $4,000. We thought then that our troubles were over. I have it from an associate in the office of one of the largest law firms in Boston that the captains and the owners in the industry filed into the office and said something to this effect:
"Gentlemen, we are ruined. What is this thing going to amount to?"
I have it from him that the head of the law firm, which firm is one of the biggest insurance firms in this city, said in substance: "Gentlemen, here is a way out. This Massachusetts act has got a joker in it. It is elective. It need have no application to you if you don't want to accept it. You can have your shore workers insured under it. You have your fish skinners, your bookkeepers, and those others who never get injured, and who never get lost at sea. Then what you can do is to go down home and form another corporation, separate from your other corporation, and transfer all your vessels to that corporation, and then let the vessels' corporation hire the men and let that corporation be kept separate from the other, keeping your bookkeepers, etc., employed by the old corporation where there is no chance of their being injured. Here is a way out of it, so you can cheat the orphans and widows that these men leave behind who die in your service.” What did they do but take the suggestion and go do it, and from that time to this there has not been a case that has been gotten by the Industrial Accident Board. Our act is elective, it allows them to take out no insurance if they do not want to, and they are not taking out any insurance and therefore there is no remedy coming for all those who are injured in the industry nor for the losses of life that I have shown you. Even payments on that one case have been stopped by the insurance company on account of the United States Supreme Court's decision in the case of The Southern Pacific Railroad v. Jensen (244 U. S. 205), in which it was held that it was a case for the United States courts, and that our Industrial Accident Board and our State courts have no jurisdiction. But Congress in October last year (Act Congress Oct. 6, 1917, c. 97, sec. 1) blocked that loophole and cured that decision, so that at the present time if another case comes up our Industrial Accident Board does have jurisdiction under our Workmen's Compensation Act. But what still is the trouble? We have got an elective act. There is nothing to compel our employers to insure their men, and there is the root of the present trouble. So the way is all set, by the United States Supreme Court's recent decisions and by the Act of Congress last October, for us now to remove the question of unconstitutionality from our State Constitution so that our Legislature, whenever it wants to, can do something; and the Supreme Court of the United States has made it clear and made it possible for an act to be not repugnant to the Federal Constitution if we cure our own Constitution. Knowing that this injustice is continuing are you going to let it go on without action?

Mr. Dresser of Worcester: Is the gentleman aware that every compulsory compensation act in the country so far has been held valid, and that the United States Supreme Court has held it valid, and does he have any serious doubt that the Legislature next year might enact a compulsory compensation act?

Mr. Wonson: I am aware that the Washington act has been upheld in 243 U. S. 219; the Iowa act has been upheld in 243 U. S. 210, and the New York act also has been upheld, 243 U. S. 188, but in the first two instances I am aware also that there is a choice given of several other ways of insuring, and I believe that was weighed very considerably by the court in declaring these compulsory acts constitutional. We have not yet got that situation here. New York, the third one that I am aware of, made a constitutional amendment in order to allow it. As for the Legislature doing anything in this regard now, the gentleman from Worcester (Mr. Dresser) knows the result of his proposition last year for self-insurance and knows the temper of our Legislature, and if he has had anything to do, which I have seen him have, with the Judiciary Committee in this Legislature, he will know that it is going to take years of plugging to get this Legislature to do anything for the widows and orphans, no matter where they are.
One trouble is, that they are afraid that after they do make a com-ulsory fund to which all employers can contribute it will not be constitutional after they get it. If we do not act here, I certainly hope the gentleman from Worcester is correct in his interpretation of the law.

Just one thought I want to leave with the delegates, and that is something that was called to our attention this morning. He twitted us with being dreamers. We might be called dreamers, in suggesting such a thing as compulsory accident insurance and justice for the poor, the injured, the widows and the orphans, and we were charged this morning with having a matter before us which savored of the dreamer. But somebody, I think it was Herbert Kaufman, has said about the dreamers that:

They are the chosen few, — the Blazers of the Way, — who never wear Doubt's bandage on their eyes — who starve and chill and hurt, but hold to courage and to hope, because they know that there is always proof of truth for them who try, — that only cowardice and lack of faith can keep the seeker from his chosen goal; but if his heart be strong and if he dream enough and dream it hard enough, he can attain, no matter where men failed before.

Walls crumble and empires fall. The tidal wave sweeps from the sea and tears a fortress from its rocks. The rotting nations drop from off Time's bough, and only things the dreamers make live on.

They are the Eternal Conquerors; their vassals are the years.

Mr. Bodfish of Barnstable moved that the resolution be amended by striking out lines 3 to 18, inclusive, the whole article of amendment, and inserting in place thereof the following:

The General Court shall have power to establish by general law any system or systems of pensions, compensation or insurance of persons for the benefit of any of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Bodfish: I believe that I can assert without fear of successful contradiction that it is the supreme duty of the State to conserve its human resources by providing for the enactment of laws to prevent and relieve industrial accidents, occupational diseases, overwork, involuntary unemployment, and other injurious effects of our modern condition of industry. Systems of relief are therefore of vital importance to the welfare of the State. The Convention will do well, then, to consider the proposition before it. It has been mentioned here that some of us believe in the lack of constitutional restraints, that we would leave the Legislature practically free to deal with any question as it sees fit; while others believe in filling the Constitution full of restrictions, even more restrictions than we have to-day. But I take it that most of us fall somewhere between these two extremes. For my part I believe, as I suggested in my remarks yesterday that Washington believed, that the government should be given sufficient power to carry out its functions. I believe that the Legislature should be given full and complete authority to deal with those questions whose solution depends upon, and must depend upon, constantly changing conditions. Now, this question that we have before us is one of those, and to-day we cannot say what will be good for the Commonwealth to-morrow. We all know that there has been wonderful change in the last twenty years, and in view of those tremendous changes that were unlooked for twenty years ago how can we, as a Convention, attempt to say what the Legislature shall do during the next twenty years, or during the life of this amendment?

It seems to me that it is expedient for us to adopt an amendment that is simple, broad, concise in its terms, that is in form what Marshall said every constitutional amendment should be,—devoid of specific detail and definition. By enumerating all the kinds of social insurance that we know of to-day we can only show to the future generations how limited our knowledge was when we adopted the amendment. It has been called to our attention that the commercial clause in the Constitution of the United States was the right kind of a clause. It was simple, just a few words, and yet it has enabled the National government to do what it has found necessary to be done in regulating interstate commerce. It has been called to our attention also what has been accomplished under the simple words stating the police power of the Commonwealth in our own Constitution, and it is my purpose in moving this amendment to attempt to state in broad, simple, concise form the great object that we hope to attain.

